financial mismanagement and internal revolution and commotion. Outside of these two points in which we hoped that Canada would have had a more prosperous year than she has had, I think there is nothing to prevent us from congratulating ourselves in this House and in the country upon the general state and condition of our trade, our industries and our products. Our harvests, although, as I have said, not very abundant, were, taking the country all round, of a fair average, and the prices received for our agricultural products were probably a considerable amount higher than in the preceding year, so that the total net results for the country at large was not so unfortunate as might have been thought at first. For the present year, although we cannot, of course, tell what may happen as the months develop, the prospects, especially in Manitoba and the North-West and in certain parts of the older Provinces, are fair; a largely increased area, especially in our western country, has been placed under crop, and at the present time the prospects there are of the brightest. With reference to the foreign trade for the year 1889-90, I may say that the aggregate trade was some $14,000,000 in excess of its preceding year and marked one of the best years in the history of Confederation, being some $65,000,000 in excess of the trade in 1878-79, the last year of the Administration which preceded the present Government. The exports for the past year under review were $7,500,000 more than they were in the year 1888-89 and some $25,000,000 in advance of the exports for the year 1878-79. There was a gratifying increase of the trade between Canada and Great Britain of $7,000,000 over and above the year 1888-89, and our trade increased to a greater or lesser degree with France, Germany, Portugal, Italy, Holland, Belgium, China, Japan and Switzerland. There was a decrease of about $1,000,000 in our trade with the United States of America, a slight decrease in our trade with Spain, and somewhat larger with Newfoundland and with South America and the West India Islands. The decrease in trade with some of these countries was because of reasons which I have previously stated, and I may say as well in this connection that, carrying out the promise of the preceding year, the current year which we have now completed will show a gratifying increase of exports over the very large increase of the previous year. Our home trade, taking our country through, so far as it appears to one looking with a broad glance at it, is, on the whole, in sound condition. Some branches of our industries are flourishing, while others are not so fortunate in that respect. But taking it all in all, I think it is an opinion which will be borne out by financial men, that the trade condition of the country is a sound one if it is not a very flourishing one. Our inter-provincial trade, which year by year has been becoming more and more a factor and an incident of our development, has its steady increase, and although we have not at hand an unerring means of denoting by statistical records what the exact increase in volume of this trade is, yet from certain large indications that we get we are assured that it is a constantly increasing factor, and that it carries with it all that increased energy and life and prosperity which comes from such a field of activity. Aided by our railways; trunk lines which have been built and which are now in the best of running condition, and smaller and more circumscribed lines, but in their way not less important railways, which develop certain local centres and pour out upon the trunk lines their contributions to commerce, both of these conjoined are, year by year, under prudent and skilful management in the main, accessory to the development of the trade of the country in this respect. Last year has seen an increase, too, in the mining activity of Canada. The Government, by its regulations put in last year's tariff providing that mining machinery of a class and kind not made here should be admitted free of duty for three years, has aided in that activity. The iron bounty is having its results, and in some parts of our country there will be this year large accessions to the productive power of Canada in that respect by capital which is at present being invested in that industry. The visit of the British Association of Miners and Engineers, which was paid incidentally to this country in connection with their annual meeting, has been, I am assured, of great importance to the future development of our mineral wealth. The opinion of experts and the actual views in the country of men who were pre-eminently practical and scientific in this regard, is having its effect in making better known the large and important resources of the Dominion. I must not omit to mention the benefit arising from the labours of our own department, which is partially charged with that, nor ought I incidentally to omit referring to the good which has come from the Commission which was appointed by the Ontario Government, whose labours were very thorough and the information given by which was very complete and of great importance. The immigration of the past year, although it has not been so large in volume as some of the preceding years, has been of a class which is thoroughly satisfactory, I think, to this country. It comprises a class of men who have responsibilities, who have money, who have experience more or less in actual farming, and who come into this country prepared to make their home and stay here, and with a skill and knowledge which is necessary for the development of the properties into which they come. I am sure that the recent visit of the Farmers' Delegates, so thorough and general as it was, and which has been succeeded by one of the most practical and complete reports which I have ever had the pleasure of reading, will have the effect of awakening an increased interest in Great Britain and other countries of Europe, and will be followed by its fruits of an increased immigration of the class of settlers which we particularly desire to have in this country. Our moneyed institutions have, on the whole, stood well the trying crisis of the past year. Whilst in the United States of America bank after bank has fallen under the stress and stringency of the money market, whilst in Great Britain and in London, the centre of the world's money market, there has been great suspense and great trouble and great stringency; our banks in this country have pursued the even tenor of their way; a gratifying fact which is, I think, partly due to the good system of banking which we have in Canada, but which is, perhaps, chiefly due to the practical knowledge and prudent skill of the men who have our banking institutions in charge, and who take cognizance of the signs of the trade of the world as they appear from time to time and accommodate themselves in a skilful and prudent way to these necessities, and who also heed the warnings which are obtained in that way and so steer a prudent course.

Our credit abroad stands as in preceding years; and although the financial troubles which have occurred over the civilized world, and which have been especially felt in the money markets of Europe, have had the effect of depreciating our securities, as the securities of all other countries and all other colonies have been for the time depreciated, and even the British consols themselves, yet our securities stand in comparison better than those of our sister colonies, and, taking all things into consideration, they hold their own in every respect. I think we can congratulate ourselves upon the buoyant nature of the revenue of the past financial year, a revenue the largest in the history of this country, a revenue which did not come from increased taxation as a result of changes and additions to the tariff, but which is an evidence of the power of the people to buy, and consequently marks to a certain extent their prosperity and the soundness of their financial condition. I think we may congratulate ourselves, too, upon the balance which has been kept between the revenues and expenditures of the country, as will be more apparent when I take up those matters in detail. Altogether, Mr. Speaker, to leave this branch, which may serve as an introduction to what is still more germane and pertinent to the question in hand, I think we may say that we have a happy, a united, a progressive, and a right-minded people, who are glad to live in this country and under Canadian institutions, who have a hopeful outlook with reference to the future, and who are full of progress and activity at present. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the House will allow me, I wish to deal for a moment with some more general trade interests. It is within the memory of the members of this House that some two or three years ago I had the pleasure of introducing resolutions which looked to the formation of lines of steamship communication towards the West Indies, towards Great Britain in the matter of a more rapid and better equipped Atlantic line, and towards Australia, China and Japan in respect to improved and regular steamship communications on the Pacific Ocean. I am very glad to say, with reference to these lines, that two of them have been established, and at the present time, I believe, have been well established. Different lines of steamers to the West Indies were started in part as an experiment, and with a desire, if possible, to open up trade by couriers of a regular and more speedy kind, with the islands of the Carribbean Sea and some of the coasts of South America; and although difficulties have been met—very great difficulties, of which the House will know when we take up those particular subjects—I believe I may say to the House that these lines are now fairly well established, under conditions as good as we may hope to obtain at the present, and on a standing and a basis upon which they will be able to prove in the course of two or three years, I hope to the satisfaction of this House and the country, that there lie in those islands to the south of us possibilities of a large and remunerative commerce, as regards especially branches of trade which are complements of each other, and to which in neither country is there home competition, but only the competition from outside. With reference to the Pacific, I may state that the line of vessels which was subsidized by the British Government, and in part by the Canadian Government, has at length been established; and within the last two months the first of those well-built, finely-equipped and speedy vessels has been put upon the route, and passengers and mails have come from the far East across the Pacific Ocean, across our Canadian part of this continent and home to the old country in a space of time surprisingly short, which has elicited astonishment and comment of the most gratifying kind from the press and public men of Great Britain and the continent of Europe. We have, as a Government, put forth every possible energy to have the fast Atlantic line established as well. The House is cognizant of the history of that line up to the past year. During last year we entered into a provisional contract with a company which had very great financial strength, and of which Mr. Bryce Douglas was the agent on this side of the sea. Mr. Douglas visited this country and personally inspected the Canadian Pacific Railway and the ports upon the Pacific; and I may state that he was very enthusiastic both with reference to the prospects of this country and the prospects of a remunerative trade being built up across the country and across the Atlantic, sufficient to warrant the placing of vessels of the best style and equipment between our ports and the ports of Great Britain. A provisional contract was entered into, and, if it had not been for two reasons, one of which, and not the least important, was the disorganization which took place in the money markets at home, for reasons which are well known to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, but, more especially, the sudden and lamented death of Mr. Bryce Douglas himself, who was the soul and the inspiring genius of the company, I think we would have been able to inform this House that a hard and fast contract had been entered into for a line of steamships equal in style and equipment to the best that plies between the ports of New York and the ports of Great Britain and the continent; but the death of Mr. Douglas, especially, and the disorganized state of the money markets, has postponed this project, and the Government has again to try its hand, with the aid of the liberal donation which Parliament has placed at its disposal, with the view of bringing about what both sides of this House have declared by their votes and confidence they wish to see accomplished. Since last year the McKinley Bill, which was under discussion when this House was in session, and the main features of which were thoroughly settled before we separated, has gone into active operation. That Bill was looked upon with much apprehension and much hesitation by large interests in every part of this country. It threatened some of our trade interests; it certainly pointed to a displacement and a diversion of trade in several important particulars. Canada has had some months of experience of its operation; and, so far as I can see, upon a fair and just retrospect of the months that have passed, and the industries that have been affected, the industrial interests of Canada have stood the strain well, being far less harmed than was anticipated when that Bill was under discussion and when it was about to be passed by the Congress of the United States. The people of Canada, whilst, in some respects, they deplored some features of that Bill, knew that, so far as the Governments of Canada had been concerned, from 1867 up, no fault could be attached to them if there was not a better basis of trade relations between the United States and this country than actually existed. They knew that when, in 1866, the old reciprocity treaty was abrogated, that abrogation took place, not at the desire of Canada, but at the express instance of the United States, and they knew that, from that time up to the present, time and again, Canada has made advances, in a fair and honourable spirit, for the resumption of the old or the inauguration of new relations upon some fair and equitable basis. Looking back at the results which followed the abrogation of the old reciprocity treaty, the people of Canada, although they deplored some features of the McKinley Bill, did not think, viewing their past circumstances, present condition, and future prospects, that they had reason to become discouraged or be less hopeful than before. Looking back to 1866, and knowing that there was then found sufficient trade energy and skill and purpose in this country to convert what was then supposed to have been a great evil into what actually turned out to be a real good, inasmuch as it put Canadians upon their own mettle and energy and made them carve out for themselves fresh and remunerative channels of trade and commerce, they felt that, though they would fain have wished for better relations with the United States, they had ample resources, ample energy and a wide field about them; and setting to work, with that business energy and pluck which is characteristic of Canadians, they met the situation without grumbling or becoming despondent, and with a cheerful and hopeful facing of the future. Sir, that McKinley Bill had barely passed when, at the instance of a large interest in this country, I sent a skilful and practical man to Great Britain, who made a thorough investigation into one branch of trade which, it was supposed, would be seriously affected by the McKinley Bill, namely, the egg trade; and the investigations he made, and which have been since continued, by the High Commissioner, have resulted in a mass of information and a settled conviction, not only in this country but Great Britain as well, that for eggs and poultry there exists on that side a market of unlimited dimensions, in which home competition is at a minimum and the demand continually progressing, and in which, when we have studied and thoroughly mastered, as can be easily done, its wants and idiosyncracies, we may find a continual and unlimited market for the articles we may choose to raise and export. Statistics show, beyond a doubt, that in the United States market, the demand for our surplus eggs was becoming every year smaller, because of the home competition and the increase of the home supply. Statistics show, on the other hand, that in Great Britain the demand is constantly outrunning the supply, and that there is no probable time in the future when it will not be measurably greater than it is at present And what is true with reference to eggs is true, in part, with reference to poultry and live animals, and hay and other commodities. And I do not fear to assert and stake my reputation on the future turn of events, when I say it, that, just as that market which, for live stock, cheese and certain other commodities, was a few years ago very limited and has since expanded, until to-day it gives to our trade millions of dollars and the certainty of remunerative prices, so it will, in regard to these other articles, follow the same line and be productive of equal profit to this country. I am sure that no man in this House could wish for anything else, and all must wish for this result. And I see no reason, from past experience, after studying the conditions of the trade, to warrant me in making my statement less strong than I have made it. With reference to the West India trade, some attempt has been made in past years to foster the Canadian trade with these islands. Steamship companies were subsidized with that end in view, and last year, under the authority of Council, I had the pleasure of visiting those islands and of having conferences with their Governments, and merchants and people, in order to find out for myself something more intimately of the condition and the prospects of trade between our country and those islands. And what did I find there? I found, in the first place, the people of the British West India Islands most fairly disposed towards this country. They greeted with pleasure the interest which had been evinced by my visit to them. They had only the warmest feelings for their brethren further to the north and, without exception, expressed themselves as heartly in favour of all possible extension of trade between those islands and Canada. Just about that time, the McKinley Bill came into operation, with its diverse effects upon the people of the West India Islands, and this measure gave them much to think about before they could accept the proposition I was authorized to make, of a differential treatment of the products required by the one country from the other. Owing to the passage of the McKinley Bill, very grave thought and very serious consideration had to be given by them at that particular juncture before they could accept our terms or declare themselves in anyway with reference to my proposition. Sir, the mistake Canada made was in not putting steamships upon that route 12 or 15 years ago. If we had done that, we would have opened the channels of trade between both countries previously to the opening of the steamship lines between the islands and the United States, and we would have had already a trade in large part established with all the advantages that come from it. But while we were lying idle, not doing our duty, steamship lines regular and frequent had been sent from the ports of the United States, business channels had been opened, and business relations formed, and along these the lines of trade and interest ran until at present Canada has to introduce her wares in competition with an old and long-established business interest. But, Sir, I am convinced that, when careful thought has been given to this, and when the results of the McKinley tariff and the reciprocity clause in connection with it comes to be fully worked out, there is a great probability that the people of the West India Islands, who are so well disposed towards us and are so willing to trade with us in every possible way, will be willing, and not only willing but glad, to meet with us in order to arrange a mutually beneficial system of trade between their islands and this country. Sir, it may be—it ought not to be—but it may be a favourite pastime of some people to ridicule the idea of trade between Canada and the West India Islands. We ought not to do that. The West India Islands, inhabited, it is true, in large part by black people, have a large population which consumes very largely, and the aggregate trade of those islands to-day amounts to more than $75,000,000, nearly one-half of which consists of the import of articles which are specialties of Canada, so far as their production is concerned. They consume those articles which are our natural products and the products of our industries which, when they are introduced into the West India Islands will, I am convinced, find a ready reception there. That this is the fact is proved by the result of the last year's work, and by the results which are just beginning to be apparent, of the exhibition which took place in Jamaica, where Canada made a most important and a most successful exhibit, where she disabused the minds of our island brethren of many prejudices and wrong conceptions which they had had in regard to us, where she displayed her wares and her goods to the best advantage, and where she proved to them that a mutually advantageous trade could take place, and laid the foundation for that trade in actual sales, in many orders, and in prospective trade, which those who had their exhibits there informed me speaks well for future commerce between that country and ours. Then, we have had, during the past year, an answer from the United States of America, different from any answer which has been received from 1866 up to the present time. The papers have been laid on the Table of the House, or at least a part of them. They will form a subject of discussion later on. Suffice it for me to say at the present moment that on an invitation given by Mr. Secretary Blaine—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER,—the delegates from Canada went to Washington for the purpose of having an informal conversation with Mr. Blaine, and talking over the possibilities of trade relations between their country and ours. They went there, and at the expressed desire of the United States, and, for their convenience and not for ours, the President of the United States asked us to postpone that informal conference which was appointed at that time, and to meet on his own invitation in a formal conference to be held in Washington in the month of October next. That is the state of things as it exists. In response to the offers which have often been made through the British Ministers and otherwise, that is the first time when the United States Government have intimated that they are willing to sit down with us and canvass fairly and freely the basis of a trade arrangement. It is not my business at present, nor would it be prudent for me to lay down the lines or go into details as to what will be the policy of the Government, when this meeting takes places in October. But I may say this, that the Government holds itself ready, as the Liberal-Conservative Governments have always done, to meet the United States on a fair and equitable basis and with the sincere and earnest desire to remove all differences that exist and to give the greatest freedom of trade compatible with the best interests of this country in its relations with the United States of America. Certainly no Government of a self-governing and self-respecting country should be asked to do more. Further than this, we can state that while we are willing to make all the concessions that on these lines can fairly be made, we are not willing to go so far as to injuriously shut ourselves out from the trade which we have with Great Britain and the other countries in the world, that we are not willing to forego, for a doubtful gain, the substantial advantages which we have enjoyed and expect to enjoy from our relations with the mother country, from which connection we have reaped so much in the past and from which we hope so much in the future. But, so far as is consistent with the best interests of this country and in the broadest commercial and national sense, having regard to our standing as a country forming a portion of the Empire, we are prepared to go as far as these considerations will allow us, and not one single step further. And the Government of the United States would not require more. The Government of no self-respecting country would ask for more, but would honour that country which would maintain the position of self-respect which we inevitably must take. I do not despair that, when our conference takes place in October, if disturbing conditions are not injected which might bring about a defeat, it may be found possible for relations to be formed which will place our intercourse with the United States on a more satisfactory footing than it is to-day, So much with regard to these general matters. Passing to another point, I wish to take up the change which has been made in regard to our Dominion Savings Banks. The members of the House who have followed the constitution of these banks, and the regulations under which they have been conducted, know that the rate of interest and the amount of the deposit have been frequently changed. On December 24th, 1877, the limit was placed at $1,000. In 1880, the limit was $3,000. In 1886, it was made $1,000; and in 1887, the maximum was placed at $1,000, with a further limit of $300 a year as the maximum for a yearly deposit, and in 1889 the rate of interest was reduced to 3½ p.c. Previous to making that Order in Council and subsequent to it, the balance which had heretofore existed upon the side of deposits, came to be changed, and from August, 1889, up to the present time, each month, almost without exception, has seen a withdrawal from the savings banks of the country, larger than the deposits which were placed therein. This is not wholly due to the change in the rate of interest, inasmuch as the withdrawals commenced in excess of deposits some months before the lower rate of interest came into operation. However, it has gone on, and for several causes which might be named, until we find that in the year 1889-90 there was a net reduction of nearly $2,000,000. This reduction, however, does not show a loss in the gross deposits of the country, and consequently in the earnings of the country at large, but rather a transference. As proof of the statement I make, I have here a table prepared as follows:—

DEPOSITS IN BANKS ON 31ST MAY.

In Post Office Savings Banks	22,132,854 19	21,357,554 67	21,130,429 26
In Dominion Savings Banks	19,214,227 95	18,498,290 34	17,114,889 84
In Chartered Banks payable on demand ...	55,165,595 67	51,440,101 67	56,522,473 82
In Chartered Banks payable after notice or on a fixed day.	68,795,851 55	74,629,147 67	84,679,400 27
City and District Savings Bank and La Caisse d'Economie.....	10,728,563 45	10,778,164 86	10,994,546 49
	176,037,092 81	176,703,258 81	190,441,739 68

From this it appears that the gross sum of the savings of the country and the deposits of the country in the different savings banks for 1889, amount to $176,000,000; in 1890, to $176,700,000; in 1891, to $190,500,000, thus showing that the total savings and deposits of the people of the country in 1891 had increased about $14,000,000; so that whatever withdrawal there was from the Government and savings banks, is not at all to be taken as a sign of lessened earnings or of lessened savings of the country. Part of it has been due, since the Order in Council was passed, to the change which has taken place in the policy of the banks of the country, the Bank of Montreal, and by other banks, having introduced savings departments or branches, in which they take sums as low as one dollar, and have been paying interest at the rate of 4 per cent. upon them, and this accounts in part for the withdrawal, I am sure, of some of the savings from our banks. However, in order to meet the withdrawals from the savings banks, and which is, in some respects, a redemption of debt, and in order to meet the redemption of debt which fell due from time to time instead of going upon the the market for loans, I have been, during the last year, obliged to have temporary loans negotiated by our agents with banks in London, in order to meet these withdrawals and these redemptions of debt. These loans are, as I have said, temporary; they run for twelve and six months, to expire on the first of July in the present year, when arraugements will be made and are now nearly completed, I believe, for their being carried on for six or twelve months longer. This is necessitated from the fact that the state of the London money market, and the state of securities upon that market, make it an imprudent thing for the Dominion of Canada, with a due regard to the high position that our credit has obtained, to go for any regular loans under present conditions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman might as well state the amount of the loan, and the rate of interest paid?

Mr. FOSTER. The amount of the loan is £400,000, on the 30th June, 1890; and £600,000 in December, 1890, one running for twelve and the other for six months, the rate of interest being, the first 4 per cent., and the second 4½ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that all, or did you borrow any more?

Mr. FOSTER. That is all we have borrowed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you propose to borrow more?

Mr. FOSTER. We may have to borrow a little more. It depends largely upon the withdrawals which we have to meet. Turning now to the year 1889-90, the results may be tabulated as follows:—

	Estimates.	Receipts.	Difference.
Customs	$24,000,000	$23,968,953	−$ 31,046
Excise	7,000,000	7,618,118	+ 618,118
Miscellaneous	8,200,000	8,292,853	+ 92,853
Totals	$39,200,000	$39,879,935	$679,925

From this it is seen that while there was a slight falling off from my estimate in Customs, there was a large increase in both Excise and Miscellaneous, making the receipts in all nearly $700,000 in excess of the estimated revenue. It is, however, only fair to say that the large increase in Excise was due to the fact that on the 1st July of the current year, the law respecting the keeping of spirit in tanks for ageing purposes, for two years, came into effect, and that a large withdrawal, contributing duties amounting to $400,000 or $500,000, was thereby thrown upon that year, instead of coming, as it otherwise would, into the current year. Compared with the revenue of 1888-89, there has been an increase of $1,097,055, o which—

Customs gives an increase of	$ 242,170	or 1·02	p.c.
Excise gives an increase of	731,379	" 10·62	"
Miscellaneous gives an increase of	123,506	" 1·51	"
Totals	$1,097,055	" 2·90	"

The following is a list of articles from which we received increased Customs duties in the year under review. None of them are very large, the largest item being that of wines and spirits, which was partly in anticipation and to a certain extent the result of the higher duties which were placed on these last year.

Ale, beer and porter	$ 7,424
Animals, living	15,178
Arrowroot, biscuit, &c	22,359
Grain of all kinds	71,093
Cement	26,804
Coal and coke	96,486
Copper, and manufactures of	7,997
Drugs, dyes, chemicals, and medicines	25,955
Embroideries, N.E.S	4,639
Fish, and products of	4,212
Fruit and nuts (dried)	12,776
Fruits, green	12,598
Gloves and mitts	112,975
Gold and silver, manufactures of	7,616
Gunpowder and other explosives	10,486
Gutta percha and India rubber, manufactures of	29,716
Lead, and manufactures of	16,565
Oils, coal and kerosene	23,486
Oils, all other	26,003
Paper, and manufactures of	23,843
Paints and colours	2,878
Provisions	36,807
Salt	7,149
Soap	19,836
Spirits and wines	179,410
Stone	17,019
Molasses	10,012
Sugar candy	8,787
Seeds and roots	15,713
Tea	5,030
Tobacco, and manufactures of	12,912
Vegetables	21,337
Watches	10,315
Wool, and manufactures of	193,661
All other	254,535

In the undermentioned articles there has been a decrease in the duties collected as compared with 1888-89:

Flour and meal of all kinds	$ 25,586
Brick and tiles	6,215
Carriages	29,384
Cottons, manufactures of	60,988
Fancy goods	9,967

Flax, hemp and jute, manufactures of	$ 17,888
Furs, and manufactures of	11,693
Glass, and manufactures of	15,520
Iron and steel	35,218
Leather, and manufactures of	93,700
Musical instruments	26,248
Silk, manufactures of	38,311
Sugar of all kinds	824,176

I may mention that the largest article in the items of decrease is that of sugar of all kinds, which show a decrease of $824,176, showing that that year was not at all a normal year, the causes for which are variously explained. In Excise an increase has taken place in respect of every item upon which Excise duties are levied, as will be seen from the following table, in which it will be found that there was a large increase in Excise, explained, as I have stated; an increase not to a very large amount in malt, an increase in cigars, and a slight increase in tobaccos and snuffs. In Excise an increase has taken place in respect of every item upon which Excise duties are levied, as will be seen from the following :—

	1888-89.	1889-90.	Duty accrued, 1889-90.	Increase over, 1888-89.
	Gals.	Gals.
Spirits	2,972,931	3,574,799	$4,617,643	$746,910

On the whole, it cannot be said this shows a very great increase in the consumption of these liquors the country through, inasmuch as if you take the estimate I made with respect to Excise and the increase of population, the increase per capita shows no very great increase over the preceding years, and stands at the present time far less than it did on the average in 1867. This will appear from the following table :—

Per Capata Consumption of Liquors and Tobacco.

	Spirits.	Beer.	Wine.	Tobacco.
	Gals.	Gals.	Gals.	Lbs.
Average since 1867	1·168	2·664	·142	2·117
do 1888-89	·776	3·263	·097	2·153
do 1889-90	·883	3·360	·104	2·143

The expenditure in 1889-90 I estimated at $36,500,000, the actual expenditure was $35,994,031 ; that is, the actual expenditure fell below the estimate $505,969. On the other hand, the expenditure of that year fell below the expenditure of the previous year $923,803. So that, with a saving in expenditure as regards the estimated amount, a saving in the total expenditure as compared with the preceding year and an excess of revenue over what was estimated, there is a gain which accounts for the large surplus over and above what I had anticipated. Increases took place as compared with the expenditures of the previous year, as follows :—

Sinking Fund	$150,593
Civil Government	27,133
Legislation	231,017
Administration of Justice	23,978
Penitentiaries	30,403
Superannuations	22,831
Railways and Canals	25,529

And an increase of $309,603 in the services chargeable to Collection of Revenue. But, on the other hand, there were marked decreases in the following :—

Interest on Public Debt	$492,090
Charges of Management	15,940
Premium, Discount and Exchange	27,242
Immigration	92,408
Quarantine	17,807
Militia	36,538
North-West Mounted Police	76,608
Public Works	326,730
Mail Subsidies, &c	17,939
Ocean and River Service	154,052
Lighthouse and Coast Service	45,664
Marine Hospitals	10,603
Fisheries	26,702
Subsidies to Provinces	146,505
Miscellaneous	237,964

Taking, then, into consideration the fact that the revenue gave more than I anticipated, that the actual expenditure fell below the receipts, I am able to say to the House that on Consolidated Fund Account, after all the services for which appropriations have been made had been taken care of by the Government, there remains a surplus of $3,885,893 over the ordinary receipts. That is not, however, to say that we have the sum of $3,885,893 actually in pocket. There are capital expenditures as follows :—Railways and Canals, $3,419,132 ; on Public Works, $495,421 ; Dominion Lands, $133,832; North-West rebellion claims, $4,773, to which, if we add the railway subsidies, $1,678,196, and the transfer of the Cobourg debentures, $44,496, we have a total capital expenditure of $5,776,301. So that, Mr. Speaker, the account as a whole of expenditure and income stands in this way : That we took care of the ordinary expenses of the country out of the Consolidated Fund, that we laid up in the Sinking Fund against our debt and for the reduction of the debt, $1,887,237, and had a surplus of $3,885,893 which we placed over against capital expenditure, and came out at the end with an increase of debt of only $3,170. It, therefore, appears that the statement I made in this House three years ago, and which met with severe ridicule from hon. gentlemen opposite, comes out very nearly verified. I stated that I thought by 1891 an equilibrium ought to be had between expenditure and income, taking in capital expenditure as well as expenditure on Consolidated Fund account, and this has taken place with the trifling exception of $3,170, which is merely nominal. So that the net debt on 30th June, 1890, is $237,533,211, or within a few dollars of the sum it was one year previous. Sir, it may not be amiss to lay before the House the course of the finances during the last three years. The expenditure on Consolidated Fund in 1887-88 was $36,718,494 ; 1888-89, $36,917,834 ; 1889-90, $35,994,031. The revenue was, 1887-88, $35,908,463; 1888-89, $38,732,870 ; 1889-90, $39,879,925. The deficit in 1887-88 was $810,031, in 1888-89 the surplus was $1,865,035, in 1889-90 it was $3,885,893. The capital expenditure has kept almost the same for three years, being nearly an average of $5,500,000, the amounts being : 1887-88, $5,464,502; 1888-89, $5,267,035; 1889-90, $5,731,354. The net debt had increased, in 1887-88, $7,216,583; in 1888-89, $2,998,983, and in 1889-90, $3,170. The rate of interest on the gross debt was, in 1887-88, 3·45; in 1888-89, 3·52; in 1889-90, 3·37, the lowest rate it has reached, with the exception of one year, since Confederation. The net rate of interest on debt was, in 1887-88, 3·12; in 1888-89, 3·07; in 1889-90, 2·99, the lowest point it has reached since 1867. The average interest per capita on the net debt, which is the burden of the debt on the people as shown by the payment for interest, was, in 1887-88, 1·79; in 1888-89, 1·74; in 1889-90, 1·65, or only 6 cents more per head than it was in 1879, before the Canadian Pacific Railway was begun to be built or the vast expenditure on canals made. Coming now to the present year, which is pretty near completed, and about which, therefore, we have fairly certain data, I may state that the estimate for Customs made last year was $23,500,000, for Excise $7,000,000, and for Miscellaneous $8,700,000, or a total of $39,200,000. Up to 20th June, 1891, the receipts amounted to $36,606,357, and if we receive the same revenue for the remaining ten days as we received last year, the total revenue will reach $38,858,701. So there will be a decrease from my estimate of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $800,000. The expenditure up to 20th June, 1891, was $30,249,329, and if we take the expenditure of last year as a measure for the expenditure for the remaining period of this year, which was $5,619,427, our total expenditure on that basis will be $35,868,757. But between 20th June and 30th June of this year there are extraordinary expenses which were not met in the same period of time last year, the items for legislation, for the census, and one or two others. Therefore we must add $345,000, which will make the expenditure in all probability about the region of $36,000,000, so that the expenditure for 1890-91, deducted from the income of 1890-91, will give for this year a surplus of about $2,100,000, which is again on the right side of the account. The capital expenditure for 1890-91 has been kept far below that of the preceding year. For Public Works we estimate altogether, with what we know has been actually spent, $500,000; Railways and Canals, $2,300,000; Dominion Lands and Railway Subsidies, $1,400,000, making a total capital expenditure in the neighbourhood of $4,200,000. If we take the Sinking Fund, $1,900,000, which again is laid up against our debt and is so much in reduction of debt, and the surplus of $2,100,000, we will find that as between that and the capital expenditure we will come out within $100,000 or $150,000 of being equal, whereas last year we came out within $3,071. This cannot be stated at present to a certainty, but it will not exceed the sum I have named. As regards 1891-92 I cannot make any well-defined estimate. There may be certain changes in the tariff, if the good will of this House carries out the intention of the Government which will affect to a certain extent any estimate which could be made; suffice it to say that the revenues for next year, upon what basis I can estimate for at the present time, will be in the neighbourhood of $37,500,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you give the details?

Mr. FOSTER. The details I can scarcely give, but I think I will have a little more to say about that by-and-bye. So much, then, with reference to the condition of our finances. I now go to another and, may be, more interesting section of my subject. Last year the House will remember that we had a rather extended revision of the tariff. I am not one of those who believe that in a country like this, with a protective tariff which is based upon the condition of the industries which require protection, and the condition of industries in other countries and of the labour markets of other countries—I am not one of those who believe that there should be a cast-iron tariff for a stated period of years; conditions change, and with them, if we are reasonable and prudent, we must change the conditions of our fiscal policy. Neither am I, on the other hand, one of those who believe that it is best for the general interest of the country that too frequent tariff revisions should be made. This year I have had pressed upon me, not a very large number I must say, but still a considerable number of changes in the tariff, some of which possess great merit, and if I were making a general revision of the tariff I should certainly recommend them for the consideration of the House; but taking into account the fact that last year we had a rather extended tariff revision, that this is a summer session and is going to be a short and a hot one, and that we have commercial negotiations on foot between ourselves and the United States, I put these three considerations together as a very good reason, which I think the House will approve of, for the decision that the Government has come to, to make no general revision of the tariff this year. There is, however, one article which appeals to every man's palate and to most men's pockets, and which has claimed the attention of the people of this country for the last few months more largely than perhaps any other; I refer to the article of sugar. Sugar has always been looked upon in Canada as a large producer of revenue, and it has always been made to pay its tribute into the public treasury. Sugar, in one respect, is one of the best articles possible for distributing the taxation, the rich and the poor use it largely in proportion to their means, it is diffused through every section of the country and is used by every class of the people, and there is possibly no article upon which a part of the revenues of the country can be more equitably placed. For fear that some may have, as some have intimated to me, the idea that the Liberal-Conservative Government is the only Government which has put taxation upon sugar and levied large duties from it, I had a table prepared of the course of the sugar duties of the Dominion of Canada, since 1868, and I find that commencing in 1868 with a tax of 1 cent a pound, and 25 per cent. upon all over No. 9 Dutch standard, we have gone on consecutively raising the impost in 1878, 1879 and 1882—I think that was the last revision of the sugar duties, if I mistake not. Therefore a large proportion of the revenue of the country in all these periods from 1868 up to the present time has been obtained from the article of sugar. The course of the sugar industry has been a remarkable one in this country; upon it two parties have had their policies clearly and sharply defined, and I have prepared the following table for insertion in the Official Debates of the House on this subject:

In 1878, under the regime and policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, this country imported and took for home consumption 109,000,000 pounds of sugar at a value of $6,186,000 paid to the outside producer, with a duty of $2,595,000, the rate of duty being 41 per cent. That sugar cost 5·65 cents per pound, the duty upon it was 2·37 cents per pound, and the extraordinary fact—not extraordinary, but remarkable fact which I wish noted is that of this sugar, only 6 per cent. was raw while 94 per cent. was refined, and had been refined by the labour and the capital and within the confines of other countries than our own. What I want to note in that is, the small consumption of sugar, the very large price paid to the outside world for it, the high cost per pound as payment to the outside world, the high duty per pound, and the almost total absence of the refining industry in this country. Well, Sir, in 1879, another policy was introduced; that was the policy of refining the sugar in our own country. That year had its results, and, in 1880, 118,800,000 pounds of sugar was taken for home consumption, costing $4,000,000 instead of $6,000,000, with a cost per pound of 3·35 cents instead of 5·65 cents, and a duty of 1·75 cents per pound instead of 2·37 cents, and with the other result, that the percentage of raw sugar imported rose from 6 to 68, and the percentage of refined sugar fell from 94 to 32. And so has gone on the history and progress of the sugar question until 1889, the last normal year, when, without disturbance of McKinley Bills, prospective or actual, the consumption of sugar in the Dominion of Canada reached the enormous amount of 223,841,171 pounds, more than twice the quantity consumed in 1878, the cost of that quantity being $5,000,000 to us as regards the outside world, as against $6,000,000 in 1878 for less than half the amount—2·60 cents per pound being the cost and 1·64 cents per pound the duty, whilst the amount of sugar brought in raw, and refined in this country, rose to 95 per cent., and the refined sugar brought into the country fell to 5 per cent. This table will be for the members on both sides of the House to see and to criticize. What I want to draw the attention of the House to is the fact of the decreased burdens represented in the reduced price we have paid for sugar to the outside world, in the cheaper sugar itself, in the lower duty per pound, in the increased consumption, due, in part, to greater cheapness, and to the growth of the industry of refining in our own country, amounting at the present time to 95 per cent. of all the sugar that we use in this country, and a further accompanying result, the enlarged trade with the native sugar-growing and producing countries. So that, whereas in 1878 our sugar was bought, refined, entirely from Great Britain and the United States, almost none coming from the countries of production, now it is mostly all from countries of production, and an increased trade takes place between ourselves and them as a consequence. Now, Sir, at this particular juncture of circumstances, it becomes necessary for the Government to look over the whole question and to consider its policy with reference to this question of sugar. The amount which was consumed in 1889, the last full year, was 223,841,171 pounds, from which a duty was collected of $3,675,724. If the Government yield to the demand for free sugar, it has to face the reduction of the duties in a normal year of pretty near $3,675,000, because the most of that is upon raw sugar, very little being refined sugar. Taking the last three normal years, we will say roughly that the amount of the duty which has accrued, has been $3,500,000 per year, and it is a difficult question for a Government to face, considering, on the one hand, its desire to give cheap sugar to the masses of the people, and on the other, the imperative necessity for maintaining a fair balance between expenditure and revenue. But the Government has looked over this whole question, and on two conditions, it has come to the conclusion to sweep away, from the burden of the great mass of the people, with one stroke of the pen, $3,500,000 of taxation; and I venture to say, Sir, that never in the history of Canada, either before Confederation or since Confederation, has any Government come down to the House with such a large reduction of taxes as is involved in this proposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now let us hear your conditions.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman asks for my conditions. I shall present them to the House in all kindness, and yet with all the emphasis possible. They are two—first, that we shall assent to a greater economy in public expenditures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Good; hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to know that I have the assent of hon. members opposite to that proposal, and I know, and knew previous to this, that I would have the assent of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; and I promise them and the House that if this Government continues to supervise the expenditures—as we intend to do despite the different motions for adjournment which may, from time to time, be moved—we shall practise this economy in no niggardly spirit, but we will, while giving cheap and free sugar to the people, give them as much as the country ought reasonably to ask for the public works and services and improvements of the country. The other condition is that there shall be compensating duties to a certain extent

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen must not say "oh" yet. You must not expect to have all the sugar without having something bitter to mix with it. The compensating duty will not be to the full amount of the burden of taxation of which the country will be relieved; for, while we propose to take off $3,500,000, we propose to ask the House to allow us to put on $1,500,000, and the question is, where can that be put? It has been urged that we should put a duty on tea and coffee, and if we followed the example of hon. gentlemen opposite, an example which in the main is bad, and which in this instance I do not propose to follow, we would clap a duty of 2 and 3 cents a pound on coffee, and 5 and 6 cents a pound upon tea, and thereby invade the poor man's breakfast-table afresh. Instead of doing that, we propose to make the breakfast-table a freedom in reality—to keep the coffee free, to keep the tea free, and to give the sugar free as well; and we look to a different source for raising the $1,500,000, a source from which we think it can be raised most easily, with the least burden upon the great masses of the people, and we hope with the least dissatisfaction to the country at large. I propose to ask that the House consent to the imposition of 1 cent per pound additional on malt. Malt has, up to the present, with few exceptions, borne a duty of 1 cent per pound, and this addition will add, according to my calculation, 3 cents in cost to every gallon of beer; and I ask the brewers, the maltsters, the wholesale sellers and retail sellers, and, if need be, the drinkers, to divide this 3 cents among them and make a cheerful and pleasant face over it. This, on the basis of last year's consumption of malt, will give a revenue in the neighbourhood of $500,000. For fear there should be any jealousy in this matter, I propose to ask the distillers to consent to the imposition of a slight increase in the Excise duty upon distilled spirits, which will add but very little, 20 cents per gallon, to the cost of that article; and if it is necessary, I want to ask the distillers, and the wholesale sellers, and the retail traders, and the drinkers as well, to divide this equitably among them and make a pleasant face over the operation. That increase will give, upon the basis of last year's output, about $600,000; and then, that we may all have our luxuries put on an even basis, I am going to ask the tobacco men to submit to 5 cents per pound upon tobacco as an Excise duty, and a similar amount upon the import, which will figure up to $400,000. All these, added together, will give $1,500,000; and with the imposition of $1,500,000 taxes in these ways, which I think the great mass of the people will approve, when we take into account the large relief given to them, we propose to remit the sugar tax of $3,500,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the sugar duties to be absolutely and totally abolished without reserve?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman must understand me to mean, as I have no doubt he does, that when I have said that the duty upon raw sugars amounted to $3,500,000 and that it is remitted, it is the duty of course upon raw sugar which is remitted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite would even violate the precious example of the United States, when all along they have been asking us to imitate their example and be guided by them in all our commercial policy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman's proposition, as I understand it, is to leave the duties on refined sugar as they are and free raw sugar.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman must wait until I get through, when, I trust, all will be made plain. I hold in my hand a list of the resolutions which I propose to ask the House to go into committee upon after the hon. gentleman has replied, and I will briefly run over the recommendations which I propose to make to the committee. A change will be made in the molasses duty, which at present is 1½ cents per gallon. The change that will be made is that all molasses between certain degrees, 40 and 56, which takes in all fairly good and extra molasses, shall pay the duty they now pay of 1½ cents per gallon, but when they test over 56 degrees, they become in reality of the consistency and value of sugar, and come in free, as does all raw sugar. When they test less than 40 degrees, they approach that perilously narrowed margin beyond which lies the mass of stuff which is sometimes imposed upon the people for molasses, but which is simply rubbish, with, coming down to certain degrees, scarcely a percentage of saccharine matter in it at all. I propose that the duty shall be 1½ cents per gallon below 40 degrees, and one-quarter of 1 cent per degree additional as it grades below, in order to protect consumers from the stuff which is known as "black strap" or something worse, being mere washings, and doctored products, which no man ought to put in his mouth and think he is taking molasses. In addition to the foregoing rates, I propose to keep up what is in the present tariff, a specific duty in all cases of 2½ cents per gallon, when not imported direct without transhipment. Upon all cane sugar and beet root sugar, and so on, not over No. 14 Dutch standard in colour,—that is, the raw sugar which comes in free—upon all that kind, when not imported direct without transhipment from the country of growth and production I propose to keep the same duty on as at present—the same relative duty, I mean. There was charged on this before, 7½ per cent. of the duty, and what I propose to put on now is 5 per cent. of the value, which is as near as can be equivalent to 7½ per cent. of the duty. There is also a provision that in all the cases of cane sugar produced in the East Indies and exported therefrom viâ Hong Kong, such rate of 5 per cent. ad valorem shall not be exacted, if the sugar is transhipped at Hong Kong. A trade of large prospective growth is opening up between us and the East Indian sugar-producing countries by way of Hong Hong and the Canadian Pacific Railway Steamship Line and railway lines, and for the benefit of the western coast especially and Canada as a whole, I propose that sugar so imported shall not be subject to the duty of 5 per cent. Now, then, my hon. friend will get his answer. The duties now upon raw sugar, which the refiner has to pay in order to make his better grades of sugar, it being so much per pound and so much per degree over 70 degrees, amounts to about 2 cents per pound on granulated. The amount of protection that the refiner has at present on refined sugar amounts to about 3 cents, so that there is a difference in the neighbourhood of 1 cent between what he has to pay on his raw material required to make a pound of refined sugar and the pound of refined sugar that he competes with. All those sugars which come in under that head are to be not free, but to bear a duty of eight-tenths of 1 cent per pound. That is the duty upon refined sugars and upon all over No. 14 Dutch standard. Under the old tariff, glucose or grape sugar came under the general rate. As we have changed the tariff in regard to the rest, we have placed the duty on glucose or grape sugar at 1½ cents per lb. Cut tobacco, which is now 40 cents and 12½ per cent., is to be 45 cents and 12½ per cent. Manufactured tobacco and snuff, which is now at 30 cents and 12½ per cent., is to be 35 cents and 12½ per cent. Ale, beer and porter, when imported in casks or otherwise than in bottles, which is now at 10 cents per gallon, becomes 13 cents per gallon; and ale, beer and porter, when imported in bottles, which is now 18 cents per gallon, becomes 21 cents per gallon. That is, that what is added to the cost of malt liquors by the addition of a cent a pound on malt, is added to the imported articles in order to make the equivalent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You might state what the equivalent is?

Mr. FOSTER. 3 cents a gallon. The House will recollect that I have asked that 20 cents be added to the Excise duty. Last year I raised the duty on imported spirits and wines, while I made no change in the Excise duty, and it was argued by some hon. gentlemen that I had disturbed the proper proportion which should exist and that some addition should be made to the Excise duty as well. After looking over the whole question, I have come to the conclusion to restore pretty nearly the former equilibrium by adding 20 cents on Excise, while making a smaller increase on the imported article, so that the relative position of the two is brought back to nearly the position they previously occupied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did you take account of that in estimating for the million and a half?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. In regard to the import duties, I do not look for much increase. The increased duty is small and it may have the effect of reducing the importation, and I have made no estimate for any particular increase in that branch. There is another article in which we have decided to make a change, and that is the article of salt, which is now at 10 cents and 15 cents per 100 lbs., and which we propose to reduce one-half, making it 5 cents and 7½ cents. This we have been impelled to do because we considered that, owing to the protection which was given and certain combinations which have been entered into, a monopoly has been created, and it is a wise and prudent thing for us to meet that state of things by reducing the duty one-half. It will also be observed that it is provided that these resolutions shall take effect on and after the 24th June, 1891:

"Provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed as excepting any sugars now held to be in bond for refining purposes in any bonded premises connected with or occupied in whole or in part by any sugar refinery, which may be found on examination of the stock in such premises to have been removed therefrom, from payment of the duty properly payable thereon under item No. 419 in schedule A to the Act, chap. 33, Revised Statutes, which shall continue in force as regards such sugars, until proper entry thereof and payment of duty thereon has been made."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does that cover sugar in bond in merchants' bonded warehouses?

Mr. FOSTER. It covers all the sugar put in bond by the refiners, no matter where they may be.

Mr. BOWELL. It covers everything in bond.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The wholesale men have lately been allowed to hold sugar in bond.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, it covers that.

Mr. FOSTER. There is another matter to which I will refer. Certain members of the House have been aware that during the last ten or fifteen years a great change has taken place in the world in reference to the production of sugar. Whereas, a few years ago, a very small proportion of the world's consumption of sugar was other than cane sugar, within the last ten years, in European countries especially, a great change has taken place. The cultivation of the beet has been encouraged, and beet root sugar has been manufactured under Government bounties; and this has been so successful under that system that at the present time a little more than 65 per cent. of the world's consumption of sugar is made from the beet. For the last twelve or thirteen years we in Canada have had more or less spasmodic or continued attempts to introduce the culture of the beet in order to make sugar therefrom. The attempts have been to a large extent experimental, and I do not think, from what information I have so far, that the results can be said to have been successful. However, I am not here to-day to argue that question pro or con. I have my own opinion in reference to it. I am not here to say that I believe that, by the introduction of the bounty system in Canada, it will be possible for us, under fair conditions and without undue impositions on the people, to make the cultivation of beet in this country successful, with our climate, our soil, our prices of labour and all the attendant circumstances, but I am not unmindful of the fact that in the Province of Quebec there are one or two beet root sugar factories whose promoters have gone in good faith into the enterprise of the manufacture of beet root sugar. They have their machinery there, they have made their investments, they have sowed their beets, and they are now, through the farmers, raising the crop for this year, and to take off all the protection they had when they commenced the season's operations would appear to be a hardship, and I think will so strike hon. members of this House. So that I have this to recommend, that for one year, this season only, whatever beet root sugar is made wholly from the beet in the Dominion of Canada, shall be paid, out of the finances of the country, a bounty equal to the protection which it would have enjoyed if the tariff had remained for the year as it was when the farmers planted their beets and went into that industry. When I make this statement I also wish it to be accompanied by the emphatic statement, that this proposition does not commit me or the Government to the principle of bounty with reference to the culture of beet root sugar in this country ; we do not propose to commit ourselves to that principle, and the legislation we ask for now is for this season only, and solely upon the grounds which I have mentioned to the House, and which I believe will approve themselves to the fair sense of the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the hon. gentleman know the amount of bounty per pound?

Mr. FOSTER. I will read the resolution :

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that, under such regulations and restrictions as may be by the Minister of Customs deemed necessary, there may be paid to the producers of any raw beet root sugar produced in Canada wholly from beets grown therein between the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, and the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, a bounty equal to one dollar per one hundred pounds, and in addition thereto, three and one-third cents per one hundred pounds for each degree or fraction of a degree of test by polariscope over seventy degrees.

This will apply to the present season only, when the farmers have distributed their seed and are looking forward to the season's operations, and it secures to them the amount of protection which they would have had under the tariff as it was at the time when they sowed their seed.

Mr. SCRIVER. What about maple sugar?

Mr. FOSTER. Maple sugar remains just as sweet and just as good as it was, without any bounty. I have another resolution which I will read on behalf of the Minister of Customs :

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act, Chapter 32, Revised Statutes, intituled "An Act respecting the Customs," by repealing section 94 thereof—respecting the refining in bond of sugar, molasses or other material from which refined sugar can be produced.

Now, of course, that the Government has taken the duty off from raw sugar, there needs to be no regulation, or no law upon which regulations can be based, for the refining of sugar in bond. Mr. Speaker, I thank you, and I thank the House, for their kindly indulgence in the remarks I have made, and their kindly reception of the conclusions which the Government, through me, have been able to announce. I beg leave now to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means on the following resolutions :—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act, chapter 33, Revised Statutes, intituled : "An Act respecting the Duties of Customs," by repealing the items numbered 9, 10, 400, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423 and 431, in schedule "A" to the said Act; and to amend the Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 39, intituled; "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Duties of Customs," by repealing the items numbered 126, 127 and 128, under section 1 of the said Act; and to amend the Act 53 Victoria, chapter 20, intituled : "An Act to amend the Acts respecting the Duties of Customs," by repealing the items numbered 148, 156, 157, 158, 159, 165 and 166, under section 10 of the said Act,— and to provide otherwise by enacting that the following rates of duty be substituted in lieu thereof :—

1. All molasses and (or syrup N.O.P., including all tank bottoms and) or tank washings, all cane juice and (or concentrated cane juice, and all beet-root juice and) or concentrated beet-root juice, when imported direct, without transhipment, from the country of growth and production.
   (a) Testing by polariscope, forty degrees or over and not over fifty-six degrees, a specific duty of one and one-half cents per gallon.
   (b) When testing less than forty degrees, a specific duty of one and one-half cents per gallon and in addition thereto, one-fourth of one cent per gallon for each degree or fraction of a degree less than forty degrees.
   (c) And in addition to the foregoing rates, a further specific duty in all cases of two and one-half cents per gallon when not so imported direct without transhipment.
2. All cane sugar and or beet-root sugar not above number fourteen Dutch Standard in colour, all sugar sweepings, all sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, all melado and or concentrated melado, all molasses and or concentrated molasses N.E.S., all cane juice and or concentrated cane juice N.E.S., all beet-root juice and or concentrated beet-root juice N.E.S., all tank bottoms, N.E.S., and concrete, when not imported direct without transhipment from the country of growth and production, five per cent. ad valorem : provided, however, that in the case of cane sugar produced in the East Indies and imported therefrom viâ Hong Kong, such rate of five per cent. ad valorem shall not be exacted if transhipped at Hong Kong.
3. All sugars above number fourteen Dutch Standard in colour, and refined sugar of all kinds, grades or standards, and all sugar syrups derived from refined sugars, a specific duty of eight-tenths of a cent per pound.
4. Glucose or grape sugar, glucose syrup and, or corn syrup, a specific duty on one and one-half cents per pound.
5. Cut tobacco, forty-five cents per pound and twelve and one-half per cent. ad valorem.
6. Manufactured tobacco, N.E.S., and snuff, thirty-five cents per pound and twelve and one-half per cent. ad valorem.
7. Ale, beer and porter, when imported in casks or otherwise than in bottles, thirteen cents per gallon.
8. Ale, beer and porter, when imported in bottles (six quart or twelve pint bottles to be held to contain one gallon) twenty-one cents per gallon.
9. Spirituous or alcoholic liquors, distilled from any material, or containing or compounded from or with distilled spirits of any kind, and any mixture thereof with water, for every gallon thereof of the strength of proof, and when of a greater strength than that of proof, at the same rate on the increased quantity that there would be if the liquors were reduced to the strength of proof. When the liquors are of a less strength than that of proof, the duty shall be at the rate herein provided, but computed on a reduced quantity of the liquors in proportion to the lesser degree of strength ; provided, however, that no reduction in quantity shall be computed or made on any liquors below the strength of fifteen per cent. under proof, but all such liquors shall be computed as of the strength of fifteen per cent. under proof, as follows :—
   (a) Ethyl alcohol, or the substance commonly known as alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl or spirits of wine ; gin of all kinds, N.E.S.; rum, whiskey, and all spirituous or alcoholic liquors, N.O.P., two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon.
   (b) Amyl alcohol or fusil oil, or any substance known as potato spirits or potato oil, two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon.
   (c) Methyl alcohol, wood alcohol, wood naphtha, pyroxylic spirit, or any substance known as wood spirit or methylated spirit; absinthe, arrack or palm spirit, brandy, including artificial brandy and imitations of brandy ; cordials and liquours of all kinds, N.E.S., mescal, pulque, rum shrub, schiedam and other schnapps; tafia, angostura and similar alcoholic bitters or beverages, two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon.
   (d) Spirits and strong waters of any kind, mixed with any ingredient or ingredients, and being known or designated as anodynes, elixirs, essences, extracts, lotions, tinctures or medicines, N.E.S., two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.

(e) Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters, hair, tooth and skin washes, and other toilet preparations containing spirits of any kind, when in bottles or flasks weighing not more than four ounces each, fifty per cent. ad valorem; when in bottles, flasks, or other packages weighing more than four ounces each, two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon, and forty per cent. ad valorem.

(f) Nitrous ether, sweet spirits of nitre and aromatic spirits of ammonia, two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.

(g) Vermouth and ginger wine, containing not more than forty per cent. of proof spirits, seventy-five cents; if containing more than forty per cent. of proof spirits, two dollars and twelve and one-half cents per gallon.

(h) In all cases where the strength of any of the foregoing articles cannot be correctly ascertained by the direct application of the hydrometer, it shall be ascertained by the distillation of a sample, or in such other manner as the Minister of Customs directs.

10. Champagne and all other sparkling wines, in bottles containing each not more than a quart and more than one pint, three dollars and thirty cents per dozen bottles; containing not more than a pint each and more than one-half pint, one dollar and sixty-five cents per dozen bottles; containing one-half pint each or less, eighty-two cents per dozen bottles: bottles containing more than one quart each shall pay, in addition to three dollars and thirty cents per dozen bottles, at the rate of one dollar and sixty-five cents per gallon on the quantity in excess of one quart per bottle, the quarts and pints in each case being old wine measure; in addition to the above specific duty, there shall be an ad valorem duty of thirty per cent.
11. Salt, coarse, five cents per one hundred pounds (not to include salt imported from the United Kingdom or any British possession, or salt imported for the use of the sea or gulf fisheries, which shall be free of duty).
12. Salt, fine, in bulk, five cents per one hundred pounds.
13. Salt in bags, barrels or other packages, seven and one-half cents per one hundred pounds, the bags, barrels or other packages to bear the same duty as if imported empty.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that there be added to the schedule "C," to the Act, Chapter 33, Revised Statutes, as being exempt from Customs duties, the following, viz.:—

All cane sugar and, or beet root sugar not above number fourteen, Dutch Standard, in colour, all sugar sweepings, all sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, all melado and, or concentrated melado, all molasses and, or concentrated molasses, N.O.P., all cane juice and, or concentrated cane juice, N.O.P., all beet root juice, and, or concentrated beet root juice, N.O.P., all tank bottoms, N.O.P., and concrete, when imported direct without transhipment from the country of growth and production, Free.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act, Chapter 32, Revised Statutes, intituled: "An Act respecting the Customs," by repealing section 94 thereof, respecting the refining in bond of sugar, molasses or other material from which refined sugar can be produced.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, that under such regulations and restrictions as may be by the Minister of Customs deemed necessary, there may be paid to the producers of any raw beet root sugar produced in Canada wholly from beets grown therein, between the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, and the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, a bounty equal to one dollar per one hundred pounds; and, in addition thereto, three and one-third cents per one hundred pounds for each degree or fraction of a degree of test by polariscope over seventy degrees.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal so much of sections 130, 192, 177 and 258 of the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 34, and of any Acts amending the same, so far as the said sections or amendments thereto determine the Excise duties to be levied upon the respective articles hereinafter mentioned; and to provide that the Excise duties thereon shall hereafter be as follows:—

1. Upon spirits, as described in sub-section (a) of the above first cited section, one dollar and fifty cents.
2. Upon spirits, as described in sub-section (b) of the said section, one dollar and fifty-two cents.
3. Upon spirits, as described in sub-section (c) of the said section, one dollar and fifty-three cents.
4. Upon malt, as described in sub-sections (a and b) of section one hundred and ninety-two, for every pound, two cents.
5. Upon fermented beverages, made in imitation of malt liquor, as described in section one hundred and seventy-seven, on every gallon, eight cents.
6. Upon tobacco, as described in the first five paragraphs of section two hundred and fifty-eight—for every pound, twenty-five cents.

Except that cut tobacco when put up in packages of one-twentieth of a pound or less, shall, on every pound, pay forty cents.

7. Upon cigarettes, as described in the sixth paragraph of the said section—two dollars per thousand.
8. Upon snuff, as described in paragraph nine of the said section—on every pound, eighteen cents.
9. Upon snuff, as described in paragraphs ten and eleven of said section—on every pound, twenty-five cents.

6. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing Resolutions and the alterations thereby made in the duties of Customs and Excise on the articles therein mentioned, shall take effect on and after twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one.

Provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed as exempting any sugars now held to be in bond for refining purposes, in any bonded premises connected with, or occupied in whole or in part, by any sugar refinery, which may be found on examination of the stock in such premises to have been removed therefrom, from payment of the duty properly payable thereon, under item number 419, in Schedule "A" to the Act, Chapter 33, Revised Statutes, which shall continue in force as regards such sugars, until proper entry thereof and payment of duty thereon, has been made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, so far as regards what I may call the more mechanical portion of the Budget, that is to say, a fair and reasonable presentation of the several financial facts with which we are tolerably well familiar through the Trade and Navigation Returns, also through the Estimates laid on the Table, and the Public Accounts, I have no fault whatever to find with my hon. friend opposite. But I think it will strike the House as somewhat curious, after the various declarations we have heard from time to time from that hon. gentleman and his associates, of their desire to retain complete and absolute independence of the neighbouring Republic, of their determination to go their own path unchecked and untrammelled by any American legislation, to observe that by far the most important change which he mentions to-day, and by far the most important act that was done during recess by the Finance Minister, has been done, I may say, in obedience to, and at the dictation of, the United States Government. Why is it, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has come down to-day and has proposed to abolish, not the duties on sugar, as I shall presently show the House, but the duties on raw sugar? Is it because the hon. gentleman had been convinced that it was in the interest of the public to do so? Not a bit of it, Sir; it is solely because the United States Government had taken similar legislation about a year ago, and our hon. friend, in humble obedience and subservience to the United States, has followed suit. Now, Sir, during the late recess, another most important alteration in the policy of the loyal and independent set of hon. gentlemen opposite, took place. A year or two ago, with great flourish of trumpets, for the sake of protecting our forests, for the sake of encouraging our lumber manufacturers, those gentlemen had determined that it was in the highest degree necessary, in the interest of the people of Canada, that an export duty should be placed on logs. Sir, the Government of the United States told these hon. gentlemen: You must abolish that duty at your peril, or we will tax the timber coming into this country from Canada; and straightway, during the recess, our friends scarcely waited until the ink of the President's signature to the McKinley tariff was dry, when, in obedience to this dictation from Washington, they straightway abolished the export duty, and set another example of subservience to American tariff legislation. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman—and perhaps therein he was well advised—said very little indeed about certain facts to which I will call your attention, which disclosed themselves in the Estimates which he has recently submitted. I think he might well enough have said a word or two about that. It was rather a curious omission on the hon. gentleman's part, that he did not think fit to go over the Estimates which he has submitted to us. I do not much object to that myself, because they are in the hands of every hon. gentleman, who can see them for himself. But I can fancy, Mr. Speaker, why it was that my hon. friend did not care to call our attention in particular to those Estimates which he has recently submitted. I have glanced at those Estimates a little, and I would say, after looking at them, that they are, to my mind, very suspicious, in fact I do not think those Estimates are the Estimates originally submitted by my hon. friend to Council. They look to me very like Estimates which have been taken and hacked, as I may say; they look to me very much like Estimates which have been prepared or doctored for a particular purpose and emergency. There is one very remarkable thing about them. On the whole the decreases and the increases in the Estimates for 1892 very nearly balance each other; but the House will do well to notice one thing curious about them, that whereas, on the face of them, the reductions the hon. gentleman has made are in their essence purely temporary reductions which it is very unlikely he will be able to maintain (although I can assure him that we will do our best on this side to encourage him in his new-born zeal for the reduction of the expenditure on public works) these reductions, as the House will see, are all purely temporary in character, but the increases, Mr. Speaker, one and all, are there to stay. Sir, we look at Public Works and we see a reduction of $624,135, and it is not for me to say, in view of certain recent developments, that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues are not perfectly right in thinking that the smaller the sum put at the disposal of the Public Works Department, the better for the morals and good government of this country. The second item, I notice, is this: The hon. gentleman has reduced the supplies for destitute Indians by $119,731.

Mr. FOSTER. They are getting more self-sustaining.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are said to be so, I know; but the Governor General's warrants we have seen on a great many occasions remind us of the means by which the hon. gentleman, if it be found necessary, as I fear it may be, may increase the expenditure. I should be very glad indeed if that reduction becomes a permanent one; but for years and years we have seen that kind of reduction attempted, and year after year we have found under Governor General's warrants or under supplementary estimates the sum ordinarily expended re-demanded and re-voted by this House. And so that, also, is one of those items which I would not advise the hon. Minister to build upon too much. Then I see, and this makes up, let it be remembered, the bulk of all these reductions, that the hon. gentleman proposes a reduction in the subsidies to the ocean steamship service, of $126,000. How does he pretend to tell us, in view of what we know was pledged by the High Commissioner at Quebec, and in view of his own statement, that he expected to have a fast line equal in all respects to the fastest line now plying between New York and Liverpool, that that is to be looked upon as a permanent reduction? On the contrary, if we take the hon. gentleman's estimate we might strike our pens through the item and place plus $500,000 instead of minus $126,000, and if the hon. gentleman thinks himself in the slightest degree bound by the statement made not long since at Quebec by the High Commissioner, instead of $500,000, we will have $750,000, as the annual expenditure to which this country is now pledged. But when I turn to the other side I find, as I have said, the increases are there to stay. First, we find that the Post Office, which, including the charges for its head department, now costs us over $1,000,000 more than the annual expenditure, demands a further sum of $274,110. Does the House want to know why, when there is a deficit of well nigh $1,000,000, we are asked for an additional sum of $274,110 annually, forever? The reason is this: By a most curious coincidence, I do not say it is anything more, by a sequence of events, the Postmaster General visited the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway a few days before a certain interesting letter appeared, which a good many hon. gentlemen heard of in their constituencies, and now we find the first instalment of that arrangement I speak of in the shape of an addition to our expenditure for the Post Office service of $274,000. I find that our public works, which are such a credit to us, the management of which, and I include our railways as well as our ordinary public works, has reflected such infinite credit on the people of this Dominion, demand for the current year $401,768 more. This is an increase which has come to stay. That is a proof of the wise discretion with which our public works have been administered, a proof of the wisdom of aiding cut-throat lines for the purpose of adding to the enormous deficit which we have incurred on our Intercolonial and other railways. Sir, looking over the hon. gentleman's speech as a whole, there are two things which are very clear to me, there are two things which I think will be very clear to the House, and one of these is this, that the hon. gentleman, whatever his qualifications for his office may be, is at present very ill-acquainted with the conditions of large and important sections of the country. Were it otherwise, the hon. gentleman would most assuredly not have indulged in the statements he made respecting the general prosperity of our people. Although the hon. gentleman in his time has been a professional philanthropist, nevertheless I have never believed he was at bottom a cruel-hearted man, and, therefore, I think it is ignorance on his part which has induced him to describe the present condition of this country as one of considerable and even of great prosperity as what he called a united, a happy, a prosperous, a right-minded, a progressive people. He described our prospects as of the brightest, the condition of a sound one, and everything was going well. Sir, I take issue in the strongest possible manner with the hon. gentleman. I do not mean to say that to-day in Canada we have reached the last stage of trade degradation in which large bodies of the people are in actual need of food.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as moral degradation is concerned, hon. gentlemen opposite have tried hard to drag us there, and have succeeded only too well, as certain investigations are proving, and as their past history from 1873 shows, too. But the hon. Minister, I believe, spoke in ignorance. I tell the hon. gentleman and those around him—and there are plenty of hon. gentlemen who can corroborate everything I say—that, to-day, in large sections of the country, among the most prosperous portions in former times, there are a great many men who, day after day and hour after hour, are finding it harder to make ends meet, who are having to contend with daily depreciation in the value of their farms, who have to look forward, unless some change, and a great change, too, is brought about within a reasonable period, to seeing themselves sink from the condition of prosperous and independent yeomen to that of mere day labourers on the farms which they once owned, or, what is almost worse, who find themselves with highly-mortgaged farms, utterly unable to extricate themselves from the clutches of the usurer. That is the condition to-day, I tell the hon. gentleman and his friends, of a large number of our fellow-countrymen in what were formerly the most prosperous portions of Canada. That is one thing which the hon. gentleman has not understood, which the hon. gentleman has not appreciated, but which, before the end of this debate, I think the country at large will be made to appreciate and understand.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). In what portion of the Dominion does this condition prevail?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. From one end of Ontario to the other, in what were the most prosperous portions of Canada.

Mr. McNEILL. What about free trade England?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are provinces in which the hon. Minister can hardly show one county in ten where the rural population to-day is not absolutely decreasing in number, and he cannot show one in fifty where the farms of the people are within 25 or, perhaps, 33 per cent. of the value they were twelve years ago. That is clear. The hon. gentleman does not understand the condition of the large mass of his fellow-countrymen to-day. Another thing which is at least equally plain and equally clear in every syllable of the hon. gentleman's speech is, that he does not at the present moment entertain the slightest hope, and I fear if the truth was known, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues do not entertain the slightest real desire, to obtain a reciprocity treaty of any form, kind or shape, from the people of the United States. I do the hon. gentleman the justice to say that when he spoke on this question he spoke with bated breath and whispering humbleness. He did not absolutely despair of obtaining a reciprocity treaty; he thought it was just possible it might be obtained. Well, he could not well have said less, and, knowing what he does, he could not well have said more as to the prospects of obtaining a reciprocity treaty under his guidance and management, and on the conditions which he lays down as those which alone he would accept. But, Sir, after all said and done, why should our hon. friend desire reciprocity so long as the Government has funds? So long as the till is full that is all that the hon. gentleman feels bound to regard. It is no concern of his, it is no concern of his colleagues, it is no concern of his colleagues' paymasters and bottle-holders, how the mass of the people fare. This policy of excessive taxation, I grant you, suits certain interested parties, and suits them well; these persons control the Government of Canada, these sustain the Government of Canada; the thing is a fair equation, as the hon. gentleman would say; the Government gives these interested parties the power to plunder the people and in return they are always ready, and why should they not be, to tithe the plunder for the purpose of keeping the hon. gentleman and his friends in power. And so, Sir, with cash on hand, plus Gerrymander Act, plus Franchise Acts, Railway Subsidies, Quebec Harbour Works and all that depends thereon, everything goes merrily as a marriage bell in the hon. gentleman's opinion; and to quote Mr. Lowell:

> "Each sturdy protectionist gets what he axes,
> And the people: their annual soft sawder and taxes."

Now, Sir, what is the real condition of things here in Canada? The real condition of things here in Canada is this;—and the hon. gentleman knows it well, and the census which is about to be taken, and as to which we are about to get information if it be fairly and honestly taken, will confirm every statement that I make—the actual condition of things in Canada, which ought to be one of the most prosperous and progressive countries on the face of the earth, is: that of every male born in Canada within the last fifty years, probably to-day one man in three is to be found a denizen of the United States. Our condition in Canada to-day is that after twenty years have come and gone, after $100,000,000 of the capital of the people of the country at large, and nearly half as much more from private sources have been sunk in an attempt to develop our North-West; after we have incurred an annual charge of nearly $7,000,000, over and above all we get from that country, which is an annual dead loss to the older provinces, we have this result: that to-day in our fertile belt which ought to be able to sustain 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 of people; after twenty years, after spending $100,000,000, after charging ourselves with $7,000,000 a year, we find, Sir, that we have got scarcely one family to the square league as the fruit of all our exertions. We find that according to the returns of the Province of Ontario—and the same thing is true of Quebec, as my hon. friend from that province can testify—as regards the rural districts of that province, we find, as I said just now, that in almost all our counties the farm populations have absolutely retrograded; that there are fewer men engaged in agriculture to-day from one end of Canada to the other, as far as the older provinces are concerned, than were engaged in it a few years ago. And we find more; we find that if we take the actual taxation—not the nominal taxation, but the sum which is wrung out of the people's pockets, part of which, and part only, goes into the public treasury, the balance going to those gentlemen who, as I said, sustain and control the Government—we find, Sir, that we are approaching the position of being among the most heavily-taxed countries in the world, if we look to the real and not the nominal taxation. With that condition of things staring us in the face we are told that it is disloyal, that it is treasonable, that it is positively indecent for us to call the attention of our people to the way in which their resources have been squandered, and in which their burdens have been deliberately increased by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a few little things which the hon. gentleman might have noticed. The hon. gentleman might have gone, I think, a little more into the effects of the McKinley Bill; however, I will not enter into that subject now, for I hardly have time, but I will treat of it later on. But, Sir, when the hon. gentleman was good enough to enlarge on the increase of trade which we have obtained within the last year I think the hon. gentleman might have remembered- he surely must have known what used to be said from that side of the House by his own predecessor as to its being the primal function of the National Policy to restore the balance of trade. We were told we would have an equilibrium between our exports and imports, but what is the fact of the matter? According to the Trade Returns of last year we exported $96,749,000 worth of goods and we imported $121,858,000 worth: the balance of trade was dead against us to the tune of $25,109,000. Now, I do not attach, and I never did attach very much importance to that, although bearing in mind that Canada is to a very great extent a tribute-paying country it is not a thing to be entirely overlooked. But, Sir, what has the hon. gentleman and his friends to say now? Why, they used to deafen our ears talking of the mischiefs that were going to result to Canada from the heavy balance of trade that subsisted against us from year to year, and yet our Minister of Finance has not one word to say in explanation of the fact to which I call his attention, that to-day there is a balance of trade of over $25,000,000 against us. The hon. gentleman dealt very gingerly, and I do not wonder at it, with the reduction which took place in our Savings Banks deposits. In September, 1889, we had $43,202,000 deposits in the savings banks, and in April of this current year our savings banks deposits had fallen to $38,398,000, or, in other words, we have lost $4,804,000. I can recollect well that the hon. gentleman and his friends would cram it down our throats that there was no proof so perfect and so complete of the progress of the country as the fact of the increase of the deposits in these Government savings banks. Now you have lost $5,000,000, and it is hardly a circumstance worth mentioning in the mind of my hon. friend. I pointed out then, and I recall the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact, that the thing on which he plumed himself was entirely a fallacy and a mistake. He and his friends were paying at that time 30 per cent. more for money than its worth in the open market; they were disturbing trade; they were artificially raising the rates of interest and doing a good deal of harm; and, moreover, instead of following the wise example of the English Government of treating money obtained in this fashion as it ought to be treated, namely, as trust funds to be invested in Government funds and not otherwise, they were using that money for permanent investment, with the result which the hon. gentleman has just pointed out to the House, that when our savings banks deposits began to diminish, straight away he must borrow in England at 4 or 5 per cent. to the tune of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 to make up the deficit in these deposits which under that unwise and improper system of financing had been invested in permanent works. Neither, Sir, has the hon. gentleman, and I do not much wonder at it, one word to say to the House as to the enormous increase in the deficits on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways. It was bad enough the year before, for we had then a deficit of $300,000, but what is the deficit to-day? I find that the total receipts of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways for the last year were $3,204,000 and the total expenses were $3,846,000; being a dead loss under the wise Government opposite of $641,000, and an admitted dead loss of working expenses over receipts, (without allowing one penny for the loss of interest) on the cost of construction incurred within the last year, and incurred mainly, as I pointed out a little while ago, by the suicidal policy of subsidising out of the pockets of the people a cut-throat line to destroy a property in which we had invested $50,000,000. Nor, Sir, had the hon. gentleman a word to say about what he well knows is going on in every part of Canada: he had nothing at all to say about the continuous exodus of the people of this country——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT,- which has been going on ever since the introduction of this National Policy in a ratio two or three hundred per cent. faster than ever occurred before. Hon. gentlemen opposite exclaim at this. Have we not got our own North-West Census returns taken four or five years ago, which show that notwithstanding a most profuse expenditure we had succeeded in placing perhaps 9,000 families in the North-West and Manitoba in five years, as against a reported immigration by the Department of Agriculture of about 130,000 strong. There was another very extraordinary omission made by the hon. gentleman. He boasts of having maintained, and I dare say he desires for his own part to maintain, the expenditures and receipts at an equilibrium. I have said, and I repeat, that our best sympathies are with him in his endeavours to control his colleagues in that matter; but it is extraordinary that the hon. gentleman had not a word to say about the vast mass of contingent liabilities to which he and his colleagues have committed themselves. But, perhaps, he thinks that ante-election promises do not count, and are not to be taken into consideration by a prudent Finance Minister. Sir, we have a vast mass of promises made as to undertakings of all kinds—for Trent Valley Canals, for Prince Edward Island tunnels, for Quebec bridges; the municipalities of Ontario and other Provinces are preferring claims, which the past conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite will render it very difficult for them to resist. Then the hon. gentleman knows that knotty questions regarding provincial subsidies are likely soon to engage our attention; but about all these he had not one word to say. Nor did he say anything, though he admitted the fact, as to the drop in revenue which took place between this time last year and the present, amounting to about a million dollars, which certainly does not indicate quite that condition of prosperity to which the hon. gentleman alluded. Sir, I hope and trust that the anticipations of the hon. gentleman as to a good harvest may be fulfilled. I hope and trust that all over this country there will be a good harvest, although I am bound to say that the accounts which have reached me do not entirely confirm the statement which I understood the hon. gentleman to make. Doubtless we all desire to see a good harvest, for never did any community stand more in need of a good harvest than does the greater portion of Canada to-day. But on the question of general prosperity, I take issue squarely and directly with the hon. gentlemen. He was good enough to tell us that under existing circumstances—which I suppose meant in view of the threatened loss of the American markets—it was necessary and desirable to search for new markets. I entirely approve of that. The object was excellent; nothing could be more desirable. Whether we succeed in regaining the American markets or not, I hold that we should obtain new markets wherever they are to be found. But while I approve of the hon. gentleman's purpose, I cannot but think that the methods he pursued during his somewhat celebrated West Indian trip, were open to a little criticism. I shall be very glad indeed if, when we meet again, or at any time, the hon. gentleman is able to report to us that we have secured large and valuable markets either in the West Indies or elsewhere. But, Sir, according to the recorded statements of the most influential men in the West Indies who have spoken of the hon. gentleman's trip, I am sorry to find that not only, as the hon. gentleman prudently and cautiously put it, are they likely to take a great deal of time in making up their minds about the advantages of dealing with us, but the concurrence of opinion among them, whether he is responsible for it or not, appears to be that it is much more to their advantage to deal with the United States than to deal with us; and if I may venture to make the criticism, I might say that it was not wise in the hon. gentleman to speak in public on the subject as he did in those various places. I think it was not wise, for two reasons. In the first place, it was his duty to have ascertained privately and quietly what could be done; and in the next place, the fact to which I have alluded, that many of those people have already declared their preference for the United States market and for treaties with the United States in preference to treaties with us, is likely to place him at a very serious disadvantage when he goes to Washington for the purpose, as he hopes, though very faintly, of obtaining extended trade relations with the United States. I fear, from what I have seen, that, if the hon. gentleman tells those people that if they refuse to treat with us he will find new markets elsewhere, we may be competitors of theirs in other countries wherein they have hitherto held the monopoly. I fear, Sir, that this very trip of his, and the very statements made by those with whom he has been carrying on negotiations, will be very likely to rise up against him, and that the United States Government will say to him: You have been to the West Indies, you have seen the authorities there, you have made your proposals to them, and they have told you that they do not want to treat with you.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was one declaration made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance which demands my most hearty sympathy, and with respect to which I can beforehand pledge him the sympathy and assistance of every hon. gentleman on this side. That was the declaration he made, that now, in his judgment—and I might add, in mine long ago—the time had come when we should call a halt in the profuse expenditure we have been indulging in for this many a year. The hon. gentleman's intention is most excellent. I commend it, although I cannot help recollecting the fate which has befallen many other good intentions of many other equally good men; and I might tell him also that we, on this side, cannot very well forget how often we have been promised reductions in expenditure, how often we have been vainly promised, for example, enormous returns from our new territory in the North-West, notably by one of his predecessors who was good enough to assure us that in a very few years we should be exporting 640,000,000 bushels of wheat from the North-West, and by another, now no longer here, who worked out in elaborate details the prediction that on the 1st day of January of this current year last past, every cent we had expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway would be back in our coffers in cash or securities better than cash. I will give the hon. gentleman all the assistance in my power to keep down the expenditure, but I must remind him that the record of his party and of himself on that subject is a very bad one indeed. Twenty-four years ago, the total expenditure of this country was $13,500,000. In six years, under the administration of the hon. gentleman's friends, between 1867 and the autumn of 1873, our annual expenditure had risen from $13,500,000 to $23,316,000, nearly $10,000,000 in six years. Then, from 1874 to 1878, there was indeed a halt in the expenditure, and in those five years our expenditure rose—what? From $23,316,000 to $23,519,000. Then, from 1878 to 1890, hon. gentlemen opposite, returning to their old tricks, succeeded in raising the expenditure of Canada from $23,500,000 to, as nearly as possible, $36,000,000, being a further addition of $12,500,000; so that in two periods of about seventeen years, those hon. gentlemen are responsible for an addition of $22,500,000 to the annual expenditure of Canada. I say their record is not an encouraging one, but we will do our best to aid the hon. gentleman in his good intentions. Sir, within a period of twenty-four years, or, more strictly, I should say within the two periods of six and of twelve years, while our population has increased, if it has increased, by barely one-half, our expenditure has been nearly trebled. Our expenditure, therefore, has increased in that interval exactly six times as fast as our population. Undoubtedly there is cause to call a halt. What reason did the hon. gentleman allege on various occasions during the late election for this increase of expenditure? His pleas were these two: First of all, he stated, and has repeated here to-night, that it was necessary to construct great and expensive public works. Next he alleged it was necessary to acquire new territory, and in acquiring new territory, we had incurred enormous expenses. I will treat of these two pleas in succession. First, as to his plea that our expenditure is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that we had to construct very expensive public works, I would like to know, when the hon. gentleman and his friends take credit for that, what value they attach to those assets. Now I have here a statement from the hon. gentleman's own Public Accounts showing the sum of money that was expended in 1890 in maintaining our railways and canals; also showing the receipts therefrom, and the expenditure the hon. gentleman proposes to incur during the present year. It is instructive. It sheds a light on the enormous value, as an asset to Canada, of those public works, in consequence of which, says the hon. gentleman, this enormous increase in our expenditure is justified. I find that in 1890, under the head of public works, railways and canals, we spent $4,362,000, and under the head of railways and canals, chargeable to income, we spent $214,000, and for the department over which the Minister of Public Works presides, a charge of $62,783 is made, and for other items connected with public works, $186,000. On these public works, be it remembered, we have expended all told about $50,000,000 for canals, about $50,000,000 more for railways, being $100,000,000 of capital sunk. These public works cost us in 1890 for their maintenance $4,825,000, and our total receipts were $3,800,000, according to the Public Accounts. We have sunk $100,000,000 of capital on which we do not get one copper of interest and never will, and, more than that, not merely have we got these unproductive public works costing us $100,000,000 for which we receive no return, but we are absolutely unable to make both ends meet by at least $1,025,000 a year, and I perceive that for the year 1891-92, the hon. gentleman proposes to expend on the maintenance and keeping in order of these same works and on the other items I have enumerated the sum of $5,214,000, so that, if these receipts remain as they were before, our public works which justify this enormous increase of expenditure, according to the hon. gentleman, will be a dead loss to us for maintenance of $1,414,000, over and above the annual charge of $4,000,000 a year for interest on the sum they have cost. Sir, if that were, in my opinion, an accurate statement of the necessities of the case, I would say that our position was a very bad one, but for my part I do not believe that this enormous disproportion between receipts and expenditure is justified. I do not believe that this dead loss we sustain is the cost of the maintenance of public works properly administered, but I believe it is the cost of maintaining a radically corrupt Government. Now, the House will remember this, I hope all my hon. friends will remember this, and I hope our press will take occasion to make the statement ring from one end of the country to the other: the nominal expenditure is not, under our protective system, any measure at all of the burdens of the people. Sir, every intelligent protectionist, if there be such a thing as an intelligent protectionist—there are intelligent men who, for their own party purposes and their own personal interest support protection, I grant you—but an intelligent protectionist is an anomaly yet to find—an intelligent and honest protectionist. Now, if there be an intelligent and honest protectionist, capable of discussing the question from a fair and honest standpoint, that man never will deny, never can deny—be protection right or wrong, be it wise or foolish according to his idea—that under any protective system you choose to imagine, in all human probability the very minimum of taxation taken out of the people is twice as much as the sum which goes into the treasury. In a great many cases, that is far too small a proportion. In many cases—and I am going to give the House a very notable example presently—for every dollar that goes into the treasury, $3 or $5, or even $10, are taken out of the pockets of the people. There are cases in which an enormous sum of money is taken out of the pockets of the people, and not one cent goes into the treasury. I have said that the hon. gentleman had given us a most admirable instance of how the protective policy works, and he could not have selected a better one than what he chooses to call the boon he is going to give to the people of Canada in the reduction of the sugar duties. The hon. gentleman had a great opportunity, and he has thrown it away. Had he come down to the House to-night and said: Gentlemen, the Government of Canada have decided, in view of the fact that they have a considerable surplus, in view of the action of the United States, in view of the burdens which the people now have to bear, to give the people of Canada free sugar, I would have frankly applauded the action of the hon. gentleman and I would have said it was a very good one as far as it went. But he has done nothing of the kind, and he has had the effrontery, I was going to say,—at all events he has had the boldness to state that the Government propose to restore three millions and a half of duties to the people of Canada. They do not propose to do anything of the kind. They propose to substitute one million and a half for another million and a half. What, then, do they propose to do with the other two millions? They intend to present them to their friends, Drummond & Co.

Mr. FOSTER. That must be a fortunate man.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, he and his friends are fortunate. It is well known that these gentlemen have for years been running branch Custom-houses for their own private advantage. It is well known that the sugar refiners, who are headed by Mr. Drummond, have been the largest subscribers to the corruption fund of hon. gentlemen opposite. Verily, they are wise in their generation, and verily they have their reward. Thus we have the maximum of loss to the revenue, the minimum of advantage to the people, and the maximum of advantage to these monopolists, the refiners and their friends opposite. They profess to give a free breakfast-table, forsooth. They do not give it at all. On every pound of sugar which the poorest man consumes, according to the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister himself, he will have to pay, not into the public treasury but to the sugar refiners, eight-tenths of a cent. The hon. gentleman told us that the normal consumption of sugar in Canada is 224,000,000 lbs. And that will represent about $1,800,000 of taxes, of which, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, not one cent is to go into the treasury of Canada. The people of Canada are to be taxed to the extent of nearly two million dollars for the benefit of an industry which has been of great assistance to hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends. That is the boon which the hon. gentleman has brought down to this House. Here is a case in which the people are to be taxed nearly two million dollars, and yet, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, he does not expect that a penny of that will go into the treasury. I do not object in the least to his substitution of taxes on tobacco, whiskey and beer, although I remember the time when some of his colleagues would have raised a great objection to the tax on the poor man's beer, but it appears that since one hon. gentleman has been translated to upper regions, his influence is not what it used to be. I do not object to the substitution proposed, but I do object to the hon. gentleman telling us that it is a boon for the people of Canada to have free sugar when we can see that they are not to have free sugar at all, but that we are called upon to pay nearly $2,000,000, not for the benefit of the public but for the benefit of those gentlemen who have endeared themselves, by methods to which I have already referred, to the hon. gentleman and his political friends. I could give another instance, and perhaps I may as well give it to the House now, as to the way in which this protective tariff works, as to the way in which it takes an enormous sum out of the pockets of the people without putting one cent into the treasury. The hon. gentleman says he has been imitating to some extent American legislation, and I will just quote to him an illustration lately made in the American Congress, showing how that system works there. They were discussing the duties on woollens and worsted, and one of the speakers said:

"For instance, in 1880, we consumed 193 million dollars worth of domestic-made woollens and worsted, and only 83 million dollars worth of imported. The same year, 335 million dollars worth of our iron and steel consumption was domestic-made, while only 35 million dollars worth was imported. Now, it is evident that, while a 10 per cent. reduction of tariff on these two items would reduce the Government revenues only some 7 millions (that is, 10 per cent. of the 33 plus 35 millions of these two imports), it would save the domestic consumer from paying this 7 million tariff duties plus some 53 million (that is 10 per cent. of the 193 plus 335 million of these two domestic products) of 'protection' to domestic monopolists, thus making a total saving of some 60 millions in these two items alone. Moreover, when duties are inordinately high, a reduction in them frequently increases the revenue, by increasing importations to the extent of more than compensating, at the reduced rates, the former restricted importations at higher rates."

That is probably an extreme case, but it illustrates the point which I want to make, that, if you want to arrive at the cost of a protective tariff, you must double and probably treble the amount that actually goes into the treasury. Take, for example, a very much smaller article than sugar. We imported of clean rice 2,861,000 lbs., on which a duty was paid of $35,773. Of unhulled or uncleaned rice we imported 23,076,000 lbs., on which a duty was paid of $38,365. That unhulled rice, I am informed, yielded at least 20,000,000 lbs. of clean rice, and, as we know, the price of that was regulated by the price of the clean rice imported. What, then, was the result? The amount lost, if the consumer paid the same for the one as the other, the receipts to the revenue being only $38,000 for this unhulled rice, was about $250,000, and that is a very fair illustration of the results of the present tariff in many cases. And what is true of rice, what is true of sugar is, to say the least of it, equally true of cottons, and of woollens, and of iron goods, and of a vast variety of other articles of general consumption, with this difference: that in all these cases under the system introduced by the Government, the system of substituting specific duties for ad valorem duties, the vice is intensified to a higher degree. The poor man, in all these cases, is compelled to pay enormously more than his richer brother; on the finer classes of goods, the tax, in all probability, averages 25 per cent. When you come to the coarser class of goods consumed by the majority of the population, you will find the tax under this mixed specific and ad valorem system rises to 40, 50, 60, aye, in some cases, to 70 and 80 per cent.; so that the poorer the man, under the system of which the hon. gentleman is the champion, the larger his family, the greater his needs, the more, in proportion to his income, is taken out of him under the specific duties of the hon. gentleman. Sir, is it any very great wonder that under this condition of things the increase of population in our country is lamentably slow? I believe that if an honest census were taken, if, for the miserable de jure system, which is conceived for the purpose of lending aid to fraud, an honest de facto system had been substituted, no doubt the truth would come out even more clearly; but even as it is, I have not the slightest doubt that the result of the present census, unless extreme fraud is resorted to, will show most clearly and distinctly what I have asserted, that there has been an enormous loss of population, both relative and absolute, in a very great number of the most important districts of Canada; and at the same time there has been an enormous displacement of wealth. Now, I admit for my part that this displacement was in part inevitable, for it arose from causes which neither I nor the hon. gentleman, nor any party could control. But I say that it is a grave crime, a grave offence against good statesmanship, for the Government to do as the hon. gentleman's Government has done, wantonly, wilfully, needlessly and maliciously, I might almost say, to aggravate those tendencies which a wise Government would have checked, or at least would not have increased. Sir, the whole policy of the Government has been to aggravate the evil; the whole policy of the Government has been to drive the people from our shores; the whole policy of the Government has been to increase the population and wealth of a certain small number of favoured localities at the expense of the great mass of the people. Sir, it is true, and I make the hon. gentleman a present of the statement, that under his regime there are ten millionaires, perhaps twenty, perhaps fifty, for one that existed under the regime of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Mackenzie); but for each of these there are a thousand men who have been obliged to leave their country, and hundreds of thousands who, as I have said before, are in danger of sinking into a position a little better than serfs, by reason of the hon. gentleman's policy. Certain towns and cities have done well so far, although it is extremely likely they will speedily experience a check; but the vast majority of our cities, the vast majority of our towns and villages, and with scarcely any exception, all our country districts, are to-day stationary or retrograde. Our country districts, as every man knows, have lost very heavily in population; scarcely one in five can show an increase in population equal to the natural increase, not to speak of the immigration that might have come. I tell the hon. gentleman that were an honest national balance sheet to be struck, were we to set on one side the additional national debt, the additional municipal debt, the additional provincial debt, the additional railway debt, the immense depreciation of farm property in all the older provinces of Canada, the immense depreciation in the value of real estate in almost all the towns and villages in Canada during the last twelve years, and were we to put on the other side all that can be imagined as to the growth of wealth in a few hands, and as to the growth of wealth in two or three pet towns and cities—if such a statement were made, the result would be a demonstration that we have made no progress at all during the last twelve years in national wealth; at the best we have been but marking time. The bulk of the people are poorer to-day than they were 12 years ago, although a few are much richer, but the aggregate of burthens has enormously increased. Now, Sir, I turn to hon. gentlemen's other plea. They justify the fact that the expenditure of Canada has increased six fold as fast has the population has done, by the allegation that the money has been well spent, inasmuch as we have acquired vast territories. Now, Sir, we are not dealing with what might have been, we are dealing with what is. Had those territories been well and wisely managed, were the hon. gentlemen able to-day, as with moderate good management they might have been able, to point to a population of a million, or even three-quarters of a million, in our North-West country and Manitoba, I am not prepared to say that I would have thought the money altogether thrown away. But if there be one thing clearer or more notable than another, if there be one fact more manifest than another, to every man who has paid the slightest attention to public affairs, it is this, that the so-called national development has resulted in the most pitiable failure in developing the North-West, and the Province of Manitoba in particular. I alluded just now to the fact that the late Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1880, had solemnly promised the people of this country that by the 1st of January, 1891, six months ago, or thereabouts, we would have had all expenses paid and at least sixty-nine millions in cash, and assets as good as cash, to pay for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, I think nothing can give a better illustration of the difference between the promises and performances of those hon. gentlemen than the promise made by the late Premier and endorsed by the High Commissioner, as to what we should receive, and the actual facts as disclosed by these Public Accounts. We were promised a clear profit of sixty-nine millions on the 1st of January, and on the 1st day of July last our account stood: Expended in the North-West Territories, $6,043,000; received, $4,275,000; difference, $1,766,000. Promised sixty-nine millions plus, performance nearly two millions minus. That, Sir, is the way those hon. gentlemen have developed the North-West, and they have effected this result at a most enormous cost to the older provinces. I cast no blame on the people of the North-West; they are fellow-sufferers with ourselves, and fellow-sufferers to a great extent, for each and every one of them has cause to deplore the miserable mismanagement and the miserable mis-government that have left that great inheritance in the condition in which I state it to be. Still we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that an enormous proportion of our present expenditure is wholly and entirely due to the culpable way in which our funds have been expended in the so-called development of the North-West. I stated a little while ago that our annual expenditure there was, as nearly as possible, something like $7,000,000, That is to say, the older provinces of Canada to-day are expending out of their taxes about $7,000,000 a year more than they receive in the attempt to develop the North-West, and this is the way the sum is made out: In one way and another we have sunk at least $100,000,000 of public money in that country, the interest on which amounts to at least $4,000,000 annually. The charges for Indians in the North-West foot up to $940,000 a year; our Post Office service costs us $120,000 a year more than we receive; our Mounted Police costs us $753,000; our Dominion Lands cost us $90,000 more then we receive, and over above these items there is a vast mass of expenditure amounting in all to $1,450,000 charged to the North-West, against which we receive perhaps a sum of $924,000 all told. So that if you make an accurate estimate of the mode in which the present Government have conducted the development of the North-West you find there is a loss on capital account of $100,000,000 and an annual charge of $7,000,000 a year, and for a result there is perhaps in the fertile belt (capable of supporting in peace, prosperity, and comfort, twenty or thirty millions of people), perhaps, I doubt if there is that number, one man to the square mile. That is the way and those are the results by which hon. gentlemen opposite justify the expenditure of the enormous sums of money that are annually extracted from the people of Canada. I say this, that all of these details indicate scandalous extravagance. I do not say they necessarily indicate corruption, but they do indicate scandalous extravagance, and the practical result of all is this, that we have expended over $100,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway and other railways and on our canals. We do not receive one penny in return. They cost us $1,000,000 a year more for working expenses, and the North-West costs $7,000,000 besides. I say nothing about extras. Year after year we are called on to provide hundreds of thousands of dollars charged to the so-called capital account of the Intercolonial Railway and to ordinary capital account millions and millions from time to time. But I do call attention to these two facts: I do call attention to the gross waste and mismanagement which must have existed when, with such wonderful resources in the North-West Territories, the results are such as I have just depicted. While this has been going on, what has been the position of the great mass of the people of Canada, notably what has been the position of the agricultural classes? It is plain to demonstration that the home market on which hon. gentlemen opposite profess to rely, which was to consume all our farmers could possibly raise, is quite inadequate to realize the conception formed of it. A vastly smaller number than those now engaged in agriculture could supply the needs of the home market. It is clear, on the other hand, that, with the exception of the United States, the foreign market is an utter failure. The hon. gentleman talked to us before six o'clock of his hopes of obtaining markets for us elsewhere, and he went over a list of our exports to France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Holland, and all the rest of them. I will take the years 1873 and 1890, and we will see what we have to hope from these foreign markets. Our population has increased, our means of communication are better and the cost of freight has been vastly lessened during these 18 years. What have we done to increase our exports to foreign countries during this period? In 1873 we sold to France $631,000 worth, in 1890 $278,000 worth; to Spain we sold in 1873, $25,000 worth and in 1890, $69,000 worth, an increase; to Portugal, in 1873, we sold $191,000 worth, in 1890, $207,000 worth; to Italy we sold in 1873, $177,000 worth, in 1890 it had fallen to $81,000 worth; to Holland we sold in 1873, $13,000 worth, and in 1890, $1,042 worth. To Newfoundland we sold $2,800,000 worth in 1873, last year only $1,185,000, a loss of $1,700,000 in our trade with that sister colony alone. To the West Indies collectively, and this is important, we sold in 1873 $3,988,000 worth; in 1890, under the fostering auspices during twelve years of the National Policy, we sold $2,719,000 worth, a loss of $1,200,000. During that interval the trade occasionally increased and diminished, but the grand result is this, that in 18 years, as these tables show too well, we have not succeeded in adding any appreciable percentage to our total exports to those countries, and that although our population is greater, although transportation is much easier and better, although freight is much cheaper, although under ordinary circumstances we ought to have enormously increased our exports. But what are they worth all put together, even multiply them by two or four or six, compared with the trade in which the hon. Minister of Finance takes no interest, for which he cares nothing, for which he hardly raises his hand to try to restore to us—the trade we had with the United States, which, in spite of all disadvantages, in spite of two hostile tariff walls, is to-day very nearly equal to the half of all our trade with the whole of the world? Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, our home market is inadequate, foreign markets out of the United States afford no tangible prospect of relief; but what is the condition of the agriculturists of Canada? Under existing circumstances we are called upon by the recent legislation in the United States to sustain enormous new and additional burdens. Sir, what will be the effect of the McKinley tariff? The hon. Minister of Finance disposed of it in a few half a dozen sentences. The hon. gentleman told us that the McKinley tariff is not going to cause any very great strain on the people of Canada; Canada, he says, has stood the strain well. If the hon. gentleman understood the situation, as I think he ought, he would have known that the McKinley tariff, or its effects up to date, were almost wholly anticipated before 1st October, that almost all the goods likely to be affected by it had been rushed across the border. It will be more than a year before we will experience the true effect of the McKinley tariff. The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that he has sent an exceedingly well trained commissioner to England, and that this gentleman tells us that we need not despair or be discouraged, for it is not going to affect us much. He says our egg market in England is going to prove quite as good as the egg market we lost in the United States. Well, the merchants who deal in that commodity to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars do not think so, the farmers' wives who have eggs to sell do not think so; and any man who has any practical acquaintance with the agricultural population of Canada does not think so. I heard the hon. gentleman actually declare that what was true as to the egg market was true as to the hay market also. He absolutely rose in his place to tell us that we can find as good a market for our hay in England as we can in the United States if the duty was removed. I commend that statement to my agricultural friends around me, and I think before this debate is concluded the hon. gentleman will hear from them their opinions as to the practical acquaintance with the interest of that great class of our people which is evidenced by the statement of the Finance Minister, that the people of Canada can find as good a market for their hay in England as they can in the United States. The actual effect is this: The farmer of Canada is to-day paying many millions of dollars of taxes to the United States Government in addition to the enormous tax which is levied upon him by the present Government under their protective tariff for the joint benefit of themselves and the Red Parlour. What is the total of these taxes we are called upon to pay? I will give the hon. gentleman a few details as to that, as he appears to regard as a matter of very small moment the amount of taxes the people of Canada are obliged to pay to the United States. According to his own Trade Returns last year, we sold to the United States 9,939,000 bushels of barley, on which the duty, the trifling duty, amounted to $2,982,000; of beans and pease we sold 710,000 bushels, on which the duty amounted to $284,000; of horses we sold 16,000, on which the duty was $566,000; of the article of eggs alone we sold 12,835,000 dozens, on which the duty amounted to $640,000; of hay we sold 101,000 tons, on which the duty was $400,000; of sheep we sold 251,000, on which the duty was $502,000; of potatoes we sold 1,053,000 bushels, on which the duty was $263,000. Now there is no doubt whatever that almost all that duty comes practically out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers. It is perfectly true, I have never denied and I do not deny it now, that the American consumer pays the duty likewise, but let the hon. gentleman and his friends lay this lesson to heart: while the American consumer pays the Canadian producer loses. That is the result of that tariff, and in our relative position that will always be the result of that tariff. The hon. gentleman's late chief knew that well, and stated it often as did many of his colleagues, and it is not unreasonable that it should be so in view of the fact that our total production is such a very small portion of the total consumption of the United States. But do not let the hon. gentleman suppose, and do let not the House suppose, that the sum of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 which is paid to the United States is all that the Canadian farmer loses. Recollect that the price which he obtains for his surplus products in the United States affects the price which he obtains at home; not merely does he lose on what he sells to the United States but he loses, and loses enormously, on what he sells at home. True, that certain persons may make a benefit out of it, true, as I think was suggested by the Minister of Customs, that some of these people who live in the country and who are not particularly interested in the welfare of the farmers may make a paltry few dollars out of their distress, but in the meantime the Canadian farmer not merely loses the whole amount or vastly the greater part of the amount of the American duty, but he loses much more also. His home prices are cut down by reason of his being deprived of a market for his surplus production in the United States. Does the Government pretend, will there be found a man on that side of the House to pretend, with the facts now before us, that there is the slightest chance of our obtaining as good a market outside of Canada in any other country except the United States for many of the articles we have to sell? Are we likely to get as good a market elsewhere for our hay, or for our barley, or for our horses, or for our eggs, or for the thousand and one minor articles for which there is practically an unlimited demand in the United States? No wonder that in this state of things the farmers of Canada demand relief. They have a right to get relief, and there is but one way in my judgment in which that relief can be obtained, and that is by reciprocity with the United States; free and unrestricted reciprocity, the right to buy in that market as well as the right to sell in that market—unrestricted reciprocity in the fullest sense; that and nothing else is the only cure for the evils under which that great section of our population is at present suffering. I tell the Minister of Finance, who does not absolutely despair of obtaining reciprocity and who thinks that it is possible to obtain it, that this present Government cannot get it, that this present Government does not desire to get it, does not hope to get it and is not making any provision for it. I call the attention of the House to the fact that all through the Budget speech there is not any provision made, there is not any indication given that the hon. gentleman considers the obtaining of reciprocity with the United States within the limit of practical possibilities. He has lost his opportunity, he has dallied and delayed with the question, and if there is one thing touching reciprocity as to which he and his colleagues have manifested a general eagerness, it is an eagerness to find out arguments against it. The hon. gentleman told us this afternoon that he was going to Washington, and he alluded to the recent visit of himself and his associates, and if I did not misunderstand him altogether, the hon. gentleman intimated that he and his colleagues had been invited by the United States to go there, and he implied, if he did not exactly state, that the invitation came in the first place from the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He said so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps he said so. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is a most wonderful discrepancy between the letter addressed by the High Commissioner to Sir John Macdonald, in regard to that matter, from the statement made by himself. Sir Charles Tupper states in a letter under date 21st April, 1891:

"Mr. Blaine also said that he did not agree with the reference which had been made by Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper during the elections as to what took place concerning the initiation of the proposed informal discussion between the United States and the Dominion. I told Mr. Blaine that I wished in the outset to recognize the accuracy of the statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I had seen, regarding the initiation of the negotiations respecting reciprocity arrangements between the two countries."

Who are to be believed? Are we to believe the High Commissioner?

Mr. FOSTER. You can believe both, so far as that is concerned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Believe both? I was not able, last night, to get hold of the despatches from Washington; but I perceive this in the letter of Mr. Blaine:

"In view of the fact that you had come to the State Department with the proposals, and that the subject was then for the first time mentioned between us, and in view of the further fact that I agreed to a private conference, as explained in my minutes, I confess that it was a surprise to me, when several weeks later, during the Canadian canvass, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper both stated before public assemblages that an informal discussion of a Reciprocity Treaty would take place at Washington after March 4, by the invitation of the Secretary of State. I detail these facts, because I deem it important, since the matter has been, for some weeks, open to public remarks, to have it settled, that the conference was not initiated by me, but, on the contrary, that the private arrangement of which I spoke was but a modification of your proposal, and in no sense an original suggestion from the Government of the United States."

Sir, I caution the hon. gentleman. We do not desire to see the representatives of Canada treated to another three-minutes conference at Washington. We do not desire to see the representatives of Canada compelled, as Sir Charles Tupper was compelled, to state before the British Ambassador that Mr. Blaine was right, and that the Canadian Cabinet had incorrectly represented—for what purpose I will not now stop to inquire—the so-called invitation to discuss a reciprocity treaty with Mr. Blaine; and I might remind the hon. gentleman that, before they went down there at any rate, they had, under Mr. Blaine's own hand and seal, the most explicit declaration that if all they had to propose was the sort of reciprocity the hon. gentleman indicated, they had much better stay at home. Sir, the hon. gentlemen have been beaten out of their first contention. It is not twelve months since we heard their avowed representative, a member of their Cabinet, the gentleman set up to answer my motion last session, formally declaring—and his colleagues did not dare to disavow it then—that the Government of Canada did not want reciprocity in natural products. They have been beaten out of that contention; for they now admit, or say, that it is desirable. I much fear that their conversion is half-hearted; at the best it is purely negative. We were told, Sir, by the leader of the House, that the financial and trade policy of the Government would be announced by the Finance Minister to-day; but that hon. gentleman, though he has been very careful to tell us the kind of reciprocity he does not want, is dumb as an oyster as to the sort of reciprocity he does propose to ask for or is willing to accept. I fear that my hon. friend beside me is right—that in their heart of hearts they want none; but they say they love reciprocity, and in proof of it, not merely here, but on every hustings, they have exercised all their ingenuity to conjure up objections to every practical scheme of reciprocity. Now, to-night I propose to discuss their three leading objections to it. They do not now for one moment pretend to say that it would not be an advantage; but their loyal souls are appalled at the idea that if we had reciprocity with the United States we must necessarily, more or less, discriminate against Great Britain. Now, there may be, and probably are, some hon. gentlemen on the other side to whose minds that is a most grave and serious objection per se. I do not mean to say that I myself would not avoid that necessity if it could be avoided; but I may say that, as regards the greater number of hon. gentlemen opposite, there never was a more arrant piece of hypocrisy than for them to oppose reciprocity because, forsooth, it entails discrimination against Great Britain. What has their whole tariff itself been during these last twelve years but practical discrimination against Great Britain? What is their tariff to-day? Why, Sir, to-day we import about $43,000,000 worth of goods from Great Britain which we tax to the tune of $9,576,000, while we import $52,000,000 from the United States, which we tax $8,220,000. There if you like is practical discrimination against England. What is their whole tariff but an attempt to bar out manufactured goods; and what has Great Britain to send us except manufactured goods? Does the hon. gentleman pretend to tell me that any appreciable percentage of the goods which are admitted free consist of manufactured goods from Great Britain for general consumption here? All the goods manufactured in Great Britain the hon. gentleman severely taxes. What does he admit free from Great Britain? Well, he admits Australian wools free; he admits hemp for the benefit of the manufacturers; he admits railway iron for the benefit of some great corporations; he admits chemicals of most descriptions for the advantage of his friends, the protected manufacturers and possibly some other manufacturers; he admits tea and coffee from China and Japan; and he admits articles for the use of the Dominion Government; and these practically constitute the vast bulk of the free goods which come to Canada from Great Britain. In the whole lot, not one article manufactured in Great Britain and coming into general use in this country, is admitted free, but all such articles are taxed enormously—far more heavily in effect than articles coming from the United States. But, Sir, these hon. gentlemen, who twelve years ago turned their backs on the British fiscal system and deliberately adopted the American fiscal system, in spite of the warnings we gave them, in spite of the fact which we stated then and repeat now, that in so doing they struck a serious blow at British connection—these 35 per cent. loyalists are appalled at the notion of discriminating against the mother country. Sir, so far as her material interests are concerned, Great Britain is an investor in one way or another to the tune of eight hundred, perhaps a thousand millions, in British North America. It is of more interest to Great Britain by far that we should be able to pay interest on the vast sums we owe her than it is that a small paltry fraction of her insignificant trade with us—for insignificant it is, looking to her vast resources—should be interfered with. But the hon. gentlemen have no right to say that if Canada became richer, our trade with Great Britain would diminish. They assume that because the United States, which is—at least a great portion of it—situated in a totally different zone, do not import per head as much as we do, therefore our trade with Great Britain would be enormously reduced. I deny the inference. If these hon. gentlemen were able to show me that there is an enormous difference per head between our imports and the imports of those portions of the United States, whose climate and other conditions closely resemble ours, then there might be something more or less in their argument. I do not believe that if Canada became much richer the material interests of Great Britain would suffer at all, nay, I believe that, on the whole, they would be greatly advantaged. And there were other considerations to which I have often alluded. There is the consideration that it is in the highest degree a necessity for the material and political interests, and, I might add, the social interests of Great Britain, that she and her descendant, the United States, should be on the best possible terms, and free and full trade relations between us and the United States would be the very best means of bringing about that very desirable result. But even were it true that an injury was going to be done to Great Britain, though I would be sorry for it, I deny that any injury would be done her, but I cannot admit that that is a conclusive argument. I am not here to give advice to the British Parliament, I am not here to advise Her Imperial Majesty in her capacity of Queen of Great Britain. I am here as a Canadian representative, to advise the Queen of Canada what is best for the interests of the people of Canada, and if it is best in the interest of Canada, it will be her duty to take that advice. Let us understand this question and thresh it out. For my part I would rather see an ounce of loyalty to the people of Canada than a ton of this windy, worthless, spurious bastard loyalty of these thirty five per cent. loyalists. More than that, the hon. gentleman knows, every man who has studied the question knows, right well that reciprocity, from the very nature of the case, means, as against all other countries, discrimination more or less. We do not propose to discriminate against Great Britain per se, but we propose to enter into a treaty of commercial relations with the United States, whereby certain privileges will be given by Canada to the United States, and by the United States to Canada against all the world. That is what we propose to do. Does Great Britain hesitate to discriminate against us when it serves her turn? Look at her many commercial treaties, and you will find, Sir, that British statesmen do not consider whether a favourable commercial treaty for Great Britain may or may not tread on our corns, and I claim the right to do for Canada what British statesmen do for England. Then hon. gentlemen have a second objection, which, I must say, they ought to know and must know to be wholly unfounded in fact. They declare that it is the policy on this side to surrender control of our tariff. That is a most wilful misrepresentation. Hon. gentlemen know right well, for they have been told it times without number, that the distinguishing feature of our policy, the distinguishing feature of unrestricted reciprocity, is this, that both sides retain control of their own tariff. The United States do not propose to resign control of their tariff, nor does Canada propose to resign control of hers. Sir, the adjustment of the tariff, no doubt will require thought and consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will prescribe when I am called in. Walk out of that side and give us a chance, and we will do it; but do not imagine that I am going to interfere with another man's patient. More, I may add this, regarding this question of the tariff, that, if there be any truth in the indications of popular sentiment in the United States, there is a very strong probability that the United States are a great deal more likely to reduce their tariff than to raise it, and hence the difficulty which hon. gentlemen opposite fear, is likely, to a very great extent, to disappear in the course of the next few months, or, at furthest, in the course of the next year or two. Then comes up the vast difficulty that excited the fears of hon. gentlemen opposite—the question of revenue. Now, I do not mean to say that there will be no difficulty in making up the loss of revenue. I never contended that. There is a difficulty, and that difficulty is one directly created by the misconduct of those hon. gentlemen in increasing our expenditure from $13,000,000 to $36,000,000, in two periods of six and of twelve years. Sir, it is a very great impediment to our welfare, indeed, that we should have thus recklessly increased our taxes and our expenditure, at the very moment when the United States were largely reducing theirs. But these hon. gentlemen beg the question from the start. It appears to be a fundamental postulate of theirs that loss of revenue means loss to the people. Why, as I understand it, as my hon. friends on this side understand it, as every man of common sense will understand it, under a protective system, the loss of revenue is a gain to the people and doubly so in a case like ours. Now, the hon. gentleman and his friends want to know how we are to make up the deficit which may be caused by the loss of revenue on American imports. Well, Sir, that hon. gentleman boasts of a surplus. What better use can be made of that surplus than to employ it in giving the people of Canada this great boon? As I have hinted very plainly, the hon. gentleman is bound, or his successors would be bound to exhaust the economies, and they are neither few nor far between which might be exercised in carrying on the public business. I do not believe it will be necessary for an honest, a business-like, Government to spend every year $1,000,000 or $1,400,000 over the receipts as the hon. gentleman proposes to do in these estimates, in carrying on our railways and canals and public works. I do not think it will be necessary to spend, say, $1,000,000, if proper management were used for the maintenance of Indians in the North-West. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) did not find it necessary to do so. I do not think we require to spend the best part of $1,000,000 in maintaining the Mounted Police, and there are innumerable other cases in which useful and valuable economies might be practised. Then the hon. gentleman has told us that it is quite possible to increase our Excise and make a good deal of that. But what I particularly want to point out is this, that under our scheme there is no question of additional taxation at all. It is a pure question of substitution. It is a pure question, at the worst, after all the resources I have spoken of have been exhausted, of substituting a cheap mode of taxation, if it comes to that, for an expensive mode. Now, the hon. gentlemen, over and over again, have deliberately misrepresented the position of the Reform party on this question, and I desire therefore to restate what I stated in 1888, when this question was first introduced. What I said was that we intended to levy no poll tax, that we intended to add nothing to the burdens of the labouring man, the farmer, the artisan, the miner, or the fisherman—or the real productive classes. I said:

"Sir, I desire to say that, in my judgment, we ought not—I do not think that this Government would dare, I do not think any other Government would wish—to add by direct taxation one farthing or one penny to the taxes that now press most heavily on the agricultural classes, on the fishermen, on the miners, on the lumbermen, on all the great producing classes in this country.

"I shall be prepared to prove in some detail, at the proper place and time, that among the many faults with which our system abounds, perhaps the greatest is this; that under it the hard-working, industrious thrifty man is taxed enormously out of proportion to his earnings; and I say that with a system of direct taxation, if you must have recourse to it (although I doubt greatly whether you need, with proper economy, to have recourse to it) that crying injustice must be redressed, and the respectable, well-to-do, moneyed classes must be made to pay their fair proportion, no more should be asked, to the burdens of the country. This proportion they most assuredly do not contribute to-day and never will, under a system of purely indirect taxation."

And I went on to say:

"I dwell on that particularly, because I am aware that, at this very moment, there are certain persons, presumably in the interest of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are losing no opportunity to impress upon the farmers of this country in particular, that if we get unrestricted reciprocity with the United States the federal revenues will have to be raised by direct taxation, levied in the same way as the municipal taxes are to-day. I, for one, will protest to the uttermost of my power against any such injustice; I, for one, declare here, speaking on my responsibility in my place in Parliament, speaking with a knowledge of the subject, that our present system is monstrously unjust to the poor man and too favourable to the rich man, and that injustice ought to be redressed, not by adding to the burden of the farmer, the labourer, the artisan, the mechanic, the fisherman, the miner, the lumberman, but by removing the burdens from these, and placing them upon the shoulders on which by right they ought to fall,"——

And not by taxing the people of Canada $2,000,000 a year for the benefit of a half a dozen sugar millionaires. Hon. gentlemen opposite are pleased to state, and have stated again and again, that our Customs revenue would be almost wholly destroyed if we adopted a system in any way resembling that of the United States. We do not propose to make our system a mere fac simile of theirs, but, for argument's sake, suppose we did adopt their system, suppose we did adopt a system by which we would collect as much revenue from Customs as the United States do, in proportion to our population, is there any reason to suppose that we would obtain less than they do? On the contrary, there is a strong probability that we would obtain more as being the inhabitants of the northern temperate zone. What do the United States expect to receive from Customs during the year 1891-92? After losing all their sugar duties, they expect to receive $190,000,000, and that amount may very probably be exceeded. Should we obtain a similar sum in proportion to our population, all we would lose would be the amount derived on the imports we now receive from the United States. But the Government and their friends wholly ignore this patent fact, that, if we were to obtain reciprocity with the United States, the wealth of this country would increase enormously and the population of this country would increase enormously. If the population of the country becomes more, and if it becomes richer, is it not perfectly clear and plain that that population will inevitably buy more luxuries and pay more taxes and add to the revenue in a thousand ways? Assail our fundamental proposition if you please; show if you can, what I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite will have the hardihood to attempt, that, if Canada obtains unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, we will not add greatly to our wealth, and in all probability be able to retain our own population here instead of losing them as we now do by the tens and hundreds of thousands in a decade. If you admit my fundamental proposition that unrestricted reciprocity means increased wealth and an increased population, your difficulty in regard to revenue vanishes into thin air, so that there is no need to be afraid of it on that ground, as the hon. gentleman opposite, when he called himself an independent member and sat on the back benches, was wont to say, when he advocated prohibition and advised us to sweep away all our Excise revenues by a stroke of the pen and trust to Providence for our income. If I thought our population was to remain stationary, I would still say this was by far our wisest course, but if you admit the increase in population and in wealth, there need be no fear, there need be no grave apprehension as to the difficulties we are to encounter. If there be any doubt that, if we had free trade with the United States, Canada would increase in wealth and population, it means to assert—and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to do so—either that the country we inhabit is inferior to the United States or that the people who inhabit it are inferior to their people. Have not the hon. gentlemen opposite always insisted that our country was as good as theirs, and sometimes have they not asserted that we had the best half of the continent? Have they not always insisted—and they are right in that—that Canadians are in ability and intelligence the equals of any people on the face of the earth? There is another point to which I might call attention. One great vice of our system is that we have too large a governmental machinery for our present population. You are altogether too extravagant in that matter.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Abolish the Locals.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not the slightest doubt that, looking at those who control well and wisely and honestly the Government of Ontario, they are a thorn in the flesh of my hon. friend, and he would be glad to see some of his friends on the other side of the House controlling that province, which may Heaven forefend. I say that one of our evils is that our governmental system is out of all proportion to our needs, that it is too large and too expensive for our real wants. We are spending four or five times in proportion what the United States found it necessary to expend at a similar period of their existence. Our present governmental machinery is large enough for ten or fifteen or probably twenty-five millions, so that, if there was an increase of population in this country, there would be a large increase of revenue with a very small increase in expenditure. You might double the population of Canada and hardly add 5 per cent. to the cost of the Government as now administered. Then there is another consideration. We are threatened with grave financial difficulties. If we could stop the exodus from this country and if, instead of increasing at the rate of 50,000, we were to increase, as we ought to do, at the rate of 150,000 or 200,000 a year, which is no extravagant supposition, then within two or three years we would add several millions to our annual income and would add very little to our expenditure. But the real fact is that, in what we propose to do, the money would not be lost, the money would go into the people's pockets. In point of fact a great deal more would go into the people's pockets than now goes into the treasury. Now, what is the position of the farmers of Canada to-day? They pay a large taxation to the United States on the principal portion of the goods they have to sell; they pay taxes to the Dominion Government, and to the combines which are so friendly to it on almost everything they have to buy. If we had reciprocity with the United States, the farmers would save all three taxes. They would save the taxes which they pay to the United States; they would save the taxes they are compelled to pay to the Dominion treasury, and they would save the taxes they have to pay to our friends of the combines. At the very least calculation on the proposition which I advance, we would save $16,000,00 to the people, with a possible loss of $8,000,000 to the revenue, and I think that is sound political economy and ought to commend itself to every man in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always using their own extravagance as a reason why we should not have reciprocity with the United States. It is a good rule of law that no man is allowed to plead his own wrongdoing, and these gentlemen ought to be estopped, on that ground alone, from contending that, because they have been monstrously extravagant, because they have frittered away our money by the hundreds of millions, they are unable to obtain anything like reciprocity with the United States on even terms. They tell the farmers of Canada that they cannot afford to endure a mere temporary disturbance, a mere substitution of one form of taxation for another, for fear the revenue would suffer. Sir, what would be the result if unrestricted reciprocity with the United States were obtained, so far as the farming population of Canada are concerned, so far as the population of the greater number of towns and villages is concerned? I take the one single item of stock, and I show the hon. gentlemen that on that one item, more would be saved by far to the farmers of Canada than would compensate three times, four times over, for any disturbance in the revenue. Last decade, in 1880, the farmers of Canada possessed a little over one million horses; I believe to-day the number has increased to something like a million and a quarter, although of that we have not full details. Now, it is known to every farmer that if we had free trade with the United States, he might add, at the very least, $30 more to the value of every horse that he possesses; on that one item of stock alone the farmers of Canada, by unrestricted reciprocity, would benefit to the tune of $30,000,000 to $37,000,000. In Ontario to-day, we have 22,000,000 acres held by farmers and under cultivation, more or less. Sir, it is not a matter of opinion with me but of knowledge, that given reciprocity with the United States, every one of those 22,000,000 acres would be worth, on the average, in the market $10 more than it is to-day; and I venture to say that I can produce from the richest agricultural districts in Ontario, not one, but four and forty good men and true representing those counties here, to back up every word of that statement. So that on that item alone, and for Ontario alone, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States would benefit the farmers in the increased value of their farms, by $200,000,000. What it may be for Quebec, what it may be for Prince Edward Island, what it may be for the Maritime Provinces, I do not pretend to say; I have not the same knowledge. However, I well believe that at least an equal sum, particularly if you take into account Manitoba, will be added to the value of their property. Sir, beside me sits my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), and that hon. gentleman showed me, some time ago, a letter from a former fellow townsman, whom evil legislation and the National Policy had turned into a citizen of the United States, giving my hon. friend the right to draw on him, I believe, for $5,000, to invest in a farm in Prince Edward Island, if only he thought there was a chance of unrestricted reciprocity. Sir, I have not the slightest doubt that an enormous increase in value amounting to many hundreds of millions would accrue in the first place, to the farmers of Canada, in the next place to the lumbermen, to the fishermen, to the proprietors of lands and property in the towns and villages throughout Canada. I know of no class who would be endangered by it except those worthy gentlemen of the Red Parlour, who have fattened so long at our expense, and have feasted under the regime of the hon. gentleman. The reason why the hon. gentleman does not desire to get reciprocity, or that he is not able to get it, is what I stated at first. The hon. gentleman, in this matter, is not a free agent, he is not free to act as he thinks the interest of the whole country requires. Party exigencies and the necessity of providing party funds for party managers, are the real obstacles in the way of unrestricted reciprocity. It is three years now since the first motion was made in favour of unrestricted reciprocity in this House. What have hon. gentlemen done in those three years? Worse than nothing, Sir. They have prejudiced our case in every possible way, they have got themselves into such a position that it is doubtful, except by a very great stretch of courtesy, whether they can get a hearing in the United States. Now, it is clear that these hon. gentlemen propose still to refuse to get us reciprocity, and that being so, I for my part demand, speaking for myself, speaking for my friends here, the representatives of a great majority of the agriculturists of Ontario—and I believe the great majority of the agriculturists of Canada—I demand that the exorbitant taxation under which the people now labour shall be reduced, and that it shall be reduced in reality, that we should see a genuine and bonâ fide reduction, not a sham reduction such as that of which notice was given this afternoon. Sir, the need of reduction is extreme. The hon. gentleman may not know it, I do not suppose the hon. gentleman does know it; but all over Ontario, and I believe all over Quebec, I believe all over the Maritime Provinces, there are no facts better known than this, that on the one hand the value of farm property is depreciating, on the other, the number and extent of mortgages is increasing immensely. Now, if hon. gentlemen dispute the facts which I gave them last year, I challenge them to make use of the census, or of any other means they please for the purpose of obtaining real and correct information as to the true state of the mortgage indebtedness throughout Canada. Sir, the hon. gentlemen declined the challenge I gave last year. I am not able, therefore, as they did not choose to accept, to obtain that minute information which I would like to have obtained for the purpose of showing how grievously the condition of the agricultural population of Canada has depreciated during the last twelve years. But, Sir, the information which they would not get, has been supplied in part, at least, by some returns recently furnished to the Ontario Government. I have here a list showing the total number of chattel mortgages on farms undischarged in twenty-eight counties, on the 31st December, 1889, and I find that there were no less than 6,474 such chattel mortgages. If that proportion be extended to the other counties, it means that in prosperous Ontario, a country which, under good government, under honest government, ought to be among the most prosperous sections, not merely of North America, but of the world, one farmer in every twelve is reduced to the extremest distress, is hoisting what is a true equivalent to the black flag. I need not tell my agricultural friends that the very last thing that any farmer does is to give a chattel mortgage on his stock and implements; he must be reduced to the most extreme distress before he does that. I repeat here the statement which I made last year, that I believe, if the truth were known, it would be found that almost every second farmer in the majority of our counties is heavily mortgaged. I shall not go into details as to the amount of the mortgages, because I have given evidence enough to show how great it is, and because, as I said, when the hon. gentlemen refused my challenge, it was proof enough to all fair and impartial men, that they knew if that challenge had been accepted, the result would have been substantially as I have stated. Sir, we have here vast embarrassments among a great number of our farmers, we have great depreciation in the value of land, we have great arrest in the growth of population. As I have repeatedly stated to-night there are very few agricultural counties in Ontario in which the farm population is not retrograding, there are very few of our towns and villages able to maintain the natural increase of births over deaths. I have a curious incidental proof taken from the hon. gentleman's own Trade and Navigation Returns, showing how things are going on in that direction. I turned, the other day, to our exports of manufactured goods. There appeared to be a nominal increase to the value of $1,000,000 over 1878, no very large increase. But it is desirable to see what constitutes our exports of manufactured goods. Here are the principal items: Of leather goods we exported in 1890, after twelve years of the National Policy, $309,000 worth, as against $804,000 in 1878; of wood and manufactures, $850,000 worth; ships to the value of $442,000; lime, $175,000 worth; extract of hemlock, $161,000 worth, not one of these items being such as the National Policy could be said in any way to have protected, and almost all having been exported in quite as large quantities 12 years ago as they are to-day. There are two other items to which I call the special attention of the House. Under the heading of exports of manufactured goods, I find the item of ice to the value of $247,000—ice as manufactured goods under the National Policy—and for a concluding item, household effects, the effects of men leaving the country, $818,000. I will admit there is one article of manufactured goods in which the increase has been most notable and extraordinary under the fostering care of the National Policy, and that is the item of household effects. Briefly, as I understand the case, our position may be compared to that of a man who owns a huge estate, but who is entirely cut out of the most profitable market for his produce. We have room in this Canada of ours, as I well believe, for one hundred millions of people, and perhaps for more, and yet we cannot keep, and have not been able to keep for the last 12 years, a decent proportion of our young men and women in our own country. Sir, we have resources of a great many kinds. Some of our resources, I believe, are calculated to give us a natural monopoly in various important articles, and yet for lack of markets, for the United States is really our only available market except Great Britain, we are quite unable to make use of them. This confederation is not twenty-five years old, and yet in those years we have contrived to weigh ourselves down with as heavy a debt in proportion to our population, with a much heavier taxation in proportion to our population, than most nations of 500 years of age. We talk of our glorious constitution, we prate of our chartered liberties. Why, we deny to our people the most common rights and liberties known to England and to English custom, the right to do the best we can for ourselves, to buy in such market as we please, and sell in such market as we please, without being fined for the operation. We have used our natural advantages with this result, that to-day in the great country we have obtained possession of in the North-West we find literally hundreds of people where there ought to be millions. The hon. gentleman and his friends boast of their loyalty. They declare they cannot, forsooth, do anything that may imperil their loyalty, but they do not hesitate to drive a million of Her Majesty's subjects into exile. They talk of their faith in Canada, mark that, and the way they show it is by demonstrating that they are afraid to allow our people to compete in open markets with the rest of the people on this continent. They declare, forsooth, that they have faith in Canada, and yet, the people of Canada in their view are such poor knaves that they are quite unable to hold their own in competition with the people of the United States. I maintain no such doctrine, no such belief. One redeeming feature of the vast emigration of Canadians to the United States is this, that wherever Canadians have gone, from one end of the country to the other, they have asserted themselves and occupied positions of responsibility and importance in a most unusual percentage in proportion to the number now settled in the neighbouring Republic. Sir, these hon. gentlemen allege that we are fleeing from one protective system to a higher protective system. A child would know better than to use such an argument. If there be one thing clearer than another it is this, that the position of the United States is such, the extent and character of their territory is such, the mass of population is such, that there cannot possibly be conceived a country in which the experiment of protection, the mistaken and mischievous experiment, I believe, can be tried with less risk to the inhabitants than in the United States; and per contra, and conversely, there is no country on the face of the earth of which I have ever read, heard, or seen, so utterly unsuited to try the experiment of protection as this Canada of ours. Sir, the measure of the mischief of protection is essentially the measure of the narrowness of the area, and by that I do not mean the geographical area alone, for the larger the extent and the greater the population the less the injury done. I will give an illustration which I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will understand. What mischief would follow if Europe and America enacted the most insane protective tariff which ever entered into the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite against the manufactures of Asia and Africa? No harm would result. And similarly in our case I tell the hon. gentlemen that to all intents and purposes the nearest practical approach to genuine and real free trade for Canada lies in unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. I propose to crystallize our views briefly. The twelve years of folly, fraud and falsehood which we have struggled against have to a great extent done their work. The hon. gentleman tells us that trade is on a sound basis. I tell the hon. gentleman that, if unhappily the present harvest should prove below the average, we would be within measurable distance of a great financial crisis, and he will find that view is held by men of the greatest experience in business in this country. The time is ripe for a change; and what change shall it be? Our National Policy is discredited. We see quite clearly in our present condition that we must obtain relief or continue to see our population diminishing under our eyes until Canada is becoming very little better than a breeding ground for producing citizens for the United States. Instead of that we offer a clear cut rational policy; we offer a clear cut rational, plain and distinct policy; we say the only way you can redress the mischief you have done, the only way you can give our people a chance, the only way to increase our population, the only way in which you can make atonement to the farmers for the overtaxation you have wrung from them for these many years, is by obtaining reciprocity with the United States and in order that the sense of the House may be clearly expressed on the question I beg to move:

That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

Resolved—That the situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artisans, miners, fishermen and farmers; and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured as well as natural products.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose that we should follow the same course that we have done on other occasions, and go into Committee on the resolutions and pass them with what debate will be necessary, which, I hope, will not be very much at this time. Then we can concur in the resolutions in some future time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And then we can proceed with the debate afterwards?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course it is well understood that the fullest possible discussion will go on in future stages in the Committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Your motion will have to be withdrawn for the moment to allow us to go into Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course this discussion cannot be possibly closed to-night, and, as my hon. friend suggests, it is of importance to the public service that these resolutions should be passed, so that under these circumstances I do not object to withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, the resolution can be withdrawn for the moment and we can go into Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw the amendment?

Amendment withdrawn.

House resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Probably as these resolutions are long, it had better be understood that their adoption now is purely pro forma on our part, and is intended not in the slightest degree to imply our concurrence in them, but is merely for the purpose of giving the Government an opportunity of putting them in force at once and preventing any fraud on the revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the understanding.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And that there will be perfect liberty to discuss or to object to any item hereafter?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Resolutions reported.

CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved third reading of Bill (No. 97) to amend the Act respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that full provision is made in the contract with this company that our subsidy is only to be paid to them so long as they keep the road in good working order. I desire to know from the hon. Minister of Finance if that is the case.

Mr. FOSTER. The Act remains exactly as it was. No change has been made in that clause.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the case, is it?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the case, the schedule provides that.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSONS BAY RAILWAY.

On the Order being read for the to House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:—

That it is expedient, in order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway Company to construct a railway from the city of Winnipeg to some point on the Saskatchewan River, to enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and to pay for such services during the said term eighty thousand dollars per annum, such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the said railway.

Mr. LAURIER. We are not prepared for the discussion of this important item this evening, and I do not think the hon. gentleman should take it up.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is rather important for the parties interested that it should be taken up this evening. Some of the financial parties interested are sailing in the course of a few days, and are very anxious we should get it through, and if it does not go through to-day it will not for a couple of weeks.

Mr. LAURIER. There was a misunderstanding the other day as to what would be the business on Friday last. Nobody expected this evening that anything would be taken up except the Budget, and I submit that it would not be fair to this side that we should be unexpectedly called on to consider this important Bill.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No one expected the motion to adjourn yesterday.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, you might have expected it.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not usual to give notice of such items as this on a Government day, because they are always expected to come up on such a day, and hon. gentlemen are supposed to be ready for the discussion. As it is of great importance that this item should be passed, I think the House ought to go on with it.

Mr. LAURIER. This is the first time in my experience that we ever adjourned the Budget debate when it had but fairly commenced.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not adjourned.

Mr. LAURIER. It is not going on.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman's memory is at fault. There has never been a case but one, since I have been in the House, in which the course pursued to-night has not been followed. That case occurred the last time, or the time before, when the Budget ran over a week or ten days, causing great confusion in carrying out the law as proposed. In all other cases the tariff resolutions have been carried on the day introduced.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the usual course taken has been that the House immediately adjourned, and did not take up any other matters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Customs will find that my hon. friend is quite right. We have repeatedly, in the interests of the public service, on both sides of the House, consented to allow the tariff resolutions to be put in force for the purpose of preventing manifest loss to revenue, but it has always been the custom to adjourn immediately, and, if I remember rightly, it was two o'clock before we adjourned last night.

Mr. DALY. I submit that this motion has been on the paper for some days, and that hon. gentlemen opposite have had every opportunity of enquiring into it. The Minister of the Interior is prepared to give certain information on the question, which, I understand, is all that is required, and I may say it is highly important in the interest of this work, which is of great moment to our people in Manitoba and the North-West, that this matter should come up to-night. There are gentlemen interested in it who are desirous of sailing for Europe at the earliest moment, in order that they may have the opportunity of placing the scheme in the hands of their friends, before the financial year closes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We must have time to consider it. It is a question involving millions of dollars, and involving indirectly the question of the practicability of navigating the Straits, and we must have time to hear what has been said on the subject, and to consider the general policy.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The portion of the road for which we propose to ask assistance, although a portion of the Hudson Bay Railway proper, does not involve the consideration of the whole question. It is only proposed to assist in the construction of the first three hundred miles of the line, known as the Hudson Bay Road, as a colonization road, exactly in the same way as the two other roads built by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Saskatchewan. It does not call into question the Hudson Bay route whatever.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Last evening, when the importance of having the resolutions about the Hudson Bay Railway advanced a stage was brought to our notice, we were fully impressed with the necessity of curtailing the Budget debate, if necessary, in order to make room for it. It was represented to us that the negotiations which will be connected with the enterprise, would be materially advanced if the resolution itself passed a stage to-night. There is no desire on the part of the Government to curtail the debate. Of course hon. gentlemen opposite cannot take up a question they are not prepared to discuss, but if they will let the resolution go forward a stage, I am sure great advantage will be gained by the enterprise itself. We can do nothing, under the circumstances, but appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, and give them assurance that they will have ample time to discuss the measure.

Mr. LAURIER. Since it was determined by the Government yesterday evening that this important matter should be taken up to-day, I only regret that the rules, which the hon. gentleman said yesterday ought to prevail in the relations between the Government and the Opposition, were not carried out, and the Opposition not informed that this matter would be taken up.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not my fault but my hon. friend; because when the proposition was made to adjourn he did not seek any information as to what business would be taken up to-day, otherwise we would have been prepared to tell him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that we have only been able to stop the Budget debate and reach the present stage, by the consent of the leader of the Opposition to withdraw for the time being the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) so as to enable the Government to make the necessary progress with the tariff resolutions. It would be rather unfair, to say the least, if after extending that courtesy to the Government, they should insist on springing on the House a resolution of this important character, on which some hon. gentlemen desire to speak. If we go into committee and report the resolution, there will be no adequate opportunity to discuss the matter at a further stage. The hon. gentleman might take it up the first thing on Thursday before going on with the Budget debate. We have no disposition to throw obstacles in his way, but some consideration should be shown the Opposition under the circumstances.

Mr. BOWELL. The only reason why I disapproved of the statement of the hon. gentleman was, that he said there was no other opportunity so favourable as this to discuss this question; but he knows that a Bill will have to be introduced, founded on these resolutions, and that will have to be referred to committee, so that the fullest opportunity for discussion will be given. The only difference is, that there will be two opportunities in that case, whereas there would have been only one now, for the discussion.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In view of the line taken by the Opposition, and seeing that not much progress could be made now, I think, if the Opposition will agree to take this matter up on Thursday, I will waive my objection.

DECK AND LOAD LINES.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 106) to provide for the marking of deck and load lines.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. TUPPER. I stated on the introduction of this Bill that I intended, when it was read the second time, to ask that it be referred to a Select Committee, and I propose now that it shall be referred to a Committee composed of the following gentlemen:—Messrs. Borden, Flint, Gillmor, Welsh, Yeo, Davies, Langelier, Kaulbach, Kenny, Putnam, Tupper, Skinner, Burns, Adams, Wood, McDonald (King's), Curran and Desjardins (L'Islet).

Motion agreed to.

ADMIRALTY COURTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was anxious to proceed with the Bill in reference to the admiralty jurisdiction, and I understood it was being examined by hon. gentlemen opposite. I would ask whether they are ready to go on with that now?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the hon. gentleman will not ask us to go on with that now, as it was expected that the debate on the Budget would take the whole day.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BOWELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 105) respecting the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman should give us some explanation as to what railways this Bill is intended to apply.

Mr. BOWELL. The object of the Bill is simply to curtail the system of keeping the accounts. It refers to the main line of the Intercolonial, the Eastern Extension Railway, the Cape Breton Railway and the Windsor Branch Railway. At present a separate account has to be kept, and up to this year a distinct set of books has been kept for each of these lines, entailing a considerable amount of expense which will be removed by this measure. The object of the Bill is to make these roads form part of the Intercolonial, and that is the only object, as I am informed by the Railway Department and the Chief Engineer. I asked him to make a statement as to the effect of this Bill upon the running of the road, and he assures me that it will have no effect whatever in that regard, but will simply consolidate the different branches which exist now as separate lines, and for which a separate account has to be kept.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Windsor and Annapolis Railway was included?

Mr. BOWELL. No; the Windsor Branch.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is only one objection to this that I can see, and I suppose it is not of much weight. Under the present system, we have some opportunity of ascertaining what portions of the road are paying and what are not. Now, you have the Intercolonial proper, running from Point Lévis to Halifax, and from that to New Glasgow, and you have the expenditure and receipts on that main line. You have also the expenditure and receipts of the Eastern Extension, and you will have hereafter the expenditure and receipts of the Cape Breton Railway, as you now have the expenditure and receipts of the Prince Edward Island Railway. That enables one to judge of the portions of the road which are paying and those which are not paying. The only objection I see is that you will be unable to see which parts of the line pay and which do not pay, and it might be important to know that. I have never raised any objection to the construction of the road through Cape Breton, which has cost some $3,000,000. In view of the policy adopted by the Government in 1882, I never raised any objection to that, but I always had the extremest curiosity to learn what would be the effect of the running of that road. I have heard my hon. friends opposite frequently refer to the fact that the Prince Edward Island Railway was run at a loss, and no doubt that was true, and I have heard references to the possible results of the running of the Cape Breton road. Therefore, not from curiosity alone, but for the purpose of comparison with railways in other portions of the Dominion, I was anxious to know what would be the result of the construction of this Cape Breton Railway. We have the Eastern Extension, we know exactly what that costs; we have the Prince Edward Island road; we have the main line and the Windsor Branch. But when these are merged, all hope of attaining any result in that direction will be gone, and the general working of the road in the Island of Cape Breton will be merged in the general working of the Intercolonial Railway, and the House will have no opportunity at any time of determining whether that is a loss or whether it is a gain. My own impression is very strong that it will be a mighty heavy loss, but whether that impression is well founded or not, nobody will be able to judge hereafter. Of course, I am not able to say whether the necessities that the hon. gentleman speaks of, are such as to justify this change, and the loss which I can see we will derive in the matter of information. I dare say the hon. gentleman may be better informed than I am, but I can see great difficulties that will arise in the way I have stated.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friend from Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), I am sure will be very glad to learn that so far as we can judge up to the present time, there will be no loss in the running of the Cape Breton road.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As it has not been run, I do not see how there can be a loss.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The Cape Breton road has been run since January last, and in every month since it commenced to run there has been a large surplus over the running expenses. So far as I am concerned, as well as the other representatives from Cape Breton, I can assure my hon. friend that I will be very glad to see the accounts of the running of that road kept separate; but if the Government feel that these accounts can be more easily kept by having them kept with the other roads I can have no serious objection. But my hon. friend from Queen's will find out by experience, that the importance of Cape Breton is so much superior to that of little Prince Edward Island, that there will not be any loss in the running of that road.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this is a very important Bill, for it is a very short one, and I think its importance has been plainly stated to the House by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). The Opposition have continuously opposed the construction of many of those lines for the last ten years, on the ground, first, that they duplicated the Intercolonial Railway at many points; and, secondly, because they believed the roads would not pay the running expenses, let alone pay interest on the money invested. For I can easily see by the passage of this Bill, that it will free the present Government of all the responsibilities that they undertook, in the statements they presented to the House with regard to the earnings of the different lines. For instance, the Oxford and New Glasgow Line, which was built virtually to duplicate the Intercolonial road, will now be merged in the non-paying Intercolonial Railway, and many of the other lines in the same way. It is going to give the Government an opportunity of continuing the recklessness of which they have been guilty in the construction of those lines, and, it will prevent that investigation into the separate earnings of those portions of the Government railways that the country has a right to have, and as a simple matter of justice to the Opposition, that we should have in order to verify the predictions that have been made with regard to those lines. If the hon. gentleman gets this Act passed, the form of keeping the books of the whole railway system under the control of the Dominion will be altered; it will be treated as one line, and those lines that have been built foolishly, extravagantly, unnecessarily, will be merged into the whole system, and the country will be unable to learn, if ever that consolidation takes place, whether those lines are earning their own expenses or not. We cannot tell a single thing about them. Now, I say that it is wrong that that condition of things should be inaugurated, because the country has a right to know whether the predictions made by the Government at the inception of these different schemes have been realized with regard to the probabilities of their earning money sufficient to pay, not only their running expenses but some small interest on the investment. I suppose the acting Minister of Railways has begun to realize by past experience that if they are left open to criticism, as they are under the present arrangement, their predictions with regard to them will no more be fulfilled than were their predictions with regard to the North-West and the export of grain, and the enormous receipts from lands and so on, in those glowing statements and grand predictions that were presented to the country by Sir Charles Tupper when he induced the House to grant a $30,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then we were to have so many inhabitants to go in there, we were to have so many hundred millions of bushels shipped from that country, and we were to have so many millions of money paid into the Dominion treasury by a certain time. Not one of those predictions has been fulfilled; we have not got ten per cent. of the amount promised. Now, we can well remember in what glowing terms, with what amount of eloquence the High Commissioner brought before this House his statements as to what would be the result of the building of the Oxford and New Glasgow road. He told us it was to open up an enormous extent of country, it would shorten the distance between the cities of Ontario and the cities of the east, it would be the means of bringing the trade of the Maritime Provinces to the doors of the people of Ontario, and it was an absolute necessity. He presented such a glowing picture to the House of the magnificent results that would flow from the construction of that line, that he induced many to believe that it would be the greatest boon that could be possibly achieved. But now we know perfectly well that in place of its being 45 miles shorter it was only four or five miles; in place of the grades being less, as he said they would be, in order to facilitate the bringing of New Glasgow coal to Montreal and other ports, the grades were actually steeper. We know that in order to meet the necessities of the party at that particular time, and to run the road from door to door in order to satisfy that particular section, the road was virtually spoiled. It was lengthened and run zigzag, to different points, and the result was to increase the grades and to leave them no better than they were on the line of the Intercolonial Railway. Now, that will be merged along with the Intercolonial Railway, along with all the rest of the lines. This Bill is short, but it is going to give the Government the power of burying up their past acts with regard to their reckless conduct in expending money in the Maritime Provinces in useless and wasteful speculations, not as a necessity, but for political purposes. The whole thing will be merged into one, and neither the people of this country nor the Opposition will ever be able to find out the exact earnings of the portions that have been built, and the country will be called upon to pay an annual deficit, as it has done for many years past, to keep these roads running, and it is going to enable the Government in that way to bury up the extravagance that has characterized their conduct in connection with the road during the last ten years.

Mr. KENNY. I think the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), and probably other hon. gentlemen sitting on that side of the House, will remember that when the Intercolonial Railway expenditure was under consideration, either the past session or the session immediately previous, it was suggested, I think, by an hon. gentleman sitting on the other side of the House, that it would be more convenient if all these items were congregated together and we had one system of book-keeping. I am speaking now entirely from memory. I think the hon. member for Queen's was in the House at the time; he takes an interest in all these roads, and it was suggested by an hon. gentleman opposite that it would be more convenient for the public service if these expenditures were united together, that the system of book-keeping would be more perfect. I think I am correct in making the statement that the suggestion actually came from the other side of the House to make this change. But under the circumstances, I think we must admit that while there is great force in the argument presented by the hon. member for Queen's, it may not, perhaps, be so easy to find the details of each particular branch, yet in dealing with Intercolonial Railway expenditure, I think the Bill before the House will lighten the duties of the members of the House.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to know what is the expense of the present system of bookkeeping. The Minister of Customs, I think, rests his Bill wholly upon the ground of the saving of expense. The object, he says, is to save the expense of keeping separate accounts. There is a great deal of force in the arguments advanced by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and there should be a balancing of arguments both ways. One can readily see that if this principle is to apply in future, every time there is an extension of the Intercolonial, or the Government chose to construct some branch railway, the parent line may have the financial success of the enterprise completely given to it. That is not the proper course to adopt. The Minister should be able to give the House the information we ask, and tell us how much will be saved.

Mr. BOWELL. I frankly tell the hon. gentleman I do not know. My connection with the railway department has only extended over a few days, and details such as have been asked I am not prepared to give at this moment. Nor am I prepared to accept the statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), but I do not propose to discuss it. I can tell the hon. gentleman and this House that, so far as this Bill is concerned, it is introduced for the sole object of cutting down the expenses as far as possible in the management of that road. I know there is no desire on the part of the Government, or those connected with the department, to hide anything or deprive hon. gentlemen or the country of all the information they should have, and they should have all it is possible to give them. I fully comprehend the force of the suggestions or objections, if I may be allowed to so term them, thrown out by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). There is a great deal of force in what he says. What I suggest is, that if the hon. gentleman will allow the Bill to go through Committee I will not ask the third reading to be taken until I have had sufficient time to enquire from the department, and obtain the information which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) asks, and such information as other hon. members desire. My own impression is, and I admit that I have very little knowledge of railway book-keeping, that there will be no difficulty in obtaining the information which the hon. gentleman suggests. I can understand that in running a train through from one point over the main line and returning, the cost of the coal consumed on one portion of the route might be difficult to ascertain. Still, there might be a pro rata mileage charged. To be frank with hon. members, I must say I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details to give the information requested; but I will make enquiries at the department and ascertain if the system of book-keeping would not enable the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) or any other member, who desires the information to obtain it as fully as if half a dozen sets of books were kept in connection with the different branches. I will also endeavour to find out what saving will be made in connection with this matter, as asked by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock).

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I have no desire to factiously obstruct the passage of the Bill, and I am not therefore going to offer any objection to the Bill going into Committee. The hon. gentleman will see that the Windsor Branch stands in a different position from the other branches. The Government maintain the way of the Windsor Branch and receive one-third of the receipts, while two-thirds of the receipts go to the Windsor and Annapolis Company. I cannot see very well how the accounts of the branch can be mixed up with those of the Intercolonial Railway, which is owned by the Government. I may say frankly to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that I offer less opposition to this Bill, because at present the accounts of the Oxford and New Glasgow and Pictou roads are included in the Intercolonial accounts. The only roads the Bill asks to amalgamate with the Intercolonial Railway in this regard are the Eastern Extension and Cape Breton roads. My anxiety was to discover what the working of the Cape Breton road would be. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) has stated a fact not within the knowledge of members of this House, and not, I believe, contained in any official record, certainly it is not in the railway report or railway statistics or published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). If the hon. gentleman will ask for a return he will find the facts I have stated are correct.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will take the opportunity to ask for a return. To avoid the necessity of obtaining a return, perhaps the hon. gentleman will kindly give the information.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). With very great pleasure.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us in regard to the working of the Cape Breton road, which it is now proposed to amalgamate with the Intercolonial Railway, what have been the receipts and expenditures during the time it has been in operation? If the receipts and expenditures of the Oxford and New Glasgow and the Pictou Branch had been separate, I would have been disposed to maintain the objection made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), but as they are contained in the Intercolonial accounts, the only thing we are discussing is whether the Eastern Extension and Cape Breton roads should be kept separate.

Mr. BOWELL. I can fully understand the objection, more particularly in view of the difficulty I have had in the Customs Department in coming to a correct conclusion as to the amount of drawback in the shape of Customs duties paid on articles used upon the road, and purchased in foreign countries by those who owned them. In the original charter obtained from the Province of Nova Scotia certain conditions were made and a perpetual exemption from Customs duties was given, and my difficulty has been to ascertain the amount chargeable to that portion of the road which belongs to the Intercolonial Railway, over which their engines, passenger and freight trains were run. To use a familiar expression we have had to "jump at it."

Mr. McMULLEN. The Grand Trunk Company operate a great many lines and keep separate accounts for each road. From the company's annual report you can trace the mileage and earnings of every line they operate. It must also be remembered that the Grand Trunk Company are operating far more branch lines than are the Dominion Government. I was not previously aware that the Windsor and New Glasgow road was operated as part of the Intercolonial.

Mr. BOWELL. Are not most of the branch lines of the Grand Trunk Railway Company leased roads?

Mr. McMULLEN. Some are not, and still the accounts are kept separately. It is highly desirable that we should have this information I ask, unless the item for book-keeping is going to be a very important one, as it is highly desirable that this country should be in possession of the facts with respect to the annual earnings of the lines; and to verify and substantiate that our fault-finding is necessary, we should be able to trace the annual cost of the different portions of these lines. I was pleased to hear my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) say that the Cape Breton line was now paying running expenses and a little over. That is more than we expected; but we hope that it will do more than that, and if it does pay a small interest on the investment it is fair to Cape Breton that the rest of the Dominion should know that its railway is not a drain on our resources. If the accounts are not kept separately, the impression might prevail, without any possibility of setting it right in the future that the Cape Breton Railway was a drain on the country. When the hon. Minister presents his statement as regards the cost of book-keeping we will be able to decide whether it is better to have specific information as to the annual cost of each portion of this line than to save the paltry sum which might be saved by the passing of this Act.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I have no desire to prolong the discussion, but if separate accounts are kept I would suggest they should be kept differently from the manner suggested by my hon. friends opposite. I would suggest that the accounts of the branch of the Intercolonial Railway from Point Lévis to Moncton be kept separately from the accounts of the rest of the road; that the accounts of that part of the Intercolonial Railway between St. John and Moncton, between Moncton and Sydney, C. B., and between Halifax and Pictou be also kept separately. If that were done I think it will be found out that the eastern portion of the road pays remarkably well, and that the deficit on the running of the Intercolonial Railway is largely incurred between Point Lévis and Moncton, and that it is chiefly on account of carrying the products of the great Province of Ontario to the consumers down by the sea at a lower rate than should be paid to the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to ask the acting Minister whether, if the Bill passes and all the branches and extensions are under the one management, it is contemplated to make any change in the freight arrangements as regards the new branches of the road?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Perhaps the Minister could give me the information before the Bill passes. I simply want to point out that along the Intercolonial Railway from Campbellton to Halifax, including Pictou, the rate is precisely the same, but the moment you leave Windsor Junction on the Windsor and Annapolis Branch, the rates are much higher; and also from New Glasgow, Antigonish, Port Mulgrave and Point Tupper, the rates are a great deal higher. I want to find out, if they were all brought under the one management, whether the rates could not be made the same from Antigonish as they are along the line to Pictou and other points on the Intercolonial Railway. I see no reason why, on the Windsor and Annapolis Branch, freight can be carried to Pictou at a certain rate and it cannot be carried to Annapolis at the same rate. I hope that before the Bill passes we shall have some information on this.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman wish to know whether the through rates or the local rates are to be changed?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The through rates.

Bill reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 24th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 115) to amend the Act respecting Government Harbours, Piers and Breakwaters.—(Mr. Tupper.)

POSTMASTER AT GALT.

Mr. SEMPLE asked, Did Mr. Thomas Cowan resign the office of postmaster at Galt before the 5th of March last? If so, has he been reappointed, or does some other person hold the position?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Thomas Cowan did resign the office of postmaster at Galt before the 5th of March last. He has been reappointed.

INDIAN AGENT ALLEN.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Did the Government receive the following letter, and if so, what action have they taken in regard to it?

"To the Right Honourable
"The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

"SIR,—Last winter (a year ago), there were informations laid with Indian Agent Allen by the undersigned Indians.

"Three of those informations were against Thomas McVittie, of Denny's Mills, for selling liquor to Indians.

"McVittie was fined in two of the cases; fine $50 in each case.

"The informant Johnston, who is an Indian of the Saugeen Band, went several times to Allen about his share of the fines, but could not get any cash. All that he could get from Allen was $10 in goods out of Mulvaney's store in Port Elgin, and he was entitled to $50, $25 in each case.

"There was an information lodged against Charles Briggs, of Paisley, for giving liquor to Indians.

"The information against him was laid by Thomas Solomon, an Indian and Councillor in the Band.

"Briggs came in company with Mr. Hilker, of Port Elgin, and paid him (Allen) $50, fine and costs, before trial.

"Solomon has not got his $25.

"At last October pay-day (October, 1890), Agent Allen hearing that Solomon was going to report the matter to the Indian Department, sent word to him that he had $15 for him, and if he did not take that he would not get any.

"Agent Allen is giving orders on our annuity money to merchants, and one merchant he allows to make orders, and accepts the same.

"He allows the same merchant, R. Buckley, to sit at the pay-table and collect his pay, when all others have to stay out of doors.

"There are several matters that require investigation, and if you require proof you can summon the following persons, viz.:—A. Lindsay, Merchant; John Wood, Merchant; D. Robertson, Merchant; J. J. Creighton, Merchant; A. Hambridge, Carriage Manufacturer; H. Harmer, Furniture Dealer; and nearly the whole Band of Saugeen Indians.

(Signed) "RALPH JOHNSTON.
"THOMAS SOLOMON."

Mr. DEWDNEY. A letter from these parties was received by the Department of Indian Affairs, containing charges against Agent Allen, similar to those mentioned in this letter, which purports to be a copy thereof, but is not. The letter was acknowledged, and a copy of the same was forwarded to the Inspector of Indian Agencies and Reserves with instructions to investigate and report upon the same. No report has yet been received from the inspector.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION AT DIGBY, N.S.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Is the Government aware that the postal accommodation at Digby, N.S., a central station for the distribution of mails, is totally insufficient for the demands upon it? If so, is it the intention of the Government at an early date to make more suitable arrangements for the erection of a building and the extension of postal accommodation in that locality?

Mr. HAGGART. The Post Office Department has no communication on the subject of the question asked by the hon. gentleman.

BERNE COPYRIGHT CONVENTION.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. EDGAR) asked, Whether the Canadian Government has requested the Imperial Government to give notice, on behalf of Canada, for the renunciation of the Berne Copyright Convention? If such request was made by the Canadian Government, what was the date thereof? And if notice has been given by the Imperial Government, what was the date thereof?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Canadian Government has requested the Imperial Government to give notice, on behalf of Canada, for the renunciation of the Berne Copyright Convention. Such request was made by the Canadian Government in August, 1889. The notice, I believe, has not yet been given by the Imperial Government.

BONDING OF FOREIGN FISH.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any change in the regulations respecting the bonding of foreign fish, or to require that such fish imported in bond shall be exported in the original packages?

Mr. BOWELL. No regulations exist having special reference to fish more than to other warehoused goods, all of which is defined by law. It appeared from representations made to the department in 1889 that the provisions of laws had not been observed in relation to fish, and instructions were issued to collectors calling attention to the law's requirements and insisting upon their observance. The circular issued at that time was as follows:—

"I have, by the direction of the hon. the Minister of Customs, to call your special attention to the provisions of section 89 of the Customs Act as amended by the Act 52 Vic., chap. 14 (last session), and now in force, which provides that goods entered for warehouse shall be immediately after entry transported to and placed in the designated warehouse; and of section 96, which provides that if goods so entered are not duly carried into and deposited in the warehouse, or having been so deposited are afterwards taken out without lawful permit, &c., such goods shall be seized and forfeited; and to point out that under these provisions of law the practice which has heretofore existed at certain ports of permitting foreign fish which has been so entered for warehouse to remain on the wharf for the purpose of being further cured, packed or repacked before entry ex-warehouse for consumption or exportation, can be no longer lawfully allowed, but such fish must immediately, on being entered, be placed in the designated warehouses and there secured in the same manner as any other bonded goods; this, however, does not prevent the packing or repacking of such fish under Customs supervision within the bonded warehouse, under the terms of section 88 of the Act; but no privileges can be given further than within the section hereinbefore referred to."

It is not the intention of the Government to make any change in the law regulating the bonding of fish or other goods; the provisions of the law being sufficient to protect the revenue in re bonding of all goods.

BOUCHERVILLE WHARF.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. PRÉFONTAINE) asked, 1. To whom was the work on the Boucherville wharf entrusted? 2. Was the work awarded under contract for a public call for tenders, or not? 3. And if the work was awarded without tenders, why was it so awarded, and what was the price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 1. The work was entrusted to the municipality of the parish of Boucherville. 2. No; but it was arranged for under an agreement with the municipal council of the parish of Boucherville, County of Chambly, to whom the estimates have been paid as the work has progressed. 3. The amount paid was in the light of a contribution towards the completion of a work commenced by the said municipality and constructed by them. The amount agreed to be paid to the municipalityis $3,200.

KINGSTON POST OFFICE.

Mr. AMYOT asked, 1. Whether there are in the post office at Kingston boxes or drawers fastened with lock and key, leased yearly to private individuals, and were there any such in 1889? 2. What is the yearly charge per box, and to whom does the amount belong? 3. Does the postmaster of Kingston make a yearly report thereon to the Government? 4. Does the said postmaster keep a record of the names of the lessees of the said boxes?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. Yes, and they were so leased in 1889. 2. The yearly charge per box varies from $4 to $6; the amount belongs to the Government. 3. Yes. 4. Yes, but only from year to year.

EMPLOYMENT OF W. A. SHEPPARD.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. CHOQUETTE) asked, Whether Mr. W. A. Sheppard is employed by the Government as an immigration agent, or in any other capacity? If he is so employed, has he made any report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Sheppard is incidentally employed for the distribution of immigration publications in towns of the United States. He has been so employed since 1883. He has furnished regular reports of his operations.

CAPTAIN CLAUDE GIGUÈRE.

Mr. AMYOT asked, 1. Has Captain Claude Giguère been in the employ of the Dominion Government, and also in that of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec for thirteen years and over?

2. Has he been employed, with men under him, to clear the bed of the river forming the harbour of Quebec; to dredge and level the River St. Lawrence at various places; and to lay the foundations of various wharves for the Government?

3. Has he performed these services and duties to the satisfaction of the officers of the Government?

4. Has he been employed by the Government, during the season of navigation for 1890, as diver, or otherwise, at Grosse Isle?

5. Were his services for the same work retained by the Engineer, George L. Bourchier, or other person, for the season of navigation for 1891?

6. Did the said Giguère accept the offer made him?

7. Did the said Bourchier, on the 12th May, 1891, write to the said Captain Giguère informing him that his services would no longer be required?

8. At whose suggestion was this cancelling of the agreement decided upon? Was it, among other persons, done upon the advice of another diver? Why did the Government act in this manner? Does the Government intend to pay and reimburse to the said Giguère whatever loss he may have suffered by reason of the foregoing?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 1. Yes, Giguère was employed by the department. Nothing is known in the department as to his being employed by the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec.

2. Giguère was engaged in the removal of boulders at Quebec, Three Rivers, &c.

3. The work was performed satisfactorily.

4. He was employed at Grosse Isle during 1890. Mr. Bourchier says that Captain Claude Giguère's men, Peter Baeudette and X. Parre, worked for him, on account of Government, at Grosse Isle, from 14th October, 1890, till 15th November, 1890.

5. No; Giguère was not retained for the season of 1891.

6. Mr. Bourchier says he never made Giguère any such offer.

7. His men's services were of a decidedly temporary character; they were paid for their time by the day, and liable to be discharged at any moment when their services were no longer required.

8. There was no such agreement.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, When was the Electoral Franchise Act passed? How many times has it been amended since? How many times have the lists been revised? How many times suspended? Have the revisions and suspensions occurred alternately? Were revisions promised which did not take place? If so, why? Will the lists be revised this year? What has been the cost of each revision? What the total cost? Was anything paid for the lists in seasons when suspended? If so, how much?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I find that in one particular I was mistaken in the answer I gave the other day, and will, therefore, answer the whole question. The Electoral Franchise Act was passed in 1885. The lists have been twice revised. The Act has been twice suspended. The revisions and suspensions have not occurred alternately. The revisions were not promised which did not take place, but the intentions of the Government with regard to revisions were simply declared. The lists will be revised this year. The cost of each revision has already been laid before the House, including the total cost. Nothing was paid for the lists in seasons when suspended.

DREDGING KAMINISTIQUIA RIVER.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, How many yards of dredging, according to engineer's report, have been done on the bar of the Kaministiquia River by Captain Murray, and what amount of money has been paid him for the same, since July, 1890? How many yards have been dredged in the River Kaministiquia by the same party, since July last, and how much money has he received for the same?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On the bar, 50,010 cubic yards at 7 cents, $3,500.70; in the river, 99,650 yards at 19 cents, $18,933.50; total, $22,434.20. The quantities of dredging to be done during the season of 1890 were as follows:—On the bar, 50,000 cubic yards; in the river, 100,000 cubic yards.

LANGEVIN BLOCK.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. What is the total amount expended by the Government in connection with the Langevin Block? 2. What is the amount of all unpaid claims in connection with the erection of said block?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total amount expended is $778,961.60. On main contract for construction, $252,593.57; on contract of roof, $15,813.99; iron stairs, $3,854.58. In answer to the second question, these claims are not recognized by the department, with the exception of the small sum of $1,000 or $2,000.

SAULT STE. MARIE WHARF.

Mr. GILLMOR asked, Did the Government purchase the property at Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., upon which the Government wharf is built? If so, from whom, and upon what terms was the purchase made? What was the total cost of the wharf? Who is in charge of it? What agreement (if any) was made with the party in charge as to rent to be paid by him or payment to him?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The property mentioned, which is valued at $67,000, was conveyed to the Crown by William Henry Plummer on the 8th July, 1888, the consideration being $1, and that the Crown should extend the wharf built thereon, and appoint the said W. H. Plummer wharfinger at a fixed salary, to be paid out of the tolls collected on said wharf. The total cost of the wharf, extension and repairs up to date is $13,605.36. There was no agreement.

BAR AT THE MOUTH OF THE RIVER THAMES.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, Whether, in view of the great obstruction to navigation caused by the bar at the mouth of the River Thames, in the County of Essex, Ont., the Government propose to have the said bar removed during the present summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Last session Mr. Campbell moved for the papers, &c., in reference to the dredging off the mouth of the River Thames. Since then there has not been any further examination nor report. In the last report on this subject it is stated that to make a channel 5,000 feet in length of a permanent character through the "bar," with a width of 150 ft. and a depth of 12 ft., would require the following outlay:—Dredging, $10,000; protection works, $75,000; total, $85,000. During 1889 the sum of $4,179 was expended in dredging at this place. The Government has not decided whether they will have work done there this year.

BREMNER'S CLAIM FOR FURS.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has an application been made by or on behalf of Charles Bremner for payment for the furs taken by General Middleton? Is it the intention of the Government to pay for such furs?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. An application has been made on behalf of Charles Bremner, but it only came to the Privy Council at the close of last week, and it is too soon for me to state what the intention of the Government is.

SALMON NET FISHING ON THE RESTIGOUCHE.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government that in the event of any of the present lessees of salmon net fishing rights in tidal waters on the Restigouche River, in the County of Bonaventure, dying, that their heirs will be deprived of a continuance of such fishing rights? If so, why?

Mr. TUPPER. There are no lessees of salmon net fishing rights on the Restigouche River, but there are licenses which are only enforced from year to year. The license is granted only for the year's fishing, so that no rights are involved, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to answer the other part of the question.

IMMIGRATION TO THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked, What reply has been sent to the memorials of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories on the subject of immigration? If the memorials have been rejected, on what grounds?

Mr. HAGGART. The reply given to the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories, on the subject mentioned in the hon. gentleman's question, was to the effect that it would be inadvisable to ask Parliament for a vote for immigration expenditure for any part of the Dominion apart from the ordinary votes for immigration.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the following article on the reform of the North-West Mounted Police which appeared in the public press:—

"1. Pension for permanent disablement, irrespective of number of years' service.

"At present a man has to complete fifteen years' service before he is entitled to a pension by reason of being incapacitated.

"2. Promotion to commissioned ranks to be through the force by competitive examination; eligibility to be determined by character and service. A proportion of officers being appointed from the Royal Military College, Kingston.

"By this means, every man on joining would have the possibility of a commission before him as an incentive, irrespective of social or political influence. Police duties are peculiar and can only be acquired by practical experience, embracing, in addition to a knowledge of drill and purely military matters, a knowledge of prairie work and a thorough acquaintance with the duties of a peace officer.

"3. Rigid enquiry into the character of applicants for enlistment, and the maintenance of the age clause. As enlistment is now carried out, almost anyone who is physically fit can gain admittance into the North-West Mounted Police; the consequence is that all sorts and conditions of men flock into the force, with a most deteriorating effect. The constant cropping up of serious crimes brings discredit on a splendid corps and causes the better portions of its members to blush for their associations, and prevents men of good character from enlisting from fear of having to sleep, eat and associate with the class that is now being recruited into the force. No corps in the world is more dependent on the intelligence of its members, who may at any time be called on to perform duties requiring judgment and reasoning powers of somewhat higher order than will suffice for the ordinary soldier. The men have to be self-reliant, and very young men are not desirable material. Twenty-two should be the minimum of enlistment.

"4. Shorter term of service should entitle both officers and men to pensions.

"The maximum term of service at present in the force is such that no man who has endured the exposure, privations and arduous duties of twenty-five years' service can be other than broken down and decrepit. Nor can any officer of thirty-five years' service expect to be capable of enduring the exposure and fatigue of a campaign with the younger men of his command. The Mounted Police is practically on service at all times, and the physical effects are more telling on its members than on men working in other departments of the Government. The maximum term of service should be twenty years in the ranks and twenty-five for a commissioned officer.

"5. A sliding scale of pay to be applied to officers. In the case of young inspectors coming in at, say, $600, an increase of $50 a year up to $1,000, and in the case of inspectors coming in at $1,000, after five years, an increase of $50 a year up to $1,200; for superintendents up to $1,000, and to assistant commissioners, after five years, $50 a year up to $1,800, and the commissioner needs no increase. If anything he is overpaid.

"The justice of this is obvious. At present a newly joined inspector is on the same footing as one who has seen many years' service. Officers should be credited with their back service and receive pay from the date of passing of the new Act in proportion as if the scale had been in force from the date of their appointment.

"6. Previous service in the force to count towards a pension after a man is promoted from the rank to a commission.

"At the present a man promoted to a commission loses the benefit of all his previous service, and starts from the date of his commission as if he had never served a day in the force, with 35 years before him before he can hope for superannuation. Under the present circumstances, a man of 10 or 12 years' service would be foolish to take a commission and relinquish all previous service.

"7. Police to be placed on an equal footing with other troops in respect to the North-West Rebellion medal, whether under fire or not.

"The amount of service was as great, if not considerably greater on the part of the police. Why should the recognition be less?

"8. That officers, non-commissioned officers and men should not be transferred from one division to another, except in exceptional cases.

"After an officer has become proficient in his duties at headquarters, he should be permanently posted to some division, and not be liable to be transferred at any moment, without exceptionally strong reasons. The first duty of an officer is to make himself acquainted with the character and dispositions of all the men in his division, and under his command, and by association be able to take a personal interest in their hopes and troubles, and thus cement the strong respect and regard which should always exist between the men and their officers. He should know the capabilities of each horse, his disposition and peculiarities. To do his duty effectively, he must be reasonably well-known to the inhabitants, and thoroughly posted by personal experience in the topography of the district in which he is placed. As an officer, a fortiori with one of subordinate rank. To transfer an officer without any apparent reason, points to the conclusion that he is too intimate with the inhabitants to do his duty impartially. The expense incurred by a married member of the force, in moving from one post to another, is ruinous, and must keep him in straightened circumstances, if not in actual debt. The home comforts that he has gathered around him must be reconstructed, and new friendships and associations formed. Every officer should remain with his division, unless special circumstances necessitate a change, either for personal considerations for the officer thus moved, or for strong advantage to the public service."

Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session on the lines set out in this article?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The attention of the Government has not been previously called to the newspaper article referred to, but several of the subjects mentioned therein were under the consideration of the late Sir John Macdonald and were noted by him for future action. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill respecting the North-West Mounted Police during the present session.

BELLE CREEK BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. WELSH asked, Has the Government taken the Belle Creek breakwater, Prince Edward Island, as a Government work? And if so, how much money (if any) has been expended thereon by the Government? Has any contract been entered into for the rebuilding or repairing of the breakwater? If so, what is the amount of the contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not taken the Belle Creek breakwater as a Government work. No expenditure has been made thereon, nor contract entered into for rebuilding or repairing the structure.

RED POINT PIER, P.E.I.

Mr. WELSH asked, When did the Government take over from the Local Government of Prince Edward Island, Red Point Pier, P.E.I., as a Government work? How much money has been expended on said pier since it was taken over? Was this pier included in those recommended to be taken by the Government engineer? If not, for what reason was it taken over from the Local Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not taken over Red Point Pier from the Local Government. The sum of $799.97 was expended during 1885 and 1887 on repairs. It is not recommended to be taken over.

WOOD ISLANDS BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to allow the breakwater at the Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island, to remain as it is, without repairs or dredging, or will there be placed in the Supplementary Estimates an appropriation sufficient to save it from decay and destruction, and to carry out the recommendation of the Government engineer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The report from the resident engineer has not yet been received, but it is expected very soon.

WALKERTON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TRUAX asked, Have the Government appointed a caretaker for the Walkerton Public Buildings? If so, what is his name, where did he reside at the time of his appointment, and what was his occupation? When was he appointed, and what salary is he to receive?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not appointed a caretaker there.

LOCATION TICKETS ON COCKBURN ISLAND.

Mr. LISTER asked, Was Peter McLellan entitled to lot 16 in 4th concession, Cockburn Island, under location ticket either granted or assigned to him? Has the ticket been cancelled? If so, when, and for what reason? Has any person since such cancellation acquired any right or interest in the lot from the Government? If so, the name and address of such person?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Lot 16, concession 4, Cockburn Island, was assigned to Peter McLellan by Thomas Smith, the original purchaser. The sale of the lot was cancelled on the 3rd July, 1888, under section 46 of the Indian Act, for imposition. No return has as yet been made to the department by the local agent of the re-sale of this lot.

Mr. LISTER asked, Was John Alexander Mc Lellan entitled to lot 15 in 5th concession of Cockburn Island, under location ticket either granted or assigned to him? Has the ticket been cancelled? If so, when, and for what reason? Has any person since such cancellation acquired any right or interest in the lot from the Government? If so, the name and address of such person?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Lot 15, concession 5, Cockburn Island, was sold to John Alexander McLellan. The sale of this lot was cancelled on the 3rd of July, 1888, under section 46 of the Indian Act, for non-fulfilment of the conditions of sale. No return has, as yet, been made to the department by the local agent of the re-sale of this lot.

NAPANEE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ALLISON asked, Who was the contractor for the Napanee Public Buildings? Who tendered for the work? What was the amount of each tender? Was the lowest accepted, and what was the amount of it? Have the buildings been fully paid for, and what has been the total cost to date?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contractor for the Napanee Public Buildings was George Newlands. The tenderers for the work were J. J. Lyons, Ottawa; George Newlands, Kingston; G. A. Cliff, Napanee; George Wilson, Gananoque; J. Forin, Belleville; T. Doddridge, Brockville; and A. Cameron, Portsmouth. The amount of the tenders was as follows:—J. J. Lyons, $27,087; George Newlands, $25,350; George Wilson, $26,000; J. Forin, $26,000; T. Doddridge, $27,500; A. Cameron, $32,624. The lowest tender was accepted, the amount being $25,350. The buildings have been fully paid for. The total cost to date is $48,378.80, including cost of site, building of post office box fronts, heating, tower clock and furniture.

INDIAN AFFAIRS IN NORTH BRUCE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Has the following list of charges been submitted to the Government regarding Indian affairs in North Bruce? If so, what action has been taken?

1. Selling horses, buggies, hay and provisions.
2. By giving orders to merchants and collecting the same.
3. By accepting orders from merchants purported to be made by the Indians, but made by merchants themselves.
4. By stopping the pay from Indians at pay-table, instead of giving each Indian his money in full.
5. By allowing a merchant to sit at pay-table and collect his money, when others had to stop outside.
6. An Indian went to agent's house for his pay, which the agent refused him unless a certain merchant, friend of agent's, was there to collect his money.
7. An order was passed in Council in the spring of 1890, signed by chiefs, councillors and agent, for D. Robertson to supply the Indians with seed grain, the said Robertson to be paid in July quarter and October, 1890, for which he supplied them, and there is quite a balance to be paid him yet. The reason he is not paid is the agent accepting orders from friends of his, and when the Indian leaves the pay-table, he has nothing left to pay balance on his seed.
8. One Jebott called on Indian Agent Allen this spring, offering to supply the Indians with seed potatoes at 65 cents per bushel, which offer he refused, the same to be paid July and October quarter; but one Gordon, a friend of Agent Allen's, goes to Jebott and buys all the potatoes at 60 cents per bushel, and sells the same potatoes to the Indians at 75 cents per bushel, getting an order from said Indians to Agent Allen, who collects same orders at pay-table. If Agent Allen was looking after Indians' interests, he could have saved the Indians 15 cents per bushel.

9. In April quarter, 1891, the agent accepted so many orders and collected them at the pay-table; that in most of cases the Indians had not a cent left to buy any seed with, and the said Agent Allen did not exert himself, or try to get seed for the Indians, which he should have done.

10. By accepting orders from merchants, friends of his, the said orders made for full amount of annuity coming to them, the said merchants charging what prices they think fit, and said Agent Allen collects the said orders at pay-table, instead of giving each one his money in full, as the Government intended he should, and let the Indians pay whom they pleased, as should be the case. Under the present system of Agent Allen, the Indians are deceived, as the ones that sign the orders, or otherwise have them signed, do not know that they have signed all, or nearly all but a few cents of what is coming to them—in some cases more than what is coming—and the consequence is, the said Indians who sign, or get signed for them, contract accounts in other places, and when pay-day comes, the answer you get is: We have none left; Allen took it all for some merchant friends of his.

11. That the said Agent Allen is not a fit and proper person for Indian agent, as he has no education, and can scarcely write his own name.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In regard to questions 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, no charges, such as described under these heads, have been made to the department. The charges made in questions 2, 3, 4, 5, are similar to those made in the letter referred to in the previous question of the hon. member, and have been acted on, as I previously informed the hon. member. No other communication has been received.

METAL PILLARS FOR PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What is the cost of the metal pillars under the hand (stone) railing of the stairs to the entrance of the House of Commons, Senate, and other public buildings in Ottawa, including putting them in place, and why were the stone ones removed and metal put in? Was the contract let by tender; if so, did the lowest tenderer get the work? Who did the work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The cost of the bronze pillars underneath the hand (stone) railing of the entrance of the House of Commons and Senate, is as follows:—82 bronze pillars, $1,804; fitting up, iron ties, masonry, stonecutting, $894.70; total, $2,698.70. The stone pillars, which were of Ohio (Devonian) standstone, were, owing to their exceptional exposure to moisture, heat and frost, completely destroyed by weathering, and the railing had to be temporarily supported. Bronze was preferred, being much more durable and less costly than granite. The tenders were as follows:—Messrs. Garth & Co., bronze, at $22 each, $1,804; Messrs. R. Forsythe & Co., red granite, at $32.50 each, $2,665; Canadian Granite Co., red granite, at $35 each, $2,738. The lowest tenderer was given the work.

W. E. JONES, CENSUS COMMISSIONER.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1st. Is Mr. W. E. Jones, of Richmond, Province of Quebec, Census Commissioner, the same Mr. W. E. Jones who is the editor of the Richmond Guardian?

2nd. Did the said Mr. W. E. Jones obtain three weeks' leave of absence from the 14th of February last to the 5th of March last?

3rd. Did the said Mr. W. E. Jones receive $10 per day and expenses as Census Commissioner during the aforesaid period from the 14th of February last to the 5th of March last?

4th. Is the Government aware that the said Mr. W. E. Jones employed the aforesaid period of time in canvassing, holding meetings, and making speeches in favour of the Conservative Administration?

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may state that Mr. Jones was appointed Census Commissioner; he did not obtain three weeks leave of absence from 14th February last to the 5th of March last; he did not receive $10 a day and expenses as Census Commissioner during that period; and the Government are not aware that he employed the aforesaid period of time in the manner mentioned by the question.

EUGÈNE SOUCY OF TROIS PISTOLES.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. CHOQUETTE) asked, Is Eugène Soucy, of Trois Pistoles, employed in any capacity on the Intercolonial Railway, and if so, what does he do? Was the said Soucy at one time employed as conductor on the said railway, and if so, why is he no longer so employed?

Mr. BOWELL. This gentleman was employed as a conductor, and was dismissed in 1888 for being under the influence of liquor when on duty.

TRAIN SERVICE IN P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Department of Railways received a petition from the merchants, traders, and other inhabitants of Tignish and vicinity, in Prince County, P.E.I., praying that an express train leave Tignish in the morning so as to connect at Summerside, P.E.I., with the steamer plying between Summerside and Pointe du Chêne, New Brunswick? If so, what action, if any, has been taken with respect to said petition?

Mr. BOWELL. Such a petition was received from Mr. Richard Hunt, and the department informed Mr. Hunt, on the 14th April, 1891, that the request would not be granted.

BREAKWATER IN PRINCE COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, When the contract of the breakwater or pier at Brae, in Prince County, P.E.I., is to be completed? Has any inspector been appointed to look after said work? If so, what is his name? When was he appointed, and what is to be paid for his services as inspector?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract is to be completed on the 16th January, 1892. An inspector has not been appointed, nor will there be one appointed until the services of such an officer are required.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. GERMAN asked, What, if any, is the rate at present allowed postmasters for salary on the revenues collected at the various post offices?

Mr. HAGGART. The salaries of postmasters of staff offices are regulated by the Civil Service Act. Other postmasters are allowed for salary at the rate of 40 per cent. on the first $800 of actual postal revenue collected at their offices, and 25 per cent. on the revenue in excess of $800. A rent allowance is also granted in certain cases according to the following scale:—$40 when revenue reaches $800; $20 for each additional $400 up to $2,000, and $20 for each $500 thereafter.

STEAM FANS ON CATTLE VESSELS.

Mr. SPROULE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to act on the suggestion of M. C. Baker, V.S., their agent at Montreal, and order the use of steam fans on all vessels carrying cattle during the season, during which distillery-fed animals are being shipped?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government intend to insist that all vessels carrying cattle during the season shall have steam fans upon such vessels.

ADJOURNMENT FOR HOLIDAYS.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to enquire from the Government whether they have considered the fact that there are two legal holidays next week, and have they any suggestions to offer the House in that respect?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government have considered the fact that there are two holidays next week, and we believe that if we took Saturday of next week, thus having Tuesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, then the two holidays would not deprive Parliament of more than one day's work. Therefore, when the House adjourns on Friday, we shall ask the House to adjourn until Tuesday at three o'clock, and then sit during the remainder of the week except on Wednesday, which is Dominion Day.

Mr. ROOME. As I am living at a distance from the Capital, it would be little use going home unless the recess were extended till Thursday. I, therefore, suggest that the House should adjourn until Thursday at three o'clock, and sit on Saturday.

Mr. IVES. This is a question worthy of consideration. If the Government insist on sitting on Tuesday, I think it is doubtful that there will be a quorum at the committees and probably not a quorum in the House, but members on both sides, at very great inconvenience, will have to attend on Tuesday and then lie over here or return home for Wednesday and then come back on Thursday. Many of us have engagements on Dominion Day, which will take us home, and, therefore, it will be very inconvenient to come back on Tuesday.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman has said. I suggest to the Government, whether it would not be better to adopt the precedent given us two or three years ago, and sit on Dominion Day. We have reached that period of the year when it becomes a very serious matter for business men to be away from their engagements and business, and it is desirable to push business with all convenient and reasonable speed. I understand it is not possible to sit on Monday, on account of the character of the day, and it is not impossible, according to precedent, to sit on Wednesday; so the adjournment might simply be over Monday, and the House might sit on Tuesday and Wednesday, and also on the following Saturday, which would make up for Monday, and we would thus be afforded a slight hope, although we do not see the end of the session yet, of arriving at a reasonably early prorogation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I certainly think that would be the better plan to adopt. Although many hon. members may have engagements for 1st July, there would be a sufficient number of members present to attend the business of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Every consideration should be paid to hon. members coming from the western and eastern provinces, who have not been home since the session began. It is the duty of members living within a convenient distance of the Capital, who can run home on Saturday and return on Monday, to come here and sit on Tuesday and Wednesday, if necessary, because if we adjourn from Friday until Tuesday and then again until Thursday, there will be very little business done next week. If we commence on Tuesday and take Saturday instead of Monday, and the general understanding is that we cannot sit on Monday, but as we have previously sat on Dominion Day, much work may be done, and I do not understand that members can spend their time to greater advantage than by sitting in the Legislative Halls and doing the work of the Dominion on Dominion Day. I think respect should be shown to the wishes of the hon. members from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and British Columbia.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I agree with the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and also with the remarks of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). So far as I have been able to ascertain the wishes of members from the Maritime Provinces, they would all prefer that the House should sit on Wednesday next. There never has been a session in which there was greater reason why this should be done, as we all know the circumstances under which the House is now meeting and the sad occurrence which took place during the session, the like of which we hope will not again happen.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I am very much in favour of the recent proposition. If we are not going to sit on Dominion Day, I think it would be better to adjourn until Thursday. If the House is going to sit on Dominion Day, then we should adjourn until Tuesday at three o'clock.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is desirable that the question should be settled now. There has been a very clear expression of opinion by a majority of the House in favour of adjourning until Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. LAURIER. It is evident that the majority of the members of the House favour sitting on Wednesday, Dominion Day, and if we are to sit on that day, the House had better adjourn until Tuesday. If, however, it is the wish of the House not to sit on that day, then an adjournment had better be taken until Thursday next.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course the Government wish to obtain the feelings of the House, because we are only its Executive Committee. From the feeling expressed it appears that hon. members wish to sit on Wednesday. In that case we would lose no time next week, because we would sit on Saturday as well, and, therefore, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has said, we would be pushing forward the business of the session as rapidly as possible.

Mr. MARA. We have not yet heard whether it has been decided to meet on Tuesday or Thursday. I understand the leader of the Government to state that the House will not meet until Thursday. If so, I should like the question put to a vote, because a large majority of the members are in favour of sitting on Tuesday, and of course on Wednesday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman may not have understood what I said. From the feelings expressed it appears that the House should, when it adjourns on Friday, stand adjourned until Tuesday at three o'clock, and then sit all next week.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND TUNNEL.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for :

All correspondence. telegrams, letters, reports, estimates and other documents relating to the surveys for, and construction and cost of, a submarine tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

He said : I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to make a few observations on the substance of the motion and the reasons why I move for those papers. It will be in the recollection of the House that when Prince Edward Island joined the Confederation, it did so upon certain terms which were agreed upon between that province and the rest of the Dominion, and the only one of these terms about which I am at present concerned is that which provided for an efficient steam service for the conveyance of passengers and mails between the Island and the mainland, winter and summer ; that is, the placing of the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion. The paragraph in the terms of the Union which relates to this is very comprehensive and apparently very clear, and it stated that we were to have continuous steam service between the Island and the mainland all the year round. If that compact were literally construed it would be necessary for the Government to construct a tunnel, because that is the only means by which continuous communication could be maintained ; but it is said, and said with some truth, that the compact must be construed with reference to the state of facts which were in existence at the time and which might fairly be in the minds of those who entered into the contract, and that at that time nothing was said about the tunnel. I do not say that this is not true, but there is no doubt about the fact that Prince Edward Island, before she entered into union with the Dominion of Canada, was one of the most prosperous little provinces in North America, and the people were progressing from year to year and were satisfied with their then condition and the maintenance of their independence. I have no hesitation in saying that I belonged to the party for many years known as the anti-Confederate party. I belonged to it because I believed we could live very much more cheaply, and by the maintenance of a system of free trade we could be much more prosperous than we could be if we entered into union with the Dominion, where the thin edge of protection had already been inserted, and which had previously to that entered upon a career of extravagance, the results of which were easily discernible by all thinking men. However, the Island, for good or for evil, entered into an enormous contract for the construction of 210 miles of railway, the result of which was to throw upon that province a heavy debt, the payment of the interest on which was found to be enormous, and the people, listening to the voice of the syren at the time they were called upon to pay this interest, agreed to enter into a union with Canada. I may say that I have not heard at any time since then of the existence of a repeal party in Prince Edward Island or of any desire to go back to our previous condition. We always have accepted the situation loyally ; we accept, and always have accepted the terms upon which the union was made, and we desire that these terms should be carried out in a fair and reasonable spirit. I have not yet despaired myself that the terms will be carried out by the Parliament of Canada and by the Government of Canada, but it has been plain to my mind for many years that it is almost impossible to make the Parliament of Canada understand the real position of matters. The impression prevails to-day, and has prevailed for many years that Prince Edward Island has been in some sense or way a favoured Island in regard to its treatment by the Government of Canada. I wish that it were so ; but the facts are directly to the contrary. I hear from time to time statements made in the public press that Prince Edward Island has, relatively to its extent, more railway mileage than any province in the Dominion. We heard a short time ago that the post office service on the Island does not pay, and we have heard it pointed out from the Trade and Navigation Returns that the amount of Customs duty which the Island pays is ridiculously small. People have formed the impression that the Island is a non-paying member of the community and that it is rather a drag than otherwise on the Dominion generally, and if the impression were to be formed only on the information which appears in the blue-books, I cannot say that it is a wrong one. However, I protest against the unfairness of this impression. We had the Island held up to ridicule the other day as the most ignorant province of the Dominion, in the sense that it posted and received fewer letters per capita than any other province, and that the post office service was carried on at a greater loss than anywhere else. These statements are totally inaccurate. I turn to the statistical Year Book of the Dominion for 1889, and I find that the total expenditure of the Post Office Department exceeds the revenue by $717,000, and while the expenditure of the Province of Prince Edward Island for the post office service in the year 1890 is largely in excess of the revenue, yet every other province in the Dominion is in exactly the same position. It is not correct to say that the expenditure per head is larger in Prince Edward Island than anywhere else in the Dominion, for I find that the post office expenditure in Manitoba, Keewatin, and the North-West Territories——

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is discussing the motion with reference to the Submarine Tunnel?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was prefacing my remarks in reference to the tunnel by giving certain facts concerning Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see how that comes under the tunnel question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am going to show the hon. gentleman that this has an important bearing on the matter. If the Province of Prince Edward Island is highly unproductive and unfertile it would be madness on the part of the Dominion to sanction the expenditure of any money at all, but, on the contrary, if that Island is a progressive, rich and prosperous country, or a country which under normal conditions ought to be prosperous, then I say the matter presents a different aspect. I want to show that, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, it is not behind any other province of the Dominion in prosperity and progress, and I wish to correct the impression that has gone abroad in the public press—it is not open for me to refer to a previous debate, but I can refer to matters which appear in the public press—and I say that the statement made there, gathered from remarks made in this House, that the receipts and expenditures in the post office service in Prince Edward Island are worse than in any other part of the Dominion, is entirely incorrect. I say that we come third or fourth in the Dominion instead of last; after Ontario, we follow closely upon Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I will not waste the time of the House on that. Then, I referred just now to the statistical table which appeared from year to year in the blue books of this Dominion, showing that the Province of Prince Edward Island paid into the Dominion nearly $160,000 in the shape of Customs duties. Sir, that statement was so flagrantly incorrect and misleading, not only with reference to Prince Edward Island, but with reference to some of the other provinces, that it had to be withdrawn. Now I propose to show how very much that statement is at variance with the facts. The total imports of the Dominion in 1890 were $112,765,854, or equal to $21.48 per head of the population, on which a duty of $4.60 per head was paid. Estimating the population of Prince Edward Island at 125,000, that would give us $575,000 as paid into the revenue by that province instead of $160,000 with which we were credited in the Trade and Navigation Returns. Now, is there anybody who doubts, knowing the character of the population of Prince Edward Island, that they pay an average duty per head equal to the average of the whole Dominion? I do not think anybody can doubt that; but if proof is required, we have one test which, I think, will be accepted by hon. gentlemen as a fairly good one. That is: Before you joined the Dominion at all, when you had your own Customs-houses and kept account of the total duties paid, how did you stand? Well, Sir, I find that in 1872, the last year before we entered Confederation, the imports of Prince Edward Island from all countries, including Canada, which was then, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, a foreign country, amounted to $2,569,878. At the average importation of $21.48 per head of the Dominion, with our population of 125,000, we would have imported $2,685,000. These figures show that before Confederation Prince Edward Island imported just about the average per head of the Dominion; and if you apply the tariff of the Dominion to our actual importation of $2,569,879 before Confederation, you will find that we pay $569,000 in duty, just what I say we do pay—about $600,000 in round numbers—instead of the paltry $160,000 with which we are credited by the blue-books. Now, the total exports from Prince Edward Island in 1872, before we entered Confederation, amounted to $1,894,174, while the blue-book for 1889 credited us with only $887,000 of exports, or a million less than we exported twenty years ago. It is not necessary for me to call the attention of those hon. gentlemen who know the fertility of the soil of Prince Edward Island and the salubrity of its climate, to these figures; because they know that in a country such as that Island, where almost every acre is settled and under cultivation, and where there are no paupers, all the people belong to the consuming class. But for those who do not know this, it is necessary for me to state a few facts. The area of Prince Edward Island amounts to 1,250,000 acres, one-half of which is under actual cultivation. I find by the census that ten years ago Prince Edward Island had a population of 51 to the square mile, while the population of the other provinces of the Dominion to the square mile was only 4·72. I find by the same census that Prince Edward Island owned 55 head of live stock for every 100 acres of improved land, while the other provinces owned only 38 to the acre. It raised 109 bushels of field products to the acre of improved land, while the other provinces raised only 61 bushels. All of which goes to show that, so far from being inferior in productive power and in the other qualities which go to make a province valuable to the Dominion, the Province of Prince Edward Island stands superior to the general average of the rest of the Dominion. I do not mean to say that there may not be parts of the Dominion which are richer in many ways than Prince Edward Island is. I merely say that, taking it as a whole—its soil, its climate, and the condition of its people—the distribution of wealth is as equal there as in other parts of the Dominion; and although we have none of the very wealthy men, such as are to be found in other parts of the Dominion, the general average of wealth among the people is, I think, up to the general average of the Dominion of Canada everywhere.

Mr. SPROULE. Not much poverty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Of actual poverty I may say there is none, and it would be impossible for an honest man with such a climate and soil to be an absolute pauper. Surrounded as that Island is with the vast wealth which is in the sea flowing about its shores, with a good soil, an equable climate, and reasonable means of bringing the produce to market, there is no reason why there should be any poverty there at all; and if there is poverty or depression or want, it is owing to an abnormal condition of affairs, not to the general condition. I ask the pardon of the House for quoting these figures, but I felt that it was necessary to do so to show the actual state of the facts. Then, it has been stated against Prince Edward Island that the Dominion of Canada has built for us a railway 210 miles in length, and granted us other large favours. In regard to that, I repeat now the statement which I have made every year since I have had the honour of a seat in this House —that Canada did not build that railway in Prince Edward Island; that, in the adjustment between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, the cost of that road was charged to Prince Edward Island. The Dominion Government has built a railway for the adjoining Island of Cape Breton at a cost of $3,000,000, which is chargeable to and paid out of the Dominion exchequer, but the $3,250,000 which the Prince Edward Island Railway cost was charged, every dollar of it, to Prince Edward Island, in the settlement of accounts between the Dominion and the Island.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Is not the interest on the cost of the Prince Edward Island Railway also chargeable to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Dominion assumed the bonds.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Answer yes or no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say that if the bonds were assumed by the Dominion of Canada and charged to the Island, the party who assumed the bonds are supposed to pay the interest. That is right enough.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the principal sum of $3,250,000, which constituted the cost of the road, was charged to the Island in the Dominion accounts between the Dominion and the Island, and if it had not been so charged we would have received the interest upon that $3,250,000 every year since we entered the confederacy, and we have lost that interest.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). If the Dominion of Canada would only give to Cape Breton $50 per head on the population, which is ninety thousand, we also could build our own road on condition that the Dominion would pay the interest.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You got that and more when Nova Scotia came in.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman, I am sorry to say, has a very incorrect appreciation of what Cape Breton has received, but perhaps I will enlighten him before I sit down.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the hon. gentleman will see that Cape Breton received $50 per head and a great deal more. I would ask the attention of the House for a moment to the terms of the Union, which provide for continuous communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Reasonable efforts were made in that behalf, in my humble opinion, although my opinion is not shared by the majority of the people of the Island, by the Mackenzie Government and the Government which came in afterwards. A great experiment was tried by the Mackenzie Government when, at heavy cost, they contracted for the Northern Light. That boat was more abused and less costly than any experiment the Government had made. She was the pioneer in the service, and did a most admirable work; and although she did not carry out the terms of the Union, it was because no boat could in the winter months carry out that contract. After the Northern Light had been on the service many years and had performed her work, she was followed by the Stanley, an excellent boat, built with the improvements the department, after experience, thought necessary. She is an admirable boat, and in mild winters, when the ice is not very thick, I believe the Stanley will carry out that service admirably well; but I am bound to say that in winters of heavy frost, when the ice is heavy, neither the Stanley nor any other boat that can be built—but on that point I defer to the opinion of Mr. Welsh—ever will be able to keep up communication for six or eight weeks in the winter. I am not complaining at all of the Government in that respect, but a few years ago we had a project started by the Hon. Senator Howlan for the construction of a subway between the Island and the mainland, which would enable this Dominion to implement its contract with the Island. Well, I never was in favour of that scheme. I made enquiries among scientific men, engineers, with whom I came in contact, and I found it was an experiment of a kind to which I did not feel justified, for one, in asking this Government to commit itself. That experiment consisted in laying an iron tunnel along the bottom of the Straits of Northumberland, some places 90 feet deep, and as no such experiment had ever been tried before, and as the scientific objections to it were very great, I never, for one, either threw cold water upon it or said anything to promote it. Under the sense of my responsibility to my constituents, as their representative, and also as a member of this House, I felt that I could not give this experiment my endorsation. However, the hon. gentleman obtained a charter in this House. He had the right to proceed with that charter, and I believe he entertained the sincere conviction that he could carry it out, but I believe that he came to the conclusion, after the expenditure of a good deal of time and money, that the subway scheme was not possible, and he dropped it. At that time it was thought that the construction of a tunnel was out of the question altogether, and judging from the cost of the construction of tunnels in other parts of the world that opinion was then well founded. But a few years ago, the cost of the construction of tunnels has, by the discovery of new machinery, by the invention of the beach shield and other machinery, been enormously decreased. Last year the question of the construction of this tunnel was discussed in the other chamber at some length, and the leader of the Senate, who replied to the speech made by Senator Howlan, advocating the construction of a tunnel, quoted the cost of the construction of tunnels in different parts of the world, and he showed that if the cost of the construction of this proposed tunnel approximated the average cost of the construction of tunnels in other parts of the world it would be out of the question for this Dominion to undertake that expenditure. He said:

"The Government satisfied themselves that the project of making a tunnel across the Straits of Northumberland or a subway—two very different things, by the way—was really in one sense impracticable—that is to say, it would cost so much as not to justify the expenditure of the sum required for the service which it was intended to perform."

Then he went on to show he had taken the trouble to glance at the subject and to find the cost of the construction of tunnels in different parts of the world, the Urlberg Tunnel, the St. Gothard, the Mont Cenis, the Severn and other tunnels, and he gave the figures, which are not interesting or necessary for the purpose of my argument or as regards the feasibility of the project. I acknowledge that the leader of the Government in the Senate was quite justified in making the statement he did, and that the figures he gave, $20,000,000 to $26,000,000, were simply appalling; and the Government, forming their judgment, to some extent, upon these data, came to the conclusion that they could not construct the tunnel. Then followed the discovery of the cheaper methods of tunnelling. A revolution, I may say, followed the discovery of tunnelling with the beach shield, and it was found that tunnelling, which at one time was impracticable, owing to its cost, was now brought down to very reasonable figures. So the question we have to meet to-day is what is the probable cost of constructing a tunnel under the new condition of affairs and with the improved machinery. Before I come to that, let me pursue for a moment further the line of argument I was adopting a little while ago, in reply to the interruption of the hon. gentleman for Cape Breton. When Prince Edward Island entered Confederation the terms were arranged on the basis of an additional expenditure on the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway of $58,000,000, or about that. It was understood that would be required, and Prince Edward Island got the benefit of that basis being adopted in the adjustment of accounts which then took place. But, as a matter of fact, instead of spending that amount of $58,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the canals, we have spent $148,000,000, or more than $90,000,000 more than was arranged for in the adjustment of accounts between the Island and the Dominion. The Government recognized the injustice the Island was suffering from, to some extent, in 1887, when we had a Conservative Local Government in power, which had been floundering in debt year after year, because it had not the pluck to put on a little direct taxation. That Government repealed an Act which your humble servant put on the Statute-book when he had something to say in the Government of that province, and they kept getting into debt, and then they came to the Government here and set forth these facts and the injustice which was being done to the Island, and they asked for an increased allowance, for better terms, and this Government gave them better terms. Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Minister of Finance, brought down a Bill to allow Prince Edward Island $20,000 a year, being the interest on half a million of capital. That should never have been accepted by the Government of Prince Edward Island. At the time that Bill came before the House, I pointed out that they were giving just half what we were entitled to; that, instead of giving us the interest on the money which had been expended beyond what was calculated, they only gave us half the interest, and I told the hon. gentleman that the time could not be far distant when the Island would be found knocking at the doors of the Administration, and asking, not that favours be given, but that common justice should be done, and that the amounts expended on the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the canals and public works in which the Island did not participate, beyond what was calculated at the time she entered into Confederation, should be taken into consideration again, and that the amount should be re-adjusted, not on the basis which was adopted in 1873 of what would probably be spent, but on the basis of what actually was spent, and I think hon. gentlemen will see that there is no injustice in that. The Island, in that respect, therefore, has not been fairly treated. There is another point to which I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen, by which the Island, from its very isolation, not through any determination, I hope, on the part of the House to make it suffer, still has suffered very largely. In 1882 this Parliament entered upon the principle of subsidizing local railways. I always thought that we were entering then upon a very dangerous experiment, one which would land us in boundless extravagance in the long run; I always thought that this system would be made a means of log-rolling between one part of the Dominion and another, that people would come here clamouring for these subsidies, and I saw, too, that the money would not be expended because the roads were in the interest of the country, but in order to bring support to the Government. The results have shown the truth of the predictions then made. I find that the total subsidies granted by the Dominion, according to the Railway Report for 1890, are $46,040,957 I find that the total subsidies paid up to the 30th September, 1890, amount to $37,196,930. If you deduct from this the subsidies paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway of $25,000,000, the Canada Central and the road from Ottawa to Montreal and Quebec, all of which are made part of the great trunk line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and amount in all to $28,919,250, you have paid to railways outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway trunk line the sum of $8,277,680. That is up to the 30th September last. In addition to that, there are now being earned, as appears by the report, of subsidies which we have already voted, an amount of $3,500,000, making a total of subsidies paid or about to be paid, outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway trunk line, of $11,777,680. Where were these subsidies paid? I find that, up to the 30th September, 1890, the subsidies paid were as follows:—Ontario, $2,735,095; Quebec, $3,194,511; Nova Scotia, $1,816,232; New Brunswick, $905,545; British Columbia, $750,000; making a total actually paid of $9,401,383. That amount, be it remembered, is not the amount we have paid for the construction of railways, but simply the amount we have paid in the way of subsidies towards the construction of railways built by private corporations. In addition to that, the Government undertook the construction of branch line of railways in different provinces. They built very largely in the Province of Nova Scotia, so much so that it has become a proverb in the Maritime Provinces that you cannot find any more land in Nova Scotia to build another railway on. For branches and extensions of the Intercolonial Railway, including the purchase of the Rivière du Loup branch, the Government expended in the Province of Quebec, up to June, 1889, $5,520,323; in New Brunswick, $3,371,855; and in Nova Scotia, $7,821,070; making a total of $16,713,248. In 1890, between June and September, we expended in Nova Scotia on the Cape Breton extension and the Oxford and New Glasgow branch, $1,000,000, making a total of $17,713,248. Add to that the cost of the railway from Ottawa to Montreal and Quebec, $2,394,000, and you find that, outside of the Intercolonial Railway proper, there has been an expenditure of $20,107,248 in the construction of branch lines of railway, in addition to the subsidies I have already mentioned. Well, Sir, how did we spend that? We spent $3,019,752 in building the Cape Breton road; $1,556,015 on the Oxford and New Glasgow Railway; $1,318,731 on the Eastern Extension, and $503,000 on the Pictou town branch and other roads, which it is neither profitable nor instructive to repeat, because they go to make up the total I have given. So to summarize the figures and put them in a nutshell, we have contributed in subsidies $12,687,437; and we have spent in building roads, outside of the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, $20,107,248, or altogether, $32,794,685. Well, we know the cost of the Intercolonial Railway is about $46,908,000. For the Canadian Pacific Railway we have voted $62,000,000, and we have spent $34,000,000 on canals. We have given a grant to the Short Line Railway to St. John of $186,000 yearly for twenty years, which is equivalent to a present payment of $2,687,393; and we have given to the Chignecto Marine Railway a yearly grant, the present value of which amounts to $2,343,000. So the total expenditure made with reference to railways and canals, including the Chignecto Marine Railway, is $180,733,311, of which expenditure the Province of Prince Edward Island does not share in the benefits to any appreciable extent. Hon. gentlemen understand that that is a very large sum of money, and it is an unfortunate thing that a province such as Prince Edward Island, lying as it does in a gulf, separated by water from the mainland, should not be in a position to participate in the benefits which must flow to the counties and to the provinces through which these railways and canals, costing 180 odd million dollars of money, are built and flow. Sir, I have already shown you that Prince Edward Island built at its own proper cost its own railway, and I have shown you the condition of matters with reference to the expenditure in other parts of the Dominion. Then, Sir, I will just recall shortly the terms under which we entered the Union. Before the last election delegates from Prince Edward Island visited Ottawa and interviewed the Government in connection with the construction of this subway, and a Minute of Council was passed, which was not very definite or very clear, and did not commit the Government, I frankly say, to the construction of the tunnel. But the leader of the Government, previously to the election, wrote a letter to Senator Howlan, who was chiefly engaged in promoting this tunnel, and who left the Senate at the instance, as I understand, of the leader of the Government, and came to Prince Edward Island and contested one of the districts there upon the ground that the Government were going to build this tunnel. He came to Prince Edward Island, and he made his canvass solely upon that point, and was beaten by my hon. friend who sits behind me. Senator Howlan held in his hands a letter from the late leader of the Government, Sir John A. Macdonald, written just previously to the election, and which reads as follows:—

"OTTAWA, February 6, 1891.

"MY DEAR HOWLAN,—In response to your pressing request with respect to the tunnel across the Straits, I desire to repeat that, under the present circumstances, the Cabinet are not in a position to deal with the question. If, as I believe, the country will continue to give us its confidence, the Ministry will, under my guidance, take the matter up without delay. I understand that Sir Douglas Fox is of opinion the scheme is a feasible one. The chief thing still unknown is the cost of construction. I fully appreciate the nature and extent of the obligation incurred by the Dominion to maintain continuous communication between the Island and the mainland. We have tried to carry this out by the Stanley, but of course she cannot fight against the elements. So if the cost comes within a reasonable amount, such as Parliament feels itself justified in incurring, I shall be prepared to submit the question for their favourable consideration.

"I am yours sincerely,
"JOHN A. MACDONALD."

Well, Sir, there was a written pledge under the hand and signature of the leader, which was read at every public meeting on the Island, pledging the Government to submit the matter to the favourable consideration of Parliament if Sir Douglas Fox's estimates showed the expenditure would come within a reasonable amount.

Mr. FOSTER. Pledged what?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Pledged Sir John A. Macdonald to submit the question to the favourable consideration of Parliament, provided Sir Douglas Fox's estimate showed that the expenditure would come within a reasonable amount.

Mr. FOSTER. Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will read the clause again:

"I fully appreciate the nature and the extent of the obligation incurred by the Dominion to maintain continuous communication between the Island and the mainland. We have tried to carry this out by the Stanley, but of course she cannot fight against the elements. So if the cost comes within a reasonable amount, such as Parliament feels itself justified in incurring, I shall be prepared to submit the question for their favourable consideration."

Of course, the hon. gentleman pledges himself there to submit it "to their favourable consideration;" they could not judge of it until he submitted it.

Mr. FOSTER. "If."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, I do not know what the hon. gentleman means. He would submit it for their favourable consideration if, in his judgment, the cost came within a reasonable amount, and Parliament, of course, was to judge whether his judgment was correct or not. Now, they promised that, and they promised more. On February the 28th, just at the critical time before the election, the High Commissioner was sent to visit Prince Edward Island. He came as far, I believe, as the town of Pictou.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He went towards it, at any rate. He sent a telegram, and the telegram was reputed to be dated from Pictou, stating that he could not reach the Island; that it was impossible for him to go, and that he had been recalled to Ontario. He was on his way to Pictou, at any rate; I do not know how near he reached it.

An hon. MEMBER. Truro.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Very well; if he had got on board the Stanley—it was the only time this winter, I believe, that she was out twelve days in the gulf—probably the electors of Quebec, Toronto and the rest of the Dominion would have lost the eloquence which he gave them. Well, he could not come himself, but he sent the following telegram to the gentleman who was opposing me in the election:—

"D. FERGUSON, Charlottetown.

"I regret deeply that it is impossible for me to go to the Island as the Stanley cannot cross, and I dare not attempt the Capes. I have satisfied myself that the tunnel can be made for six million dollars, and you may rely upon all the aid I can give to that important and necessary work.

"CHAS. TUPPER.

"AMHERST, Feb. 28, 1891."

Now, nothing could be plainer or more distinct than that. We have the fact that Sir Chas. Tupper was brought to this country at the direct request and invitation of the Government themselves, on a telegram from the leader, for the sole purpose of promoting the elections; and doing it in the way he thought was best, and acting in pursuance of his instructions, he telegraphs to the people of the Island that he had satisfied himself that the tunnel could be built for so many million dollars, and that the people of the Island "might rely upon all the aid he could give to that important and necessary work."

Mr. FOSTER. Tell us about the other telegram now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell the hon. gentleman about another telegram. So here we had the written letter, signed by the leader of the Government, and the absolute, unqualified pledge given by the High Commissioner. The electors were asked to pass upon it. The hon. gentleman asks me in regard to another telegram. I telegraphed the leader of the Opposition whether, if this tunnel could be built for a reasonable amount, the scheme would have his support. He telegraphed that if the Estimates, when produced, showed that the tunnel could be built for a reasonable and fair amount, the project would have his support. I am not concerned in bandying party recriminations; I am more concerned in coming down to practical work. I want to know whether the pledge given by the late leader of the Government, Sir John Macdonald, will be carried out; I want to know whether the absolute and unqualified pledge given by Sir Charles Tupper, his agent, and the agent of the Government, will be carried out; and I also want to know if this question is to be kicked about as a football between parties at all future elections? Since this matter was before the Senate last year, and since the Government of that day, believing the cost to be an appalling cost, refused to sanction it, we have had estimates made by Sir Douglas Fox, and they were brought down by the Minister of Finance in answer to a question by myself some weeks ago. It appears that the cost will be as follows:—For a tunnel of 11 ft., internal diameter, from shaft to shaft, including land tunnel and contingencies, $5,232,640; for a tunnel of 16 ft., internal diameter, from shaft to shaft, including land tunnel and contingencies, $9,596,093; for a tunnel of 18 ft., internal diameter, from shaft to shaft, including land tunnel and contingencies, $10,962,167. So far as I am concerned, I believe that nothing short of the largest tunnel will be of practical benefit to the people. Of course, my opinion may be wrong. I took occasion to consult with some engineers with respect to the smallest-sized tunnel through which the freight car of the Intercolonial Railway could pass. I take it that if a small tunnel could be built through which the mails could be carried in a toy car it would be of no benefit to the people of the Island. Unless you can give a tunnel through which freight cars can pass, carrying produce from the Island to our natural markets, the United States, I do not think a tunnel would be of very great value to our people, certainly not one tithe of the importance it otherwise would be. To give the House some idea as to how the people of Prince Edward Island are handicapped, I will give an example. I suppose it is generally conceded, in no part of the Dominion can root crops be grown as well and perfectly as in the Island, and I suppose that in no part of the Dominion can the potatoes begin to compare with those of the Island. Owing to our natural disadvantages and the fact that we are driven to export our potatoes during three or four weeks in the fall of the year, and thus overstock the market, we are obliged to accept only one-half what the farmers in the adjoining Province of Nova Scotia receive. I find that in 1881 there were grown on the Island 6,042,191 bushels of potatoes, the average price paid to the Island farmer being 22½ cents per bushel. That price will not pay for growing potatoes. At the same time farmers in the neighbouring Province of Nova Scotia were receiving an average price of 44 cents per bushel. Why was that? It was because the Island farmers had to ship all their potatoes during the short period between the time when the potatoes were dug from the ground and the close of navigation, while the farmers of King's, N.S., were able to ship their crop to the market of the United States according to the demand and receive the higher price of 44 cents a bushel. I speak within the hearing of my colleagues, who are more practical men in this matter than I am, and I say that if the farmers in Prince Edward Island could by the construction of a tunnel or otherwise be placed within access of the markets where they could obtain 44 cents a bushel, instead of raising six million bushels they would raise twelve to fifteen million bushels. I have talked to hundreds of farmers on the Island on this subject, and there is but one answer to the question on this point. There is hardly any object, nothing but necessity drives our farmers to sow, dig, cultivate and export potatoes for a price of 22 cents a bushel, and frequently less. They would not do it if they could grow anything else. If this communication can be had, provided by the words of the terms of the Union, if the Dominion can furnish us with continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of Canada, you will give us prosperity beyond anything that prevailed in that part of the Dominion before. We know we have a market to some extent in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but it is nothing to speak of; our great market, and the market to which the largest portion of our potatoes goes, is the United States. A few years ago we began, not to export potatoes as a raw product, but to manufacture them into farina starch, and it was discovered by the Americans that the Island could supply the market cheaper than themselves, and thus we could control the market without difficulty. But, unfortunately, protective counsels prevailed, and the Americans imposed a duty of $40 a ton on farina starch. If we had access to the American market with that duty removed there is no limit to be placed upon the successful growth and production of that remarkable esculent in the Island. The soil is eminently suitable, the conditions of climate are favourable, and that trade alone and the business which would flow from the growth of the potato would make the Islanders a prosperous people. It is said that the estimated cost of the tunnel is very large. I admit that it is very large, indeed, and very careful consideration and very strong arguments are required before any hon. gentleman can ask the Government or the House to become committed to an expenditure of $11,000,000. But I ask hon. members not to turn away from the arguments with a sneer and a jeer, and refuse the proposed expenditure on the tunnel with scorn. If the scheme is not a feasible one, or too expensive, or the circumstances do not justify it, well and good, throw up the scheme; but let it be judged on its merits, and let the House not determine that because foolish expenditures have been undertaken in other parts of the Dominion and so-called wild-cat schemes entered upon, this scheme must be classed with them and thrown out. I beg hon. members to give this scheme patient, fair and reasonable consideration, and to remember not only that we come here asking for a tunnel on its merits, but also on the compact entered into with the Island in 1873. That compact cannot be ignored. I do not think it is the desire of any man to ignore it. That compact I believe the people of the Dominion are prepared, so far as their voice goes, to implement. That contract, I ask, should therefore be read and considered by hon. gentlemen, and particularly by the Government when they come to form their conclusions upon it. I will not ask for the construction of these cheaper tunnels; I say that the only tunnel which can confer upon Prince Edward Island benefits commensurate with its cost is a tunnel which will admit of the passage of freight cars, so that the exports of the Island can be carried to their natural markets. I say that if that can be done the Government will earn the everlasting blessings of the people, and that they will confer upon the people of that Island peace and happiness and prosperity for all time. We must consider the disadvantage that the Island labours under because of its isolation, and the fact that the National Policy, while bearing heavily on other parts of the Dominion, bears ten times more heavily on that Province, because we do not derive any of the incidental advantages that other parts of the Dominion do from the National Policy. In the great cities where manufacturers congregate there are some compensating advantages given to the people for the great disadvantages which it is alleged the National Policy causes, but in Prince Edward Island, while we are obliged to contribute as much per head of the population as elsewhere, we receive nothing in the world in return, and for our produce we get only one-half as much as is paid for the same produce in the adjoining province. We have a compact which entitles us to be placed in continual communication with these other provinces, and although I do not want to ask unreasonable or improper favours for Prince Edward Island, or unreasonable or improper expenditure in this critical financial period of the history of the Dominion, I ask fair-play and justice and the application of these principles to the compact you have entered into with the Province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FOSTER. What was your estimate of the export of potatoes?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not refer to the export; I said the growth was six million bushels.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not my intention to follow the discussion of the hon. gentleman. I think he has a fair right in this House to show the advantages and the position of the beautiful Island in which he resides and of which he is a representative, and to ask for any public work or any improvement which he thinks may benefit the Island. I heard the hon. gentleman criticize some remarks which had been made in this House during a prior debate, in the course of which he alleged that a misrepresentation had been made in reference to the postal service of Prince Edward Island. I have no doubt he alluded to a statement which I had made on that occasion, and as I do not want the statement I made at that time to be contradicted without reason, I shall briefly give the reasons why I made the allegation, in order to show that the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in representing my statement as being inaccurate. If I remember aright, the statement I then made was in connection with some criticisms upon the postal service of Prince Edward Island. Perhaps I spoke too hastily; perhaps, even if it were true, I ought not to have said it, but what I did say was that, according to its population, Prince Edward Island made less use of the postal facilities than any other portion of the Dominion. Upon looking at the statistics now, I find that the statement I made was literally true, and I will compare Prince Edward Island with the other provinces to show that the statement was correct. The population of the Province of Ontario, according to the last census, was 1,932,000. The gross revenue from postal receipts in Ontario was $1,748,081 in 1889, the net receipts were $1,278,603.01, and the total expenditure by cheque $1,393,738. The total population of Quebec, according to the last census returns, was 1,359,027, the gross revenue from the post office $691,186.12, the net revenue $535,457, and the total expenditure by cheque, $691,026. The population of Nova Scotia, according to the returns of 1881, was 440,572, the gross revenue from the post office $260,000, the net revenue $166,000, and the expenditure by cheque $258,724. In New Brunswick, the total population was 321,233, the gross revenue from the post office $177,715, the net revenue $120,670, and the total expenditure by cheque $230,125. The gross revenue from the post office for the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories was $213,000, the net revenue $154,000, the expenditure by cheque $276,037, and the population, according to the last census, was, in the Territories 56,446, and in Manitoba 65,954. In British Columbia the gross revenue was $96,226, the net revenue $76,115, and the expenditure by cheque $177,160; and according to the last census the population of British Columbia was 49,459. In Prince Edward Island the gross revenue in 1890 was $36,851, the net revenue $25,386, and the total expenditure by cheque $47,656, independent of the amount expended for carrying the mails in winter across the ice; and according to the last census the population of Prince Edward Island was 108,891. This shows that the total per capita receipts from Prince Edward Island are less than those from any other portion of the Dominion.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am always gratified when the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) rises to address the House on a subject so dear to him as that pretty little Island which we all love; and I cannot but admire the plucky way in which he comes to its rescue and endeavours to present it to us as the hub of the whole Dominion. At the same time I do not think it is right in him to represent that the Island has not been fairly treated by the Dominion in regard to public expenditure. I have taken the trouble to go through the whole volume of the Auditor General's accounts, so far as they refer to this pretty little Island, in order to ascertain what its real cost to the Dominion is, and they show the modest sum of $600,000 a year of net loss, that is to say, $6 a head of the population. I do not say that it would be cheaper for the Dominion, on the approach of winter, to transport all the inhabitants of the Island to the mainland——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not object to a certain amount of badinage, but the hon. gentleman surely cannot be serious in making that statement.

Mr. COCKBURN. The hon. gentleman is perfectly serious, and more than that, he has the figures here for the year 1890 which prove his statement to the letter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Give them?

Mr. COCKBURN. I will hand them in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read them.

Mr. COCKBURN. The Dominion subsidies and Government allowance amount to $183,903.42. We pay the Lieutenant-Governor a salary of $7,000, and an Auditor and Assistant Receiver-General $4,465. We spend on Customs $19,758, and receive a revenue of $159,970. Of Customs seizures, I credit the Island with one-fortieth, that being the proportion of its population to that of the whole Dominion, amounting to $836. Then coming to Inland Revenue, I find the Excise expenditure to be $1,960 and the revenue $42,946, the Weights and Measures expenditure $1,469 and the revenue $355, and the Gas Inspection expenditure $248 and the revenue $73. On the Prince Edward Island Railway there is an expenditure of $266,485, and a revenue of $160,971. Now I come to the Post Office, and I may say that I have carefully analyzed these figures, and I find this to be the result—that, taking the gross postal revenue for 1890, the revenue from Ontario amounts to 90 cents per head, from Quebec to 50 cents, from Nova Scotia to 59 cents, from New Brunswick to 55 cents, from Manitoba and the North-West Territories to $1.74, from British Columbia to $1.94, and from Prince Edward Island to 33 cents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many times more was British Columbia than Ontario? You make British Columbia three times as much as Ontario.

Mr. COCKBURN. I can only take the figures as I find them in the books. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to get through, as I have some other tid bits for him yet. The Post Office revenue from the Island is as follows: Mail service, $31,223; salaries, $24,045; miscellaneous, $3,518; and the mail subsidy, $3,679, or a total for that service alone of $62,465, with a revenue of $25,386, showing a loss of $37,000. Now, I come to the Indians. They cost us $2,490, and strange to say they have no less than eight doctors to attend to them, which doctors cost $425, while the medicine for their patients cost only $26.05, and I add $26.50 for extra medicines; and they managed between them to kill one poor Indian, for whose burial they charge $25.32. The militia for the defence of the Island we maintain at a cost of $9,171. Then we come to public works, and we have been told again and again that we do not give any public works to the Island because it sends members here to oppose the Government: but the fact is that we spent on Dominion buildings $6,129, on harbours and rivers $10,717, and on dredging $10,133, while we received a revenue of only $2,162. Then we gave a subsidy to the Anglo-American Telegraph Company of $1,946. In agriculture we spent $1,097, and got a revenue of $2,229. For the revision of the voters' lists, I charge one-half of the cost, as it comes only once in two years, $1,575. For the elections of 1887 I charge one-fifth of the cost, as they come every five years, $582. For the public health, I take one-ninth of the expenditure in the Maritime Provinces, as that is the proportion of the population, $172. Then we come to the marine expenditure. The steamer Stanley costs an annual expenditure of $24,565, and yields earnings amounting to $10,560, and the winter mail service costs besides $2,752, and earns $162; and in this I am not including the interest on the cost of the Stanley, of $150,000, or the annual wear and tear of the steamer, which amounts to, perhaps, $15,000, or insurance. Then the lighthouse and coast service costs $16,968, the meteorological service $551, and hospitals $1,112. Wharves and piers yield a revenue of $1,120. For steamboat inspection, I take one-fortieth, as the Island has one-fortieth of the population of the Dominion, making an expenditure of $524 and a revenue of $337. In the same way the sick mariners' fund gives an expenditure of $72 and a revenue of $467. Superior and County Court judges, $19,071.64. On Dorchester penitentiary the expenditure was $4,901.76 and the revenue $515.63, being in each case one-ninth of the whole, as the population of the Island is one-ninth of that of the Maritime Provinces. Then we come to the senators and their mileage, and I find that our four senators from the Island, including their mileage, cost this country $4,849. I think, in respect of senators, we have been extremely liberal to that little province, whose whole population, men women and children, only equals that of two or three wards of the great city of Toronto. Then I find that the members from the Island in this House and their mileage cost $7,404.80. The expenditure on savings banks amounts to $412.19, as the share of the Island. From the fisheries she gives us a revenue of $302.88, but on the other hand her overseers and wardens cost us $3,113.21. Then we come to the fish protection, in connection with the modus vivendi, the expenditure on which—Prince Edward Island's proportion of one-ninth, her population being one-ninth of the Maritime Provinces—amounts to $7,173.29, while her proportion of revenue from this item amounts to $1,409.60.

Then there is the census of which, since the population of the Island is one-fortieth that of the Dominion, and the census is taken every ten years, her proportion of the expenditure is one-four-hundredth, and according to this proportion it amounted to $631.67. Then the printing and revision of the voters' lists, which takes place every two years, costs, for the Island's proportion of one-eightieth, $990.78 every year. I then come to the following other items, being the one-fortieth proportion which the Island is chargeable with: Supreme and Exchequer Courts, $1,340; Dominion police, $511; Speaker of the Senate, $100; Speaker of the Commons, $100; the Senate, $1,506; the total cost being $60,217; the Commons, $5,416, or one-fortieth of the total cost of $216,660; Library of Parliament, $801; printing, binding and distributing laws, $113; printing, paper and binding, $1,783, with a revenue of $190.76; immigration, $2,752, being one-fortieth of the total, $110,091; major general commanding, $100; adjutant general, $65; interest on public debt, $241,421, being one-fortieth of $9,656,840; civil government, $32,721, being a fortieth of $1,308,846; Secretary of State, revenue, $235; revenue of outstanding cheques, of which the total amount is $2,212, the Island is entitled to $55 as its one-fortieth share; pensions voted, $1,001, being one-fortieth of the total expenditure of $40,041; pensions, statutory, $7,712, being one-fortieth of the total expenditure of $308,515; superannuation under Supply, $15; public buildings, Ottawa, $8,594; Rideau Hall, $650. These make up a lotal expenditure of $993,371, against a revenue of $410,626, leaving us with a clean deficit of nearly $600,000 per annum chargeable to Prince Edward Island. I may state that the expenditure for fishery bounty, $156,050, being less than the interest on the $5,500,000 received from the United States, has not been considered as a charge against Prince Edward Island. Now, as an illustration of how liberal this Government has been in dealing with this pretty little Island, the garden of the Dominion, whose members here we receive with open arms and the greatest courtesy, let me refer to the question of winter navigation. They have some difficulty in crossing during part of the winter time. The ice being mountains high, the Stanley is at times unable to breast it and cross the channel. An arrangement was made that, as far as possible, continuous communication should be kept up between the mainland and the Island, but it never dawned on the mind of any man at that time, I may safely say, that its members would come here, after we had given them that $600,000 per year, and ask us to undertake an expenditure of from $12,000,000 to $16,000,000, to enable a few people to cross over when the Stanley was not running. There may be a few odd chickens, a few dozens of eggs and bags of potatoes left on the Island which could not be carried across at that particular season, but there could not be a great many, as the number of passengers carried on ice-boats, when the Stanley was not running during the winter of 1889-90, was about seventy souls, and they paid out of their pockets, in solid money, $161.46, and the amount received for freight on the ice-boats during the winter of 1889-90 very nearly reached the sum of $10.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The number of passengers crossed during the season is much larger than that.

Mr. COCKBURN. I said on the ice-boats. I do not wish my language to be misconstrued. The whole question is this: We are asked to make a tunnel to give communication during the short time the people are compelled to cross in ice-boats.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have crossed with sixty men in a boat at one time.

Mr. COCKBURN. I have gone through the returns carefully, and am confident my figures are correct. The total revenue got from the ice-boats was $171.46, not more; and we are soberly asked to spend $16,000,000 in that interest, and at a time, too, when the hon. gentleman told us he did not wish to make any unreasonable demand, as we are temporarily embarrassed through our having just freed the taxpayers of a couple of million dollars taxation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's statement with reference to the cost of the tunnel is about on a par with his other statements. Sixteen million dollars is not the estimate of Sir Douglas Fox or anything like it. The hon. gentleman is only $5,000,000 astray.

Mr. COCKBURN. The estimate given by the Finance Minister a week or two ago for a certain tunnel of certain dimensions was, I think, $14,000,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. COCKBURN. $11,000,000; but I would like to see the hon. gentleman who would rise and tell me that he ever knew of any Government on earth who undertook a contract for a submarine tunnel on a basis of $11,000,000 and finished it without an addition of at least twenty to forty per cent. I am not looking at the mere estimate, but at what we know, from our own experience of estimates, would be the inevitable cost of the work. And we are asked, in all soberness of mind and spirit, to take and squander the hard-earned money of the public, at a time when we are doing all we can to relieve the people's burdens, when we are combining on both sides, as we did the other night, to do the best we can to reduce our expenditure on public works. Yet, at this time, we are asked to assume this colossal charge, to enable seventy passengers—let it be one hundred, I do not want to be niggardly—to pass over with their baggage during the winter months when the Stanley is not running. I say the proposal is simply outrageous. The Island has already $600,000 a year given to it; and I ask its representatives now, in the name of common sense to be content. In Ontario I find that we contribute to the Dominion a clear surplus revenue of over $2,750,000. Such is our love for our tiny little sister in Confederation that we do not begrudge out of our fullness to give her $600,000. They are the younger provinces, but, when the younger sister is apt to presume on the forbearance and on the wealth of the elder brother, I think it is time for us in all sobriety to state how the case stands, especially when it is said that the Government has not been dealing fairly with the Island in the appropriations which it has made, and when it has been attempted to place the Government in this position, that it does not grant the money, simply because, it so happens, that the majority of the representatives from that nice little Island do not happen to belong to this enlightened side of politics.

Mr. WELSH. Make a note of that.

Mr. COCKBURN. I hope my hon. friend there, whose heart is full of that little Island, which I hope to see daring this summer——

Mr. WELSH. The sooner the better.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am sure I shall have a kindly reception there, judging from the kindly people who are sent here from the Island. I know my hon. friend opposite sometimes looks a little savage, and thunders forth in Ciceronian and Demosthenesian style, but I know that his bark is worse than his bite, and I cannot help thinking that, when he comes out of the House this evening, he will admit that he does not honestly in his heart think that we are going to be taken in in this way, but that it is simply a bluff, so to speak, that he wants some increased harbour accommodation or postal accommodation ; but he cannot surely think for a moment that we would entertain a proposal to expend $16,000,000 or even $12,000,000 on this project, or to load the country with such a debt. In regard to the passengers who come from this nice little Island, which has a population, I believe, of about 108,000—and the four wards of St. Patrick, St. David, St. Stephens and St. James, in Toronto, have about just as much population, and have not four senators or six representatives on the floor of this House, though still we manage to creep along without asking for an expenditure of $600,000—I believe the noble ward of St. John in Toronto would appropriate such an amount as that, if my hon. friend would present it as a solatium for the new Tariff Bill which is increasing the price of tobacco and spirits and other good things. I do not want hon. members to go away with the impression that only seventy passengers crossed there during the year. That is the number of passengers on the ice-boats, when the Stanley is unable to run.

Mr. WELSH. You have found that out.

Mr. COCKBURN. The number of passengers carried on the Stanley was 1,881. There may possibly have been only 1,000, as perhaps some went forwards and some went backwards ; though, judging from the description of that Island by the hon. gentleman, I should think very few would go back. The total revenue derived from the passengers on the Stanley was $5,644.50. Add to that the $161 we had from the ice-boats, and we will have a total of about $5,800, and that would be the interest which we are to get on the $16,000,000 or the $14,000,000 or the $12,000,000 required for the tunnel. We will send them all through the tunnel in future. We will dispense with the Stanley and the ice-boats, and we will send their market baskets, their chickens, their eggs and other articles through the tunnel, which we are to build at a cost of $12,000,000.

Mr. McLEAN. The hon. gentleman is speaking of the 70 travellers who crossed in the ice-boats. I suppose he refers to the 70 commercial travellers who came down there from Ontario.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am glad to know that people do go from Ontario, that enlightened province, to that nice little Island, and no doubt when they are there they are quite able to partake of the delicious chickens and the potatoes and the esculent fruits which it produces. If you have to charge the revenues with the amount we receive from that traffic, instead of borrowing our money at 4 per cent. we would have to pay at least 5 per cent., and the $5,800 which we now receive from that traffic would be changed into the payment for a really effective and tunnel service of upwards of $720,000 a year.

Mr. PERRY. If the rumours be true that the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) is to have a seat in the Cabinet, Prince Edward Island will not have much consideration.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ALBION MINES SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou) moved second reading of Bill (No. 113) to continue the Acts respecting the Albion Mines Savings Bank.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou) moved that the Rules be suspended in relation to the Bill, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole forthwith.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. EDGAR. As an exceptional course has been taken by removing this Bill altogether from the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, I think the hon. gentleman promoting the Bill ought to explain it.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). Its object is to extend the charter for a period of two years. The charter lapses the 1st of July. The bank was originally incorporated by the Parliament of Nova Scotia and afterwards by the Parliament of Canada, and the object of the Bill is to extend the incorporation for a period of two years, with power to amalgamate with any loan company that may be lawfully incorporated. The terms of the Bill are exactly on the same lines as those of the Farmers' Bank of Rustico which was before the Committee on Banking and Commerce the other day.

Mr. MULOCK. It applies to only one bank.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). Only one.

Mr. EDGAR. The provision as to amalgamation with loan companies was also in the other Bill?

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). Yes; word for word. I propose to add two clauses similar to those in the Bill regarding the Rustico Bank.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any personal liability of the shareholders of the Albion Mines Savings Bank to the outside public?

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). It is a limited liability company, no more than any ordinary bank.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there double liability of the shareholders?

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). Single liability, I think.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If there is double liability, the creditors of the institution might be seriously affected, as you make no provision that the creditors may have recourse against the shareholders to the extent of double liability, which the statutes provide, in case of amalgamation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If there is personal liability under the existing organization, it ought not to be wiped out, as it will be by this Bill.

Mr. FRASER. Any company with which this company would amalgamate would know the liabilities before taking over the assets.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is very well, provided the company which took the assets over was a substantial company. But suppose it was not. You get rid of the double liability of existing shareholders and substitute nothing.

Mr. EDGAR. Even if there be not double liability, there may be liability on the capital stock.

Mr. FRASER. From what I know of the bank, there is no difficulty on this point. I know from personal knowledge of the affairs that there are no outstanding liabilities against the bank of any account.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

INDIAN AGENT ALLEN.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. McNEILL. With the permission of the House, I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior some questions of which I have given him private notice. I desire to ask: Is it known in the Department of Indian Affairs that Mr. James Allen, referred to in questions put by the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to-day, was for some where about a quarter of a century, one of the most respected members of the County Council of Bruce? How long has Mr. Allen been employed as Indian agent by the department?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid these are not questions of urgency such as the hon. gentleman is justified in putting at this time. Of course, if the House is willing, he may proceed.

Mr. McNEILL. Since he has been acting as Indian agent, has Mr. Allen's conduct been such as to cause the department to give any credence to these charges? Are any of these charges of which the department has any cognizance preferred by Indians? Are baseless charges frequently preferred against Indian agents by Indians? Is it within the knowledge of the department that the last of these charges preferred against Mr. Allen is ridiculously untrue?

Mr. SPEAKER. If any member objects to these questions being put, I must rule that they are out of order.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Jamieson (page 271), the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackintosh (page 344), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Taylor (page 355).

Mr. JAMIESON. I have not had the opportunity of replying to the addresses which were delivered to this House on the main motion which I placed before the House, nor have I been able to say anything with reference to the two amendments which have been moved to the main motion. Under the circumstances, I think the House will indulge me while I offer a few remarks in reply to the remarks which have been made upon this question. I have been very much pleased with the way in which the question has been dealt with by hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House upon it. On this occasion the question has been treated very seriously by the House; it has been treated in a manner in which I think it deserved to be treated, owing to its very great importance. I would have preferred, however, to hear not only the leader of this House, but the leader of the Opposition, express their views to the House on the subject. I think it was due, not only to the House but to the country, that both those hon. gentlemen should take the House and the country into their confidence upon a question which has moved the country from one end to the other, as is shown by the numerously signed petitions that have been presented during the present session. I do not know what the views of the leader of the Opposition are upon this question, since he has not stated them. However, I feel satisfied that notwithstanding his silence he will, in all likelihood, support the resolution which has been presented to the House. I think the very first occasion on which I ever saw that hon. gentleman was in 1875 at the great prohibitory convention in the city of Montreal, when he occupied the honourable position of a seat upon the platform, and, Sir, I do not think that since that time, at least, I hope since that time nothing has occurred to alienate his sympathies from this great moral movement which is abroad in the country. Now, I want to say a word on behalf of the much-abused Dominion Alliance. That organization has been very much spoken against by several gentlemen who have addressed the House upon this question, and more especially has it been spoken against by my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). Now, Sir, that organization is composed of representative temperance men, the executive officers of the different temperance organizations of this country and representatives delegated by the different religious bodies of this country, and in this respect, at all events, it is a representative body of men. We who are members of that organization have no pecuniary interest in this matter whatever; we are acting in the interest, as we believe, of our common humanity, in endeavouring to prohibit a traffic which we believe to be injurious, not only to the morals of the people, but to the business interests of the whole Dominion. I have no doubt that some hon. members of this House have been a little troubled, perhaps a little annoyed, by action which has been taken by the Dominion Alliance on this question; and, Sir, I apprehend that before this question is fully settled by the Parliament of this country, both political parties who are now contending for the control of public affairs will be much more troubled than they have been in the past, for if I understand aright the public sentiment of this country, and more especially the temperance sentiment of this country, I believe it is the determination of the friends of prohibition to fight and to wage this warfare until they secure the victory; and if the political parties are not disposed to grapple with this question, it will have to be grappled with by a party organized on different lines altogether. But so far as I am concerned, I would be better pleased to see a coalition of both parties formed upon this question, for it must be settled some day, and settled once for all, if not in this Parliament, at all events in the near future. Now, Sir, the question of the revenue has been touched upon, and I must say that I think this question, from a revenue standpoint, might have been much more easily dealt with at a former period in our history. It will be within the knowledge of the House that in 1883 we had a surplus of $7,064,000, whilst the revenue derived from spirits, wines and beers amounted to $6,254,000. Deducting the latter from the former figures, we have a surplus of $810,000; so that in that year we could have easily grappled with this question, we could have passed a prohibitory liquor law, and the revenue of the country would not have been disturbed in the least, because we would have had a surplus over and above any revenue which was derived from the liquor traffic. However, things have change since then. Not only has the revenue derived from the traffic largely increased, but we have not in later years had the surpluses we had in 1882-83. Last year the revenue from spirits, wines and beer amounted to $7,562,000. We had a surplus of $3,885,000; so that had we been deprived entirely of the revenue which was derived from spirits, wine and beer last year, there would only have been a deficit of $3,672,000 to provide from other resources. I take this ground, and probably I will not be supported in the view I take by the members of this House or by the country, that once we concede the fact that the revenue is derived from a source which is injurious to the best interests of the people, and that the traffic from which it is derived injuriously affects the morals of the people, there should be no further question whatever in regard to discarding the revenue altogether and finding other sources of revenue for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the Dominion. Passing from this view of the question to another view, I would say that I have been very much pleased, and I am sure the people have been pleased, that we have arrived at this stage in the agitation when not one hon. member has stood up and justified by any language whatever the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The whole question has been narrowed down to this: How can we best get along without the revenue? That is the sole question, and I believe we have wisdom sufficient to enable us to devise means to continue public affairs without the revenue derived from the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I may be excused, since I did not speak at any great length in support of the resolution I submitted to the House, to advert to another view of the question, and it is this. I hold the opinion, and I am not sure but that a large body of the people share with me that opinion, that the temperance people made a very great mistake in the first place in accepting what was known as the Dunkin Act in 1864. I am not going to shrink from making the statement here that I believe the people made another serious mistake, and I thought so at the time, in accepting the Canada Temperance Act. It was a compromise at the time. My judgment was then, and my judgment is to-day, that if the temperance people had followed the line on which they were proceeding prior to 1878, that of making a general advance in favour of prohibition, this movement would have occupied a much more advantageous position to-day than it occupies in this country. But the temperance people, having asked general prohibition, were offered the compromise of the Canada Temperance Act, and subsequently when they came before Parliament and brought the demand for general prohibition before the House, they were told: We have already given you local option; when you come back and tell us you have used what we have already given you, and it has proved ineffectual for the purpose for which it is given, it will then be time enough to ask for an advance on the line of general prohibition. The temperance people of the Dominion, and I among the rest, laid hold of the Canada Temperance Act as being the very best measure we had, and we did so almost exclusively with the view of testing public sentiment on the question, rather than with the view of finding it effective in producing the results which, perhaps, its promoter intended it should produce, namely, the bringing about of a large diminution in the evils flowing from the traffic in intoxicating liquors. We have been told that inasmuch as the Canada Temperance Act has been repealed in almost all the counties and cities in which it was enacted, consequently the people have changed their views as to the general prohibition of the traffic. But I contend that nothing of the kind can be inferred from the action of the people in dealing with the Canada Temperance Act, because local option cannot be effectual in dealing with this question. What we want is general prohibition, and it will be only when we have general prohibition we shall be able to judge of the salutary effects of the law, and not before. Something has been said, considerable perhaps, in respect to the question of compensation. I am not sure I am very orthodox from an ultra-temperance standpoint on the question of compensation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think you are.

Mr. JAMIESON. For my part I occupy this position: If I had my choice to-morrow between general prohibition and compensation, and no prohibition, I would accept the former, because I believe this country cannot make too great a sacrifice for the purpose of bringing about the general prohibition of the traffic, and it is in holding that view, and that view alone, that I would favour compensation. I hold that so far as the retail dealers are concerned they are not entitled to compensation. It is no doubt within the knowledge of most hon. members that in England there has been a judicial decision given by one of the highest courts that a person has no vested interests, and therefore no legal redress if he is deprived of the annual license which has been given to him from the constituted authorities. This decision sets at rest, so far as legal authority is concerned, the question of vested interests. But I believe it would pay this country, and every other country in which this traffic is carried on, if some means were devised to buy out root and branch the whole liquor interests and provide in some other way for carrying on the Government of the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Buying out their votes, do you mean?

Mr. JAMIESON. It will be in the recollection of hon. members that in 1883 we passed a law which curtailed to a very large extent the number of licenses issued in the Dominion. All hon. members who were residents in the Province of Ontario will recollect that a law was passed in that province, known as the Crooks' Act, which very seriously curtailed the number of licenses, and we did not hear a word about compensation in either instance being paid to those deprived of their licenses, the inference being that, in this Parliament and in the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, no opinion of that kind was held by those who framed those two statutory laws. As far as the principle of prohibition is concerned, we are not very extravagant in our demands. At the present time 399 out of every 400 are prohibited by legal enactment from engaging in the liquor traffic, and we are simply asking you to go one further and declare that the four-hundreth man shall be dealt with in like manner. This is a very moderate and a very simple request, and I hope that the good sense of this House will accede to it, and that we shall have, in the near future, prohibition from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which will be a great boon to the people of this Dominion. A very serious objection has been urged against the resolution which I have submitted to the House, on the ground that we made a departure from the action which we have taken on former occasions, and that we now state that the time has arrived when we should have prohibitory legislation in this Dominion, while in former resolutions we did not definitely ask the House to say that the people of this country were prepared for probibition. I am not fanatical upon this question. I have very strong convictions, I must say, but even if the House accepts the proposition which I have made, I am quite prepared to concede to the men who are engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors a reasonable time for closing up their business and getting out of the traffic. Some will ask what will be a reasonable time? For my part I will be quite willing to concede to these gentlemen at least three years, aye, if it were necessary four or five years, and I think that by the passing of this resolution, although the Government of the country will be bound to act in its spirit, I believe that the temperance people of this country would sustain them in giving reasonable and proper notice by passing a law and indicating in that law that it should come into force at a period of three, or four, or five, years hence. I think that would be reasonable notice to give to the people engaged in this traffic. If it were possible that this question could be dealt with now, I would personally make even greater concessions to get rid of the traffic. If it were possible at this present moment to pass a law to allow the present license holders to continue the traffic during their lifetime, provided they complied with the requirements of the present law and properly obtain their license, I will go so far as to accede to a proposition of this kind, because in the meantime the traffic would be circumscribed, the number of licenses would be gradually reduced, and ultimately we will get rid of the whole business. I wish to offer a few remarks now with reference to the revenue question. I hold the opinion, and I am not alone in holding it, that the diminution of revenue by the prohibition of the liquor traffic will be only temporary. It is within the knowledge of many gentlemen in this House that in the year of Father Matthews' greatest triumph in Ireland, one-half, or more than one-half of the population, were pledged teetotalers, the general revenue of the country instead of being diminished was increased and it ran up to £90,000 sterling beyond the average of any former years. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) treated fully on this portion of the question, and it is not necessary for me to go any further in that direction; but I am fully satisfied that if the money which is worse than wasted in this traffic were employed, as it would be, in giving employment to the people and increasing the purchasing power of the people, the duties derived from the increased consumption of dutiable goods would more than bring about an equilibrium in a very short time. I have a word or two to say in reference to the amendments proposed to my resolution, and I shall deal in the first place with the amendment of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I would readily dispose of that amendment by saying that it is entirely too hazy in its character to receive the assent of the House; if I were dealing with a gentleman of the same profession as myself we would simply dispose of it by saying that it was void for its indefiniteness. The hon. member has not thought proper to indicate in what manner the opinion of the people should be taken or as to how the people were to be polled upon this question.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is a matter of detail.

Mr. JAMIESON. I am not sure but that he actually refuses to say in what way he intended the popular sentiment should be taken, whether at the polls or by a referendum or plebiscite. I think that before any proposition of the kind submitted by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) received the acceptance of this House it should at all events be clear and easily understood, so that we would know what we were voting upon. I, therefore, trust that the amendment of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) will not be accepted by the House; and while I am speaking on this subject I would go a step further, and say that if I am authorized at all to speak for the temperance people of this Dominion I would state that we are not prepared to accept a referendum or a plebiscite upon this question, and that the unanimous sentiment of the temperance people of this country is, that if we get prohibition we must get it in a constitutional way, through the people's representatives in this Parliament, and we are not going to ask any new-fangled way of bringing about a result which can very simply be brought about on the floor of this Parliament. I have now a word or two to say with reference to the amendment of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh). My impression is that it has some merit in it; I am disposed to concede that. I think my hon. friend was of opinion, at the time it was first introduced, that it might produce some good effect. But now so much time has elapsed, and the session is so far spent, that the hon. member's amendment, if accepted now, would be utterly barren of any result. The temperance people of this country want all the information they can possibly get on this question; and for my part I should like to have placed before the people in some proper way all the information asked for by my hon. friend in his amendment. But now, it must be conceded by every member of this House, it is too late to have this question referred to a special committee, for such a committee would not have time to make an inquiry which would be at all fruitful or serviceable to us in considering the question at a subsequent session. In addition to that, I think the hon. gentleman's amendment is obviously unacceptable to the general temperance sentiment of this country, from the fact that he recognizes vested interests on the part of those who hold licenses. My hon. friend shakes his head; but when I read to the House his amendment, I think he will see that I am correct. He asks this House to affirm in the following language:—

"That this House, whilst desirous of moving in the direction of the amelioration of the evils complained of, is of opinion that any legislation should be so safeguarded as not too suddenly to disturb the revenue of the country or the vested interests claiming compensation."

If that does not recognize vested interests, then I do not understand the English language. Now, Sir, I think I shall not follow this question any further. I must apologize to the House for the time I have occupied. I think they will agree with me that, owing to the fact that two important amendments have been submitted, and that I had no opportunity of replying to the arguments of those hon. gentlemen who thought proper to differ from me on this question, it was only reasonable that I should occupy the attention of the House with a few words in reply. I trust that the resolution which I have submitted will receive the assent of the House. I cannot agree to accept either of the amendments, and I shall consequently vote against them both, and stand by the original resolution which I have placed before the House.

Mr. CURRAN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he speaks on behalf of the Alliance when he says that they will not have a plebiscite on any terms?

Mr. JAMIESON. I do.

Mr. McNEILL. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is due to myself as well as to the House that I should say a word or two in explanation of my position as the seconder of the amendment of my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). When I agreed to second that amendment, I had just had a conversation with my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who I am sorry to see is not here at this moment. From that conversation I inferred, erroneously, as it would seem, that he had an understanding with my hon. friend from South Leeds that he would support his amendment, and therefore I thought that amendment was the one most likely to receive the support of this House; it was also the one which came nearest to what I myself would have preferred. But when I agreed to support that amendment I told my hon. friend beside me that I should be obliged, when I got up to second it, to say that I would have preferred an amendment which would go further than his—one which would go so far as to say that the vote of the people on this question should be had at the earliest convenient time. I think it is due to myself that I should say this. I think my course in reference to this matter has been consistent from the first. I was, I think, the first member of this House to support the principle that this matter should be referred to the popular vote, and I am here to maintain the same principle to-night. When the Scott Act was before this House I proceeded upon the same principle, namely, that this was a matter which had been in a large measure removed from our hands and which was really in the hands of the people; and, therefore, I supported any amendment which, in my view, was calculated to improve the working of the Scott Act, altogether irrespective of whether I personally approved of such amendment or not; and, on the same principle, I opposed any amendment which was likely to prevent that Act from receiving a fair trial. So now I hold that this question is really in the hands of the people, and not in the hands of the people's representatives. For many years past we have proceeded upon the principle that before any legislation of this peculiar kind shall be put into operation—legislation which is altogether different in its nature from any other legislation with which we have to deal--legislation of such a peculiar nature that it follows a man into the privacy of his home and dictates to him there what beverage he shall be permitted to partake of—the people themselves shall be first consulted. We have never ventured to place prohibitory legislation on the Statute-book, or to make the people subject to it, without having first received the permission of a majority of the people who were to be affected by it. This principle was accepted when the Dunkin Act was passed before Confederation. It was endorsed when the Scott Act was passed some thirteen years ago, and it has been repeatedly affirmed and reaffirmed, endorsed and re-endorsed, whenever the Scott Act has been submitted to the popular vote. I say that the right of the people to be consulted before prohibitory legislation is placed on the Statute-book has been affirmed and acted upon in Canada, without intermission or contradiction, for the last quarter of a century and more; and I say that if this House were to-night to trample upon this well-established right, by proceeding to legislate over the heads of the people, the result would be that in the agitation which would speedily arise from one end of this Dominion to the other the course of hon. members in this House would be described as a breach of trust and the action of this House as a piece of tyranny. My hon. friend who has just spoken has said that he does not approve of any new-fangled principles being introduced into our constitution. I wonder if my hon. friend took this objection when the Scott Act, which he supported, was introduced. I do not understand where his consitency is in this matter. Why it should be a new-fangled notion to suggest that this question of prohibition should be left to the vote of the people, when my hon. friend has been supporting for years the Scott Act, which was in principle just the same, only that it went a little further—because all that is proposed in this resolution is that the principle should be left to the decision of the people, whereas in the Scott Act not only the principle but the details were so left.

Mr. JAMIESON. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend seems to think that is a modification of the principle. I venture to say that it is, in this sense, that we give away a great deal more of our authority, as representatives of the people, if we say that the people must pronounce not only on the principle but also on the details. No doubt my hon. friend has the idea that what is proposed is the introduction of the plebiscite. Well, the plebiscite is a very dreadful name. It is something which has a very bad odour in the nostrils of hon. members in this House, and, no doubt, justly so. There is no doubt that the plebiscite was very improperly used in France. There is no doubt it was there made an instrument of tyranny and an instrument to misrepresent the views of the people, and our general elections might be similarly used if they were conducted in the same way as the plebiscite was conducted in France. I am not here to argue on behalf of the plebiscite, but I say that if our own general election had been conducted in the same way as the plebiscite in France it would have been no fairer in its results. What was done under the plebiscite? Questions were drawn up in accordance with the wishes of the government of the day and submitted to the people, without any opportunity whatever being given to discuss them. Not only so, but the government officials in every quarter of France were ordered, on pain of instant dismissal, to force the people to vote yea, and in many cases the negative ballots were withheld altogether, so that no opportunity was given to vote otherwise. If we were to conduct our general elections in that way the result would not be altogether satisfactory, and though I am not here to argue in favour of the plebiscite, I venture to say that because the plebiscite was misused in France is scarcely a valid argument against the principle. But what is proposed here differs very largely from the plebiscite, because the plebiscite, as is generally understood, is a question which is left to the people without an opportunity being given for discussion, and often drawn up in such a way as to be misleading. Not one of these objections apply here. This is not a question which is submitted to the people without discussion, for it has been amply discussed on the public platform and in this House time and again. What we propose is very much more like the referendum as used in Switzerland. It is not quite that, because in this amendment we do not propose to leave all the details to the people, but only the principle, and the principle has been thoroughly discussed. In Switzerland the referendum is generally an act of the legislature, all the details of which have been arranged and discussed by the legislature, but which is left to the people's decision under certain circumstances. When it is an act bearing on the constitution it is left as of right. In other cases, if thirty thousand of the people, or eight cantons, petition for it, they have the right to have any Act of Parliament submitted to them before it becomes law. In this case we simply suggest we should do, to a modified extent and in a modified degree, what we have done in the case of the Dunkin and Scott Acts. In these Acts all the details were left to the people. In the present case we ask that the principle be left to the people, and that principle has already been thoroughly discussed. For my part, if any hon. gentleman prefers to this proposition the suggestion that an Act of Parliament should be submitted in place of the principle only, I am perfectly willing to accept that proposal; but I say that this House is committed to this policy, not only because we have acted in this way in reference to the Dunkin and Scott Acts, but because this House has itself declared, by a resolution, that this question of prohibition shall be submitted to the people when the people are prepared to pronounce upon it. I want to know whether the natural, the logical, the consistent thing to do, is not to leave it to the people, and ascertain whether they are prepared for it or not, and for this reason I have much pleasure in seconding the amendment of the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. LISTER. I suppose that, when a very large proportion of the people of this country pronounce in favour of prohibition, it is the duty of Parliament to give them what they desire. I have no doubt that the Government have decided on some policy in regard to this matter. I believe we were informed by the Minister of Finance or some other member of the Government, when this question was last under discussion, that the Government would be prepared to announce to Parliament and the country their policy upon this question, and I think that, before we are asked to pass a vote upon it, it is the duty of the Government, the plain and manifest duty of the Government, apart altogether from the promise they have made, but upon the merits of the question itself, so that the House may deal intelligently with this question, and may form an opinion upon the policy which the Government may adopt, to tell this House what their policy is. The various views which are held upon this temperance question have been ventilated here. We have heard the arguments for and against it stated, and the views entertained had been enunciated on both sides during this discussion. I certainly had hoped and expected that the Minister of Finance would have been heard. I remember that, fourteen years ago, it was my pleasure to listen to that hon. gentleman advocating the cause of temperance. If ever a man was devoted to the cause of temperance, I thought it was that hon. gentleman at that time. He urged it with all the eloquence he possesses and with all the persuasiveness of which he is a master, and I thought that, if ever a man would stand by the ship till it sank and went out of sight, that man would be George E. Foster. Some years afterwards I was elected to Parliament, and my hon. friend was elected about the same time for a constituency in the Maritime Provinces. I believe he had been a Liberal up to that time, but he was, I think, elected as an independent, or, if not as a Liberal, he was a temperance man first, last and all the time. Judge of my amazement when I read the account of an interview which he had with a deputation which had gathered from various portions of this country and met him in his official capacity as Minister of Finance, and judge of the amazement of the people of this country, who looked upon him as the champion of temperance, as the leader in this question, when they read his words:

"He said that equally strong prohibitionists might not agree as to the methods and times for prohibition. This was neither a Government nor a party question, but a popular question, and the people only could decide what was to be done. They must remember that there was a wide difference between enactment and enforcement. The delegates spoke of obtaining prohibition in the near future, but the resolution of Mr. Jamieson contained no future—it was essentially the present. Did they mean that there was to be no grace; that the carrying of the resolution was to be followed the next day by a prohibitory liquor law; or did they mean that the resolution was to be adopted and carried into effect when the Government saw means and methods at their disposal? Again, if the law was passed the first thing to be faced was a loss of seven millions and a-half of revenue."

Fourteen years ago there was no question in regard to that. At that time he pressed upon the people vehemently the question of prohibition, and said that the country was ripe for prohibition, and the people of the county in which he was speaking declared that the country was ripe for prohibition. Again he said that, if such a law were passed:

"Moral sentiment said, 'Let it go; men's souls cannot be weighed on the balance against money,' but it was a practical difficulty, nevertheless, for the next moment he, as Finance Minister, would have to come down to Parliament with a scheme to provide that revenue. And how was it to be done?

"A delegate—Reduce your expenditure!

"Mr. Foster said that was impossible and that the only way to meet the loss of revenue was by imposing direct taxation, for which the people were not ready. He was not prepared to pass a prohibition law, be unable to enforce it or to raise the revenue, and have a reaction set in, with the result of sweeping the Government that enacted the law out of power, and a return to a state of things ten times worse than they were before. His position was this: The people had a right to what they wanted, but the first duty of the Government was to ascertain if the people really did want prohibition and would stand by it and take all the attendant consequences.

"Rev. Dr. Potts—How can you ascertain that?

"Mr. Foster replied there were two ways—one by the simple constitutional means of making prohibition a direct issue at the polls and elect men pledged to support a prohibitory liquor law; the other by what was known as a plebiscite. Either means would be effectual. As to what his action in the House would be, they would see for themselves when the proper time came."

A change came over the spirit of the hon. gentleman's dreams after he took a seat in the Cabinet, for now he says that the difficulties in the way of total prohibition exist in regard to the finances of the country, that there is no way of making up the deficit which would naturally arise from having immediate prohibition. That hon. gentleman has in this House, in 1883, 1884 and 1885, voted for and supported prohibitory resolutions. He has declared by his voice and his vote that this country was ready for total prohibition. Ned I recall the discussion which took place here in 1886, when the Robertson amendment was proposed declaring that now the country was ready for prohibition? If you look at the votes polled on that night you will find the name of George E. Foster as one of those who sustained that motion. In 1884 the gentleman who now occupies the important position of Finance Minister spoke upon this question, and he said:

"I am within the mark when I say the evils resulting from the liquor traffic have done more to retard the prosperity of the country and to sow the germs of disorder and discontent than any other evils probably with which the country has been afflicted."

He also said:

"So, Sir, when we desire that the liquor traffic be suppressed by legal enactment, we are within the bounds and rules which economic science on every page lays down, and which will join us in declaring that the liquor should be suppressed in the best economic interests of the country."

He further said:

"Men have got beyond the idea that they are here simply to recruit soldiers, to gather taxes, and to carry on war and let the best interests of the country take care of themselves, and they have come to the conclusion that in the future, is the practical duty of legislators to dig down into the causes which lie at the root of social deterioration."

Later in the same debate he said, on page 1120 of the Hansard:

"I make bold to stand up and declare from my place in Parliament, that this free people in the Dominion of Canada will not cease their agitation, and will not be satisfied until the largest application of the principle of prohibition has been made to a traffic which they know is an enemy to the best interests, material, moral and social, of the people."

Again, on page 1121 he said:

"We legislate to keep up the brewery, to keep up the liquor shops in our country, who employ altogether some 11,000 or 12,000 persons. Now, there is another class in this country, and that is the 4,400,000 and over, who do not make and sell liquors. The legislation we have at present is in favour of the 11,000, but it is against the best interests of 4,400,000."

In this debate Mr. Robertson, M.P. for Shelburne, moved to add the rider:

"And this House is of the opinion that the public sentiments of the people of Canada calls for immediate legislation to that end."

Mr. Foster insisted that this addition to his motion was in order, and voted for it. And again, in 1885, on the motion made by Mr. Kranz, M.P., to grant compensation to distillers and brewers, Mr. Foster said (Hansard, page 243) :

"To-day we have a resolution which distinctly recognizes the fact that the prohibition movement can no longer be ignored, that the people are behind it, and this resolution is, if I understand it rightly, the calm and deliberate expression of opinion that whether they be prepared for death or not, death is imminent. * * * That question has been before the country for 50 years; it has steadily been making forward towards its solution. Every year it has been increasing in strength ; every year its influences behind it have been augmented."

Then, Mr. Foster in an address subsequently, delivered in 1885 (Hansard, page 251) :

"He computed the loss to Canada by the liquor traffic, in loss of labour, by deaths caused by it, to be $12,000,000 yearly. He also computed the loss to the Dominion, by money thrown away on the liquor, to be $40,000,000, or a total loss yearly of $52,000,000."

Now, Mr. Speaker I repeat that these were the views of the hon. gentleman previous to his being called upon to take a seat in the Cabinet. I am not saying that these are not his views to-day, I am not questioning that he may be an ardent temperance man still ; but if we are to judge from the statements made by him to the delegates who met him on the occasion referred to we must conclude the opinions which he expressed in 1884, in 1885 and in 1886, are not the opinions which he holds to-day. What is the reason? Is it that he is afraid to face the question? Is it that he is afraid, as he stated to them, that the Government of which he is a member will be swept out of power ? Or is it true that rather than sacrifice himself on this question, which to him was greater than all other questions, he would prefer to sacrifice that great question rather than lose the seat which he holds in the Government of this country? Fifty-two millions a year is the loss which he estimated this country sustained, and the hon. gentleman, ardent advocate as he was of the prohibition movement for all these years, long before he had a seat in this House, and for years afterwards, rising on every occasion when this question was brought before the House, advocating it with all the skill, with all the power at his command, we find that suddenly, when a seat is given to him in the Cabinet, all these difficulties arise—the question about the revenue, the question as to whether the result of such legislation would not be to sweep the present Government out of power. Sir, the people of this country can only conclude that the position which the Government are taking to-day, that the utterances which my hon. friend made to that delegation, indicate an abandonment by him of all the professions he has ever made on the question of prohibition, and that he prefers a seat in the Cabinet with its $7,000 a year to standing by the principles of which he professed to be such a warm and ardent adherent. Sir, never in the history of this House, never in the history of any Parliament of Canada since we had parliamentary government, has there been presented to the House such a mass of petitions on any question as we have had this session for prohibition. They indicate that behind these petitions are hundreds of thousands of people who are placing this question above and beyond every other question that this House has to deal with. And this House must deal with it. They will not be allowed to trifle with this question ; the people of the country will call them to account ; they must deal with it in one way or the other. If Parliament is opposed to this prohibition movement, if the Government is opposed to it, then it will become a question at the polls, and let the Government take the consequences if they think proper. But it must be dealt with ; and I repeat again, that before this question is submitted to a vote of this House it is the plain and manifest duty of the Government to declare its policy thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would not have said anything upon this question were it not that a good deal of weight has been laid upon the enforcement of the Canada Temperance Act ; and I think statements have been made on that subject not in accordance with the facts. I think the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) stated that the Government of the Province of Ontario had not enforced the Scott Act, and that it was their duty to enforce that law. I think the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) made a statement of the same description, and said that the Provincial Government of Ontario had not enforced the Scott Act simply because it was a Dominion law. That hon. gentleman also stated that if the Dominion Government had undertaken to enforce the Scott Act they would have been interfering with provincial matters. I would remind those hon. gentlemen that the Dominion Government took the licensing system out of the hands of the Provincial Government and assumed control of it. Let those hon. gentlemen look back to the time when the Scott Act was passed in the 60 counties they speak of in the Province of Ontario, and let them remember that the officials who at that time were empowered to enforce the licensing system and enforce the McCarthy Act—I speak of my own knowledge and experience when I relate what took place in the County of Huron, and I can assure the House that in all that county the Dominion officials, whose duty it was to see that the Scott Act was enforced, did everything in their power to prevent the carrying out of that law. They went so far as to come before the County Council of Huron and urged the council not to ask the Provincial Government to appoint a police magistrate to try the cases, after it had been found that whenever information was laid and a conviction seemed sure, the case was taken from court to court, and no such thing as conviction could be had—let these hon. gentlemen remember that these things took place under the officials appointed by the Dominion Government to enforce the licensing system in the County of Huron. The inspector refused to have anything to do with the first five informations that were laid before him. When the information was laid before the magistrate then three convictions were secured. This proves conclusively that they were not buncombe informations that were wanted, but informations laid on a good foundation. My mind goes back further, and I think I remember that the Minister of Finance of to-day laid down a very good proposition at one time when he stated the conditions under which a law could be fairly tested. Speaking on temperance, he said that when a law was passed by a Government it was the duty of that Government to provide proper machinery for the proper enforcement of that law, and if that Government failed in that particular duty it could not be said that the law had had a proper opportunity to be tested. Such, I hold, was the condition of the Scott Act in many portions of Ontario. Proper machinery was not provided by the Government when the law was passed, and for that reason the law in many instances proved a failure. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) stated that for two or three months in his locality the law was obeyed, but after twelve months the law was at an end and liquor was sold as at any other period. This proved that the people of the country were prepared to obey the law, providing the Government had provided proper machinery to carry it out. I believe such to be the case. Let me say that the social drinking habits of the people of this country and of the old country are such that it becomes the duty of each individual to put his shoulder to the wheel and endeavour to remove this gigantic evil. I heard the other day of a condition of things in my native land for which I was ashamed. I read a statement from the contractor for the construction of the bridge over the Frith of Forth, in which it was stated that in building the bridge it was found that the workmen of Britain had fallen into such a condition that when men were required who were prepared at all times to do their duty the contractor had to employ Italians and Bavarians. After the Scotchmen had worked two or three hours, which was the time they were able to work on the foundations of the bridge, the moment they left work they went to the hotels, and when they again returned to take their places they were not capable of performing their duties. Hence, foreigners were put in their places, and the long-boasted British workmen had to give place to men who were not, I believe, superior but inferior, except for this drinking evil. I also saw recently the statement of a sea captain sailing between the old country and Australia. When asked what kind of sailors he preferred, he said he would not have Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen or Americans. When asked his reasons, he said they went ashore when the vessel reached port and got drunk and fell into the hands of the police, and there was no satisfaction in employing them. Then he was asked as to the nationalities of the men he employed. He replied Italians, Danes and Norwegians, with whom he said he had no trouble; and for cooks he chose Chinese. These nationalities are superseding British sailors in sailing British vessels. This is an evil permeating all classes of society, from the millionaire to the beggar in the street. The bench has not been free from the evil results of intoxicating liquors, and even the pulpit has at times been disgraced by the effects of the traffic. I hope the Minister of Finance still holds the opinion he formerly held, because he made another statement. He said that after looking somewhat carefully into the subject and making a fair estimate, he came to the conclusion that the people of Canada spend each year for intoxicating beverages a sum in the neighbourhood of $40,000,000. Yet that hon. gentleman told a deputation which waited upon him that the Government could not afford to lose annually $7,000,000 of revenue. The hon. gentleman himself admitted that $40,000,000 was spent in drink, for an object that was not in the interests of the wives and families of Canada, and it must be admitted that if the money was otherwise expended the people would be better able to pay revenue than when their earnings are spent in intoxicating liquors. Under the Scott Act in 1886, the inspector of gaols and prisons stated that in one portion of Ontario where over 1,000,000 people lived under the Scott Act, there were 1,800 crimes committed, but in another portion with a little over 1,000,000 people living under the Crooks Act, crimes reached 5,800, or a result of 1 to 4 in favour of the Scott Act. That must be taken as evidence of the beneficial effects of the Scott Act in Ontario. I hold that if we wait for every man to obey every law we will never pass it or enforce it. We have always had laws against burglars; and yet burglars are almost daily brought before the courts. We have laws against theft, and yet every day thieves are punished. Does any one object to the law, or does any one propose to do away with the police force simply because the laws are not obeyed? If we had a prohibitory law to-day it would have an educational force on the people that nothing else ever possessed. Whenever you get people to obey the law there is no necessity for the law, because, the people are a law to themselves. Taking all these facts into consideration, I cannot vote for any amendment to the main motion. I will give it my vote, and if the main motion is not carried I will then be prepared to vote for a plebiscite.

Ives,

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not altogether in reply to the exceedingly kind and somewhat seductive invitations from the other side of the House, that I should make known my views on this question before the House comes to a final vote, that I rise for the purpose of asking the indulgence of the House for a very few moments. For two or three years past, although almost every year the question of prohibition in one form or other has been before the House, and has been discussed, I have not had very much to say, and that for reasons of my own. During that time I have been subjected, of course, to a great many criticisms and to a great many misrepresentations. I do not complain of that; every person in public life has to be subject to these criticisms and these misrepresentations, and it would be impossible for me to keep track of either one or the other and reply to all. I do not intend to-night to reply to the gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Lister), I leave that to some other person whose quality of mind will better fit him for the purpose than my own. I have, however, to thank him, although he unwittingly did it, for the service which he has done me. He has quoted from speeches which I have made, and I hope he has received a deal of benefit from the research and reading which has been necessary in order to acquaint himself with these speeches and excerpts. I am quite sure that he has selected the very strongest utterances I have made, and those most apropos to the question which is now under consideration, and I propose to use these as a text for explanation in the few remarks to which I ask this House kindly to listen. The hon. gentleman has read from certain speeches of mine, delivered, he says, fifteen years ago, and delivered later than that, but a few years ago, and he has done me the service of reading a newspaper report of my answer to the delegation which waited on the Government some few weeks since. I take this occasion to say that this newspaper report does not exactly convey the ideas that I tried to express; in the main the ideas are what I did express, but the conjunction is not the same, and a different sense could be taken from them than what I proposed they should bear. That always happens, or very often happens, when newspaper reports of what one says are made hurriedly. However, I desire to say this: that with reference to the question of prohibition I have not changed my views as to the principle from the time that I had views upon this subject, whether it be fifteen years ago or whether it be later. I to-day believe in the principle of prohibition just as strongly, and more strongly, than I have in any other previous part of my life. I believe also in the practicability of the principle of prohibition, and in this I will no doubt differ from a great many gentlemen on both sides of the House. I cannot help that. I have my opinions. I propose to keep them, and I have to avow here to-night in the House and before the country, that I am of the opinion, from the light and knowledge that I possess upon it, whether it be sufficient to enable me to give a proper judgment or not: that the principle of prohibition is a feasible and practical one in its application to the country; that it is feasible and practical under certain conditions. Now, I desire to say in the next place that any hon. gentleman who reads my speeches in the past will find that I never burked nor blinked the difficulties that were in the way of the enactment and successful carrying out of prohibition in this country; neither was I ever so dishonest with myself or with my audience as not to tell my audience in the first place what I thought were the difficulties that were to be encountered, and what I thought was the battle to be fought before the victory could be won; and if hon. gentlemen inside of this House, and if people outside of this House—and many of them, too, who profess to be very strong temperance men, and I do not doubt their profession—would be honest enough to quote all my speeches and to take me fairly on this point for review, what I state to-night would be found to be amply carried out.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Life is too short for that.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend may not be altogether in a condition to keep quiet, but he would do me a very great favour if he would allow me to speak without interruption. What I have stated to be the difficulties in the way of prohibition, and what I believe to-night to be difficulties in the way of the practical realization of prohibition are mainly these. There is first the desire for intoxicants, the desire for stimulants which exists in a large proportion of the people of this and of other civilized countries. There may be a difference of opinion as to why this is; some gentlemen say that this is a natural appetite in man, others say that it is an artificial one and that it is bred by circumstances and by custom, or that it is transmitted by inheritance. I am of the second belief and not of the first. However I am not here to-night to discuss this point, but simply to say that it has now, and has in the past more than now, been one of the great difficulties to be encountered in the practical carrying out of the prohibition principle. I stated as well, and I hold to the same belief now, that the power of custom is another of the great difficulties which stand in the way of the practical realization of prohibition. Any man who studies history, any man who has gained experience, any man who observes to-day, knows the power of custom and what a yoke it places even upon intelligent men. That power of custom, draped in all the allurements of hospitality and of genial fellowship, is one of the adjuncts of the liquor traffic and one of the incitements to the drinking usages of the country; and these will have to be largely reformed and overcome before the principle of prohibition is practically realized. I have always stated, and I state to-day, that the moneyed interest is another great difficulty to be overcome. The man who manufactures intoxicating liquor does it to make money from it; the labour he employs is paid by this money; the man who sells the liquor by wholesale has his profit; the man who retails it has his profit; the municipality, the province, the Government has its share, and, before the man who manufactures can pocket his gains, he has to divide with all these different classes; and, when you talk prohibition, and before you get prohibition to be an accomplished, practical fact, you have to fight, and you have to conquer, that interest. I have stated, as well, that another difficulty in the way of prohibition was the difficulty of its enforcement. Any person who has had practical knowledge and experience of license laws and Scott Acts, of local option laws, or of prohibition, in any country, knows the difficulties to be met with in enforcing a law of this kind. We may say they should not exist, we may shut our eyes and declare that they do not exist, but all the same they do exist and they have to be overcome, and they are a factor to be encountered in the ultimate carrying out of the principle of prohibition. I have always stated and I state to-night that another difficulty to be overcome is the difficulty of the adjustment of revenues. The gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Lister) misrepresented me in this matter. The gentleman from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) also misrepresented me. Neither of them probably, I will do them the justice to believe, intended to do so; but anyone who states that before that deputation or any other deputation I gave as a reason why I could not favour a prohibitory law, that the $7,500,000 of revenue stood imperatively in the way, states what is not true, and states what I did not state. I want that to go as current outside as inside of this chamber; and gentlemen who have a thought about them ought to be careful on these points of criticism of the reputation of another, even though he be nothing but a public man, and ought to be sure of the grounds of their criticism. I never said such a thing. I am here to make another statement. I do not count a gold dollar for one single moment in the balance against one single ray of light or happiness that comes into the humblest home in this country. I do not count your handful of dollars against the happiness or well-being of one single man, if it is attacked and in danger; and I am here to-night to state that I do not look at the $7,500,000 as worth one moment's argument if it is put in the balance against a strong demand of the people to do away with what I consider to be an evil, and to bring about a state of things which I consider would be better for the homes, the happiness and the material prosperity of the country. But I did not meet that temperance delegation, and I do not propose to meet any other temperance delegation, and say to them: True, $7,500,000 of the necessary revenue of the country will be taken away, but do not let us think about that, that presents no difficulty. Do not I know that it is a difficulty? Was I not honest in stating that it was a difficulty? Would I not be dishonest if I did not say that that is a practical difficulty, and that we must consider how it is to be met? Nobody knows better than hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been for years ambitious of occupying the Treasury benches, that the moment they take possession of them they must expect the question of ways and means to be one of the most important questions with which they are to grapple; and however favourable they are to prohibition when they are on the Opposition seats, when, in the far-off time, I hope, they come to occupy these benches as a Government, they well know that whenever a man or a set of men, no matter how good their cause may be, comes to them and says: We have a proposition; we wish you would carry it out; you will lose $7,500,000 of revenue, but then there will be a great advantage to the country, and you should not let that trouble you; they must reply: It does trouble us; it is a practical difficulty to overcome, and we must find how to provide the ways and means. Sir, if this country and this Parliament agrees to it, I am here to state that no better thing could be done in this country than to do what? Than to provide in some other way for the $7,500,000 of revenue in order to have a country blessed with the sobriety and peace and consequent plenty that I believe would come from a well-ordered and well-enforced prohibitory law. Now, that is simply my position. Criticize it as you may, but criticize it fairly as I place it before you; and any man who has been Finance Minister, or who wishes to be Finance Minister, will know that he has a practical difficulty to face when he is asked to come down to the House and provide for $7,500,000 of taxation, by giving it up for any cause, no matter how good it may be. Sir, it has been stated that that would be saved to the country, and it has been said that in speeches formerly made by me I had declared that. So I have declared it, and I believe it would be saved to the country; but I believe too that although it would be saved to the country, and the country would be so much the richer for that saving, it none the less is a difficulty to provide for the financial needs of the present; and this is to be done by increased taxation, and by some method other than that which we have now for raising our taxes. So much with reference to that point. I said that I believed in the feasibility of a prohibitory law under certain conditions. What are those conditions? I will name but one, that is, the condition which follows as a logical sequence, as a necessary deduction from what I have just been stating, that before a prohibitory law ought to be enacted, and before it can be maintained so as to do good in the country, there must necessarily be the basis of a strong and preponderating public sentiment in its favour, in order not only to lead to its enactment, but to tend to its maintenance and enforcement as well; and I say again, what has been quoted as a reproach to me, and I say it boldly and earnestly, that that man is no true friend of the temperance cause or the prohibition movement who will enact a law to-day, if he does not firmly believe in his heart that that law finds its reflex in the overpowering conviction of a preponderating and active majority in the country in favour not only of its enactment, but its maintenance as well; and that he would do the worst possible service to the cause of prohibition to snatch a verdict for the enactment of the law, and find out afterwards if it were not a reflex of such a preponderating sentiment in the country, that it would become a dead letter on the Statute-book, a by-word in the community, and a reproach to the very temperance men who favoured its enactment. So I say the first thing that is necessary as a basis for the enactment of a prohibitory law, and for its maintenance, is a strong, preponderating conviction in the majority of the people of the country who are to be subject to the law, and who are to maintain it by virtue of that strong, preponderating conviction. Now, let us be honest with ourselves to-night. Do we in our heart of hearts believe that this country, from British Columbia to Cape Breton, has that strongly preponderating and actively co-operating sentiment in favour of the enforcement of a prohibitory law? If we do, let us vote for it and enact it. If we do not, let us be honest with ourselves, honest with the cause, and honest with the country as well. Now, Sir, I have one other point. I am met at once with the criticism: We petition you for a prohibitory law; these prove that the country needs it. Now, I am not one of those who would for one moment ridicule the petitions which have poured into and been laid on the Table of this House. I am pointed to the variety, and the scope, and the number of those petitions, and I am told that they are an index that the people are in favour of a prohibitory law. These petitions are, ninety-nine out of every hundred, honest petitions, honestly signed, and many of them bear the prayers of those who pen the signatures that those petitions might eventuate in a strong and effective prohibitory law. And I believe that these petitions merit the careful consideration of this House. But petitions do not show certainly and definitely the state of feeling of the country, and are not the basis upon which we can enact legislation of the importance of that which is proposed. I have every respect for the resolutions that have been sent here, resolutions of the synods, resolutions of conferences, resolutions of temperance societies. These as indications of opinion are excellent, but they do not offer to us that indestructible and certain basis upon which the law proposed could rest for its maintenance and enforcement. I do not believe that the indication given by the vote on the Canada Temperance Act and by the subsequent reversal of that Act, is a certain sign that the people are or are not ready for maintaining prohibition; and I ask members on both sides, coming fresh from their constituencies, if they can assure us they have a warrant or not from the people to vote for the enactment of a prohibitory law during this session. Therefore I say we have not that certain basis upon which, if we are honest, we ought to stand. I am met with the criticism: You doubt that the country is ready, and you do not want to enact the law until it is, but give us no chance to say whether we are ready or not. That is a fair point to put and it has great weight with me. In reply I may say there are chances. You have the constitutional chance, the regular chance, the old chance every four years to elect a man in each county to represent you. Yes, but, they say, that does not fill the bill; when we come to a general election, we see two parties pitted against each other, and there are great questions which overshadow this question of ours, so that we are beaten out of the field and have no chance to get a fair expression of opinion. There is a good deal of truth in that, but it is also true, on the other hand, that if the temperance question does not burn itself to the topmost place in the general elections, that is fair proof that it has not the strong and wide basis it ought to have in order to find its expression and to maintain that expression after it has found place in the enactment of the law. Will it not be that every year this cause, struggling up through the superstructure of other questions, making its way to the front, will make itself at last the overpowering and overmastering question at the polls, and when it does that, it will have its own heaven given warrant for declaring it has in its favour the irresistible mandate of the people. That is my impression. Yet I acknowledge the difficulty. I have great sympathy with one of the strongest and best prohibitionist in his province, who, writing to me a couple of weeks ago, said: "Looking over the field, I have my doubts as to whether the sentiment of the country is strong enough to uphold a prohibitory law, if it were enacted to-day; but for God's sake give us a chance to vote for it outside of other questions." That brings me to the second proposed way of getting at the voice of the people, that is by reference to the people of the question alone, outside of the general elections, and without the disturbing influence of other questions. That is the referendum or the plebiscite, as you choose to call it. There are difficulties in the way. One of the chief difficulties is outlined by temperance men themselves, who, through the Dominion Alliance, which holds itself to be a strong exponent of the sentiment of the country, down through Methodist conferences, lodges of Templars and the like, say: We do not want any plebiscite; we want nothing but the good old British method of voting at the poll, when the man is before us, and when we embody, as far as we can, in our representative, the sentiments of the community; and that expression of the temperance people weighs with me and with this House against the proposal of a plebiscite or referendum. There is reason for their objection to that proposition. It is unusual, and people are properly a little chary about doing an unusual thing in regard to constitutional and political methods; but besides being unusual, it has this objection, that it is indefinite. Under the plebiscite the people would be asked to vote: "Are you in favour of prohibition or not," and they would mark their ballots "yes" or "no." But have they pledged in Parliament the representatives of the counties to prohibition? There is a general expression on the part of the people, but you have not concentrated that opinion in the individual representatives; and when these representatives meet in Parliament, unless they have a mandate from their constituencies to vote for prohibition or have pledged themselves specially to do so, they will not feel the responsibility resting upon them of carrying out the intention generally expressed. That is one of the chief reasons why the strong prohibitionists of this country are opposed to the referendum. There is this further danger, that if once you get this Parliament in the habit of sending back to the people any question which vexes it, you make that habit a custom, until you take away the strong power of representative institutions, by weakening their responsibility and making it possible for men, with the best intentions, whenever any question comes up which promises to be troublesome, to just refer it to the people and ask their advice upon it in their general capacity. These are the reasons for and against these two methods, and I do not hesitate to say to-night which of these I prefer. I believe in the old constitutional methods. I believe in the votes, from their places in this House, of the representatives of the people. I believe in the responsibility of the people's representatives here on the floor of Parliament; but I do not say that circumstances may not arise with reference to this question, which stands to a certain extent in a different position from others, which may render it necessary that, some time or other, it should go direct to the people; but if that practice is adopted in the country, it will bring many evil effects in its train. I wish for one moment to notice some mean insinuations that have been thrown across the floor to-night, that once I was a prohibitionist and temperance man, and that now I am not, and that the reason is that I now get seven thousand dollars salary a year. If any gentleman has the pleasure and the anxiety of holding a seat on the Treasury benches and goes through his work fairly and well, he will find that at the end of each year that he has had as many clothes as he can wear, and as much food as he can eat, and the chance to do as much work in one year as in any other capacity he would attempt to do in five, and that is about the sum and substance of it. It is not worth while for me to repel that insinuation. I do not propose to lower myself by doing so, but while on this point I wish to refer to another matter. The Montreal Witness is a temperance prohibitionist paper, and the Dominion Alliance is a temperance reform body, representative to a certain extent. But when the Witness proposes, as it did a few days ago, to say to a member of Parliament: "I have my eye on you. This is a resolution which I put in the hands of the hon. member for North Lanark, and I am going to watch every man, and every man who does not vote for that resolution I am going to mark as opposed to prohibition." Well, I believe in every man having his own opinion, as I believe in the Witness having its own opinion, but the time has not yet come when I, occupying a seat in this Parliament, propose to put my conscience and my judgment in the keeping of any paper or set of men. I propose to do what is honest and fair on this question, and I will make an honest confession before this House to-night. The only inconsistency which has been urged against me is that on one occasion I voted for immediate prohibition when Mr. Robertson, of Shelburne, brought that up as an amendment. I did it, and I did it in a moment of weakness. I did it, not because I was convinced that the country was then ready for immediate prohibition, but because I felt that the lash was raised outside of that criticism and that anathema which would be hurled against me if I did not vote for immediate prohibition, and I voted for it. There is my candid confession. Take it, and make what you please of it; but from this time forth I propose to do what I consider to be right and honest, and I will do nothing further and nothing less. Now, after having made these few gentle and unemphatic remarks, allow me to state my position at the present time and what I am in favour of to-day. We never can have too much information. My hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) does not believe that the whitest and strongest light that can be thrown on this question can be too white or too strong for it. The man in this House who is not a temperance advocate, and has not read widely and studied deeply in regard to this subject, and it is not to the discredit of any one that he has not done so, if he proposes to deal honestly with this question as I know members on this side of the House intend to deal, must come to the conclusion that it is time to stop playing with the prohibition question, that members must make up their minds in regard to the facts of the case, in regard to what course is to be followed, must then say what they will do and must do what they say. In order to do that, we need the fullest information. In 1872 and 1873, there were very large petitions presented to each House of this Parliament. It is a mistake, I think, to say that the petitions laid upon the Table of the House this session were more influential or more numerously signed than those which were presented in 1873, 1874, and 1875. I have not the figures at hand, but I know that those were monster petitions. They came to a Government which was led by hon. gentlemen opposite. They prayed for prohibition. Select committees were appointed by both this House and the Senate, they made their investigations, and both of these committees reported in favour of immediate and total prohibition. But the House and the Government were not satisfied with that, and a commission was appointed to investigate the matter. The commissioners went to different countries and made a year's study of the subject and embodied their views in a report to the Government, and another resolution was presented to the House, and the great temperance convention which met in 1875 also passed a resolution in favour of prohibition. After all that, the Government did not pass a prohibitory liquor law, and I think Mr. Mackenzie stated, as his reason for not doing so, that he did not think the country was ripe for such a measure. Since that time, sixteen or seventeen years have passed, and the world's experience has ripened, and the history of temperance effort and of prohibitory legislation has taken a wide stride forward, so that now it occupies a significant and important position which it did not at that time. How many men in this House have studied what has been done during that period, and followed it closely? I think that every man in this House wants to know what has been done and to get at the results of experiments which have been made in other countries, if he desires to give an intelligent expression of opinion on this subject. During that time Kansas has been added to the roll of prohibition States, and Iowa has also been added to the roll of prohibition States. These laws have remained in force and I believe with great benefit to the countries which have adopted them. It is true that some people dispute that, but that is not my position. Why should we not learn the results of the world's experience in all these years. What I propose is not for the purpose of shelving the temperance question or the prohibition question, but for the purpose of getting information as to the most approved, the latest, the most reliable data. I propose that a Royal Commission shall be appointed to embody the results of the world's experience in regard to this question from 1874 up to the present time, and to make research and to collect all the facts and all the experience they can get, and lay before this Parliament the result of the experience of other countries and the data which they can obtain from them, which will be of the utmost advantage to the members of this House and will be helpful to the country as well. That will form a better basis for the consideration of this question than anything we have now before us and will enable us to arrive at a proper conclusion upon it. I have said more, perhaps, than I thought I should at the beginning. What I have said I adhere to. These are my convictions and I place them before the House and the country. I move in amendment to the amendment, that all the words after the word "that" in the original motion, and all the words of the proposed amendment be struck out, and the following words added instead thereof:—

"In the opinion of this House, it is desirable, without delay, to obtain for the information and consideration of Parliament, by means of a Royal Commission, the fullest and most reliable data possible respecting—

"1. The effects of the liquor traffic upon all interests affected by it in Canada.

"2. The measures which have been adopted in this and other countries with a view to lessen, regulate or prohibit the traffic.

"3. The results of these measures in each case.

"4. The effect that the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law in Canada would have, in respect of social conditions, agricultural business, industrial and commercial interests, of the revenue requirements of municipalities, provinces and the Dominion, and also, as to its capability of efficient enforcement.

"5. All other information bearing on the question of prohibition."

And it is only fair for me to state before sitting down that this resolution is drawn out very largely on the lines of the amendment of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), widened and broadened considerably in the scope which he had arranged for in his amendment; and, although, as he stated, there was no knowledge and agreement between myself or any member of the Government and himself in regard to that matter, his plan, in its essence, recommended itself to the Government, and this is simply a little widening and broadening of the principles on which he based his amendment. I hope that the House will adopt this amendment, and that good results will come to the cause of temperance and sobriety in Canada from the work of that commission.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that if ever a conclusion on any subject was at variance with the proposition itself, the conclusion which the hon. gentleman has offered to us in his amendment is such; it is totally opposed to the principles he has just laid down. The hon. gentleman stated that he was a prohibitionist at heart, and still believed in prohibition; he was not always required, as he said, to defend himself against the charge of inconsistency. Well, I will not go over his record to charge him with inconsistency, I will be satisfied to take his speech to-night and the conclusion at which he has arrived, because if ever two things were inconsistent, it is the proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman in his speech and the conclusion to which he has arrived. He stated that he was a prohibitionist at heart, that he still believed in prohibition, and that he would be ready to enforce it, but for one fact as to which he was not quite certain, and that was whether the public opinion of this country was ready to sustain and maintain a prohibitory law, if a prohibitory law were passed. In lofty language the hon. gentleman said that he would not hold a piece of gold against a ray of light, not even a handful of gold against a ray of light; but he said that judging from the experience of the past he had reason to believe that if a prohibitory law was passed to-day, it would not be enforced, and that the country would reap no better results from it than it is reaping to-day. What, then, would be the conclusion at which one would expect the hon. gentleman to have arrived? That we should have information as to whether public opinion is ready or not to sustain a prohibitory law. That would be the natural consequence. The hon. gentleman is ready to-day to take the responsibilities of raising a revenue, without the revenue derived from the liquor traffic, and he is ready to undertake the task of finding other sources whereby our coffers could be kept full—he would be ready to undertake all that if he could only know this day that there is in the country such a prohibitory sentiment that a prohibitory law would not remain a dead letter upon the Statute-book. This is all the information the hon. gentleman needs, before he asks Parliament to pass a prohibitory law. Now, Sir, this being the fact—and I put the case fairly, I put it in the very words, I believe, which the hon. gentleman has just used, that is the only proposition upon which he wishes to be informed, this is the only light which he asks for now. Now, let us look at the conclusion of his premises. Does he ask for this commission to enquire whether public opinion to-day is ready to sustain a prohibitory law? Does he ask whether the people would vote for prohibition if they were allowed an opportunity of voting upon the question? No, Sir, there is not a word of that. The hon. gentleman reviewed all the methods whereby public opinion could be tested on that matter. There was the plebiscite, he said, but he does not want a plebiscite, perhaps there might be objections against it. There is the old constitutional method, the old British method, that we employ to settle every question that comes up, that is by an election every four or five years when the people are called upon to pronounce their judgment. There is force, certainly, in the remark of the hon. gentleman that if to-day public opinion was seriously in favour of prohibition, it is probable that the voice of the people would make itself felt to that effect by sending to Parliament a majority of members ready to vote for it. But the hon. gentleman discarded all these methods, and he wants information, so he says, as to whether the people are ready, as to whether public opinion is in favour of prohibition. Let us look at what he proposes. He asks for a Royal Commission to investigate what? To ascertain what is to-day the public sentiment in regard to prohibition? To ascertain whether the people, if consulted, would give their decision in favour of prohibition? Nothing of the kind, but only, to ascertain "the effect of the liquor traffic upon all the interests affected by it in Canada." That, Sir, is the conclusion of the hon. gentleman who, a moment ago, said would not hold a piece of gold in comparison to a ray of light. Does he want to know what would be the effect of prohibition upon the material interests of the country? He would not be in doubt as to where he would get the revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. That is for your information, not so much for mine.

Mr. LAURIER. Oh, that is too charitable, and too thin at the same time. I do not ask for information; I am ready to vote on the propositions which are before the House. The hon. gentleman said a moment ago he did not want any information upon that subject, he was ready to find the revenue. Now, he wants to be informed:

"1. The effects of the liquor traffic upon all interests affected by it in Canada.
"2. The measures which have been adopted in this and other countries with a view to lessen, regulate or prohibit the traffic.
"3. The results of these measures in each case.
"4. The effect that the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law in Canada would have in respect of social conditions, agricultural business, industrial and commercial interests, of the revenue requirements of municipalities, provinces and the Dominion, and also as to its capability of efficient enforcement.
"5. All other information bearing on the question of prohibition."

Sir, this is only an unmanly attempt to shirk the question.

Mr. FOSTER. You have not given us your views yet.

Mr. LAURIER. I have given my views on this amendment.

Mr. SCRIVER. It has been said that history repeats itself, but if it does it affords us strange examples of contradictions in the conduct and utterances of public men, I think if there is any one person who listens to the eloquence, the very eloquent and forcible speech which the Minister of Finance made this evening and who heard the equally eloquent and forcible speech which he made some years ago, but who will admit that the hon. gentleman sees entirely new light, that he does not at all stand, notwithstanding his profession of being a prohibitionist still, upon the same grounds that he did in 1884. On the 5th March in 1884, Mr. Foster moved:

"That the object of good government is to promote the general welfare of the people by a careful encouragement and protection of whatever makes for the public good, and by an equally careful discouragement and suppression of whatever tends to the public disadvantage.
"That the traffic in alcoholic liquors as beverages is productive of serious injury to the moral, social and industrial welfare of the people of Canada.
"That despite all preceding legislation, the evils of intemperance remain so vast in magnitude, so wide in extent, and so destructive in effect, as to constitute a social peril and a national menace.
"That this House is of the opinion, for the reasons hereinafter set forth, that the right and most effectual legislative remedy for those evils is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes."

Mr. FOSTER. Those are still my sentiments.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. gentleman had no doubt at that time as to what the country requires.

Mr. FOSTER. Now show the inconsistency.

Mr. SCRIVER. I have some more quotations to make, and I prefer to make these quotations rather than to give any utterances of my own. They are altogether more forcible and powerful as arguments in favour of the immediate enactment of a prohibitory law, than any considerations I am able to present.

Mr. FOSTER. What a public benefactor I have been.

Mr. SCRIVER. I think you were, or aimed to be at one time, but I am afraid you have sadly fallen from grace. Referring to two or three points which the Minister of Finance has urged this evening as constituting a reason for taking very different ground from that he took in years gone by, I propose to read two or three quotations from the speech the hon. gentleman made on that occasion, and no one within the sound of my voice will fail to understand how strangely different his present position is from his position on that occasion, and he has laid himself, at least, open to the charge of inconsistency, if not of want of strict candor. The hon. gentleman, after speaking at some length of other aspects of the question, went on to say:

"There is another question which has agitated the minds of a good many, and is looked upon as a very serious objection to the passing of a prohibitory law. I allude to the loss of revenue to the country in consequence of this. I will not go into the moral question as to whether this revenue is obtained in a legitimate manner, as to whether it is right or wise for this country to batten upon the proceeds of this traffic, but I will simply quote the authority of a gentleman whom I am glad to see sitting in his seat opposite to me to-night, a gentleman whom a large majority of this House consider to be a very high authority upon financial matters. I allude to the hon. the Finance Minister, who last summer, on August 9th, at Westminster Palace Hotel, in London, made a speech upon Canadian liquor legislation, and in that speech he said:

"It has been my misfortune, or fortune, having been a great many years in the Government of my native Province of New Brunswick and in the Government of the Dominion, to hold the post of Finance Minister in all these Governments, and I have never heard but one opinion about the revenue question, namely, that it is of quite secondary importance, though it is, I admit, a more difficult thing with you. The revenue we obtain in the Dominion of Canada is probably five or six millions of dollars a year, and it costs $20,000,000 in providing it for us. No Finance Minister would remain long in office who would, in this day, propose a scheme for raising a revenue of $5,000,000 that would cost $20,000,000 to collect."

"Mr. Speaker, I think that, coming from such an authority as this, this House will accept the view I have propounded, and I do not believe that there are a great many people in this country who would not be prepared for the statement, that the hon. Finance Minister there made. There are not a great many people in this country who would not fully understand, that although direct receipts from this traffic would certainly be expunged from our revenue, still the improvement in the general commerce of the country, the improvement in the general welfare and well-being of our community, would be so great that the receipts in all other branches of our revenue would be increased correspondingly, and there would, practically, after the first year or so, not be any diminution whatever in our revenue from our tax-payers.

The hon. gentleman did not seem to have any doubt on the financial question at that time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question! question! dispense.

Mr. SCRIVER. We cannot possibly dispense with these quotations. It is only fair to quote the utterances of the member of Parliament against the utterances of the Minister. I really think the hon. gentleman's speech in 1884, was more convincing than his eloquent speech to-night. He proceeded to say:

"There is another point which I now come to, and that is, when we ought to prohibit. It is generally said that we should not prohibit until the country is quite prepared for that action; until there is not only an evident desire on the part of the country for prohibition, but also that the country should be prepared to sustain the prohibitory measure and to assist in carrying it out. I believe this is, to a certain extent, true: but I believe also, that one of the very best means of obtaining that happy period in the country's history is to commence by prohibiting. I believe that the very fact that a prohibitory law is in existence is one of the very best educating powers in the community. I believe that, by the legislative action of the Parliament, we may have a better influence upon the people of the country to bring them to that opinion than we can in any other way whatever."

What then is the use of a Royal Commission? The hon. gentleman continued:

"It is true that in years past moral suasion has been tried, and moral suasion has accomplished a great deal. Far be it from me in any way to detract from the noble efforts of those who have spent their time and labour in trying to improve the principles of the community upon this question, but I believe that, in conjunction with moral suasion, as an assistant and help to moral suasion, it is absolutely necessary that the Government of the country should propose a law, and should assist those who are trying this moral suasion to carry out that law and to enforce it. What has been the result in those countries where we have a prohibitory law? We find universal testimony to the fact that in those states and countries where the prohibitory law has been in existence the people have found the education which it exerted upon the community was the very greatest possible to be imagined."

The hon. gentleman then went on to speak of the effect of the prohibitory laws in some of these states. However, I will venture to give only another extract from the hon. gentleman's speech delivered in 1884. He said further:

"But there is another argument which we may fairly adduce. It is very inconsistent for the Government of any country to license people to sell intoxicants, and thereby encourage intemperance, while at the same time they pretend to be educating people in favour of temperance. Certainly it is a very ineffectual mode of educating people in favour of temperance by precept, when by practice the Government educate people in favour of intemperance. So long as we may be told that the liquor traffic is perfectly respectable, that it is acknowledged and fostered by the Government, that traffic cannot possibly be considered disreputable, or immoral, or wrong. It is very difficult for us to preach when we do not practice, and I think, Sir, that it is the duty of the representatives of the people to take the first step in practising that which they are endeavouring to preach to the people.

"Now there is another objection very often urged against prohibition, and that is that prohibitory legislation cannot succeed, and must necessarily be ineffective, and conducive rather to evil than to good. I believe we have not to go outside the limits of our own country to see the fallacy of this argument. I come from a county in which a prohibitory liquor law has been in existence for a long time, and I can emphatically say that, while it has not accomplished all that we desire it should accomplish, while it has not been absolutely and entirely enforced, still it has accomplished so much good that the vast mass of the people in that county would regret exceedingly to see it repealed. Nay, more, they would strenuously resist and forbid the repeal of that law, and any agitation in favour of such repeal would meet with a most determined opposition. I think I am justified in saying this when I recall the fact that the other day I presented to this House a petition signed by 1,200 or 1,500 of the electors of my county, asking that this resolution, in favour of which I am now speaking, should be passed by this House. If the Dunkin Act, which has been for many years in existence in my county, had been inoperative, if it had produced more evil than good, if it had not, at all events, accomplished some of the good which was expected of it, it would have been quite impossible that so large a number of the most intelligent electors in my county should have asked for the passage of a resolution in favour of prohibition. Instead of that, they would have sent petitions here asking that the resolution be rejected, pointing out how prohibition had failed in its effect. We know that in a large number of counties in this Dominion the Scott Act also has been in force, and although, no doubt, there are conflicting opinions in regard to its action, still the simple fact remains, that in every district I know of where this law is in force, the liquor-sellers and those who wish to obtain liquor, together with the manufacturers of such liquor, are opposed to such law, is to me a convincing argument that that law has done harm to the traffic. I believe if we could obtain evidence from these counties where prohibitory laws are in force, the evidence would be overwhelmingly in favour of prohibition."

I beg to remind the House that it was after such utterances as these that the hon. gentleman gave the vote he did give in favour of Mr. Robertson's resolution. He says he gave it in a moment of weakness. Well, he does not do justice to the powerful arguments he used as a reason for giving the vote he did give. Those arguments, I am sure, were convincing to a great number of hon. members who listened to them, and would be equally convincing if repeated to-night. I have felt it to be my duty, as well as my pleasure, to quote the utterances of Mr. Foster, M. P., against the utterances of the Hon. Mr. Foster, Minister of Finance.

Mr. FLINT. We have heard from the Minister of Finance probably one of the most extraordinary confessions ever made in Parliament by a public man, that he voted on an important public question in a moment of weakness and in consequence of appeals made to him by certain parties outside of this Legislature. Is the time coming when we will have another confession from the Minister of Finance, that the resolution now moved by him in this House, was moved by him in a moment of weakness also; that it was the result of a lash of some kind; and that threatened with penalties inside of this House or outside of this House he has put forward this motion? Comparing the motion made by the Minister of Finance on this important subject with the speeches with which he has ornamented the question of prohibition during the last fifteen or twenty years, I think that we will see that a great change has come over the spirit of his dream and that some motive—I will not attribute any improper motive to him—but some motive of an extraordinary character must have influenced a man of his character and position in this country to take the extraordinary stand he has taken on this question to-night? What are the conclusions the Minister of Finance lead us to? We find the country agitated from one end to the other on a question of great economic and moral importance; we find the Table of this House overwhelmed and overburdened with petitions upon this question, asking the House to take certain action with regard to the passage of a prohibitory law; we find certain amendments suggested to the House by representatives of the people, one looking to a vote of the people on this question and another looking towards an enquiry upon the subject. And, after the able speech, the eloquent speech, and the powerful speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance, as that hon. gentleman is always able to deliver, and for which he has no greater admirer than myself, we find he has simply adopted in another form an amendment of one of his supporters and looking to the same end. I will make some practical criticism upon the speech of the Minister of Finance which I submit to the consideration of the House. In the first place, we are to be treated to delay, we are to be treated to a costly commission to gather facts which have already been gathered, facts which the hon. gentleman himself has given to the public, facts which are within the reach of every member of this House who wishes to make any effort to gather them, facts which are well known from one end of the country to the other, and facts upon which the whole prohibitory agitation which has led to this discussion have been based. The country is well aware of the effects of the liquor traffic upon all the interests concerned in Canada. We require no expensive Royal Commission to sit one or two years to lay these facts before the Legislature: the country is well aware as to the measures which have been adopted in this and other countries with a view to lessen, regulate, or prohibit the traffic. An expensive Royal Commission paid by the people of this country to gather facts already in their possession will not add anything to the educational influences which are already before the people in connection with this subject, and so every conclusion which has been suggested by the mover of this amendment has already been settled by committees of this Legislature, by the able addresses which have been delivered in Parliament during the past fifteen years, by the vast amount of literature which has been poured forth by the press of Canada during the past quarter of a century on this subject and which is within the reach of every person within this Dominion. But, Sir, assuming that we have an expensive Royal Commission, that we have half a dozen gentlemen roaming throughout this country and other countries, we have at the end of this period a bulky report circulated at immense expense, interesting I grant you and replete with valuable information—but the main question is left precisely in the position it is now in after the lapse of two or three years. The Government will still be groping in the darkness for some practical means to carry into effect the will of the people, and to pass a prohibitory liquor law which, according to the arguments of the hon. the Minister of Finance himself, will be of incalculable benefit to every man and to every interest in this country. I say, Sir, it is a lame and impotent means of evading a direct pronouncement upon this question, and if it is carried into effect we will be in precisely the same position two years hence as we are to-night. The question of a plebiscite will still be open for discussion and consideration, the probability of a prohibitory liquor law being enforced by the people of the country will still be open for debate, and after years of delay and a heavy expenditure of public money we will not have advanced one step in the matter. I think it would be more manly and more in accordance with the disposition this Parliament has manifested in treating other subjects, that the representatives of the people in this House should vote at once either for or against the principle of prohibition. As there are large numbers of members in this House who have some doubts as to whether the electorate of the country is in favour, by a large majority, of prohibition, the Legislature to-night, or as soon as practicable, should come to a conclusion as to whether they should submit this question to a plebiscite or otherwise. Personally, I am opposed—and chiefly for the reasons given by the Minister of Finance—to the idea of putting this question before the people by a plebiscite or referendum. The reasons I have given against the appointment of a Royal Commission will apply to this also. After having placed the question before the people, after having referred it to the people at the polls, suppose the people have given a substantial yea to the question thus submitted to them, the Legislature will find itself in precisely the same position it is in to-night, as to how best to deal with this question, and the personal feelings or political proclivities of some hon. gentlemen will still be bound to interfere with the carrying into effect of a strong and reasonable and practical prohibitory law. I think it would be far better than all ulterior questions should be laid aside and that Parliament should, at as early a date as possible, decide on the principles of prohibition and leave in the hands of the Government or other competent authority the framing of a prohibitory law. I agree with what has been well said by the hon. mover of the resolution (Mr. Jamieson), that it is not the desire of the temperance people of this country, who are forcing forward with the utmost energy they can bring the necessity of a prohibitory liquor law, it is not their desire to bring that about in such a way as to destroy or injure suddenly any great interest connected with this question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was not that a subject of discussion in the Alliance whose resolution this is? Was not the question of the Legislature dealing with immediate prohibition the subject of discussion in that Alliance, and was not this resolution framed by the Alliance as a hard and fast resolution for immediate prohibition?

Mr. FLINT. I believe the resolution of the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) was a resolution suggested to him by the Alliance, but even if it had not been suggested to him by the Alliance——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then let me say it is the resolution we are voting on, not the hon. gentleman's opinion.

Mr. FLINT. I am speaking now in regard to the whole question rather than to the amendment of the hon. Minister of Finance. I was saying that assuming that on a plebiscite the people would show themselves in favour of the law, we would then be in precisely the position we are in at the present time with regard to taking any practical steps to carry out the will of the people; and I think that, even at the expense of some delay, it would be better that Parliament itself should come to the conclusion to enact a prohibitory liquor law; then the Government would be required by Parliament and the opinion of the country to enforce it as they do any other law on the Statute-book. I am not disposed to admit that the question of prohibition is so different from any of the other great questions of legislation as to be treated in any exceptional manner. However, the question has been so fully dealt with by the hon. Minister of Finance and the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that it would be unfair to the House for me to dwell any further upon it at this hour, and I will only conclude by saying that I trust that the resolution of the hon. Minister will not be accepted by the House, but that we shall reach some definite conclusion on the main question, or on some collateral question more closely connected with it than is suggested by a proposal for a plebiscite, a commission or anything of that kind. I am strongly opposed to the amendment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to say a word or two before the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance is voted upon by the House. With regard to that motion, I entirely concur in the remark of my hon. friend beside me, that it is wholly beside the speech which the hon. Minister addressed to the House. That hon. gentleman proposes that the House shall recommend a Royal Commission on this subject. Why should the House take the responsibility of recommending a Royal Commission to His Excellency the Governor General out of the hands of his constitutional advisers? We may appoint a committee in the promotion of public business, or to investigate or obtain information on a subject requiring the action of Parliament; but the appointment of a Royal Commission is entirely in the hands of the Administration, and it is usually employed for the purpose of getting information for the Government to enable them to submit to the House some proposition relating to the administration of public affairs. Now, the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches do not require a vote of this House to enable them to appoint a Royal Commission. But, Sir, the appointment of a Royal Commission, under this motion, as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has most conclusively pointed out, is for the purpose of getting information which will not in the smallest degree assist us in dealing with this question. I apprehend that a large majority of the members of this House are in favour of prohibition. The only question upon which the friends of prohibition are divided is whether such a measure can be made practically operative in the country. Upon that I have already expressed my opinion. For the reasons that I gave at an earlier period of this discussion, I am of opinion that such legislation should be preceded by a proper ascertainment of the opinion of the country on the question, which can be most readily and most effectively had by a plebiscite. Now, I do not agree with the hon. Minister of Finance, that this would be in any degree a departure from the principle of responsible government, or would in any degree weaken the practice that has heretofore prevailed on the part of representatives of the people, of assuming the largest possible degree of responsibility in dealing with public questions. The object of obtaining a vote of the people upon the question is to ascertain whether they really desire a measure of prohibition or not. I believe that such a measure, if carried into operation with fair efficiency, would be of very great advantage to this country; but I am of opinion that a measure which would simply close the houses now licensed to sell liquor or the places licensed to manufacture it, and leave every person free to engage indiscriminately, without any fear of the law in the sale, with which it is proposed to do away, would be a worse state of things than that which we undertake to remedy; and I would like some assurance that there would be an efficient enforcement of the law before I would undertake to put such a measure on the Statute-book. The difference between a measure of this sort and ordinary measures which the representatives of the people are called upon to enact, is that there is no constant, active public opinion required in order to make ordinary laws efficient. If you put on the Statute-book a law against forgery or a law against theft, the number of offenders is very small, and the immense mass of the people, the entire community I may say, are in sympathy with the enforcement of the law, and are altogether against the offender. That does not hold good in the same way with regard to sumptuary legislation, and you must have a healthy, active, strong public opinion behind your law in order that it may not be inefficient. For that reason I am desirous that there should be ascertained in the simplest possible way, that is, by popular vote, the opinion of the country on this question. What the hon. Minister of Finance has proposed does not bring the House any nearer to a solution. It does not enable us to ascertain what the opinion of the country is. These hon. gentlemen may appoint a commission; they may summon witnesses; they may take evidence; but what is it all about? About the evils of intemperance? Why, Sir, we know them. About the amount of money that is obtained from licenses? That can be easily ascertained; it is a matter of no consequence. About the amount of revenue that would be displaced? We know that already. About the appliances that are to be employed for making good any deficiency that would arise from the adoption of such a measure? That is the business of the Minister. He has all the means of obtaining information now, without a commission at all. A more inconsequential proposition than that which the hon. Minister of Finance has submitted to the House could not well be conceived, so remote is it from every practical consideration which it is possible to give to the question. Now, the Minister of Finance said that the former Administration had not gone as far as the petitions desired it should go. Well, the Government of that day did assume the responsibility of dealing with that question. We had a majority in Parliament, and we did not seek to shirk the responsibility of dealing with a question upon which public opinion was being agitated.

Mr. BOWELL. How?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We introduced what was called the Canada Temperance Act, which is an optional law. It is a law which may be brought into operation anywhere, whenever public opinion chooses to bring it into operation. The Canada Temperance Act is rightly styled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Queen against Russell, in which their lordships said: It is a measure of prohibition for the whole country, but it is a measure which is left in abeyance until public opinion in the various localities chooses to bring it into operation.

Mr. BOWELL. Was not that after this House had authorized the Government to appoint a committee to travel through the United States and obtain information?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If I remember rightly the House appointed a committee, and the committee conducted the enquiry, but the Government themselves appointed a commission.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman does not go quite far enough. That committee recommended certain action to be taken, which is almost in the line of the motion made by my hon. friend on my left, and the Government acted upon it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly, at that time we made enquiry, and were largely influenced by the opinions of our friends in New Brunswick, who had tried a prohibitory law which was made universally operative over the entire province. It was however inefficient, and in the vast majority of places it was not enforced at all. In two years it was repealed, and nearly every one who had assisted in putting the measure on the Statute-book was defeated in the elections. We were all of opinion, after very carefully considering the subject, that legislation in advance of public opinion would do more harm than good : and it is because I still hold that view, I am anxious to know precisely what is the state of public opinion in this country upon this question ; and that can be ascertained by plebiscite more accurately than by any other method ; and that being the case, I am opposed to this proposition for delay. I am opposed to this proposition to obtain information which has been already obtained, and I am in favour of a referendum in order that the opinions of the people of the country may be ascertained on the subject, The proposition which the hon. Minister submits has no relevancy to the question before us.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We have learned to-night that the Finance Minister in the past has had moments of weakness. He has told us so, and in one of those moments he voted in this House for a prohibitory resolution. I wonder if the hon. gentleman has one of those weak fits upon him now.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; I feel quite strong.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wonder if the resolution which has emanated from his brain is the result of weakness or of power. He was good enough to tell us to-night that in the future he would be more honest. Had he not done so, some of us might have had some suspicion about the honesty of his course in the future. After I had in a playful manner said, when the hon. gentleman asked the hon. member for Lambton to read all his speeches, that life was too short, was the Finance Minister in a moment of weakness when he indicated that I was not in a condition to understand them if I did read them. The hon. gentleman may have thought that I who am always in a condition to know what is said in this House, would tolerate an impertinent and false charge such as that. My position is so secure, wherever I am known, that the imputations of such a man as he will not be listened to by any hon. gentleman in this House. I have been in this House for a good many years, and during all that time hon. gentlemen know well that I have never been in other condition in which I was not able and ready to attend to legislation, when the Finance Minister, from the position he has attained, casts, after the playful exclamation I made use of, an imputation of that character upon me, I would perhaps be justified in not replying to it and may be now demeaning myself by noticing a statement of that character coming from the source it did. It may be possible that I, who never, in the discharge of my public duty, referred to the personal characteristics or to the frailty of any member in this House or out of it, I may see fit, on some occasion, to serve back to the Government the meed and measure that they deal to me on the other side. I may yet be obliged to do it, and I think, if I invite a comparison to be made between my record and that of the hon. gentleman, I have no reason to blush either for my friends or for my record. I listened on one occasion to the Minister of Marine, when he made a statement of the same character as that to which I have just referred. I considered the impertinence and the source it came from so contemptible that I did not reply, nor would I reply to-day did I not think it possible my silence might be construed into an assent. But I tell the Finance Minister and every other gentleman in this House that I am prepared to discuss my career and record, either as a temperance man or in any other relation they choose, and if the Finance Minister will throw down the gauntlet and will give opportunity for a discussion——

Some hon. MEMBERS. To-morrow.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the policy on the other side, but I am here to take it up to-night. I have tolerated those calumnies, and have lived through them. The hon. Minister of Finance says that public men are liable to be misrepresented. The best evidence that the charge made by the hon. Minister of Finance was false, was the fact that it was made by him. Take his record on the temperance question. The first session he came here he delivered a lecture on prohibition which lasted some six hours. He was then prepared to sacrifice everything in order to secure that boon. At that time, the Minister of Finance was enjoying his indemnity here, and he was enjoying a large source of revenue from his temperance lectures. His sources of income were well known to the people of this country, and I do not object to his obtaining his livelihood by those means. At that time he thought prohibition was a necessity, and by advocating it he reached the Treasury benches, and, after he reached the Treasury benches, not one word, not one act, nothing does he do but to discourage the measure upon which he rode into power. That is the gentleman who tried falsely to impute to me to-night a statement which he knows to be false and to be a calumny and a slander. I will not imitate him by investigating his career further than as a public man. I will not be drawn out of my course by any scandalous imputation he may make upon me, a false and scandalous imputation which every member of this House knows, and which the hon. gentleman himself knows, to be a false and scandalous imputation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must call the hon. gentleman to order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. SPROULE). I think the hon. gentleman is violating the rule which says that no member should use offensive imputations against another.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the Minister of Justice is just, why did he not call the Minister of Finance to order when he made that imputation against me ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, you have ruled the hon. gentleman out of order, and he must withdraw the expression.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am going to withdraw. I said he made a scandalous and a false statement against me. He made both, but I withdraw them both.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is an evasive statement and is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. When unparliamentary expressions are used, the member who uses them must withdraw them absolutely, without any qualification whatever.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend has objected to most offensive language used by the Minister of Finance against him, and he has protested against an imputation upon his character. If he is not allowed to refute and deny any such imputation, there should be some change in the Rules or in the fair-play allowed in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the expressions of the Minister of Finance were unparliamentary, he should have been called to order at the time.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not the point.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The question of order is before the Chair.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to speak to the question of order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No one denies that the hon. gentleman has a right, as the leader of the Opposition has said, to defend himself, and to deny and refute any insinuation made against him in strong terms, but he must keep within parliamentary language. He has just admitted that he said that the Minister of Finance made a scandalous imputation which is false, and that he knew to be false.

Mr. MULOCK. As I understand the point upon which your ruling is asked, it is this: The Minister of Finance made a statement reflecting upon the character of my hon. friend from East Grey——

Mr. LANDERKIN. South Grey, if you please.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend from South Grey. He denies that, and says that the imputation was false and scandalous. If an imputation is made against a member of this House, surely he has a right to say that it is untrue.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, Mr. Speaker——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Chair has not yet decided the question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We are discussing the question of order. I think the well understood rule is that you may characterize a statement as being untrue and false, but you cannot charge the member who made it personally with being a liar, or say that he is stating what he knows to be untrue. You can characterize the statement as untrue, but you must not accuse the person of stating what he knew to be untrue.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member said both. He said that the statement was untrue and scandalous, and that the Minister of Finance knew it was so.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In order to stop any further discussion on that point, I will bow to the wish of the Speaker and withdraw the statement, and I suppose that is all that is necessary. I do not know that it is necessary, but, if the Minister of Finance will see that he has done me an injustice and will have the manhood to get up and say so, the discussion will end, and I will give him the opportunity of doing so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman has finished, I desire to make a few remarks on the subject now before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have the floor still. I only asked whether the Minister of Finance had the manhood to withdraw that statement or not?

Some hon. MEMBERS. What is the statement?

Mr. LANDERKIN. He knows very well the statement he made.

Mr. FOSTER. I really do not know what all this is about. If the hon. gentleman or any hon. member on that side will mention the statement I used against the hon. gentleman which was false and scandalous, I will withdraw it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I heard the statement.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Justice cannot have the floor the whole time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) would have the right to refer to what the Minister of Finance may have said in respect to him, but it is rather late to call the Minister of Finance to order for what he may have said, and to which attention should have been called at the time, if it were necessary.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I bow to that decision, as I do to all the decisions of the Speaker.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has risen to give the information asked for by the Minister of Finance from any member on this side.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has asked any hon. member on this side of the House to state the words used by the Minister of Finance in reference to the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). I was here at the time, and the words he used were: "the hon. gentleman is not in a condition to be quiet." I would like to know what the hon. the Finance Minister meant by that?

Mr. SPEAKER. I must say that this question is exceeding all bounds, If the expression used by the Finance Minister was an unparliamentary one, the attention of the Chair should have been called to it at the time. We cannot discuss it now, whether it were unparliamentary or otherwise. I did not hear the expression used by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), but if, as stated by the Minister of Justice, it was that the statement of the Minister was false, and he knew it to be false, it certainly was unparliamentary, but I suppose I am to understand that the member for South Grey withdraws that expression.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That question having been solved and the Minister of Finance having screened himself behind the ruling of the Chair and allowed an imputation like that to rest against me, I will conclude that he has taken another of his weak fits, has got one of his parliamentary fits—if it were in order I would say something else; and the Speaker, and the Minister of Justice, and some other members on that side of the House might come to his rescue. Now, I could carry this case further, I could reason it out with him in its entirety, I could go along his career since he entered the House, and I could consider his position, his variety of positions on this question, ever since he came to this House and some time before; I could follow him up and down the lines when he went around with his carpet bag and when he was lecturing on this subject. I will not do that, I am not going to do anything of that kind, nor do I impute any fault to him for that. But when he makes a specialty of this subject, gets into the House on this subject, gets into the Government on this subject, and just as soon as he gets into the Government, then he shelves this subject, and puts his prohibition into the pigeon holes of the department, and never mentions it again in the House, then, I have a right, as a public man, and he being in the Ministry, to criticize his conduct, and I will do so. It appears to me that it is a proper question for me to discuss, and it is a proper question for this House to discuss, and I tell him that it matters not to me what opinions he may entertain of me or of my course in the House. But there is this about it: I believe the people will think that these momentary weak spells which he has are not always momentary, and that they will last for a considerable season; and there are some people in this country who will believe that these weak turns will last as long as he is in the Dominion Cabinet and gets his salary. A great many people will believe that. I think I am quite parliamentary when I say that. He chooses to make imputations against me, I am not going to make imputations against him; but I believe there are some people who will take that view of the case. As to the language in which he refers to the press, as to the sneers that he makes at the Montreal Witness which tried to impress this truth upon the country, as to his declaration that he would not allow the press to dictate to him, and as to the terms in which he speaks of the press that endeavours to carry out the principle which he says that he admires, I will leave that with him and them to settle; but I will not allow him, nor will I allow any other member of this House, to get up and make statements about me which are false, which are not correct, as long as I am in this House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I want to say a few words on the subject which was before the House an hour ago. As regards the question which has just been under debate, I confess I was not able to follow the argument if any, and I shall not attempt to reply. I will only express my regret that the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) should have indulged in language which seems to me entirely uncalled for by anything which transpired this evening. I think that hon. member will be willing to admit himself that he is in the habit, I will not say in the habit, but that he occasionally indulges in the practice, of throwing remarks across the House in a loud tone of voice while members on this side are speaking, in a way that is rather disagreeable to a gentleman who desires to carry on his argument to the House without interruption. He did so while the Minister of Finance was speaking, and the Minister of Finance made a retort at the moment which I may not have fully heard, but which I certainly did not interpret in the offensive sense in which the hon. gentleman seems to have received it. I think the hon. gentleman might have regarded it—I certainly did at the moment—as a playful answer to playful badinage on his part, which is very often rather a rough kind of play. I do not intend to say anything more upon this subject than to express regret that this episode has taken place, and that the hon. gentleman has seen fit to resent what was said to him in answer to his interruption in a way that seems to me to have been quite uncalled for. I want now, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words upon the subject under debate, and but a very few words considering the lateness of the hour. For the greater part of the evening, since the Finance Minister resumed his seat, the question which has been dealt with by hon. gentlemen opposite who have endeavoured to answer him, has not been at all pertinent to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) or to the sub-amendment moved by the Minister of Finance; but the all important question, it would appear from the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, has seemed to be not the merits of prohibition, not the merits of a proposition to make a public enquiry for the information of the people who are eventually to decide this question, but the more important question, overshadowing all others, seems to have been whether inconsistency can be found between the speech of the Minister of Finance this evening and some speech he made at some other time. The first hon. gentleman to criticize his consistency was the leader of the Opposition, against whose remarks I have nothing to say but this, that the friends of the Minister of Finance are quite willing that the contrast shall be made between the speech of the Minister of Finance, which was frankness itself, which stated the views that he held on this question from the time he entered Parliament down to this moment, and admitted an error he had made once, and the speech of the leader of a great party who resumed his seat without daring to express his opinion on this question. I also think we are willing, if I may pass now to one of his supporters, to contrast the record of the Minister of Finance upon this question with the speech and the record of the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), who resumed his seat after occupying the time of the House, agreeably it is true, because he was reading eloquent passages from the speeches of the Minister of Finance, but who left us in such doubt as to where he was upon the question, that I had to ask three or four members beside me whether he was a temperance man or a friend of the liquor traffic.

Mr. SCRIVER. You will have no doubt when he votes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will have no doubt after he votes, and I hope that hon. gentleman who threw a taunt across this House about history repeating itself, will not repeat his own history when I remind him that in 1877 he was afraid to vote that a prohibitory law was the true remedy for the evils of the liquor traffic. A member of this House, in 1877, moved that a prohibitory law was the true remedy for the evils arising from the liquor traffic—that was the first part of it, and the second part of it was that it was the duty of the Government to bring in such a measure. The member for Huntingdon shirked behind the pretext that there was a question before the Supreme Court as to who had power to legislate on the question of prohibition, and he voted that the words "a prohibitory liquor law is the true remedy for the evils of the liquor traffic" be struck out of the resolution. He promises us that we shall know more about how he will vote, so that we shall know more about how he feels than we have ever done since 1877. I desire to offer a few observations with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as regards this question. I entirely agree with him that on a question of such great importance we ought to be certain before coming to a conclusion as to whether public sentiment has reached that point of determination, assuming it to be in favour of prohibition, as to ensure the full enforcement of the Act after it is passed. I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell too as to the propriety of passing laws of this kind, sumptuary laws as he designated them and as they are generally designated, as to which public sentiment may not be in full accord. But where I differ from the hon. member for Bothwell, and where it seems to me the argument obliges us to part is on this point: The hon. member for Bothwell says that with a view to ascertain that he desires at once to test public opinion by a vote. Now what is the logical conclusion of the hon. member for Bothwell on this point? It is this, that although he has been a member of Parliament for a long period of years, a leading and fully imformed member of Parliament, better informed and better experienced than the great majority of us here, after all his experience, his reading, his contact with the people and the study of this question, yet he, a public man, is unable at this moment to come to the conclusion as to whether public opinion of this country is strong enough to warrant the passage of this measure, and he proposes to leave it without information to the electors, not one in a thousand of whom has the information and knowledge he has on this question. What is the difference between that proposition and ours? It is that at every phase of this difficult question we shall gather in the most authentic way the largest and fullest information that can be obtained in this country and everywhere else, not for the purpose of informing the Minister of Finance—and that sophistry was in all the arguments we had from the other side—not even for the information of the Government alone, but for the information of this House, as a basis for future action and for the information of the electorate, to whom the hon. member for Bothwell proposes we shall eventually refer this question. If he, with all the study and experience he has been able to bring to bear on this question, is unable to come to a conclusion, surely he may consider that the electors can be enlightened by information obtained by means of a Royal Commission. Then there was the equally illogical strain in the hon. gentleman's argument as to the unconstitutionality, or the impropriety from a constitutional point of view, I had better put it in that form, of this question being investigated by a Royal Commission instead of by the Government. The hon. gentleman declared that the Government was here, that it should give the information to the public, and was the constitutional committee of this House for such a purpose. But the hon. gentleman illogically then came to the conclusion that while the Government was qualified to deal with this question and get the information, this Parliament, which is constitutionally bound to legislate on the question, was incompetent and must ask the people to legislate for it. There ought to be very little uncertainty as to the basis of a proposition of this kind. The resolution of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) sets out on its face more fully than the sub-amendment does the nature of the information which is required in this country. After all the discussions which have taken place on this question it is true that members have been able to tell us what the loss of revenue to Canada will be, but I have not heard any view of the question as to what the provincial losses will be as regards provincial revenue, what losses the various municipalities of this country will be, what the loss to the carriers and other branches of industry and commerce will be, and also the loss to the men engaged in the industry that will be put out of existence by the adoption of a prohibitory law. Moreover, we have had no information within the last 17 years as to the working of prohibitory laws restrictive of the sale of intoxicating liquors in other countries of the world. If it was right, as I suppose it was, as I have no doubt it was, for the Government composed of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1874, under the report of a joint Committee of both Houses, to issue a Royal Commission and send their commissioners throughout the United States to get information on this point, surely now after, as the Minister of Finance has said, new states have been added to the roll of prohibitory states, after 17 years have elapsed, is there any impropriety, any unconstitutionality in making the same enquiry now, and even enlarging the bounds of that enquiry, so as to ascertain what, under the altered conditions of our country, the effects of a prohibitory measure would be upon our own people? If the Government now is the best qualified body to get this information and lay it before the House, I presume it was so in 1874. But in that year the course now proposed was adopted. I will not detain the House, as I might have done at an earlier hour in the evening, in showing that time after time in Great Britain, not only on kindred subjects to this, but on this subject itself, enquiries have been made year after year as to the working of laws to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors even in the British Isles themselves. No less than three Royal Commissions have been issued within the limits of Great Britain as to the working of the license laws in that country, and they have collected information and laid it before the public and Parliament for the purpose of informing the public mind, as well as the mind of Parliament, as to all the facts and circumstances surrounding the question. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) expressed to the House a strong preference for a decision of this question by a plebiscite. For a moment I wish to present to the House a few of the objections to that proposition; I will state them very briefly and not elaborate them considering the hour of the night. I think that course is open to a very grave objection, not only because it is or is supposed to be repugnant to the theory of our constitution, but because it pratically weakens the power of this Parliament for all time to come, to say that it shall abrogate its functions in discussing any public question and leave that to the people to decide, instead of its being decided by the men whom the people have sent here to deal with that and every other question that may require the action of Parliament. I can easily conceive, to say nothing of the theoretical objections, that in future years when measures may be brought forward to which vigorous opposition will be raised in this House or in the country, a clamour to do the same thing would be raised, and we would find in all our future experience in Canada that the precedent set on this occasion was not only a departure from our constitutional theory but a very inconvenient one in practice; there would be no safety, no security, and very little strength in this Parliament until that precedent was virtually wiped out, so far as regards its authority and its force for all time to come. That is, however, only my opinion upon the question. I say that assuming I am wrong upon that point and that at a future period this Parliament should say

I am wrong, I do believe that if this question in all its intricacy is to be submitted in the form of a plebiscite, then the information which it is proposed to get by this commission and to circulate by this commission throughout the country is more important than ever. To come back to the argument with which I have started; if this information is needed here—and this debate shows it is needed—for these considerations, and this evidence, and these facts which we desire to enquire into have not been discussed by anyone here who pretends to be a master of them, if they are needed for the deliberations of this House, undoubtedly they are ten times more needed by the people who are to vote upon this question should a plebiscite be adopted. For these reasons I trust that the amendment which the Minister of Finance has made will be adopted. I am reminded by an hon. friend near me that the proposition to submit this question in the form of a plebiscite, even if we are disposed to it, would not settle the question, and that mode of disposing of it—if it can be called disposing of it, but I should rather call it a shirking of the question—that mode of disposing of it for the present has been denounced and discountenanced by the very organization which has entrusted this resolution to my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). For these reasons I hope that the amendment will be adopted, I hope, to use a simile which I will borrow for the occasion, that this House either upon the question of a plebiscite or upon the broader question of prohibition, will not risk the safety of the ship of State in seas the soundings of which have never been taken. I do believe, Sir, that the information which will be asked for and obtained by this Royal Commission will do a great deal more to form and enlighten public opinion throughout the country on this question than any member who has spoken on the other side of the question has been willing to admit this evening.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I beg the House to be assured that at this early hour of the morning I do not propose to enter upon any lengthened discussion of the question before us. I have one or two ideas to present and I shall present them in very few words. I may be allowed to remark with reference to the opening sentences of the Minister of Justice's speech that his promise was sadly marred by his performance. He attempted to lecture hon. gentlemen on this side of the House because they did not confine their arguments to the question in dispute, that they had entered on the question as to the consistency or inconsistency of the Minister of Finance and he deprecated that the time of the House should be wasted with such fruitless discussion. He had no sooner ended his denunciation of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House for their supposed breach of parliamentary rules, than he himself entered on a criticism as to the consistency of my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver). The hon. member for Huntingdon needs no defence at my hands and I should imagine that the course he took on the occasion to which the Minister of Justice refers would need no defence in the mind of any lawyer. The hon. gentleman knows that at that time the question as to the powers of this Parliament on the liquor legislation was in dispute. He knows that the question had been carried to the Supreme Court of this Dominion, that it was sub judice and the opponents of Government for the purpose of snatching a party vote had asked the House to pass a legal judgment upon a question which was then sub judice before the Supreme Court of the Dominion, and my hon. friend the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) acting with a discretion which I should expect from a gentleman of his prudence and years, declined to usurp the position or to exercise the functions which should be discharged by the judges of that court. That is the amount of the inconsistency of the hon. member for Huntingdon. I have to make a remark on a personal matter which has arisen very unpleasantly to-night. The Minister of Finance is charged with having used language of a most personal and offensive character against one of the most respected members of the Opposition in this House, a gentleman who has sat here for many years with credit to himself and to the constituency he represents, and a gentleman whom I think both sides of the House will unite with me in saying, that, whatever may be thought of his political opinions, there is not a man in the House at present or a man who ever sat in the House with him, who does not respect his personal character. I am quite sure that when party passions subside there is no one on the other side of the House who will defend the unwarranted attack made upon him in an indirect way, and if the hon. the Minister of Finance did not intend to make that attack personally offensive, when the opportunity was afforded him by the member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) it would have become his position and his dignity if he disclaimed any offensive intention. This is a matter of opinion, but the hon. gentleman knows that if that kind of innuendo is introduced, it is a two-edged sword which can be used by both sides of the House. Now, as to whether we should vote in favour of a Royal Commission, or vote to refer this question to the people, I am in favour of referring it directly to the people, because this House has already passed its opinion upon the subjects which you now desire to refer to a Royal Commission. If my recollection serves me aright, the last time the House discussed and voted upon the question of prohibition, it decided that it was prepared to carry out the necessary legislation to enact prohibition on one condition and one only. The House was satisfied with regard to the information it had, the House was satisfied with regard to the effect prohibition would have, but the House was not satisfied as to whether public opinion was ripe for it, and subject to that qualification, and to that qualification alone, the House declared, by an enormous majority, that if public opinion was ripe for prohibition, it was quite prepared to carry it into effect. If the country is now ripe for prohibition, I ask the House to have the manliness to do what it said it was ready to do three years ago, and to carry out the pledge it gave to the country. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that the reference to the Royal Commission does not embrace any mode of testing public opinion, and that the only point upon which you are not satisfied is the one point that you did not refer it to the Royal Commission to decide. You refer to that Commission to take evidence and to find out what would be the effect of the prohibition, but you have already determined that you know enough about that, and the Minister of Finance in his speech to-night declared that he himself was ready to vote on the effects of prohibition in this country. Although one pities the miserable inconsistency of the hon. gentleman which is apparent in his conduct, yet one cannot but admire his audacity when he said that although he once voted for prohibition he did it in a weak moment. But, Sir, upon this point—and it is one as to which we ought not to quibble about consistency or inconsistency, because it affects not one man, but the honour of the House—not only the Minister of Finance, but the House has pledged itself by an enormous majority that when it once became satisfied that public opinion was ripe for prohibition, it would be ready to enact such a measure. That is the only question we have to satisfy ourselves upon, and how are we to satisfy ourselves upon it? Simply by taking a vote of the people, either in the ordinary constitutional way or in the way of a plebiscite. Sir, the arguments advanced by the hon. Minister of Finance, who I may say holds a brief for the liquor interest to-day, against taking the vote in the ordinary constitutional way, are insuperable.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to state that I hold a brief for the liquor interest.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, if the hon. gentleman will tell me for whom he does hold a brief, I will withdraw my charge, and make it consistent with the facts.

Mr. BOWELL. If he were half as well paid as you were for the short time that you held a brief, he would be very well paid.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is very pertinent to the subject. I admire the appropriateness of the remark made by the hon. Minister of Customs. It is intended to be personally offensive, but owing to the fact that it is so appropriate to the discussion, I will forgive him the intrusion. I want to know if we can test public opinion by the ordinary mode——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question has been raised as to whether the hon. gentleman was in order in charging the hon. Finance Minister with holding a brief for the liquor interest. I may say that I hope the hon. member will withdraw that expression.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly, Mr. Speaker, if you are of opinion that that expression should not be made, I do not need any argument upon it—I will bow to the Chair and withdraw it without any hesitation. Sir, on the question whether we could test public opinion in the ordinary constitutional mode at a general election or not, the hon. Minister of Finance—who does not hold a brief from the liquor dealers, but who alone knows for whom he does hold a brief, which is on the opposite side from the brief which he held when he spoke four or five years ago—has convinced me that we cannot test public opinion properly at a general election. Every hon. gentleman knows that at a general election there are one or two prominent questions which divide the great political parties; and he knows that nine-tenths of the electors vote on these great questions—questions of state, questions of policy, financial questions such as that which were argued at the last general election—and he knows that a very small fragment of the people are prepared to say: We have no interest in these great questions of state, and we are going to vote on this one little question of whether we shall have prohibition or not. Every practical politician knows that you may go on for the next twenty years as you have been going for the last twenty years, and so far as the general elections are concerned you will never be able to deduce from their results, whether a preponderating mass of the people are in favour of prohibition or not. Sir, I base my argument on these two propositions: First, that you have been discussing for nearly a quarter of a century whether the people are in favour of prohibition or not, and after having held a dozen elections you have never been able to come to a conclusion; and, secondly, you have declared by a resolution that when you can come to a conclusion, you will vote in favour of that conclusion; and, I now say that, that being the case, if there is another proposition which holds out a fair prospect of enabling you to form a conclusion, although open to some objections, such as novelty, you are bound to accept it. When I last addressed the House on this question, I stated that if an opportunity were afforded to me, I would move directly and squarely that this question should be submitted to the people, and I had a resolution prepared to move in the following words if my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had not anticipated me:—

"That all after the word 'That,' in the original resolution, and all the words of the amendment be struck out and the following substituted:—

"In view of the large number of numerously signed petitions presented to this House from all parts of the Dominion, praying for the passage of a law prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and in view also of the continuous agitation existing on the subject, and the inutility of passing such a law unless supported by a decided majority of the electorate, and the differences of opinion now existing as to the wishes of the electorate, this House is of opinion that the question of passing such prohibitory legislation should be submitted directly to the electorate at an early day in the form of a plebiscite."

That resolution has nothing vague or uncertain about it. It leaves the question, divorced from all other questions, to the people, the source of power, whose opinion we should take as our guide, and it will enable us to carry out the pledge which we have embodied in the resolution carried in this House before, and will, I think, meet the wishes of the better class of prohibitionists and the better class of thinking men in this community.

Mr. JAMIESON. I have only a word to say. In the first place, I must express my regret at the turn which the debate has taken. It has been the object of the temperance people of this country as far as possible to separate this question from party politics, and it was the desire of the temperance people, whose spokesman I am on the present occasion, to have this resolution discussed upon its merits, entirely aside from any political complications. I may say further, in reference to the suggested amendment of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) that as I stated before, so far as I understand the sentiment of the temperance people of this country, they will not and cannot accept a proposition to submit this question to a plebiscite. If that amendment were passed, I have no hesitation in saying that the temperance people would not fight the question at the polls, because such action would be in direct opposition to their sentiment on the question. So that any amendment of that kind would be entirely abortive, so far as bringing forth any proper fruit is concerned. Now, I must say, in reference to the amendment of the Minister of Finance, that I was not aware of the character of the amendment until it was read here to-night, and so far as I am concerned, as the proposer of the resolution before the House, I cannot at the present stage accept the amendment of the Minister of Finance. My desire is to get an honest and square expression of opinion upon the question of prohibition pure and simple. At the same time, I am bound to say that I am not opposed, and I believe the temperance people are not opposed, to all possible light being thrown upon the question. We do not fear investigation, but believe the more light obtained the greater strength our cause will have. Under other circumstances, I would not object to that proposition, but under present circumstances I must object to it, because I want an expression of opinion upon the motion and not upon the amendment. But, if any good is to be got out of the commission, if any information is to be obtained by it, I for one, if it came up in the proper way, as a substantive motion, would not oppose it. I trust this question will not be indefinitely postponed, but that next session all necessary information will be before the House, when I, for one, if I still retain the confidence of the prohibitionists, will endeavour to press it again upon the consideration of Parliament.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say that, in view of the statement made by the representative of the temperance party in this House to-night, I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. Minister of Finance. I stated in my constituency to the temperance people there, that I would support a resolution to leave this matter to the people at once, and I believed that that would be satisfactory to the temperance people; but, as I now understand it, it will not be satisfactory to the temperance people, and I think the proposal of the Minister of Finance the most reasonable one to adopt, and I will support his amendment.

Mr. FRASER. I do not wish, as the seconder of the resolution, to be considered as agreeing in the statement made by the mover. The temperance people are ready to have the question submitted to the people and voted upon, and they want no law which will not be sustained by the large majority of the people.

Mr. JAMIESON. I desire not to be misunderstood upon this question, and if I apprehend correctly the hon. member for Guysborough he has quite misunderstood me. I have stated distinctly that my desire is to have a square vote on the question of prohibition, and that I cannot accept the amendment of the Minister of Finance. I did qualify that statement by saying that, under other circumstances, I would not object.

Mr. FRASER. I made no reference to that at all. I only wished to state that, as the seconder of the resolution, I do not accept the statement that the temperance people will not accept a plebiscite.

Mr. JAMIESON. I may tell the hon. gentleman that for the past fifteen years I have been a member of the Dominion Alliance. That question has been repeatedly before them, more especially during the last few years. And the hon. member for Huntingdon will bear me out when I say that, so far as the Alliance is concerned, they are absolutely opposed to a plebiscite. I have a resolution sent me from Hamilton a short time ago to that effect passed unanimously by a thousand people.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) to amendment, agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to on a division.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.55 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 25th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. MULOCK moved:

That it is desirable that any witness called before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, be examined under oath or affirmation touching any matters coming before them.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 116) further to amend the Inland Revenue Act.—(Mr. Costigan.)

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 117) further to amend the Exchequer Court Act. He said: The principal provisions of the Bill are four. The first is that the divisions of the Exchequer Court shall have jurisdiction to decide disputes between claimants to patents of public lands, where any dispute of the kind may be referred to the adjudication of the court, as, for instance, where a deceased person has become entitled to a patent if the patent has not issued and there are rival claimants to the estate. The second provision refers to cases in which a judge is disqualified from sitting. At present there are no means by which a substitute judge can be appointed, unless the judge is actually disqualified by interest. But there happen to be some cases where there are other reasons than actual disqualification to make it desirable that the judge should not sit, as, for instance, cases in which as Deputy Minister of Justice he has given an opinion. The object of the provision of the Bill is to enable a judge to be appointed ad hoc in such cases, and to make good his jurisdiction, notwithstanding that the regular judge may not have the interest absolutely to disqualify him in law. Another provision is to confer on the court jurisdiction between subject and subject, to give remedies in cases under the patent law in relation to copyrights and trade marks. Finally, the remaining provision is to introduce the interpleader practice in Exchequer Court cases.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When the hon. Minister refers to patents in lands, does he refer to patents that may be issued by one of the departments here, or to patents generally?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Patents to be issued from the departments here.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before taking up the Orders of the Day, I hope the House will allow me to draw its attention to an article which I find in Le Monde of this morning, in connection with the position which I took in this House on Monday night. The article, as I translate it, reads as follows:—

"MR. JONCAS VOTED WANT OF CONFIDENCE IN THE GOVERNMENT.

"Mr. Joncas was elected by acclamation at the last election. Until lately the member for Gaspé had almost always supported the Government; but he is of Liberal origin, and as the herring-keg will always smell of the herring, so now Mr. Joncas has retained the taste of his early years, and he now returns to his first loves, without any ado. Perhaps the best way after all to pass from under one flag to another is to march off in silence."

Mr. Speaker, Le Monde, of Montreal, has always made itself the mud-cart of the Conservative party since it came into existence. The editors of Le Monde, of Montreal, have made their paper the vehicle for all the filth with which the Conservative party wants to cover its opponents, and I am not at all surprised if I find myself a little besmattered with mud by the editors of Le Monde. I would not pay any attention to this article were it not for its giving me the occasion to explain the vote which I gave here on Monday night against the Government. The editors of Le Monde, Mr. Speaker, have such supple spines, they are so accustomed to crouch neath the whip that lashes them, they are so used to quietly and smilingly wipe away spittle thrown in their faces, if it pays them to do so, that they cannot understand independence of character in other people. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the motion of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, on Monday night, because I wanted to protest by my vote against the principle which seemed to have presided at the formation of the present Administration. I wanted to protest by my vote against the fact that the senior Privy Councillor of Her Majesty, the first lieutenant of the chief whose death has left such a great vacancy among us, the one we are still in mourning for, and whose loss will be long and keenly felt by the Conservative party, had been left aside. I wanted to protest against the complete ignoring of the man who for twenty-five years of his life, in weal or woe, fought by the side of the chief whose loss we lament. I had another reason, Mr. Speaker, for my vote, a reason personal to me, which it does not suit me to make public here to-day; but grave interests connected with my county were on the verge of being sacrificed, or I thought they were on the verge of being sacrificed to political gamblers, to parasites, to leeches, such as the editors of Le Monde, who take the best blood of the Conservative party for their own benefit ; and, Mr. Speaker, I will not suffer an injustice to be done to those who have entrusted to me the duty of representing them in this House, I will not sacrifice their interests in order to please individuals of the stripe of the gentlemen of Le Monde. Now, Le Monde says that I am of Liberal origin, and that I have changed my flag. Mr. Speaker, for twenty years of my life I have actively and honourably fought the battles of the Conservative party, I have fought them at my own cost and expense ; no one has ever had to pay me $80,000 in order to have me remain true to my party ; and I will continue to remain a Conservative and true to my party as long as the policy of my party will be acceptable to me, and as long as the interests of my constituents will be safe, as long as justice will be done to us. Mr. Speaker, I wish to improve this occasion to give a formal denial to an assertion which was made by the Liberal press after the last general election. It was asserted that I had pledged myself solemnly, and by writing, to support my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, knows as well as I do that there is no one in his party who can say that such a pledge is in existence ; that such a pledge ever existed ; that there was ever any question of such a pledge. Now, Mr. Speaker, Le Monde may continue to insult me in its columns, but I am thoroughly determined upon one thing. I ran as an independent Conservative at the last election in the County of Gaspé, and I mean to remain an independent Conservative. I mean to vote for my party, as I said before, as long as justice will be done to the interests that I represent ; but if the interests which I represent ever seem to me in danger I will in no wise scruple to vote against the party now in power, and if ever I come to leave the ranks of the Conservative party it will be because I refused to remain in the company of people whom I thoroughly despise, and who seem to be paid to insult the friends of the Conservative party.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON'S BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on the following resolution :—

That it is expedient, in order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company to construct a railway from the city of Winnipeg to some point on the Saskatchewan River, to enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and to pay for such services during the said term eighty thousand dollars per annum, such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the said railway.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DEWDNEY. The House will recollect that for the last two or three years the policy of the Government has been to connect the two extensive commercial arteries, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Saskatchewan district, by joining the Canadian Pacific Railway with the Saskatchewan River at different points in the Territories and Manitoba by branch lines of railways. Some two years ago, a resolution of an almost similar character to the one now before the House was presented. That was to grant a financial subsidy to a railway starting from Regina and running to Prince Albert, on same terms as those now presented to the House. Last year hon. gentlemen will recollect that an arrangement was also made by which we assured the construction of the road from Calgary to Edmonton. With regard to the construction of those two roads, I am glad to be able to state that they are commencing to realize what we expected of them, and a large settlement has been going in to both the districts served by these two roads, and especially on the western route. We have had deputations from some of the Southern states this year inspecting the lands of both these roads, and the reports from these delegates are of the most satisfactory character. With regard to the question of policy, I am quite sure the House will agree with me as it did agree with the Government in previous years, that it is one which cannot but be beneficial to the North-West Territories and Manitoba. A few days ago, I find that a gentleman, who has had an opportunity to study the country, and is well known to hon. members of this House, the Hon. Edward Blake, has stated, with regard to the Western road from Calgary to Edmonton :

"Certainly the development of the country must be greatly assisted by the branch lines to the fertile districts, both north and south, of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was essential that care should be taken that no consideration should enter into their location other than with the view of tapping the very best portions of the country."

Well, that is what the Government have done with regard to the line which is now under consideration, and which I may say, passes, almost from its starting point to the Saskatchewan, through as fine a section of the country as we hold in the North-West or Manitoba. The conditions upon which we ask the assistance of this House and the terms upon which we propose to give assistance to the company who propose carrying out the work are precisely the same as those given to previous companies. We propose that the company shall contract for the transport of men, materials, supplies and mails for twenty years from Winnipeg to a point on the Saskatchewan, at $80,000 per annum, to be paid on the construction of the railway from a point within the city of Winnipeg to a point on the Saskatchewan River, such payment to be computed from the completion of the railway to such last-mentioned point. The subsidy will be made payable in half-yearly payments and be assignable to trustees to secure the company's bonds on the whole or any part of the undertaking. The tariff rates will be the same as those agreed upon for the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway Company, and remain undisturbed for six years. And in case the amount earned by the company between Winnipeg and the point on the Saskatchewan River for Government service should not amount to the sum paid by the Government, one-third of the land grant earned will be kept to recoup the Government. At the same time the Government wish it to be distinctly understood that they are assisting this railway, not as the great Hudson Bay Railway which we have heard so much about lately, but on its merits as a colonization road. It is also understood that the company shall at no future time make any demand on the Government for financial assistance for the construction of the railway northward from the Saskatchewan River. The line originally located and which has been fyled within the Department of Railways, commenced at the city of Winnipeg, and ran along the eastern shore of Lake Manitoba to the Saskatchewan River. It is now proposed to probably alter the direction of that road in order to accommodate the very large settlement which is going in to what is known as the Dauphin Lake district. For the last eighteen months settlers have been flocking into that country, and constantly calling out for railway communication. I may state, for the information of hon. gentlemen, that the character of the country is excellent. I hold reports from different engineers who have been there, and who all express the opinion that it is one of the most valuable portions of our western country for settlement. There is no occasion for me to read extracts from these reports, but I hold them in my hand and will show them to any member who wishes to look at them. When I brought this matter up first in the House, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated he would like to have some idea with regard to what surveys had been made and the estimated cost of construction. It is estimated that the road can be built, the whole of its length, including rolling stock, station houses, equal to the Canadian Pacific Railway standard, for the sum of $15,000 per mile. I might also further state that a contract has been already let to the firm of Messrs. Mann & Holt, who have constructed the roads from Regina to Prince Albert, and are also now building the road from Calgary to Edmonton. The contract has been let to those gentlemen for the sum of $11,000 per mile for the line proper without the rolling stock. A land grant has been given for some years to this company to the extent of 6,400 acres per mile within the limits of Manitoba and 10,000 per mile from Manitoba to Hudson Bay—although we have nothing to do with the Hudson road proper beyond the limits of Manitoba and towards Hudson Bay. The land has been given in alternate sections on each side of the railway line. I may also state that the company is not exactly in the same position as the two other companies I have referred to. At that time an arrangement had been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway to operate the line six years. No such arrangement has been made in this case, but it is presumed that there will be no difficulty as to the operation of the road. With regard to the main Hudson Bay road, I may state that I have given my personal attention to that, and have come to the conclusion, after a good deal of study, that the road is feasible and the navigation sufficiently open to accommodate the traffic, and I believe, if constructed, it would result in cheapening the cost of transportation of our wheat produce some 15 or 20 cents per bushel. These are my own private opinions in regard to that line, but I may state further that the Local Government of Manitoba appear to have come to the same conclusion, because they have made to this company, if it continues the line we are now assisting from the Saskatchewan to Hudson Bay, a grant of $1,500,000. I hope the House will look favourably on this resolution, and that I shall be allowed to introduce the Bill, which I hope will be adopted.

Mr. SPOHN. Representing the constituency I represent, and coming from the part of the country I come from, I feel I would be false to my constituents, false to the Province of Ontario, and false to the Dominion of Canada, if I remained in my seat and did not protest against spending money for such a scheme as this. I consider that every dollar spent on this railway is thrown away and lost to the country. I must congratulate the Minister of Interior for the very plausible manner in which he brought forward his motion. He tells us that he intends to grant this subsidy only for a colonization road as far as the Saskatchewan. Do we not know that the building of this road depends on the Manitoba bonus, and that the promoters of this scheme will go to the old country and expect to float that scheme on the ground of the Manitoba grant and the grant they expect from this House, and do we not know that the Manitoba bonus depends upon the completion of the road to Hudson Bay? Therefore, I propose to discuss this as a Hudson Bay scheme and not as a colonization scheme. This is merely introducing the thin edge of the wedge. It is merely sugar-coating the dose, but although it is sugar-coated, the coating is too thin, and we get the bitter taste before we swallow the nauseous draught. I claim that this is a violation of all the policies of all the Governments of this country, who have spent so many millions of dollars in building the Welland Canal, the Sault Canal, and enlarging the St. Lawrence Canals, and in building the Trent Valley Canal. More than this, I object to an expenditure of this money for such a purpose, because I maintain that this is impracticable. I maintain that this road, if built, will be of no practical purpose, and I believe that the people who pay the taxes have a right to be heard on this question. I dare say some people will make money out of this road. No doubt the contractors will make money out of it, and it will be the old story over again. We have had too much of this kind of public expenditure in the past, and it is time that we should put a stop to it, and we should not spend money at this day unless it is to be of benefit to the country at large. I was pleased the other day to hear the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) stand up for the Province of Ontario and tell us that that province paid more than half the taxes of the Dominion, and that the city of Toronto itself contributed more to the taxes of the Dominion than the Maritime Provinces and the North-West put together. When this question comes to be decided, I hope the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) will vote as he speaks. I expect the members for Manitoba will support this Bill. No doubt they will all support it. We will probably, for the first time in the history of this House, find the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) and the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) sailing in the same boat. Of course, whether this road be completed or not, there will be a certain amount of money spent in Manitoba, and there will be a certain boom in consequence of that, but I believe I can show the House that, were this road built, it would be of no advantage to the Dominion or to the Province of Manitoba. I claim that, in questions like this, demanding a large outlay of public money, demanding that we go to the old country and ask for credit from the capitalists of the old country, on the endorsation of this House, these questions should be calmly debated and we should go into all the details in order to see whether this or that expenditure is feasible ; but, if ever there were a wild-cat scheme put before the people, I believe this is the scheme, and, whether it be started as a colonization road or not, it will be floated on the English markets as a road to Hudson Bay, and every dollar obtained on the English markets for the road to the Saskatchewan will be obtained for a Hudson Bay scheme, and therefore it will be obtained on false pretences, because that bonus from the Manitoba Government will not be given until the road is completed to Hudson Bay. Therefore, this House should discuss this question not as a local colonization road to the Saskatchewan, but as a road to be built to Hudson Bay, and and which can only benefit the contractors. In going into this matter, I propose to quote certain authorities, but before doing this I would remark that nearly all the statements and papers given us by the promoters of this road are slightly coloured. Take the question of distance : They claim that Churchill is 700 miles from Winnipeg. Every engineer will tell us, and every practical railway man knows, that, in following the curves of the streams and in making the necessary curvatures to get the proper levels, the length is increased to a considerable extent. I have it on good authority that, when this road is completed to Hudson Bay, instead of being 700 miles long, it will be over 800 miles. Then again, as to the distance between Churchill and Liverpool, it is stated that the distance is in favour of Churchill by a few miles. The distance from Churchill to Liverpool is stated at 2,926 miles, and from Montreal to Liverpool at 2,990 miles. In making up this statement, they follow the same line as in the other, and take the longest line from Montreal, by Cape Race. Surely, if the Hudson Straits are navigable, the Straits of Belle Isle are navigable, and that would be in favour of Montreal by 150 miles. This matter of distance is, however, of minor importance. Now, the distance from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay is 800 miles ; the distance from Winnipeg to Fort William is 426 miles, being a difference in favour of Fort William of at least 350 miles. It costs, to carry a ton of grain at present rates, 1½ cents a mile per ton, but grain has been carried, and grain can be carried, on railways at 7 mills per ton. If we take the lower rate at which grain has been carried, we find that we can carry it from Fort William, past Montreal, for less than the difference on the freight between Winnipeg and Churchill. What I mean is this, that what we gain by the difference in favour of Fort William will carry grain past Montreal to Liverpool. Now, I do not propose to take up your time by discussing the navigation of Hudson Bay, because that has nothing to do with this question at all ; but I propose to discuss the navigation of the Hudson Straits, because through the Hudson Straits every vessel must pass, and whether Hudson Bay is closed or whether it is open, matters not. If the Straits are closed, then navigation is closed ; consequently, I propose to confine my remarks to the navigation of the Hudson Bay, and I will try to make them as brief as possible. We know that the Alert established several stations through these Straits ; I do not propose to take up every one of them, but only the principal ones through which navigation must pass. In doing this I shall quote from Lieutenant Gordon's report. We find that vessels going into Hudson Bay cannot pass the straits before August. The Alert, on 7th May, fitted up with stores on board, with the members of the expedition, sailed out from Halifax at 11 a.m. Surely this was early enough to try the Straits. Now I will quote from his report :

"On June 15th, at 5 p.m., made the edge of the ice about 35 miles east of Cape Resolution, the ice, though heavy, was slack ; steamed in, working as near course as possible. At 1:30 a.m. of the 16th made the land—Cape Best The ice was now run tight together, so we banked the fires and left the ship to pull under a foretopsail and F. T. staysail. From June 15th to July 6th we were drifting with the ice. At times the ice would run abroad and then the ship was worked under steam or sail, in whatever direction seemed most promising. I append hereto a chart on an enlarged scale, showing approximately our drift in the ice."

This shows the condition of things at the eastern end of the Straits. The Alert passed through, planting observation stations at different points. —

"On the following morning, August the 4th, observed a vessel in the ice in the Straits, supposed to be the Hudson's Bay Company's ship Diana, bound for Fort Chimo. The ice was so thick around the shore that it was with difficulty we were able to work our way into the harbour (Port Burwell), and when in there the ice was jammed so tightly that I walked from the ship to the shore without difficulty. Arrived at Churchill August 31st, soundings all the way across the bay. We made Knightshill Beacon at 8 a. m. of the 31st, and anchored in Churchill harbour at 2 p. m. the same day. Stopped at Churchill to survey harbour. Started on return voyage September 7th. On the morning of the 7th, we left Churchill and shaped course across the bay ; no field ice was met with except a few scattered pans lying off the south-east end of Salisbury Island ; there were, however, quite a number of icebergs, sometimes eight or ten being in sight at one time."

Now follows the ice record at Nottingham Island :

"NOTTINGHAM ISLAND, STATION NO. 5.—ICE RECORD.

"[September, 1884.]

"1st. Closely packed ice extending across the Straits.
"2nd. Ice moving with the tide, large field near Cape Digges, not much change in appearance from yesterday.

"[October, 1884.]

"1st. Clear water in middle of Straits, heavy pack along the shore.
"2nd. Straits full of ice as far as can be seen, no open water visible.
"3rd. Ice loose, body of pack has moved east.
"4th. Fog bank to the south in a.m. ; in p.m. cleared and showed heavy field of ice lying north and south to the east of the island, clear water to south-west.
"5th. Snowstorm ; ice packed on the shores.

"[November, 1884.]

"24th. Heavy ice closely packed in the Straits.
"25th. Heavy ice moves east and young ice forms in the Straits.
"26th. Straits opposite are frozen as far as can be seen.
"27th, 28th, 29th, 30th. Ice solid and immovable extending in every direction.
"31st. Ice east of here moving to north-east, ice to south remaining stationary."

This shows that navigation was closed before 24th October. I will now give winter record :

"[January, 1885.]

"1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th. Ice solid in every direction.
"5th. Snowstorm.
"27th. Drifting snow.
"28th. Ice packed closely in every direction.
"29th, 30th. 31st. Straits completely blocked.

"[February, 1885.]

"1st. 2nd, 3rd. 4th. Ice packed solidly in every direction.
"5th, 6th, 7th. Snowstorm and drift.
"8th, 9th, 10th, 11th. Straits blocked with heavy ice.

"[March, 1885.]

"1st, 2nd, 3rd. Ice solid in every direction.
"4th, 5th. Snowstorm and drift.
"6th. The Straits to the eastward is clear of the heavy ice and is now covered with a smooth sheet of young ice.
"23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th. Heavy ice closely packed in every direction."

I give this report to show that there is no possible chance for winter navigation by the Straits, as some promoters have claimed. I will continue to read the record :

"[April, 1885.]

"1st. Clear water shows to the east and north-east, but ice is closely packed.
"10th. No open water visible.
"11th. Snow falling and drifting.
"12th, 13th. Straits in every direction closely packed with heavy ice.
"14th. Snow falling and drifting.
"29th. Strait completely covered with ice.
"30th. Snow drifting.

"[May, 1885.]

"1st. Snow drifting.
"2nd. Heavy ice, closely packed, with ice in every direction.
"3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th. Heavy ice in every direction.
"29th, 30th. Straits completely blocked.
"31st. Three or four small patches of open water near the station, elsewhere the ice is closely packed.

"[June, 1885.]

"1st, 2nd. Ice closely packed.
"6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th. Ice closely packed.

"[July, 1885.]

"8th, 9th. Straits covered with ice, somewhat scattered on the 8th, closing upon the afternoon of the 9th.
"10th. Straits covered with tight fields of ice. * * *

"[August, 1885.]

"1st. Compact and heavy ice to eastward.
"4th. Heavy ice is still visible to the eastward.
"5th. Ice has all moved east towards Salisbury Island; Straits to south-west completely clear, and clear water extends some miles to the east of this station.
"6th. Ice is still closely packed to the south of Salisbury Island, and seems to extend to the southward.
"7th. Ice south of Salisbury Island is moving this way; elsewhere the Straits are completely clear.

"PORT LAPERRIÈRE (CAPE DIGGES), STATION NO. 6.

"[October, 1884.]

"1st. Heavy ice both in Bay and Straits, with open water channel showing occasionally. * * * *
"21st. Drift ice in the Straits all day as far as can be seen.
"22nd. No open water visible in the Straits.
"23rd. Same as 22nd.
"24th. Bay, Straits and harbour frozen solid with new-formed ice.
"25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st. All the ice solid; no water to be seen in the Straits. The 23rd seems to have been the last day on which navigation would have been possible.

"[November, 1884.]

"1st, 2nd. No water visible."

Sometimes the ice shifts, and there may be streaks of open water, but I have given the conditions as found by the observers at these dates. I will pass over the winter and take up spring navigation.

"[July, 1885.]

"8th. No alteration, ice tight everywhere.
"9th, 10th, 11th. Ice still remains solid.
"12th. From the Island for five or six miles the ice is broken and drifting, beyond that the pack is close.
"13th. Foggy.
"14th. No open water in the Straits. * * *

"[August, 1885.]

"4th. Weather thick, could not see any distance.
"5th. Ice close in Strait in a.m., but in p.m. ice was broken and scattered.
"6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th. No ice in Strait * * *

"ICE MET WITH ON THE VOYAGE OF THE 'ALERT.'

"Our observations show that during the first half of the month of June, a belt of ice varying in width from 30 to 50 miles, extended the whole length of the Labrador coast, from Cape Chudleigh to Belle Isle. Off the entrance of Hudson Straits at this time the field extended from 35 to 100 miles to the eastward of Resolution Island, and on the 16th of June when I endeavoured to enter the Straits the ship was beset in heavy ice about ten miles to the S.W. of Cape Best. This ice was very heavy and some of it in large sheets, but at the turn of the tide the pack generally slacked off a little when the ship was worked on under steam or sail as opportunity offered; this state of affairs continued until the 4th of July, when, owing to the damage done to the ship, we had to return to St. Johns. Except on one occasion no large amount of open water was seen from our masthead, the ice always seeming to be tight to the westward of the ship. I measured the thickness of many of the pans: some were 22 feet, but the common kind was floe ice, about 10 feet in thickness. On the 4th of August when we got back from St. Johns there was still a great deal of ice in the Straits and some of the pans were of great size, many of them being over half a mile in length.

"NOTES ON THE ICE MOVEMENTS IN HUDSON BAY AND STRAITS, 1768–1769.

"Capt. Falconer states: 'In the month of July, when the above Hudson Bay Company's ships commonly get their passage through the Straits outward bound, it is almost blocked with ice, some of which is aground in 100 fathoms of water, * * and this with the large quantities of floating ice makes the passage dangerous, and detains the ships, some years, till the latter end of August, before they get clear of the Straits.'

"The ice mentioned in the above quoted paragraph as being aground in 100 fathoms of water is undoubtedly intended to apply to icebergs, some of which I have myself seen aground in from 80 to 100 fathoms. On the north side of the Straits some of these large masses of ice getting aground at high water of spring tides will remain fast for weeks if they do not break up. Capt. Falconer states that the Bay was only navigable from the latter part of July to the middle of October."

I propose to give some extracts from Captain Hawes' report. Captain Hawes has made fourteen voyages to Hudson Bay. He places the probable period of navigation for steam vessels properly fitted for ice work as seldom exceeding three months, 15th July to 15th October :

"As to the closing of the navigation in 1884, Mr. Laperrière reports, at Cape Digges, that on 25th October the ice was solid in every direction, and at Nottingham Island a similar entry is made on the 27th. A distinction must be made between the closing of navigation by the formation of young ice, and the presence of a large field of heavy old ice which is cemented together by the formation of young ice between the pans. In the first case any ordinarily powerful steamer could go through without risk, but in the second case the most powerful of the whaling or sealing steamers would be helpless. The western end of the Straits is always subject to incursions of this heavy ice, from Fox Channel, and especially so in the months of September and October, when strong north-easterly and north-westerly gales are frequent.

"HUDSON STRAITS.

"In Hudson Straits, for the first 20 days of August, the ship was always in the ice; the average surface water temperature for this period is 31° 3."

I have given you a report of the experience of the expedition during 1884 and 1885, and will now give 1886, as you might think 1885 an exceptionally bad year. To give a better idea I will quote instructions from Hon. Mr. Foster :

"'OTTAWA, 22nd June, 1886.

"'To LIEUT. A. R. GORDON, R. N.,
"'Halifax, N. S.

"'SIR,—With reference to the voyage of the Alert and the work to be performed under your charge for the present season, it is desirable that you should be guided by the following instructions, which are intended rather as an index of the general wishes of the department, than as an absolute direction from which you are under no circumstances to deviate. Changes that may be rendered necessary, by circumstances now unforeseen, and other work than that indicated which may appear to you proper to be done during the course of your voyage, are to be within your own discretion, always bearing in mind the purpose of the expedition, and the time at your disposal.

"It is desirable that you should proceed to the mouth of Hudson Straits with as little delay as possible, so as to avail yourself of the very first feasible opportunity to make the passage through. If you are prevented from at once entering the Straits, you will occupy your time in taking accurate observations of the extent and condition of the ice, the prevailing winds, and the currents at its mouth.

"'At the earliest possible period consistent with the safety of the expedition you will push through the Straits, in order that to demonstrate the earliest date of opening navigation and the time required to pass through the ice, noting carefully all the incidents of the passage.

"'Unless necessity exists for visiting any of the stations, of which you will be advised by the system of signals agreed upon, you will not lose any time in visiting them during your outward voyage.

"'It would be well to delay your homeward voyage through the Straits to as late a period as is consistent with safety and the labour involved in gathering the men and plant of the observing stations, in order to gain whatever data you can as to the condition of the Straits at the latest period of navigation.

"'The observers, the houses and all portable and valuable articles at the stations you will take on board the Alert on your return voyage, and bring them with you to Halifax.

"'You will bear in mind that it is the wish of the department to demonstrate as far as possible the navigability of the Straits, for purposes of commerce, in point of time and facility, and anything that will conduce to that end the department relies upon you to do to the limit of the means placed at your disposal.

"'I am, Sir,

"'Your most obedient servant,

"'GEORGE E. FOSTER.'"

As you see, Sir, the Government took every pains and every precaution to ascertain the truth and the proper condition of the "Straits" during these years. If, on examination of these reports, we find that these "Straits" are not navigable I submit it is the highest folly to grant any money towards the building of this road. In making this voyage the spring had every appearance of being favourable, and when they left Halifax it was supposed they would make an early voyage. They say:

"We commenced this voyage with every hope of making an early and successful passage of Hudson Straits, as the news from Newfoundland was that the ice had left the Labrador coast, and that the season, so far as the movements of the ice were concerned, was an unusually early one. Our subsequent experience showed that certainly, all along the Labrador coast, and to a less extent in Hudson Straits, the season was earlier than last year.'

"From the 11th to the 19th July the ice covered the Straits from 'Emma Island' to Cape Digges, and through this 200 miles we worked, every time the ice opened gaining something, if only half a mile. Much of this ice was heavy old ice, and of such a nature that no ordinary steamer which could be used as a freight-carrier, even if strengthened and sheathed for ice, could, in my opinion, have passed through at this time without injury.

"On leaving harbour of Digges Island on the morning of the 25th the ship was again beset and only got clear on the following morning. After this date we met no ice which would in any way have interfered with navigation.

"Captain Guy, of the steamer Arctic, one of the most powerful of the Dundee whaling fleet, has kindly furnished me with notes, from his experience in Hudson Straits this year, and the following is taken from his communication:—

"'The Arctic left St. John's, Nfld., on 16th May, and proceeded northwards, making the ice at the south side of Cumberland Gulf on 25th May, intending to go into the gulf; the ship was, however, beset about ten miles from Monumental Island, wind being from the eastward, and drove from there around the south side of Resolution Island into Hudson Straits, still fast in the ice, and only got free at the Lower Savage Islands on 2nd June.'

"Capt. Guy found the S.W. ice extending to the east of Resolution Island and Cape Chidley, about 40 to 50 miles tight, with from 10 to 20 miles of slack beyond that.

"From the Lower Savage Islands to Ashe Inlet, Capt. Guy says they had no trouble, but the voyage occupied from 2nd to 5th June, and the distance is only 150 miles: we must admit that the progress of the Arctic was not very rapid.

"After leaving Ashe Inlet, Capt. Guy states that he found the ice much heavier, being now from 15 to 20 feet thick; proceeding north-westward, he got up into Fox Channel as far as Cape Queen: here, however, he found an impassable barrier of ice, and tried to cross the channel to the westward: this was also impossible, and so the Arctic headed south, watching for a slack place to enter the barrier of ice. From the 20th June to the 25th July, the Arctic was steaming between Cape Queen and Charles Island, trying to get into Hudson Straits, and only reached the western end of the Straits on 26th July, or five days after the Alert had got through and into harbour at Port Laperrière.

"A little loose ice was met with early on the morning of the 28th, but otherwise there was nothing of interest occurred, and we arrived and anchored in Churchill harbour at 5.15 p.m. on the 29th, having made the run from Cape Southampton in forty-six hours.

"From 30th July to 3rd August, we were engaged in making a survey of Churchill harbour. A copy of this plan has been forwarded.

"The harbour at Churchill is formed by the mouth of the Churchill River, which empties itself into Hudson's Bay at that angle in the coast lying between Cape Churchill and Seal River. Between these points the older rock formations come right down to the sea.

"We remained here till Friday, the 20th, at 3 a.m., on which day we left for Marble Island, steaming up the western shore of Hudson's Bay.

"22nd. Arrived and anchored in outer harbor at 10 a.m. On the Deadman's Island I found a letter from Capt. A. P. Benton, of the bark Wave, which read as follows:—

"'MARBLE ISLAND, 1st August, 1886.

"'Wintered in the outer harbour in company with the George and Mary. Had a mild winter, but cold and backward spring, the thermometer not reaching 30° till 19th May. Commenced cutting trenches 18th March, but did not get out till 16th day of June. The G. and M. got out 12th June.

"'Cruised all over Hudson's Bay the rest of June and July. Saw only one cow and calf, got her, 145 brls. Spoke George and Mary 16th July, clean, bound to Repulse Bay; she saw one whale but did not get him.

"'Welcome full of ice; did not see a whale there. On 16th July the ice extended from Whale Point across to Cape Harding. The whale I saw was on the 2nd day of July; saw nothing in June.

"'In February scurvy began to come on the crew. First natives came to the ship 21st April; bought one deer, afterwards bought five more deer. In middle of May things looked blue. The 28th May we were sawing ice in nine fathoms of water, and the ice was on the bottom. We used between the two barques nearly forty bomb lances to blow the bottom of the ice out. The pack was fast to the floe, 1½ miles, ever since January; could not do anything with it. The 1st of June the pack broke off from the end of Deadman's Island and afterwards we got along quite well, sawing. The ice in the harbour was 7½ feet thick. Nearly one-half of the crew of both vessels were down with the scurvy and the remainder more or less afflicted with it; but we got along quite well after we got out. All are in good health now.

"'I leave here to-morrow for a short cruise and home.

"'ANTHONY BENTON,

"'Master of barque 'Wave,' New Bedford, Mass.'

"September 7th. At 5 p.m. left Port Laperrière for Nottingham Island, steaming dead slow. At 11 p.m. weather rather foggy; met a lot of loose ice, off the edge of which we lay till daylight.

"September 8th. At daylight sighted Nottingham Island, and at 8 a.m. arrived in Port de Boucherville and anchored. All hands were immediately put to work getting off the stores and taking down the house, the whole work being completed and the ship at sea again at 6 p.m. the same evening.

"About Nottingham Island there was a good deal of loose ice, which, though nothing to seriously affect navigation, was heavy old ice, and was undoubtedly the advance guard of the pack of old ice coming down from the north, but appearing somewhat earlier than in 1885.

"September 9th. After leaving Nottingham Island the wind again began to freshen from the eastward, with a rapidly falling barometer; it blew fresh all day of the 9th, and before midnight it was blowing a whole gale. This continued all day."

I now give the experience of Nottingham Island for 1885-86:

"PORT DE BOUCHERVILLE, NOTTINGHAM ISLAND.—ICE RECORD.

"[September, 1885.]

"27th. Ice all round, and has come close to shore to the northward. No open water visible to north-east or east.

"28th. Ice formed on the harbour; field ice covering the Straits in every direction, with small spots of open water showing.

"[October, 1885.]

"1st. The pack has drifted back again, and is to-day nearer the shore to the northward than yesterday.

"3rd. The ice is now tight and compact in every direction; from the top of a hill some distance inland, a little open water shows near the horizon between south and east; elsewhere no water to be seen. The bay to the north of the station is frozen so that the seals can lie on it.

"4th, 5th, 6th, 7th. Ice in every direction, slackening and tightening with the tide; at times large lakes of open water show."

I pass over the winter and come to the summer again.

"[July, 1886.]

"9th, 10th, 11th. No open water in sight.

"12th. S.W. wind has blown the ice off shore.

"13th. Ice to the northward and between here and Salisbury seems compact, but the Straits to the south must be nearly clear as we could hear the sea breaking on the outer edge of the ice near the shore to the south.

"15th, 16th. Ice tightly packed on the shore; no open water.

"17th. Ice loosened out a little and some open water shows in places.

"18th, 22nd. Ice remains loose; much open water.

"23rd, 24th. Open water along shore, but ice visible on the horizon.

"25th, 26th. Ice swings in a little occasionally, but it is always loose and much broken us.

"28th, 8 p.m. Ice packed tightly in all directions.

"29th, 30th. Not a particle of open water to be seen. Ice packed tightly to the horizon."

"NOTES ON THE ICE IN HUDSON STRAITS AND BAY.

"In considering the question of the quantity and movements of the ice in Hudson Straits, the first point that arises is whether the only ice to be met with there is that formed in the immediate locality, or whether there are sources of supply beyond.

"We have now had voyages on three years to Hudson Straits, and it is certainly legitimate to assume that we have not met with all the kinds of ice which are at any time to be found in these regions. I consider that they may be divided into three types or classes: First, there are in Hudson Straits at all times of the year, icebergs; second, up to the end of July or beginning of August there is much young floe ice, by this is meant the ice which has been formed during the winter immediately preceding. Its thickness is variously reported from 7 feet 6 inches at the harbour on Marble Island to 3 feet 10 inches at Port Burwell, in the eastern entrance of the Straits. A mean between these two measures would be, I consider, a fair average for the thickness of this class of ice, when met with in Hudson Straits, say somewhere about 5 feet of solid blue ice; covering this ice is a sheet of snow packed solid and as hard as the ice itself, and, like the ice, of varying depth. In the month of July 2 feet would probably be the average depth of this cap or crust of snow, thus making the total depth of ice and snow together from 7 to 9 feet.

"The third type of ice is what I called in my first year's report the 'heavy Arctic ice.' This ice is of every thickness, from 10 to 40 feet; it is the product of many winters in which it has been growing in thickness, both below by freezing, and above by the accumulation of the successive winters' snows.

"Port Laperrière and Nottingham Island. During the season of 1884, the field ice never left the Nottingham Island, but remained there, swinging to and fro with the tide, all summer. On 2nd October, at Nottingham Island, the Straits are reported full of ice as far as can be seen, and the date of the final closing fixed by the observer there was 26th October. At Port Laperrière, first ice 19th October. Straits closed, apparently full of ice, 22nd October.

"The general direction of Hudson Straits at the eastern end, is about N.W. and S.E. (true), and across the mouth of the Straits, flows persistently the great Arctic current, carrying with it, not only giant bergs from the Humboldt and other glaciers, but field ice from the Arctic Sea coming down the East Greenland coast, together with all that comes down Davis' Straits and from out of its many bays and fjords. The quantity of this ice which passes down across the mouth of Hudson Straits is enormous, nor does it all pass across; a great deal of it is carried right into Hudson Straits to the south of Resolution Island; more comes in through Gabriel Straits and thence flows westward along the north shore of Hudson Straits. This westerly set apparently terminates about the eastern side of Salisbury Island, because the bergs are seen to come in the Straits, and to pass up the north side going west beyond Ashe Inlet. The breadth of ice outside of Hudson Straits varies greatly from time to time. I have been told of its being 120 miles off in March, and this year in the end of May, Capt. Guy, of the Arctic says, 'We found the south-west ice extending off Resolution Island from 40 to 50 miles of tight ice, and outside from this 10 to 20 miles of slack ice;' showing up to the 25th of May, this year, an impenetrable barrier of 50 miles of tight ice between navigable water and the entrance of Hudson Straits. This mass of ice outside pens up the ice in Hudson Straits, and it is only after a westerly blow of some duration that it moves off to the eastward and permits of the ice moving out. About the end of June or beginning of July, the bulk of the northern ice has passed south of Cape Chidley, and the Hudson Straits is free to pass out, but at this season of the year the westerly winds form only about 30 per cent. of the total, hence the discharge is slow and vast quantities of this ice disappear in the Straits and Ungava Bay under the influence of the rising temperature of both air and sea.

"It will be admitted that with the experience extending to centuries, which the Hudson Bay Company have, if it were possible for them to get their ships in earlier they would endeavour to do so; inasmuch as the detention of one of their ships over a winter in the bay, entails loss of markets, more or less undue wear and tear of vessel, and the additional expense of wages and maintenance of the crew. I have examined the records of 116 consecutive arrivals at York Factory, and find that the average date is September 4th. Of the 116, 48 arrived in August; earliest date, 6th August. The latest arrival was the 7th October, on which occasion the ship wintered in the bay.

"There is no question but that the year in which the ship arrived, 6th August, must have been an exceptionally favourable one, because of all the August arrivals only 13 arrived prior to the 20th of the month, and in considering the question of the navigability of the Straits by steamships for the ordinary purposes of commerce, I am of the opinion that steam will not lengthen the season at the beginning more than a month to five weeks, so that our own experience, and that of the Hudson Bay ships, points to the first half of July as being the earliest date at which the Straits may be considered navigable for the purposes of commerce, by steamships fortified for ice navigation, and at the same time capable of being used profitably as freight carriers.

"It has been held by some that the ice in Hudson Straits was so light and so much broken up that there was no risk of an ordinary vessel being crushed in it. I am informed that one of the American whaling vessels was crushed in 1885, and the Hudson Bay Company some years since lost a vessel by the ice in the Straits.

"The Hakluyt Society have published a work entitled 'The Geography of Hudson Bay,' by Capt. Coats.

"Capt. Coats was an officer in the Hudson Bay Company, who commanded vessels sailing into Hudson Bay from 1727 to 1751. During this time he was twice crushed in the ice, and in his geography he says: 'In the year 1727, when near the meridian off Cape Farewell, when running through the ice with small sail, two pieces of ice shut upon us and sunk our ship. Again in 1736, being entangled in the ice six leagues within Cape Resolution when the ice shut upon us by the tides only (for it was dead calm) and crushed our sides in and sunk her in 20 minutes.'

"GENERAL REMARKS ON THE NAVIGATION OF HUDSON BAY AND STRAITS.

"Having now made voyages on three years to Hudson Straits, and having carefully examined the reports by the observers as to the formation and movements of the ice in Hudson Straits, I have the honour to submit the following statement in regard to the navigation of these waters.

"In discussing this question, I think it well to state that I am not required to report on the commercial aspect of the case, and whether Hudson Straits navigation can be made to pay, nor do I, in the seasonal limits given, mean to state that it is impossible for a ship occasionally to get in earlier or leave later; but having carefully considered the subject, I give the following as the season during which navigation may in ordinary years be regarded as practicable for the purposes of commerce; not, indeed, to the cheaply-built freight steamer, commonly known as the 'ocean tramp,' but to vessels of about 2,000 tons gross, fortified for meeting the ice, and of such construction as to enable them to be fair freight carriers. These vessels must be well strengthened forward; should have wooden sheathing, and be very full under the counter; the propeller should be of small diameter and be well down in the water. I place the limit of size at about 2,000 tons, because a larger ship would be somewhat unwieldy, could not make such good way through the loose ice; and being unable to turn so sharply she would get many a heavy blow, that the smaller ship would escape.

"I consider that the season for the opening of navigation to such vessels as the above will, on the average, fall between 1st and 10th July. The position and movements of the ice I have already discussed, and need not here repeat. The closing of the season would be about the first week in October, partly on account of the descent of old ice from Fox Channel into the western end of the Straits; this old ice being rapidly cemented into solid floe by the formation of young ice between the pans; in such ice, no ship, however powerful, could do anything to free herself. At this time, too, the days are rapidly shortening, and snowstorms are frequent though not of great duration.

"Altogether, I consider the navigation of Hudson Straits as being more than ordinarily difficult, with shores inhospitable and bleak, presenting such a picture of loneliness and desolation, that it takes some time to get accustomed to it. The only safety in thick weather lies in the constant use of the lead and keeping a bright lookout, as the dead-reckoning is frequently in error to a considerable extent."

Now, I think I have quoted enough to show that it is impossible to navigate the Hudson Straits during the winter, that it is impossible to make more than one voyage in the year from England and return, unless under most favourable circumstances and in the face of extraordinary risks. To show you what is thought on this subject, I will quote from the evidence of Mr. Smith, the Deputy Minister of Marine. In his examination he stated that he considered it almost impossible to make more than one trip from England to Churchill and return, and he was asked:

"Do you refer to sailing ships when you speak of a vessel making two trips in the season?—No; I am speaking of fast steamers. It would have to be an exceptionally fast steamer, and a favourable season, with as little delay as possible. Of course the vessels for this work have to be built exceptionally strong. Chief Commissioner Graham told me that the vessels were provided with double stores and double crews, against accident. The ordinary ocean vessel would not be able to go in there at all. They should be as strong as wood and iron can make them, and no expense spared in their construction."

He was further asked:

"Do you not think there would be a great deal more for steamers?—With steamers, as you are aware, we have had some experience. We did everything possible to strengthen the Northern Light, and make her efficient for the service; still with all that she has cost a great amount of money to keep her in repair. The character of the ice is such that an ordinary steamer could not go through at all; that is, ocean tramps, as they are called—these vessels that sail between Liverpool and New York. The ice would knock a hole in the bottom of such a vessel in a moment, and she would go down. We had to put both greenheart and iron-plating on the Northern Light, and yet she runs a chance of incurring heavy expense for repairs at any time."

And still they ask for a grant of money for a railway to this region. Now, Mr. Pusey gave evidence before the Commission. He wrote to Captain Spicer in reference to the building of a railway to Hudson Bay, asking the price of materials and his opinion as to the navigation of Hudson Straits, as Captain Spicer had often been there. Captain Spicer answers as follows:—

"GROTON, CONN., 17th March, 1883.

"MR. C. H. PUSEY, New York,—Your favour of the 16th March is at hand and duly perused, and I am a little surprised to hear that the subject of a line of steamers to Hudson Bay is still being agitated. I thought the subject had been dropped. I have been consulted before on this matter, both in this country and in Europe, and my answer has always been the same—impracticable. But to answer your questions in order as asked, I will say:

"1st. There is no average length of time to be depended upon, as there are no two years alike. In the year 1863 I battled the ice from 1st July to 22nd August to get into Hudson Bay, and left for home 23rd September, and it was by a piece of good fortune that I was enabled to get clear. But a gale of wind for two days cleared the south shore, so that by coasting inside the islands and rocks I got clear. The year 1862, Captain Charles Allyn, in the barque Black Eagle, attempted to leave the Bay 10th September, but had to turn back again and winter, on account of heavy pack ice. In 1863 a Hudson Bay Company's ship did not get into the Strait until after I did, and there were two whalers lost the same year, one 17th July and one in August, about the 20th, I think. These vessels were well fortified for the ice. The Hudson Bay Company's ships are built expressly to combat ice, and they have found, by an experience of about 200 years of navigation there, that it is not advisable to attempt the Strait until about 1st August, and never to stop later than 15th September, except they winter, and I think there is no year that the Hudson Strait is free from ice three months, and no steamer or vessel has any business there, except built expressly for the ice, which iron vessels are not. There are always floating icebergs.

"2nd. I have never known it to be safe in the Strait, early or late. Thick fog and snow, strong currents and icebergs are always there.

"3rd. My experience in that country for twenty-four years compels me to say I do not believe any man can tell, with certainty, within two weeks of the time he could arrive there, not only from Liverpool, but even after he had entered Hudson Strait.

"4th. I do not think that, with a dozen trading posts on the north shore of Hudson Bay, they would secure $3,000 worth of trade. I have had the whole shore, and never got $500 in sixteen months.

"5th. I would not guarantee to land any freight of railway material, or any other, at a given time, for anything less than cost of said freight and the liabilities of damage.

"In my opinion, to sum up, it is simply an absurd project, and I think it would be safe to guarantee the loss of every vessel that attempts to carry wheat out of James Bay three months in the year, and I think Col. Wm. H. Gilder could have told you the same if he would, and I can point out several masters here who would tell the same story, I think. If there is any point that I have omitted, I would be happy to answer, if asked.

"Yours respectfully,

"J. C. SPICER."

Now, Sir, I think I have said enough to satisfy anybody on the question of navigation; and I propose now, for a few minutes to speak of the possibility of this road, if it were built, becoming a paying enterprise; because I believe it is our duty to take into consideration, not only the navigation of the Straits, but also the power of the railway to earn money for the bondholders if such an unfortunate thing happened as that the road should be built. As I have stated before, the distance from Winnipeg to Churchill is at least 350 miles farther for railway traffic than by Fort William; consequently, all grain shipped from the North-West must pay the railway rate on these extra 350 miles; and I claim, and everyone can make the same calculation for himself, that the railway rate on these extra 350 miles will pay the cost of shipping the grain from Fort William to Liverpool. Now, navigation opens at Fort William generally between the 1st and the 5th of May; this year it opened on the 29th of April. The last cargo left Port Arthur in 1889 on December 3, and in 1890 on December 2. Now, when grain is shipped from Fort William east, there is a chance to sell at the different point for milling purposes, or supposing grain were quoted at 80 cents or 90 cents a bushel at Winnipeg, and rose 10 to 15 cents a bushel at the Sault, at Port Huron, or at Owen Sound, this cargo could be sent to these places or direct to the shipboard, as the case may be, and all grain shipped to Fort William has the preference of the sale at these different points. Of course, any change in price that takes place during the transportation of grain from the North-West during the winter is no advantage to the grower, because every bushel of grain that is raised in the North-West and shipped to Fort Churchill will be locked up nine months, and whether grain goes up or down the grower suffers, for the wheat buyer carries the risk, and, consequently, gives a lower price. Now, grain is being carried from Chicago to New York at this season at 4½ cents per bushel, and from Port Arthur to Duluth and New York at 4⅞ cents. Two cargoes were shipped in May from Port Arthur to Kingston at 2½ cents, and other cargoes have been shipped at 2⅜. It cost to carry grain from Kingston to Montreal from 2 cents to 2½ cents per bushel, and it is being carried this year for 2 cents. Corn is sometimes carried for ¼ of a cent less than wheat. One cargo has been shipped in May from Chicago to Montreal at 4¼ cents. Now the grain is shipped from Montreal to Liverpool at 3 cents per bushel, and often less, being carried as ballast in cattle and other ships carrying light freight on deck. The rate of 4½ cents from Chicago to New York is by the Erie Canal via Buffalo. Grain has been shipped from Chicago and Duluth to Buffalo at 1¼ cents, and these ships get a return cargo of coal. These ships carry grain from Chicago and Duluth to Buffalo and get return cargoes of coal, and the competition is so great on the lakes and will always be so great, that if this scheme which is proposed be ever carried out and grain be carried by it for the producers of the North-West, it will have to be carried for almost nothing and the bondholders must pay part of the running expenses or hand the road over to the Government. If the Hudson Bay Railway be built, it will have to carry grain at such low rates that the investors in the bonds will never see the interest much less their capital. I can assure the House, and I believe every sensible man will agree with me, that no man who invests his money in these bonds, when they are floated on the English market, will ever see his interest much less his principal, and I believe the Government should not allow a scheme like this to be floated in order to take in the English capitalists. We all know that some money will be made out of it. No doubt the builders of the road will make money; no doubt the contractor will make his pile; but God help the poor foolish bondholders. Now, the ships which carry goods from Montreal, New York and Boston must have return cargoes. Grain has been carried for 1 cent a bushel. Hudson Bay ships must be expressly built, will cost more, carry less, and cannot bring any return cargoes to compare with vessels coming to Montreal and Boston, and as they can only make one voyage to Churchill and back, and possibly two under the most favourable circumstances, therefore if they are to pay, which they never will, it will be at the cost of the producers of the grain. At the present time ships of over two thousand tons are passing through the Welland Canal, and when the Sault Canal is completed and the St. Lawrence Canal is enlarged, as should be done, we will have navigation from Montreal direct, and vessels will make through trips from Fort William to Montreal at lower rates. Why do the Government talk of building the Trent Valley Canal, if they intend to build this railway to Hudson Bay? I submit that the Government should be honest with us, and either stop this grant, or go on and build a railway to Hudson Bay, because we know that the promoters of this scheme, when they go to England, will not ask the moneyed men of England to subscribe their capital for the road to Saskatchewan, but to subscribe their capital to build a railroad to Hudson Bay; and they will show, backed up by their flowery arguments, that they are bonussed by the Manitoba Government and the Dominion Government. I ask, is it fair to the moneyed men of England to allow this scheme to go in this shape and ask them to advance money? The Trent Valley Canal is a public work, it has occupied a prominent position in this country, and the promised completion has done a good many great services in the past. We generally hear of it sometime before an election, after which it dies out. Now, as far as I am concerned, I believe the Trent Valley Canal is feasible. It can be built for a very small expenditure, and I believe, if it were built, grain vessels, taking grain from Fort William, can be unloaded at the terminus, which fortunately will be in my riding, and the elevation, as all shippers know, will benefit the grain. Then grain can be carried through the Trent Valley Canal as cheaply as through the Erie, and we know that at present grain is carried more cheaply between Chicago and New York than between any other places of like distances and similar situation. I, consequently, submit it is much better for the Government to invest the money in completing the Trent Valley Canal, enlarging the Welland Canal and St. Lawrence Canals, and allow the provinces which have built the Canadian Pacific Railway and have been taxed a large amount of money therefor, to be recouped by building up the cities along the line of the Trent Valley Canal, and along the River St. Lawrence and our lakes, instead of throwing away all this money in the wild scheme of building a railway to Hudson's Bay, which will only allow of one trip a year to England. For the benefit of Manitoba members, I wish to submit that should the Hudson Bay Railroad ever be built it will be of little use to the farmers of that country. Grain in Manitoba—and if I am wrong I ask the hon. members for Marquette or Selkirk to set me right—is cut from the 15th to the 25th of August, and is not shipped until the 15th or 25th of September. Now, everyone knows that by the time this grain reaches the elevator at Churchill, it will be too late for shipment to England that year, and it will, consequently, have to be locked up in the elevators at Churchill, and the grain buyer must pay interest and storage, all of which must come out of the pockets of the Manitoba farmers. So that, notwithstanding the fact that it may at the present time look like a small boom to have this road started, I can assure the representatives of Manitoba that were this railway in operation to-morrow, it would be of no practical use to the farmers of that province. The storage of grain at Port Arthur costs 4 cents a bushel for five months. I will leave it to the promoters of this scheme to say what it will cost for eight or nine months at Fort Churchill, when interest on the grain and insurance also must be paid, and all that comes out of the farmer. Now supposing that you store grain at Fort Churchill and the price of grain rises during the winter, there is no outlet. We know that the price of grain often fluctuates, that it often goes up in the fall and goes down in the spring; and all the grain which would be shipped to Churchill would be deprived of that rise. How different it is at Fort William. If grain can be sent from Manitoba to Fort William and stored in the elevators there, and a rise takes place, that grain could be shipped by railway. I am informed that two million bushels of grain were shipped last winter, and I contend that it is much better to apply this money to enlarging the St. Lawrence Canals, and to completing the Trent Valley Canal, instead of going on with this scheme. I would like to hear from the hon. members who represent counties along the Trent Valley Canal if they intend to support a scheme that will indefinitely postpone the work. Do the representatives of the people along the banks of the St. Lawrence intend to support a scheme which, if we are to believe the words of the promoters, would, if it were feasible, draw the produce of the country, not through the River St. Lawrence, but past it? I believe that the people of the eastern provinces will see that it is their duty to vote against this scheme, and I would also like to ask the member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) what he intends to do? Does he intend to vote for a scheme which will block up Port Arthur and Fort William by the building of a road to Hudson Bay? I think it is time for the Finance Minister to intervene in this matter before it is too late, and to prevent this scheme being floated on the home market. I submit that it is a wrong to the people of the old country that any scheme should be floated which will eventually injure the credit of this country, and every thinking man who looks into the circumstances of the case and studies them, must know that this scheme will never pay. No Government should allow such a scheme to be floated when they feel and know that it will never pay, and I ask the Finance Minister to save himself from the curse of the children and grandchildren of those who may invest their money in these bonds through the endorsation of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DALY. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman has seen fit to take up so much of the time of the House this afternoon in discussing this question from his standpoint. I admit that the hon. gentleman has a perfect right to criticize this Hudson Bay scheme or any other scheme which may be before the House, but I cannot understand his calling upon members from Ontario living along the Trent Valley Canal to oppose it, meaning, I suppose, that a certain amount of traffic will be lost to that enterprise by the construction of this Hudson Bay Railway. I am perfectly willing that the Government should give reasonable aid to the Trent Valley Canal, and I would not oppose any aid given to any enterprise in the Province of Ontario, the Province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or any other province, but, so far as the Hudson Bay scheme is concerned, it is the one scheme upon which all parties, all people and classes of Manitoba and the North-West Territories are agreed. I do not think the speech the hon. gentleman has made would go down with his fellow-Liberals in the Province of Manitoba, or that the farmers of that province have the same views in regard to the Hudson Bay Railway as he has enunciated here to-day. The farmers of Manitoba are looking forward anxiously to the building of that railway for the relief they need by giving them a nearer access to the market for their grain. The distance from Winnipeg to Montreal is 1,425 miles, and all grain shipped from Winnipeg to Liverpool by way of Montreal has to travel that distance. The distance from Winnipeg to Fort Nelson is estimated at 650 miles, so that there is a saving of 700 miles. Take the freight on a car of grain for 700 miles.

Mr. SPOHN. The hon. gentleman speaks of Fort Nelson. Everyone knows that Fort Nelson is not navigable, and, therefore, the intention is to go to Fort Churchill.

Mr. DALY. I do not admit what the hon. gentleman says in regard to Fort Nelson, but I will speak of that later on. I was saying, when I was interrupted, that there would be a saving of 700 miles of land carriage, and the farmers of Manitoba and everyone who has studied the question believes that when the Hudson Bay Railway is an accomplished fact, then, and then only, will they get the proper price for their grain. As to the storage of grain at Fort Nelson or Fort Churchill, whichever of them may be decided upon, does not the hon. gentleman know that nearly all the wheat sent from the North-West is stored at Port Arthur, and that nearly all the wheat which comes from the western territories of the United States is stored at Duluth, during the winter months? We say that the principal business of this railway will be done in the winter season. The hon. gentleman says that our farmers cut wheat between the 15th and 25th August, and in that he is correct; but the grain is not threshed, as a general rule, until November, or even December and January, because, after the grain is reaped, it is necessary, in September or October, for the farmer to get his fall-ploughing done. Every winter our elevators are full, from Winnipeg to the eastern boundary of the Province of Manitoba. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are every year increasing their storage capacity, and in Duluth the elevator capacity has had to be increased every year since the grain industry developed in the west. The hon. gentleman ought to recognize the fact that it is not the farmers but the buyers who will ship the grain, that a great deal of grain is purchased for future delivery both in the United States and in Canada, and that a great deal of this grain will be stored at Fort Churchill or Fort Nelson for the future delivery at Liverpool. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman devoted a great deal of his time to the navigation of the Hudson Straits. I did not expect when this matter came up this afternoon that the discussion would take the direction that it did. I did not suppose, for instance, that any hon. gentleman would inflict upon the House quotations of reports that were made some years ago. It is well known to members of this House that that report was published and circulated throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and that it is in the hands of any person in Great Britain who desires to look into this scheme, of any financier to whom the promoters would be likely to apply, and desired to inform himself concerning the navigability of the Straits. The hon. gentleman said: "God help the bondholders." Well, I can assure him that, so far as the Hudson Bay Railway is concerned, every matter and every detail will have to be laid before the financiers to whom the promoters may apply. They will not have to depend upon ex parte statements of the promoters, but they will have laid before them the very report the hon. gentleman has read, and which is printed and distributed with the imprint of the Government of Canada upon it. Now, Sir, in order to answer the remarks of the hon. gentleman, I will also quote from many authorities to show the navigability of those Straits :—

"Dr. Bell, of the Canadian Geological Survey, who has made five voyages through the strait: Navigable from middle of June to middle of November.

"Captain Jacob Tabor, a New Bedford whaler: From first of July to first of November.

"Captain St. Clair, New Bedford whaler: From first of July to middle of November.

"Captain Clisby, of New London, Conn., who has had 14 years' experience in those waters: Four months and often five.

"Captain William Kennedy, who commanded an expedition in search of the remains of Sir John Franklin, and who has had eight years' experience of the Strait: From June to November.

"Mr. W. A. Archibald, for many years in the service of the Hudson Bay Company at Moose Factory; From June to December.

"Captain William Hackland, in the Hudson Bay Company's service for 39 years: Strait never freezes; no reason why steamships should not navigate it any time.

"The Canadian Government sent three expeditions to the Strait and Bay—1884-85-86—under command of Lieutenant Gordon, in all of whose reports the period of the navigation of the Strait is placed at four months.

"Captain J. J. Barry, the first officer in each of the expeditions, an experienced Newfoundland sealer, thinks ocean steamers can enter as early as June, and can certainly come out as late as December.

"Mr. W. A. Ashe, Superintendent of the Quebec Observatory, the officer of the expedition in charge of the station on the north coast of the Strait, from August, 1884, to September, 1885, says the Strait is navigable for from four and a-half to six and a-half months, varying accordingly to the class of the ship.

"Mr. William Skynner, an officer who accompanied the three expeditions, thinks the Straits can be navigated from June to December.

"Commodore Markham, R.N., an experienced Arctic navigator, accompanied the expedition of 1886. He reports: 'I believe the Strait will be found navigable for at least four months of every year, and probably often for five or more. There will, I have no doubt, be many years when navigation can be carried out safely and surely from the first of June until the end of November.'

"Captain John Macpherson, of Stepney, London, as first officer and captain in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, made voyages from London and Stromness to Hudson Bay and return annually for twenty years. He writes: 'There is no reason why steamships should not make the passage (of the Strait) as early as the first of June, and come out as late as the middle of November.'

"The Bay is open all the year round. It is described by Lieutenant Gordon as 'a vast basin of comparatively warm water,' and by Dr. Bell as 'very tranquil and wholly free from storms.' In his evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons, the latter stated that he found the mean summer temperature of the water of the Bay 53° Fah., while that of Lake Superior was 39·5° during the same season."

Now, in order to set the hon. gentleman at rest upon this question, I may state to him that an agreement has been entered into between the Hudson Bay Company and William Milburn & Co., and every gentleman coming from the lower provinces, and having to do with shipping interests, will recognize that company as one of the largest steamship companies in the world. William Milburn & Co. are prepared to put their ships on that route as soon as the financial arrangements are made. In addition to that, Billbrough & Co., who are the Lloyds' Agents, have made an agreement to the effect that they will insure cargoes, so that so far as these gentlemen in England are concerned who have made themselves conversant with the facts by means of the reports the hon. gentleman has referred to, and by investigation on their own account, they are satisfied not only to enter into contracts for the supplying of the ships that are needed to sail from foreign ports to Port Churchill, but the insurance underwriters are prepared to effect an insurance upon those cargoes.

An hon. MEMBER. At what rate?

Mr. DALY. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman at what rate, but I can tell him they are prepared to do it according to the St. Lawrence rates; that is exactly what the agreement states, and I think that ought to set the question at rest. These gentlemen who have made this agreement have, no doubt, investigated thoroughly the question of the navigation of these Straits. This resolution before the House does not, in my opinion, commit this country to building the whole of the Hudson Bay Railway. It is simply a colonization railway for 250 miles from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway into the northern territory. That territory is being well settled and well opened up, and it is necessary that those people going in there should have railway communication. It is on the route of the line from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, and since people in the Edmonton district and the people in Prince Albert district are able to get railway communication on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, these people who are living in the northern district, in the north-western portion of the Province of Manitoba, desire also to have railway communication. Those people are just as much entitled to recognition at the hands of this House as were those of Calgary and Edmonton, who have a railway from Regina to Long Lake. The motion of the hon. the Minister is merely to the effect that the same aid should be given to that portion of the Hudson Bay Railway that was given to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, and to the Prince Albert Railway. I take it that the question of the feasibility of the whole line, and the navigability of the Straits, had nothing whatever to do with the question now before the House. I would say to the hon. gentleman that this particular portion of the country through which this 250 miles will run, is one of the most fertile districts of the Province of Manitoba. We have reports in connection with this scheme from several gentlemen who went through there, from which I will read the following :—

"The country between these points, a distance of 242 miles, is very flat and almost free from rock, except in the immediate neighbourhood of certain parts of Lake Winnipeg shore.

"The first 30 miles of it is prairie land similar to that in the rest of Manitoba. After passing through this there is a well-wooded country with many open plains extending as far as Fairford on the Partridge Crop River. All of this country offers great inducements to the settler, and is already occupied by farmers and fishermen along a large portion of the lakes and Swan Creek, which flows into Lake Manitoba north of Oak Point Mission.

"It is well watered with many lakes, round which there are splendid hay lands and clearings for cattle grazing: especially is this the case at the Rat Lakes, about 75 miles from Winnipeg.

"After leaving these, the line passes close to Dog Lake, an offshoot of Lake Manitoba. This lake is 14 miles long and drains the best piece of farming land on Lake Manitoba. From this point to Fairford Mission (which is about 132 miles from Winnipeg) there is a little muskeg, otherwise the same good country prevails.

"There will be little or no difficulty in constructing the line so far, as the country is so level that beyond raising the track and draining, no further construction would be required. There are no rivers to bridge. Fairford itself has already a good settlement, and only awaits a means of outlet to rapidly establish itself as an important agricultural and lumbering centre. It is one of the oldest missions in the country. There is a great quantity of exceedingly fine spruce and poplar all through this country, the spruce attaining to an enormous size, often growing from three and four feet across the stump."

Now, we have reports of engineers who have gone over this line at different times, in different years, and every one of these men report that the line can be very easily constructed, and that it will cost, including bridges, $15,000 per mile, which, hon. gentlemen will admit, who have any knowledge of building of lines of railway in the prairie country, is a very moderate sum, considering that quite an expensive bridge will have to be built at the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. Sir, I have dealt as concisely and as succinctly as possible with the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite. Let me say that this Hudson Bay scheme is one in which every portion of the country is deeply interested, and every person in the great Province of Manitoba and in the North-West Territories have a personal interest in it; indeed, their interests are bound up with it. I may say that so strongly do our people feel upon this matter that when the Greenway Government came into power they saw fit to repeal an Act that had been upon the Statute-book granting aid to the Hudson Bay Railway by guaranteeing bonds to the extent of four and a-half millions. That raised such a discussion throughout the length and breadth of the country, that it was made a plank in the platform during the late elections, particularly in my election and in the election of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald). My opponent, Mr. Martin, and Mr. Campbell, the opponent of the hon. member for Winnipeg, had taken a certain stand in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway, and I have no doubt that the large majorities received by my hon. friend from Winnipeg and by myself can be attributed, in a large measure, to the position that the Greenway Government took upon this scheme. Immediately after the general election in March last the Manitoba Legislature met, and so strong had the feeling grown, and so strong were the supporters of the Government who had come from bye-elections and other elections, that they prevailed on the Government entering into an agreement, from which I will quote in a few moments, with the Hudson Bay Company. This agreement provides for a grant to the company of $1,500,000 on the completion of the line; and it further provides that the railway to be completed by the company shall be an all-rail road from Winnipeg to some port on Hudson Bay, and the first 100 miles the company shall complete by 31st December, 1892, and the whole road should be completed and operated within five years from 1st May, 1891. The standard for the construction of the road is to be the same as fixed by the Parliamnt of Canada for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that the Manitoba Act?

Mr. DALY. Yes. Hon. gentlemen will observe that this agreement is surrounded with safeguards; that so far as the Legislature of Manitoba is concerned, it commits itself to giving aid to the railway, but only on condition of its completion to Hudson Bay, and not until then will the amount of $1,500,000 be paid over. Coming back to the question of the aid asked in the resolution, $80,000 per annum, I do not know whether hon. gentlemen understand the question thoroughly or not, but in the agreement, which the Minister of the Interior read, it is provided that the company shall be paid $80,000 per annum, and in consideration of this subsidy shall carry Government mails and freight, and so on, and if at the end of twenty years the company shall not have earned by the carriage of freight and mails that sum of $80,000 per annum, the Government is to take one-third of the land grant in repayment of the deficiency, whatever it may be. So far as the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) is concerned, the hon. gentleman must remember that the House is committed to the Hudson Bay Railway as a through scheme, that the Parliament of Canada gave to the scheme a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile within the limits of Manitoba and 12,800 acres per mile outside, and so, no matter what arguments may be advanced, Parliament is committed to the whole scheme. All we ask is that, in that portion of Manitoba I have described aid shall be given in the same manner as it is granted to the Edmonton, Calgary and Prince Albert Railway, in order that the people living in the Dauphin district may have an outlet. If it should prove that the building of 300 miles of railway will enable them to carry out the scheme, so much the better for the people of Manitoba. I desire the Committee to understand that we do not approach this matter in Manitoba from a political standpoint; both parties have committed themselves to it by the legislation which was passed last year, and by the legislation passed when Mr. Norquay was in power, and that passed at the instance of Mr. Martin and Mr. Greenway, showing that the whole people, irrespective of politics, are bound up in the success of this scheme, and that the matter under discussion affects almost the entire portion of Manitoba.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am not in any way interested in the Trent Valley Canal, and I do not intend to let that great work influence the vote I shall give on this resolution, nor do I intend that any other public work shall interfere with the decision I have arrived at with regard to my duty towards this resolution. This matter must stand on its own merits and be decided on its own merits alone. I may say at the outset that I have always been very sorry in regard to giving my vote to commit the country to any of these desperate schemes. With me it has been a vital question whether the projects are likely to prove remunerative to those who put their money into them for the purpose of carrying them into execution. That is the first question, because in a great measure the credit of the country, and not only its credit, but its good name and also its honour is connected with the manner in which these enterprises are carried out and prove remunerative. I need not tell the Committee that this House has sometimes given its sanction to rather questionable schemes, to schemes that have brought moneyed men great loss and have also brought disrepute on our common country, and have prevented legitimate enterprises securing on the most favourable terms the money needed to carry them out. With respect to the Hudson Bay project, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) said that both Manitoba and the Dominion are committed to the scheme, that both of them have made grants. But, strange to say, the Manitoba Legislature, composed of gentlemen who ought to know every circumstance connected with the scheme, and who ought to know from the reports of the exploration of the country, the territory through which the line will pass, and also the prospect of the road ever becoming a paying one, did not put one single dollar into the enterprise. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) has told us that the Legislature voted $1,500,000. How was it voted? Only to be paid when the road is constructed, and not one cent before. The resolution before the Committee proposes that $80,000 a year for twenty years shall be paid for certain services to be performed when the road is constructed. I submit that if the enterprise is not a proper one, and is not likely to pay, this grant will deceive people in the money markets of the world. It will go far to enable those floating the scheme to put the bonds on the market, and the unfortunate men who put money into the enterprise will suffer serious loss. The question for the Committee and the House to determine is, whether it is a feasible scheme, and one likely to succeed as a commercial undertaking and pay a fair return to bondholders. Let hon. gentlemen bear in mind that this is a part of the great Hudson Bay Railway scheme. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) has quoted from the report of the expedition sent by the authority of Parliament to report on the feasibility of the scheme. We have also other reports, which declare, in a most unmistakable manner, that as a commercial route for the carriage of produce between Manitoba and Great Britain, this route is utterly impracticable. And yet, Sir, we are asked again, by the resolution now before us, to give the sanction of this House to a scheme to lead the moneyed men of the old country into a trap to invest their money in a wild-cat scheme. This railroad is one of two things: it is either part of the Hudson Bay Railway, pure and simple, intended for the purpose of through traffic, or else it is a colonization road. If it is simply a part of the Hudson Bay Railway, I think I have said enough, and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) has said enough, to show that the road is impracticable, and that it would be worse than money thrown away to invest anything in it. Worse still, the honour of the country would be involved by encouraging the financiers of the old country to invest their funds in a wild-cat scheme. I know that in the map laid on the Table of this House we have what is called an alternative route. I submit to this Committee, and I want it to be particularly noticed, that according to all the information we have, the line of the Hudson Bay Railway, as originally surveyed and as shown on that map, is not a colonization road; that it runs through a country which has no necessity for a railway and which is not fit for farming, and that there will be no traffic upon it unless it is traffic through to the Hudson Bay. Therefore, as originally surveyed, the railway is not in any sense of the word a colonization road, nor is it in any way calculated to settle up the waste lands of Manitoba and the North-West. It is of no practical use whatever except as a through line to the Hudson Bay. As I have said, they show an alternative line on the map. The original line runs between Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipeg, but the alternative line crosses over the narrows in the middle of Lake Winnipeg and runs on the east side of Lake Dauphin. It is patent to every one in this chamber that the great object of the nations of the world who are making any efforts in this direction is to shorten the lines of communication. The route from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay is a very circuitous route, and if the railway runs to Port Nelson it very much resembles a half moon, and the more circuitous the line the less chance there is of paying, and that the alternative line greatly increases the length of the road by still further deflecting from a straight line. I have only to point to the Intercolonial Railway, as an example, to show that the long circuitous route by which it was built has precluded for all time the possibility of it becoming a paying investment, and has made it a burden of half a million dollars per year or more on the people of this country for all future generations. Let me draw the attention of the House to the fact that the survey as originally made is very circuitous, if you run to Port Nelson, which my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) points out as the objective point on the Hudson Bay, which is the nearest port they can get to. When those explorers were sent out they reported that there was 27 miles of a shifting sand roadway which is constantly fluctuating from the mouth of the river until you get to the clear water out of Port Nelson, and that the only practical harbour on the Hudson Bay is one at the mouth of the Churchill River, which greatly increases the length of the road. Another word about this route as a colonization road. I submit that it is not in the proper place for a colonization road at all; there was such a railway charter asked for here last session and it was refused because it was going to interfere with the Hudson Bay Railway line. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) last year asked a charter for a line starting from Portage la Prairie and running by Lake Dauphin; and I may tell the Committee, from reliable information which I have, that there is a splendid farming country in Lake Dauphin district. This road when it crosses the Narrows gets into good land and runs east of Lake Dauphin, but I submit that it is about 100 miles too long. Somebody may say that it was none of our business how long it was, but I contend that it is our business, because we have given 6,400 acres of land per mile, and every mile extra is just so much out of the property of the country. If you are going to build a colonization road, the proper place is where the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) asked a charter to build it last year; or better still, and I tell the House there is a still better route, if you run a line from Gladstone, Nuppawa or Minnedosa right up into the very country which is going to be served by this long railway, you will save 6,400 acres of land per mile for every mile you cut off, and instead of a road 200 or 300 miles long one within 100 miles long will serve the whole purpose. The attention of the House has been called to the fact that the period of navigation is so short in the Hudson Bay that it utterly precludes it from being a safe route for carrying grain to Great Britain, and that fact being established beyond the possibility of dispute, as shown by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Spohn), you can never by that route take the year's crop out in the year it is raised. This, as the hon. gentleman showed so forcibly, is a very important consideration in this matter, for if you can bring the crop down by the present route or take it by any other way to the market, you have a chance to sell at any time of the year, but if you take the crop by the Hudson Bay route you cannot get it to the British market before August or September of the next year. All these things considered, I appeal to the Committee to pause before launching themselves upon a scheme of this kind. I believe it will pay those who constructed and projected it, but as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) says, where will the poor bondholders be. I submit that this House should be very careful before they do anything which would lead the moneyed men of the old country into investing in any such wild-cat scheme as this, a scheme which will never pay anybody except the projectors and those who build the road. After careful consideration of the question, these are my views upon it, and I feel it my duty as a member of this House, and as a citizen of this our common country, having the welfare of Canada at heart, to oppose this scheme to the bitter end at every stage which it reaches in this House.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss as to whether the bondholders or the people who purchase the bonds of the Hudson Bay Railway will derive interest or not from their investment. I take it for granted that men who have money to invest will make it their own business to know whether it is properly invested or not. I have been a little surprised and amazed by some of the arguments used against this scheme by hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon. We are told by the first gentleman who opposed this scheme that the railway is no good, that it is impracticable, and that the Hudson Bay Straits cannot be navigated, and then at the close of his remarks he attempts to point out to this House that if this aid is granted that road will be built and that it will consequently destroy the trade that would otherwise come through the Trent Valley Canal.

Mr. SPOHN. I did not say that the Straits could not be navigated, but I said that, as a commercial enterprise, the railway would be a failure. Of course, we know they could make one trip a year there; that is considered navigating it, I suppose.

Mr. WATSON. Well, if I were under the impression that ships could only make one trip a year, I do not think I would rise on the floor of this House and advocate the scheme, nor do I think the promoters of the Trent Valley Canal would lose much trade. But I have greater hopes of the navigation of Hudson Straits than the hon. member for Simcoe. If I did not believe that our grain would be carried out in the same year that it is grown, I would not support the scheme. But I am under the impression that at least a portion of our grain can be taken out the same year that it is grown. The scheme would be practically wiped out, so far as outside capitalists are concerned, if it were understood that that could not be done. If the grain had to be stored up at Churchill or Nelson for eight or nine months, that would be fatal to the scheme. At the present time, instead of the farmers of Manitoba not threshing their grain until November or December, the greater portion of it is shipped and goes eastward by the lakes in the same season that it is grown. Now, while I am glad that there are some schemes on which the hon. member for Selkirk and I can agree, I regret that he could not sit down to-day without having a fling at the Greenway Government, by stating that they were forced to do certain things. I may say that the Greenway Government have always supported the Hudson Bay Railway, and the change made by them in the form of the assistance they were granting to the scheme from a guarantee to a direct grant of a million and a-half, was made to suit the promoters of the scheme, and that change, I believe, had the almost unanimous approval of the people of Manitoba. The Local Government felt that they could not speculate too much in a work that was calculated to benefit not only Manitoba, but the Territories westward even to a greater extent than Manitoba, and they made the change because circumstances had changed. The railway monopoly was done away with, there was another railway in the country, and the same importance was not attached to the Hudson Bay Railway as at the time the guarantee was given. However, last session, the Manitoba Government considered it so important that they agreed to give it a bonus of $1,500,000 if the road were completed within five years. This should convince the members of this House that the people of Manitoba feel an interest in the construction of this work. As the hon. gentleman who last spoke has stated, it is not a colonization railway. Although it might be run though a country where it would be more profitable for colonization purposes, there are some 37 miles of it built now in the direction indicated on the map; and it is proposed to continue it by the Narrows of Lake Manitoba and westward of Lake Winnipegoosis, and Cedar Lake to the Saskatchewan River. By this route it will tap the Lake Dauphin district, which is already fairly well settled; and it will give communication with steamers on the Saskatchewan River a month earlier than it would if it ran to the eastward of Cedar Lake and on to Grand Rapids. Another reason for carrying the road to the west of Lake Manitoba is that by that route it will be more valuable to points west of the city of Winnipeg. While Winnipeg is an important city, there are many other points of importance in Manitoba and the North-West, and it is also of advantage to these points that the road should be constructed westward of Cedar Lake. This route passes through a tract of country which is probably fit for grain-growing, but it is certainly good for grazing, and it would open up a large territory which at present remains undeveloped. From the Narrows of Lake Manitoba there is good navigation to the north end of Waterhen Lake. There are also valuable fisheries and timber areas in the same district, which this road would be the means of developing. Now, we have heard read here to-day some reports made by Commander Gordon, who was instructed to make the survey he did for the purpose, I believe, simply of pleasing the people of Manitoba and the North-West; but the Government did not go into the matter as if they wished to obtain the most favourable report regarding the project. I believe they desired to have such a report made as would discredit the scheme rather than one favourable to it. They sent out to Hudson Bay an exploring vessel which was nothing more nor less than a sailing vessel, the Alert.

Mr. SPOHN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The Alert is a steamer.

Mr. WATSON. The Alert is a sailing vessel with a 50-horse power engine in it. It was stated by the hon. Minister of Finance, who I do not think knew what he was talking about, that it could be worked up to 150-horse power, but if that were done it would burst the boiler. I would ask any gentleman familiar with the matter if he thinks that a vessel with a horse power equal to what is used on the small tugs which ply up and down the Ottawa River here, would be sufficient to carry a vessel through any ice such as the Alert was likely to encounter. I think the Government in sending that vessel to test the navigation of Hudson Straits were trifling with the subject. It had to go with wind and tide. Only 175 tons of coal could be carried on the vessel. and how long would that last? I know nothing personally of the navigation of those Straits, but I feel satisfied from the reports made by a special committee of this House which sat in 1883, and of which Mr. Joseph Royal, now Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, was chairman, and the evidence given before that committee, that there is from two and a-half to four months' navigation there every year. That evidence was given by gentlemen who had examined the Straits, believing that it was only fit for fishing and hunting. The Hudson Bay officers and the New Bedford whalers want to preserve their fishing and hunting grounds; and, consequently, when enquiry is made as to the navigation of the Straits, they give the people to understand that the navigation, so far as regards a commercial route, is not feasible.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman think the road, if continued between Lake Manitoba and Winnipeg, would have any traffic at all at present?

Mr. WATSON. Up to Grand Rapids?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I certainly do not think it would have as much as if it would cross at the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, and went through the Lake Dauphin country which is now settled.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the population?

Mr. WATSON. There are some six or seven townships in that district settled, and all the even sections are already homesteaded, while the odd sections, although reserved for railway purposes, are all squatted upon, so that there is hardly a valuable section of land remaining to be taken up in that district. The people there are greatly in need of railway communication, and, as was stated by the hon. member for Middlesex, when I introduced a Bill last year, which I am sorry was not passed, it would have formed a portion of the Hudson Bay Railroad when that road would be built. I stated then that I believed the Government had trifled with the House; and when we have before us the report of the Deputy Minister of Marine, certainly, as was stated by the hon. member for Simcoe, the Government apparently wished for some excuse for not giving assistance to the Hudson Bay road. Now, so far as the cost of the carriage of grain is concerned, it appears to me that there cannot be two opinions as to the benefit which would be derived in the shipment of grain to Liverpool. I am not going to give a set of figures as regards the cost or comparative cost. It is sufficient for me to know that competition would necessarily lower the rate, and if the Hudson Bay Railway had any idea of carrying grain freight, they would have to charge a lower rate than the Canadian Pacific Railway. As I strongly believe in competition, I believe that this road, if it will not do all that the people of Manitoba and the North-West expect, it will certainly reduce the rates. Now, I do not think I will occupy any further time in this discussion. I feel that this road is entitled to the grant as much, if not more, than either the Calgary and Edmonton, or the Regina and Long Lake road, for these roads are only colonization roads; and with regard to them we do not expect anything better than a colonization road; but this line of railway will, we expect, in addition to being a colonization road, run through to the Hudson Bay, and give us more benefits than a simple colonization road. For that reason I am in favour of the resolutions now before the House, and I trust this House will see fit to pass them, and pass a Bill founded on them giving this road the $80,000 a year for twenty years. If I had my way, I would divert this road into a better country. I have some reason to hope the promoters may see fit to adopt a better road, that is a road running along the south end of Lake Manitoba altogether. There connection could be made by their line with Portage la Prairie, and then the route which is to be traversed by the line I proposed last year, could be run on to the west, and open up a good tract of country for its full length inside of Manitoba.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is there not a large settled district west of Lake Manitoba, and would not this proposed line cut off that settlement from all railway accommodation between Lake Manitoba and Riding Mountain?

Mr. WATSON. In that newly-settled country there is certainly a large settlement, and this road, as laid down, would require a branch running from the south end of Lake Dauphin to the west. I had hoped that the charter, granted two or three years ago, and which was extended last year, of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company would have been carried out, and I have hopes that road will still be built. If it is, it will accommodate the settlement in that section better than the Hudson Bay road. But they have got the land; and if not wiped out by other enterprises, I hope the promoters of the scheme may be placed in a position to go on and construct that road.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). This road runs through my county, starting from Winnipeg and running northwest. North of the present terminus, there are a number of settlers in my county, forty miles away from any railway, and there are settlers going in even back of that, so that in a year or two there will be settlers sixty miles from the railway. It is the intention of the promoters to cross at the Narrows and use the western route, and not between Lake Manitoba and Winnipeg, because there are some settlers west of Lake Winnipegoosis. With regard to the country around Lake Dauphin, a large number of settlers will go in north of that this year, and a large number went in during the past year. Besides that there are large timber areas in that region, and along the streams that rise in Duck Mountains and run towards Lake Winnipegoosis, where mills would be erected to accommodate the settlers, and timber would be sent down by rail to Winnipeg to supply the people in Winnipeg and settlers on the prairie. For this reason the road is very important as a colonization road at present, and a large amount of traffic would be given to it in the near future. The charge was made by the hon. member for North Middlesex that this is a wild-cat scheme. The hon. gentleman had no right to apply that term to this, any more than to any other system of railway. Two companies came before this House, one last year, and one the year before. One was for the road from Regina and Long Lake to Prince Albert. That company was a colonization company, and received the assistance of the Government. It was not a wild-cat scheme, as the road is now built and operated to the great advantage of the people on the Saskatchewan. The other was for the purpose of building the road between Calgary and Edmonton, which is now under construction. It was asked why the Local Government dealt differently with this company from the manner this Government has dealt with it. The positions of the two Governments are different. This Government looked at the fact that colonization roads must be assisted, and they aided the Central Railway from Regina to Prince Albert—the road running northerly from the Canadian Pacific Railway to the great Saskatchewan. Then they aided the road near the Rocky Mountains, because there was a large settlement around Edmonton which wanted outlet, and the Government looked at it from a purely colonization standpoint. Now, they say, we will build a third one. Thus, we will have three colonization roads —the middle, the western and the eastern—all going to the Saskatchewan from the south. Now, the Local Government looked at the question from a totally different standpoint. They will not and cannot assist colonization roads, but they want to assist any road that will bring about competition with the present system in Manitoba. First, they went to work and aided the Northern Pacific because they believed it would compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, they say we will give assistance to another competing line, the Hudson Bay road purely, because they believe it is going to be a competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway when completed. That is why they are assisting it in this way, but they would not give any aid to it as a colonization road. I can say nothing further than that I join with other hon. members from my province, that we are a unit and feel that it is of great importance to the people of that province that this road should be be built.

Committee rose, and, it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on the resolution.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite agree that we were committed, from the time of Confederation, to the construction of a trans-continental line of railway, composed of the Intercolonial, coupled with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and reaching to the Pacific coast; but I deny that, on the part of the confederacy, there was ever any understanding that the North-West should be given, as it has been given and is now being given, aid towards the construction of side lines and others throughout the North-West, in the way of colonization companies' lines. It was distinctly understood, when we expended the money we did for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the lands in the North-West should be used to recoup the Dominion treasury for the amount expended on the construction of that line. We know the statements which were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, from time to time, with regard to what this Dominion might count upon in the way of receipts from the sales of lands in the North-West. We have never realized any portion of that recouping, as far as the Dominion treasury is concerned. We have not received from the North-West the first tithe of the amount we have expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have spent enormous amounts on the development of the North-West, largely at the expense of the older provinces of the Dominion, and I contend that the accommodation now given by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the canals, for the shipment of goods from Port Arthur to Quebec, by the expenditure we have made on the enlargement of those canals, should suffice for the North-West until we have a larger population in that territory and in Manitoba than we have now. I am not going to discuss the feasibility or the necessity, from a Dominion standpoint, of the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. I am not going to discuss the question as to how many months or how many weeks in a year Hudson Bay is available to navigation. That has been dealt with by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn), who has read extracts which I think will convince any reasonable man that, if these seas are open for three months in the year, that is about the full extent of time during which they can be safely navigable. With the very limited population we have in the North-West, with the very limited development in comparison with the development which was expected to take place in that country, when the scheme for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was first proposed, viewing the whole ground, taking a retrospective glance at our experience in regard to it, I say that it is taking a step altogether in advance of the requirements of this country to ask us now to consent to the expenditure of $80,000 a year for twenty years for the construction of a road to Hudson Bay. I do not think it is at all necessary. From the extent of the territory which has been opened up by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the lines which have been opened up in consequence of the money and land grants which have been given, I think we have enough territory opened up which is not yet occupied, and that we have no necessity to open up any further territory at present. The older sections of this country have been crippled financially by the enormous expenditure which has been made on that section of the country. When we consider that, in the older provinces, we have counties and provinces which, through sheer necessity, subjected themselves to an annual drain in the way of taxation for twenty years to secure the railway accommodation they absolutely required, and that they are yet struggling with the financial embarrassments produced in that way, and that they have never received one dollar by way of relief from the Dominion treasury, but have been compelled out of their own pockets to contribute towards the construction of these lines, I ask if it is just or reasonable to ask them to quietly consent to a guarantee of this kind being given to a line which is to run through an unsettled wilderness, and of which the financial results are very questionable, to say the least. I cannot sit still and consent to the passage of this resolution. Early in this session, there came from the west of Ontario a large deputation to wait on the late First Minister and the Minister of Finance, and to press upon them that, under the changed condition of things in this country, after the Dominion Parliament had decided to subsidize short lines in the different provinces and had taken under its control almost the whole railway system of this Dominion, and was yearly granting aid to other lines, as a matter of justice and right they should be recouped to a certain extent for the money they had expended on their local lines. The reply they received was that the Government would seriously consider the question, while they held out no expectation to that deputation that these municipalities would receive any relief, because the First Minister stated that the drain upon the Dominion treasury now was so great that they could not hold out any hope that any relief would be granted. If that is the case, and these municipalities and counties are to be treated in that way, how can these men be expected to consent to granting $80,000 a year for a road of this kind, which means $2,000,000 added to the debt of this country, capitalizing it at 4 per cent. The claims of these municipalities would be settled by $2,500,000 or $3,000,000. I intend, and I wish hon. gentlemen to understand this fact, if this Bill is pressed upon the House, to present a resolution that no guarantee of any kind whatever towards the construction of this line shall be given until those municipalities to which nothing has been given in the way of a refund of the amounts they have expended on their lines have had their claims settled. I wish every hon. member from the west of Ontario to understand that he will have to face an amendment of this kind on this Bill, because I consider that these municipalities should be settled with before the Dominion Parliament is asked to give any guarantee in aid of this wild-cat scheme, for I can call it nothing else. The speech of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) would have satisfied me, if nothing else did, that it is unwise and imprudent to give this guarantee. He said that the products of Manitoba and the North-West could not be sent out by the Hudson Bay Railway in the same year in which they were raised.

Mr. DALY. It is nothing of the kind.

Mr. McMULLEN. He stated that the farmers of Manitoba and the North-West required to devote their attention to ploughing their ground for the next year's crops from the moment their harvest came off until the last moment they could plough, and that their threshing was not done till some time in November, and that, as a result, this line could not possibly be used till the following spring. Now, when we consider the fact that the wheat, according to the hon. gentleman's argument, has got to be not less than nine months in transit before it reaches the market of Liverpool, I say the proposition is absurd, unless they are going to have in Europe the experience that Joseph had in Egypt, when they will have to lay up grain for seven years. It is a fallacy to think of using this road to transport the surplus produce of the North-West to the markets of Liverpool. It is nonsense, when you come to consider the rapid transit of the produce of all sections of the world by steamships and railways; and the idea of hoarding up at one point on the Hudson Bay a large portion of the output of the North-West and leaving it in storage for six or seven months before you can ship it to the markets of the world is absurd and a fallacy. I base my arguments on the statements of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly,) and if his statements are true, as I have no doubt they are, in my humble opinion, to use a common phrase, they knock the bottom out of the whole scheme. I wish, by these remarks, to indicate the position I am going to take upon this important question. When we come to consider the indebtedness of this Dominion, when we realize that we have an acknowledged indebtedness of 237 millions, as stated by the Finance Minister the other night, and when we consider that we are subject to an annual interest charge within a few dollars of ten millions, as shown by the Auditor General's account, although the Finance Minister says it is less, I say that it is going a step altogether beyond the abilities of the people of this country to consent to a grant of $80,000 a year for twenty years to construct this line. Let us wait patiently till our North-West is filled up. Let us utilize the lines we have already produced at a very large cost to this Dominion, let us utilize the magnificent line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the water-stretches that we have in this Dominion and that are an undoubted advantage to us; and when Manitoba and the North-Wess get a population of four or five millions, then, if we find the carrying capacity of those lines are insufficient to meet the requirements it will be quite time enough to consider the propriety of staking the resources of the Dominion to produce other lines. Let us lie quietly by, doing everything we can to increase our population and to fill up the lands in the North-West that are still lying unoccupied. It would be very much better to take a small proportion of that money and devote it to an active and energetic immigration policy, that would bring into the older provinces men from the old country who would take up lands that are now for sale at a reasonable price, and allow those who are struggling under financial embarrassments to go and take up new land in the North-West. Let us fill up our country with a population first, let us put ourselves in the position to produce a great deal more than we are producing at the present moment, and when the necessity arises, if further export accommodation should be necessary then we can furnish it; but in my opinion it is unwise and imprudent to ask our consent in the meantime for such a large outlay when it is not necessary. Let me say that if any one argument would be necessary to convince me that this outlay is unnecessary it is the fact that the produce of the country that goes by the Hudson Bay route has got to lie in transit for from eight to nine months before it reaches the market of Liverpool, for that is the statement of the hon. member for Selkirk. If any one thing beyond another was necessary completely to squelch out any prospects of the undertaking commending itself to this country, it is that statement of the hon. gentleman regarding the time that it will take to carry produce over that route. For these reasons I shall oppose the scheme, and if the resolution is carried, when the Bill is introduced, I shall from time to time present resolutions declaring that until such time as the municipalities of western Ontario, which have built their own roads and never received a single dollar, have been recouped for their outlay, not a dollar shall go towards the construction of this road.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). I wish to correct one statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). He says the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) made the remark that this road could not ship out grain during the season in which it was grown, and therefore he opposed it. Now, that was not the expression of the member for Selkirk. What the member for Selkirk said was, as I understood him, that even by our present route viâ Lake Superior the bulk of our grain could not be shipped out in the year in which it was grown, and that viâ the Hudson Bay route, if we could not do any better, we could at least do that much. The hon. member for Selkirk and myself both think that we can ship out more grain in the season in which wheat is grown by the Hudson Bay route than we can at present viâ Lake Superior and Lake Huron.

Mr. DALY. I suppose a word of explanation from me is necessary. I do not suppose this matter would have obtained any prominence were it not for the remarks of the hon. and clever gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Watson), and if he had not the mind of a child he would have understood exactly what I said. I read from a pamphlet, quotation after quotation, showing the months within which the Straits were navigable, that is, from June to December. What I said with reference to wheat going out—and I want the statesman from North Wellington to bear this in mind, although I may not have explained myself as fully as I might have done—was that the bulk of the grain from Manitoba and the North-West would be stored, just as the bulk of the grain from the North-Western States is stored to-day at Duluth. We know that at Duluth there are fourteen or fifteen million bushels of wheat stored during the winter season. What I undertook to say, and what I say now, is that the bulk of the threshing in Manitoba is done in and after October; though there is threshing done in September, and there is a large amount of grain shipped in September by the lakes to Eastern Ontario and Quebec to be ground into flour for the people of the eastern provinces; but the bulk of the wheat of Manitoba is bought after the period at which navigation closes. It is true that in certain portions of Manitoba where grain ripens more rapidly than in others, people endeavour to get their grain to market earlier, in order to get the advantage of low freight rates by water, but the bulk of our wheat at present has got to lie in elevators until navigation is opened in the spring. There is a quantity of wheat shipped during the winter viâ Boston on the all-rail route, but only a small quantity. The evidence I have adduced to the House shows conclusively that if this Hudson Bay route is navigable between June and December we can, if there is grain threshed, as I admit there is, in September, earlier get the benefit of the Liverpool market. But it is a matter of perfect indifference to the farmer. It is not the farmer who will have grain stored in the elevators at Fort Churchill or other points on Hudson Bay, as at the present time thousands of bushels of grain are held every year by buyers at the elevators at Port Arthur after the cash is paid over. If this is the only argument against the Bill I do not think it will affect the question before the House.

Mr. WATSON. As explanations are in order, I desire to offer one, especially as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has been allowed a second speech. The hon. member for Selkirk said that if I had the mind of a child I might understand what he said. I admit that if I had the mind of a child I might understand what he said, but as I have a mature mind it is very hard to understand what he meant to say, when he said exactly the contrary.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not altogether surprised at the opposition which has suddenly arisen against the resolution, because it is quite in harmony with the pessimistic policy usually displayed by hon. members opposite respecting the development of this country. Their ideas rarely extend beyond their own limited localities, and if they succeed in convincing their constituents that every dollar should come there they have accomplished a great deal, for beyond that they have no higher aim. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has reminded the members from Western Ontario that they will be called to account for this vote, and he said he proposed to divide the House on it, and he declared that not one dollar should be spent in that country for railway schemes until Ontario was recouped her outlay for railways in the past. The people of Ontario occupy a very different position from these people in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman's constituents have railways all round them to-day, and are in a very different position from the western people, who have to struggle with the difficulties of life and have not the comforts to be found in the older settlements. The hon. gentleman spoke as if we would be rolling up some large debt to the Dominion by carrying out this, which he designated as a wild-cat scheme. I wonder what he understands by this term? I presume he means an impracticable scheme, the scheme of a railway going into an inhospitable country where settlement was never likely to take place, and for the reason that they would be unable to raise crops from their labour there would be no use for railways. Regarding the practicability of navigating Hudson Bay, I need say but little. But I hold different views from those who declare this region is an inhospitable one and will grow nothing. In 1883 I brought down to Ontario potatoes raised at Fort York and Fort Churchill, and on the shores of Hudson Bay, weighing two pounds and two and a-quarter each. I was assured by a person who grew them that not only would potatoes grow there, but small fruits and other vegetables would grow to maturity as well as in any part of Ontario. If this is the case, and this is a fact beyond dispute, it is a guarantee that this is not an inhospitable region, and that it is only a matter of time when it must be settled by people who will come from Ontario and other parts of the country. But the question is this: Does this involve any divergence from the policy of years past? What has been the policy of this Government? It has been to throw as rapidly as possible colonization railways into different unsettled parts of the country. In many sections of the North-West people from Ontario and foreigners have been struggling hard with the difficulties of life, and railway communication is an important factor in enabling them to cope with those difficulties. In the prairie country the railways are even more needed than in the wooded district. This is no divergence from the principle we have adopted and followed for several years past. This is not rolling up debt against this country. We have been giving liberal subsidies to any company willing to extend railways to any part of the country where there were settlements and where there was no settlement at present. This is a colonization railway, not aided by land but by a money subsidy; not as money given away, but a loan of money from the country, for which we are to get a return in the shape of the carriage of mails and freight which will be needed as settlement advances. It is not as if this road were going to pass through a country all of which had to be settled, because there are different sections already well settled.

Mr. LISTER. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say there was no land subsidy?

Mr. SPROULE. This resolution does not offer a land subsidy, but a loan, for which we are to receive labour in return. I am speaking of the resolution which is now engaging our attention. There are localities where considerable settlement has taken place already, and it becomes important that a railway should be built at the earliest possible date, and therefore the necessity of devising some scheme whereby gentlemen can obtain money to build it. When we remember that we are not piling up debt, but that it is a loan from which we shall receive a return in a short time, and that we are not giving all the money to-day but spreading it over twenty years, when settlement will have reached that country, not only from Ontario and other provinces but from European countries, it is apparent that we will obtain not only a return of the money but a much larger return in the shape of dutiable materials consumed. I do not understand why Ontario people should feel injured because we propose to give to their friends and relatives some of the facilities and conveniences of life found in that part of the country which they have left. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has no doubt many of his constituents out there, as I and many others in Ontario have. It is not unfair and unjust to assist them to cope with the difficulties incidental to a new country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did the hon. gentleman not vote against the proposed charter through this part of the country when proposed by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) last year?

Mr. SPROULE. I am talking of the present motion, and if the philosopher for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will confine himself to the subject I will be content to answer his question. The opposition to this measure is most unreasonable, illogical and unfair, and I do not think any people in Ontario would condemn the proposal to aid in building a railway through this very important part of the country, where there is plenty of water, plenty of timber and arable land.

Mr. DENISON. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) seemed to wish to have some opinions from Ontario members in regard to granting $80,000 a year. As a member for Ontario I may say I heartily endorse the grant of $80,000 per annum for this railway, and I do so for this reason: that it is a part of the country which is entirely unknown and unsettled beyond the confines of Manitoba; within the confines of Manitoba, I understand, it is fairly well settled, and the people there require means of access to the markets of Ontario and the east, while beyond that little or nothing is known. From that district up to Hudson Bay it is practically a terra incognita—people know little about it; but with the expenditure of this sum of money the people of Canada can have access to that inland sea and will be able to know whether the fisheries are as productive as they are reported. We will be able to see also whether the forests are capable of development in the way of timber limits, and so forth.

Mr. GIBSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DENISON. It is most likely also that there will be a great development of mineral wealth in that district. An hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but I recollect hon. gentlemen opposite spoke in the same way about the Canadian Pacific Railway. We were told by them that the Canadian Pacific Railway would not earn sufficient to pay for axle grease for running it, but we find now that the Canadian Pacific Railway is the only railway in the whole country paying a dividend, not only on its bonds but on its stock, a fact which I think can hardly be said about another railway in the whole length and breadth of Canada. When hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches they concluded it would not pay to build the Canadian Pacific Railway line through the Lake Superior section. They started their line from Port Arthur, but now we find that part of the road developing into one of the richest nickel countries in the whole world, and we find many thousands of people pouring into that country, while a few years ago we looked upon it as useless and barren. Again, Sir, when I was west of the Rockies, two years ago, I was told that the Kootenay district was developing into a rich and valuable country; the Canadian Pacific Railway let daylight in there, allowed the people to get in their machinery and gave them a chance of prospecting and developing its great riches. From the very first I have always had strong views on the question of assisting the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay, and whether the outlet to the sea can be used or not is really after all, to my mind, a secondary consideration. Of course, if it can be developed, and a line of steamships can be run from Fort Churchill or Fort Nelson to England and other European ports, it will be a great advantage, and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) has read to-night the statements of a dozen or more gentlemen showing that that bay was open to navigation from three to five months during the summer. We all know that for 200 years back the Hudson Bay Company have been sending their steamers there every year. It has been an accessible water for 200 years, and we have never heard of any disaster happening. Even supposing that this does not turn out as good a route as we should hope, still it will develop that great inland sea, and will permit the Canadian people, who have an adventurous turn of mind, to prospect that country and to fish on the seas. I am satisfied that the people of Canada will never regret the granting of the small sum of money asked for this great Dominion work, which will develop that valuable country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has considered how many million acres there are which have been opened up by railway communication in the North-West, where no settlement has yet been had and which are still open for settlers?

Mr. DENISON. It is not altogether a question of settlement. I am in favour of still more developing our country. I believe in opening up the whole country, and I believe, too, that we cannot have too much development.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I did not expect to have an opportunity of addressing the House on this question to-night, but as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) has asked what will be the position of the member for Algoma on this question I take the opportunity now to reply. I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the Minister of the Interior and I also listened with attention to the introductory remarks of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn), but as his argument appeared to me to stray far afield, and as the gentlemen in the back benches sweltering under a semi-trophical sun could hardly stand the pressure when he talked of the immense icebergs and the floating ice in Hudson Bay, I took the opportunity to retire from the House at that time to get into a cooler sphere. Now, I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that with regard to my own district of Algoma I can place myself on record in a very decided way. The hon. gentleman's argument, as I said before, appeared to wander far afield: it wandered in fact all the way to Hudson Bay, where this resolution did not intend to carry it at all. As I understand the proposition made by the Government to-night, it is a question whether or not the Government of the day will bonus a colonization railway to some point on the Saskatchewan. That scheme I am prepared to support, and I may tell the hon. gentleman and the House that I would be prepared to go even further to-night if the matter under discussion was to subsidize or bonus the whole Hudson Bay Railway. With regard to the district which I have the honour to represent, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) evidently intended to make it appear that if I supported this scheme it would be taking traffic away from the town to which I belong and from other towns in the district of Algoma. I dispute that contention in toto. I think, Sir, that by the development of the great west there will be traffic enough for us all, whether we are residents of Port Arthur, or whether we are residents of Winnipeg, or whether we are residents of Toronto, or any other city of Canada; and I am prepared to-night to support this resolution on the ground that this railway opens up one of the finest stretches of country in the Province of Manitoba. There is no finer part of the Dominion of Canada than the Lake Dauphin country, through which it is proposed to construct this railway, and, as I have already said, I would be disposed to go further than even subsidizing this railway, and subsidize the whole Hudson Bay road. I cannot approve of the stand which the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has taken to-night, for it strikes me that his policy is a very selfish one to propose in this House. It strikes me, as a western man, as a man whose duty it is to develop, to the greatest extent, his own district, as well as the whole western district of this great Dominion of Canada, that the hon. gentleman's proposition is selfish in the extreme. I come to this Parliament as a representative of those people who have received aid from the present Government to build a railway through a mining region, and I can say to the members of this House that I am not prepared to support this resolution? I had the honour of coming to Ottawa with my predecessor in the representation of Algoma and soliciting aid for the construction of a railway in my district. Let me ask, who are building that railway to-day? They are not my political friends nor the political friends of the Government, but they got that aid, and that railway is being constructed through a mining region, as I said, almost a wilderness. It is through a mining district, and the result remains to be seen what the producing capacity and what the output of that district is going to be. Sir, my district has received from this Government nearly $300,000 to aid in the construction of that railway, and would I not be a craven to that district and to the Dominion of Canada if I did not stand up here to-night and advocate the grant to this railway which has been proposed by the hon. Minister of the Interior? Therefore, I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. FORBES. Before the resolution is put I would like to say a few words. Though as a member of this House I am favourable generally to the granting of bonuses to railways, I do not agree with the object of this resolution, which is for the grant by this Parliament of $80,000 a year for twenty years for the building of a railway to Hudson Bay. If the object is to aid in the extension of the road to Hudson Bay, a distance of some 800 miles, then all I can say is that that has not been honestly put before the House in the resolution as it stands. The objections to this project which have been put forward by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) are most pertinent to the case, and there has been no attempt to answer them. The experts who were sent out by the Dominion Government have shown that Hudson Straits are actually non-navigable, except for two or possibly three months in the year. Now, if the syndicate who are promoting this undertaking are doing it on a commercial basis they should make some effort to show that the reports of these experts are not in accordance with the facts, and they should be prepared to lay before the House proper evidence in contradiction of the statements made by the hon. member for East Simcoe. Moreover, I would call the attention of the Maritime Province members in this House to the effect of the passage of this resolution on the Atlantic ports of the Dominion. We have in Nova Scotia a large grain elevator, which was built for the purpose of holding the grain brought from western Canada over the Intercolonial Railway and other railroads for shipment to foreign ports. If it is intended by this resolution to divert that line of trade from the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Maritime ports to the Hudson Bay, I take it that the Maritime members of this House will, as a unit, oppose it—not on the general principle that it is wrong to subsidize railways, but because the impracticability also of this scheme is a sufficient excuse for them to oppose the diversion of that trade which should come to their own ports. My province, one of the counties of which I have the honour to represent, has put forward paramount claims for aid to railways. We have in the Counties of Queen's and Shelburne a strong agitation on foot for a railway which I might classify—according to the description given of the Hudson Bay road by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly)—as a colonization road. The hon. member claims that the proposed grant should be made to the Hudson Bay Railway, on the ground of its being a colonization road, which will open up new lands to settlement, as well as valuable timber limits and mill sites. If that is a valid argument for a grant of $80,000 a year for twenty years to this railway, with how much greater reason can we, in Queen's and Shelburne, ask for a subsidy for the 45 or 47 miles of our railway which are yet unsubsidized, on the basis that our railway is a colonization road? Because the construction of our line will have the effect of opening up large timber limits and great powerful mill sites, and bringing people engaged in the lumber business nearer to the centres of trade. If that is a good argument why we should support the proposed subsidy to the Hudson Bay Railway, I say on the same ground that $20,000 a year for twenty years, or even $10,000 a year for twenty years, would give us a sufficient sum of money, if capitalised, to build our railway. If it can be fairly urged that Parliament is pledged to this scheme on the ground that a resolution in favour of it has already been accepted by the House, I say that we are equally entitled to a grant on the ground that Parliament has already agreed to the principle of the railway in the Counties of Queen's and Shelburne. From the peculiar nature of this proposition I feel myself bound to oppose it, though not on the ground taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who oppose a general distribution of public moneys for railways on the ground that the public debt of Canada is too large. I look at the matter in a different light altogether. I hold that the public debt of Canada, if incurred for public works, is properly incurred by the Government of the day; but it behooves the Government as trustees of that fund to consider wisely whether they are going to support a measure like this, which is so fraught with danger to the investors of capital, which is loaded with visions of profit having no practical foundation, that it is likely to reflect on the credit of the country and embarrass the promoters of future schemes of utility in this country. I can understand the hon. members for Selkirk, Lisgar and Marquette supporting this measure, because the railway is designed, as we might say in vulgar phrase, to go right past their barn doors, and interests their constituencies. In so far as it assists in developing and expanding north-western Canada, I am in favour of the scheme. In so far as it does assist in developing the North-West, I am in favour of a grant; but, I say, as it stands to-day, it is in an incomplete and insufficient condition and not entitled to our support. If the promoters would come in with the resolution asking a grant for a portion of the line, 100 or 200 or possibly 250 miles, on account of colonization, they might expect the support of hon. members on this side; but when they ask our support, on the ground that it is to be extended to a point on Hudson Bay, with the object of carrying the trade of the great North-West through that channel, and when it is shown, conclusively, that such a scheme will not warrant the arguments put forward on its behalf, and that it goes beyond the wants of the country, it is our bounden duty to oppose any grant. And, therefore, I feel bound to oppose this resolution.

Mr. DAVIN. I need hardly say that I listened with pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, although I cannot agree with his arguments. It is impossible to keep from one's mind the building of the Hudson Bay Railway, and I do not think it would be desirable to do so. The resolution reads as follows:—

"That it is expedient, in order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company to construct a railway from the city of Winnipeg to some point on the Saskatchewan river," and so on.

So that the resolution itself suggests, and very properly suggests, the time when, instead of having a colonization railway before us from Winnipeg to some point on the Saskatchewan, we shall have the Hudson Bay Railway running right from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay. And not only that, but the map which is on the table and those which have been circulated by the promoters of this scheme contemplate a Hudson Bay Railway, not merely from Winnipeg to some point, either Nelson or Fort Churchill, on the Hudson Bay, but a railway running south-west from the Hudson Bay right into the heart of the territory, and from the North-West Territories right down to the Pacific coast in the United States. Now, if it were only a colonization road I consider that it should still get the support of this House. It goes through a country and into a country that will invite settlement. That portion of the Saskatchewan country which it will open up is known to every one familiar with the North-West as a portion of the North-West that may invite the largest possible amount of settlement. But, Sir, I think that regarded as the herald of a complete Hudson Bay Railway, as the herald, not merely of the Hudson Bay Railway from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, but also of a railway that will inevitably be built from Hudson Bay south-west right into the heart of the territory, and running down to the Pacific coast of the United States, it is a still more desirable scheme to support. If the Committee will bear with me for a moment I will point out that if you take a map properly scaled and use a measuring line you will find that the distance from Fort Nelson to San Francisco is precisely the same as from San Francisco to Chicago. There is as much evidence as that picked by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn), to show that the Hudson Bay is navigable for four and a-half months in the year. In fact, the Bay is navigable for the whole year; but with regard to those Straits on which the hon. gentleman dwelt at such length, the Straits near Nottingham, there is evidence in the very same documents from which he quoted—the evidence of experts who have made four and five voyages through these Straits—to prove that they are navigable for four and a-half months during the year. The leader of the Opposition, who is an experienced lawyer, knows that if you were to take the report of a case in court, and cull the testimony of a few witnesses, you might prove also almost anything; and if the hon. member for East Simcoe had been as impartial as he was earnest and had given us the evidence of such experts as Professor Bell and some seven or eight others, who had made a voyage through these Straits between the middle of June and the middle of November, he would have found that the evidence on which he relied so much, namely, that in some places the ice went down to the bottom, is incredible, for these places are three hundred and a still greater number of fathoms deep.

Mr. LAURIER. What says the report?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was the report he read.

Mr. DAVIN. He read the evidence of witnesses. I think myself that Mr. Gordon was prejudiced against the road. I say he was, because we have the evidence of experts, men just as skilful as he, who made these voyages within the middle of June and November, and they declare solemnly that these Straits are navigable for three and four months during the year. What is the fact? That route is the historical route. It is the route the Hudson Bay Company has used. My hon. friend was again incorrect when he stated that the Hudson Bay Company was accustomed to build and buy ships of great strength. Why, they do nothing of the kind. They have been accustomed to buy ships by no means so strong as the hon. gentleman represented, and it is in evidence they have sometimes bought ships anything but strong. They require boats not drawing much water, in order that they may be able to go up to York Factory, where the water is very shallow. It is because this is part of the great Hudson Bay Railway that I support it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It may go in the opposite direction.

Mr. DAVIN. How?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) It may run to the North-West.

Mr. DAVIN. One moment. My hon. friend from Selkirk naturally looked at this from a Manitoba point of view. I naturally look at it from a North-West point of view; and if my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Macdowall), who takes a very deep interest in this question, were here, he would also look at it from the point of view of the North-West. What I look forward to is the time when we shall have a railway running almost in a straight line from Fort Churchill down to San Francisco: and what would that do? It would drain all the wealth of the Pacific coast, not merely in Canada, but in the United States. The distance from the Hudson Bay at Fort Nelson to San Francisco is exactly the same as from San Francisco to Chicago, and, under these circumstances, looking at the immense length of a railway from Chicago to the Atlantic, if you take the distance—because you get to the short parallels—from Hudson Bay to Liverpool, you will find that by the Hudson Bay route, of which I now speak, Japan will be 2,300 miles nearer Liverpool than it is to-day. Such a railway would bring the North-West from 700 to 1,000 miles nearer to Liverpool. What does that mean for the North-West farmer—for the men of Prince Albert and Battleford, and Moose Jaw, and Regina? It means 15 cents a bushel more for their wheat than can be got under the present conditions of transport. And under those circumstances I say that, once grant that those Straits are navigable for three or four months in the year, you have the real North-West railway which is to take out the grain of the North-West. I may refer to the speech of my hon. friend, the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), to whose remarks I always pay the greatest possible attention, because he is one of the most laborious and most estimable members of this House, and it is always instructive to listen to him. He takes the greatest possible pains to gather facts and figures, and he is always well posted. The only fault I have to find with him is probably that the light that gleams on those figures is not of the broadest kind. Now, I found him somewhat inconsistent. I was very glad to hear him say—because I think I heard something different from these hon. gentlemen in other days—that he wanted immigration to go into that country; he said that he wanted immigration to go into Ontario, and, to make room for these immigrants, he wanted the people of Ontario, whose farms are so largely mortgaged, to go up to the North-West. He wants to have boundless room for these people in the North-West, but he objects to a small expenditure which would result in opening up more country for them to occupy. I found that somewhat inconsistent. When conversing with merchants in Quebec, in Toronto and in Montreal, I found that already the custom of the North-West is of the greatest value to them. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) speaks in reference to certain municipalities in the west, and proposes that, until they get something which he says they are entitled to, nothing more should be done to the North-West. Sir, the North-West is like some vast undeveloped farm belonging to the people of Canada, and, as you develop it, you add to the wealth of Canada. If you go to the merchants and manufacturers of Canada from Quebec, the old capital, to Sarnia, they will declare to you that they have done well out of the North-West, and the more you swell the population there and the more you bring in the immigration which I am glad to see my hon. friend is desirous of having brought in the more it will be for the general benefit of Canada. My hon. friend talks about this as a wild-cat scheme and as being impracticable. We heard the same thing about the Canadian Pacific Railway in other days, and not so long ago; but from the same hon. gentlemen who talked about that railway ten or twelve years ago with doubt we now hear that it is a great railway. It is a great railway, but within two or three years with a single line, as every one knows, as Mr. Van Horne knows, it will be inadequate to take out the produce of the North-West to the sea.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many trains are run a day?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know, but I do not think a great many more trains can be run with a single line. You may know more about railways than I do. I do not profess to be a railway man. But I have heard railway men say that with a single line the Canadian Pacific Railway will not be able in a short time to carry the produce of the North-West. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) smiles incredulously. It is the amiable disease of the philosophic mind to be incredulous.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you ought to be the most incredulous man in the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I have a buoyant nature, which counterbalances my philosophic pessimism. I have heard railway men say that they doubt, and even in 1887 they doubted, whether the Canadian Pacific Railway would be able to carry all the produce of the North-West. Anyway, it is certain that in a short time one line will not be able to carry it out. If that is not so, why should the Northern Pacific try to get an entrance there? Why should the Grand Trunk desire to get a line into the North-West? Not for the sake of having a line in the North-West, not for the sake of spending tens of thousands, or even millions, of dollars in order to have a line there as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway, but because they know that, in a very short time, the carrying trade from that country will be valuable. My hon. friend says: Rely upon these great lines, and let us wait. That was the cry exactly which we heard in other days and which is echoed now. I think we heard it from my hon. friend from Norfolk last year, and this year I have heard it said that it would have been much better if we had not built the Canadian Pacific Railway so rapidly, but had gone slowly and taken twenty or thirty years to build it, so that we might have peopled the country gradually as we proceeded. I say it was the greatest pity in the world that the scheme to build that road in 1873 did not go into force, as then we should have been ten years advanced in the North-West. I say now to these gentlemen who doubt about this line and take the same attitude in regard to it as they did in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway that they are making the same mistake. They doubt whether it is feasible, they doubt whether it will pay, they doubt whether the money will not be thrown into the sea by taking this course. Five or six years hence, when some other railway scheme is before the House, these gentlemen will say: let us rely on the one line from Winnipeg to the Hudson Bay—forgetful of all this cold water which they have tried to throw upon this resolution, which is simply a tentative scheme—proposing not to go too fast but step by step. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Forbes) has spoken of the trade which is likely to be taken away from Halifax if we have the Hudson Bay Railway completed. I believe that the more we develop every portion of Canada the better it is for every other portion. I believe you cannot make any portion of Canada too rich, and in my own small way I have preached to the people of the North-West, where there is a great deal of jealousy between the rival towns, that they should not be jealous one of the other, but should work for the common good. The leader of the Opposition is far too enlightened not to agree with me that, if we believe, as can be proved, that these Straits can be navigated for three or four months in the year, if this railway is what we believe it will be, this railway will be for the general benefit of Canada. Referring again to my hon. friend from Queen's, I must say, if I may do so without offence, that his speech gave promise of his being a useful ornament to this House. What may happen, after all, in reference to that same Nova Scotia in which he is interested, and in which he takes so much patriotic pride? Look at the map! You will find that such a railway as this Hudson Bay railway, such a large scheme, such a scheme as is adumbrated in the map which is before you, will bring the grain from Assiniboia, from the Saskatchewan, from Alberta, down to those forts on the Hudson Bay, and it is possible that we will see ships from Halifax coasting around to the Hudson Bay to take that grain to the city my friend is interested in. My hon. friend is laughing; he facetiously says "in ice-boats." Sir, when this is completed you will have infallibly many and many a cargo of grain taken from Churchill and or from Port Nelson, whichever happens to be the place ultimately adopted, right round through those Straits, right down by the coast into the very port of Halifax. My hon. friends laugh, but they laughed at other things which afterwards came true. Now, I rose merely as a North-West man to show the interest that we take in this matter and also to expose, if I may venture to hope that I have exposed, one or two fallacies that have been uttered in this debate. I hope the House will pass the resolution, and I hope that the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), when the Bill comes down, will be in one of his genial moods—for when he is in a genial mood he is one of the most genial of men—and that he will not carry out his desperate threat of opposing the measure at every stage.

Mr. FRASER. This scheme appeals to me on account of its magnificent proportions. There is everything about it to make men in this House enthusiastic. It is going to enable tourists to go through that country and enquire what kind of a country it is; that is a great matter. It is going to enable them to see whether there are timber limits in that country, so that we will no longer be obliged to travel on foot to find out where the timber limits are. A railway will be more convenient, for we are advancing all the time. It would be too bad for the hon. member for Toronto or myself to have to travel through that country on foot to find out whether there were any timber limits or mineral lands there; and for those who, like myself, are fond of fishing, it would be inconvenient to carry on foot our nets and fishing tackle to fish in the waters of that vast region. Therefore, it appeals to every man in every conceivable way, and I do not see very well how I can oppose it. It means just a million dollars, including interest; about $3,000 a mile for 300 miles, that is just what it means. But a difficulty meets me much more important than the difficulty that presented itself last night, when we had to appoint a Royal Commission to enquire into it. We know little about the character of the country. We do know something about the question for which a Royal Commission was appointed last night, but we know extremely little about this Hudson Bay region, and the evidence we have now, about the feasibility of shipping, is conclusive against it; therefore, we should go another step, and the Government should issue a Royal Commission to obtain proper data for voting this money before we pass this resolution. I can very well understand how the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) would like this railway to be built, and, if anything could make me vote for it, it would be the fact that he wanted it. But there seems to be a diversity of opinion among the members of the North-West themselves. If I understood the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), a few moments ago, he said something about a railway that some one wanted in the North-West, and others wanted it in Manitoba. I am a little confused, but I understood from his remarks that there was really a difference of opinion among the members from that section as to where the road should be built. Be that as it may, from all that I have heard, I am satisfied that this country does not require it. I agree that the money spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway may have been well spent, but I cannot forget that the Minister of Finance himself had to admit that the immigration into that country, notwithstanding the Canadian Pacific Railway, had not come up to our expectations. Now, would it not be wise for us to wait and see whether the Canadian Pacific Railway is going to fulfil all the grand predictions we heard about it, before we vote these millions to build any other railway? We are told it is going to help settlers to come down from the Hudson Bay and settle in the North-West, as if we needed another way for settlers to get into the North-West. If settlers are not going into the North-West by the present road, I submit there is not much chance of getting them to come in by any other. I can well understand how hon. members from the North-West want this road for the benefit of the settlers now there. I happen to come from a county where, from one end of it to Halifax, a distance of nearly 200 miles, there is not a foot of railway. I come from a county that has, according to the last census, a population equal to between one-fifth and one-sixth of the whole population of the North-West, and still there is not a mile of railway in that county. Twelve short miles would bring the county town in connection with the Eastern Extension Railway, but we cannot get it built. Now, I submit that there should be some little consideration shown for the older counties as well as the new counties. Remember that I am not saying a word against the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but that being built, and not having fulfilled the predictions made concerning it, I am afraid, notwithstanding the eloquent manner in which members have spoken in behalf of this scheme, that the prospects do not warrant us in passing this resolution, although we are told that there is going to be a railway from the Pacific coast up to that point, that we shall have vessels from Halifax going to Hudson Bay, and coming back to Halifax on the way to England, and perhaps the grain would have to be put into elevators at Halifax and rest awhile before going over to England. I cannot see my way, therefore, to support this resolution, coming as I do from a province where, although we have received money for railways, we still feel that the wants of our people are not fully met. In view of the fact that the North-West is not being filled up as was anticipated, in view of the fact that we have a falling revenue, in view of that facts that we brushed off the book last night the sum of $2,000,000 a year, I submit that at present I cannot see my way to support this scheme. I do not think we have sufficient evidence to prove that we can have shipping from that point, and as wise legislators we ought to have such data as will convince reasonable men that it is practicable to get some advantage from this scheme before we consent to engage in it. It appears to me that the scheme is undertaken as a speculation. We are told this new country is going to be filled up by people who will pay taxes, if only the settlers were able to get into that country. That is one side of the question; the other side is the hard fact that we will have to pay $80,000 for twenty years on that speculation, without having any data to convince us that it is going to pay. I am not opposing this on sectional grounds at all. While I would like to receive as much money as possible for roads in Nova Scotia, I am bound to say that there is no feeling of sectionalism in my province. If it was going to be for the advantage of the whole Dominion that this road should be built no one would object to it, for I agree that if that country were filled up with settlers the whole nation would benefit by it. But believing that we have not sufficient data before us, that there is no prospect that the scheme would bring us any return, and that older sections require the money, I am bound to oppose the resolution.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think hon. members are entitled to further information on this subject before the resolution is taken out of Committee. It is worthy of the consideration of the House that a number of hon. gentlemen who have this afternoon and this evening so ardently supported this resolution were gentlemen who opposed the construction of the railway 12 months ago through this same section of country, or a very considerable section of it. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) submitted a measure to the House last year for the purpose of connecting the settlement west of Lake Winnipegoosis and Lake Manitoba with the Canadian Pacific Railway by a line of railway lying west of Lake Manitoba. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross), and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), and the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), all of whom have ardently supported this resolution, all of whom have pressed on the attention of the Committee the importance of constructing a railway in that section of the country, were equally ardent and earnest in opposing the Bill of the hon. member for Marquette, and they have not informed the House what new light they have received during the last 12 months to induce them to ask for railway accommodation for small settlements to which they denied railway communication 12 months ago. It would have been interesting if those hon. gentlemen had told the House how it was that they opposed the Bill of the hon. member for Marquette last year and how it is they are supporting this resolution for the purpose of constructing a railway at very considerable expense to the public treasury for the accommodation of the inhabitants of a portion of the same district. Why, this railway, located where it is, as shown on the map, will leave out a settlement nearly 100 miles in length, for which no railway accommodation will be provided. The House will be interested in learning how it is that those hon. members from Manitoba have come to change their minds. Is it because they are not so much interested in furnishing railway accommodation to the inhabitants as in promoting the interests of certain parties who are interested in this charter? How is it they support this scheme, and they opposed the one proposed by the hon. member for Marquette? I do not think there is any difficulty on the part of the Committee in drawing its own conclusions. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is always an ardent supporter of any measures proposed by the Government. I can well understand why the hon. gentleman should support this resolution proposed by a Minister of the Crown, and should have opposed the Bill proposed by a member of the Opposition. It is not the merits of the question that determine the merits of the proposition; it is not the public interests. It depends altogether in whose hands the Bill may be for the time, and who it is that in this House is promoting the measure. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) informed the House that this railway ought to be located in the interests of the population of the North-West Territories, that the interests of the people of Manitoba should not be considered, or that they should be made subordinate.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understood the hon. gentleman to make a distinction between Manitoba and the North-West.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us what he did say?

Mr. DAVIN. What I said was this: that my hon. friends naturally take a great interest in this line as Manitoba men; I take a great interest in it as a North-West man, because I look forward also to a line running from Regina to San Francisco. I did not try to put the North-West Territories above Manitoba, or to contradistinguish them. My hon. friend will remember I said that I regarded this line as the harbinger of a great Hudson Bay Railway that would not only come down to Winnipeg, but would also be carried forward to San Francisco.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman told us that the natural route between Japan, China and Liverpool was a railway extending along the Saskatchewan from Port Nelson or some other port in Hudson Bay. In fact the hon. gentleman told us that the construction of a continental road, a road to convey the traffic from the great east to western Europe, was to be a road altogether different from the Canadian Pacific Railway. And the central portion of Canada should undertake to construct a road lying a thousand miles away from the inhabitants who are to bear the burden and pay the taxes. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) holds that although we have many millions of acres lying in the vicinity of railways already constructed unoccupied and fit for settlement, for which settlers have not been found, we should go on and furnish railway accommodation for every mile of territory which we possess, whether we can get any one to occupy the territory or not.

Mr. DENISON. Not exactly that. It was to develop the western country and the lands there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). To develop a country without inhabitants and for which you are not getting inhabitants where railways are already provided. The hon. gentleman's proposition reminded me very much of a story told by the poet Moore in criticizing a work on Church and State by an English bishop. Moore tells that there were butchers' shops established everywhere throughout Hindostan for the benefit of the Brahmins, and although it was true that the Brahmins would not eat meat, yet, as it was necessary the butchers should live, it was only right they should be compelled to pay for the meat, so long as the meat was provided. And so we must go on and provide railway accommodation for the whole 3,000,000 square miles of territory we possess, although we have at the present time but 5,000,000 of inhabitants. We have to-day railway accommodation for more than three times the inhabitants we possess. What has been the effect of this extraordinary construction of railways, not merely in Canada but in the United States? We have scattered our population over territory many times as large as it should occupy. This has depreciated the value of real estate more than the protective tariff, and we are continuing to do so by pursuing the policy on which hon. gentlemen opposite have set out. Why should the farming population and the industrial and artizan classes of the older provinces burden themselves with additional taxation to provide railway accommodation for men who are still on the other side of the Atlantic and likely to be there for a generation, when every mile of railway built has a tendency to diminish the value of real estate in the settled districts, the amount of capital the people possess, and increase largely the burdens already imposed. I could point to districts in the adjacent Republic where a quarter of a century ago real estate was worth twice what it is to-day, and it is depreciated because a considerable portion of the population have been withdrawn from these districts and taken into the western territories. What are you doing in the North-West? Why, you are withdrawing perhaps five or six thousand people from each of the western counties of Ontario. You have diminished the value of real estate by at least $3,000 for every man you have taken away, and you have scattered these people over an immense area of country where there are bridges to build, school-houses to erect, churches to build, taxes to pay for the maintenence of school-teachers, and where they have immense sums to pay for all these purposes, a mere fraction of which they would only have to pay if they had continued in the agricultural districts of the older provinces. I am not saying that we ought not to encourage settlement in the North-West, but I do maintain that you ought not to go on with the construction of railways far beyond the yet settled portions of the country, and thus enormously diminish the value of real estate in the older provinces and enormously increase the difficulties of life in a new country by the sparseness of the settlements which are established along these immense stretches of railway. I have no doubt that where settlements have already been formed we ought to take into consideration their wants and necessities, but the policy of the Administration with regard to railway construction in the North-West during the past four or five years has gone far beyond this. I know that some hon. gentlemen from the west have pressed upon their constituents their fitness for the place on the ground that these bankrupt companies are indebted to them and that they have a special interest in having them succeed in this House. It seems to me that we will be obliged to call a halt some time or other. You propose now to give $80,000 a year; that represents the interest upon at least $2,000,000 capital which is locked up for twenty years, and what compensating advantage does the country obtain which is called upon to pay that sum of money? Look at the depreciation you are producing in the value of real estate in the older provinces. I am not going to enter now into an elaborate discussion of that question, but it can be made as plain as twice two are four that if you extend railway construction over vast and unsettled regions you will seriously affect the value of real estate, and you diminish the wealth of the country far beyond the amount of money you abstract from the pockets of the people for railway construction. These are matters that ought to be seriously considered by the House. I do not think that the available wealth of this country is an unlimited quantity ; I do not think you can go on taking $80,000 a year for this enterprise, and $80,000 for another, and $80,000 for a third, as you are proposing to do, without seriously affecting the revenue and seriously embarrassing the population of the country. Look at what you have spent already in the North-West. You are paying, and are likely to pay for all time to come, $1,000,000, or $1,200,000 a year for the extinguishment of the Indian title. That represents $25,000,000, and you have more than twice that sum expended already east of the Rocky Mountains upon railway construction. What have you by way of compensation for this large sum of money ? You have simply transferred from the older provinces, if you take into consideration the diminution in the value of real estate, a far larger sum than the $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 you spent in Manitoba or in the North-West Territories. It does seem to me that it is worthy of the serious consideration of the population of Ontario and Quebec how far they are going to continue this system, and when they are going to call a halt. I think that the Minister who has proposed these resolutions ought to tell us whether he proposes that any payment shall be made to the railway company until this portion of the road which is being subsidized is wholly built, whether he proposes any limitation in time, or whether he proposes to continue this railway as an obstacle to private enterprise for all time to come. I think that the House is entitled to know this, and that it is also entitled to know all about the terms of the payment, while it is discussing this resolution. If we get this information we will be able to consider fully the scheme when the hon. gentleman brings down his Bill. We see two proposed routes on the map which is laid on the Table of the House. Can this company run its line where it pleases ; can it go where there are no settlements if it pleases ; or, can it not go through the settlement if it pleases ? I am disposed to support the plan of free railway construction, but it is to be a plan of free railway construction when the companies receive little or no subsidies. When you propose to give a large subvention to a company, it seems to me you ought to have some voice in saying where the road is to go ; but you do not say that in this case. We have no scheme submitted in connection with this railway, except that the road is to begin at Winnipeg and point somewhere north and west, supposing that it is not to point in an easterly direction simply because there is a large body of water standing in the way.

Mr. SEMPLE. I desire to say a few words upon this very important question. It was stated by the Minister of Finance, the other evening, that he intended to follow a policy of economy, and as far as I know I think that the gentlemen on this side of the House will do the best they can to support him in that if he does not go to an extreme. The question now before us is this : We are asked to vote to-night an amount which when capitalized is $2,000,000. If we were asked for a large grant of land there might be very little objection, because we know that during the last few years the amount received for land in the North-West has not been equal to the amount paid out in expenses of agents and charges to capital account for surveys and other matters. Therefore, if we were asked for a large grant of land there might be no objection, but when it comes to a large sum of hard cash at the present time, when we were expecting a policy of economy, it is something we do not care very much about. Now, Sir, it will be remembered that a few weeks ago a large deputation from various counties in Ontario which had granted bonuses to railways waited upon the late Premier and the hon. Minister of Finance, and were accorded a respectful hearing. The claims they made aggregated about $6,000,000. I suppose that if they had received half that sum in hard cash they would have been satisfied. They were told, however, that the matter would have to be decided by Parliament, and that it was doubtful what the other portions of the Dominion would say if that large amount were granted as an act of justice to those counties in Ontario. That was very little encouragement. The people of those counties had spent largely to supply themselves with railways ; they are now subjecting themselves to direct taxation on account of those grants, and they have received no return from this Government. But although there was no money for meeting that just claim, it is proposed now to grant $2,000,000 to this railway in an entirely new country. Now, Sir, it is often said that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a great railway. There is no doubt that it cost a great deal of money, and the worst of it is that the portion of Canada which contributed the most has received the least advantage from that railway. We had the statement made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) the other evening that the Province of Ontario contributed more than half of all the revenue of the country ; therefore, out of the $62,000,000 granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, Ontario has paid $31,000,000 ; and what has the effect been on the Province of Ontario ? That our farmers have realized less every year, that their farms have been reduced in value, and their taxes increased. I hold in my hand a blue-book issued by the Dominion Government, in which there is some very interesting reading ; it is the Railway Statistics of Canada for 1889. From this we learn what has been granted by the Dominion, the provinces and the municipalities for railways. The Dominion has expended for railway bonuses $145,445,322. The Ontario Government has expended $6,097,007, and the municipalities $10,344,541, making altogether $16,441,548. The people of Ontario, when they wanted railways, put their hands into their pockets and built them, and they are now paying heavy taxation for them. Then we find that the Province of Quebec has been very liberal in its expenditure on railways. The Government spent $13,177,453, and the municipalities $4,253,274, making together no less a sum than $17,430,727. The Premier of that province, who is so popular, has gone to the markets of the world to borrow money ; and it is strange to see the very persons who helped to create this expenditure decrying his Government, so that he may fail in obtaining a loan. Under these circumstances, do you think the people of that province will be willing to increase their burdens by granting this large sum of money to the Hudson Bay Railway ? The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn), who entered largely into the subject this afternoon, showed from a carefully prepared report made by an expert that this is an impracticable scheme. It is something like that other wild-cat scheme of a ship railway that is to carry ships across New Brunswick. Now, it has been said that many of the people in the North-West are living far away from railways. I grant it. I remember the time when there was not a railway in Ontario. Even after we had the Grand Trunk and the Northern many of our farmers had to team their grain forty or fifty miles, and I do not know but many of them made as much money then as they do now, perhaps more. Those men learned to take things as they found them, even though they did not move very fast: but they endeavoured to clear up the land and make improvements, and if some of them have done well it has only been by hard work. I do not pity the people of the North-West if they have to wait a few years before they get all the railways they want. I believe that both Liberals and Conservatives would be in favour of this road it they could be shown that any good purpose would be served by it. But everybody knows that in a town high taxes depreciate the value of property, and so when Dominion taxation is high, it is a drain on the people, and times are not so good that we can afford to be lavish in our expenditure. In the admirable speech which Mr. Hague delivered the other day at the annual meeting of the Merchants Bank he said that in no year had there been so much bankruptcy in the Dominion of Canada as there was last year, when the failures involved something like $17,800,000 of liabilities. That does not show a condition of prosperity: it shows that too many people have been depending for their prosperity upon borrowed money. Now I hope this will not pass. I hope that this era of economy, of which we have heard so much lately, will begin in earnest, and I shall cheerfully support the Finance Minister in everything reasonable.

Mr. WELSH. As far as the navigation of the Hudson Bay route is concerned, there is no trouble about it. I believe a powerful wooden steamer of two thousand tons or a steel steamer adapted for the ice could make two round trips from England safely to the Hudson Bay every year. I have sold some ships to the Hudson Bay Company in London for that purpose, and have had many interviews with them about the navigation of the Bay, and I think there would be no difficulty in opening that route if the country could afford it. I would be the last to object to the Bill, but we have already expended a very large sum in opening up that country with different railways, and I do not think the financial affairs of the Dominion are in such a very prosperous condition that we can encumber ourselves with a few more millions. The Government ought to look around and see the aspect of affairs in other countries. There is the Argentine Republic, and Chili, and New Zealand, which have been going ahead with their boasted highfalutin prosperity, and have fallen in the money market to the depths we all know of to-day. Look at their stock in the English market to-day, and see where their extravagance has left them? Why, in New Zealand the officials have to work for half pay. I do not think our position is very bad, but I remember only last year the late lamented leader of the Government said he thought it was high time we should call a halt in this railway expenditure, and I think it would be well for the Government to be cautious. I do not like to say anything against the scheme, because I think the members from the North-West ought to be the best judges of their requirements, but I would suggest that the Government should use caution. We had a speech yesterday from the member from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), who gave us his view of the financial affairs of Prince Edward Island, of which he had evidently made a deep study; and as he appears to be a man of great information and deep thought, who has no doubt crossed the pons asinorum and understands a great many things, though there are many asses bridges he has not yet crossed, I would like him to give us a statement, from his point of view, of the state of affairs with regard to the North-West. I have no doubt that he is a useful member of this House, and that he makes a deep study of the financial standing of the different provinces. He gave us Prince Edward Island yesterday, and the least he should do is to give us his opinion concerning the expenditure of $2,000,000 for the construction of this road.

Mr. COCKBURN. I do not think the hon. gentleman is exactly in order; and although I am willing to undertake, as I have undertaken in the earlier part of my life, to handle some pretty recalcitrant subjects, still there are limits, and I really could not undertake the instruction of the hon. gentleman. I must draw the line at my hon. friend.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The debate has taken a much wider range than I had anticipated. I did not anticipate that the Hudson Bay Railway scheme would be the leading question this afternoon. However, I think the promoters of this Bill will find no fault with the debate, which, so far as it has gone, will do them no injury, particularly as the feasibility of the Hudson Bay route has been ably supported by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh), whose maritime experience is so well known, not only in this House but in all parts of the Dominion. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) went very largely into the question of the Hudson Bay Railway. No doubt he has been preparing himself for some time, for we must recognize the fact that he was loaded up to the hilt with regard to this question. My impression is, however, that the hon. gentleman has never visited our western country; and it was very noticeable in this debate to see the difference between the views of those who have visited that country and those who have not. Both the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) misunderstood the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), because I am perfectly aware that hon. gentleman is of the same opinion with regard to the main question of the Hudson Bay Railway as its promoters, and is also, I believe, in favour of the road which the Government have now placed before the House for consideration. I was rather interested in the remarks of the hon. member for West Assiniboia in reference to the main line he spoke of from San Francisco to Hudson Bay, because that is the line which has been laid out on the maps ever since that scheme has been mentioned, and it is one which, if the Hudson Bay scheme proper is found to be feasible, will be constructed in the future, if not in the near future. However, I do not propose to take up the time of the House with reference to that question, but wish to call its attention to the fact that this is a colonization road for which the Government is asking assistance. In answer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I may say that on the 16th May, 1890, the Bill was passed respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway, which compels the completion of this piece of line to the Saskatchewan River within four years from the 21st of June, 1890, and that is the time to which the present company will be limited for the completion of the first 300 miles from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan; and nothing is to be paid of the subsidy until the road is completed. Of course, the hon. member for Bothwell understands that this is exactly on the same principle as the assistance given the other two roads, one of which is completed and the other under construction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This road is tied to no particular location.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No. While I mention that, I may say that the old location of the road, which is filed in the railway office as being a part of the Hudson Bay road proper, was the piece which runs between the two lakes, Manitoba and Winnipeg. It is proposed by the promoters, with the consent of the Government, to vary that, and to cross at the rapids of the old crossing of the Mackenzie line, in order to accommodate settlement, which is very much greater to the west of Lake Manitoba than the settlement between the two lakes. A question was raised by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), in reference to that, and he appeared to think that the deviation, the crossing at the Narrows, and the adoption of the route by Lake Winnipegoosis, would make the line to Hudson Bay very long. I have nothing to do with that to-day. I think a few miles extra in length will be of advantage, because the line will traverse a much better section of country than it would between the two lakes. He also spoke very feelingly as to placing any scheme on the market which he thought would be unprofitable and likely to result unfavourably to the investors. I should be sorry to advocate any scheme for the English market which I thought was not a legitimate scheme and one for fair speculation. We know that the syndicate which took up the bonds of the Regina and Prince Albert road, built that road in the time they proposed to build it. The same syndicate took up the Calgary and Edmonton road, and I have no doubt they would be glad to take up this scheme if they had the opportunity. So I have no doubt that, if we can be guided by the results in the case of the other two roads, this will not be a speculation which will be disappointing to the investors. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke of the opposition which was given to a line promoted by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) last year. If I recollect aright, there was more than one charter before the Government at that time. I think there were two, if not three. One of them was passed, and a land grant was given, and I have no doubt that in the near future that road from Portage la Prairie to the northern end of the Dauphin Lake will be constructed. There was a conflict, I know, between the two charters at that time, but there was no political significance in it, as far as I am aware, because the gentlemen who were concerned belonged to both sides of politics, and therefore the insinuation, if I may call it so, of the hon. member for Bothwell, has no ground. All the people of that section wanted was a charter covering that piece of country, and it was granted. I should also like to impress upon the Committee that this $80,000 a year is only an advance to the company. An agreement will be made similar to those which were made with the two other lines of railway which have been constructed on the same basis as this. It is a loan, and is expected to be paid back at any rate within the twenty years. I have here a copy of the agreement which was made with the Calgary and Edmonton road, which states very clearly what the conditions are, and the conditions will be similar in this case. They are very explicit. The money advanced has to be paid back, and the Government retain one-third of the land grant to secure them against loss, and, of course, the land is increasing in value from year to year. Therefore, the Government risk nothing in the assistance we propose to give in this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I have always been of opinion, and I still am, that the proper course for a young member in his first session is to be a listener and not a speaker, and I have tried to act on this principle, but I do not think I would be justified in casting a merely silent vote on a question in which my constituents are as deeply interested as they are in this question, and in saying this I am stating the case very mildly, for every one who has lived in Manitoba or the North-West Territories for any time, or has even paid a visit of any length to those portions of the Dominion, must be aware that the people there are a unit in favour of the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. There is no difference of opinion in regard to it amongst people of different races or parties, and whether they come from Canada, England, France or Germany, all are in favour of it, and you will find the strongest Reformer and the most ardent Conservative working together to secure the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. Nothing can more clearly show this than the large majority by which I had the honour of being returned at the last general election, and, if the House will bear with me, I will exemplify my meaning by drawing a comparison between the two elections which took place in Winnipeg in 1887 and 1891. In 1887 the Conservative party chose Mr. W. B. Scarth, my predecessor in this House, as their standard-bearer. He was regarded as being our strongest man. The Reform party put forward no candidate, but Mr. Hugh Sutherland, who was then, as he is now, the president of the Hudson Bay Railway Company, ran as an independent candidate. He refused to pledge himself to support either party, but simply stood on the ground of the construction of the Hudson Bay road. As Mr. Scarth was the Conservative candidate, and Mr. Sutherland had formerly been connected with the Reform party, the latter got the great majority of Reform votes, but as he was an independent candidate, the crack of the party whip was not heard and there were many defections from the Reform party on that occasion. As I have said, Mr. Scarth had the unanimous support of the Conservative party, and although he was known to be a supporter of the Hudson Bay Railway—and if he had not been he would never have had a seat in this House—so many of the people had got it into their heads that by electing Mr. Sutherland they would hasten the completion of that road that, when the ballots came to be counted, Mr. Scarth had a majority of but 12, and on a recount that majority was reduced to 8. During the time which elapsed between that and the next election the Conservative party in Winnipeg was split in twain, owing to differences of opinion in regard to the course of the Dominion Government in disallowing certain local railway charters. In February last the Dominion Government dissolved the House and appealed to the country. At that time I was chosen as the standard-bearer of the Conservative party in Winnipeg. The Reformers put in the field against me a personal friend of my own, Mr. Isaac Campbell, a very strong man, a man who is known and respected from one end of Winnipeg to the other, a man of the highest character and of the strictest integrity, a man whose popularity was so well known that he was styled, not in sarcasm by his foes but by his friends, "The people's Isaac." Notwithstanding that he was the strongest candidate the Reformers could have put in the field, with the possible exception of Colonel McMillan, the Provincial Treasurer, it was found, when the ballots were counted, that he was defeated, not by a majority of 12 or of 8, but by a majority of 509. Now, Sir, no one who knows the constituency will say for one moment that, at the time of the last election, I was a stronger candidate than was my predecessor, Mr. Scarth, four years ago. I am perfectly aware that the unpopularity of the platform of the hon. gentlemen opposite, unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, call it which you will, was quite sufficient to account for the defeat of my friend, Mr. Campbell, popular as he was; still, if that had been the only thing he had to carry on his shoulders, the majority against him would have been comparatively small. But it so happened that a year or two ago, when he was a member of the Local Legislature, where he represented South Winnipeg, in the course of a speech which he delivered in the House he stated that he did not consider the Hudson Bay Railway a pressing necessity, or words to that effect. Well, when the election came on and he offered himself as a candidate for Winnipeg, he stated on the platform over and over again, that, if elected, he would use his utmost endeavours to secure the early construction of that road, and would support any resolution that was introduced into this House with that object in view. Sir, every one who heard him knew that he was a man of his word, but the very fact that there was a shadow of suspicion of lukewarmness on this point was enough to roll up this large majority against him. This feeling is not confined to Winnipeg. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) also gained a considerable portion of his majority on account of the feeling that Mr. Martin was not as energetic in support of the Hudson Bay Railway scheme as he might have been, that feeling arising, I believe, not from any hostility on his part to the scheme in question, but from the personal feeling which he had against Mr. Sutherland, the president of the road. In fact, Sir, there is not a constituency in Manitoba or the North-West Territories in which an opponent of the great Hudson Bay Railway scheme, no matter how popular he might be, no matter how strong a candidate he might be in other respects, could hope to be returned if it was supposed for one moment that he would not back up this scheme to the best of his ability. I know that one of the causes of the return of my hon. friend for Marquette (Mr. Watson) was that he was known as a strong supporter of this road. Now, Sir, I will call your attention, and the attention of the House, to this universal feeling in favour of the road, which pervades Manitoba and the whole North-West Territories, and I must say that I think hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this scheme ought to consider very carefully the reasons on which they base their opposition, before they thus oppose the unanimous wish of a whole people. I have been very sorry to hear from the other side objections raised to this scheme from a provincial point of view. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) appeared to think that Ontario was the only province in Canada, and that the Trent Valley Canal was the only enterprise deserving of any kind of support. That, of course, is a proposition that I know the majority of the members of this House will not endorse. I do not wish to say anything disparaging of the great Province of Ontario. I am proud to say that I am an Ontario man myself. I was born and brought up in that province, and no one admires the energy of the people of Ontario any more than I do; but I do not think that members representing that populous province ought to try to take advantage of the comparative weakness in this House of Manitoba and the North-West, both in population and in representation, to refuse them the privileges which they would press if they were the parties making the request. I do not think it is necessary, at this stage of the proceedings, to enter into any defence of the Hudson Bay Railway scheme as a whole. It has been discussed from various points of view to-night, and I may say that were the Hudson Bay Railway as a whole under discussion I think I could adduce arguments which would at least moderate the views of my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). But as that scheme is not now before the House, and I am sorry to say that it is not, I will not occupy the time of the House by urging arguments in favour of the construction of this road from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay. What we are now considering is a resolution moved by the Minister of the Interior to grant aid to that portion of the road from Winnipeg to the North Saskatchewan, which the Government intend to treat as a colonization road, and which they are perfectly justified in so treating. I may say that I should have been much more pleased, and I know the other members from Manitoba and the North-West would have been much pleased, and their constituents would have been much pleased, had the Government seen fit to extend aid to the whole road. That, however, they have not done, and I think half a loaf is better than no bread, and consequently I intend to support the resolution which is now before the House. But, Sir, I think that if hon. members who oppose it would pay a visit to the North-West, or, more correctly speaking, to the Province of Manitoba, and view the country which will be opened up by the proposed road, they would come to the same conclusion that I have arrived at, namely, that this is a public work which well deserves the support of this House and of the country. The Dauphin district is one of the most fruitful in Manitoba, and it is, I am informed by those who have lived there, a portion of the country which has the good fortune to escape the early frosts from which some other portions suffer. It is in this respect very like the district immediately round Portage la Prairie, and I believe that this is caused by the north winds being moderated as they pass over those great bodies of water, Lakes Winnipegoosis and Manitoba. Whatever the cause may be, it is a fact that the farmers in that country have hitherto escaped the fall frosts which have, in other portions, caused disaster. Such being the case, you will not be surprised to learn that immigrants have flocked in there at a very rapid rate, and the settlers there find themselves not only inconvenienced, but actually impoverished, by not being able to get the grain they grow to market. Consequently, I will gladly support the resolution of the Minister of the Interior to grant this aid to the road in question, more particularly so as, when completed, I hope it will be the first step in a complete railway from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, which will give the farmers of Manitoba a short line to the European markets, and that is of very great consequence to them, as every cent they can save in freight is just so much more in their pockets. I would ask the members of this House from every province to consider this resolution cooly and apart from all party feeling, and if they do so, and if they inform themselves on the state of the country, I feel sure that they will be found voting for the resolution which is now under discussion.

Bill (No. 118) respecting the Citizens' Insurance Company (from the Senate).—Mr. Desjardins, (Hochelaga.)

PAPASHASE INDIAN RESERVE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House,

Mr. WATSON. Before the motion is adopted I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter of special importance. It was my intention to have brought it forward last Friday, and I have not had an opportunity to do so since. It is important that it should be brought before the House now. I find by advertisements that an Indian reserve is about to be sold by public sale, the Papashase reserve lying immediately south of Edmonton. It is to be sold on 2nd July. The notice given has been very short, and this is a matter for the consideration of the House. It is not in the best interests of Canada, and it is certainly not in the interests of the North-West, that large tracts of land should be locked up in the hands of speculators. It appears to me from the notices given of the sale that there is a big job on deck. The block of land advertized to be sold covers 25,000 acres, and it is situated in a region of country which is represented to be very valuable. Accompanying the advertisement a map is sent, together with a description of the land. The description of the land is furnisned without the signature of the engineer who made the report or the Dominion land surveyor, and I must say that, judging from the description given in the pamphlet, I do not think any person who knows anything about the country, or about a prairie country, would not be willing to give a dollar an acre for the land. It has been represented to me by gentlemen who know the section and the district that these lands are valuable—they are good lands. They are situated almost immediately at the terminus of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, a road which is under construction and which will be completed this fall. I hold that these lands should not be sold until the public have had an opportunity of seeing them and having facilities for getting there by railway. I am satisfied the lands will be enhanced in value by the construction of the road, and a much larger price will be obtained for them if sold after the railway is completed in that section of the country than if they are sold to-day. I believe these lands have not been occupied by the Indians for two or three years, and it might be interesting to know what particular demands have been made on the department for the sale of the lands at this particular date. The lands cover 40 square miles, or 25,600 acres, and would accommodate 160 settlers with their families, with 160 acres each. It is a great mistake to dispose of these lands at so short and limited a notice, for I find that, outside of the hand bills, advertisements have only been inserted in the following papers: Free Press, Winnipeg, 6th June; Calgary Herald, 9th June; Regina Journal, 9th June; Regina Leader, 9th June. The advertisements have not appeared in the Prince Albert and Saskatchewan papers. The lands are to be sold at Calgary, 200 miles from the reserve, and from the information furnished to me it appears that some speculator interested in purchasing the lands must have succeeded in getting the Government to advertize the lands for sale before the public have a chance of inspecting them, before the railway is completed, and before the public, wishing to obtain lands in that vicinity, can visit the country. For that reason I bring this matter before the House. Hon. members must know from our past history, and members of the North-West know, that the system of disposing of large tracts to speculators has been antagonistic to the country, and for that reason I have thought fit to draw the attention of the House to this matter, which I consider one of great importance, for it means a very great loss to the Dominion treasury. I desire the Minister of the Interior to state what particular demand has been made for the sale of these lands, and what is the object of now selling the lands through which the railway will be completed in a very few months? It cannot be to the interest of the department to do so, because it would receive a very much larger sum for the land after the railway is completed than it could possibly receive at the present day.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) has found a mare's nest. Two or three days ago the hon. gentleman met me in the corridor, and made a statement to me, which I did not take in a very serious manner, to this effect: He asked: What are you doing with the Indian lands near Edmonton, selling them? I replied, yes. The hon. gentleman answered that the description from the survey did not appear to be as good as the information ought to be, and he added: I propose to bring the matter up on the Estimates. The next morning I sent for the surveyor, a very able man and one of our most able land surveyors, who had had this particular land under his supervision, who surveyed it two or three years ago, and who, last year, was sent up by me for the purpose of staking out every quarter-section and putting in posts, and making a detailed description of every quarter-section. It has been known that we were doing this throughout the country for the last six months. I will not dispute the dates given by the hon. gentleman as to the advertisements. I had been almost dreading the bill which would reach me in connection with this matter, particularly after I received a very large account for an advertisement I ordered some time ago, and was brought to my attention in this House. I made particular enquiries as to the extent the advertising had gone, as I did not wish to be extravagant. I am very much mistaken if there have not been advertisements in the North-West papers for four, five or six months respecting the sale of this land.

Mr. WATSON. The advertisements sent out by the Indian Department, signed by Mr. Vankoughnet, are dated at the Department of Indian Affairs, 15th May, 1891.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That might be the case. They were sent out to the Indian agents and others to be posted up, and to be added to the already extensive advertisements in the newspapers. In reference to the report which the surveyor has made of that land, I may mention that I have been over the land on more than one occasion, and I have been through that reserve north, south, east and west. Portions of the reserve is of excellent quality, but on others the soil is light and it is not so good. I pressed upon the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs to impress upon the auctioneer, when he sold that property, that he should not exaggerate the description of the quality of the land of the Interior Department, and I did so because I found that an auctioneer, in order to get a large price, had described land far beyond what the reports of the land surveyors warranted, and on account of this we had, in several cases, to exchange the land bought for better land, because we found that the representations made to the purchasers were incorrect. I may say that a more able and a more honest and honourable man than Mr. Nelson, the land surveyor, is not in the service of the Dominion, and I place the greatest reliability in the descriptions he has given. He has valued every quarter-section, and it varies from two to five dollars per acre, and in looking through the field notes of the surveyor and getting explanations from Mr. Dennis, who is our inspector of surveys, I find that it is remarkable how well they agree with regard to the value of land. Now, with regard to the time of sale, I have probably as much experience as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), and I am the responsible head of the department, and have to exercise my best judgment. I believe now, and I believed six months ago, that the time to sell that property was when the railway was just coming to this point and being finished, because, I believe it would then be more valuable than it would be in a year's time. When the railway is being built is the time to get a boom in the land. The expiration of the contract time for the building of that railway is on the 1st July of this year, and I maintain that a better time could not be selected for the sale of that property. If we find that the land is not realizing what we think it should realize we will stop the sale, but my object is to get every dollar we can for the Indians who are interested in that reserve to place in the Indian funds. I do not know to-day one single individual who has talked of buying one acre of that land. I hope that the road will be built on the 1st July, and I believe that we can get a good price for the land then.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are these lands surrendered?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; they belong to half-breeds who have taken scrip.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand that the lands were surrendered on receiving scrip?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the money then go into the Indian funds?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

THE BUDGET DEBATE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. Minister intend to proceed with the Budget debate to-morrow, or is there any other business to take precedence of it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will ask the House to concur in the resolution that was passed to-day, then we will take the Admiralty Bill and then the Budget.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the discussion to-morrow at all resembles the discussion of to-day it may mean going over the Budget discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. The discussion must have petered out to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you quite sure?

Mr. FOSTER. No; not certain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the Budget discussion should go on to-morrow. We consented practically to allow the matter to wait on the very distinct understanding that it would have been continued at once. It is quite impossible that the discussion on the resolution that we have introduced can be got through in one or two days. It may involve very much more delay than the hon. gentlemen think if they allow another day to pass without continuing the discussion.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.10 p. m.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Jacques Cartier) (translation) moved:

That the Second Report of the Special Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House be adopted.

He said: This report, Mr. Speaker, is intended to confirm the first report of the Committee adopted on the 2nd of June, and asking for the appointment of an assistant reviser for the French version. The Committee, on application made to it, first took Mr. J. C. Dansereau on trial, and upon the report of the chief translator that he is perfectly competent for the work, the Committee, at a subsequent meeting, decided to recommend his appointment to be made permanent, at a salary of $1,000, to date from 3rd June; notice has been given, and I now ask for the adoption of this report.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask to let the matter stand until another day, because I think the whole question of the translation of the Hansard ought to be reviewed in this House. The translation is not certainly what it ought to be, and it is so defective as to call for serious consideration. I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot be satisfied with the French version of the Hansard.

Mr. DESJARDINS. We are satisfied so far, because no complaints have been made since we have had the additional help asked by the House. I understand that the translation has been going on satisfactorily, and from the report we have received from the chief translator concerning the efficiency of the officer to be appointed, we understand he is perfectly competent to fill the position to which he has been named, and we now ask the House to concur in the report. This report is only the consequence of the first one which was adopted by the House when the appointment of an assistant reviser was asked.

Mr. LAURIER. The whole thing can be revised again, at all events. I have not recently looked at the translation of the latter Debates, but only judge by the translation of the early Debates this session, and certainly that was not at all what it should be. I will take the opportunity of looking at the latter translations, and if it shows improvement I will raise no objection.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The hon. leader of the Opposition might as well bring up that question on the vote for the Hansard.

Mr. FOSTER. While the Hansard question is up, it may be pertinent to say a word with reference to the reports. There is something wrong with them. The takes are not uniform and some are execrable, and it is more trouble often to revise the speech than to deliver it. I feel exactly of this opinion, that, if we are to have a Hansard we ought to have it thoroughly correct. When a speech is taken down, it ought to appear as delivered, and not the opposite or not a very inaccurate reproduction of what the speaker has said. I would rather see the Hansard abolished than see it kept on in its present inefficient condition.

Mr. McMULLEN. In reply to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Finance, I am glad to say that I have carefully and closely criticized the few speeches I have made in the House this year, and I must acknowledge that the reports this session are more correct than those of any previous session. I think the way the utterances of members are taken down is remarkable for its accuracy and reflects great credit upon the reporters.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So far as I am concerned, I have found the reports very excellent in most instances. Occasionally I find a word has been misapprehended or that the reporter has perhaps mistaken the word for another similar in form, but I have nothing to complain of as to the accuracy of the reports, not only during this session, but during the past three or four sessions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to endorse very fully the remarks made by my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Mills). My idea has been that the reporting this session has been better, and more accurate than it has been for the many years I have sat here.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it must have been inaccurate before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is true that in some previous sessions I have sometimes had to complain that what I have said has been misapprehended by the reporter, but this session I have had no such complaint to make, and only the other day I remarked to my hon. friend how wonderfully accurate were the reports produced. Of course, I know nothing in regard to the French translation.

Mr. DAVIN. As a member of the Debates Committee, I may say that we have paid a great deal of attention to the question which has been raised, and last session I was under the impression that there was one member of the staff—I do not know who he was, and never attempted to find out—who was weak; but this session I have been observing, and it does appear to me that the staff seems to be quite efficient. It is an astonishing thing to me that the report is as good as it is, and for this reason—the reporters sit there, as it were, between two fires. Gentlemen on the other side of the House are talking, and we know how gentlemen are talking on this side. I know that it is most difficult to report a speech when men are talking all around you. I know that, when I was a reporter in the gallery of the House of Commons in England—I suppose I must have been considered very peremptory in my style, but on what is called a full dress night, there is a gallery where members can sit close up to the reporters' seats, and the box which I occupied happened to be next to that gallery, and I had to say to them, "I cannot report when you talk this way." That would occur when perhaps Mr. Disraeli or Mr. Bright was addressing the House. It is amazing to me, as I have said, that the report here is as good as it is under the circumstances, and, comparing that report with what I know, though, of course, I have myself found occasionally a word omitted or misapprehended by the reporter, the Finance Minister may be assured that the report is pretty well done. For instance, the other night in the tariff debate I found that I heard one of the speakers make a certain statement, and I went to the Finance Minister and said: Is that correct? He said: "No, that is not what he means. It is just a slip of the tongue of the hon. gentleman." Naturally the reporter would take the word down, and the hon. gentleman when he went over the report, would say: "That is not what I said;" because what he intended to say would be in his memory, though he had used one word instead of another, which is a thing which happens to every speaker. The case to which I refer was the use of the words "raw sugar" instead of "refined sugar," a very easy slip to make. I had not heard the part of the Finance Minister's speech on that subject, and consequently I asked him if that was what he said, and he said: "No; he means refined sugar and not raw sugar." I consider that the report itself is very well done. As to the French translation, I have not gone into that and I am not competent to go into that, but I repeat that the English report is very well done.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the Minister of Finance has certainly been unlucky, because the experience of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and certainly my own experience, is that the report is as good as it can be. Of course there will be inaccuracies from time to time, and it is impossible that there should not be some at times, but I have felt great satisfaction with the reporting since I have sat in this House. As to the translation, I cannot believe my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is not competent to go into that matter, and I wish he would go into that, because it requires the immediate attention of the Committee. I will not characterize that translation. I have not looked at it lately, but certainly the translation in the earlier part of the session was not fit to be published.

Mr. EDGAR. I think there is one weak spot in the Hansard report this session. I do not know where it is, but, on the few occasions when I have had to look over a speech, I have suddenly come to a portion which, as far as I could recollect, did not represent what I said at all, whereas other portions of the report were surprisingly accurate. If the Hansard Committee would give this matter their attention, I think they would do good service.

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly what I found. Take the speech I delivered last. I spoke, I think, distinctly, and I was quite close to the reporter. When I revised that speech, I found the first two columns ran just as well as I spoke, and then I found one or two columns which were inaccurate, and were in fact the opposite of what I said, where the speech was garbled and wrong. At the same time, in newspaper reports made in the gallery above, I found this well reported and just what I said. I do not find the majority of the reports in that condition, but every now and then I find a very bad spot, and if the Hansard Committee could find out where that bad spot is and take it out, I believe we would have a very good Hansard.

Motion agreed to, on a division.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That when this House adjourns to-day, it stands adjourned till Tuesday next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. ROOME. Do I understand that we are going to meet on Wednesday and also sit on Saturday? If not, I think it would be better to adjourn until Thursday. Many members who live at a considerable distance would like to go home, and if this House does not sit on Wednesday and on Saturday, I think it would be well to adjourn until Thursday.

Mr. COCKBURN. There is a very strong feeling, particularly in Western Ontario, as to transacting any business on our great national holiday. That is to many hon. gentlemen on the other side as sacred a day as Monday next may be, and I do not think that, throughout the length and breadth of the United States, we would find a single person willing to transact business on the 4th July or who would not consider that as a sacred holiday.

Mr. EDGAR. We do not follow the example of the United States.

Mr. COCKBURN. I was making an appeal to my friends opposite, because I supposed that any objection that might come would be from the other side. I thought, if we had a holiday on the Monday and a holiday on the Wednesday—and I do not understand having a holiday on the Monday and not on the Wednesday—that the Tuesday intervening would be a dies non, and therefore that the proposal should be that we should meet together again on the Thursday, and take the Thursday, Friday and Saturday of next week, and the whole of the next Saturday also, and that by this means facilities would be given to those gentlemen who wished to go home and transact business, while work would not be retarded. No doubt those gentlemen who are engaged in the investigation which is going on might meet on Tuesday if they so desired.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one suggestion I would like to make to the House before we discuss that point. It is very necessary for smooth working that we should have the Supplementary Estimates for the current year passed and assented to just as soon as possible. I think there is nothing very important in them that will cause very much discussion. My proposition would be to meet on Tuesday. There are a certain number of members who will remain here, and we will have a quorum. We could agree te take up no other business than the Supplementary Estimates for the present year, and I think we could dispose of them satisfactorily and thereby facilitate the business by one day.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) says we ought to have Wednesday as a holiday, and that if we take Wednesday as a holiday, it is not worth while to meet on Tuesday; so he gives to the House a reason for losing two days next week quite unnecessarily. We have met on the first day of July before.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am sorry to hear it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman was an assenting party to it.

Mr. COCKBURN. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There was a reason for it; the hon. gentleman was not here, I am told. There is great anxiety on the part of hon. gentlemen who are living far away and who cannot avail themselves of these holidays, not unnecessarily to prolong the session. It seems to me that it is most desirable to have just as few holidays from now to the close of the session, as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not agree with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) that it is the general opinion of members from Western Ontario that we should adjourn until next Thursday. We have had a great many holidays during this session. We have been prolonging the session from time to time, and hon. members from both the extremities of the Dominion are kept here a much longer time than they otherwise would be, were it not for these holidays. Now, next Tuesday is a Government day, and there cannot be much work that will arouse much discussion. The following Wednesday is a private members' day, and if there are those who are not willing to work on that day, certainly they are not compelled to be here, but whatever work is done will materially shorten the session; it will keep the members here, and they will be prepared to go on with the work. On Thursday we can resume our legitimate work, and it is important that we should do so, because it is a season of the year when many members can ill afford to be away from home.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) wants to know the opinion of the majority from West Ontario. I think I represent the majority from West Ontario by a large majority, and I cordially agree with him that the majority of West Ontario wants to sit here on Wednesday, and get through the business of the House.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). This discussion, and the discussion we have had previously, have suggested to my mind an idea which I wish to express. The delays, and interruptions, and the lengthening of the session, which these holidays and holy days have produced during this session have convinced me that this House, in its wisdom, should take possession of the whole time and continue its business consecutively.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Abolish all holy days.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I understood the House agreed on the previous occasion that we should meet on Wednesday, and it really seems to me that if we were to alter that understanding it would be a breach of faith. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), and I would like to see Wednesday observed as a holiday, and would do anything in my power to have that custom made universal. But I do feel that our circumstances at present are exceptional, and that we will be justified in sitting on that day.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I agree with the hon. gentleman in thinking that this matter had been disposed of the other day, when the Ministry assented to what seemed to be the almost universal opinion of the House. I do not rise to take any further part in that debate, deeming it settled, but to refer to the intimation given by the Minister of Finance or rather an invitation to some hon. gentlemen that they might absent themselves on Tuesday and Wednesday, as the business would not prove to be very important. Now, I desire to call his attention to the fact that a very important Committee is in session, and that if many hon. gentlemen remain away, there will be no quorum of that Committee obtainable, and if that Committee does not sit on Tuesday and Wednesday the result will be to prolong the session by two days further. We cannot hope to get through—anybody on that Committee will see that we cannot hope to get through that investigation without constant and continuous meetings; and I should be sorry indeed if any hon. gentlemen should take advantage of the indirect invitation which the hon. gentleman gave, to absent themselves on that occasion. I wish to recall the attention of the members of that Committee to the important business before it, which requires their attendance on those days. I have no doubt myself that a quorum will be present, unless hon. gentlemen are misled into the impression that really nothing is going to be done in the House. Witnesses have been called to attend the meetings of the Committee, and the desire of that Committee, irrespective of the provinces from which its members come, is to get through the work. These delays are becoming a very serious matter, and we should not allow any more to take place that are not imperatively necessary.

Mr. MASSON. I will not presume to speak for the majority from any section of the country, but I will speak my own feelings in this matter. I would not like to see this House sit on the national holiday. Whatever other people may think, I am sure that a very large majority of the loyal Canadians in Western Ontario believe that the national holiday should be well kept. In Western Ontario we do not keep many holidays, and the few that are kept commemorate some national event. The Queen's Birthday and the Dominion Day are the two most regularly observed by the citizens of Western Ontario, and to those people it will seem strange that, whereas we should have a recess on this holy day and the other holy day, we cannot afford time to respect our national Dominion Day. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, that the House should meet on Tuesday and do such work as can be done without the necessity of a full House, ought to be adopted, and then we could adjourn over the Wednesday and lose as little time as possible.

Mr. DAVIN. I cordially sympathize with my hon. friend's view in regard to the national holiday, but I cannot think that it is of sufficient weight to keep the members here who come from a long distance. When we consider the convenience of those members coming from the West and coming from the Lower Provinces, I think it is a serious thing to keep them here one or two days longer than is necessary. While sympathizing with the desire to observe the national holiday, I do not think that we can be better employed in celebrating that day than in sitting here and helping to govern the country. I am not sure myself that, so far as this House is concerned, we have not too many holidays. But as regards our national holiday, I must say that I think we cannot observe it better than by sitting here and pushing forward the business of the country.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to protest most strenuously, on behalf of the British Columbia contingent, against having such a long holiday as is suggested. It is most unfair that we who come such long distances should be kept here longer than is necessary. We have to leave our homes a week before the Ontario members, and a week after the session elapses before we reach our homes again, and during the adjournments there is not the slightest chance of getting home, and so they represent so much time lost to us. I hope this House will not adjourn for the time now suggested.

Mr. HYMAN. After the protest made on behalf of British Columbia, I think it would be unfair for Ontario members, who might visit their homes during the holiday, to insist on the adjournment proposed. We know that more than once during the session there was no opportunity for members to visit their homes, and the length of the session will be considerably increased by the proposed adjournment. Under the circumstances it would only be fair and just for the members from Ontario to assent to the brief adjournment, and to return the kindness which members have shown them on more than one occasion.

Mr. WATSON. As representing the Liberals of Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, I object to any long adjournment. It must be remembered that some of the adjournments that have taken place during the session need not have occurred. I agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia that we have too many holidays. If a church feast day takes place in Quebec we have to submit to a holiday on that day. I think the House should meet on Tuesday and Wednesday. In 1885 the House met on the national day, 1st July, and on 4th July it voted a large subsidy for a railway running through the State of Maine.

Mr. TROW. I understood that this matter was definitely settled the other day. I think it is taking up the time of the House uselessly to further prolong the discussion. We have had a holiday to-day, so far as business is concerned, and I am surprised that hon. members should keep harping on a matter that is already settled, namely, that we should meet on Tuesday. I feel astonished at the expression of the Minister of Finance, in which he almost advised members to leave. What are members sent here to do but to attend to public business, and it is absurd that a quorum of twenty members only should attend and pass Estimates. The suggestion is so preposterous, in my estimation, that I am surprised it should be made.

Motion agreed to.

CARLETON BRANCH RAILWAY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday next, to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to authorize the Government to sell to the city of St. John, for the sufm forty of thousand dollars, the Carleton Branch Railway.

Motion agreed to.

PAPERS RE PROJECTED TUNNEL.

Mr. PERRY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call, attention of the Minister of Marine that the House ordered a return of certain papers regarding connection between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The question of the tunnel will be before the House in a few days, and I wish to be in possession of these papers. I believe the member for Centre Toronto had possession of the papers some days ago. It is unfair that the papers should not be here. If there is not a sufficient staff to prepare them the number of clerks should be increased.

Mr. COCKBURN. I will state in reply to the hon. gentleman——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved second reading of resolution respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 119) respecting a certain agreement therein mentioned with the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 13) to provide for the exercise of Admiralty jurisdiction within Canada in accordance with the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Bill before the Committee is a most important one, and I desire to make some observations upon it, which should, perhaps, have been addressed to the House more regularly on the motion for the second reading, but the Bill passed hurriedly, and with the indulgence of the Committee I desire to make these observations now, and touch on the principle of the Bill. The Bill is, as I have said, of importance, and is necessitated by the passage of the Imperial Admiralty Act a year ago, and it is necessary that, instead of the Imperial Act, some legislation should be enacted by this House substituting for the old Courts of Admiralty some new court. That power is given to us very fully by the English Act, and the question which the Minister of Justice and the Government and this House have to decide is, what is the best provision we can make for the new courts which we are authorized to constitute under the Imperial Act. I submit respectfully to the Minister of Justice this proposition, that as far as the experience of a hundred years is concerned, during which the Vice-Admiralty Courts of the different provinces have been working, there is no reason to complain that they did not administer justice speedily and well. I have never heard any complaints, more particularly in late years, since the practice of these courts has been simplified. I have never heard any complaint that these courts did not administer justice well. How are these courts constituted? In the Province of Prince Edward Island, and in the Province of Nova Scotia the chief justice for the time being was, ex officio, the judge of the Admiralty Court. A different rule prevails in the Province of New Brunswick, and Judge Watters, I believe, was the Admiralty judge of that province, but whether it was a judge so specially appointed to discharge the duties, or whether it was a judge who for the time being held the high position of chief justice of the Supreme Court of the province and acted ex officio as Admiralty judge; in either case, I believe, the result was gratifying to those who had litigation in these courts. We are now called upon to constitute courts under the English Admiralty Act, and the first question that arises seems to me to be: Why do we not continue the admiralty jurisdiction vested in the Supreme Courts in the several Maritime Provinces? I frankly admit that, from the examination of the Imperial Bill, and the reflection I have been able to make upon it, I find that this is the course which presents itself to my mind as the better one, and for several reasons. In the first place you have the courts established already in the different provinces, the courts which the people are accustomed to look to as the dispensers of admiralty justice, and, in the second place, provided you have constituted the Supreme Courts of the different provinces Admiralty Courts and made each of the judges of these courts judges in admiralty, there would be a simple and effective appeal lying directly from a single judge to the Supreme Court of the Province, an appeal which would lie at the door of the litigant. He need not go away to Ottawa or elsewhere, but after the Admiralty judge in the first instance had given his decision he would have the privilege of appealing from that judgment to the full court of the province and getting their judgment upon it. Of course he might go further if he chose, and come to the Supreme Court of Canada, and from that to the Privy Council. One defect of this Bill which strikes me is that the appeal which I have described is taken away, and an appeal much less effective, in my humble judgment, is given. A few years ago the practice in the Supreme Courts in the Maritime Provinces was so large and so heavy that the courts were not able to overtake it. I remember myself fifteen years ago that the dockets of all the courts in the Maritime Provinces were crowded with cases, and the remanets in some provinces were simply appalling. All that has been changed now. We have simplified the practice and procedure; we have to a large extent done away with trials by jury, and the consequence of modern improvements in practice has been not only to remove all the remanets which formerly stood there as rather an impeachment of the courts of the land, but I have no hesitation in saying to-day that not one of the Supreme Courts of the Maritime Provinces are at all overworked. On the contrary, I do not think I would be saying anything improper if I said they have hardly enough work to do. The fact of the matter is simply this: That if you vested the jurisdiction which the Imperial Act enables you to do in the Supreme Courts of the several provinces, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, I do not think anybody could say that the courts would be overworked. They have plenty of time to do the work which is now before them and to do this work in addition. There is another reason why this is so. We have proceeded upon the same lines as the English Parliament has; we have, year after year, by the establishment of County Courts and inferior tribunals, endeavoured, as far as possible, to make justice cheap and to bring it as nearly home to the doors of the litigants as possible, and the result has been that, because of the establishment of County Courts and the cheapness of procedure in those courts, a vast amount of business which was formerly transacted and necessarily had to be transacted in the Supreme Courts, is now transacted by the simpler and cheaper tribunals, just as effectively and just as well, in the interest of the litigants, I believe, as it formerly was transacted in the Supreme Courts. This has been done with the result I have pointed out to the House: that while we have a very large staff of judges in the Supreme Courts of the different Maritime Provinces, they are not overworked. I cannot speak as to Ontario, because I do not know about their practice, but so far as the Superior Courts are concerned, that province is not as much interested in admiralty matters as the Maritime Provinces are. Neither can I speak of the Province of Quebec; and I do not know whether their judges are overworked or not. What does the hon. Minister now suggest for the admiralty system which is in force? He says: I propose to constitute the Exchequer Court a Court of Admiralty; and he proposes to take power to divide the provinces into local admiralty districts and to appoint for each of these districts a local judge in admiralty, with the necessary staff, registrars, marshal, and other officers, to enable the law to be carried out. Well, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman means—he evidently does not mean, I should say, from the Act—to mark out these districts at once or to appoint these new judges at once. I say he takes power to do it, and when they are appointed what will be the result? You have a local judge presumably competent and able to decide upon these questions and growing more and more competent every day because of the practice he will have, and you have an appeal from him, not to the Supreme Court of the province in which an appeal could be argued cheaply and, in my humble judgment, better, but you have an appeal to the single judge of the Exchequer Court at Ottawa. I respectfully submit that a court presided over by a single judge—if I have correctly read the Act, and I think I have—is not as competent and as effective an appeal tribunal as would be the Supreme Courts of the several provinces. I would respectfully submit that point to the consideration of the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill, and to the consideration of the House. Now, what would be the effect when this is done? You would have an appeal to the Exchequer Court judge, which, in my opinion, if it differs from the decision of the judge below never would be acquiesced in, followed by another appeal to the Supreme Court, and then each litigant has a right to go to the Privy Council. Now, supposing the matter in litigation is for an amount less than $500, I assume that under the Exchequer Court Act the litigant has no appeal at all. The hon. Minister will, perhaps, correct me if I am wrong, but as I read the Exchequer Court Act in conjunction with this Act no appeal will lie to the Exchequer Court judge for any sum less than $500. That may be a good provision or it may be a bad provision, but my objection to it is that the Exchequer Court as an Appeal Court in admiralty is not as good a court as the Supreme Courts of the several Maritime Provinces would be. In the meantime, before the hon. gentleman marks out these local sub-divisions, and before he appoints the local officers of the court in these districts, he makes a provision for continuing the gentlemen who now discharge the duties of these Admiralty Courts, in their positions as local judges in admiralty. Very well, take the chief justice of the Province of Nova Scotia, or the chief justice of the Province of Prince Edward Island, or Judge Watters with all the experience he has gained from many years practice as Admiralty Judge in New Brunswick; their judgment would be subject to an appeal, to a single judge constituting the Exchequer Court in Ottawa. I do not think that is right. I do not think the chief justices of the provinces would care to have—I do not think it is right, they should be subject to have their judgments reversed by a single judge at Ottawa, and with all respect to the Exchequer Court judge, whom I think is a very good judge for the purpose he was appointed—I do not desire to make the slightest reflection upon him, for I have none to make—I do not think that either his experience or his position justifies us in assuming that he should constitute an effective or satisfactory Admiralty Appellate Court from the judgments of the chief justices of the Maritime Provinces. Having presented these objections to the scheme on principle, I leave the matter in the hands of the House. I may have to offer some criticism on the various sections, but these are all the observations I have to make at this stage.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am hardly disposed to say that there is not a good deal of force in the criticisms which the hon. gentleman has presented; but I have this answer to make, and I think it will be found to be a sufficient answer when we come to consider the details of the measure, that in dealing with the subject of admiralty jurisdiction, we are dealing with a somewhat anomalous state of affairs as regards the past, and a somewhat temporary state of affairs as regards the present, and we have likewise to consider, to a great extent, new requirements of the future; and any measure proposing to deal with the subject in all its phases, will naturally be open to a good deal of criticism. I have considered, however, all the points raised by the hon. gentleman, and I think the mode in which they are dealt with by the Bill is, after all, the most satisfactory that can be devised. What has been the organization of these tribunals in the past? They have been created under Imperial authority, and that Imperial authority prescribes that in each province the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court shall be the chief justice of the province until another appointment be made. So that, in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, no other appointment having been made, the chief justices became the judges of Vice-Admiralty, and so were made. In New Brunswick another appointment was made under the authority of this Parliament, a special salary was provided, and the County Court judge of the County of St. John was made Vice-Admiralty judge. The appeals from these judges were not to the Supreme Court of the province, but directly to the Privy Council. We have, therefore, as regards the past, that very anomalous condition of affairs. It only happens by virtue of the non-interference of the Government that the chief justices in those two provinces have been judges of vice-admiralty jurisdiction. It does not follow that that will always be the case. I do not think it will be the case permanently, and we are, therefore, not to criticize the Bill on the supposition that the chief justices are to be judges of the Vice-Admiralty Courts. As regards the present phase of the jurisdiction, we find ourselves confronted with the Imperial statute passed eighteen months ago, which provides that this jurisdiction is no longer to be controlled by Imperial legislation, and that these courts are to be abolished, subject only to the power of this Parliament to vest the jurisdiction in some other authority. If this Parliament does not exercise that power the jurisdiction merges in the provincial courts, and this Parliament has to decide whether it is better that that should occur, or that we should retain that jurisdiction under federal authority. Now, what are the advantages of the two methods respectively? As the hon. member for Queen's has argued, there is some advantage in letting the jurisdiction merge into the provincial courts. The advantage is simply this, that you have one set of tribunals for dealing with all classes of litigation, whether arising on the sea or on land, which I admit has some convenience. But there are some disadvantages in that proposal. One is, that if we adopted that system the jurisdiction would cease to be exercised by men who had derived considerable skill from their past experience in those courts; and, on the contrary, any judge, whether he had ever held a brief in an admiralty case or not, would be constituted an admiralty judge. Another disadvantage would be that we should be obliged, under the terms of the Imperial Act, to provide a pension for every judge, every registrar and every marshal in Canada. That pension, according to the terms of the Imperial Act, is to be provided by this Parliament, and on such a basis as would be just, having regard to the previous emoluments of the office. That would necessitate providing pensions for some sixteen or twenty officers in this country, every one of whom is as well qualified to-day, so far as I know, to perform his duties, as he has been during the last ten years. On that phase of the question, the provisions of the Bill are temporary. It is proposed to continue in office these gentlemen, and to continue the marking out of admiralty districts, which now exists. The Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario will, under the provisions of this Bill, remain, subject only to future action, each an admiralty district; and it is proposed, with the view of disposing of the question of pensions, to continue all the present judges and officers. As regards the future, it is proposed to take power to mark out admiralty divisions from time to time. It may be desirable in the Province of Ontario to have more than one judge of maritime jurisdiction; and in some of the Maritime Provinces it may be desirable, for the convenience of localities, that the districts should be subdivided; but we can do that with freedom and with a proper regard to economy when the present officers, who have a claim upon us for pensions, have ceased to hold office, and when we are quite free to appoint new officers, and to arrange the salaries according to what the extent of their divisions and the amount of their duties would entitle them to claim. As regards the question, whether, in the interest of the future, which we have to consider, we should allow this jurisdiction to merge into the provincial courts, or should retain it under our control, it seemed to me that the weight of argument, besides the reasons which I have already given and others which I shall mention in a moment, are in favour of keeping the jurisdiction within our control. When the Imperial Parliament has vested in us the power to create an Admiralty Court, it seems more consistent with the dignity and authority of this Parliament that the court should be one of our own creation, and that we should not simply acquiesce in that jurisdiction passing from our hands and being exercised by courts of provincial constitution. But we have to keep the fact in view that, in all probability, as the business of the country develops, it will be found necessary that a considerable portion of the jurisdiction now exercised by the Exchequer Court, shall, from time to time, be discharged by local judges. It will in all probability, as the business of that court increases, as no doubt it will, be found more economical and satisfactory that, instead of having the judge absent himself from the Capital and go on circuit throughout the Dominion, the different provinces should have local judges exercising in those provinces, to some extent, exchequer jurisdiction. If we take advantage of this opportunity presented by the Imperial legislation to keep the matter within our control, we shall have the judicial system established. We shall have the Supreme Court, of course, as now constituted by this Parliament, we shall have the Exchequer Court, as now established by this Parliament, and we shall have branches of that court in the various provinces, exercising, not only admiralty jurisdiction, but likewise local jurisdiction as regards cases arising in the Exchequer Court. It will otherwise be impossible to avail ourselves of a system of that kind, unless we create a new set of local judges for the Court of Exchequer throughout the Dominion. I have thought, after giving the matter most serious consideration, and my colleagues agree with me, that it will be desirable to keep in our hands the jurisdiction thus vested in us by the Imperial statute. I think, for several reasons, it will be desirable there should be the right of review by the Exchequer judge here, as we are to some extent curtailing the right of final appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which now exists. We are entrusting it to a new set of judges for the time being, judges, it is true, of very high rank in some of the provinces, but not necessarily judges of very high rank for the future, and not at all likely to be judges of as high rank or qualification as the judge of the Exchequer Court; and in giving an appeal to him, we are giving an intermediate opportunity of review—before one judge, it is true—before the expense is incurred of going to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course in England there is an appeal from the Court of Admiralty to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The appellate jurisdiction is not in the House of Lords. The Vice-Admiralty Courts in most of the colonies are but parts of the Admiralty Court, and for this reason there was a like appeal from them to the Privy Council. But this did not put the trial of admiralty causes under the British North America Act in a different position from ordinary causes which are tried in the courts constituted by the Provincial Legislatures. When we were organized into a Confederation, we were authorized to legislate upon the subject of navigation and commerce, and the marine affairs of the Dominion were placed under the legislative jurisdiction of this Dominion. At the same time, there is a clause in the British North America Act providing for the constitution of courts dealing, not merely with questions arising under the laws of the various provinces, but with questions arising under the law of the Parliament of Canada, by the Local Legislatures of the various provinces. There is nothing whatever to forbid any province giving jurisdiction to any court, which it might feel proper to establish relating to admiralty matters. I suppose the Minister of Justice would not for a moment question that proposition. The Provincial Legislatures in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, might, at any time since 1867, when making provision for the constitution of their courts, have given to such courts, as they saw proper, admiralty jurisdiction; and nothing could have prevented, it seems to me, apart from the prerogative of disallowing an Act constituting a court, and the exercise of such jurisdiction by the court so established. Is there any reason, when the English Government has, by formal act of its Legislature, withdrawn itself from the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction in this Dominion—that is, when it has ceased to treat the Courts of Vice-Admiralty as a part of the admiralty jurisdiction—that this power should not be exercised by the provinces, and that they should not give to some court in each province jurisdiction relating to the admiralty? If that were done, it is clear that a great deal of inconvenience would be avoided, for there can be scarcely any doubt that the judges who now exercise jurisdiction as judges of the Superior or Supreme Courts of the different provinces, would be equally well qualified to consider admiralty cases in their courts. I think it is clear, from the provisions of the British North America Act, that although we may constitute our own courts under the 101st section, we cannot take away from the provinces the power to constitute courts having this jurisdiction. If we were to-morrow to provide a court for the better administration of the laws of Canada and give to that court original jurisdiction, say, in criminal cases, we would not thereby take away from any one of the Superior Courts in the provinces, which has this jurisdiction, its jurisdiction over criminal matters. The exercise of any such power by us would not lessen the power possessed by the Local Legislatures. There is no provision that this power shall be exercised by the Local Legislatures until it is exercised by the Parliament of Canada. The jurisdiction given is absosolute and unlimited as to the time. The hon. Minister of Justice, in discussing another matter, admitted our right to amend or repeal any Imperial Act that was in force in this Dominion prior to the adoption of the British North America Act of 1867. I think that proposition is one that may be maintained. We have had jurisdiction given us over the subject, because it is a settled principle of constitutional law in the colonies that all Acts in force prior to the constitution of a government in the colonies are to be treated as part of the common law, and such Imperial Acts may be altered or amended just as the common law itself may be. Well, that rule applies here to the jurisdiction given this Parliament over the subject of navigation and shipping, and the Act of 1867 gives us this jurisdiction over the constitution of courts for the purpose of trying these matters. It seems to me there are two ways in which we might have proceeded. We might have undertaken to declare, as we did in the constitution of the election court for the trial of controverted elections, that certain existing courts shall have admiralty jurisdiction, and this would not be merging jurisdiction into the existing court, but would be designating that court as an original court for the purpose of trying cases of this sort. But I very much doubt the propriety of that, and it certainly would be more irregular than it would be to constitute a court in that way for the trial of election causes, because election causes belonging to the Dominion were not such as the Provincial Legislature could constitute a court to try without our authority and consent, and perhaps not even with it; but, as far as the admiralty juridiction is concerned, it being a matter which was referred to a certain class of court, and it being a subject matter over which this Parliament had jurisdiction given to it by the British North America Act of 1867, I think it is clear that, from the passage of that Act up to the present time, any Provincial Legislature may declare that a certain court organized and established by that Legislature shall have jurisdiction in admiralty causes. So, when the Minister of Justice says we ought to retain for the present control of this matter, he is stating a position which cannot be upheld, because, though we may create a court for trying admiralty causes, we might thus prevent the Local Legislature from giving like jurisdiction to a court which it might think proper to establish. It is clear that such jurisdiction might be given to a superior court by the Local Legislature as such jurisdiction may be given over election causes. As to the matter of convenience, is there any special reason for keeping the trial of admiralty causes separate from the trial of any other cause in the proviuces? I do not think there is. Why should not a provincial court try a question of property in a vessel or any dispute in relation to seamen's wages or bottomry bonds, or anything of that kind, just as well as any ordinary matter of contract? Is there any possible reason for it? The Minister of Justice has referred to the question of compensation. Well, if the Minister of Justice were to give the full court an appeal in the case of the trial of an admiralty cause by a chief justice, where he now has the right to try it, no inconvenience could arise and no claim could arise, so long as the chief justice undertook to discharge the duties of judge of original jurisdiction. But it would be easy to provide that this jurisdiction should pass to any judge of the court, upon the demise of the chief justice, and that there should be an appeal to the full court, precisely as in any other case. It seems to me that we are multiplying courts and adding to the expense of the administration of justice unnecessarily, and we are creating difficulties in the way of suitors, we are imposing larger burdens upon them than if we were to merge this jurisdiction into the ordinary jurisdiction possessed by a provincial court. I think there are serious objections to this mode of dealing with the matter, and I hope the Minister of Justice will allow the Bill to stand over for another session and give an opportunity for fuller consideration of the subject than it will be possible to give it during this hurried session.

Mr. EDGAR. Apart from the very interesting point raised by the hon. gentleman who has preceded me (Mr. Mills), as to the rights of the provinces to create Admiralty Courts themselves, I am not at all disposed to quarrel with the Imperial Government for having given power to the British possessions, of which we form a part, to legislate for our own Vice-Admiralty Courts. I think it is a little further concession to our local self-government than we had before. I will not refer to the bearing of this Act on the Vice-Admiralty Courts in the Lower Provinces and in Quebec, but I shall only say a few words in reference to its bearing on the Maritime Courts in the Province of Ontario. For some seventeen years, I think, we have had established in Ontario a Maritime Court under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government. There was a maritime judge at Toronto, and there were surrogate judges of that court appointed among the County Court judges in different parts of the province. I see by this Bill it is proposed to abolish the Maritime Court in Ontario and to make provision that the maritime judge as well as the surrogate judges shall have all the powers of local judges of the Admiralty Court. I do not think the Minister of Justice can have quite intended one of the effects which will follow from this Act, as I read it. By the Imperial Act, all the powers and jurisdiction of the admiralty division of the High Court of Justice are conferred upon the judges who may be appointed by our Act. Then, by our Act, section 20, the surrogate judges—that is to say, the inferior judges in our Maritime Court, and not the head judge—are made judges of the new court. Then section 9 of this Act gives all the powers of the Exchequer Court to these local surrogate judges, and sections 3 and 4 of the Act give the Exchequer Court the full powers that the English Act authorizes, that is to say, the powers of the admiralty division of the High Court of Justice. Therefore, our local surrogate judges of the Maritime Court under this Act, as I apprehend, would have the full powers and the unlimited jurisdiction of the judges of the admiralty division of the High Court of Justice in England. I do not think it should be. They have in England a limited jurisdiction for the County Court judges as to the amount at issue, and they are also restricted in other respects, and I think that should be the limit of jurisdiction given to our surrogate judges, and that our own surrogate judges should be limited in their jurisdiction to such of the powers of the judges of the Admiralty Court as are conferred by the commission appointing them. Thus they would be restricted by all the directions contained in the commission. I think that the Bill as to the Maritime Court of Ontario will bear more consideration on that as well as on other points, to which I will draw the Minister's attention as the Bill goes on.

Mr. GILLIES. I wish to make a few remarks on the subject before the House. I will say that coming from the maritime section of this Dominion, we are deeply interested in this Bill, and we were glad to learn that the Imperial Parliament last year passed the Act known as the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act. I am much pleased to see the action of the Minister of Justice in providing machinery to bring this Act of the Imperial Parliament into operation in Canada. But on looking over the Bill itself, I would respectfully suggest that some sections of it might be made a little more extensive, so that the relief it affords might be obtained by all parties seeking a remedy. I find that the Bill, as specified in the 14th section of the Act, makes the head office of Nova Scotia at Halifax. I would like to bring to the notice of the Minister of Justice and to the notice of the House the fact that in the Province of Nova Scotia we have seven county Court Judges, all of whom are very fairly familiar with the practice in the Admiralty Court, and would be excellent judges to preside over the local Admiralty Courts. I think it would be a very excellent provision to insert in this Act that the County Court judges, in their respective districts, should have jurisdiction by which immediate relief could be given to parties seeking it in those courts. For instance, if we take the wide coast of Cape Breton and suppose a collision took place on any part of that coast, the only point at which relief can be obtained is Halifax, where the party has to go and fyle an affidavit and get a warrant to arrest that ship, and in the meantime she is off beyond the jurisdiction of the court. But if the County Court judge of that district had jurisdiction, the party desiring relief could go to him, lay his complaint, make his affidavit, get a warrant, and have the ship arrested right away. I think, therefore, that the County Court judges should have jurisdiction on matters of this kind, and that they should not be confined entirely to the chief justice, whose residence is at Halifax. This idea is somewhat borne out by the 5th section of the Act, because it gives power to the Governor in Council, from time to time, to constitute any part of Canada a district; and, to my mind, it appears only reasonable that these districts should be created right away, and be made conterminus with the jurisdiction of the County Court judges in the several provinces. Now, a word as to the method prescribed for appeal. I entirely concur with the views of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) in that respect, and, in saying this, I do not wish to be considered as reflecting in the most remote manner upon the learned and excellent judge of the Exchequer Court. My opinion of him is too well known, and no one can suppose me of holding any but the highest opinion of his learning and his character. But in the Maritime Provinces we have judges who are pre-eminently qualified to sit as Admiralty Court judges, and it is, therefore, no disrespect to him whatever when I say that I do not think his training is essentially of that character which is required for this position. I, therefore, think I am right when I say that the County Court judges will, to say the very least, be fully as qualified to sit and adjudicate upon the claims that may be made before them in the Admiralty Court, as any Exchequer Court judge sitting at Ottawa. I do hope, therefore, that the Minister of Justice will see that such provisions are introduced as will make this court more immediately available to persons seeking relief, than it is at present.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies), regarding the circumstances in Nova Scotia with respect to this question. What obtains in the eastern portion of Nova Scotia, as stated by my hon. friend, obtains largely in the western portion of that province. In Nova Scotia we have a great deal of admiralty business to do, and it is a great inconvenience to have to go to Halifax when any of these cases occur. On one occasion I had the experience that the hon. gentleman refers to, in a case where it was only by means of securing the services of a tug that we stopped a vessel from getting beyond the jurisdiction of the court, whereas if the regular means of communication had been taken, the vessel would have escaped proceedings entirely. Now, if it could be so arranged that our County Court judges would have the same jurisdiction in the western portion of Nova Scotia in admiralty matters, I think it would satisfy the members from that part of the province and the public generally, besides being a great convenience to the parties interested

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose, before the Bill is finished, to take power for the Governor in Council, as I indicated in my remarks a few moments ago, to change, from time to time, the limits of any Admiralty Court district, so as to provide for the cases referred to by my two hon. friends from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) and from Annapolis (Mr. Mills). As respects the present admiralty districts, the provision of the Bill is temporary, in view of the necessity for making provisions for existing officers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman how this Act affects the compensation of the admiralty judge, if you enlarge his district or diminish it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I say this is temporary, in view of the fact that we cannot change the limits of his jurisdiction without changing the compensation; therefore, I would not propose to alter the limits of the jurisdiction until a vacancy occurs in his office, and after that, I think a new distribution of the admiralty districts would be very desirable. Now, I think the hon. member from Ontario misapprehended, in that respect also, the provisions of section 20. He seemed to be apprehensive concerning the extent of the provisions in section 20, on the ground that they conferred very high jurisdiction upon the officers who are now performing those functions. It is to be remembered that at the present moment all these officers have the full extent of the jurisdiction possessed by Vice-Admiralty judges in Canada, and they are judges of as high rank as the principal judge of the Maritime Court of Ontario. They are all County Court judges; and looking at the extent of the business which is done throughout that country, and the amounts involved, I do not think it is unsafe to give judges that jurisdiction. I would say, also, that that section of the Bill keeps in view the fact that these gentlemen are in office, and that we cannot enlarge their jurisdiction without compensating them, and we propose under the provisions of this Bill that their jurisdiction in such Admiralty Courts shall from time to time be fixed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Local Legislatures may give this jurisdiction to any court.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That has been the hon. gentleman's argument, I am aware; but I am hardly prepared to agree with it at the present moment. No doubt we have power, both by the provisions of the British North America Act and of the Admiralty Act of 1890.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If I understand the criticisms of some hon. gentlemen opposite, notably the hon. members for Cape Breton and Annapolis, they amount to this: that to ensure speedy and cheap decisions of the Admiralty Court, it is essential to vest the jurisdiction in County Court judges; but, under the operation of the Imperial Acts this is impossible. We can only vest the admiralty jurisdiction in a court having unlimited civil jurisdiction. The County Courts are not such courts, and, therefore, it is not possible to give admiralty jurisdiction to them. So we are thrown back on two propositions: The one which I submitted, that we should leave it where it should be left, and was left by the Imperial Parliament if we did not legislate, namely, in the Supreme Court of the several provinces; and the other is, to constitute the Court of Exchequer and Admiralty Court. The Exchequer Court is a court of unlimited civil jurisdiction within the interpretation clause mentioned in the Imperial Act. By that clause, unlimited civil jurisdiction means jurisdiction unlimited as to the amount to be recovered. The Exchequer Court comes within that definition. I repeat there are only two possible schemes for this House to adopt: one is to vest the jurisdiction in the Supreme Courts of each province, and the other is to create the Exchequer Court the Court of Admiralty. There are grave and serious objections to the latter course, and the Minister of Justice has endeavoured to meet these objections, but the hon. gentleman has not convinced me, particularly with respect to the right of appeal, and in that the hon. member for Cape Breton concurs with me. The more you think of it, the more objectionable that feature will appear. Putting on one side the objection as to whether it is proper that the judgment of the chief justice should be subject to appeal to the exchequer judge—suppose a case involving $2,000 or $3,000 is tried in Halifax, is decided by the chief justice, and an appeal is taken to the exchequer judge here, counsel will have to come all the way from Nova Scotia to argue the case, the Exchequer Court will take time to consider it, and reverse or confirm the decision. An appeal lies to the Supreme Court, and the same course will be pursued, and the counsel will have to come here. The Court of Review is not a court that recommends itself in practice to the better judgment of litigants or counsel. There should be an alternative appeal, and there should be a right of appeal, either to the Exchequer Court judge or direct to the Supreme Court. That, of course, might get us out of the difficulty. I look with some degree of alarm at the possibility of establishing a large number of local Admiralty Courts within the Dominion. Such a scheme would involve a very large outlay. It must be remembered that the judge selected to discharge the important functions of an admiralty judge must be a superior class of man. He will have to deal with cases involving amounts varying from $1,000 to $50,000, and in case of a collision between large steam vessels, the sum might be $100,000, and therefore, the abstruse nature of the subject, the important character of the cases and the immense value at stake, call for the appointment of a very high officer. What I contend is that we now have that class of officers on the bench in every province, and if instead of legislating so as to create a lot of separate and independent courts in this Dominion, we begin in the direction in which the Imperial Parliament has been legislating, that of making one universal Supreme Court with several branches, we shall be proceeding in the right direction. With all deference to the arguments advanced by the hon. gentlemen opposite, I am still of the opinion that the judges of the Supreme Courts in admiralty cases, with jurisdiction vested in all the judges and an appeal to the Supreme Court of the province, would be a more effective and cheaper mode than that proposed. In view of the importance of the subject, I suggest to the Minister of Justice whether he would be disposed not to press this subject through the House this session, but leave it as a matter for more mature consideration on the part of the legal fraternity throughout the Dominion.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). I do not see where the objection in regard to the appointment of County Court judges applies. I think this Parliament could name any person, whether a judge or not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). The Imperial Act prohibits you from doing so.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). No; whoever is appointed will be a judge of the Exchequer Court. If the judge of the County Court were appointed, he would become a local judge of the Admiralty Court. I can quite understand the reason the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) desires to have only one court in each province. He resides at Charlottetown, and no doubt would like to have all the admiralty business transacted there. It has been a great objection in regard to the Admiralty Court in Nova Scotia, that all the court business was transacted at Halifax, and a great many of the outside lawyers obtained very little work there. It was so expensive to get even very small claims through that very many were abandoned. Two years ago we had a seaman's claim for $50, and it cost $100 in Halifax to get a decree to sell the vessel, the expenses being divided between the master of the court, the registrar, and a very small fee for the solicitors. The vessel was afterwards sold for $120. I hope some proposition will be made for the reduction of the fees, and I do not see why the clerks of the court should not have power to make out the necessary papers, especially in regard to claims for small amounts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is quite right in supposing that the provisions of the Bill can be applied to smaller divisions than the present admiralty divisions; but such provisions could not be applied without a Bill of this character. As regards the proposal to postpone consideration of this matter, I look upon this Bill as not only important but most urgent. The Imperial Act came into force on July 1st; it provides that certain steps shall be taken in regard to jurisdiction, and it would be very objectionable to allow the jurisdiction to be vested elsewhere and then take it away.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's arguments no doubt will be quite sufficient to induce him to proceed with the Bill. I understand by the Imperial Act that if we do not establish an Admiralty Court for Canada, the admiralty jurisdiction will be vested in the courts having admiralty jurisdiction, which will be in the Supreme Courts of each province, so that in case we do not pass the Bill it would result that the Supreme Court of the different provinces would be Courts of Admiralty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is what I meant, that the jurisdiction would pass to the provincial courts, and it would then be very inconvenient for us to take it away. I may say, in connection with the question as to what is a court of unlimited civil jurisdiction, a difference of opinion has already arisen as to whether anything but the Exchequer Court would be a court within the meaning of that expression of the Imperial Act. It is claimed by one class of the profession that the Exchequer Court is the only court of unlimited civil jurisdiction in Canada, inasmuch as all the others are limited territorially. I merely state that objection for what it is worth.

Mr. EDGAR. The interpretation under the 15th section of the English Act says "unlimited as to the value of the subject-matter."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But what I wish particularly to say about that is, that the jurisdiction, unless we pass an Act on the subject, even if it were vested in the provincial courts, would be vested in the Exchequer Court as well, because that, undoubtedly, is a court of unlimited civil jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not very well see how that follows; it might in other colonies, but I do not see how it can be in Canada where there has been a distribution of powers under the British North America Act: unless the Minister of Justice is disposed to argue that that Act has no applicability at all to the subject of admiralty jurisdiction, and that all our power to deal with the matter is derived from recent legislation in England. If the hon. gentleman does not hold that view, then he must admit we had the power before. The Imperial Government might have interfered, it might have undertaken to disallow our legislation, but, apart from that interference, we have, under the British North America Act, the power to legislate upon this subject. I apprehend that under section 101 this Parliament might have constituted a court under that provision, which says that in addition to a general Court of Appeal it may establish such other courts as may be deemed necessary for the better administration of the laws of Canada. But the establishment of such courts was not intended to take away, nor would it take away from the Provincial Government, the right to establish courts for the trial of all civil matters and for the trial of criminal matters as well. If we had jurisdiction over this subject before, it is, I think, clear that the Local Legislatures could establish a court having admiralty jurisdiction just as certainly as they could establish a court having jurisdiction over criminal matters. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that, so far as the trial of controverted elections is concerned, the Provincial Legislature could not establish a court to take control of that, simply because that was not one of the matters that was usually relegated to a court: that was part of the law of Parliament, and no court had jurisdiction over a matter which belonged to Parliament itself, except it was expressly given by the Parliament whose jurisdiction was affected. That is a principle which shows what the limitation is and how that limitation arises; but I do not see that any such limitation can arise in the case of the jurisdiction over admiralty matters conferred upon a provincial court, and I have not learned from anything that the Minister of Justice has said in defence of this Bill why this jurisdiction should be withheld from provincial courts and conferred upon courts specially created by this Parliament. There is just the one point to which the Minister of Justice referred, and that is the claim that might arise from the judges who now are entitled to salaries of the exercise of jurisdiction as judges in Vice-Admiralty. That, I think, is a matter that might be considered and dealt with without undertaking to create a court in the way that the hon. gentleman proposes, and multiplying the judicial organizations of the country by a Bill of this sort.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the power for Provincial Legislatures to create a Court of admiralty jurisdiction, I would suggest for the consideration of the hon. gentleman that we have no power, and clearly the provinces have no power to legislate beyond our territorial limits, and that a large part of admiralty jurisdiction has to be exercised in relation to matter arising outside of our territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We try matters of contract in foreign countries.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no doubt of the jurisdiction of our Legislatures to give a court authority over our own subjects, and over any persons who come within our jurisdiction, but I very much doubt, indeed, the authority of the Provincial Legislature to give to a provincial court, or to any other court, jurisdiction over a vessel on the high seas. At present the Admiralty Courts and the High Court of Justice of England, exercising its jurisdiction through the Probate and Admiralty division, has that jurisdiction by virtue of Imperial statutes; and by virtue of our Imperial statute, this jurisdiction will come to our Canadian court. It is true there would be several classes of cases over which the Provincial Legislatures could give jurisdiction to our provincial courts, but I very much doubt that they could do so in respect to many of the subjects of admiralty jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me call the attention of the Minister of Justice to sub-section 7, section 91 of the British North America Act. We have jurisdiction given to us there over "militia, military, naval service, and defence." Supposing we were to apply the rule to which the Minister of Justice has referred: We commission an officer and put him in charge of a Dominion ship, and he undertakes to sail from Halifax to Hudson Bay. If the view taken by the Minister of Justice were applied to that particular sub-section, we would have no control over him, or over the ship, or over anything that might happen outside the marine limit.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is by virtue of our legislation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think so. If the hon. gentleman looks at this clause he will see it refers expressly to militia, military, naval service and defence, and it is certainly clear that the Merchants' Shipping Act would not apply to it. I take it that in the interpretation of an Act like our Constitution, you must interpret it in such a way as to make it effective, and so interpreting the Act you will be obliged to admit that there is jurisdiction beyond the marine league. In some of the early cases, more than two centuries ago, with the colonies to the south of us that rule was recognized; and so I think where jurisdiction is given over navigation and shipping you are to give an interpretation broad enough to make the law efficient. The interpretation which the Minister gives would not so make it, and would be a practical denial of the jurisdiction.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree that we must give it the broadest possible interpretation to make it thoroughly effective, but it is not a question of interpretation, it is a question of the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am referring to the power given to this Parliament to deal with the subject of navigation and shipping. This same Act provides that those courts shall be established by the Provincial Legislatures.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The reason I press upon the hon. gentleman the desirability of considering whether it would not be better to postpone the Bill is this: The step we are taking of constituting Courts of Admiralty, while open to grave doubts as to its propriety, is irrelevant. If we left the matter over for a year, the Supreme Courts of the various provinces having, in the meantime, all necessary jurisdiction under the Imperial Act, at the end of that time we would be in a position to consider whether they constituted efficient tribunals or not. However, I shall not press the point any further, as the hon. gentleman has apparently made up his mind to go on with the Bill, although I have a very strong opinion upon it.

On section 4,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Could it be open to argument that this section limits the jurisdiction of the court? The Imperial Act vests all the powers of the Admiralty Court of Great Britain in the court constituted by us under this statute, and it is possible that we may be limiting that jurisdiction by declaring that the jurisdiction "shall be exercised throughout Canada, and the waters thereof, whether tidal or non-tidal." The Imperial Act vests in the Admiralty Court jurisdiction "over the like places, persons, matters, and things, as the admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England, whether existing by virtue of any statute or otherwise."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Let that clause stand.

On section 5,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest, seeing that there are no divisions existing at the present time, and none immediately contemplated, that this ought to be a legislative Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hardly think it is of so much importance. For example, we want to deal almost immediately with the Province of Ontario. We have there one judge of maritime jurisdiction, which extends all over the province; but we have a number of surrogates, and I think we must almost immediately define the district of each of these. We propose to define it so as not to interfere with the present emoluments of the judge. It is only for that purpose that we propose to exercise these powers now. The others will remain as they are.

On section 6,

Mr. EDGAR. There is a very decided change made here in the tenure of office of the maritime judge of Ontario. Under this Act he becomes a local judge of admiralty; and while he is now and, I think, ought to be a judge holding office during good behaviour, and removable only on an address of the Senate and the House of Commons, this clause puts him in the position of an officer holding his office during pleasure. That was the tenure of office of the surrogate judges, I admit, but I do not think it ought to be the tenure of office of the maritime judge of Ontario. I leave my hon. friend from the Maritime Provinces to say how this affects the vice-admiralty judges in his province.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The tenure of office is such in the Lower Provinces, and in that respect we simply want to keep things as they are. I do not think the objection is a very practical one. The amount of business done in the Maritime Court of Ontario is not very large, and I think it would be very inconvenient to have a different tenure of office in that province.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why should it not be during good behaviour, as in the case of the other judges?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Under the Imperial Act the chief justices in the Lower Provinces are judges of admiralty during pleasure, and I do not see why we should give up our right.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is hardly consistent with the view that has been held as to the independence of the judges.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it hardly fair to say that the vice-admiralty judges of the Maritime Provinces hold office during pleasure. It is true, the chief justice of the Supreme Court is, ex officio, the judge of the Admiralty Court until the proper authority constitutes an admiralty judge. That can hardly be holding office during pleasure within the meaning of these words as they are ordinarily understood. I think all superior judges should be placed on the same level. I doubt the propriety of appointing a responsible judge, with the extensive and important functions of these judges, only during pleasure, to be subject to removal as the Government changes—the appointment to be in any sense or way a political appointment, and be absolutely removed from the possibility of bias arising from the fear that if his judgment be not satisfactory to the powers that be, or his place required for political purposes, he may be removed.

Mr. SKINNER. A large number of cases in the Admiralty Court are those in which the Government is directly or indirectly concerned, especially fishing cases. Therefore if the judge held office during the pleasure of the Government, his decision might possibly be more or less influenced by that fact, and his conduct be governed by a different rule from that which would govern it if he did not hold office on that tenure.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to call attention to the next line, which empowers the judge of the Admiralty Court to receive such fees as may be from time to time prescribed by general rules or orders. I think it is objectionable that the judge should receive fees. The hon. member for Victoria complained of the expense of Admiralty Courts, and I suppose our desire is to simplify the practice and make it as little expensive as possible, but I doubt whether allowing the judge to be paid by fees will have this effect. That power is rather calculated to induce him to have rules made for increasing the cost of litigation. It is rather infra dig for a judge to receive fees for every order he issues.

Mr. EDGAR. I think it would be far better, as far as we can, to fix the salary in this Act of Parliament, because the salaries of the vice-admiralty judges are now fixed by Dominion statute, and I do not see why we should not also fix the salaries of those who take their places.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No one has stronger objection than I to the system of paying the judges fees, but that is the present system, and if we take away the fees we must provide for an increase of salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman is wrong, as under the Act it is only in the case of the abolition of the court that the judges are entitled to compensation. Of course, I am only looking at the legal aspect of the question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the spirit of the Act requires that the emoluments should not be reduced, and we should not like to deal otherwise with the judges.

Mr. EDGAR. The fees are abolished by the effect of the Act. The Bill provides that they shall receive such fees as are from time to time prescribed by general rules or orders. Then, under a subsequent section, they have to be made by the Court of Exchequer, and approved by the Governor in Council and transmitted for approval to Her Majesty in Council, so that the whole matter is thrown open, and there can be no better opportunity than the present to fix the salary. Has the Minister of Justice any figures to show the amount of fees received?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec the fees average from $300 to $400 a year. In Prince Edward Island they are very small.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It might be more satisfactory that the salary should be increased by the average amount of the fees for the last two or three years, and the fees abolished.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not wish to be understood as advocating a reduction in the fees; and I agree with my hon. friend that if we take away the fees, we will have to give compensation.

On section 12,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be well to provide that no further suits shall be instituted in respect of the same matter in the principal registry court or any district registry? Supposing a ship was owned in Yarmouth and the ship itself was in Halifax, there might be two suits brought, one against the ship in Halifax and one against the ship's husband or owner in Yarmouth. I think the proviso should be amended.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the difficulty is met by the power given to the higher court to amalgamate the suits and transfer them to its own registry. If we were to make a prohibition such as that proposed, we might interfere with suits instituted in good faith in another place.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have already provided that, if a suit is instituted in one district, it shall not be instituted in the principal court. Why should you not make a provision that, if a suit is instituted in one district, it should not be instituted in another district?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree to that amendment.

On section 11,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be well to give an alternative appeal direct to the Supreme Court if desired?

Mr. EDGAR. There is another appeal to the Privy Council under the Imperial Act.

Mr. SKINNER. It ought to be defined if this appeal to the Exchequer Court is to be to the Exchequer Court of the Dominion, or if it means such an Exchequer Court as we have in New Brunswick.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That question is settled by the second section of the Act, which says the Exchequer Court of Canada is the one referred to. This clause may stand.

On section 13,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It might be desirable that the fees should be submitted to Parliament for approval.

Mr. EDGAR. Under section 24 of the Imperial Act, the fees have to be submitted to the Governor in Council and the Imperial authority for approval.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a provision in the present Exchequer Act, that all rules made by that court shall be laid on the Table of the House within a certain number of days after the session, and that will cover this case.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the 24th section only refers to those rules, which require the approval of Her Majesty in Council.

On sub-section d, of section 14,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I wish to propose an amendment to section 14 as sub-section 2, to this effect:

That the Governor in Council may, from time to time, change the limits of any admiralty district, create new districts, and assign thereto the names and places of registry.

We want to give new names to the districts as well. At present there is a district for Quebec, and it may be desirable to have a district in Montreal.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is taking power to alter by Order in Council?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Take, for instance, a case in Nova Scotia. At present the Nova Scotia registry is in Halifax, but if it should be necessary to make another admiralty district, it would be desirable that we should give to it the chief registry.

On section 15,

Mr. EDGAR. What is the particular difficulty requiring it to stand in that shape?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At present, you will remember, it is a maritime court of Ontario, and we want to change its name and call it the Toronto district, in order that the other districts now presided over by surrogate judges may be constituted apart.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the hon. gentleman know how many surrogate judges have been actually appointed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Fifteen.

Mr. EDGAR. Is it proposed to make fifteen registries?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; some of them have no business, and we will of course drop them.

Mr. MULOCK. A difficulty presents itself to my mind. Suppose it should happen that one of these local judges should be taken ill, and was unable to transact his business. He would still be in office, and how is it proposed to deal with his duties during his incapacity?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is always available the principal judge of the Exchequer Court himself, and these judges have concurrent jurisdiction with him.

On section 16,

Mr. SKINNER. Is it intended that the judges who were holding their offices at the time the Imperial Act was passed, shall hold their office now under the new court without any appointment whatever?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That would be the effect of it. It might be desirable to issue commissions to them, inasmuch as their title of office would be changed. But this absolutely entitles them to continue in their office without any fresh appointment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You make it a legal and not a parliamentary appointment?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman to carve out new districts during the lifetime of the present incumbent?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

On section 25,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does this provision mean to give concurrent jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court judge with the Admiralty Court judges of the Lower Provinces?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I should imagine that if a case arose in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, it would be more convenient to institute proceedings in those provinces rather than commence a suit in Ottawa.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This provision gives power to the judge of the Exchequer Court to go to the other provinces to dispose of such cases. Section 10 provides the way the suit may be instituted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Section 23 provides that, notwithstanding the provision of section 10, the initial proceedings may be taken before the Exchequer Court at Ottawa.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It does not mean that.

Mr. MULOCK. It seems to me possible that it may be necessary, by circumstances, to institute a suit in a district in which it may not be the most convenient to continue it, and, in such cases, I think there should be power to change the venue, as it were, to a more convenient district, inasmuch as the position of the vessel gives the jurisdiction. Sometimes it may happen that the party suing may be compelled to institute a suit in an inconvenient district, and section 12 gives power to transfer from the local to the principal districts, but not from one district to another.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If that power were invested in the principal judge, it would be a useful one.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The districts are so large that there could be very little inconvenience of that kind. The district includes the whole province, and, if it is inconvenient for a judge to preside in Halifax, for instance, he could try the suit in Cape Breton or wherever he pleases. A provision that you could change the venue from one province to another would be inconvenient.

Committee rose; and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

A Message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:—

MR. SPEAKER,—

His Honour Chief Justice Sir Wm. Ritchie, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of your Honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Deputy Governor had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:—

An Act respecting the Farmers' Bank of Rustico.

An Act with respect to the Albion Mines Savings Bank.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 66) to confirm a lease between the Guelph Junction Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Henderson.)

Bill (No. 78) to confirm an agreement between the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to confer further powers on the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway Company.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

Bill (No. 46) respecting the South-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 65) respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 39) respecting the Maritime Chemical Pulp Company (Limited), and to change the name thereof to The Maritime Sulphite Fibre Company. Limited.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Manitoba Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Macdonald, Winnipeg.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 118) respecting the Citizens' Insurance Company.—(Mr. Desjardins, Hochelaga.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved concurrence in resolutions reported from Committee on Ways and Means.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved in amendment, that all the words after the word "That" be left out and the following inserted instead thereof :--

The situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artizans, miners, fishermen and farmers, and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next, should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured as well as natural products.

Mr. WELDON. In rising to address the House on the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford, I shall begin what I have to say by congratulating the hon. Minister of Finance on his good fortune in having to submit to this House so satisfactory a statement as that which he has been able to make, and in having been able to propose such acceptable changes in the tariff as those which he has proposed. It is a good many years in this country since any Finance Minister has had so pleasant a duty to perform as the hon. gentleman had on Tuesday night last. He was then in a position to tell us that, at last, after twenty-three or twenty-four years' struggle, the predictions made two or three years ago that the debt of the country would be allowed for a time to stand still had for two years been verified. He was enabled also to inform Parliament and the country that he proposed to cut down the expenditure, and to effect the greatest reductions of taxes made in any year since the union of the provinces. And he was enabled to give the members of this House and the people of this country the feeling that there was going to be a rest for a time after a most arduous struggle. Almost a quarter of a century ago, the two great parties in Canada, the Reform party and the Conservative party, joined hands and formed a new party, by the name of the Liberal-Conservative party, whose policy was to bring about the union of the British provinces in North America, to bind those provinces together by a railway from the Atlantic coast to the St. Lawrence River, to construct and deepen a system of inland water-ways running from the great lakes down the St. Lawrence. No sooner was the union of the provinces accomplished by the help of that coalition of the Macdonalds, the Cartiers, the Browns and other great men, than the Canadian people, under their strong leadership, set themselves to the fulfilment of that task. In some nine or ten years, at great cost, after great struggles and labour, they had almost completed the Intercolonial Railway. From that time until now, they have been steadily working at the problem of deepening the canals, but shortly after the union, largely, I think, owing to the ambition and foresight of Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier, they conceived the grand project of acquiring possession of the prairie lands of the North-West and the distant Province of British Columbia; and as a condition necessary thereto, they decided on pushing railway communication so as to connect the Atlantic seaboard with the great lakes on the St. Lawrence River, and then cross the prairies and the three chains of mountains to the Pacific Sea. It is with great relief the Canadian people know that these three radical measures have been accomplished. With reference to the canal system, a little remains to be done, but this much has been done, that 27 feet 6 inches of clear water has been given to the great ocean ships going to Montreal, and with the expenditure of a little more money, 14 feet of clear water will be given from Montreal to the head of Lake Superior. This useful and great struggle, which perhaps has taxed the energies of Canadians to their utmost for twenty-five years, is about over; and it is with a feeling of great pride that we find those works completed and those predictions verified, and that we can now hope, for some years to come, to find but a very slight increase in our public debt. When I heard the hon. Finance Minister say that, despite the enormous expenditure which has been made since 1879 on railway construction in the North-West, the actual interest per capita on the debt in Canada had not increased by more than 6 cents, I thought the Conservative party, which has controlled for twelve years the destiny of the country, had great reason to be proud; but the feature of which we have the greatest right to be proud in that budget was this: that after all this has been done this country is in so sound a position that our Finance Minister is able to say to the whole body of Canadian consumers, that he is in a position to lower their burden of taxation by $3,500,000, by means of reductions in the tariff. We know well that for many years this article of sugar has been to Finance Ministers of both parties the favourite child of the whole tariff. The Finance Minister in the late Mackenzie Administration used to call it the white-haired boy of the tariff. The sugar duties were so easily collected, their bulk was so large, and the revenue derived therefrom was paid at so few points, that all Finance Ministers were extremely jealous of any attempts to destroy or cut them down. I congratulate the Finance Minister on having had the courage, I may say the self-denial, to take off $3,500,000 from sugar and to give this great boon of free or almost untaxed sugar to the Canadian people. The member for South Oxford, speaking on this question of sugar on Tuesday last, described the net result of all that the Finance Minister had done as being a substitution of taxation of $1,500,000 on those who make and deal in and consume liquors and tobacco for $1,500,000 on the consumers of sugar, and he said the remaining $2,000,000 had been handed over to the sugar refiners. What a preposterous statement for anyone to make in this House, and particularly for an hon. gentleman sitting in the front benches, and who has been a Finance Minister himself? I venture to say that the consumers of the Dominion have received relief by this measure amounting to almost $5,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELDON. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." What are the figures? There are 228,000,000 lbs. of sugar consumed annually in Canada. The price has been cut down, as the figures I will read will show, at the refineries both on white and yellow sugar, and, if it be true that one-third of the sugar consumed in Canada is granulated and two-thirds brown sugar, it is a mere matter of arithmetic to see that the cost of sugar at the sea-board is reduced by about $4,000,000. If you pursue the argument, and admit that the remission of 2 cents a pound at the Custom-house as hon. gentlemen opposite contend, means the lowering of the price by two and one-half cents at the retail store, then, in addition to the reduction of $4,000,000 at the Custom-house, 25 per cent.

further must be added for the reduction at the retail stores, so that you will find that the measure of the reduction of the burdens of the people in respect of sugar, is almost $5,000,000. I state this as a manifest truth, and place it against the statement of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the sugar refiners had received the advantage of $2,000,000. I know that the president of the Moncton Sugar Refinery telegraphed Tuesday night to his people to sell granulated at a reduction of 2 cents a lb., and that in Montreal it was announced that granulated sugar had gone down to 4½ cents. The conclusion that I arrive at is that a reduction has taken place of 1½ to 1¾ cents upon yellow sugar, and of 2 cents on granulated sugars. The hon. gentleman says that we have not removed the taxes on sugar, because the taxes have not been entirely taken away, and that some protection has been left for the refiners in this country, but I contend that the protection which is left to our refiners is less than it was under the polariscope tariff of 1886.

Mr. MULOCK. How much reduction is there?

Mr. WELDON. There is a reduction of about 16 cents on the 100 pounds. The ex-Finance Minister says that protection is still given to the refiners. It does not suit him to have the sugar refined in this country. If the Finance Minister had taken off the duty and at the same time had smashed the sugar refineries with their thousands of employés, counting those who work in the refineries and in the subsidiary trades which they need, he would, no doubt, have applauded him. Our idea was to continue to give those people employment and not to drive them away to the country to the south of us. I want to make another flat contradiction of a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He says :

"We have the maximum of loss to the revenue, and the maximum of advantage to these monopolists. On every pound of sugar which the poorest man consumes, he will have to pay not into the public treasury, but to the sugar refiners eight-tenths of a cent."

I deny that statement. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the tariff, article 2, page 277 of the Votes and Proceedings, he will see that it says that all sugar at and below 14 Dutch standard comes in free, and that which comes in at 14 Dutch standard is a very excellent yellow sugar which we in the Lower Provinces have used very largely. A sugar known as Cuba crystals, which tests as high by the polariscope as 96 degrees, and therefore is nearly a perfect sugar, though a trifle brown in colour comes in free under the present tariff. Then there are Muscovadoes, which will come in free, and thus any poor man can protect himself against any attempt on the part of the refiners to put anything like eight-tenths of a cent a pound on sugar by any combine they might make. The hon. gentleman's statement is not founded on fact. And the truth is that the great bulk of this sugar will come in absolutely free, and this is a protection against any extortion on the part of the refiners. Hon. gentlemen would like the restoration of the old system. I will not at present touch upon the question of free trade against protection, but later on I will deal with that on its merits. Speaking of the low grades of sugar, I might say that last night an hon. gentleman who is interested in the sugar trade, and particularly in the kind which I have referred to as Cuba crystals, informed me that it was selling yesterday, in Halifax, at 3¼ cents, and that Muscovadoes were selling yesterday, in Halifax, at 2½ cents. We noticed that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his speech the other night was lacking in his usual vigour, though not in his usual despondency and gloom. The tariff was altogether too much for him, and the cheers with which it was greeted from these benches were the precursor of the cheers with which it will be greeted from the Atlantic to the Pacific. For the benefit of the members of this House who are here for the first time, and who have been too busy and too well employed to read the Budget speeches of the hon. member for South Oxford for the last twelve years, let me say that his speech on Tuesday night presented no very new features. There were some of his old predictions, some of his old boasts, omitted. We heard no more of the old story that the tariff could not do its work in raising a revenue without being prohibitive, but most of the old points came out again ; they were made much in the old spirit, though in a spirit, perhaps, of deeper gloom and despondency than ever before. As he spoke, one was reminded of the old English divine, who, speaking of his own country, said : "The man who goes about in this country telling the people they are not as well governed as they ought to be, is a man who will soon find a large audience." And upon that statement of the judicious Hooker I would like to add this commentary : that the man who goes about this country for seventeen years making the same gloomy statement, will find at last that he will lose his audience—and that is precisely the position of the hon. member, for I noticed that neither the members behind him nor the members in front of him, on Tuesday night, paid very much regard to what the hon. gentleman said. He gave us a short lamentation on the balance of trade, although, as he said it, it was in the way of taunt rather than as declaring his own belief. As to the balance of trade, the figures, as that hon. gentleman gave them, proved nothing more than this, that the exports, which are recorded in the blue-books, are too low, and every man who studies the export tables in our blue books and in American blue-books, know they are too low—they are too low in the case of all countries where there are no export duties. We can easily test that by comparing our exports to the United States, for example, with their recorded imports from Canada ; by our record of exports to the British Islands, with their record of imports from Canada. Our table of exports bulks too low, because of the fact that the Custom-house officers are not very particular in making up the figures. I say, secondly, our exports in the blue-book are but the product of Canadian capital and Canadian labour on our Canadian land, and, as we know, that must be supplemented and added to by the products of Canadian capital and Canadian labour on the sea ; and if those things be added together, you will find the purchasing power of the things that Canada has to sell to foreign countries is large enough to pay for all our imports, and to pay interest on our debt, and that is what is required to make a sound commercial condition. In one breath the hon. member for South Oxford complained of excessive taxation in this country. That was the old story, it was the automatic action of a man who had prepared his speech before he had heard of the tariff changes and who was forgetting for a moment that we were throwing off three or four millions of taxes. He spoke a moment afterwards of the drop in the revenues for the current year. He was not frank enough to say that that was caused by the fact that since the 1st of April there had been an almost entire cessation of imports in sugar. He complained again of some interview there had been between the Postmaster General and the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the result that he discovered that the Government were giving larger mail subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman had not had the patience, nor had he the candour, to go on and to say that in the interval between the old figures and the new, a large system of railways known as the New Brunswick Railway with a large and expensive postal service, had been taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the payments that were formerly made to the New Brunswick Railway now appeared as made to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. member had one of his old-time remarks concerning the decline of trade, and after the unnumbered rebukes which he has received in this Parliament, I was somewhat surprised to find that with a view to discredit the Government, with a view to discredit the National Policy, he ventured to dwell once more upon the decline in trade between 1873 and 1890. He chooses as the first term of the comparison the volume of our foreign trade in 1873, when he knew perfectly well that the entire decline occurred during the five years when his tariff, his fiscal policy, and not ours influenced our foreign trade. He was not aware that the figures he gave would only have the effect of rebounding against himself, and of bringing our discussion back to his own wretched and lamentable fiscal record. It reminds one of the story that Joe Howe used to tell of a farmer of Digby, in western Nova Scotia, who went to spear a salmon with the handle of a bush scythe, and in doing so cut off his own head. That the hon. gentleman should have had the courage to remind this House of a decline in our foreign trade of from 41 or 42 millions, occurring during the four or five years when he was Finance Minister, is almost passing belief. I say that when Sir Richard Cartwright had control of the fiscal policy of this country, the trade went down by leaps and bounds, and when the Conservative party came into power the tide turned, and trade has steadily gone up by some 40 millions. However, unfair and uncandid as he was, I shall not make my statements so lacking in truth as to insinuate that he was the cause and ought to be held responsible for the 42 millions of a decline. I know better. That was in part due to great economic causes entirely beyond the control of any Finance Minister. I am not going to the extreme length of saying that the National Policy is calculated to develop foreign trade. That is not its aim and purpose, though during the existence of our National Policy our foreign trade has made a reasonable growth. The National Policy has cut down our foreign trade in two distinct respects. It has cut off the export of some of our own raw materials of manufacture, and cut off the import of foreign goods made from those very materials. In the article of household furniture, school furniture, church furniture and all that, the effect of the National Policy was to cut off the export of that birch and ash timber, to cut off the drain of our sons who were going away to the American States to work up that wood and send it back to our provinces, and to cut off the supply of food products that was leaving our provinces as food for our own boys who were there in those foreign mills and factories making up that furniture. When you look at those trade tables you will find a decline in the exports of this timber, it is no longer going out, these food products are no longer going out, and the finished products are no longer coming in. There is a decline in the out-go and a decline in the imports, and that is one of the first effects of the National Policy; although that effect upon the volume of foreign trade was looked for, the policy which produces that effect, in my opinion, is no blunder, but a capital success. A second advantage of the National Policy was in respect of the manufactures that we are well calculated to make from the raw materials which we are not calculated to grow. We were led to import raw materials and to have them manufactured here and sold in our own market, so that under the National Policy we were importing raw cotton, raw manila and raw sugar for example—whereas earlier we had been importing cotton fabrics, cordage and refined sugar; and in respect to the bulk of that trade, again the foreign trade tables will show a decline in value. That was the expectation, that was the very aim of those who defended the National Policy—it was to keep for us our home market by giving employment to home labour, by building up our own towns and cities and thereby to put our people in the position of such greater thrift and comfort that they would be able to buy more largely than they had heretofore been buying of articles of luxury. I look at the tables, and I find that despite the fact that there has been a decline in articles of the first class I speak of, manufactured out of our own raw material, and articles of the second class manufactured out of raw materials grown abroad, so notable has been the increase in the comfort of the whole body of our people, that despite these two reductions, our foreign trade has grown by $40,000,000. The hon. gentleman says that the bulk of the people are poor. He gives us his own bald and naked assertion, but he gives no proof. Year after year I have occasion to go into as many homes as the hon. gentleman, and I suppose a great many more. I know the condition of the people of my own county, and as the result of visiting hundreds of their homes, I take the liberty of stating that the bulk of the people are not poor. I give this as an illustration: Whereas twelve or fifteen years ago musical instruments were seldom to be found in the homes of the middle and working classes, pianos being hardly ever seen and organs being rare, now in the part of New Brunswick I represent the bulk of the farmers are supplying their homes with musical instruments. I put that fact against the hon. gentleman's assertions. We were treated once more by the hon. gentleman, as we have been treated times without number, and this unhappy nation has been treated times without number, to tales of extravagance. The hon. gentleman told us that when the Dominion began its career it spent $13,500,000, and now we are spending $36,000,000, and he cannot understand it. I will tell the House why he cannot understand it. The skies are too near his head and his horizon is too narrow. The hon. gentleman is a parish politician. Speaking with all respect for his skill in debate, his fluency of speech and his finished declamations, he is a parish politician and not entitled to be named as a statesman. How could any man who took in the whole situation make the complaint he did, that because the expenditure has increased two or three-fold, therefore there had been criminal extravagance. What were we doing at the beginning? We were governing four provinces on the St. Lawrence and on the Atlantic seaboard, and now we are governing half a continent. Why should the hon. gentleman go over all those items, and why should he travel the old ground? We adopted the present policy, and we knew it would be a costly policy, and yet followed it, and it is altogether too late in the day for that hon. gentleman or any gentleman to complain that we have done what we have done. The hon. gentleman says our public works are unproductive. He complains we have spent about $50,000,000 on canals. In all conscience, if there is any one expenditure which that hon. gentleman ought not to make the subject of reproach to the party now in power it is the expenditure on the canals. As a matter of common fair-play he knows well that his old leaders in the Conservative party, and subsequently the leaders in the Liberal party, committed themselves to the policy of thorough canal development and pursued that policy. It is true that when Mr. Mackenzie came into power in 1873, and after advertisements calling for tenders for a very large canal expenditure had been issued and tenders had been received, that hon. gentleman took upon himself to cancel the whole business; but they did not stop their own canal expenditure. They decided on adding millions for canal expenditure. I do not make this as a ground of reproach against the hon. gentleman and his allies, because it was one piece of vigorous and earnest policy to which they were entitled to credit during those long, dismal and unsuccessful years in which they controlled the destinies of the country. The hon. gentleman spoke of the Intercolonial, of the great sum of money it has cost, $50,000,000, and the very large deficits that have been incurred by reason of that road. I confess that I share in some degree the hon. gentleman's regret that the deficit is so large. It is a disappointment to us all, and I think, speaking from the experience of two Administrations, that of Mr. Mackenzie, in which he was his own Minister of Railways, and that of Sir John Macdonald, it has been shown that the political management of railways in this country cannot be made economical. I hope, at a later stage of the session, to express my views on this subject more fully, and I trust we will find some method of dealing more successfully with this railway question, and find it possible to place the Intercolonial Railway in the hands of a non-political Commission, fully strengthened by Act of Parliament, entrenched as the judges are now, and beyond the control of Parliament, a commission composed of able men who will be given almost carte blanche to go forward and make the Intercolonial Railway pay. Having regard to the enormous trade done by it in the Lower Provinces it is disappointing to see the increased deficit incurred by it. Hon. gentlemen now in opposition have no hope that they can do better, and if they spoke their minds freely they would say they could do no better. The only hope is to adopt some system such as I have suggested, and I hold this opinion more strongly in view of the fact that I hear such a system has been successfully operated in other colonies of the Empire. But the complaints of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) are loudest as regards the North-West. He saw ruin everywhere, dark clouds were hovering over the Lower Provinces, the canal system was wrapped in darkness, but the deepest darkness was away in the western country. He reminded us that our predictions had not been fulfilled. I will not weary the House by reminding the hon. gentleman of the predictions he made, which are found recorded in his own Budget speeches. They are very entertaining to all who have a sense of humour; a humorous man making an analysis of the hon. gentleman's Budget speeches, noting and commenting on the various predictions and promises he had made, would make this House scream with laughter. The hon. gentleman commonly has a commercial crisis on hand and impending. On Tuesday night it was afar off, for it was only within a "measurable distance." When elections are coming on, however, it will be found that the commercial crisis is at hand. It was so in 1881, 1886, and before the last election. Now, who is this political prophet? Why is he entitled to speak with the authority he claims for a large part of the honest working people of this country? Whose arm does he make strong for work, whose heart does he make lighter; and half the strength of a man is the heart and hope he brings in the morning to his daily toil? What immigrant walking behind the plough on the western prairie whistles with a lighter heart for reading the hon. gentleman's speeches? What fisherman rowing out towards the sunrise over our sleek Atlantic seas has felt his arms strengthened after reading one of the hon. gentleman's speeches? Upon what meat doth this Cæsar feed that he hath grown so great? I have shown his entire unfitness to be called a prophet; he has shown his entire unfitness to be regarded as a safe and responsible statesman, because, right after the last election he took occasion —and I hope his Ontario colleagues will not stand by him in that—he took occasion to sneer at and wound the pride of six of the provinces of this Dominion. He called us in these six provinces the shreds and patches of the Dominion; he called us in the East, and he called you gentlemen in the West, shreds and patches. Was it good politics for a man who aspires to leadership to wound the pride of six provinces; was it good politics to tell fifty-seven members of this House that they and the people from whom they come are in the main a gang of thieves, and that they were in the pursuit of public plunder? I heard my hon. colleague from St. John (Mr. Hazen), in his speech at the opening of this session, refer to that language with due warmth and resentment, and I heard my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), later on in the session, referring to a letter which Richard J. Cartwright wrote in the Toronto Globe, describe it as being insulting, and slanderous, and calumnious, and diabolically false. Although I feel that resentment which both of these hon. gentlemen feel, I cannot work myself into a state of anger, for I have a sense of profound pity, that a man, who has sat in Parliament so many years with colleagues although they are not of his party in this House, could find no better words to say of them than that they are a gang of thieves and boodlers. I may tell the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that these six provinces which he calls the "shreds and patches" of the Dominion, and which to-night are represented by fifty-seven members in this House, are the hope of this Dominion. To the development of these provinces we must mainly look for the future greatness of Canada. To-night they have little more than one-quarter of the members of this House representing them, but we will not have long to wait to see the time when they will send one-half the members of this House. I have a right, representing as I do a constituency in one of these insulted provinces, to speak warmly of the unjustifiable remarks of the hon. gentleman. In his eyes, the Dominion of Canada is like the vision which the old king Nebuchadnezzar saw: the head of the Dominion, Ontario, is gold, and the feet representing to him the Atlantic and Pacific provinces are part iron and part clay.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the belly?

Mr. WELDON. The belly was silver, and I think that must be the Province of Quebec in the member for South Oxford's dream. I remember the time when the hon. gentleman had very little love for the Province of Quebec, but now he seems to flirt with that little beauty of the Lower St. Lawrence because she is friendly to him, and it is an interesting sight to see that gallant knight throwing off his armour and "capering nimbly in my lady's chamber to the lascivious pleasing of the lute." Let me ask what good has that hon. gentleman ever done for the country; we do not dispute his mental gifts, but of what service has he been to the country? Has he ever a good word to say for his country? Has he ever a helpful suggestion to make? When he was in power, and when above all other things it was his duty to encourage the people, he kept on discouraging them. He was almost as gloomy then as now; the Budget speeches of 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 are almost as dismal reading as his recent speeches. The hon. the Minister of Customs and my hon. friend from Two Mountains (Mr. Daoust) remember perfectly well these years when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) used to spend the first half of his session apologizing for his blundering prophecy of the year before, and the last half of the session predicting that he would not blunder again, and so on session after session renewing the same dismal plaint. I pass away from my observations in reference to that hon. gentleman, and I wish to say a word about the National Policy. We are told by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that the National Policy has won its last victory. We will see about that. They tell us that the National Policy is a failure. We will see about that. To observe the operation of the National Policy as it appears to us in the eastern Provinces, it is convenient to go back to events ante-dating by several years the introduction of that policy. Like many other members of this House, I was born in a country village, and I can remember well the time when, in each of these country villages throughout the Province of New Brunswick there was an appreciably large class of artizans, There were in each village two or three shoemakers making shoes for the whole people of the district; there was a tannery, tanning the hides of all the cattle slaughtered in the whole district and selling them through the country; there was a harness-maker with three or four men working in the shop, taking that leather and making it up into harness; there was a carriage-maker getting his planks of birch from the mill, putting them upon the old benches and taking his rip-saw and ripping out his shafts and felloes and spokes. Those of us who saw it remember very well when in each village there were the blacksmiths ironing carriages and sleighs, and ploughs and harrows, and making horse shoes and horse nails. As my hon. friend reminds me, we saw the people shearing their own sheep, and carding and spinning and weaving the wool. Well, some of us left our homes in our boyhood and took no particular note of the strange industrial changes that the country was undergoing, but when we went back twenty years later we found that artizan class had gone from the village. We found that where there were three or four shoemakers making boots and shoes for the people of the village there was now but one cobbler left repairing boots; we found that where there were three or four tanneries, tanning skins, taken from the cattle of the country round about, there was now but one or none.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELDON. This may strike those gentlemen opposite as extremely funny, but I think, if they wait a moment my learned friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my acute friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) will find that I will throw some light on the discussion. We found that the village carriage-maker was having his felloes and his spokes and his shafts brought in by the railway almost ready for use, and where previously there had been three or four carriage-makers, there was now but one person employed putting these parts of the carriage together. We found that the wool was no longer carded and spun and woven at home. What had happened? One of those wonderful industrial changes came over the Province of New Brunswick which had come over the face of the entire world. These articles, which twenty years ago were made in little shops by three or four men, were now almost entirely manufactured by great gangs of labouring men in vast mills in the city. We found that the multiplication of labour-saving machinery had entirely altered the industrial condition of the country, and the drawing out of the village of these fifteen or twenty artizans—not agricultural producers, but consumers of agricultural products—deprived all of these villages of a market of some value. These were the signs that village life, which, twenty years before, was picturesque by reason of these small industries, was declining; these were the changes that were visible, and the effect of these changes became more visible when the American war was over. And when the Minister of Finance of that day was the one who should have noticed these signs and changes, and should have made a provision to meet the disaster which could be seen by observant men, he was not equal to the occasion. It was his fault, as I have often heard of that hon. gentleman, that he thought he knew more than anybody else. He would take his books on political economy, his Adam Smith, his John Stewart Mill, his Ricardo or his Fawcett, home to his study and read them there until he was saturated with his learning and the consciousness of his own learning, and he believed the great captains of industry in this country could teach him nothing. The wholesale merchants, the bankers, the railroad men, the manufacturers, the miners, the farmers, the lumbermen, and the steamboat men, came to the hon. gentleman to impress their views upon him and to show that the existing condition of things was ruining the artizan class, and was driving them out of the country to build up foreign cities, but they could teach the hon. gentleman nothing. He was described very well by one gentleman as sitting there like a fretful porcupine with his quills set against every man who approached him. In those days, as good luck would have it, there sat on the other side of the House men who did not know everything, men who could learn, men who knew that the industrial condition of this country had changed, men who discovered some things which these hon. gentlemen did not see. They took up this policy—not a protective policy, but a national policy. They knew that there never could be a strong nation built up in this Dominion unless it had diversified industries. They knew that if most of the industrial power of this country was absorbed by the republic to the south of us, there never could be any strength or permanence in this Canada of ours. This is the reason that many of us who were trained to free trade in our colleges, who were taught by free trade professors, who had read free trade books, learned, when we came to open our eyes and see the signs of the times, that while free trade might be a good policy for European countries where different conditions prevailed, it was not the policy for Canada. Those free trade books were written by men accustomed to different industrial institutions, and under the inspiration of old world ideals which have not been realized, for even the nations of Europe have not become free trade states. Our Conservative statesmen, with the common-sense ideas acquired by being daily in touch with all classes of the people, gave the people what they wanted, I will not go over the other arguments which in those days were put forward, such as that about Canada being made the slaughter market of the United States. We were 4,000,000, and they were ten times as many, and they needed only to add 10 per cent. to their output in many lines of production in order to supply our wants. Thus they could glut our market and destroy our productive industries; and when these were once destroyed, they could amply recoup themselves by raising the prices of their goods. Herein is the justification for eight-tenths of a cent per pound which the hon. Minister of Finance has laid on refined sugars. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford said there were no intelligent protectionists. There are no intelligent free traders in Canada. Free trade is a fetish, and the days have gone by when men will worship it. Protection with many men is a fetish. Every community, however, must deal with its own problems from its own point of view. That is what our people have done, and that precisely accounts for the fact that the Conservative party have carried the elections of 1878, 1882, 1887 and 1891. I never was a protectionist in my life, but I have favoured a policy which has guarded our home market from absorption by our neighbours in the American Republic. The hon. member for South Oxford, in attacking the Budget speech, laid great stress on the decline of farming and farm values. He said that the value of farms in the Province of Ontario during the operation of the National Policy had gone down from 25 to 33 per cent. in forty-nine cases out of fifty. Here was another of those unfortunate, naked assertions for which that hon. gentleman is becoming famous, and on account of which he is coming to be not very carefully listened to in the House of Commons. I desire to put against his naked and unsupported words the record of statistics which are the latest in point of time that I could find in the library. They are from the Report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries for 1888, published by Mr. Blue, an authority which I do not think the hon. gentleman will repudiate. It tells us that the value of farm lands in the Province of Ontario, instead of having depreciated, have in the seven years from 1882 to 1888, appreciated in value $8,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh.

Mr. WELDON. I will read you the figures. In 1882, the value of farm lands in Ontario was $632,000,000; seven years later their value had increased to $640,000,000. In the same period the value of farm buildings increased from $182,000,000 to $188,000,000, the value of farm implements from $37,000,000 to $49,000,000, and the value of live stock from $80,000,000 to $102,000,000. In that period the value of farm lands, buildings, implements and stock in Ontario has increased from $882,000,000 to $982,000,000, an increase of $100,000,000 in seven years, which, I think, is a pretty good showing. I wonder if the hon. gentleman, when he next goes into Ontario, will have the effrontery to tell the people that farm property has gone down in value?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should think I would.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You do not even understand the figures you are quoting.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. member for South Oxford, by way of making an attack on the National Policy, has called our attention, as he has been accustomed to do for many years, to the movement of our population away from the country. This is a subject of great interest all the world over; but I know of no cheaper trick on the part of the demagogue than to take some fact which is not traceable to tariff policies or fiscal policies, because it is as patent in free trade countries as in protectionist countries—which is visible all the world over—which operates in almost equal strength in the United States and in Canada, in free trade Scotland, in free trade England, in protective Germany, in Switzerland—which is as universal as the atmosphere—and attributes the same phenomenon in his own country to the defects of the Government. I say it is one of the most cheap and despicable arts of the demagogue. Now, what is the fact as to the movement of population in this country? I will not follow the bad example of that hon. gentleman—I will not pit my naked assertion against his; but I will read from the record, although not at such length as to weary the House. The statement I read is from the Toronto Globe of three days ago, an authority the value of which I hope the hon. gentleman will recognize:

"The Scotch census, which is the last of all to come in, shows the same increase in the town and decrease in the rural population which the whole civilized world is becoming familiar with. In England and Wales the agricultural population, during the decade, 1871-81, declined 16 per cent. The figures are not yet available for a comparison of 1881-91 with the previous decade, but it is known that the agricultural population shows a continuation of the decrease that marked the previous decennial."

The census of Ireland for 1891 shows there has been a marked decrease in the rural population, although I do not think that proves very much, because there are special causes for that decrease in the case of Ireland. Even in the United States, the country for which the hon. member for South Oxford has so much admiration, we find striking evidences of a similar movement. In the State of Vermont there has been an actual decrease in population in the last ten years. I mention this, not with any pleasure, because to me as a Canadian there can be no pleasure in the decadence of those commonwealths which have given to law, to literature, to eloquence and statesmanship, some of the brightest minds to be found in the records of our English race. But the fact is, nevertheless, those states where Horace Greely was born, and Daniel Webster, and Longfellow the poet, and Hawthorne, are losing their people by thousands, and, one after the other, these homes are being broken up. I need not to gloat over their misfortune, but by way of illustration of the truth and soundness of the proposition I am setting forth, in Maine, out of its sixteen counties, seven have declined in population; and in the Empire state of New York which, as many of us remember, was in our boyhood the foremost farming state of the Union—and no doubt many of us remember the days when all our wheat flour in the Maritime Provinces was bought in the Genesee Valley—the population shows a decrease in twenty-three out of its sixty counties. I venture to say you will find no such startling statement in any of the provinces of Canada. Pennsylvania shows that twelve out of her sixty-seven counties have decreased in population. So that, in group after group, in state after state, of the Union we find the same deplorable showing. I wish to speak of one group of states, the figures with reference to which are indeed surprising, and that is the great north central division watered by the Ohio, the Missouri and the Mississippi and including the prairie region, a group of states ten in number with a population of 22,000,000. The facts in reference to these are shown by the last American census, and I will not take up the time of the House by mentioning more than a few of them. Ohio with its 89 counties, shows a decline in population in 28 of them. Of Indiana's 92 counties, 25 have declined in population, and in Illinois 30 out of its 107 show a similar result. I think these are the most surprising facts with reference to this matter of the movement of population that we have heard of for a long time. The State of Iowa, an apparently new state, in which one would think the fertile elements of the soil could not be materially exhausted, shows a decline in 27 counties out of its 99. I will not weary the House with reading any more of these figures, but I have them here if any hon. gentleman desires to see them. To be sure I have read the strongest as illustrating my position, but there are a good many other states in which the decline, though not quite so striking, is striking and discouraging indeed. It is not my business or my duty to weary the House with any speculation as to the cause of this decline. I do not know the causes. In our own counties I know many of the causes for the decrease, and no doubt some of them are world-wide. The enormous increase in agricultural machinery, by means of which one man and a boy can do as much in seeding, harvesting, cutting and threshing grain as could be done by four hands thirty years ago, thus saving the labour of two or three men on every large farm, is one of the causes. And another cause, and perhaps the strongest cause, is to be found in the fact that our race is a nomadic race, which has, ever since its history began, gone on wandering south and west until the British race has fairly girdled the globe, and it was a mark of great sagacity on the part of our Conservative leaders that, seeing the drain of population owing to this and other causes, they took the means to divert it into another portion of our own territory. There was one class of farmers who were tired to death draining wet lands, taking stones out of the soil, clearing wooded lands, who were anxious to find a more pleasant field for their labours, and who when they heard that out west, at the cost of not many dollars, there were lands to be had for the asking, free of forests, springs and stones, where there were no obstructions to cultivation, they naturally determined to flock thither. And you, Sir, could not wonder at it. The young and enterprising spirits who were discouraged by the hard work and little progress in the older provinces determined to make their way to the prairie lands; and our Government, seeing this migration, determined on opening up our own prairie lands and in directing thither the course of this movement, so that if we lost these people in the east we would hold them in the west. Another class of people we were losing was the artizan class, which, before the National Policy was introduced, had not sufficient field for employment in our own country, and had to seek their living in the workshops and factories of Boston, New York and other American centres. But by means of the National Policy, instead of that class being drawn off to the United States, we have kept them here. Hon. gentlemen opposite may look wise and shake their heads and laugh, but they have never propounded any rational alternative policy to the National Policy, and it will be time enough for them to shake their heads when they will have found such a policy as will more effectually prevent any outward movement of our population. With reference to the daughters of the household, who in the olden days could only find employment in domestic work, we have furnished them with work in our own cotton mills and other manufacturing industries, and helped to prevent their seeking similar occupation in the United States. I was glad to hear the hon. Finance Minister throw a ray of hope into the discussion by pointing out to our farmers that in the British islands there was a market of great possibilities. It is all very fine for hon. gentlemen opposite to sneer at every effort made to improve things, but the people of this country look to those who are hopeful and suggestive and constructive and not to those political atheists who believe nothing and have no hope in the future. The English market for our farmers, as everyone knows who will study our statistical tables, has been a growing market. We sell twice the bulk of agricultural products in the British islands that we did fourteen years ago, and during that same interval the American market has shown no growth whatever. The hon. Finance Minister spoke of our very large sales of cheese and beef, and indicated that, with continued energy and skill in studying the demands and conditions of the English market, we could fit ourselves to compete in that market with respect to other articles. There is no manner of doubt about it. Any one who is interested in agricultural pursuits, and who studies the question in a practical way, must know that there is no practical reason why we cannot sell butter, and eggs, and poultry, and many other products of the farm in the English market, much more largely than we do now, and to greater advantage than we ever could in the American market. Further, I am proud to say, there is on the English horizon a cloud the size of a man's hand, indicating a change of policy to our advantage. That may not afford our hon. friends opposite as much pleasure as it does us, but it excites in some of us the hope that, before we are many years older, we may, by means of new political adjustments, find in the old country, for the products of our farms, a much larger market than we have hitherto found. A very small difference of duty, a duty of 5 or 7 per cent. in the English market in favour of our wheat, and our barley, and our beef, and our mutton, and our poultry, and our eggs, and our lumber, would guarantee the very rapid building up of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that it is perfectly whimsical to talk about such an event, because it will never happen. They say that the leading statesmen on the English platforms have declared against it. They often quote what Mr. Gladstone and other leaders have said, but I say the utterances of Mr. Gladstone and the others on this question are not half so significant as were the utterances of leaders of opinion in England four years before the corn laws were repealed. Let hon. gentlemen read the speeches in the English Hansard of 1842-44 against this repeal, and then turn to the Hansard of 1846, and they will find that too much attention cannot be paid to those declarations of Mr. Gladstone and the others. Hon. gentlemen will remember that within five years the voters of England have been increased by 2,000,000. Before the last reform Bill there were 3,000,000, and to-day there are 5,000,000 voters, and the 2,000,000 who have been added are almost entirely the farming population. It is Hodge who has come in; it is the agricultural labourer largely who makes up those 2,000,000. The farming population of England, the landlord, the tenant and the farm labourer, are almost a unit in favour of differential duties to protect themselves against the American products and the products of Russia and Germany; and the chambers of commerce, in city after city, which show the indications of a movement even among the manufacturing classes, have declared in favour of this charge. If you notice the very significant articles which have appeared in the London Times three times in 6 months, in January, April and May, indicating a very significant change in opinion in England, and if you notice the very significant answers which the Prime Minister there has given within ten days to the people who made enquiries of him in reference to it, you will conclude that there will be great inducements to farmers to go on to the prairie land, and that enormous prospects are open to us in the islands across the sea. I have only to say a word in reference to unrestricted reciprocity and then I have done. The hon. gentleman, in attacking the position of the Government and the Finance Minister, said the Government were not friendly to any reciprocity, and were not in earnest in attempting to obtain any reciprocity. That was a statement which he made at twenty minutes to six. At a quarter after nine, he said the Government were too eager for reciprocity, that they were waiting for the beck or nod of Mr. Blaine to take any reciprocity they could. I must leave the hon. gentleman to reconcile his two statements. It would very greatly enlighten the Canadian public and would clear the public mind if the hon. member for South Oxford would make a clear and emphatic statement and, speaking for his party, an authoritative statement, as to what form of trade policy his party desires. Sometimes they are in favour of free trade which strikes down all the custom-houses on the 49th parallel and along the other portion of the boundary line. At another time they put the custom-houses back again. In fact, they are playing and juggling with names. We ask them in all candour and frankness to discard names and deal with things, and we ask the hon. gentleman to tell us whether he is in favour of unrestricted reciprocity or of commercial union? The hon. gentleman does not deign to answer. I would ask another question: Whether in the event of the hon. gentleman failing to secure what he calls unrestricted reciprocity he will take the responsibility of pressing on for commercial union? Now, the hon. gentleman does not think it necessary to give an answer. I tell the hon. gentleman that the record under my hand shows, as he knows very well, that the American people, with whom he has been bargaining and intriguing for the last two years, are not in favour of what he calls unrestricted reciprocity. There is not one responsible man in the United States in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. Neither Democrats nor Republicans will have it. Mr. Hitt and Mr. Butterworth, speaking of his own friends, will not have it. Mr. Wiman will not have it. The four or five senators of the United States who have been working with him will not have unrestricted reciprocity. Need I weary the House by reading extracts from the speeches of these gentlemen to show that they will not agree to this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity, that they will not allow Canada to have a lower tariff than they have under this scheme, that they contend that our tariff must come up to theirs, and that Canada is not to be the back door for smuggling into the United States? Let me read a few words from responsible men in this country and from leading Americans on this question of unrestricted reciprocity, as to the proposal that we should have a lower tariff than they have, and the policy of striking out the custom-house line altogether. The Hon. Mr. Laurier made a speech at Abbotsford last October, and he describes what he understands reciprocity to be. He said:

"This policy involves full and absolute reciprocity, not only in natural products, but also in manufactured articles, without any restrictions whatever. When the Liberal party comes into power it will send commissioners to Washington, according to the principles affirmed by the Cartwright resolution of 1888, to propose a mutual agreement by which there will be free trade along the whole line, doing away with restrictions vexatious and detrimental to both countries alike, and removing the custom-houses that go so far to cause friction between two countries designed by nature to exist side by side in friendly relations."

The Hon. Mr. Laurier is in favour of striking down the custom-houses. Mr. John Charlton, who I think, is the member for North Norfolk, in 1891 said :

"With commercial union between the two countries we could dispense with a standing army; for under the new relations that would be established between ourselves and our neighbours there would be no necessity for one; we could do away with our custom-house officers, who would have to seek other fields of usefulness."

Professor Goldwin Smith, who has been the literary ally of those gentlemen, in a letter to the Mail, dated 13th July, 1888, declared that :

"The proposed assimilation of tariffs on the seaboard is simply an arrangement to prevent reciprocal smuggling. Let me say once more that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity mean the same—the removal of the customs line between Canada and the United States."

And again :

"Commercial union would, of course, involve assimilation of tariffs, which, however, would present no uninsurmountable obstacle to negotiation. It would also involve an assimilation of the liquor (excise) duties."

Congressman Hitt—and we have heard more of this light recommended by gentlemen of the Opposition than probably any other—says :

"What is commercial union with Canada? It means, as set out in this resolution, the adoption by both countries of precisely the same tariff of duties or taxes to be levied upon goods coming from abroad, abolishing altogether our line of custom-houses on the north by which we collect tariff duties on goods coming from Canada, abolishing their custom-houses along the same line by which they collect duties upon goods we send into Canada, and having intercourse as unrestricted between this country and Canada as it is between the states. The line of custom-houses would follow the sea and include both countries."

Then Mr. Butterworth says :

"The adoption of the system proposed would involve the assimilation of tariffs, rates and internal revenue taxes, and possibly an arrangement for pooling receipts from customs, and a division on some equitable basis."

I have also a speech which is reported to have been made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) before the Charlottetown Board of Trade, when the hon. gentleman used his own native intelligence before he had been whipped into discipline.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is rather a "chestnut" which has been read for the last four years.

Mr. WELDON. Here is what he said at Charlottetown :

"Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect, that while it would be perfectly free trade between the two countries, each country would have the right to frame its own tariff as regards the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent. tariff while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent. The immediate consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the states by the way of Montreal. To this the states, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent, and unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit as well as commercial union, was, therefore, impracticable.

That is what the hon. gentleman calls the straight common sense of the whole matter, and so did the member for North Norfolk and so did these American gentlemen. They know, and the hon. member for Queen's knows to-night, as well as he knew it then, and the hon. member for South Oxford knows to-night, that there is no possibility of getting unrestricted reciprocity, that it is an illusory scheme, and that if this free trade wave had carried them into power, they would have been driven on to the point of commercial union, or they would have to pose, as the repealers in Nova Scotia did a few years ago, as arrant imposters and humbugs. I need not quote Mr. Blake ; he says precisely the same thing, that there is no such a thing to be wrought out as unrestricted reciprocity. The only thing to be got by these free traders is commercial union. They are fond of repudiating Mr. Blake, but I submit that in large sections of the Liberal party of this country, he is regarded as the safest and clearest thinker among them all. I waited to hear the hon. member with his project for dealing with the question of revenue. He knows that free trade strikes down more than $7,000,000 of American duty at a blow, and he knows perfectly well that it strikes off two-thirds of the duties that we now levy on our English trade, which would be some $6,500,000 more ; and he knows that it strikes off, perhaps, a quarter or a third of the duties that we are now levying on the manufactured goods from Belgium, Germany, and other countries. This loss would amount to $15,000,000 or $18,000,000, and how do they propose to deal with it ? They simply knock their heads against a stone wall and declare that the facts are not what they are. What nonsense to say, as the leader of the Opposition said in Halifax and elsewhere, that the loss would be only eight millions ! They know perfectly well that our trade with England would go over to the states. Unrestricted reciprocity has its tap root in the greed of the New England manufacturers to get the market of Canada for their own manufactures. Hon. gentlemen cannot humbug the Canadian people, and they cannot humbug this Parliament. They may say eight millions till they are tired of saying it, but they will not alter the fact. What are the economies they are going to practise. The hon. member for Queen's told us about one of them, the economy in connection with the tunnel. These gentlemen, with these fifteen millions of a loss of revenue staring them in the face, were not going to impose direct taxes to fill up the gap ; they were going to cut down the expenditures, and the first step the leader of the Opposition and the member for Queen's were going to take to cut it down, was to build a tunnel across the Straits to Prince Edward Island from the mainland. The hon. member reminds us that his antagonist. Mr. Ferguson, had a scheme for building a tunnel.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Hon. Senator Howlan.

Mr. WELDON. Yes, I should have said Senator Howlan ; the hon. gentleman was not to be outdone by Senator Howlan, and three days later he had a scheme,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was referring to the scheme that Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper pledged themselves to.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman read a letter sent by the Minister of Railways to Senator Howlan, and I propose to read another interesting document which was sent by another political leader to the hon. gentleman himself. I have not wearied the House very much with humour to-night, but, at the risk of a "chestnut," I will venture to tell a story which somewhat illustrates the humours of the campaign they had in Prince Edward Island, when Senator Howlan with a telegram pressed pretty close upon the heels of the hon. gentleman opposite. The story is of a hunter telling his friend how the hunter and his dogs chased a rabbit. The dogs, said the hunter, chased the little quadruped out of the alder cover across a swamp, dashed through a river and at last came so close upon the rabbit that the rabbit ran up a tree. "Why," returned his friend, "a rabbit cannot climb." "Well," said the hunter, "this rabbit had to climb." After Mr. Howlan got that telegram from the Minister of Railways the hon. gentleman had to come three days later with a telegram from his own leader. I will entertain the House with that telegram to show you how these gentlemen propose to make up for the loss of the fifteen millions of revenue. I will read the first letter, signed by Wilfred Laurier, addressed to the Hon. L. H. Davies, Charlottetown, as it is published in the Island Guardian, and dated at Arthabaskaville, 9th February:

"My Dear Davies,—I enclose you a copy of the letter which I have just sent to Mr. Higgs. I suppose it will be satisfactory. I have no time to write at length. We are deep in the fray, and things are looking remarkably well."

Now, let me read the letter to Mr. Higgs, sent by the same gentleman, and which appears in the same issue of the Guardian:

"Arthabaskaville, 9th February, 1891.

"B. D. Higgs, Esq., Charlottetown, P.E.I.

"Dear Sir,—I have your favour of the 2nd of February instant. I hardly would have thought that an expression of opinion as to the construction of a tunnel to connect the Island of Prince Edward with the mainland, should be required from me. Every man who has given any attention to the condition of things and to the necessities involved by the entering of the Island into Confederation, must admit that such a tunnel must be constructed, if the thing is reasonably practicable. The first requisite is to have an accurate survey and reliable estimates. I am only sorry that these were not obtained long ago."

I am sorry the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) who has loaded our files with interesting Bills, and the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who last year brought in interesting Bills in the interest of electoral purity, are not here, because their missionary work might be very well directed to that hon. gentleman himself; before they try to convert us hardened sinners, they would do well to try their prentice hand upon him. Now, I do not mean to say that I endorse in the slightest degree the letter or the spirit of the Bills of the member for West Huron and the member for North Norfolk. For my part I think that when hon. members of this House can be led to bring in such Bills, it indicates simply a hysterical and panicky condition of the public mind. I am not saying one word in condemnation of the position taken by the hon. member for Queen's, but I am simply showing what they propose to do as an initial step in meeting this tremendous loss of revenue.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I am afraid that the tunnel has a poor chance at your hands.

Mr. WELDON. I do not know about that.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Will you vote for it?

Mr. WELDON. I will ot commit myself. I certainly will not take such an extreme and unreasonable position as the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) took the other day, who, I think, has got this same contagion of the narrowness of parish politics as the member for South Oxford. That is not all, neither is it the largest nor the worst. I wish now to call the attention of the House to a matter of much greater importance. The tunnel project if carried out would involve an increase of $10,000,000 to the debt with the additional interest charges; but there is a much greater charge which I desire to press upon the attention of the House, and I do so with much gravity and with a very imminent sense of present danger. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was not the only man to whom letters were sent by the Opposition leader, and I am deeply disappointed that the leader of the Oppposition is not in his place so that he might correct me if I am charging him with acts he has not done. I only know the facts as they are contained in the record, in La Patrie, a Liberal paper in Quebec, the Toronto Globe, the leading Liberal paper in Canada, and another Liberal paper in Quebec. The charge is this, that the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), the leader of the Liberal party, speaking as he must have spoken and as he did speak in the name of the Liberal party, is alleged by his colleagues to have made very great and dangerous promises. It is within the memory of all, that some years ago Mr. Mowat, Mr. Mercier, Mr. Fielding and Mr. Blair met in the city of Quebec at what is known as the interprovincial conference to consider the scheme to amend the British North America Act, but which was merely a scheme to get the provincial subsidies largely increased and thus enhance the burden to the borne by the Canadian Exchequer. I have in my hands the record. They proposed to add, making their calculation on the census of 1881, $1,500,000 to the subsidies of the provinces as an additional charge on the consolidated fund; and their scheme was, without entering into details, that when the census of 1891 was taken the subsidies were to be enlarged, and assuming the proposition that the population would grow 600,000 in ten years, which I hope and think is below the mark, there would have been an addition this year to the subsidies of $480,000. So that next year if the scheme of the promoters had been carried out the revenues of Canada would be charged with an additional burden of $2,000,000 per annum. This I think is a staggering proposal, in fact the most staggering demand made on this country since the Act of Union. There some anxiety regarding the Better Terms for Nova Scotia, and with respect to the readjustment of 1873, and some grumbling occurred on minor readjustments since then, but a proposal to increase by about one-half the entire subsidies paid to the provinces is a radical disturbance of the whole Terms of Union and is a scheme certainly of great moment, and I think of great danger. To those hon. members who have not had their attention called to the fact, it would be a matter of surprise to them to learn that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) is declared by his good friend and colleague, Mr. Mercier, to have pledged to him, Mr. Mercier, that if he, Mr. Laurier, was elected, the financial terms of the interprovincial conference would be carried out, and those gentlemen with their deficit of $15,000,000 at the outset and contingent liabilities in the shape of a tunnel were pledged to impose an additional annual burden on the exchequer of $2,000,000. Those were indeed rapid advances in the way of settling the question of the finances of the country. I desire to place on record these statements of facts. The Toronto Globe of 10th February last contained a report of a speech by Mr. Mercier at Montreal, in which are the following words :—

"Mr. Laurier has accepted the resolution of the interprovincial conference of 1887, and he has promised to give effect to them when he comes into power."

I am told by some of my hon. friends from Quebec that the message from Mr. Laurier was sent from Ottawa River to Gaspé, and made to do service everywhere. La Patrie, of 10th February, 1891, gives a similar report in words almost identical with those of the Globe, namely, if I may be allowed to translate :

"Mr. Laurier has accepted the resolution of the provincial councils of 1887 and has promised to put them in force if he comes into power."

A similar report, although not precisely in the same words, was published in L'Electeur. I am sorry I am not able to ask the leader of the Opposition whether the statements are true or false, whether Mr. Mercier was warranted or not in saying that the leader of the Opposition in this House had pledged himself to a new and additional expenditure of $2,000,000 a year. I hope before the debate is closed, that this question will be put and a direct answer obtained, as it must be given by that hon. gentleman. I shall close by referring to the question of loyalty. That hon. gentleman sneered at our professions of loyalty for our Queen and native land. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared that we had entered on a protective policy, and under it, we taxed heavily our trade with that nation which was the greatest manufacturing nation to which our allegiance was due. He called us 35 per cent. loyalists. But instead of being 35 per cent. as alleged by that hon. gentleman, the duty on British goods is a little more than 22 per cent., for the hon. gentleman excluded free articles in his calculation. It may cause the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) some little anxiety if we go over his record during the last few years, but it gave some of us anxiety four weeks before the last election to see the utterances he made during the heat of the election, the character of the people who were in his pay and with whom he was locking hands in this country. In May, 1890, Mr. Ferguson, the member for Welland, asked the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) if it were true that in May, 1890, that gallant knight had been in Washington giving pointers to those who were preparing the McKinley tariff, and the gentleman said that he had not been giving pointers to the persons who were preparing the McKinley tariff. That denial he renewed this year and his word we implicitly accept, but the hon. gentleman did not deny that he had been in Washington, and, looking at that fact, in connection with so many other facts, we would like to know what that gallant knight was doing in Washington. It would be pure impertinence to ask this question if the visit to Washington were of a single and detached character, but we know very well that at that time certain foreign coadjutors of this gallant knight were engaged preparing a tariff and drafting resolutions, and that our friends on this side of the line were drafting resolutions. We know very well what was taking place there several months after. We know very well that when Mr. Hitt was moving certain resolutions in Congress the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was moving closely-related resolutions in the Canadian Parliament, and then there was a second resolution from the gentlemen down in Washington, and then a second resolution from the gentlemen up here, until they were like two distressed ships at sea signalling to each other and bewildering some of us simple-minded people who did not understand the signalling. That is a spectacle which during one hundred years has never been witnessed by the Canadian people, and I pray Heaven that for another hundred years it may never again be witnessed by them. The same gentleman goes to Boston and he makes a speech at Boston, and if I had not spoken at such great length I would read that speech at length. He made a speech which I think, without exception, is the most shameless speech which ever came from the lips of a Canadian public man. It has humorous aspects in some parts of it. The hon. gentleman sat in this Parliament and he saw the rivalry between the Atlantic ports, the city of St. John and the city of Halifax, which were both struggling for the winter trade of Canada and for the summer trade too. He saw that the city of St. John, relying on the strength of her natural position, was making a bold effort for the transatlantic trade, and he saw that the city of Halifax was pressing closely behind her. What adjustment of the dispute did this hon. gentleman propose? He proposed simply to strangle both of these cities and to give their trade to Boston, not only the winter trade but the summer trade as well. That gentleman had, I will say the shamelessness, to stand before a Boston audience and to deliberately propose to strangle Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, and to give their trade to Boston, and to guarantee to that city that it should hold the whole trade of 5,000,000 of people in fee. "No man could take it from them," he said. I hope he did not speak in the name of his party. I believe I may say that I know that he did not speak in the name of his party, because I know there are a great number of better men in that party. I know there are a great number of more honourable and high-minded men sitting around him and behind him, who were as much ashamed as I was alarmed by the destructive and dangerous utterances which this gentleman made. What else did we see? We learned twelve months ago from the columns of the Toronto Globe that Mr. Edward Farrer was a traitor. These were the words of the Globe—they are not my words—and a few months later we learned that that very gentleman was employed by the Globe as its chief editorial writer, and we learned also that this gallant knight from South Oxford had acquired a controlling interest in the Globe. And then came that famous annexation pamphlet of his paid servant; and then came his movements to Washington and Boston, and the intrigues of Mr. Farrer, and the movements of Mr. Farrer, who was in his pay, as we have heard. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would contradict this. Was the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at Washington plotting the dismemberment of the Empire and the taking away of Canada from the Queen's Dominions? We know that he was in close friendship and comradeship and political association with Mr. Erastus Wiman, a gentleman who came to Canada and boasted here, with impudent falsehoods on his lips, that he was a loyal Canadian, and who went to the Committee of the American Senate and to Boston public meetings and openly declared that he was an annexationist. Now, in view of the fact that Mr. Wiman was that hon. gentleman's ally, that Mr. Farrer was in that hon. gentleman's employ, that the member for South Oxford had got control of the Globe newspaper, that he himself was at Washington in May and that he was making these speeches in Boston; was there not good reason for our fearing, as I may say I did fear, and as I do now fear, that that hon. gentleman is at heart, although he may not say it openly, an annexationist.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you had better ask your present Premier about that!

Mr. WELDON. Ah! go back to history if you like, look at the career of Sir George Cartier who was once in arms against his English Queen, but who afterwards devoted his life to the service of his Queen, and ended that life as a true servant of his Queen. Sir George Cartier did not take honours from his Queen, and then seek to betray her. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if when the roar of the Boston banquet had died away, and the hon. member for South Oxford laid his head upon his pillow and thought of the early days when his Queen, for good services which he had rendered to her, had decorated him with knighthood; I wonder if then there came across his fancy the image of that good Queen, and if there ever came a feeling of baseness, that after having taken the oath of allegiance to the Queen, as all members of Parliament have taken it, and after wearing then, as I am informed he does not wear now, the decoration of knighthood, I wonder if he did not, looking into the future, say: I know that this unrestricted reciprocity is humbug; I know that it is nothing but commercial union; and I know that when Canada puts her feet upon that inclined plane she will irrevocably plunge down to political union with the United States. The hon. gentleman knew that perfectly. Long ago we read the words which Tennyson puts in the mouth of the old English King, when he met first his beautiful Guinivere after her flight:

> "Liest thou here so low,
> Whom once I knew in happier summers."

And so every good Canadian must feel about that gallant knight who twelve years ago, was undoubtedly a patriotic Canadian. I have his words here, delivered at that time, and there is a good honest loyal English ring about them. I read them in the Hansard. I remember them now, and I will read them again to show how he has fallen in these twelve years. The hon. gentleman was speaking of the National Policy as being in itself a damage to English trade and he said, when they were delivered:

> "We know that for a long time there have been a number of people in England, who have felt that it was rather hard to be called upon to maintain the police of the seas in our interest and to perform many other things popularly supposed to belong to a central government, and yet to find at the same time their manufacturers excluded by their own colonies, at the very instant when they are doing the utmost possible to promote trade with the colonies. And I can tell the hon. gentleman, that he may rely that when the people of England come to understand the exact operation of the tariff, he will find that he has gone a great step towards inducing them to look with complacency on any proposition which will relieve them from the burden of its defence. There is no use pursuing the ostrich-like policy of shutting our eyes to the manifest political dangers which are apparent to the course we are called upon to take. I do not condemn, to the same extent, his policy as regards the Americans and I admit they have always shown themselves very selfish in all matters of trade policy, but I warn him that he is exposing great important interests in thus rashly throwing down the gauntlet to 40,000,000 of our best customers."

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me contrast with that some unfortunate remarks made by that hon. gentleman within the last few weeks or months. I will read but two short sentences from a speech made by the same gallant knight in this House. Here is the tone in which he then spoke of England—this is taken from our own Hansard—referring to our trade policy:

> "If it does discriminate against Great Britain, we have a right to. Our own interest is paramount. We owe Great Britain nothing but charity for her atrocious blundering against our interests. There never was a time that Canada could not have bettered her condition by joining the United States."

Here is another extract taken from a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman at Oshawa, on the 4th of February last:

> "If free trade with the American nation will be good for us, let us vote for it, though it should involve discrimination against Great Britain twice over. Providence has planted us on the American continent, not surely to be the mere henchmen of that distant crown, but to do the best we can for Canada in the way that to us seems best, no matter what the ultimate consequences may be."

Mr. Speaker, it is on the record, and within the memory of the oldest members of this House, that when the hon. member for South Oxford sat on this side of the House, the Globe used to speak slightingly of his performances, as it has spoken slightingly of many other able men. At that time he had waited three or four years in the hope of taking a place on the Treasury benches; and when, on the withdrawal from our politics of Sir John Rose, the portfolio of finance became vacant, because his claims were not considered, and because Sir John Macdonald gave the place to Sir Francis Hincks, then this gentleman deserted his party and his leader. Therefore, if after two or three years of impatient waiting for a portfolio, the hon. gentleman in disappointment deserted his leader, it is no very great wonder that, after twelve years of feebleness and baffled ambition, he should betray his country. I tell the hon. gentleman that he and those associated with him have made a stupendous mistake when they have looked to the skies south of the boundary line for the sign by which to conquer. We want no such sign, but we will go on standing by our institutions, looking not to Washington, but rather to London, in the hope that the Dominion will grow, if not rapidly then slowly, to be a strong, earnest, loyal people, until by-and-bye Canada shall become, as most of us—on both sides of the House, I frankly say—hope she will be, a puissant nation, one of the proudest of England's children, standing side by side with the nations of the southern hemisphere and other sister nations, bound in a league of perpetual amity and good-will with the old land. I am sorry, Sir, to have spoken at such great length, and I thank the House for its indulgence.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will lead me on a somewhat different course from what I had anticipated taking in this debate; but I feel that it is due to him, as it would be courteous on my part, that I should endeavour to give such an answer as I am able to the various points he has touched upon. He has introduced subjects which I had not thought of alluding to tonight; and in view of the prominent position he occupies in this House, I shall at least attempt an answer to what he has said. He opened his speech by congratulating the hon. Finance Minister upon his attitude and mode of delivery. I myself beg leave to tender to the hon. Minister—if they are of any value and he will appreciate them—my own congratulations on the manner and on a great deal of the matter of his speech. I congratulate him especially on the omission of much of what might be termed the gush and bounce that has characterized, not only some of his own previous speeches, but those of his predecessors; and it is not because I wish to detract from this compliment that I say I wondered whether that was due wholly to the good sense of the hon. Finance Minister, or in part because of an inward consciousness that in whatever glowing terms he might depict the prosperity of this country, it was not really as prosperous as he and I fain would have it to be. However, let that be as it may, it was an improvement on many of the Budget speeches we have heard in the past. I can congratulate him, too, as did the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, upon his declaration, that the Government had determined upon a policy of economy. Sir, that announcement was welcomed on this side of the House, and we only hope that the fulfilment of the promise may be witnessed by us in reductions in the estimates that will be submitted to the House. But while I applaud the hon. Finance Minister in his determination to enter upon a course of economy, I wish him to remember that I do not consider it to be economy in the true sense of the word that great public works which are in the interest of Canada, which are becoming almost annihilated in some cases, if we may judge by expressions which we hear from some of the members of this House, that wharves and piers and harbours which have been constructed in the public interest shall be allowed to fall into decay for the want of necessary repairs upon the plea of economy, when we cannot but feel that it is not a principle of economy that is operating, but a lower and baser principle, the principle of a small mind that will withhold a public grant due to a province or a municipality simply because the inhabitants of that province or that municipality have exercised their rights in the true spirit of manhood, and have returned to this House members who are not in accord with the Government policy. Sir, I hold that true economy demands that those necessary works shall be constructed, that they shall be maintained, and that it is the bounden duty of a gentleman entrusted with the administration of the public money—not the money of any Finance Minister or any Government, but the money of the people of this country—to expend it in those works which are demanded on grounds of public interest and public necessity. But, Sir, is economy not to be practised by abstaining from entering upon public works which have no merit in themselves and cannot be defended on purely commercial grounds, or on the ground that they are solely in the interest of this Dominion? Sir, I would like to have some evidence of a better desire for economy on the part of the Government, because I doubt very much whether there is any such desire, and would be glad to have that doubt removed. But the Finance Minister must have resolved on that new departure in economy some time before he announced it in his Budget speech; and if he was honest in that desire, why did he not use his influence in saving to the country something like $250,000 a year in the revision of the voters' lists. Why does he go on spending that money, when he knows that, if properly expended on public works along our sea coast, it would remove just grievances, by enabling the necessary repairs to be made to harbours and breakwaters which naturally become damaged through the course of time? Sir, we will look for the exercise of this economy promised by the hon. gentleman, in his withholding assent from projects that cannot be justified on their merits or the public interest; but we cannot regard as economy the refusal of the necessary grants to maintain in proper condition the public works of the country, even though they should happen to be situated within the ridings of those who may not at present be in accord with the Government. My hon. friend next congratulated the Finance Minister upon the great reduction which he had announced in the taxation of the people. To the extent to which there has been a reduction in taxation made by the Finance Minister, I join in my hon. friend's congratulations; but I could not help being amused at the manner in which that announcement was hailed by hon. gentlemen opposite. For the first time, in many years, there has been the announcement of a reduction in taxation by the Finance Minister; but I remember that for years past, instead of announcements of reduction in taxation, we have had the Finance Minister declaring increases in taxation of 10, 15 and 20 per cent.; and every time the taxation was increased it was increased amid the plaudits of those hon. gentlemen who now equally applaud the announcement of a decrease. That is a marvellous change. Let us hope that hon. gentlemen opposite have changed. Let us hope that the policy which has been advocated by the Opposition during many years, and to which they would not give heed, has at last impressed itself upon their mind as the policy necessary in the interest of the country. The hon. gentleman congratulated the Government on the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I rejoice in the completion of that great national undertaking, but I cannot congratulate the Finance Minister as heartily as I would have desired, for we were given to understand by the hon. gentleman's predecessor, and he pledged the faith of the Government to it, that the completion of that railway would not add, as it has done, $100,000,000 to the public debt, but that this very year—aye, even a year ago—the treasury of Canada would be recouped to the extent of $70,000,000 by virtue of the sales of North-West lands. Yet, to-day, not one dollar of these $70,000,000 is to be found, but, on the contrary, we have millions of deficit caused by the mismanagement of the Government. While we rejoice in the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we cannot rejoice in the fact that every prediction of the Government has been proved to be fallacious, and that they have been shown utterly incapable to estimate the possibilities of the future. Their whole calculation has been proved utterly unfounded and fallacious in every respect, as cannot fail to be recognized in the fact of the great increase of the public debt. The hon. gentleman congratulated the Finance Minister that we had arrived at a period when the increase of our public debt would cease. Let me ask what credit he is entitled to for that, in view of the promises made by the Government and the statements furnished by them years ago, that, instead of having a stationary public debt, we would have to-day the public debt reduced by $70,000,000. The hon. gentleman next congratulated the Finance Minister upon the reduction in the price of sugar, and that is about the only item in which there is a reduction ; and he attacked the hon. member for South Oxford because that hon. gentleman could not swallow all the Finance Minister said on this question. It is no doubt amusing to notice how, year after year, different hon. gentlemen opposite are put up to answer the hon. member for South Oxford, and how each year the greater portion of their speeches is made up of denunciations of that hon. gentleman. The hon. member for South Oxford, according to the hon. gentleman, is fast losing any influence he had in the country, and fast becoming very harmless indeed ; and in view of this statement, I could not help thinking what a waste of time it was for a gentleman of the transcendent abilities and statesman-like power of my hon. friend to quote the utterances, and to quote them in a disconnected manner, of the man who has ceased to exercise any influence in the country at all. The hon. gentleman would have done better, with his brilliant mind and his lofty ideas of statesmanship, to have given us an outline of what he considered is the policy that should be adopted by the country. He was particularly angry at the hon. member for South Oxford because that hon. gentleman was not prepared to admit what the Finance Minister gave us to understand, until his remark was challenged, that his proposition was to throw off the whole of the tax upon sugar consumed by the people. But when questioned on that point, we found he had endeavoured to create a false impression, and my hon. friend from South Oxford pointed out that, though it was true there was a reduction in the taxation, that reduction was to be upon the amount of duty that went into the revenue, while the taxation imposed upon the people for years and which did not go into the public treasury at all was still allowed to go into the pockets of the refiners. Is not that true? The hon. gentleman says the whole of the $3,500,000 is thrown off, and he says is it absolutely immaterial if there is some protection left to the refiner, because, he says, the great bulk of sugar, namely, all the raw sugars under No. 14, comes in free. I recognize hat fact. The hon. gentleman talked about Cuban rystals, and about the sugar that would come in free. Why, does he not know that that grade of ugar was comparatively low before, and the Finance Minister gloried in the fact that, through the arrangement of that tariff, only 6 per cent. of the sugars consumed by the people was imported by way of raw sugar, and that 94 per cent. was refined sugar. Yet, he says that the great proportion of sugar to be used by the people in the coming year is to be raw sugars under 14 degrees Dutch standard.

Mr. WELDON. Sugar 14 degrees Dutch standard is free now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman knows it was not taxed as high as the refined sugar. Now, this talking about No. 14 Dutch standard, is, to many members of this House, something which they cannot be expected to understand. They are not in the sugar business, and, therefore cannot be expected to understand it.

Mr. BOWELL. It is Dutch to us.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I will put it into English. In order that the House might understand this matter—because it is desirable that this question should be understood, and that the House should see whether all the glory with which the Finance Minister would fain surround himself is fairly due to him, and if it is justly due to him, I will be the first to give it to him, but I want the country to understand what his position is in regard to this matter—I went over to the Customs Department, knowing that they had some new samples by which they test the importation of sugar. I found that they had some new samples in and that they had some old samples left. Of course, I could not get the new samples, but I took some of the old samples and I have here a sample of No. 14 which has become somewhat bleached by process of time, and I have also samples of No. 15 and No. 16. The result of time is that No. 14 is rather lighter than it would be if now imported. I brought these to the House in order to allow hon. members to see the distinction between these different numbers. Here I have No. 14 Dutch standard sugar, which has been bleached by the operation of time till it is at least half a number lighter in colour than the real No. 14 Dutch standard by which they will test the samples of sugar imported. The hon. gentleman says : I have given you a free breakfast-table, I have given you free tea, free coffee and free sugar. If so, if that is the kind of sugar which is to be on the breakfast-table, I venture to say that none of it will be found on the table of the Finance Minister to put into his tea.

Mr. FOSTER. You are mistaken. That is the kind I take.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If so, if that is what goes on the table of the Finance Minister, I do not want the poorest man in this country to have to take that sugar for the benefit of a few sugar refiners.

Mr. BOWELL. I would ask my hon. friend if nearly all the muscovadoes that come into this country are not under No. 14, and if they are not used very largely throughout the whole country ?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No ; and if the Finance Minister is willing to do what is right in this matter let him do what he said when he was interrupted by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who asked him a question as to his not taking off the duty altogether on sugar. The hon. gentleman then said that when the United States reduced their duties, they retained duties above a certain standard for the benefit of the refiners, and therefore we should do the same. Let me tell him that the United States, a country which hon. gentlemen opposite say is protected far beyond the protection which Canada has, a country which is protected to a wonderful extent, when it reduced the duties on sugar, made raw sugars free under No. 16, that is two numbers lighter than the free sugar that we are to have. The hon. gentleman knows that our refiners would not allow us to go as far as the Americans did, to make raw sugar free at No. 16 and under, as they did, because the importations which would take place would allow the same leverage to be brought to bear on our refiners as that which is now brought in the United States. But our Government have fixed the grade at No. 14, and no one knows better than the Minister of Customs that it is very risky for an importer to bring in a sugar at the grade of No. 14, because it may sail very close to the wind when it is tested, and it may not stand the test, and if it does not, if it is half over the No. 14, his calculations are altogether upset, and he will find that his whole cargo has to be paid for at an increase of $\frac{5}{10}$ of a cent a lb.

Mr. BOWELL. Is not the sample of No. 16 bleached the same as No. 14?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, that is true, and the comparison is fair. The middle grade that I have here is No. 15, but any member can see for himself the difference in colour between No. 14 and No. 16, and can see what chance the wholesale importer will have to bring in good raw sugar. If the hon. gentleman would follow the example of the United States, by which he said he was guided, if he would make it No. 16 instead of No. 14, it would not be a matter of such difficulty. No doubt, some of this will come in and will be used for certain purposes, but I think the hon. Minister cannot claim much credit for free sugar if he is going to force the people of this country to use No. 14 Dutch standard and under.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the price of granulated sugar?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see it is now $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents to the wholesale trade.

Mr. WALLACE. That is 2 cents less than it was a week ago.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My hon. friend is nearly correct. It is $1\frac{7}{8}$ cents less than it was a week ago. I am glad the hon. gentleman is following the market quotations, because then he will be able to follow a business argument when it is presented to the House, as no doubt he will. The Minister of Finance was kind enough to give to the House a table showing the course of the sugar trade in this country. He went back to 1878, he skipped 1879—I do not know why—he gave us 1880 and the years following. He skipped the first year of the National Policy, perhaps, because it was a mixed year, but he gives us the value, the quantity, and the duty during the years named, and he works out the duty per pound and the percentage on the importation from the West Indies and the percentage on the refined sugar imported. That is a very useful table. It was, however, prepared, I think, not for the purpose I am using it for, but in order to show that there was less sugar refined in the country before the introduction of the National Policy, and that sugar was higher. He does not refer at all to the state of the market at that time, or to the fact that refined sugars were being imported at that time of a high grade, and that, though the rate of duty on sugar was less than afterwards, the burden of taxation on the people was much less at that time than it is to-day. He knows that the duty on refined sugar at that time was 1 cent a lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem, while later on it has been $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a lb. specific and 35 per cent. ad valorem, or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the combined specific and ad valorem duties. He knows perfectly well that the burden on the people is the ad valorem duty or the combined specific and ad valorem duties reduced to an ad valorem duty. Is it not a pity that, when he was preparing this table for 1889 and 1890, he did not prepare a table showing the price for which refined sugars were sold in Canada at that time? I felt it necessary to do that myself in order to supplement the table of the hon. gentleman, and I propose to give it to the House. I looked through the Montreal Journal of Commerce; I had two bound volumes, the first one started on 4th July, 1889, and I took the quotation each month till June, 1890, taking six months in 1889, and the six months succeeding in 1890, making the whole year between July and July. I took in each case the first issue of each month, and I took the lowest quotation for yellow sugar and the lowest quotation for granulated sugars, that were given there. I added them together and I divided the amount by two, showing how much it was per pound on the average. No one can tell exactly—at least I was unable to do it, perhaps the Finance Minister can tell—what is the exact proportion of consumption for yellows and of whites refined, which come into the country. I think that was an absolutely fair test for purposes of explanation, as the Minister, in dealing with this question, dealt with the average protection, the average rate of duty, and so on in his speech. Now, I find that the net result, taking those months together, the average for the twelve months, that the people had to pay at the refinery for sugar, was $6.64 per hundred pounds. The hon. Minister, in his table which he has given us for 1889, gives the cost per pound of the raw sugar the refinery used, and at $2.60 per hundred pounds, on which he had to pay a duty of $1.64. Therefore, the cost of the raw sugar to the refiner, plus the duty he paid, and which went into the revenue of the country, was $4.24 per hundred pounds. In 1890 this sugar cost him $2.92, the Minister says, on which he paid a duty per hundred pounds of $1.63; so that the cost of his sugar in 1889, and the duty that he paid, and that went into the treasury, amounted to $4.55. Adding these two together and dividing by two in order to find the average price of the cost per pound to the refiner, we find that his raw sugars, plus the duty he paid on them according to the table of the Finance Minister amounted to $4.40 per hundred pounds. Sugar was selling, as I said, during these months, at the rate of $6.64 per hundred pounds, or in other words, there was a difference between the price at which refined sugars were sold and the price which the sugars cost the refiners, plus the duty he paid, according to the Minister's showing, of $2.24 per hundred pounds. The question I want the Finance Minister to answer is this: Where did that $2.24 per hundred pounds, on the two hundred million pounds of sugar consumed, go to?

Mr. WALLACE. There was not any such average.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman is inclined to doubt my correctness. I will explain to him that I started in July 4, 1889, and I closed at June 5, 1890, getting my figures from the Montreal Journal of Commerce. If he can find any mistake in what I have said, I can say that it has been made inadvertently, and no one will be more ready to apologize than myself.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman will permit, I will point out the mistake. He has taken the lowest price and the highest price of granulated, when every one knows that there are three pounds of the lowest price sold to one of the highest.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Every one does not know that. I do not know it, nor, I think, does the hon. gentleman know it. Is there any higher priced sugar in Canada than the granulated?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And yet you said I took the highest price when I took the granulated. The hon. gentleman knows that there is the Paris lump, and he knows there is the ground that is higher than the granulated; but he knows that I took the lowest quotation of granulated sugar, and he knows that it quotes from say, $6\frac{5}{8}$ to $6\frac{3}{4}$, and I took the $6\frac{5}{8}$. He knows that yellows vary a cent and a-half in price, and I did not take the highest price yellow, but I took the lowest. Even if there is a larger proportion of the yellow. I have arrived at a fair basis. But let him say what is a fair basis, for at $2.24 per hundred pounds he will find it amounts to over four millions of money in one year that has to be accounted for. Grant that he is right, let him take the proportion he likes, and see whether it would wipe out over four millions. The Finance Minister might perhaps reply that the cost of raw sugar in his table here was the original cost in the islands, and that he has not added the duty. The duty would be very small. The Finance Minister might say that a part of that was loss and cost in refining. Granting that the proportion would still be very small, there is still a vast sum of money to be accounted for in his table, as to the cost of sugar paid to these refiners and the price they had sold it at. That would be a very useful item for the Finance Minister to include when he prepares another table of this kind. My hon. friend in answering stated that the Finance Minister had reserved some protection to the refiners, but that he had reduced it. Well, if my hon. friend will examine the point I think he will find that the relative protection is greater than it was. What is the protection the refiner has under the duty of my hon. friend?

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman did not contest my position when I was on my feet. I will now show him I was right. Under the old tariff, the polariscope tariff on granulated sugar, the duty was $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound specific and 35 per cent. ad valorem. Now, last night the prices of granulated sugar in New York were $4\frac{3}{16}$ cents. Reckoned on that basis the ad valorem duty would be $1.46\frac{9}{16}$, which would leave the total duty on granulated sugar imported to-day under the old tariff at $2.96\frac{9}{16}$ per 100 lbs. I am making my calculation on my feet and I need a little time to make it accurately. The duty under the old tariff on as much raw sugar as would make a hundred pounds of granulated sugar is $2. It is 1 cent a pound where it tests 70 degrees by the polariscope, and then $\frac{1}{30}$ of a cent for every additional degree; 30 degrees more are needed to make pure sugar. So that the duties on so much raw sugar as will make a hundred pounds of granulated is 2 cents, and taking that basis the net protection to the refiner is $96\frac{9}{16}$ cents per 100 lbs.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I observe that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) applauds that statement, and if he understands it, it is more than I do; and yet I think I understand the sugar question as well as he does. I do not want to put any discredit on the figures of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), but his calculations are very involved.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I wish the hon. gentleman had challenged me before, and I could have answered him in the course of my speech.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not object to the interruption, because in a question of this kind, which is a business calculation, I am willing to admit a man might be wrong; but it is easier to take the question on the basis on which the Minister of Finance put it in his speech. The average protection the refiner had under protection was the difference in the duty he paid on the raw material necessary to make a pound of refined sugar and the duty placed on refined sugar. The protection given to a refiner or to any manufacturer is the difference between the duty on the raw material he uses and that on the finished article he produces. The Minister of Finance says the protection to the refiner was under the old tariff 1 cent per pound. Now, he says: I have reduced it to $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per pound. I should like him under this calculation to explain how it is he claims that he has reduced the protection to the refiner, when he says that all the protection the refiner had under the old tariff was $1 per 100 lbs. and now it is 80 cents. I contend that the refiners are in a better position than they were before. It is true the Minister of Finance may say that this is 20 cents per 100 lbs. less than before. But there are other circumstances to be taken into account in determining the amount of protection given to a manufacturer. The prices of sugars in the United States have fallen from 6 cents for refined to 4 cents. The refiner in Canada had a protection under the old tariff of 1 cent against 6 cents. The refiner now has a protection of $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent against 4 cents; so that now the Canadian refiner has a protection of 20 per cent. against $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. he had previously. Accordingly, the refiners in this country are absolutely in a better position and are enjoying more protection than they were before. If the Minister of Finance gives a protection of 80 cents on an article costing $4 he will have to give a protection of $1.20 if the article costs $6 to make the protection equal; but the Minister of Finance admits that it was only $1. I, therefore, say that in the present arrangement of the tariff still greater protection is given to the sugar refiner than before.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Do we understand the hon. gentleman to say that under the old tariff the duty would be charged on the price of refined sugar in New York, or on the price of that sugar in bond in New York? The hon. gentleman is calculating the duty on the price of refined sugar in New York with the American duty paid. If that sugar was exported to Canada it would be exported at the price in bond, and duty would be calculated on the same footing as now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the Minister of Customs say that? The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), although he comes from a county which has a sugar refinery, is not posted in the working of this mysterious tariff. I have shown that under an average price of 4 cents in the United States, which is a high basis, and more than the average basis on the average price of yellows and whites imported from the United States, 80 cents gives a protection of 20 per cent. ad valorem. How much protection should the refiners have? I will quote what Hon. Mr. Abbott, the leader of the present Government, stated from his seat in the Senate on 15th March, 1889, in giving his ideas of what would be sufficient protection for the sugar refiners, who the Minister of Finance and the House admit were doing very well that year. Mr. Abbott said:

"I heard in this House and during this debate the statement made that the protection was 100 per cent. In point of fact, the duty imposed on raw sugar averages 65 6-10 per cent., and on refined sugar 71 per cent.; and the difference between those two duties is all the protection the sugar refiner has."

I grant that his proposition is correct; the only protection the manufacturer has is the difference between the duty he has had to pay on the raw material and the duty upon the article he produces. Mr. Abbott said:

"The difference between 65 6-10 and 71 per cent., does not, however, correctly indicate the percentage of taxation, because refined sugar is of greater value than the raw material."

But he adds—and I want to give the House his utterance in all fairness:

"The actual protection afforded to the sugar refiner is the difference between 65 6-10 per cent. on raw sugar and 71 per cent. on refined sugar, plus the disturbing element caused by the difference in value of the class of refined sugars used here, beyond the raw material."

The hon. gentleman is right on that point. The difference in values will have some effect on the calculation; to what extent he does not say. What Mr. Abbott wanted the Senate to understand was that all the protection the refiner had was about 5½ per cent. which might be increased in values by importation. While he has given to us his view that this is all the protection the sugar refiner enjoys, while he would admit, as every one admits, that enormous sums had been made by sugar refiners during that time, the proposition of the Minister of Finance is to give a protection of 20 per cent. ad valorem to the sugar refiner under this tariff; and announcing it to the House he heralded it as one of the greatest boons ever given to the Canadian people. It is claimed on behalf of the tariff by hon. gentlemen opposite that we obtain a corresponding benefit for this duty that is paid by the Canadian people. But, before I touch that point, let me show what amount of protection is given by this tariff to the sugar refiners of this country at this moment. I am glad to know the hon. gentleman opposite gave me the figures, because there will be no dispute in reference to them. I find that in the New York Herald and the New York Tribune of 24th June, 1891, they quote granulated sugar at $4\frac{3}{16}$ cents per pound, or $4.19 per 100 lbs. The Boston Herald of 23rd June, 1891, says: "American sugar refining company quote granulated sugar, in lots less than 100 barrels, at $4\frac{3}{16}$, lots over 100 barrels at $4\frac{1}{16}$ cents per lb.," and my hon. friend opposite has himself given the present quotation in the United States as $4\frac{3}{16}$ cents. Now, then, the Canadian price as my hon. friend opposite has stated, and as the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) stated, is to-day or yesterday, or when this change was made, fixed at $4.50 per 100 lbs. The New York and Boston market is $4.19 per 100 lbs., against the Canadian price of $4.50 per 100 lbs.; or, in other words, our prices are under this new tariff, 31 cents per 100 lbs. higher than they are in the protected market of the United States. They have not taken the whole 80 cents per 100 lbs. I grant you, but what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, was that the Minister of Finance has given them the power if they agree among themselves to take the 80 cents; and they start out with taking 31 cents according to the quotations given by the hon. gentleman opposite himself. The hon. gentleman opposite has given us the total consumption of sugar in Canada as 240,000,000 lbs., but I will take it at 200,000,000 lbs., and I will call the higher price paid in Canada as compared with the United States, 30 cents per 100 lbs. instead of 31 cents, and then I ask what does that represent to the Canadian consumers of sugar? The manufacturers are charging to-day on 200,000,000 lbs. of sugar $600,000 more than is charged in the United States, even if they never take advantage of their position to a greater extent than they do now. That means that when the tariff is in operation the people of this country pay this $600,000 a year to the manufacturers. But hon. gentlemen opposite tell me: You have a compensating advantage, we are giving employment to the men. I hope we have a compensating advantage, and let us see if we have. The hon. gentleman spoke of the thousands employed in the sugar refineries. Was he speaking at random or had he the figures to prove this?

Mr. WELDON. I said directly and indirectly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I presume that when the census was taken these refiners, wishing to look prosperous, gave to the census officers the full complement of the men they employed. I have not yet got the census for 1891. I wish we had; we ought to have the returns in our hands now and they would be very useful to us, but I am forced to go back to the census of 1881, and what do I find? I find that, in 1881, we had a sugar refinery in Halifax. We have one there now, I believe; but there is another and its doors are closed. They had a refinery in Moncton; and they had two in Montreal, and they have two there now. In 1881 there were four sugar refineries in Canada, and practically speaking there are about four now. The number of hands employed by the different factories—and remember the number of employés is given by the proprietors of these establishments who are interested in every way in showing they are giving large employment—the total number employed according to their statement was 723 hands in 1881. But gentlemen will say: there has been vastly more sugar refined since then, and in refining more sugar a greater number of hands would be employed. I grant you that, but we can arrive at the extra number of hands which it is necessary to employ for the extra quantity of sugar refined.

Mr. McALLISTER. There has been a sugar refinery erected in British Columbia since then.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One has been erected there, but I have not heard of any product from it; there are no returns in reference to it. By a process of calculation, which I think the hon. Minister of Finance himself will not dispute, I can arrive at the actual number of persons employed now by these sugar refineries, taking the statement of the number they employed in 1881 as a basis. How will I do that? The Finance Minister told us in 1881 that there was 78 per cent. of raw sugar imported and 22 per cent. only of refined, while in the year 1889, which was the year he took for comparison, he said we imported 95 per cent. of raw sugar and only 5 per cent. of refined. The difference then between the importation of 78 per cent. and 95 per cent. of raw sugar would be 17 per cent. more sugar which would be refined in the Dominion of Canada in the year 1889 than in the year 1881. That 17 per cent. would be equal to 22 per cent. upon the 78 per cent. raw sugar imported in 1881 and upon the quantity refined in Canada in that year. Therefore, if to the number of hands employed in 1881, namely 723, I add 22 per cent. increase to account for the number required to refine the extra quantity of granulated sugar, it would make 159 more hands employed in 1889 than in 1881. Taking the census of 1881 as a basis and adding the proportionate increase of hands necessary to refine the increased quantity refined in 1889, the total number of hands now employed in these sugar refineries would be 882. The total yearly wages as given by these manufacturers in 1881 was $363,000, and I have to add 22 per cent. additional to that to cover the wages that would be paid on the increased quantity that was refined in Canada in 1889, which would make $79,680 more, or a total of $442,860 per year. I have shown that by the quotations to-day, 30 cents more per hundred pounds is charged in Canada than in the United States, and on a consumption of 200,000,000 lbs. per year that makes $600,000; so that you could afford to pay all these hands which are employed in the sugar refineries at a rate of nearly $500 a year each and then make a saving besides. In other words the $600,000 represents extra cost of sugar to the Canadian people; the amount of wages paid to the workmen in these sugar refineries amounts to $442,860, and if you deduct one from the other you still have a loss of $157,140. The country might, out of the public treasury, pay all the hands engaged in the sugar refineries for doing nothing and then save $157,000 per annum besides. That is the position in which the sugar question now stands, and the Minister of Finance asks us to rejoice with him and to give him credit for having wiped out the taxation that was upon the people of this country with reference to the article of sugar. No, Sir. If he had followed the principle adopted by the United States, which is the example he uses of the highest protected country we have in the world, in the adjustment of their sugar duties, he would find that they give $\frac{5}{10}$ of a cent per pound to their manufacturers, but the hon. gentleman gives $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per pound protection to the Canadian refiners. They have allowed the people of the United States to bring in No. 16 Dutch standard free, but our Minister of Finance has reduced the standard to No. 14 under which our people are allowed to bring in raw sugar. Therefore, instead of reducing the protection, he has relatively increased the protection he has given to the refiners. In spite of the fact that sugar is now being reduced in price by the amount that went into the public treasury, the people will still have to contribute a burthen somewhere else. Sugar has still to pay a tax upon the tribute that is placed upon it by those refiners, in asking a higher price than that for which sugar can be imported from a country where the price of sugar is fixed under a protective tariff as it is in the United States. No, Sir, we cannot give him all the credit we would like to give him in this matter; and we have this to say, that while the moral sense of the people of this country would be shocked if a Minister controlling a department should be found varying the terms of a contract so as to make it more profitable to the contractor, and receiving from that contractor at different times sums of money to be used as an election fund to corrupt the electors of this country, and while individual members of Parliament would shield themselves behind the statement that if done at all it was done by the Minister on his own authority and unknown to them—I call to the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite that, in criticizing the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, if there was one statement made by him that called for notice at their hands more than another, it was his declaration that it was well known that these sugar refiners were the largest contributors to that corrupt election fund. The hon. gentleman who last spoke should have given some answer to that statement; he should have been in a position either to deny it or to state that it was well founded. Sir, am I to understand that he dare not deny that statement?

Mr. WELDON. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to make a denial? I know as little about it as he does.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he is in a position to deny what the hon. member for South Oxford charges?

Mr. FOSTER. You will get the denial in due course.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). A denial of that statement?

Mr. FOSTER. You will get all the denials you deserve, and there will be a good many.

Mr. BOWELL. If you charged it, I think it would receive a little more attention.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, it would be a very sad thing indeed if, following upon these people contributing largely to an election fund for the purpose of corruptly influencing the electors of this country, it should be found that a Minister of Finance, not in the secrecy of his own department, but in the broad light of Parliament, should come down with a proposition to so adjust the tariff that those men should get hundreds of thousands of dollars for themselves, if they saw fit to use the machinery provided by him. If the moral sentiment of the community would be shocked by a Minister changing contracts for the benefit of men from whom he had received election contributions, what shall be said of a Minister who would ask Parliament to sanction tariff changes for the benefit of those who were the largest contributors to the fund for carrying the elections of this country? Now, perhaps, I have spent more time on this sugar question than I ought; but my hon. friend was very emphatic in claiming credit for the Government on that point, and I want to give the hon. Minister of Finance full credit for the reduction he has made in the sugar duties. He has thrown off, as the hon. member for South Oxford has said, all the revenue that went into the public treasury, and he has so adjusted his tariff that what was taken out of the pockets of the people before but did not go into the treasury, it is in the power of the sugar refiners to take for themselves at a greater rate ad valorem than they had before. But he is giving the right to the people of this country to use on their breakfast-table sugars under No. 14 when imported from the country of production, while if they import it from any other country they have to pay 5 per cent. upon it, and on refined sugars the people still have to pay $\frac{5}{10}$ of a cent per pound. The hon. gentleman alluded to the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford with reference to the balance of trade, and attempted to account for the balance against Canada. I do not wish to go into a discussion of the subject of the balance of trade. The hon. member for South Oxford mentioned that only to show how utterly unable hon. gentlemen opposite were to grasp the condition of the country. He was showing that for years it was claimed by the predecessor of the hon. Finance Minister, a gentleman from his own province—and his claim was cheered to the echo by all his supporters—that if there was a balance of trade against us, we were on the highway to ruin. His policy was to reverse that condition of affairs; and when, owing to their policy, hon. gentlemen opposite actually did succeed for one year in changing the balance and making our exports greater than our imports, these hon. gentlemen threw up their hats in acclaim, and shouted: "We have managed it; we have made our exports greater than our imports, and we are now on the highway to prosperity." The hon. member for South Oxford referred to that to show hon. gentlemen opposite that since that time there has year after year been an enormous balance of trade against us. The hon. member for Albert argued that these balances were fictitious and could not be relied upon to show the real condition of the country at all; but the hon. member for South Oxford only referred to the matter to show that these hon. gentlemen do not comprehend some of the subjects they undertake to discuss. Now, the hon. gentleman said that we claimed that the National Policy was a failure. Well, we have said that it has not accomplished all that hon. gentlemen opposite claimed for it. Let me ask the hon. gentleman himself a question. I think he himself was reported as saying, in reply to a question of a newspaper man, that the National Policy was a failure and would have to be discontinued. I think that was the view he himself expressed, if he was correctly reported.

Mr. WELDON. That was not my view.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I only know what the hon. gentleman is reported as having said, and if he took that position he would not surely find fault with us when we, who do not admire the National Policy, declare it to be a failure. The hon. gentleman claimed that there were good features in this National Policy. He pointed out that before it was introduced, there had been small industries scattered through all the towns and villages, but that in place of them we had now large factories. He said that in those days in every village you would find a tannery tanning the hides of the whole village. When I went to school I used to be told that the schoolmaster attended to that business in part. But no doubt the National Policy has partly had the effect of wiping out these smaller industries. But if the aggregate number of people that are receiving employment in this country now, under the system of large factories, has increased, the aggregate number of people scattered through all the villages and towns and helps to carry on the different institutions of the country, has decreased. I rejoice in the evidence of prosperity as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, and in any progress made in our manufactures, provided it is made legitimately; but I hold that if you have to bonus a manufacturer to an extent greater than all the wages he pays to the men employed by him, it is a direct loss to the country instead of a gain, and that is a proposition no hon. gentleman opposite can successfully controvert. Hon. gentlemen opposite are hardly fair when alluding to the arguments of my hon. friend from South Oxford with reference to the depreciation of farm lands in Ontario. The hon. gentleman denounced that statement in very strong language. I think he was pleased to say it was untrue, and that he would prove it to be untrue. Now, in questions of this kind it is better not to impute an untruth to an hon. member; it is better, if we can, to admit that he has given an opinion in which he honestly believes, though he may be very much mistaken, and give him the benefit of the doubt. I think an hon. gentleman is all the more bound to do that if he is not in a position to substantiate the assertion he makes by some reliable data. But what is the proof the hon. gentleman gave to show the hon. member for South Oxford was wrong in saying that farm lands had depreciated. He took the report of Mr. Blue and read the total value of improved lands in Ontario compared to what they were seven or eight years ago. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that Ontario is standing still? Does he suppose that no land is being brought, year by year, under cultivation which was not cultivated before? Does he suppose there is no increase in the total acreage of improved land? How does the hon. gentleman's reference disprove the statement made by my hon. friend from South Oxford, which was that individual farm lands have depreciated in value 25 per cent.? The figures given by Mr. Blue do not disprove that statement in the slightest degree. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that this is a point on which I do not care to touch, as I find no pleasure in talking about the depreciation of land in Canada, and would much rather be able to rejoice that our lands were appreciating instead of depreciating. But I am forced to say, and I say it with regret, that—let the hon. gentleman attribute it to one cause or another—if I am to believe the statements of loan companies and the farmers themselves, farm lands in many parts of Ontario have depreciated below what they were worth some years ago. I would be only too glad if the hon. gentleman could bring any proof to the contrary, but that he has failed to do. I, however, will not discuss this question at further length, but will leave it to be discussed by hon. gentlemen who will follow me in the debate, and who are more conversant with the matter. No true Canadian can rejoice in the fact that our lands are depreciated, but no true statesman, no true legislator, is justified in living in a fool's paradise and shutting his eyes to the facts. If the contrary be the case, he ought to know it, and face it, and introduce legislation to remedy it instead of imposing burdens upon the people greater than they are able to bear. The hon. gentleman, in speaking of the exodus, said it was not to be wondered at because England, Ireland and Scotland had to suffer from a similar exodus, and the New England States had lost their population in many parts, and he added that it was a characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon to go westward until he had circled the globe. I hope sincerely that the exodus from Canada is about circling the globe, and is now on the home-stretch back to Canada. The hon. gentleman has given his view in that connection, only it was somewhat marred by the fact that somehow, when the the people of the Western States start on their journey west, they keep within their own boundaries and do not cross over into our territory, and what I lament is the fact that while we are losing our own population we are not gaining any from the other side. It is lamentable, when we take our last census returns, to find that in Canada we are not able to retain our own natural increase of population, but that all the immigrants that come to our country and a percentage of the natural increase of our people have left us and gone somewhere else. That is a question I do not like to dwell upon any more than upon the depreciation of real estate. I do not mention it in a spirit of depreciation, nor did the hon. member for South Oxford so refer to it, but we simply point to the fact and ask that the Government should give it their attention and see whether there is not some way to be found by which a better state of things could be brought about and our young men kept in the country. The hon. gentleman spoke of the English market and of the differential duties which he anticipated would be imposed by the British Government upon farm products, and he said if the British Government would charge other countries five cents or ten cents a bushel on their grain, the English market would be a grand market for us. Are we to understand that the hon. gentleman was put up to answer my hon. friend from South Oxford in order to give this House and the country the first intimation that our Government are about to adopt the scheme of Imperial Federation as their policy? He said he was glad to see that the Finance Minister had given a ray of hope in his Budget speech with regard to an extension of trade with England and then he went on to give his own views of the direction in which legislation would tend to the benefit of this country by Imperial Federation between Great Britain and her colonies, differential duties being imposed by Great Britain on the products we are able to send her, but I do not see, from his remarks, what it is we are to do for Great Britain in return for these differential duties. I do not see what part of the hon. gentlemen's scheme will in any way turn to her advantage. Is it part of the hon. gentleman's scheme that Canada shall, in her turn, open her markets to the manufactures of Great Britain? I put him that question. He has been willing to answer me on several occasions this evening, sometimes without even my requesting him to do so, and might I ask him for an expression of his views on this point? Is he prepared to say on behalf of this Government that they entertain the project of admitting British manufactures of all kinds free into this country?

Mr. WELDON. Will the hon. gentleman say whether he is opposed to such a scheme?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not think the hon. gentleman is as candid as he might be. He has posed as a statesman to-night. He denounced my hon. friend from South Oxford as being no statesman, and proposes to us a policy, in opposition to that of my hon. friend, of differential duties on the part of Great Britain in favour of colonial goods, and he is bound to state whether, as a necessary condition of that policy being adopted by Great Britain, the Government propose to admit English goods free.

Mr. WELDON. I did not say a word about Imperial Federation.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman did not use the term, but spoke of our trade with Great Britain; and will he tell us whether he had not in his mind, when speaking of differential duties, the idea of a federation of Britain and her colonies?

Mr. WELDON. That does not matter.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman is not candid enough to admit that. I think the change predicted here by my hon. friend cannot mean anything else. And in confirmation of this I will just read a report of the hon. gentleman's remarks in a newspaper interview after the elections, concerning the Imperial tariff. He said:

"The time has come when England must choose between abandoning Canada or agreeing to an Imperial tariff that will give Canadian products a preference in the British markets in return for a preference to British manufactures in Canadian markets."

He does admit it. When the hon. gentleman could say so to the newspaper reporters, why should he not be candid enough to make the same statement here when I ask him to do so in the most pleasant manner possible? He continued:

"If England will not do this, annexation is not only probable but appears to be the inevitable destiny of Canada."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Treason.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is a bad shape in which, according to the hon. gentleman, we find ourselves. I do not think there is much hope that British statesmen, in their present state of mind, will give these differential duties, and I am very sure that, whatever our Government might otherwise do, the Red Parlour which controls it will not quietly submit to allowing British manufactures to come in free. I think, therefore, this scheme of the hon. gentleman is rather in the distant future; and I am afraid, if he is a true prophet, and he poses as one to-night, since, having denounced my hon. friend from South Oxford as a false prophet, the inference follows that he must consider himself a true one, our only alternative, according to him, is annexation, and that is a black outlook for this country. He will have to go to Washington. With reference to the English market, a great deal was said during the late election, when we were discussing the policy of the Liberal party and that of the Government, about the British market being our natural market and providing us with an outlet for our products; and it was said that we should do nothing to destroy that market. Why, Sir, if we were to adopt reciprocity with the United States, how would that destroy the market of England for Canadian agriculturists? What is the fact? The British market is as open to-day to every product of Canada as to those of any other country. It will receive every pound of Canadian produce which we choose to send free, and it is open to every other nation under Heaven just as freely as it is to us. The English market gives us no advantages, but places us in precisely the same position as it does all the other nations in the world. And while I rejoice in the fact that a large trade in many articles is springing up in the mother land, that trade is springing up there simply because it is the best market we could find under existing circumstances for those articles. If under this Government's policy we close forever the American market against our products, we can send them to Great Britain, but we shall not be able to sell them there at as good advantage as we could in the United States if we had free trade with that country. What we want for our agriculturists is to obtain for them access both to the United States and English markets. These markets will not be closed against us until they are closed against other nations. But let us deal a little with this question of unrestricted reciprocity, to which the hon. gentleman alluded in the closing part of his speech. He asked the hon. member for South Oxford to say whether he favoured unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. At last the hon. gentleman has found that there is a distinction apparently between the two. Hon. gentlemen opposite have hitherto always contended that these phrases mean the one and the same thing. Now, my hon. friend admits that there is a difference; but on rising to speak on the amendment introduced by my hon. friend from South Oxford it was not necessary for the hon. gentleman to ask what his policy is, because the very proposition he rose to criticize enunciates that policy. What is that policy? Why, it is that in the negotiations which this Government have declared they are about to enter upon with the Washington authorities in October next they should be prepared to conduct them in the spirit and on the terms of the most extended reciprocal relations that can be had. That is the proposition which my hon. friend from South Oxford has fairly laid down. There was no necessity for the hon. gentleman asking for an explanation of it, as the amendment fully explains itself. Hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed themselves in favour of reciprocity with the United States in natural products, and they are going to Washington presumably to attain that object. But is there any possibility of their being able to secure from the Washington authorities reciprocity in natural products on the basis of the treaty of 1854? Well, they have been told by Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State, or they might have learned it from the letter he has written, that he will never be prepared to grant reciprocity on these terms, and that being the case, the House cannot give the Government credit for being sincere in their desire for any measure of reciprocity at all. Why, Sir, what is the position taken by the Finance Minister, who was one of the delegates to Washington, and proposes to go there again. He is going there, he says, to obtain reciprocity in natural products. We know what he thinks with regard to the value of the American market for the products of our farms. As the mouthpiece of the Government he spoke in Toronto, when the House was dissolved, and laid down the policy of the Government on that occasion. What did he then say with reference to the United States market as a desirable outlet for our farm products. He said:

"They talk, Sir, about the natural market. They say the United States is our market. I say that in my opinion the only thing that constitutes a market is demand and supply, and the proper market for a country, the best market, is where there is the greatest demand alongside of the lowest home production to satisfy that demand. Senator Carlisle, who is often quoted by the Opposition, never said a truer thing than in his speech on the McKinley Bill, when, ridiculing the idea of natural markets being necessary, he stated that the best natural market was where the goods that a country produces are required at the maximum. Take that rule and apply it to Great Britain. We have a surplus in agricultural products. Why should we go to a market in the United States where they have a surplus of the same class of products that we have to sell? Should we go to Great Britain, where millions of mouths are crying for food and only a small percentage of the necessary supply is produced at home, where we are not met by hostile tariffs or by vacillating tariff legislation, as we have had in the United States, when once we have set the current of trade in a certain direction to run up against it and throw all things away, a country that is willing to pay and is able to pay, a country that must continue to import for all time? The natural market is not a country that produces a surplus, as does the United States, but Great Britain, which does not produce a surplus, and in which there is a sustained demand."

Now, that is the view the Minister of Finance entertains with reference to the value of the United States market to the farmers of this country. He asks the question: Why should they go to a market in the United States where they have a surplus of the same class of products that we have to sell? Let me ask now: Why did he go to Washington and beg and beseech for an interview if, peradventure, they might in any way get this market of the United States that is of no use to us? The hon. gentleman was not the only one that spoke, for we find that the Minister of Agriculture was at that same meeting announcing the Government policy, and what did he say with reference to the American market? The Minister of Agriculture said:

"It has been stated that the United States is our natural market. I contend that it is not our natural market. I contend that they are our competitors in everything we produce. Everything they produce we produce, and they are our natural opponents with the exception of, perhaps, bananas, oranges and peanuts."

Here the Minister of Agriculture, a member of the Government, declares that the United States market, instead of being a benefit to the people of this country and to be desired by them, is rather the reverse, except, perhaps, in respect to bananas, oranges and peanuts, in which articles, he admits, they would not be competitors. There you have the Finance Minister and the Minister of Agriculture stating that the markets of the United States, even for our natural products, are valueless to us; you have them going to Washington and begging for an interview, after all they said against the Washington Government, going there after all the insulting things they said with reference to the American people, and begging and seeking an interview, and coming home rejoicing in announcing to this House that they had succeeded in so far that Mr. Blaine had fixed a day when they might go back and renew negotiations for a treaty in order to secure the inestimable boom for our farmers of a market for their natural products, a market proclaimed by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to be valueless. Why should they go to the United States for a market? That is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, of these gentlemen who, three or four days after dissolution, appeared upon a public platform and poured contempt upon the idea of the markets of the United States being of any value to our farmers, even if they did get them. These were the same gentlemen who put it into the mouth of the Governor General to say that so great did he consider the boon that might possibly be obtained by negotiations at Washington that they had dissolved Parliament prematurely in order to bring it about. That is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite; and, Sir, if it were not that the honour of Canada is bound up in what these hon. gentlemen do we might view their action, the ridiculous condition in which they have appeared, with a little more equanimity; but, Sir, I hold that the honour of Canada has not been maintained by the course of these gentlemen: I hold that the honour of Canada has been lowered by the action of the High Commissioner. Just let me read to this House, from the papers that have been brought down, one or two extracts from a letter that Sir Charles Tupper wrote to Sir John A. Macdonald from Washington, on 21st April, where he is detailing to him the interview that he had with Mr. Blaine. He says:

"I told Mr. Blaine that I wished, in the outset, to recognize the accuracy of the statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I have seen, in reference to the initiation of the negotiations regarding reciprocal trade arrangements between the two countries: that I believed it arose from the negotiations which had recently taken place between the United States and Newfoundland; and that, upon that being communicated to him by Sir Julian Pauncefote, he had expressed his willingness to open negotiations for reciprocal trade arrangements between Canada and the United States, assisted by delegates from the Dominion Government, the negotiations to be informal, and to a certain extent of a confidential nature, until they could assume a more formal character, if any result were arrived at."

Sir, I say that the High Commissioner of Canada who had declared—and they knew it—that the initiation of all these negotiations was at the suggestion of Mr. Blaine: he who could boldly proclaim that on the stump here ought to have been able to enter into the presence of Mr. Blaine, without being compelled to acknowledge that what he said was not true, but that what Mr. Blaine said in reference to it was true. Sir, I say that Canada is lowered in this respect, and, therefore, we feel more deeply than if any single gentleman had been concerned, however high he might be. And then, Sir, to think of a High Commissioner, a representative of the Canadian people, going to Washington and attempting to secure an informal conference, if possible, with Mr. Blaine, in order to get a reciprocity for this country which the Finance Minister said was of no value, even in the matter of natural products alone. Fancy that man in the presence of a statesman to whom he had gone to talk upon international affairs using language like this:

"I then told Mr. Blaine that I wished to remove the idea, if he entertained it, which had been promulgated in Canada and the United States, that the present Government of the Dominion was not warmly in favour of the most friendly relations with the United States. In an article which I had recently sent over my own signature to the North American Review I had undertaken to give conclusive evidence upon that point, and that I need further only refer him to the fact that when Sir John Macdonald, who was one of Her Majesty's Joint High Commissioners, submitted to Parliament for approval the Alabama Treaty, which settled also all the then pending questions between Canada and the United States, he was fiercely denounced by the leaders and press of the Liberal party for having basely sacrificed the interests of Canada in his endeavours to promote the friendly relations between Canada and the United States. I added that I had experienced the same treatment from the same party when I submitted, for the approval of Parliament, the Treaty of Washington of 1888. I was then charged by the leader and press of that party with having conceded everything to the United States and obtained nothing in return, so great was my anxiety to remove all causes of dissension between the two countries."

Fancy the position of the Canadian High Commissioner conferring with the Secretary of State of a great nation like the United States, trying to impress on his mind that he and his party were the great friends of the United States, but the Liberal party were opposed to the Republic and its interests. What had he to do with talking about parties: what had he to do with drawing discriminating lines between parties, even if the lines were true? But that gentleman crouched in the presence of Mr. Blaine instead of taking the manly stand that an hon. gentleman should take in the presence of another. Fancy that man taking that crouching position in the presence of one of the leading statesmen of that country and assuring him of the friendly feeling that he entertained towards Americans. Fancy him doing that after heaping the insults he had cast on that country and that Government, which he offered on the platform in Canada. What did he say with respect to the United States, when speaking at Amherst in March, 1891. He made one of the most insulting statements that it was possible for the citizen of one country to use with regard to the people of another country. He was speaking of the difficulties that the Conservative party had to contend with. He said they had the Liberal party to contend with, the provincial Governments, the Grand Trunk Railway, and a little later he is reported as having said, and I call attention to that—this utterance of the High Commissioner:

"He did not forget the enormous influence of the 65,000,000 of Americans. We had not only beaten our opponents here, but the 65,000,000 to the south of us."

The hon. gentleman thus cast an insult in the face of the whole American nation, stating that they had stooped as a nation to do what he accused the Liberal party of doing, to endeavour to subvert the allegiance of Canada to Great Britain, and cast in her lot with the United States. This gentleman insulted the American people, and then crouched before Mr. Blaine. The papers brought down deal with an important question, namely, that as to duties levied on articles that might be made free in the treaty between the United States and Canada, and in which there would be discrimination enforced against Britain. What do we find in the papers? That the British Government had authorized negotiations to be carried on between Newfoundland and the United States, and a draft treaty was prepared, and under it articles were to be admitted free from the United States by Newfoundland, while those articles were to remain taxed as against Canada, England and other countries. To that document the British Minister gave his consent. I want to point out to hon. gentlemen who may not have read the draft treaty that it was not only with respect to raw products that were to be admitted free but agricultural implements when imported for agricultural societies, ploughs, harrows, and some other manufactured articles. These were to be admitted free from the United States while they were to be taxed if coming from Canada or England. These discriminations were in favour of the United States, and the British Government were a party to the transaction. It will be found in the same papers that when a protest was entered by the Canadian Government against the completion of this treaty the Secretary of State for the Colonies wrote that they had induced the Island of Newfoundland to promise similar legislation in favour of Canada, and he asked Canada not to stand in the way of Newfoundland, she having carried out their wishes in this respect. Thus, the British Government have expressed their readiness in the interests of one of her colonies to admit manufactures as well as other articles to a certain extent from the United States duty free, while duties were to be maintained against Canada and against the rest of the empire. Complaint had been made that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not refer to the loss of revenue. If the hon. gentleman who made the complaint had read the speech of my hon. friend he would have found that he dealt with the question, and dealt with it in a satisfactory manner. Certainly my hon. friend did not shirk it. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) also noted that if we had reciprocity with the United States the Americans would take possession of our markets and ruin our manufactures. How does the hon. gentleman arrive at the conclusion that under free trade between the two countries, with the barriers of each country let down, and the manufacturers in Canada having the same opportunity to buy raw material at the same prices, to employ the same labour, and having a market of 65,000,000 equally with the American manufacturers, American manufacturers would wipe out Canadian manufacturers? Is it not pouring contempt on our people to adopt that line of argument? If we maintain that contention we must admit that the workingmen of Canada are inferior in skill to the artizans of the United States, or that employers there look after their business more efficiently. One or other proposition must be maintained, and to hold either one is to throw discredit on this country. For my part, I submit that reciprocity on this basis has not been tried, and we can only argue from data, and cannot tell the result from actual experience. What data have we to proceed upon? Unfortunately, there are tens of thousands of our fellow Canadians in the United States. In that country, which was to them a new and foreign country, what is their position? Are they in an inferior position? No, Sir. The hon. gentleman knows it, and as Canadians our cheeks should glow with honest pride as we recognize and bear testimony to it. Canadian artizans, Canadian-born, Canadian-educated, have gone to the United States by the thousands and tens of thousands, and these artizans in the busy hives of American industry are holding their own, man for man, with those who have been trained in that country. I ask, Sir, if these artizans go into that which is to them practically a foreign country, and under that disadvantage hold their own with a native-born artizan or an artizan from any other country, why should not these Canadian artizans hold their own in the Dominion of Canada when the products of their labour find a free and open market in the United States—as free as the market for the products which he is manufacturing in the United States at the present time. Do they tell me it is because our manufacturers have not the enterprise, the business capacity and the brain to compete with the men on the other side? Look at what has been done by Canadians in the United States; look at their boards of railway directors; go into their exchanges, go into the business marts of commerce, and there you will find Canadians holding their own with any native-born Americans or with the people from any other country. Why, then, does the hon. gentleman lay it down as a matter settled by himself that if you have reciprocity with the United States in manufactured articles all your Canadian manufactures will be destroyed? The contention will not bear investigation, and therefore it is urged, as my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has urged it in his resolution, that in the securing of this reciprocity you should give instructions to your representatives who go to Washington in October next to treat with the Government of the United States on a broad, expansive, liberal platform, not confined to reciprocity in natural products, which will not be entertained and which hon. gentlemen opposite know will not be entertained, but that you should include manufactures as well. Giving to them that mandate, I ask the hon. gentleman what he fears, and why he does not believe, if it be good for the farmers of this country that they should be brought into free and open competition with the farmers of the United States, it should not also be good that the manufacturers of this country should be brought into free and open competition with their manufacturers to receive the benefit of their market, and giving them in reciprocity the benefit of our market, and letting those who best can prosper under the circumstances. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) refers to letters which he said were written by Mr. Laurier with reference to the finances of the Province of Quebec. He did not know whether these letters were written or not, but if it was true they were written he said that it meant there would be some $2,000,000 added to the burdens of the people of this country in giving additional aid to the various provinces of this Dominion. I do not know whether or not the letters were written either, but I ask the hon. gentleman this: He stands appalled at the very thought of it, but suppose the Dominion Government gave this money, they would be giving it for the benefit of the whole people of these provinces. But the hon. gentleman cannot view this present tariff legislation in the light it ought to be viewed in, namely, that instead of $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 of taxation being scattered over all the provinces for the benefit of all the people in all the provinces a far larger sum is by this tariff legislation placed in the pockets of four or five wealthy monopolists in this country. My friend is perfectly satisfied with that, but, oh! how his righteous soul was indignant as he thought about $2,000,000 additional burden being added to the people of this country, which, even according to his own declaration, would be taken out of the pockets of the people of the country, not to benefit the sugar refiners, but to benefit the whole people. The hon. gentleman could contemplate a tariff sustained and maintained for the purpose of giving to some favoured individuals in this country vast sums of money, and not feel in the least degree shocked about it; but he cannot understand taxation to benefit the people at large. The hon. gentleman closed his speech with his loyalty. I need not allude much to that. He has denounced my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but that hon. gentleman did not seem to feel very uneasy about it. I did not feel uneasy myself. If I know myself I believe I am loyal; I never felt it necessary to shout it from the house tops. I took it for granted that every one would believe it, and I am confident that the political party with which I am associated are as loyal as any other people in this country. But, Sir, I think it is unworthy of any man aspiring to be a representative of the people and a statesman to endeavour to draw away public attention from a great question which concerns the welfare of these people, and to try to influence their minds and excite their prejudices against a fair consideration of it, by shouting that disloyalty is contained in it. The Liberal party believe that if we could have more extended and freer trade relations with the great nation to the south of us it would benefit the people of the Dominion of Canada, and believing that, they believe in an honest attempt being made to secure it, and they are willing and anxious to secure it—not for their own glory or renown, not for the sake of attaining the Treasury benches; but they are anxious it shall be obtained and they will be willing and rejoiced if the gentlemen on the Government benches at the present time will accomplish it. In order that these hon. gentlemen opposite may obtain that great boon, we, on this side of the House, have submitted a proposition which will authorize these gentlemen when they go to Washington to confer and negotiate on a broad basis, which may be accepted by the United States, instead of being confined as they have confined themselves by their utterances to a basis which the United States have told them in advance they cannot accept. By the adoption of the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), this Parliament will give to those representatives a mandate to go to the United States to negotiate for trade relations on a basis they may hope to succeed upon, and it will relieve them from being tied up, as they have tied themselves by previous utterances, to restrict themselves to a limited reciprocity in natural products, which they know they will fail in obtaining. The resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford should commend itself to these hon. gentlemen opposite. The very fact of their going to Washington, the very fact of their attempting negotiations at all, proves, notwithstanding their utterances, that they believe Canada requires extended trade in order that she may prosper; and, Sir, these gentlemen must know, despite their talk, that the English market will be open to us after we have obtained this reciprocity as well as now. The Government must recognize, as the agriculturists and the other classes of the country recognize, the value of freer trade relations with the United States. The futile mission of the Minister of Finance to the islands of the sea in order to attempt to develop a foreign trade shows that he recognizes that Canada is in a position where she must have a broader and wider market, and these gentlemen must know, notwithstanding what they say, that the markets of the United States secured on fair and equitable and honourable terms, would be a boon to the people of this country. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture may say: What is the United States market to us? But I tell them what any business man knows, that trade knows no favour. A man does not deal with another man, nor a country with another country, simply because of friendship. Trade knows no friendship in that respect, and if the hon. Minister of Finance looks at his own Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that from year to year and down to the present time nearly one-half of the entire trade of this country is done with the nation to the south of us. Sir, it is useless to say that freer trade with a nation with whom we now do about one-half of our whole trade would not be beneficial to this people. Here are two nations side by side engaged in what? The Canadian Parliament engaged in building up an artificial barrier against the United States higher and higher and higher, and the United States Congress on their part building up a tariff wall against Canada higher and higher and still higher, while at the same time millions of money are being expended by both countries for the construction of tunnels and bridges to overcome the barriers which nature has placed between us. We say that if you can by a fair and honourable treaty between this country and the United States remove these artificial barriers which both countries have erected, and allow trade to flow more freely between the two countries, vast and profitable as our trade is now under the adverse circumstances that exist, how much the greater will be the prosperity of the Canadian people when from the channels of trade will be removed the artificial obstructions which the two Governments have created. Sir, it is with the view of benefiting the people of this country that the Opposition have proposed the policy embodied in the resolution submitted to the House, and in accepting that resolution this Parliament will give an opportunity to the Ministry to go to Washington in October to offer to negotiate a treaty on a basis which will secure for them a hearing, while we fear, from an utterance made by one of the public men of the United States, that if they persist in going with their hands tied, as they have been in the past, to a demand for such a treaty as American statesmen have said they will never assent to, their efforts will end in failure, and the people of Canada will not give them credit for a desire to secure reciprocity even in natural products. I regret, Sir, that I have detained the House so long. I must, however, put half the blame on the shoulders of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, to whom I thought I would not be showing sufficient courtesy if I did not deal with the points he brought up. I noted them all down, and have endeavoured to answer them one by one, conscious that a better answer could have been made by others. While I may not have convinced him, I trust that by examining each other's views from our different points of view, we may both find our minds enlarged, and may endeavour to promote legislation in this House which shall be for the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. MONTAGUE. After the very eloquent speech of the hon. gentleman, which has been of necessity somewhat lengthy, though not too lengthy, I am sure it would be improper on my part to ask the House to listen to anything I have to say at this late hour; and, with your permission, I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What business does the hon. Finance Minister propose to take up on Tuesday when we meet?

Mr. FOSTER. Mainly the Supplementary Estimates for the current year.

Motion agreed to: and House adjourned at 12.30 a. m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 30th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—RECEPTION OF REPORTS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That as the time for the reception of reports from Committees on Private Bills expires this day, the same be extended till Tuesday, 14th July next, according to the recommendation contained in the seventh report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 120) respecting the Salisbury Harbour Railway Company.—(Mr. Skinner.)

Bill (No. 121) to amend the Act to incorporate the Montreal Bridge Company.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 122) further to amend the Fisheries Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to prohibit the use of purse seines in the territorial waters of Canada. The fishermen on our coasts are considerably alarmed at the use of these dangerous fishing engines, which have done such irreparable ruin to the fisheries of the New England States, where legislation has been attempted on the subject, but, I think, not in time. I hesitated before introducing this measure. Last session I mentioned to Parliament the hope I had that, by representation to the Government of the United States, we might obtain a much more satisfactory prohibition, one which would cover more than the territorial waters, and until that is done a good deal of the injury complained of will go unprevented. But, at any rate, the fishermen are most anxious that we shall prevent the introduction of these purse seines as much as possible. I also add a section which is connected particularly with the enforcement of this prohibition, but is applicable generally to the provisions of the Fishery Act. Those members who are interested in fishing districts are no doubt too well aware that it is very difficult to induce fishery officers to take on all occasions that lively interest in the enforcement of the laws which Parliament has imposed upon them. There are many considerations to account for that. An active fishery man is not likely to be a very popular man in his district, and the duties are often performed in a very perfunctory manner, and not in such a way as to thoroughly protect the fisheries; so I propose to amend the general Act by enabling the fishery officer to receive a moiety of the penalty obtained on conviction. At present the Act prohibits a fishery officer from receiving any part of the penalty, and, if we want to obtain vigilance, we will have to give some inducement to active fishery officers, and incidentally to other persons.

Mr. LISTER. You allow a moiety now to any one other than the fishery officer?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes: but the fishery officer is prevented from receiving it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—DIVISION ON JUNE 22ND.

Mr. FLINT. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to supply an omission that has occurred in the Official Debates. After the division which took place upon the 22nd instant, regarding the policy of the Government, the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) called attention to the fact that I had not voted. I rose and stated that I had been paired with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), and that if I had voted I would have voted for the motion to adjourn. It appears that my remark escaped the notice of the reporter, and was not recorded, and I wish now to make this statement.

SUPPLY—INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on a matter somewhat personal to myself, and upon a matter that engaged, to some extent, public attention the last time I had the honour of a seat in Parliament. It will be recollected by those who were in that Parliament that in the session of 1886 I assailed the then Government, practically the present Government, with mismanagement, misconduct and corruption in the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West Territories. I preferred, on that occasion, about sixty charges against the Government. I based all those charges upon the blue-books submitted by the Government to Parliament and to the people of Canada, and on the reports made to the department, some of which were published in the reports of the department, and some of which were not so published. I preferred those charges openly, in my place in Parliament in the presence of the representatives of the people, in the presence of eight or ten Ministers of the Crown. I did so on the 15th day of April, 1886, and Parliament prorogued on the 2nd of June of that year, nearly six weeks after I levelled my charges against the administration of Indian affairs, and during all that period no member of the Government said a word in justification or vindication of the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West Territories. Hon. gentlemen were silent, hon. gentlemen were dumb, they opened not their mouths. Six months afterwards, and just on the eve of a general election, a pamphlet was issued. I suppose by the Department of the Interior, or by the Department of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, challenging the correctness of the statements I made, charging me with having garbled the reports, misread the reports, forged the reports. This pamphlet was printed at the Hamilton Spectator office, at confidential rates, and scattered broadcast all over the wide Dominion at the public expense. On the eve of the election, three Ministers of the Crown travelled all over western Ontario and visited my constituency, as they had a perfect right to do. I am within the mark when I say that at least one-half the time occupied in the delivery of each speech by those hon. gentlemen, was taken up with assaults upon myself individually, charging me with misconduct, misrepresentation, using forged extracts of the reports, and with all the sins that politicians are known and not known to commit. I sought an opportunity on the platform of defending myself. In my own town where these hon. gentlemen addressed a large audience, I made an application to one of the leading Conservatives in the town for leave to speak one hour in reply, and I was refused. I then made application to have half an hour, and I was again refused. I have had no opportunity of meeting these hon. gentlemen face to face until to-day. When I could not meet them upon the platform I issued a challenge to the then First Minister of the Government, which was published in the daily papers in Toronto, and a copy of which, in the following words, was mailed, by registered letter, to the right hon. gentleman:

"To the Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD,

"Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

"SIR,—On the 19th of this month you visited the west riding of the County of Huron on a political mission—as you had a perfect right to do. On the same day you and two of your colleagues held meetings at Dungannon and Goderich, to discuss political questions—as you had a perfect right to do. At both those meetings you assailed me in no measured terms, respecting the charges made against your management of Indian affairs. On the floor of Parliament, and in the presence of the representatives of the people, I arraigned you and your Government for gross mismanagement, for cruel and callous neglect, in your administration of Indian affairs. That indictment was preferred against you on the 15th of April, 1886. Parliament did not prorogue until the 2nd of June. You had thus ample opportunity to answer me before the Commons of Canada. You did not attempt the hopeless task. Six months after I arraigned you, you caused some of your underlings to prepare and issue a pamphlet, which purports to be a reply to the charges I made against you in Parliament. This pamphlet you caused to be printed, not by the Queen's Printer, Ottawa, but at the Hamilton Spectator office, at 'confidential rates,' and to be scattered by the thousands all over Canada, at the public expense. Then you visited my constituency and availed yourself of the opportunity, behind my back, to denounce me, to charge me with having garbled the public reports and having preferred false charges against you. But you took good care not to invite me to your meeting, not to give me a chance, in my own constituency, of meeting you face to face and answering your slanders then and there. I now challenge you to meet me, either at Dungannon or Goderich, at any time you may name within one month, to discuss your Indian policy, when I shall prove to the satisfaction of all reasonable men that the charges I made against you and your Government are, in nearly every case, absolutely, in all, substantially correct: that the pamphlets issued anonymously, under your supervision, and which you have not the courage to father, in answer to my indictment and in justification of your conduct of Indian affairs, garbles the official reports, misquotes the official records, misrepresents the official blue-books, emasculates the official returns, and is, in other respects, knowingly, wilfully, and audaciously false.

"I have the honour, &c.,

"M. C. CAMERON.

"GODERICH, 26th November, 1886."

Sir, as I have said, the first opportunity I have had of defending myself is here to-day, and I am glad that it is upon the floor of this Parliament, where I made the charges, I propose now substantiating them to the extent of my humble ability. On the platform, behind my back, and when I had no opportunity of answering, I found those hon. gentlemen were bold and defiant: I found that they had made use of language in respect to me which was not justified under any possible circumstances, and I shall venture to submit quotations taken from the Government organs, of what those hon. gentlemen said of me, and then I shall challenge the hon. gentlemen to make good the charges they so levelled against me. At Peterborough, on the 3rd December, 1886, that elegant, refined and polished French Chevalier, the hon. the Secretary of State said of me: "His political associates are freethinkers—secessionists, annexationists, rebels, felons, traitors;" and that I myself was a "scandal-monger and a skunk." At Hamilton, on 22nd November, 1886, another member of the Government said of me, that I garbled the official reports, I misread the official records, I misquoted the official reports of the Indian Departments. At Orillia, on 2nd December, 1886, the same hon. gentleman said of me, that I was the father of lies. Then the dignified and refined and polished and unctuous Minister of Justice, not to be outdone by the Secretary of State, spoke of me in language that even the Secretary of State hardly ventured to make use of, and which I think anyone listening to the hon. gentleman in the Parliament of Canada will be surprised to find he did use even respecting a political adversary. At Guelph, on 7th November, 1886, that dignified and polished and unctuous gentleman said of me:

"He strung out lie after lie, false quotation after false quotation, garbled extract after garbled extract, manufactured statement after manufactured statement, and out of sixty charges, fifty-nine were deliberate falsehoods."

And again, not satisfied with the polished, and refined, and elegant language the hon. gentleman made use of on that occasion, at Welland, on 16th November, the same hon. gentleman said of me:

"It was subsequently found that these charges were based upon deliberate forgeries and falsehoods. It was subsequently developed that the documents on which these charges were based were the most impertinent forgeries ever put before the public."

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the eloquent, choice, refined and polished language made use of by the Minister of Justice and by his colleagues, such was the language made use of by three Ministers of the Crown, two of them belted knights and one an Imperial privy councillor, and three of them, Canadian privy councillors, speaking behind an adversary's back of what a political adversary said in Parliament. Outside of Parliament, I would say these statements were false and unfounded: inside of Parliament, I will content myself by proving it. I was charged by these hon. gentlemen with uttering deliberate falsehoods; I was charged with making false quotations, I was charged with using garbled extracts; I was charged with having made sixty charges, fifty-nine of which were deliberate falsehoods and forgeries. If the statements made by these hon. gentlemen are true, I have no business to sit in Parliament; if they are not true, their duty is on the floor of Parliament to offer the humblest apology the English language will enable them to offer for having made use of language so unjustifiable under the circumstances. I propose to prove that the charges I made against the Administration were all true, with the exception of one, and that was substantially true. I will prove it, to the satisfaction of this House, many of whose members were in the old Parliament when I levelled that indictment of sixty charges against the Government. Fifty-nine of those charges, if their own reports are true, if the reports issued by the Department of the Interior and by their agents are true, are literally and absolutely true, if their blue-book which I hold in my hand is true. I will not deal with the whole sixty charges to-day: it is impossible. I will not venture to so weary the House or myself. I will take the first ten of those charges as published chronologically, in the order in which I treated them in my speech, and in which they were treated in the pamphlet issued in reply to my speech. I will then as occasion offers, because as far as I am able to do so I intend to put myself right before this country and before the members of this Parliament, I will fire at the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite the answers to those vile charges in batches of ten or fifteen at a time, and when I have got through, even the Minister of Justice will be satisfied that, to say the very least, he used indiscreet, unwise, unjustifiable language, and I have no doubt he will do more than that, he will express his extreme regret for having so done. I will show further that this pamphlet, issued I dare say under the supervision of the Minister of the Interior, who was then Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, is false from nearly the first page to the end. I will show that, to make a case against me, the pamphlet garbles the reports of the Department of the Interior, that it misquotes the reports, and the reports submitted to Parliament, and I will show that, in order to make a case against me, this pamphlet contains wilful and deliberate forgeries in answer to the charges I made against the Government. I will show that if these blue-books are true, if the returns are true, not only the returns which the hon. gentleman published in the blue-books but returns which the hon. gentleman had not the hardihood to publish in his own blue-books, they sustain every charge I made. Now, as to the first charge challenged, I did not give the language as a quotation from any report but as the substance of Agent McKay's report, and in doing so I made use of the following language:—

"A. McKay, an Indian agent at Grand Rapids, in his report states that the Inspector of Indian Agencies promised to supply them with all they might require, and that they were urged by that gentleman to make their demands on the department for the same, which they did, but they were not complied with. Mr. McColl, Inspector of Indian Agencies in the North-West, writing of the Swan Lake Bands, said that waggons were promised them and that he is apprehensive of serious consequences unless their claims are recognized."

What answer did this pamphlet and the Government make to that charge? The answer which the present Minister of the Interior, who at that time occupied, I believe, the position of Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories and Superintendent of Indian Affairs, ventured to make, not to a quotation from the report, but to the substance of the report which I ventured to submit to Parliament, is as follows:—

"In fact no such reports were ever made. A careful search through all Mr. McKay's reports fails to reveal any such statements as that attributed to the agent by Mr. Cameron."

Here is a direct issue: either the Government was mistaken and the pamphlet was mistaken in so answering my charges, or I was mistaken. Let us see where the responsibility lies. Will the Minister take the trouble to look at page 44 of the report of 1882? Did he ever read the reports of his department? Did he know what they contained? Did he venture to read the reports submitted by his own department before he made those charges against me; and before the Minister of Justice ventured upon the public platform to say that fifty-nine out of the sixty charges laid against the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West Territories were based upon deliberate falsehood and forgery, the Minister of Justice should have read the reports. I venture to say that the Minister of Justice never read one of them: he took the statements on trust, and he ventured to make those statements behind my back without verifying the correctness of the quotations I made in Parliament from the reports of the Indian Department. If the Minister of Justice will take the trouble to read the report, and if the hon. gentleman has not a copy of the report, I will lend him mine and point out the very paragraph. The substance of what I said can be found in the report sent in by Mr. McKay to the Indian Department. At page 44 of the Indian Report for 1882, the hon. gentleman will find the following words:—

"They stated that the Inspector of Indian Agencies promised to supply them with all they might require, and that they were urged by the gentleman to make their demands on the department for the same."

Then, if the hon. gentleman will turn to page 153 he will find what Mr. McColl said with respect to the waggons. He says:

"He is apprehensive of serious consequences unless their claims to their former possessions are immediately recognized by the Government, and the compensation of lands promised in lieu of waggons is granted them. * * * I consider that as the gardens are on a school section, and therefore not interfering with the claims of any settler, it would be advisable to adopt a conciliatory policy towards them by acceding to their request as far as granting the school section referred to, or a portion of it, to them in addition to the Swan Lake Reserve, to satisfy the promises made with regard to the waggons."

Now, I charged that these Indians were dissatisfied because you did not implement your own engagements with respects to the waggons. You said that the author of that speech was guilty of deliberate falsehood and forgery, but I have now read out of your own reports the identical words I made use of, although I did not pretend to give them in that statement as a quotation. Who is right and who is wrong? Is the Minister of Justice right who made these charges on the public platform, or is the individual right who is now addressing the House and who addressed it in 1886 upon the same subject? With respect to those charges I quote further the letter of Poundmaker to the present Minister of the Interior, in which he says:

"It is Poundmaker who takes the liberty of sending you a few lines. We entreat your Honour to send him the grist mill with horse power you kindly presented him at Cypress. We expected it last summer, but in vain. Let me have the twenty-two oxen you promised my band."

The answer which the Government made to that charge is as follows :—

"Mr. Cameron, with the idea of fairness which pervades his speech, suppresses that part of Poundmaker's letter in which he goes on to say: 'There are here sixteen or seventeen oxen.' The band having received four times as many cattle as their treaty calls for, it was for the Government, not for Poundmaker, to determine whether more should or should not be sent."

Now, Sir, what will you think of Ministers of the Crown charging me with having garbled the reports, if I can prove to you out of their own blue-books that in order to make up this answer to my charge they deliberately and wilfully forged part of the letter which Poundmaker wrote to the Commissioner ; that they left out a portion of it, cut it off in the middle of a sentence, and omitted a material part of it altogether in order to make out a charge against me. From the report for 1882, at page 196, I will show you Poundmaker's letter and what he says with respect to that :

"Let me have the twenty-two oxen you promised my band. There are here sixteen or seventeen oxen."

The Minister, if he was the author of the pamphlet, stopped here and said that was an answer to the charge, but Poundmaker did not stop here, he went on to say the following, which it was found convenient to omit in order to answer my charge :—

"There are here sixteen or seventeen oxen, but we cannot use them as we like. Our farmer is the master of them all. If these cattle were delivered into our hands I hope we would show a good deal more work."

The other parts of the letter I may have occasion to read later, but I submit to you that I have shown that the Ministers were wrong, and I have shown that from their own reports and from the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs for 1882 at pages 194 and 196. I give the pages because I do not believe the Minister ever reads them. I want him to read them now. I then went on and made this charge :

"G. McPherson, Indian agent, says: 'The clothing for the chiefs and councillors was good, except the trousers and shirts, which were inferior and worn out in three or four days.'"

I made some comments on that charge ; I declared it was a scandalous thing that the Parliament of Canada and the tax-payers of Canada should be asked to give enormous sums every year to feed and clothe the Indians, and to give the Indian chiefs some advantages, while at the same time the Government should buy these articles at the highest market price and that they were of such inferior quality that they were worn out in three or four days. The charge was a grave one and deserved the consideration of the Government. If it were untrue I ought to be stigmatized as a man who ought not to be heard to make charges against the Administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Wait a moment, gentlemen. If the answer of the Government is untrue and false, will you say "hear, hear" to the Government that you are supporting day after day, if I can prove, out of their own blue-books, that the very words I made use of in my charges against the Government, in this House, are literally the words made use of by George McPherson, the agent of the Government in the North-West Territories, and embraced in this volume of their own reports ? Surely, in such a case, the responsibility does not rest on my shoulders, but upon the shoulders of the Ministers you are supporting. You will find at page 44 of the report of 1882, the report of George McPherson, in which George McPherson makes use of the following language. Before quoting that report, let me mention to the House the answer made to my charge which I last quoted. They say :

"Again, Mr. Cameron has been guilty of garbling. Mr. McPherson does not say anything of the sort; what he does say is that 'an Indian had informed him' to that effect."

If that were true my charge would not have the same weight, but, even so, I do not think it a charge which should not be answered. However it would not have the same weight as if the charges I made were literally, and in the very words I made use of, supported by the reports of the Indian Department. It so turns out that Mr. G. McPherson, the Indian agent, did say so in the very words which I used. Mr. McPherson did not say "that an Indian had informed him to that effect," but he made use of the very words I made use of. At page 41 of the report for 1882, the Minister of the Interior, who never read the reports, will find the following :—

"The clothing for the chief and councillors was good except the trousers and shirts, which were inferior and worn out in three or four days."

Now, if the hon. gentleman will find in this report which I have just read a single word about an Indian having informed Mr. McPherson of that fact, I will withdraw that charge and say that I have not read the reports right, and that I was mistaken. But if he can find no such words at page 41 of the report for 1882, from which I have just read them, the hon. gentleman owes to the country and to the House an apology for so stating. The statement which I have referred to is the very last statement in the report ; there can be no mistake about it, and the author of this pamphlet must wilfully, and with his eyes open, have published what he must have known to be untrue. I said further :

"W. Herchmer, Indian agent, speaking of the Salteaux Band, under South Quill, says: 'Having failed in their neighbourhood, the band have been obliged to sell most of their horses to buy supplies, and are miserably poor.'"

I said that the agent had so reported, and the answer which the Government made to that charge is as follows :—

"Well, most of the Indians are miserably poor. If they were not, they would not need Government assistance. All the Government can do is to keep them from actual suffering. The Government must bring pressure to bear upon the Indians to induce them to help themselves. If they refuse to work and refuse to settle down on their reserves, they must take the consequences."

Now the charge that I made there is admitted to be true by the Government, and what I stated then, and what I state now is : that the enormous sums which we vote annually to feed and clothe the Indians should be sufficient to keep the Indians from this miserable condition, if that money were properly disposed of. Later on in the session when we reach the Estimates, I will be able to show as I have done on former occasions, how a large portion of the sum voted by Parliament to feed and clothe the Indians is expended. It was reported that, notwithstanding these enormous subventions, these Indians had not blankets to cover their nakedness, and that for want of clothing and food they were freezing to death and starving to death : and yet, my statements to the House are characterized as untrue, when what I said was extracted from the blue-books of the department. Will the Minister of the Interior take the trouble to bring his great mind down to the level of reading his own reports. At page 43 of his report for 1882, he will find the following language made use of by Agent McKay :—

"While I was making the payments this year I was informed by the Indians that they experienced great hardships for want of food during the last winter and spring."

Further in the same report it is stated :

"This was greatly caused by the want of proper medicines and necessary food. They represented that there was great suffering for want of supplies for the destitute of the land."

In the report for 1883, at page 78, Agent Anderson made use of the following language :—

"The majority of deaths during the year have been from consumption, which appears to prevail amongst them. This is owing in a great extent to their want of clothing, which is really lamentable, many of the children going naked, and some adults being barefooted in dead of winter."

Agent McKay in his report for 1885, at page 97, says:

"No supplies of any kind, nor means to procure any for the destitute, sick and aged Indians, have been provided for this treaty since 1880."

Inspector Wadsworth, one of the inspectors of the Indian agencies in the North-West Territories, at page 95 of his report for 1884, states :

"The band number eighty, and bitterly complained of starvation, attributing the sixteen deaths which occurred last year to this cause."

I then pointed out that the gross mismanagement and neglect that characterized the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West were so great that with over a million voted every year for Indians, they were allowed to freeze and starve to death, and to contract such diseases that thirteen in one band died. I further said that Indian Agent McKay stated that with regard to the Indians of the Che-ma-wha-win reserve :

"The harrows and ploughs were lying partly buried in mud and weeds in different places. Some of them have never been used or put together yet, and are spoiling for want of care."

The Government, in reply to my charge, makes use of the following language :—

"The agent does not say that 'the supplies were dumped off in the mud and filth and left there to rot.' That is Mr. Cameron's invention."

Now, I quoted from the Government's own report, and their reply is that the charge is Mr. Cameron's own invention. Let us see whether it is Mr. Cameron's own invention, or the invention of the Minister of the Interior, or an employé of the Minister of the Interior. The hon. gentleman will find at page 46 of the report for 1882 the following language :—

"I arrived here on the night of Saturday, the 12th August, and made the payments on Monday, the 14th. No improvements have been made at this place during the past year. It is a poor reserve for planting purposes, and the Indians take very little interest in doing anything in that line. In going over the reserve on the 11th September, I noticed that no attempt was made to care for the implements which had been supplied to them. The harrows and ploughs were lying partly buried in mud and weeds in different places. Some of them have never been used or put together yet, and are spoiling for want of care."

The charge I made against the Government in that connection was this: I said : Here you have an army of officials in the North-West Territories, who extract from the funds which we vote for the Indians about one-fifth in salaries, travelling expenses, &c. ; and yet you dump off at the wigwams or reserves of these ignorant, illiterate pagans, valuable agricultural implements, which the taxpayers of Canada are paying for, and you leave them there in the mud and filth and dirt to rot year in and year out ; and I am answered by the Department of the Interior with the assertion that that is one of Mr. Cameron's inventions. Now, Sir, my charges against the administration of Indian affairs are based largely upon such acts of gross misconduct. I stated further in that speech that Superintendent Walsh, in his report for 1880, at pages 26 and 27 made use of the following language :

"In some cases persons became so reduced as to render them unable to assist themselves, and I was forced to make small issues of food to save their lives. Following this want of food, and the eating of diseased horses, an epidemic appeared which marked its results by the many graves now to be seen in Wood Mountain."

I pointed out, Sir, what a terrible picture was here drawn by the Government's own agents. I pointed out that the callous misconduct and neglect of the Department of Indian Affairs could be traced by the graves of the Indians on the side of Wood Mountain ; and in answer I am told that those things are Mr. Cameron's invention. Mr. Cameron made sixty of these charges, and fifty-nine of them, the Minister says, are based on deliberate falsehood. I have proved out of the Government's own books that every charge I made is literally true. If I were disposed to pursue the enquiry further, I could quote what Major Walsh and other agents of the department said on this subject. If my memory serves me rightly, the report of the medical man was one of those that spoke so clearly and loudly of the misconduct and maladministration of the department that hon. gentlemen opposite had not the hardihood to make it part of their annual report, and suppressed it until, in the session of 1886, it was resurrected and submitted to Parliament. Dr. Edwards in that report, after specifying several types of diseases from which the Indians were suffering, added :

"And starvation, if the last can be recorded as a disease. I find that in the last three months thirteen deaths have taken place on each reserve, in all twenty-six, a very heavy death-rate ; and from all I can gather, death has been accelerated, if not immediately caused, by the scant supply of food sent out to these Indians."

Again he says :

"I saw several children in the Assiniboine camp worn and wasted, and, unless properly fed, must die in a few days."

Also :

"It may not come within my province to report this condition of starvation, but I am well satisfied that if they were sufficiently fed there would be less tendency to illness among them."

Also :

"I may also add that, from the way they have been allowed to starve, a firm determination was expressed by both Piapot and Jack that as soon as they could travel they would forsake the reserve and go west again."

Let me now point out another matter that did not come under my cognizance then. It was in one of the reports suppressed, and which was only submitted to Parliament after I had levelled my charges against the Administration. On the 23rd of September, 1882, A. G. Irvine, Commissioner, wrote to the present Minister of the Interior the following letter :—

"North-West Mounted Police.
"Headquarters, Fort Walsh, 23rd Sept., 1882.

"Sir,—I have the honour to enclose herewith copy of a telegram sent this day to the department. The messages from the Indians, as regards their annuity and reservation, I promised to send to you and the department. A reply thereto the Indians now await. I have also to inform you that on my return from Qu'Appelle, I found some 2,000 Indians here. They are all in a starving and wretched condition for the want of clothing.

"The Indians say this is their country, and they intend to remain here. They ask that they receive aid by the issue of provisions. Will you be good enough to impart to me in the form of instructions what your wishes are? In the present starving condition of the Indians, I fear if no food is given them that they may hereafter commit depredations which will bring them into collision with the force. Of course, in case of any depredations the offenders must and will be arrested and punished. It is always possible that such punishment might be accompanied with bloodshed.

"The actual power of the Indians nowhere, in view of future hostility, is certainly not great. But, as it is superfluous to point out to you, an outbreak of any kind would be disastrous and create universal alarm throughout the country.

"As you will observe from my telegram, the supplies of your department will not last more than three weeks; even for that time the issues will have to be made sparingly.

"I trust you will be good enough to reply to this by return of mail.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) "A. G. IRVINE,
"Commissioner.

"To Hon. E. Dewdney, Commissioner, Battleford."

Now, one would think a letter like that from an official in the North-West Territories would receive prompt attention. Nothing of the kind. The Indian Commissioner paid no attention to it. There were two thousand starving Indians almost at his door, and he paid no attention to them. Then, on the 2nd of October, Mr. Frank Norman, of the North-West Mounted Police, communicated with the Indian Commissioner at Winnipeg in the following words :—

"Fort Walsh, N. W. T., 2nd October, 1882.

"Sir,—I have the honour to enclose herewith a statement showing the amount of provisions issued to Indians at this post, and also the amount of provisions in store here on the 30th September just past.

"These issues have not been made on my own responsibility, but by orders I have received from the officer commanding the post and of Lieutenant Colonel A. G. Irvine, Commissioner of the Police.

"No regular issue of rations has been made, the amount of provision issued being barely sufficient to sustain life. There are at present three hundred lodges of Cree Indians camped here: these lodges average about eight souls, making a total of 2,400 souls. They are in an utter state of destitution, and are merely existing in a semi-state of starvation.

"You will perceive that were a regular issue to be made those Indians, that the supply on hand of flour would last about to the end of present month, and that of meat, about twenty days.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) "FRANK NORMAN,
"Inspector N.W.M.P.
"Acting Agent pro. tem.

"To the Indian Commissioner,
"Winnipeg, Manitoba."

Now, Sir, there is a letter on the 2nd of October, and you would think that the second communication from the officials in the North-West Territories in charge of the Indians would be promptly answered. But it was not, and so, on the 19th of October, Mr. Fred. White telegraphed the present Minister of the Interior as follows :—

"Walsh, N.W.T., October 19, 1882.

"To Honourable E. Dewdney.

"Over two thousand Indians here almost naked and on verge of starvation; have been among them for two days; am satisfied many will perish unless early assistance rendered. Please instruct Agent McDonald to come here at once to make payment. I will arrange to have money here in readiness.

(Sd.) "FRED. WHITE."

Now, one would think that would arouse the Department of Indian Affairs from its slumber, but no attention was paid to it. These communications were not even reported to the head office at Ottawa until about three months after they were sent to the Commissioner. These Indians in September were dying of starvation; in October they were dying of starvation; and in the end of October they were still dying of starvation, and no assistance was given by the Government, and no step was taken by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to draw the attention of the head of the department to the condition of the Indians. Therefore, on the 1st of February, 1883, Mr. Frank Norman communicated again with the Commissioner:

"Fort Walsh, 1st February, 1883.

"Sir,—I have the honour to enclose a memorandum I am in receipt of from Surgeon Robert Miller of this place, with reference to the condition of the Indians.

"I have informed Surgeon Robert Miller that it is not in my power to increase the quantity of food to the Indians, as my instructions from the Indian Commissioner are to keep the Indians at Fort Walsh on 'starvation allowance.'

"Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) "FRANK NORMAN,
"Inspector N.W.M.P.,
"Acting Agent.

"E. T. Galt, Esq.,
"Assistant Indian Commissioner,
"Winnipeg."

The instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the present Minister of the Interior, were to keep the Indians in a state of starvation. While Parliament was voting an immense sum, while the people were being taxed to make good the enormous subventions from year to year, to feed and clothe the Indians, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs gave instructions to keep them in a state of semi-starvation, and they were so kept. Was I not more than justified in charging the Government with cruelty and neglect in their administration of Indian affairs? At last the hon. gentleman did come to their relief. On the 24th of February, he sent the following telegram to Mr. Norman, whose despatch I have already read :—

"Yours of February 1st received (not a word about the September and October letters). Increase rations supply slightly. Purchase two hundred pounds tea, fifty pounds tobacco, and distribute judiciously and where most needed.

(Sd.) "E. DEWDNEY."

2,400 Indians dying of starvation, and almost frozen to death, and the pangs of starvation are appeased by two hundred pounds of tea and fifty pounds of tobacco. Was I not more than right in making these charges of maladministration and misconduct against hon. gentlemen opposite and their officials? Yet I am answered by the statement that the extracts I quoted from the report are deliberate falsehoods and forgeries, and that, too, by the hon. Minister of Justice, who ought to have known better. I quoted further what Mr. McColl, the Indian Inspector of Agencies, said :

"I also notice in the same record that nearly all the bands within this agency have received more axes than they were entitled to under the treaty, and that only two or three bands have received their complement of hoes, spades and scythes, notwithstanding the representation made to the contrary to the department, as well as to the Indians in reference to the matter."

That charge was met by the Government in the following language:—

"The testimony does not sustain the charge. Mr. McColl does not say that any bands had received no hoes, spades, scythes, but that some of them had not received their complement—their full allowance. All necessary implements for these Indians were provided and stored with the agent, who, through an error of judgment, did not issue them in their proper proportions. So soon as the department was informed of this, immediate measures were taken to rectify the error."

It is here admitted that practically my charge is true. But I am answered that it was an error of judgment that the proper implements were not dealt out. It is just such errors of judgment that I complain of. We pay the officials of the North-West Territories very liberal salaries, and when they are guilty of neglect, we are told it is an error of judgment; that it was done in a moment of weakness; that it was an oversight or omission. But it was just such errors of judgment which forced the Indians, at an unfortunate period in the history of Canada, to do what, under other circumstances, they would not have done, namely, take up arms against the constitutional authorities of the country. You will find in the reports for 1883, at page 138, that Mr. McColl further says:

"The councillor states that in his portion of the Island band there are ten families who have only received one hoe apiece, whereas they are entitled to two hoes each by treaty, and that in order to plant their potatoes they were obliged to use old axes with handles driven through the eyes and bent double, so that they could be utilized like hoes."

And at page 139 of the same report, the inspector makes use of the following language:—

"The Indians received fifty large axes from the agent last summer, but they complain that they have not received the number of hoes to which they are entitled by treaty, and therefore they want them, as they are greatly in need of them."

I appeal to the House whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite were justified, on the public platform and behind my back, in assailing me in the manner they did. I appeal to Parliament to say whether or not the statements I made were true, and whether or not the answers made by the Government to my speech in Parliament denouncing them for their misconduct and mismanagement were justified by the facts I submitted. I also said:

"The same inspector further says: 'The potatoes and barley received last spring were half rotten.'"

Recollect that the charge I made was that the Government were supplying these men with barley, potatoes and other seed for seed purposes. The Indians complained of the quality of the seed supplied, and the Indian inspector himself said that those which were supplied were not fit for the purpose. Did the Government admit that, and say it was unfortunate, that it was an error of judgment, that it could not be helped, and it would not occur again? Nothing of the kind. The answer is that

"Seed potatoes and barley were furnished to the Loon Strait Indians, Treaty No. 5, in 1882, and were stored at Dog Head, but some of the Indians did not go for their share, and, therefore, a portion of the seed was spoiled."

If that were true, it would perhaps be a sufficient answer to my charge. If the Indians were too lazy to go to Dog Head to get their potatoes and barley, I do not think the Government would be so very blameable, but if the potatoes and barley which the Government agents handed over to the Indians were half rotten at the time, then no language could be too strong to denounce the gross negligence and carelessness of the Government in relation to that. What the Indian inspector complained of was not that the potatoes and barley were rotten when they were received at Dog Head, but he complains "that the potatoes and barley received for seed last spring were half rotten, and were it not that these were replaced by others from Fisher's River, purchased by themselves, they would not have any crop." That is the potatoes and barley delivered by the Government to the Indians. That is found at page 141 in the report of 1882. What answer had the Government to make to the charge? Was I not right, absolutely and literally right? Was not my statement substantiated by their own agent whose report I have just referred to, and, consequently, was not the statement of the Government absolutely incorrect? I said further:

"The same inspector again says: 'That the councillor complains that the quality of the hats, trousers and shoes received by him were inferior.'"

The answer to that is:

"The clothing for the chiefs and councillors is always carefully selected and inspected, and this is the only complaining councillor in Treaty Nos. 1 and 2."

In the first place, it is not true that this is the only complaining councillor. I have already referred to others, and it is also clear that if, as the inspector says, the clothing received was inferior, it could not have been carefully selected, particularly when it was under Government control, and, therefore, the highest price was paid for it. Agent McPherson, in his report for 1882, page 41, reported:

"That the clothing for the chiefs and councillors was good, except the trousers and shirts, which were inferior and were worn out in three or four days."

And the same agent reports in 1883, page 133:

"The clothing they received was of excellent quality, excepting the trousers, which were inferior."

In 1884, page 96, Mr. Wadsworth reports:

"The trousers and wincey shown in the inventory are of very poor quality."

Yet, in the answer to the charge which I levelled against the Government, it was said that these articles were always carefully selected and inspected, and that this was the only band that complained. I have shown that two other bands complained. I could show that a dozen complained, if I were justified in taking up the time of the House on this occasion. Then I charged that the agent further said:

"John Marcus, one of the councillors of the Cumberland Band, complains that the agricultural implements forwarded by the department for their use were refused to them."

Then comes a paragraph which appears to be part of a quotation, but it is only given as the substance of the report. I said:

"We were under treaty obligations, we were in honour bound to give the Indians these things; they were bought and paid for, yet, when they reached their destination, some wise agent of the Administration would not hand them over to the Indians. Was any enquiry made into this? In so far as I am able to gather from the reports, none was made."

The author of this pamphlet assumed that it was a quotation, though I only used the first part as a quotation. The Minister of the Interior could see that that could not be a quotation, because it was simply my comments upon the report of the Indian agent. The answer of the Government to that was:

"The band did get all the implements called for under the treaty. The implements withheld were over and above the complement."

If that answer were true, my charge would lose its weight, it would be a charge that I would feel disposed to withdraw altogether, and in reference to which I would state that I was misled by the reports; but, instead of that charge being true, the answer which was made to the charge is absolutely without foundation and false. The hon. gentleman will find on page 146 of the report of 1882 that Inspector McColl says:

"John Marcus, one of the councillors, complained that the agricultural implements forwarded by the department were refused to be given them. These supplies were generally late in arriving at the different places of payments, but even where they had been delivered on the dates contracted for, the agent objected to give them up to the Indians, and also instructed Mr. Factor Belanger to retain them at Grand Rapids until further orders from him, as he was not authorized to hand them over."

Here is the answer of their own agent. The author of the pamphlet says the Indians got all they were entitled to and more, but their own agent says these implements were kept there by the agent and that they were not given over to the Indians. At page 131, the same inspector reports:

"Chief Keetcheekaikake requests that the balance of implements to which his band is entitled be furnished them."

And again at page 142, the same inspector reports:

"Two years ago 100 garden hoes were forwarded to this band, but the agent, considering them unsuitable for that rocky, timbered country, left them in the storehouse of the Hudson Bay Company there until last summer, when they were ordered to be retured to Winnipeg. The Indians are dissatisfied in not having received any agricultural implements this year, especially the grub hoes promised to be supplied to replace the garden hoes."

Is it not thus seen that the charge which I made against the Government is true in substance and in fact? I also pointed out, and this is the last charge I propose dealing with to-night——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If you like, I will go on with the whole, and there are about 60 of them. I stated:

"He (Mr. Wadsworth) reports as to Mistowasis' band: 'They complained that they did not get treaty pigs, and Wadsworth recommends that Mistowasis and Ahtahkakoop get them.' Mr. Wadsworth says of the Bob Tail Band: 'They complained that there are still due them, under treaty, a cow and bull.'"

The answer is, "That these bands received all that was due them and more." If that were true, my charge was without foundation. Let us see if it is true. Let us test it by the reports of the Government. Let us see what their own agents say, and if that confirms my statement, then the Government were wholly unjustified in issuing this pamphlet, and still more in denouncing me on the public platform in the manner they did. At page 120 of his report for 1883, Inspector Wadsworth says, speaking of the chief:

"He asked for his treaty pigs, more work oxen, another tool chest, and moccasins; also some milk pans."

And, at page 121, speaking of Mistowasis' band, he says:

"I beg leave to recommend that this band and Ahtahkakoop's be supplied with their treaty pigs."

Again, at page 125, speaking of Wahsatanow band:

"They require more oxen and tools, and ask for a grindstone and tool chest. Most of the tools given to the band under treaty have been taken to Saddle Lake."

Again, on the same page, speaking of the Bob Tail band:

"They claim that there is still owing to them under treaty a cow and a bull."

And of Ermine Skin's, on the same page:

"The chief asks for a mower and some carts."

Now, Sir, I have shown to you that in the first ten charges, taken chronologically, and a few others, levelled against the Administration, the statements I made were absolutely true, unless the reports of the department are absolutely false. I have shown that I have not garbled, I have not misquoted, I have not misread those reports; I have shown you in respect of these ten charges, and of three or four others that I made, that every statement I made is literally borne out by the reports of the department itself. I have shown you that I have not "strung out lie after lie, misstatement after misstatement, misquotation after misquotation;" and that out of sixty deliberate charges levelled by me, fifty-nine of them are not "wilfully and deliberate falsehoods." I have shown you, Mr. Speaker, that the author of this pamphlet, and the members of the Administration who undertook to deal with me on public platforms, if anyone is guilty of "distorting, misrepresenting, stringing out lie after lie, misquotation after misquotation," it is not the author of the speech, but the authors of the answers to it. Now, Sir, I cannot, after having spoken so long upon this subject, deal with the balance of the charges now, but I promise hon. gentlemen, if an opportunity is afforded me, that I shall deal with the balance of those charges, and I shall show hon. gentlemen who the men are who deliberately—I withdraw the word deliberately—who ignorantly made these charges against me on the public platform: I shall show who the "scandal-mongers," who the "father of lies" are, and I shall show who the "political skunks" are before I get through with this matter. I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite: Before you level charges of this kind against a political adversary, be sure you are standing upon safe ground; take the trouble, be diligent enough, at all events, to read your own reports, to read what your own agents say. I will now give you a word of advice, that you will do well to heed: ponder over the reports, take them home with you; if you have not got them I will lend them to you, and I will show you the pages in each volume in which the evidence can be found; ponder over them carefully, repent of your sins and transgressions, and if you make an open confession, I may find it in my heart to forgive you.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall never be so unfortunate as to deserve the hon. gentleman's forgiveness. The hon. gentleman has made a speech this afternoon which is, in one portion, a continuation of a speech which he made five years ago, and in another portion of it, was a review of some speeches which Ministers made some four and a-half years ago. If the hon. gentleman had intended to put a candid refutation of our speeches before the House, after the lapse of four and a-half years, supported by genuine extracts from public documents, I am sure the hon. gentleman would at least have given us a few moments notice of his intention to do so, in order that we might have ascertained what it was in our speeches that he was likely to complain of, and have furnished to the House the evidence to sustain our charges, if we were in a position to sustain them, and at any rate, that we might have had documents here to compare the extracts which the hon. gentleman read to the House with the original reports themselves; because the essence of this whole discussion is a charge against the hon. gentleman of having misquoted on a former occasion. When he came to discuss the charge of having misquoted from public documents before this House on this Indian question, if he desired to have a careful examination of that charge and a careful criticism of it by members of this House, he would have made it impossible to charge him now with being guilty of misquoting, by giving us some notice so that we might have had the documents here. The hon. gentleman has carefully refrained from pursuing that course, and it is most significant that he has done so when we consider more especially the history of this discussion from the beginning. Now, it was, as the hon. gentleman says, on the 15th of April, 1886, that he brought these sixty charges against the administration of Indian Affairs, to the notice of this House. The Indian Department was at that time under the management of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and the charge was made, as this attack has been made this afternoon, without one moment's notice being given to us; it was made in a carefully-prepared speech, supplied with a multitude of so-called extracts from public documents, not giving a moment's notice to any member of the House that such charges were to be made, or that such extracts were to be read, and at a time when the First Minister, who was in charge of that department, was lying prostrate with severe illness at his home in Earnscliffe. On the 15th April, 1886, that matter was brought to the notice of this House, in an elaborate speech, and with a motion on going into Supply. He was answered as well as he could be on the spot, by persons who had little knowledge of the details of the subject, and went to a vote of the House. But the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in his recollection of what took place in the same session, for, no doubt contrary to his anticipation, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald recovered from that illness in time to be present in the House before the session closed, and to review and deny the accuracy of every one of the charges which the hon. gentleman had made. The hon. gentleman was under the impression when he spoke this afternoon, that Ministers were dumb, that Ministers had no answer to make to these charges; and that the session closed six weeks afterwards, without any one venturing to dispute the correctness of what he had said, and that we sought the platform in his absence and behind his back—an expression which he used a number of times—for the purpose of attacking him, and making what was not a genuine answer to his complaint. But the House did not close within six weeks from that time without an answer having been made, for I find that on the 2nd June, in the same year, Sir John A. Macdonald, being in his place, referred to all these charges in a long address, a portion of which I will read to the House:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

"I do not know that I would have gained much information by it, because the speech was an elaborately prepared one, in which the hon. member went into a number of details which could not be answered on the spot. So soon as I was aware of the speech made by the hon. gentleman I obtained a copy of it and transmitted it to the North-West. I asked for a report not only as regards the Indians, but in regard to all the matters referred to, and I gave instructions that every charge should be brought up, every statement should be examined into and verified or refuted. In order to do that a great extent of the country had to be traversed. Each charge consisted in a distinct allegation of wrong-doing, a sin of omission or commission. The evidence to meet each charge had to be collected and investigated. Only within the last two or three days I have received additional evidence. I had intended, if my strength had allowed me, to have gone into the whole question, but it would have taken a much longer time to have read the evidence in rebuttal than it occupied to make the charges, and the House would not have listened to me. The speech of the hon. member has been published under the auspices of hon. gentlemen and widely distributed. I shall take care that the answer shall be distributed equally widely. I will let the country see from the evidence that, from the beginning to the end, the speech of the hon. gentleman is characterized by the same want of accuracy as has characterized all the speeches and attacks on everybody and everything made by the hon. gentleman in the House this session. I shall be able to show that to the satisfaction of the country."

The hon. gentleman complains of being spoken of behind his back. I have shown the House that the hon. gentleman's whole attack on this subject was made behind the back of the Minister who had charge of that matter, and who was not able to be in the House in consequence of severe illness, until some weeks afterwards. But when the election campaign came on and his county was invaded by some of the Ministers, of whom I was one, the hon. gentleman complains again that we spoke of him behind his back. I can only say, that from the time when I went into his constituency until I came out of it, I never heard an intimation that he desired to be present at any meeting we should address except once, and on that occasion Sir John A. Macdonald stated, that if Mr. Cameron desired to come and address any meeting at which we were to be present, he should be allowed by all means to do so. The hon. gentleman, therefore, cannot impute any blame to us if the hon. gentleman desired to be heard and was not heard. But I presume, inasmuch as our stay in that constituency was only a stay of a few hours and the election campaign was then on, that hon. gentleman had abundant opportunity to discuss this question after we left. His constituents had read our speeches. We were but casual visitors there, we were wayfarers, and he was a resident of the county; the people knew him perfectly well, and with our statements before them, he had an opportunity of making the most complete refutation which it was in his power to make, and I presume he made it, and I also presume the people decided the question in 1887 after hearing everything the hon. gentleman had to urge. If the result was not satisfactory to him it was by no means our fault. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will call attention again, when the hon. gentleman complains of what we said behind his back, to the fact that, returning to this House at the present session, evidently smarting under the imputations which were contained in our speeches, the hon. gentleman had an opportunity for four weeks of discussing this question in the presence of the venerable statesman who was in charge of that department when the grievances alleged were supposed to have occurred. The hon. gentleman again, with the discretion which he evinced in 1886, carefully refrained from bringing the subject before the House when the right hon. gentleman who could best answer him was here to give him his answer. I have only to say this afternoon that it would be impossible for any person to have followed the hon. gentleman's remarks, to have compared his extracts and come to the conclusion which he desired us to arrive, that the charges which he made in 1886 were sustained. I have followed some of the hon. gentleman's quotations, and I have been unable to see that the statements contained in the pamphlet issued by the department were in the least degree inaccurate. The hon. gentleman closed, for example, by quoting his remarks in 1886 and asking the House to admit that they were borne out by the department's report. Referring to page 34 of the pamphlet, I find the following as the hon. gentleman's charge:—

"The chief complained that he could not get his treaty pigs, and that he wanted more oxen, a tool chest and milk pans."

The report reads:

"He asked for his treaty pigs, more work oxen, another tool chest, and moccasins, also some milk pans."

There is no indication that any previous application had been made, there was no allegation that they would not be given. The hon. gentleman said:

"Bob Tail's band complained that there was still due them under the treaty, a cow and a bull."

The report said:

"They claim that there is owing to them under the treaty, a cow and a bull."

That turned out afterwards to be an erroneous claim, as are many of the claims made by the Indians. The hon. gentleman said:

"Ermine Skin's band complained that there was due them under the treaty a mower and some carts."

The report said:

"The chief asked for a mower and some carts."

There was no complaint in this regard, there was no suggestion even that they were due them, and so on, all the way through, and this applies especially to the charges made by the hon. gentleman to a great many harrowed listeners, when he declared that out of a band of eighty-eight heads of families and seventeen children under three years, eleven persons had died from starvation. What the hon. gentleman said is this:

"At Oak River, eleven men have died out of eighty-eight heads of families, and seventeen children under three years old. This is very distressing and is hard to account for—the change of diet, owing to the hunting and scrofula, being probably the cause."

The report shows that out of the eleven heads of families, whom the hon. gentleman said died out of starvation, seven had died from drinking too much whiskey, in spite of the strenuous exertions adopted to put down the sale of this deadly Indian poison. Then, in the passage which the hon. gentleman read this afternoon, in which he did quote correctly the passage as regards farming implements, the contrast between the report and the hon. gentleman's statement in 1885 is just as marked as any contrast can be. This is what the hon. gentleman charged, after reading from the report that harrows and ploughs were partly buried in mud and weeds in different places:

"We have an army of officials in the North-West; we have Indian agents, sub-Indian agents, farm instructors, all kinds and classes of men there to look after the interests of the Indians; and yet we find that so little attention was paid to those supplies that they were dumped off in the mud and filth and left there to rot."

The report of the Indian agent is that the Indians take no interest whatever in farming, that they take no care of the implements provided for them—not that they were dumped anywhere in the mud and allowed to rot. The Indian agent says:

"In going over the reserve on the 11th September, I noticed that no attempt was made to care for the implements which had been supplied to them. The harrows and ploughs were lying partly buried in mud and weeds in different places. Some of them have never been used or put together yet, and are spoiling for want of care."

So, instead of this condition being due to carelessness on the part of officials, it appears that the implements had been furnished to the Indians and brought on the reservation, that they had not been cared for by the Indians or even put together or used; and that fact is brought to the notice of the Government by the Indian agent who was accused by the hon. gentleman of dumping them in the ditch and in the mud and filth and leaving them there to rot. Again, on one page of the Indian agent's report, referring to the Salteaux band, under South Quill, he says, that hunting having failed, the band are miserably poor; and the hon. gentleman used this language:

"Miserably poor! With a magnificent donation voted by Parliament, and expended last year, of some $1,400,000. Miserably poor! And why? Because this Government negligently and carelessly permit their contractors to supply these Indians with an article of wearing apparel that lasts them three days."

These are the facts as reported from the report of the Indian agent from which the hon. gentleman appeared to quote:

"The Salteaux band, at Rolling River, refuse to take their new reserve after it had been acquired for them at great trouble and expense. Many of them are now anxious to take it, but I fear the part proposed to be purchased cannot now be had. However, they cost the Government little or nothing, and I have warned them that until they do settle down they will get no assistance."

He goes on to say:

"I do not expect to make of these Indians farmers: a little corn and potatoes will be about the extent of their harvest. There are one or two good men, but the influence of the rest is too strong for them. They have a good fishing lake, and they will have to look to that for subsistence, as they can sell their surplus fish."

These are the people who are said to have been miserably poor, but this not from any fault in the administration of the Indian Department. The hon. gentleman also quoted from Mr. McKay's report for the purpose of showing that the Indians had, as long ago as 1886, made complaints. It was never denied that they were dissatisfied; no one ever knew of Indians who did not complain; the fulfilment of treaty obligations with them was just the beginning, and they required these obligations to be filled to the rest of their days. But Mr. McColl says:

"To say that the Indians are wholly satisfied with the manner in which the terms of the several treaties have been carried out, would be saying what is inconsistent with their character. To complain is a chronic feature of their nature. I am forced, however, to admit, from personal intercourse with them, and from abundant data at hand, that the manner treaty stipulations have been observed in this superintendency in the past has given them just ground for complaint. They have been furnished—by no fault of the Government, which paid the price of prime supplies and implements—with inferior and old worn-out cattle, or cattle too wild for working or dairy purposes, and with supplies of all kinds of the most inferior quality, which would not be accepted at any price by the ordinary consumer."

But when the hon. gentleman, relying on that extract, went on to particular instances to show that the cattle which had been furnished to some of the bands had been worn-out and unfit for use, and hardly fit for food, it was then proven that these were confined to cases in which the band were not entitled to any such supplies to be furnished to them at all. I shall not pretend to follow the hon. gentleman's quotations, which, as I have said, require verification and which he has given us no opportunity in the least to examine. I have, however, to say that any person who will read the pamphlet which the hon. gentleman has denounced and will compare it with the extracts which he has read this afternoon, will come to the conclusion that strong as is the language which was used concerning him in the winter of 1886-87, that language was far within the mark, unless it can possibly be said that instead of being willing to deceive, and anxious to deceive this House, the hon. gentleman himself was grossly deceived and misled: because the statements which he made in 1886, and which he has attempted to sustain this afternoon, cannot possibly be sustained by any kind of evidence from the public documents, or by any kind of evidence which will satisfy any honourable man. The hon. gentleman, in making these charges in 1886 and in repeating them them this afternoon, has been, I am bound to believe, as badly imposed upon as any man ever was in regard to any section of our public affairs.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must say that I am not a little surprised at the speech addressed to the House by the hon. Minister of Justice in answer to my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron). My hon. friend read a series of extracts from speeches delivered by the members of the Government in the general election campaign of 1887, and he pointed out that the members of the Administration had used very violent, and, in his opinion, altogether unwarranted language against him. I am also of the opinion of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) in regard to this, and I do not think that anything which has been read by the Minister of Justice from the pamphlet which he has in his possession justifies the members of the Administration in the language which they used on that occasion. At the time that pamphlet appeared I took the trouble of comparing some portions of it—I did not go over the whole pamphlet—with the documents that the author professed to quote and with the vindications it undertook to make, and I must say I do not think that pamphlet was an honest production. I do not think that it gave a fair presentation of the contents of the various reports which it undertakes to set out, and I believe that it is open to the charge which the hon. the Minister of Justice has himself made against the speech of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). The Minister of Justice has referred to several statements made by the hon. member for West Huron, and amongst others to that statement with reference to the want of care of the agricultural implements which have been furnished to the Indians. The hon. member for Huron made no statements in his speech delivered some years ago, nor did he make any statement to-day that would in any way tend to misapply the language contained in the quotation which he makes. The point made by the hon. member for Huron was not that those implements had been used by the agents, that they had been thrown down in the mud, and that they had not been taken care of, but that here were farm instructors whom the Government appointed and to whom at that time they were paying a large sum of money.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There were none there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says there were none there, and if that is the case I must say the Government were negligent of their duty and there was want of care and efficiency in the administration of public affairs.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That was not the charge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says that was not the charge, but I say that is the charge. The charge is that these implements had been furnished by the Government, that they were thrown down in the mud, that the weeds had grown up over them and that they had not even been put together. These Indians are the wards of the Government, and if they did not take proper care of their implements it was the business of the officers of the Government to see that proper care was taken of them. That is the point in the charge of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), and to undertake to make it mean something else, and to read something else into it, is to pervert the argument which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) has employed. We have been voting very large sums of money for the maintenance of the Indians in the North-West Territories. In my day I think the sum voted was under $300,000, but to-day the vote is four times that amount; and what justification is there for inefficiency or neglect? It is said it will not do to let the Indians starve, you must undertake to provide for them, and farm instructors have been appointed amongst them. The object with which the farm instructors were appointed was to teach the Indians to be self-supporting, and the object of furnishing them with agricultural implements was to teach them how to use these implements and to take proper care of them, and the Government as trustees for the public, and the officers of the Government as trustees for the Administration in that territory, were bound to see that these implements were properly taken care of and that they were not allowed to lie on the ground and to rot. That was the charge made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron). He very truly stated that some of these agricultural implements had not even been put together, but he was not charging the Government with having carelessly used them in the work; but was charging them with not exercising proper supervision over the Indians with reference to the implements with which they were furnished and the instructions which were to be given to them. The farm instructors were appointed and the agricultural implements were supplied for the purpose of making the Indians self-supporting, and giving them instruction in agriculture; the vocation by which they were to live. Yet, Sir, that was not done, and the quotation given by the hon. member for Huron shows that it was not done. My hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) has read to-day in the presence of the Administration, extracts from the report of 1882. He gave the number of the page from which he was reading at the time, and it was possible for the Minister to follow him and to see whether he was reading correctly, or not. He read also the corresponding statement from the pamphlet to which the Minister of Justice has referred, and I think that the House will see that the quotations read by the hon. gentleman went to support his proposition and did not in any way support the statements contained in that pamphlet. I think it is quite clear that the members of the Administration who made personal attacks on the hon. member for West Huron during the election campaign of 1887 did use language towards him which was altogether unwarranted by anything that he had said in his speech, or by anything which he had read from the report of the Minister having charge of the Department of Indian Affairs at that time.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I should like to say a few words in reference to this matter, as at the time these attacks were made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) I occupied the position of Indian Commissioner in the North-West Territories as well as being Lieutenant Governor, and I was responsible to a great extent for the policy of the Government in connection with the territories at that time. When these attacks were made I took the first opportunity of making enquiry into the matters referred to, and when the speeches of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) were received by us from day to day the statements therein contained caused great astonishment not only to myself, but as well to the settlers of the North-West who were more familiar with the administration of the affairs of the Indian Department than the hon. member for Huron could possibly be. From one end of the country to the other the feeling existed that the hon. gentleman had been most unfair in his criticism of the Indian Department. Subsequent to the meeting of the House in that year I was asked to make enquiries into the allegations made, and to prepare a memorandum in reference to the charges, as they pertained principally to the North-West Territories and Manitoba. This was done by the officials of my department, who had all the documents in their possession. I also gave some attention to the matter myself, and I was surprised to-day when I heard the hon. member get up in his place and state that he had been misrepresented in the answer that had been made. If the hon. gentleman will look at the statements he made in the House and compare them with the reports of the Indian Department, he will himself see that while in many places he did not misquote, yet he did leave out parts of paragraphs or sentences which put a very different construction on the subject he was discussing. That is the case in many instances, I feel sure, from my recollection of the circumstances. When an answer was prepared to the hon. gentleman's remarks, there was no intention of misrepresenting him, and I should be very sorry if there had been any misrepresentation. The hon. gentleman referred to many matters which I cannot recollect now. They occurred in 1882, at a time when, as everybody must know who knows anything of Indian affairs and the state of the country of that time, all the officials of the Indian Department had a most trying duty to perform. The Indians who were scattered throughout the southern country were living sometimes on one side of the boundary and sometimes on the other, most of the time to the south of the boundary. Wherever they could hear of a buffalo, they would pursue it, and when they left we could not know where they would turn up again, whether at Fort Walsh, Wood Mountain or Fort Macleod. In that country, extending over several hundreds of miles, it was impossible to know when to give Indians supplies when they came in and said they were hungry. The police outposts were fitted out with supplies for cases of sudden emergency, when the Indians came upon them, as they sometimes did most unexpectedly. In 1882, the time with regard to which the hon. gentleman complains of my not taking notice of letters which were written to me with reference to the state of the Indians there, we were pressing upon our Indians the necessity of going on their reserves. They had either to do that or go in search of the buffalo; for we were not in a position to provide supplies to keep four or five thousand Indians going. They were not dying of starvation, none of them. The police found their supplies running out, however, and they naturally sent to us for fresh supplies. Some of the Indians did go and settle on the reserves, and others went off to hunt the buffalo. The policy we adopted was to let the Indians know, through agents and every one who came in contact with them, that they must not expect supplies to meet them on the border, but that if they wanted them, they must settle on their reserves, and that policy had the effect of bringing that change about. These Indians, who were then as wild and savage as they had ever been in their lives, are now settled on their reserves, and a great many of them are making their living independently. I am very proud of the success we have met with in this respect in the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West Territories. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) compared the administration of Indian affairs at the time he had charge of the department with what we are doing now. He said that in his time the Government spent about $300,000 a year, while we are now spending a million. That is the case; but, with the exception of one band, there were not, at the time the hon. gentleman left office, any Indians on the reserves. They were just as free as ever they had been, and the Government were not feeding them. Everyone must, therefore, see the reason for the increased cost of Indian affairs to-day. We are now dealing with twenty or thirty reserves, whereas at that time there was only one on our hands. I do not know that I need say anything more in answer to the hon. member for West Huron. It is useless to go into a discussion of every one of these items. In reference, however, to the charge about implements being left in the mud, but especially in reference to the remark of the hon. member for Bothwell that if we had not a farm instructor on that reserve we showed our negligence, I may say that the agency covered by Treaty No. 5 consists of a large number of small reserves, at which the payments are made at stated times during the year. None of the Indians under Treaty 5 are what are called farming Indians, though, if any indicate a disposition to farm, we supply them with tools. In the case mentioned, I presume an application was made to us to supply the Indians with agricultural implements. They were supplied at the usual place where the payments were made, and everything else appears to have been taken away except the lot of implements which the Indians left in the mud, and which were found there some eleven days after the payments had been made. The reserve referred to stretches along the east and west banks of Lake Winnipeg. The people are not Indians of the plains; they never have been dependent upon the buffalo, and their former means of subsistence have not failed. Consequently, farm instructors have not been supplied. If we had not given them those implements, they would probably have complained, and the hon. member for West Huron would have echoed the complaint here, that they were entitled to those implements and had not got them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that, with regard to trousers and shirts being worn out in three or four days, the report corresponds with the statement made by the hon. Minister in his speech, and is at variance with the statement made in the pamphlet.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This matter is somewhat old, and my recollection of it is not as distinct as it would have been a few years ago, nor did I know that my hon. friend was going to bring it up. But I think the House will agree with me that it is only natural the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) should seek an opportunity of making the statements he has made to the House to-day. I think it is rather ungenerous, perhaps, on the part of the Minister of Justice that he should have insinuated that my hon. friend had hesitated to make this statement while the late Prime Minister was yet with us. I think if the House will remember the position of matters after the opening of the House, and when the First Minister was ill, they will admit there was not an occasion offered to my hon. friend from West Huron when he could have very well done that. I think instead of that being urged as a reproach against him it should be rather cited in his commendation. The charge made by my hon. friend did not lie particularly against the late First Minister, that I know of. It was a charge against the Government. Perhaps the late First Minister may have had charge of the department at that time, although I think that during the years to which my hon. friend alluded, in which he found most fault with the management of Indian affairs, that department was directed by another member of the Government. Of that, however, I am not absolutely certain. The hon. gentleman, I think, also was not quite fair in stating that the hon. member for West Huron had brought his original motion at a time when the First Minister was not in the House owing to illness, for, although the First Minister was not able to be present at that particular moment, it must be remembered that notice was given of the motion, and that when the motion was reached the First Minister was ill, a fact which my hon. friend could not have foreseen.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The motion was made on going into Supply, without any notice whatever, and the Minister of Public Works, who replied to the hon. member for West Huron, stated, as will be seen on reference to page 730 of the Debates, that the absence of the First Minister was due to illness.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The First Minister was ill; that is my recollection. But the point I take exception to is, that it cannot be fairly charged against the hon. member for West Huron that he made his statement at a time when he could not expect to receive an answer. I do not think that was his object. The hon. member for West Huron tells me he made his motion on the 15th of April, and it was not until the 2nd of June that the House closed; and I find by the Hansard that as far back as May 4th the then First Minister was in his place, taking an active part in the proceedings of the House. He, therefore, had ample opportunity for a month before the session closed to reply to my hon. friend, but, according to my recollection, it was not until the closing day of the session that he alluded to the circumstance at all, and then only because I myself brought up some additional information which I had secured from a return, and which was not in the possession of the House at the time my hon. friend made his speech. The information which I brought to the notice of the House then, and to which my hon. friend has alluded to-day, consisted of pressing messages which had been sent concerning the condition of a large band of Indians who were reported to be in a state of semi-starvation. One of those letters was dated the 23rd of September, one the 2nd of October, and one the 19th of October, and during all this time the Government did nothing, although their own agent reported that unless something was done there was danger of an outbreak on the part of the starving Indians. Having brought these facts to the notice of the then First Minister, he replied, and in his reply undertook to deal with the statements made by the hon. member for West Huron. The only point I wish to make just now is this. I have not looked at the extracts quoted from the blue-books quoted by my hon. friend, but I have no doubt what he has quoted will be found there. He has made his statement in the presence of hon. gentlemen, who will see in Hansard the remarks he has made and will verify his quotations, if they feel any doubt in the matter; and the hon. gentleman has himself stated that if he has made any wrong statement or misapprehended the meaning of any report, he is quite ready to make the necessary correction. But, as far as I could see to-day, the hon. gentleman has confirmed every statement he made by authorities in the blue-book, and I think he has the right to complain that a document should have been prepared, I suppose, by an officer of the department, with the sanction of the head of the department, to explain away the blue-book in order to meet the charges he made, instead of replying to those charges in the House. I have not got that pamphlet, and do not remember what it is, but I know that it is based, not upon the denial that such things as were charged by the hon. member for West Huron against the Government were in the blue-book, but upon statements of Government officials explaining or denying the charge there made. The hon. member for West Huron is not in a position to say anything with reference to that pamphlet. If Parliament is furnished by the head of the department with an annual report, compiled from reports of the department received from Government agents in various parts of the country, and if in these reports certain statements are made, and if a member of this House, assuming those statements to be correct because they are in an official form, bases thereon a charge against the Government, it is a very unfair proceeding on the part of Ministers of the Crown that they should take the platform, and accuse the hon. gentleman of dealing in falsehoods, of uttering a tissue of falsehoods, when all his statements were taken from the Government report. The hon. gentleman is charged with falsifying the facts. That is a very strong charge for anyone to make against a member of this House, even a political opponent, unless there be very good ground for it; and it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to prove they had good grounds for such a charge by showing that the quotations made by my hon. friend from the blue-books were not in the blue books. To charge an hon. member of this House, who accepted as authentic the official reports submitted by the head of a department and commented upon them, with being guilty of stating a deliberate tissue of falsehoods, seems to me the opposite of the courtesy that ought to prevail between political opponents, though the battle may often wage warm and strong. There is this point to which I wish to call the attention of the House, that the late First Minister, when he did allude to this matter, in the closing days of the session, made a general denial of the statement of my hon. friend. He did not say that the extracts quoted were not in the blue books, but that they were capable of explanation, and I think he promised to name a commission to enquire into the whole matter. That, I believe he did not do, but he said he had sent off for information on the whole question to the different points, which he would have published. Such a course was taken exception to at the time. I took exception to it, and so did the hom. member for South Huron and the hon. Mr. Blake. They took exception on this ground, that it was unfair that statements made in this House on the responsibility of an hon. member should not be replied to in the House, but that, after the House had risen, there should be a document prepared, in reply to such statement, under official authority, and scattered among the constituencies, the contents of which were unknown to any hon. member. I think that was a reasonable and proper objection. If I remember aright, instead of answering or attempting to answer in the House the charge made by my hon. friend, although the then leader of the Government had ample opportunity to do so, the Government had this pamphlet prepared and distributed after the House rose. I have it not before me. I think I glanced through it, but it is some time ago, and it was upon the statements made in that pamphlet, purporting to be contradictions of the statement of my hon. friend, that the Minister of Justice and other hon. Ministers criticized the statements of my hon. friend as they did. I would ask the Minister now, when he considers it coolly, if he thinks that was fair, if he thinks he would be justified in attacking the statements prepared by officials whose own conduct was brought under review, because they might be called upon by the Government afterwards to say why they made those statements. How was my hon. friend to see whether these statements were true or untrue? He had only the information contained in the blue-books before him. If, subsequently, these officials saw fit to modify their statements, and if afterwards they said: We did not know this of our own knowledge, but took the information from some one else, that would be within the knowledge of the Minister, but the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) did not know anything about that, no member of the House knew of it, and no one could possibly know of it except the Ministers themselves. It was, therefore, natural that the answer was prepared in that way. I said on that occasion:

"With reference to the main question, it is to be regretted that the First Minister was not in his place when this subject was brought before this House. It is also to be regretted that he finds it necessary to announce, without making a speech openly before the House and the people, where his statement can be scrutinized and criticized, that he will issue something like a manifesto with reference to the management of his department. He said that is necessary because the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) was inaccurate in his statement. I suppose he applies the same remark to those I made. All I can say is that they were based on records brought down from the hon. gentleman's own department and I made them in the presence of the Government in order to be set right, if on any point I was wrong. But, if the hon. gentleman is to go through the papers of the department and select such as he sees fit without giving us any opportunity of scrutinizing them, we should like to know it."

I was conscious at the time that I had quoted, and had made an honest quotation, from a return which was before the House, and I was willing to have my statement challenged. Sir Richard Cartwright, who spoke after me on that occasion, said:

"Will the hon. gentleman issue this document over his own signature, or does he propose to make use of the officers of his department? Because I can see that rather serious inconveniences will arise if gentlemen at the head of departments call upon their officers to issue what is to all intents and purposes a political pamphlet. I do not object to the hon. gentleman making any speech or issuing any declarations when he sees fit, but I do not think officers should do it.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will take my own course about that; and it will be under my responsibility it will be issued. The hon. gentleman says, the answer ought to be made here. It could not be given here, because we had to trace up the facts and the evidence of the statements of sundry agents which the hon. member for West Huron quoted. We had to see those agents and ask them what they meant. For instance, there was a statement respecting Mr. Lawrence Clark, whom everybody knows. He says that the whole statement in the speech of the hon. member for West Huron is false: he used very strong language in that regard. Sundry clergymen have also stated that they have been quite misled. One of the charges brought was that a certain person had made a certain statement respecting frauds in the department. On being asked why he made that statement, he said the only fraud he knew of was a fraud committed by Mr. Pope Nixon, an officer of the late Government, and that was what he referred to, and not to any recent irregularities. The evidence will show there never was a greater tissue of false statements. I would have been very glad to have laid the evidence before the House, but it was only the day before yesterday that I received it from the far North-West. It will come, however, be published and distributed."

I call the attention of the House to what the First Minister proposed and said. If I interpret his statement rightly it was not that he would prove that what had been found by the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) in the blue-books was not there, but that the officers who had made those statements would qualify them, and that certain clergymen who had been quoted had written saying that they had been misled. If that were put before the House clearly, that would have had to be taken into consideration, and my hon. friend from West Huron, when he found that a statement had been made which was susceptible of another explanation, or that a clergyman admitted that he had been misled in what he had written, would no doubt have accepted that as a mitigation of his charges. But let the hon. gentleman be fair. The hon. member for West Huron did not know that these clergymen said they had been misled, and he could not know that certain agents of the Dominion Government had found that information supplied to them by others was not correct; so that, when he is called an Ananias, and is told that he is a liar, hon. gentlemen ought to be prepared to show, from the evidence which was before him, which was the only evidence that he could use—that their allegation is true. That is the only fair and honourable course to be taken towards any political opponent. Let the House see how unfair it was. Mr. Blake replied to Sir John Macdonald, and said:

"We will all be anxious to receive the exculpatory or explanatory statement of the hon. gentleman, but why he should not lay the material now on the Table before publishing it, since he has the material? The hon. gentleman had the right to make, from the evidence that reached him, what charges he chose, but on examining it we find the evidence altogether fallacious.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must analyze it.

"Some hon. MEMBERS. Let us analyze it,

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must classify it under the different charges. You shall get the whole of the evidence: I can assure you of that. I shall have it carefully prepared in narrative form and distribute copies to every member, besides furnishing copies to the constituencies."

The House recognized at that time that it was essential that it should have the opportunity of seeing these outside statements which had been received by the Government and upon which the Government based the pamphlet they issued. That information was denied to the House. The House did not see it. If the House had seen it, if the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) had seen it and had found that it explained the statements which were before Parliament, it would be different, but nothing of this information was before that hon. member when he made these charges, and I think it was not unreasonable that, having been defeated at the last election, having been left out of the House, he, as an honourable man—for what honourable man will not smart under unfair charges, besides being stamped by a name which is offensive to any man with a sense of honour—should now, on the first opportunity he has had in Parliament since these charges were levelled against him, taken the opportunity to show that he has been maligned, and that he should call upon the Ministers opposite to admit that they had not done justice to him and to ask them why they acted as they did. If there be a difference of opinion, let there be a difference of opinion; and if we are to have political warfare, let us have honest warfare; and if the member for West Huron did misquote, if he did garble, if he did forge, as I think he was charged with doing, from the blue-books, and it can be shown from the authors that he used, from the utterances of the agents, that he had put words in their mouth that they did not use, then he might be fairly charged with great carelessness, if not worse. But if the members opposite are unable to say to-day that what he did charge is not to be found in the reports of the different agents, they are not justified in stigmatizing him as a man whose word is not to be taken, because some of the agents or other authors, when being asked personally to send in a report, after excitement had been created in this matter, modified their statements so as to say, over their own signatures, that when they made these statements they were misled in the matter. I think the House can see how the matter stands; I think the House, composed of honourable men, will realize that the member for West Huron was perfectly justified in making the vindication of himself which he did make in his speech to-day.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the observations that have been made on the other side of the House are almost a complete vindication of the course pursued by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) in his speech on this question some years ago. It must indeed be very gratifying for the member for West Huron to find that the Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior now complain, after having spoken on this subject before, after having hurled epithets at that hon. gentleman, that he did not give them an opportunity, that he did not give them time, that he did not give them notice. They had already spoken on this question, they had pronounced upon this question, they had gone before the people, behind the back of the member for West Huron, and had pronounced upon his conduct and upon his course in reference to this subject. The member for West Huron made an elaborate speech on this occasion, a speech carefully prepared from the documents published by the Government, and out of their own mouths he has established the truth of the allegations that he made against the Government. He has also the satisfaction of knowing that the members of the Government complain that they have forgotten the charges they made against him, that they are a continuation, as it were, of the matters treated in their reports, and they plead for mercy now, after having gone from one end of this country to the other and scattered these reports against the member for West Huron, and after having loaded him with all sorts of opprobrious epithets, they now come humbly, almost apologizing to this hon. gentleman for having done so. It must be a great gratification to the member for West Huron to have this vindication from the gentlemen who maligned him on that occasion. Now, I notice in this book that was published at that time by the department—I have only had a little time to look into it, but I notice that there are some things in this book that should not be there; I notice things concerning the Indians that I do not think it is the duty of the department to put in a book at all. For instance, I find on page 30 a statement that the Indians have a chronic habit of grumbling. Now, what good can this possibly do? Is it by such a policy that the Government are going to conciliate the Indians—publicly telling the Indians that they are in the habit of grumbling? Then the Minister of Justice made a statement to the same effect to-day. Is this going to promote that harmony that should exist between the Indian tribes and the Government of the day? I think the Government are doing something that is calculated, perhaps, to do a greater injury to this country than they are aware of. I think that our Indians should be treated with greater consideration than this, and when they ask for things that are necessary, things that they require, they should not be answered: You are continually grumbling, you are asking for what you have no right to get. This language is calculated to stir up bad feelings on the part of the Indians towards the Government of this country. The Government should be very careful in their dealings with the Indians, and endeavour to consider their feelings and not seek to irritate them, or to create an unpleasant feeling on the part of the Indians towards the Government. The people of this country desire that the Indians shall be kindly treated, and they are opposed to the practice of the Government in throwing out imputations against the Indians that are calculated, perhaps, to do great injury to this country. Now, I am very glad to notice that the Minister of Justice almost took back all the epithets that he applied, in his campaign speeches, to the hon. member for West Huron. The member for West Huron, when he comes before this House to address it on any subject, always does so in a manner that does himself great credit, indeed. He is one of those members of the House who carefully prepares his speeches, he gives information to this House, and on this occasion he has given information to this House that apparently the heads of the department were not aware of. They have probably not given as close study to the reports of their own agents as has the member for West Huron, and it must be very gratifying to him to find that they now come here, after he has made his speech, complaining that they had not an opportunity of verifying the facts so that they might be able to reply to him.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE FISHERY LAWS.

Mr. LISTER. Before the House goes into Committee, I desire to bring before the attention of the House some matters to which I wish to address myself for a few moments. It is a matter of very great importance to a very large section of the community, so important, indeed, that I feel justified, under the circumstances, in calling your attention to it. I desire to say to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that I fully approve of the Bill of which he has given notice to-day, namely, to divide the fines that may be inflicted for any infraction of the fishery laws of this country between the Government and the inspector, provided he is the prosecutor; and I, for one, hope that the effect of that legislation will be an incentive to these officials to act, and will induce them to be more vigilant and to enforce as far as possible the fishery laws of this Dominion. I speak with a knowledge of the facts when I say that in very many instances these particular officers discharge their duties in a perfunctory manner. It is well known that the salaries which they receive are such as will not justify them in giving that time and attention to the discharge of those duties which the law expects from them: the consequence is that the law is disregarded, that every day in the year it is broken, and the result is loss to that section of the community; and as I stated before, I believe the hon. gentleman's Bill will be a remedy to this evil. Now, I do not propose to speak in any way as censuring the Government or the administration of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because, after reading the reports of that department, and being somewhat familiar with what is going on, through the reports of the deputies and otherwise, I honestly think that the department and its officials are fairly trying to carry out the provisions of the law. But a large portion of the fishermen of this country have what they consider grievances, and it is their privilege and my duty, if asked to do so, to endeavour to bring these grievances before the Government, with a view to having them remedied. I need hardly say to the House that the fishery industries of this country, and particularly the fresh-water industries, because it is to those fisheries I propose to exclusively allude, are of very great importance indeed, in a material sense, and it behooves the Government of the country to do all it can to prevent the destruction of our fishing interests, to satisfy themselves that the manner of fishing is not more destructive than can be compensated by the enormous reproductive power of the fish. I say, unhesitatingly, that it is the duty of the Government, with a view to the proper protection and preservation of the fisheries, to enact such laws and take such legislative steps as may be necessary in that interest. The House is, of course, aware that the great inland fisheries of the Dominion are to be found in the Province of Ontario, namely, in Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, Superior, and the Georgian Bay. In those great inland waters are to be found whitefish, trout, pickerel and herring, all having great commercial value, and it is but proper and right that every step that can possibly be taken, everything that can be done for the protection and preservation of that great natural wealth, should be done by the Government and this House. In order to form some opinion of the great wealth that is contained in those waters, I would refer hon. gentlemen to the statistics which have been furnished by the officers of the department. My remarks will refer entirely to Ontario, and hon. gentlemen will remember there are the Provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia and Quebec in which this industry also prevails. In Ontario the boats and vessels engaged in this industry number 1,650, the value of these vessels $256,568, the number of men employed is 3,528, the value of the nets is $218,191, and the value of the product last year was $1,983,123. In 1869 the total value of the product was only $190,203, or an increase in twenty years of $1,772,920. Looking for a moment at the revenue from the fisheries of Ontario, I find that the amount received in rents, licenses and fees last year was $23,666.96, or more than double the revenue derived from any other province in the Dominion including Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or British Columbia. The next largest revenue yielding province was British Columbia, and it yielded a revenue of $11,367.50. Looking for a moment at the expenditure I desire to point out that the expenditure for all purposes connected with the fisheries in Ontario last year was $14,539.87, leaving a net revenue to the Government of $9,127.09. This is the only province, with the exception of British Columbia, that pays a revenue to the Government more than sufficient to meet the expenses of management. What I have stated is sufficient, I think, to satisfy hon. members that the industry is a very large and growing one, and if the Government, or the Minister at the head of the Department of Fisheries is able to do anything to increase the productiveness of the fisheries, to protect them and to make them more lasting, it is his bounden duty, in the interest of the people, to do so. But the complaint of a large section of the fishermen is, that the fishing is carried on by gill-nets and pound-nets. The fishermen complain that fishing with gill-nets and pound-nets is destructive, particularly that with gill-nets, that if that system is continued it will inevitably lead to the extermination and absolute destruction of the fisheries of this country, and it is with a view to calling the attention of the Minister of Marine to this important fact I take the liberty of addressing the House to-day. In Georgian Bay the fishing is altogether by gill nets; in Lake Huron, on the other hand, the fishing is by pound-nets. In order to show the destruction caused by gill-net fishing I refer hon. gentlemen to pages 85 and 92 of the Minister's report for this year. Mr. Wilmot, in his report to the department, says, on page 85:

"At the present time a great deal of dissatisfaction exists among wholesale dealers and their customers, owing to the fish not being in a sound condition for food, especially when arriving at destinations long distances from the fishing grounds. The cause of this, in my opinion, is largely due to the use of the gill-net. The present system of operating the gill-net by the ordinary run of fishermen is to have two to four gangs set in different localities; these are lifted alternately, usually remaining in the water from three to four days, but in case of rough weather the fishermen cannot reach them, and the fish are not removed for a much longer period. The result is that a large proportion of the fish, when taken from the net, are in a somewhat decomposed state, and it stands to reason that their condition will not be improved by the time they arrive at the important fish markets, such as Toronto and Buffalo, to be sold to the retail dealers of Canada and the United States, after having been kept for a week or more. It is well known that a large percentage of the fish taken by the gill-nets are unfit to be shipped fresh. If in good order when caught it would profit the fishermen to ship them in that state, as they command a much higher price than when salted. The reason that such a large number of fish are salted is, simply because they are not marketable to ship as sound, fresh fish. The effect of the salt put upon them for curing purposes temporarily hardens the fish, deceives the buyer, and leads the consumer to the mistaken idea that they are wholesome, when in a great many instances they are really unfit for human food. * * * I am of the opinion that the gill-net is much more destructive than the pound-net, and its use as at present practised must eventually exterminate the salmon trout and whitefish. In districts where extensive fishing is carried on by means of gill-nets many miles of fishing grounds are covered, and while the meshes of these nets are made sufficiently large (say, 4½ or 5 inches) to capture the most marketable fish, they allow the poorer classes (such as the sucker, the mullet and the ling, averaging 2 pounds in weight, and for which there is no demand) to escape."

On page 92 he says:

"From the foregoing explanations, it will be observed that, with gill-net appliances and their facilities for easy removal from feeding to spawning grounds, it is a very difficult matter for the fish to escape being caught. A deplorable fact in connection with this system, and one very much to be regretted, is that a large proportion of the fish caught by means of the gill-net are taken off the spawning grounds at a period when they are not in marketable condition."

It is alleged by all writers on fishing subjects that the pound-net is a very destructive net, and referring to this and to the particular locality that I have in view, namely, a portion of Lake Superior, I beg to say to the Minister that if pound-nets can be at all justified, he has licensed too many of them on the particular section to which I refer, and if pound-nets are to be licensed at all there should be as few licenses granted as possible and the nets should be kept a long distance apart. It is contended by those who are engaged in the industry that these pound-nets give the fish no chance to escape, that they are put in the run-ways of the fish, are kept going day and night, and that the effect of this system of fishing has been to almost destroy the seine fishing in Lake Huron and the other lakes to which I have alluded. I would point out to the House that the seine fishing is a system of fishing which employs a large number of men. It means a very considerable expenditure of money, it means a large number of votes, and take it from every standpoint so far as the public are concerned, it is the best system of fishing. On the other hand the pound-net fishing and gill-net fishing employ very few men, because after the first expenditure for the outfit the expense of carrying on the fishery is comparatively light. As I have already said, it is contended by the seine-net fishermen that the effect of the pound-net and gill-net has been almost to destroy the seine-net fisheries on the shores of Lake Huron and the rivers running into the lakes. It has been noticed for the past four or five years—for six or seven years probably—that as the pound-nets have increased in number the catch of the seine fishermen has been reduced from year to year, until it is safe to say that within the last two or three years the catch of the seine fishermen has been comparatively very little. For the purpose of bearing out the statement which I make in this regard I will take the liberty of reading a letter which I received from a seine fishermen living in the County of Huron, on the other side of the line dividing the County of Huron from the County of Lambton. He says:

"DEAR SIR,—As we, the seine fishermen of the Grand Bend, have seen by the newspapers that you have been inquiring in Parliament for information with regard to the pound-nets in the lakes with a view to have them removed; it is the earnest wish of the seine fishermen that you would push it forward as there is about sixteen pound-nets at or near here which have ruined the seine fishing. There are three or four seine fishermen who dropped fishing, and more to follow, on account of the pound-nets. Sir, as you may not be aware how the thing is done allow me to inform you. A party in Port Huron came here last year and engaged some Canadian men to work the nets as their own, but the firm sends their steam-tug around twice a week and take away nearly all our best fish to Port Huron, and the Canadians take the small fish ashore and if they cannot sell them they bury them—as they have no salt to cure them—and so they are lost. They are set so close to the shore that it prevents the fish from running their natural course, and if it is allowed to go on for a few years longer it will ruin all our fish. It is only one mile from the shore where the fish are set and they are generally placed opposite the County of Huron between the Grand Bend and a place called Bayfield, about fifteen miles from here. The last agent when the fishing did not pay, took his pound-nets over to the States and brought them back in the spring and set them. The take generally consists of whitefish, salmon trout, sturgeon and pickerel. It is the Americans who are making the money and not the Canadians, and the Americans are depriving us of our fish. As the inhabitants are all eye-witnesses to the occurrences above mentioned, it can be proven, and we hope you will do what you can in the matter. At present there are six seines at work, four men to each. Any further information you may need I shall be only too happy to give you."

I think, Sir, I am safe in making the statement that in the fyles of the Fisheries Department will be found petitions sent to the Minister of the Department year after year pointing out the injurious effect of the pound-net fishing, and asking that either the pound-net should be abolished or the number of licenses reduced. The letter I have just read is only one out of a large number I have received from different sections of the country where the seine fishermen are complaining all alike that the effect of the pound-nets and gill-nets is to destroy the fishing ground along the shores of these lakes. I hope that when the Minister takes this matter into his consideration he will see his way to largely reduce the number of pound-net licenses, if not to abolish that system of fishing altogether. I can fully understand that when applications for pound-net licenses are put in, influences are brought to bear on the Minister which in some cases are hard to resist, but if the belief is that these nets are not in the interest of the fishing industry, and that they are destructive to the fish, then a bold stand should be taken by the Minister, and a policy decided upon which will preserve our fishing industry to us. I desire to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that pound-net licenses have been granted for Lake St. Clair. I think that is a most unfortunate thing. If there is one fish more choice than another, found in the fresh water lakes and rivers of the country, it is the black bass. Lake St. Clair is the home and the breeding ground of the black bass, and if the system of pound-net fishing is continued on Lake St. Clair, it is safe to predict that the time is not far distant when no black bass will be found in that lake. Black bass is the fish of the sportsman in this country, and it is a notorious fact that they have, within the last few years, become exceedingly scarce. There can be no possible reason why that fine fish should be allowed to be caught by the ton in pound-nets, instead of being caught by the fishermen with the ordinary seine-net or by the hook and line of the sportsman. The Province of Ontario, or the Dominion of Canada, does not get one copper's worth of advantage for all this black bass caught in Lake St. Clair, because, without any exception whatever, it finds its way to the Detroit and Buffalo markets.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LISTER. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was attempting to point out to the Minister of Fisheries the objections to granting licenses for pound-net fishing in Lake St. Clair, and I desire as strongly as possible to emphasize those objections. I stated, and I now repeat, that that lake is the home of the black bass—that the spawning grounds of the black bass are there; and I would add that it is the resort of thousands of sportsmen from all parts of this continent during the fishing season. On the Plats Canal entering into Lake St. Clair there are club houses, hotels and residences, where through the heated season there is a population, floating and stationary, of many hundreds of people, if not thousands. The experience of the past few years, since these pound-nets have been allowed to be used in fishing in Lake St. Clair, is that the black bass have been gradually becoming fewer each year, until to-day it is with difficulty that a person fishing with a rod can get a supply of fish there at all. In addition to all this, all the fish caught in Lake St. Clair are at once sent to the markets of Detroit and Buffalo. I venture the assertion that in the cities of Toronto, London, Kingston or Montreal, or any other city in this Dominion a person would find great difficulty to-day in purchasing a black bass. The business of fishing with pound-nets has fallen altogether into the hands of American companies. There is a great fishing combination in the United States. There is the Manitoba Fishing Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of Michigan, in which J. W. Gauthier is one of the principal stockholders, as well as the Buffalo Fish Company and the Detroit Fish Company. These large and powerful companies have succeeded in getting control of the principal fisheries on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay. In proof of this statement I would refer the House to pages 97 and 98 of the report of Mr. Wilmot, a gentleman well capable of giving an opinion upon the question under discussion, where he uses these words:

"Before closing this report I beg to call your attention to the fact that in former years wholesale fish dealers, with moderate capital, were stationed at different points, such as Collingwood, Meaford, Owen Sound and other places, and purchased from time to time the fish brought to market by the fishermen of Georgian Bay; but I regret to say that an extensive fish company, composed of American capitalists, have bought or squeezed out all the local dealers, and now have a complete monopoly of the fish caught in these waters. * * * As the Georgian Bay is the main source of fish food for the Province of Ontario, and the Buffalo fish monopoly now have complete control of it, it is only reasonable to assume—in fact the present aspect indicates that Canadians will only be enabled to secure supplies of salmon trout and whitefish at a very high market price, and only then when there is an over-supply for the American trade.

"In conversation with interested fishermen at various points, and in the vicinity of Wiarton (the main export depot of the American fish company), I find that considerable dissatisfaction exists among Canadian fishermen on account of the privileges which American capitalists have usurped, and which they claim must soon drive the Canadians out of the trade of exporting fish altogether."

There is no question that this portion of Mr. Wilmot's report is fully warranted by all the facts of the case. Gentlemen living in any of the cities of this Dominion will bear me out in the statement that in those cities it is almost impossible to obtain fresh fish that are fit for food. I understand that Americans are not allowed to take out licenses in their own names; but they evade the law by getting some poor fellow to take out a license in his own name, though having neither the capital nor the appliances for fishing and not intending to fish, and perhaps only employed in the establishment of one of these companies as an ordinary workman. Such a license enables one of these American companies to catch fish in Canadian waters and take them into the United States free of duty, because they make a declaration at the port to which the fish are shipped that all their fishing appliances belong to American citizens. The consequence is that while we grant a license to the Canadian, he is not its owner, but only the trustee for the American citizen. American fishermen can thus take their fish into the United States free of duty, while Canadian fishermen are met at the border by a duty which makes it exceedingly unprofitable, particularly to a small fisherman, to engage in the business. There is a case within my own knowledge of a fisherman taking $3 of fish to Port Huron, where, before he got through he had to pay $2.90 in the shape of duties, entry charges and other expenses, the payments thus amounting nearly to the value of the fish in our market. Now, I maintain that a license ought not to be granted to any person unless he can show to the satisfaction of the department that he is able and intends to go on and fish on his own account. It is not right that the law should be evaded as it is and honest fishermen driven out, because under existing circumstances it is impossible for local fishermen to compete with those great companies who throw every obstacle in their way. Speaking for Lake Huron, I can say that these Americans do not give any employment whatever to Canadian fishermen. They take out a tugboat from Port Huron, the property of a large fishing firm there, run it alongside their net, and load the fish into the tug. The men on the boat do all the work, there is not the expense of a single dollar among Canadians; the Americans receive all the advantage, to the prejudice of the fishermen of our own country. Our seine-net fishermen declare that they can produce satisfactory evidence that the effect of pound-net fishing has been almost to destroy fishing on Lake Huron, so far as seine-nets are concerned. These men are entitled to have their complaints investigated, and if they prove to be well-founded, then I think the Minister of Fisheries will feel it to be his duty to do something to relieve the fishermen from the disadvantages under which they labour. Pound-net fishermen are scattered all over the shores of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay. It is almost impossible for the fishery overseers, if they felt so disposed, to maintain a proper supervision over the fishing. Many of them live a long distance from where the fishing is going on; many of them are poorly paid; and they do not, as a matter of fact, visit these fisheries as often as they ought to. The consequence is that the regulations of the department are utterly disregarded. And in many other places, if not disregarded, they are but indifferently observed. Take, for example, the case of Mr. Gauthier. He is a Canadian citizen living in Windsor. He is a member of what is known as the Manitoba Fishing Company, a company incorporated under the laws of the State of Michigan. I believe he is the principal stockholder in that company, and I am told that this gentleman has hundreds of miles of fishing privileges, on Georgian Bay particularly. Now, as a Canadian, he takes out a license, and as an American, a member of a joint stock company, he gets his fish into the United States free of duty. Now, I charge here that Mr. Gauthier has for years utterly disregarded the fishing regulations of this Dominion. He has utterly ignored the fishing laws of this Dominion, and only the other day I have reliable information that this gentleman's foreman was convicted of obstructing the main channel of the Spanish River with a pound-net, by putting a pound-net across the mouth of the Spanish River. The Spanish River is resorted to for the purpose of spawning; and not only did he put a pound-net across the mouth of the river, in defiance of the law, but he placed it there during the close season. He was also convicted of using nets with illegal meshes, and of not removing stakes at the expiry of the fishing season, and of fishing in the close season; and I have in my possession—I do not know whether it is in the department or not—an affidavit made by one Pears, which reads as follows:—

"SPANISH RIVER STATION,
"ALGOMA, April, 1891.

"I, George Pears, of the Township of Shadden, in the District of Algoma, do solemnly declare that on the 13th day of April instant I received a letter from Mr. John Andrew, J.P., of Spanish River Mills, directing me to go carefully over the fishing grounds of the Spanish River and seize all nets found in the water. In accordance with those directions I went over the grounds on the 15th April in company with Nelson Couture, John McHugh and Alfred Folz. We found three pound-nets set, two between Gauthier's Fishing Camp and Buswell's Mill, and the third north of Green Island. The ice around them had been kept cut clear through the winter, so that the pounds could be lifted to take out the fish. There were four others—leads, hearts and trunnels—the pounds having been lifted some time previous (I was told by George Gauthier, the fishing guardian). I seized the whole, leads and all, and brought three pound-nets to Spanish River Station, where they remain. I notified Mr. Chamberlain, manager for C. W. Gauthier & Co., that I had made the seizures. I also notified George Gauthier, the Fishery Guardian at Algoma Mills, the latter in writing. When I seized the three pound-nets I found that two had been lifted that morning before I got there, and I saw C. W. Gauthier's fishermen lifting the remaining one. I followed them to the camp and found several hundred weight of live pickerel being packed in the freezer, apparently for shipment. Being in the close season, I seized the fish also, but as I had no means of removing them I left them in Gauthier's fish-house. Folz was present with me at this time. Chamberlain said, in reply to my remark that it was the close season for pickerel, that they were not caught that day (the 15th inst.) I said they were taken out of the net to-day, whereupon he said they were, and that they had a right to them. Two of the nets seized have an illegal mesh, viz.: one is 2½ inches extension measure, and the other 3 inches, the regulation being not less than 4 inches.

"And I make this declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting extra-judicial oaths.

(Sd.) "GEORGE PEARS."

I understand there is other evidence, which possibly may not be in the hands of the department, showing the facts to be as set forth in this affidavit. I maintain that when a man like Mr. Gauthier, who has received great favours from the Government in the matter of licenses, deliberately and wantonly breaks the plain provisions of the law with which he is perfectly familiar, the first act of the Government ought to be the cancellation of his license. But, although this man was fined, and his nets seized—for I am bound to do Mr. Tilton the credit of saying that immediately on getting the information he telegraphed the officers of the department to destroy the nets—still Mr. Gauthier's boat, the City of Windsor, happened to be there, and before the order of the department could be carried out, he had got on board the most valuable of the nets and took them away. That is the way this gentleman shows his respect for the law passed for the preservation of fish of this country. Not only that, but his brother, George Gauthier, is a fishery overseer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not now.

Mr. LISTER. Well, he was. He is also in the employ of the Customs Department as a landing waiter. This gentleman, who was employed by the Government for the purpose of seeing that the law was observed, himself embarked in the business of fishing, and was convicted of having fished during the close season, of having fished in the Spanish River contrary to law, and of having fished with a net the meshes of which were smaller than the regulations allowed.

Mr. BOWELL. To what officer is it the hon. gentleman refers? I was not paying attention at the moment.

Mr. LISTER. Gauthier.

Mr. BOWELL. Where?

Mr. LISTER. At Georgian Bay; but I am glad to know that the Department of Fisheries dismissed him on the first of this month. But if he wantonly disregarded his duty as a fishery overseer, you may fairly infer that he will be found faithless in his duty as an officer of the Customs Department. Mr. Gauthier, having these fishing appliances, having his brother an overseer of the fisheries, disregarded the law completely, being confident, no doubt, that his brother would protect him; and it is well known at Georgian Bay that this company have been acting in this way for years, both Mr. Gauthier and his partner being known in that country as the fish pirates of Georgian Bay. I can only repeat that, so far as this man is concerned, it is the bounden duty of the Government to cancel his license at once. I do not think it is in the interests of the fishing industry in this country that one man should have licenses over such an enormous territory as this man has. This is a matter which the department should investigate most thoroughly; and if I am here another session, I shall deem it my duty to ask the department to lay on the Table such papers as they may have respecting the matter to which I have referred. There are one or two more questions I would like to bring before the attention of the hon. Minister. As he knows, there is a fish hatchery in Sandwich, and another in Newcastle, and there is also one in the city of Ottawa; and I see by the report of Mr. Wilmot that he recommends the establishment of one upon the Georgian Bay. I would remind the hon. Minister that Lake Huron is one of the largest lakes in the Dominion, that it is one of the waters from which the largest quantity of fish is obtained; and I believe it would be in the interests of the fisheries, if upon some point of Lake Huron a fish hatchery were established. In order to plant the pickerel in Lake Huron, the man in charge of the fish hatchery at Sandwich has to go up to Lake Huron, he is not always there at the time when he is able to get the spawn. It is a matter of very great importance to my mind that we should have a hatchery, not only upon Lake Huron, but also upon Lake Superior, and I would urge upon the Government the necessity of doing this, if it can be done at all. There can be no doubt but that these hatcheries have had a wonderful effect on the fisheries in this country. The fishermen report, not only on Lake Erie but on Lake Huron, that the result of this work is already apparent, and they strongly feel that it should be continued and extended as far as possible. I would advise the Government that, in the spring, before the close season has expired, some fishermen should be permitted to fish in Canada, so that the ova could be obtained. I believe it was found this year when the fishing commenced that the male fish had disappeared to a great extent while there were any quantity of female fish, and thus it was impossible to get the male fish to impregnate the ova, and the result of that is no doubt a great loss to our own fishery. If those gentlemen had gone through there a week before, a great number both of male and female fish could have been obtained, but strange to say the males had disappeared, leaving the females. What the fishermen ask is that the gill-nets should be abolished entirely and that the whole question of pound-net fishing should be thoroughly investigated and reported on; and I would suggest that Mr. Wilmot, or some other man thoroughly acquainted with fishing in the inland waters, should be empowered to visit the fishing ports of the Province of Ontario and take all the evidence on that subject he could, and see how far the complaints which are made are well founded. We ask that the number of pound net licenses shall be greatly reduced, and that the pound-net license for Lake St. Clair shall be entirely abolished, and that the mesh of the pound-nets shall be made larger than it is. The fact is that, with the mesh which is now used, the Detroit fishermen catch a small whitefish which is not fit for the market, take it to Detroit and put it on the market as Detroit whitefish, when really it should not be on the market at all. We ask that the violation of the law as to the size of nets and as to the close season shall be punished by cancellation of the license, and the destruction of the fishing plant, and also that licenses shall be granted to Canadians only on proof that they can own the necessary appliances, and that if any licenses so granted are held in trust for an American company they shall be cancelled. We also ask that the fishery inspector shall have the power to investigate all cases of this kind. I trust that, before the House meets next year, the Minister will see his way to appoint a commissioner to investigate all the complaints of the fishermen, and then the Government and the House will be in a better condition to deal with the question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) has given strong evidence in support of what I have often urged upon the Government that there should be a closer inspection of the fisheries on the Georgian Bay generally, though, of course, that would entail a greater expenditure than is made at the present time. I acknowledge that it is a very difficult question. I do not understand the proposal of the hon. gentleman that the gill net should be abolished in favour of the pound-net, for our experience is that the pound-net has always been regarded as the most destructive of all. I hope the Minister will deny the statement made in reference to Mr. Gauthier, because, if that person has any license covering any part of the coast of the Georgian Bay, it is something new to me. As I understand, the licenses in the Georgian Bay are given to boats only. If any special privilege has been given to this person, it should at once be remedied. There is another evil to which I may refer, and that, perhaps, is as extensive as the one referred to by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). It is that many of these fish companies buy the fish direct from the fishermen and, as they are able to take them into the United States free of duty, they divide the amount of duty with the fishermen and thus induce the fishermen to sell them their fish.

Mr. LISTER. They cannot do that, because it is only the owner of the fishing plant who is enabled to get the fish into the United States free of duty.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have understood that they divide the amount of duty with the fishermen, which gives our fishermen a bonus and enables these men to get their fish into the United States free of duty. The result is the same. The fish are sent to the other side, and the supply from our own waters is lost to us. What is really needed is a more careful and closer inspection, and that, of course, means a larger expenditure of money. I think the Government are entitled to some credit for having made some progress in this direction, but I think they hardly appreciate the value of the fisheries on Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay, and that, while a great deal has been done for the sea coast fisheries, comparatively little has been done for the fisheries in our inland waters, and consequently a great loss has taken place which it will be hard to repair. I think some plan should be adopted by which the present system under which our whole trade is passing away to foreign waters should be changed and the evil should be obviated. I fancy it might be done by revising the system of granting licenses. Of course, we cannot prevent our fishermen selling their fish to foreign dealers, but no undue advantage should be given to others over our own people, and I think that fishing licenses should be granted with that view. This is a subject on which I have spoken again and again in this House, but perhaps the suggestions coming from the other side to-night will be better received than any coming from this side. I would urge a more strict supervision in the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron on the part of the Fishery Department.

Mr. SPROULE. I would not occupy the time of the House on this subject but for the fact that my constituency reaches to the Georgian Bay, and that I have had a number of communications this session and also in other sessions in reference to a more strict revision of the fishing regulations there. I very gladly endorse the statements made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). I do not think he has overrated the importance of the fishing in the Georgion Bay, Lake Huron, and the same may be said in regard to those portions of Lake Superior with which I am acquainted. The town of Meadford is one of the important fishing stations on the Georgian Bay, and I have information not only from the fishermen but from others who are conversant with this subject, regarding the necessities of the situation which, I think, it would be well to take into consideration. The first point is in regard to the size of the net mesh. I cannot say that we are troubled with the difficulty spoken of by the hon. member for Lambton, that is, the use of pound nets in the Georgian Bay—at least so far as I am aware ; but there is some trouble from the small size of the mesh. If my memory is correct I think they are four inches and a-half by regulation, but they are generally found to be only four inches and a quarter. The fishermen have a habit of boiling their nets in a solution of saponica, which causes them to contract until they are barely 4 inches ; this will catch very small fish, in fact whitefish and salmon trout are caught with this kind of a net, and the result is, this practice having been carried on for several years, that the Georgian Bay has become largely depleted of fish ; and whereas a few years ago the ordinary size of fish brought into Collingwood and Meaford weighed about four to four and a-half pounds, now they average from two pounds to two and a-half. Besides, the fishermen have to go further from the shore almost every year, and the fishing grounds which a few years ago were very remunerative, are now scarcely worth operating on account of the disappearance of these fish. Another practice that is detrimental to the fisheries, is that of collecting fish in the boats and when coming towards the shore the fishermen commence to clean those fish into a box and dump the offal into the lake. This is said to pollute the water and destroy the fish ; whether it is so or not I cannot say, but some say it does. Then, when the boat reaches the shore they hand over the last box full of offal to an establishment where soap is made, and represent to the agent at that particular locality that they brought to the shore all the offal that was collected during the time they were out. This practice is said to be very detrimental to the fish. Another point is that during the close season the spawning grounds, which are largely frequented by fish, are near the shore where the water is shallow, the fishermen set their nets, and the steamer plying in Georgian Bay for fishing protection is unable to reach them owing to shallowness of the water. They set those nets after dark and leave them until near daylight, when they put their fish into a waggon and take them to Owen Sound where they are kept in a freezer until the close season is over and then sold. Now, it is suggested that the use of freezers be prohibited during the close season. They have been used for years, and one of them had an existence even in the town of Owen Sound where the fishery inspector lives, and these operations are carried on without his knowledge. Therefore, it is suggested that these freezers be shut up, and then there will be no inducement for fishermen to fish during that season of the year, because they would be unable to put their fish on the market, and if they are not frozen they will spoil before the close season is over. In addition to that, it has been suggested that there should be a fishery overseer to look after the fishery inspectors. This overseer should possess magisterial authority to try cases in a summary way on the spot ; he might fine offenders and confiscate their nets. It has been suggested that when violators are convicted more than once, their fishing license should be withdrawn. This, it is thought by some, would be a remedy, and I believe it would. Now, these are some of the points in which the law is defective. I fully agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Lambton regarding the fishing laws on the other side over our own, which virtually bring the fisheries of our country under the control of American fishermen. Americans rent boats, or hire them for a comparative trifle, and they have nearly all the fishing boats on the Georgian Bay engaged in their employ to-day ; and those who still retain their own boats sell their fish to the Americans at whatever figure the latter are pleased to give, because the former can get no other market for them. The Americans have an advantage over them of a cent a pound on the fish in their own market. There is a firm in the town of Meaford, the Messrs. Mackintosh, who have been carrying on fishing in the Georgian Bay for a great many years, and they are so handicapped in the business that they are absolutely obliged to sell to the American fishermen, because they cannot compete with them. The price of fish is better on the American side, and the Americans who operate in the Georgian Bay, ship from Wiarton to Buffalo, or direct to Buffalo, and get the advantage of the enhanced price. To meet this difficulty, it has been suggested that there should be an export bounty on fish. I do not know whether this would be advisable or not, but if some means could be devised by which our Canadian fishermen could reap the advantages of their own fisheries, it seems very desirable that it should be done. The fishing industry is a very important one, and if we have not better protection for our fisheries, I believe that in a short time they will be almost destroyed, not only in the Georgian Bay but in Lake Superior, where the fishing is carried on. There is another practice which obtains largely during the close season, in the fall of the year, around Midland, that is the practice of catching whitefish and salmon trout, putting them in boxes and labelling them pike or black bass, and shipping them under that name. This, it is thought, could be prevented by closer inspection. The member for Lambton suggested that in view of the fact that the fishing interests were so important there, it would be as well that there should be a fish hatchery established at some point on Lake Huron. I may say that some years ago I applied to have a fish hatchery established somewhere in the East Riding of Grey, and I did so because I found that a large quantity of ova was collected for the fish hatcheries around here, including, I believe, the one at Ottawa and another at Newcastle. As this ova was carried from Meaford, I thought it would be the best place to have a fish hatchery established, because they would then only have a short distance to transport the ova, and when the fish fry were ready to put in the lake again, it would save the trouble of taking them so great a distance and leave them in a better condition. I think there ought to be a fish hatchery established somewhere in that vicinity. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, although he has always promised me that he would consider it, has never been able to see his way clear to establish a fish hatchery there up to the present time. I hope he will do so before long. I may say that the people in our section feel so strongly upon this question that not only have those who are engaged in the fishing interest taken it up, but the merchants in the various towns and the County Council have taken it up, and have memorialized the department regarding the necessary changes in the law. I have submitted those representations to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who very kindly informed me that he was about to introduce a measure that would deal with this subject, and that every attention would be given to the suggestions made in various quarters which would, as far as possible, cure the evils complained of. In view of the fact that this subject has come before the House at the present moment, I thought it due to my constituents that I should speak on this question and present their views to the Government.

Mr. EDGAR. There is one point that occurs to me which seems worthy of some attention, and which is one of very great importance in reference to the fish supply of the cities and towns of Ontario. Now, until I heard the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) speak, I was unable to account for a most extraordinary circumstance in connection with the fish supply for the city of Toronto. Some years ago it was quite possible to obtain daily the most delicious fresh whitefish, either from Lake Huron or from Lake Ontario; but for some years past it has been almost impossible to purchase in Toronto, from any dealer there at retail, any whitefish which are fit to eat. I have often complained about that matter and spoken to dealers in regard to it. The fish brought down from Lake Huron on ice and sold, are not like whitefish, but are like suckers, and are unfit for food. I can now understand, from the description which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has given the House of the mode of catching these fish, why this is so. Of course, if the fish are caught in gill nets and allowed to remain in the water dead some days and nights, they are unfit for human food when brought out and put on ice and sent to Toronto and other cities of Ontario. I do not think many subjects come before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of more importance than this one of the food supply of the large cities of the inland provinces, and if, as the hon. gentleman for Lambton (Mr. Lister) says, it is within his knowledge that this gill-net fishing is so productive of that result that large numbers of fish when taken out are unfit for food, having been dead for a long time; and if Mr. Wilmot has strongly reported against this system of gill-net fishing, as is alleged, I sincerely trust that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will take some steps to abolish it, so that the people of this country may again be proud, as they were formerly, of the delicious whitefish of our inland lakes. There was no fish of which we were more proud in Toronto than our whitefish, and we would tell strangers that we had fish better than salmon and even better than any fish that came from the sea in our whitefish. It is not once in ten times that a resident can now obtain whitefish fit to eat in Toronto. It is a very serious question and should be carefully considered in that light.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I think I understood the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) to say that there were too many fishing licenses granted on Lake Superior.

Mr. LISTER. Lake Huron.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I have only to say this in regard to pound-nets and gill-nets: Very many hon. gentlemen are not aware that there are inland waters where it is impossible to catch fish with pound-nets. The waters are too deep to fish with those nets, and consequently gill-nets must be used. Pound-nets are only used near the shore and in the bays of the great lakes. In Lake Superior, for instance, pound-nets cannot be used outside in deep water, and, therefore, gill-nets must be used. They float deep in the water, and it is the exception that fish are dead when taken out. During a few days in stormy weather fishermen are not able to visit their nets, and, consequently, some dead fish are found in them. I quite agree with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) in the recommendation for a fish hatchery on Lake Superior. Since I have been a member of this House I have brought the subject to the notice of the Minister of Marine, and I hope he will see his way clear to give us what we ask in that regard. With respect to the net, I think that if an universal mesh was used, at least in our district, it would be satisfactory to our fishermen. I was rather amused to hear the hon. member for Lambton speak of the recommendations fishermen make. My experience in the District of Algoma, where probably the greatest inland fishery in Canada exists, is that the fishermen, instead of wanting to have any of their privileges curtailed, want to fish all the year round, and the great difficulty in that district is to see that they do not commit illegal fishing. With regard to the fishing in Lake Superior—with Lake Huron and Georgian Bay I am not so familiar—the department to-day has one of the most efficient and energetic officers it could possibly obtain. The official who preceded him was changed some time last year, and the present overseer has undoubtedly shown himself to be a capable and energetic officer, and I think the department will find, after they have had some experience of the gentleman who now occupies the position, that it has made an excellent change. I will be sorry to see gill-nets done away with, because it would destroy the means of livelihood of many people on the shores of Lake Superior. In the lower lakes, which are more shallow, fishermen can use pound-nets where they can drive stakes into the mud bottom, but in Lake Superior, where the water is deep and the bottom is rocky, it is impossible to fish with pound-nets. So, I hope the Minister will take the matter into consideration and will consider the position in which we in the western part of Ontario are placed, and consider well before adopting the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton. I trust the Minister will find it in his heart, and the revenue of the country will permit him, to give us a fish hatchery on Lake Superior, because that is the largest fishing industry in the province.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to say a word or two in regard to a branch of the important subject brought up by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and that is the condition of the fish when they are put on the market. I have no doubt whatever, from the statements made in the report read from Mr. Wilmot, and also from what has been said by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), that these representations are perfectly correct. The fish when brought to land to be shipped by railway, by the large fish companies that purchase the fish, are often as regards many of them, I venture to say the bulk of them, hardly fit for human food. I do not speak of anything of which I do not know, because I see these fish brought down three or four times a week close to where I am living, and I often go with my boat alongside the tug when she is landing the fish, and ask for fresh fish. They are however so inferior in quality when brought down that I have given up purchasing them altogether in the warm weather. The fact is, the fish lie so long in the water in these gill-nets before they are taken out that they are often putrid, and a rough test is, I am told, employed in many cases as to whether the fish is a marketable one or not, and it is simply whether the man handling the fish can push his thumb through it. If the fish will stand that rough test, and if it is not such a fish that you can put your thumb through, it is considered reasonably good and it goes to the ice along with the others. A great many of these very inferior fish are salted, but, as the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has said, I believe it is almost impossible to get a really fresh fish in any city of this Dominion during the warm weather. It is exceedingly difficult to know what measures should be adopted to ameliorate this condition of things, but to talk about doing away with gill-nets altogether seems to me to be an impossible proposition. As my hon. friend beside me (Mr. O'Brien), and as my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Macdonell), have said, you can fish in deep waters, so far as I know, in no other way than with the gill-nets. You cannot fish with the seines and you cannot use pound-nets in deep water; and, therefore, it seems to me that we are obliged to allow the fishermen to use gill-nets; but I would very earnestly urge upon the Minister to turn his attention to that question, and to see what can be done in the way of improving this condition of things, for, as I have said, the fish put upon the market are often scarcely fit for human food. It is due to the Department of Marine and Fisheries that I should say that the department deserves very great credit for the efforts it has made to protect the fishing interests in the Georgian Bay. The work they have got to do is a very invidious work, it is a work in which they are very much opposed by the fishermen, and it is a work that I must, in all fairness, say the department has set itself to do well and thoroughly. I very much appreciate the fact that the department is this year supplying a much better vessel than the Cruiser to enforce the close season, and for the fisheries protection service in the Georgian Bay. The Cruiser was not such a vessel as she ought to have been; but, nevertheless, the department deserves credit for sending her there in the first place. And I am glad to find that as soon as it was found that the Cruiser did not do all that was expected of her, the department substituted for her a vessel which I believe will be thoroughly efficient for the service.

Mr. TUPPER. It is perhaps well that I should say a few words on this very interesting discussion which has taken place to-day in reference to important matters connected with the fisheries. I hope the discussion will result in some good to the fishermen. The subject is by no means a new one; the question in relation to these gill-nets and pound-nets, and the matter afterwards referred to in reference to the protection of the fisheries, are subjects which have been grappled with by the Department of Fisheries for a very long time. They have been considered at great length, and very full enquiries have been made into them year after year by the department. In the United States and in other countries we find that they are equally interested in the problems which have been put before the House to-day, and indeed in all countries the ingenuity of the fishermen has been extraordinary in devising better and more efficient means, not only for catching fish, but for evading the fishery laws also. Every hon. member in this House, particularly if he comes from a fishing district, knows well that if all our fishery officers were exemplary men, anxious to do their duty, and to do it without fear or favour, we would still by no means have a perfect record to show in regard to the protection of the fisheries. It is almost impossible, even in a much smaller country than this, and with much smaller waters to guard, to prevent poaching and evasion of the laws. That is particularly seen in the British Isles, where they have by no means the enormous difficulties to contend against that we have here. In Great Britain, with their coast guard service, and their very heavily-paid fishery staff, with officers at almost every point around these isles, if you take up the annual report of the fishery inspectors for England or Scotland or Ireland, you will find that notwithstanding that fine after fine has been imposed, and that boats and gear are destroyed almost without number, yet they annually deplore the great increase in the difficulty of enforcing the fishery laws. The truth is—and this is the greatest difficulty to contend against—that no matter how hon. gentlemen may speak in this Chamber in regard to the manner in which the law should be carried out, yet the sympathy of the community as a rule is all with the fishermen. They know that the fishermen have a hard life at the best—certainly on the coast this is true, and to a large extent also on the great lakes, as I am informed—and so much is that sympathy with the fishermen that in the event of a detection of the violation of the fishery regulations—and when an officer has incurred the ill-will often of his neighbours and former friends by catching the fisherman in the act of breaking the law—he brings him before a magistrate only to find that the sympathy of the community for the fisherman is represented in the breast of the magistrate, and a nominal fine, by no means deterrent, is imposed, and the same infraction of the law continually occurs. Now, then, all I would claim is, that admitting that in every district in Canada cases can be brought showing laxity on the part of our officers, and showing room for improvement, yet we have been accomplishing much in the past few years. While a great deal of the money spent on the protection of the fisheries is practically lost, because of the difficulties in the way of the officers, or the carelessness of the officers, who receive so small a reward for their services as fishery officers in general do receive, yet we have accomplished a great deal of good, as may be gathered from the annual report of the department. Take, for instance, the Georgian Bay, to which reference has been made. During a very short time the Cruiser—a boat by no means fitted for the work, as experience has shown—has destroyed miles of nets, and we have been enabled to do with that Cruiser what it was found impossible to do by the hired vessels previously. In former years these fishery officers, placed over a very large area, were in the habit of going to great expense in fitting up a special tug for a special trip, and the result was that an enormous bill was run up for camping outfits, &c., and not a poacher was caught. The men who were violating the law got the news in advance, and before the fishery officers could reach them the offenders had gone away. The Cruiser has to a great extent stopped that. It has not been stopped to the extent I should like, but certainly the log of that ship, during the short time she has been at work, has been very satisfactory; and I believe that of late there is evidence to prove that the effect of that has been wholesome; it has come to be understood in the district that it is not safe to violate the law. The hon. member for West Lambton spoke at considerable length with respect to gill-nets and pound-nets. That subject has been very extensively treated in the annual reports of the department. The hon. gentleman referred to the report of Mr. Charles Wilmot, who made a very careful enquiry into that subject, and whose report I have caused to be inserted in the annual report, in order that I might, if possible, obtain the very views which have been expressed to-day, and that the department might have the co-operation of the gentlemen representing the large and important districts interested in the solution of the question. Hon. gentlemen will see in the deputy's report to me a review of the suggestions of Mr. Wilmot; and it is not denied that there has been great destruction and loss of fish, both from gill-nets and pound-nets. The loss in the case of gill-nets is nearly always after a storm. If there has been rough weather, the gill-nets being placed, as they generally are, at great distances from shore, and the owners' boats not being able to reach them, the fish caught by the gills in these nets die, and become useless for any purpose; so that a great loss, of course, occurs—a loss not only of the fish, but of the spawn. It has also been found, in the case of pound-nets, that immature fish in great numbers have been taken. But there is some exaggeration on this score. While what the hon. gentleman says is true, that these fishing engines are dangerous, we must remember that the fisherman, on the other hand, claims that he has a right—and outside of our legislation he certainly has—to devise the best ways and means of accomplishing his object, that is, to catch the fish he desires to sell out of common waters in the most convenient and least expensive manner possible. We have to meet that spirit and deal with it, and no legislature hitherto has attempted to throw any difficulties in the way of fishermen, unless after the most careful and thorough enquiries it is discovered beyond all cavil that some restrictions are necessary. I speak with great diffidence of these inland waters. We have not the same difficulties to face on the sea coasts. The experience of some of the neighbouring states shows us that these land-locked waters, which were formerly full of fish, will, in course of time, become exhausted. It is entirely different on the sea coasts, because the deep-sea fish can almost defy, as they have done for many years, the ingenuity of man. The pound-net is a device that was invented in the United States for similar waters to those to which reference has been made to-day, and our fishermen naturally have adopted the means which have been so successful in the waters of the United States. One of the difficulties met with in dealing with this question, particularly in two of the large lakes to which reference has been made, Lakes Huron and Erie, is the claim that in the waters contiguous to the United States it would be unfair to unduly hamper in that respect Canadian fishermen, who have to compete with American fishermen a few miles distant; and while Americans allow all such devices, such as pound-nets and gill-nets, as will take the fish in the quickest possible manner, any greater restriction imposed upon the Canadian fisherman would result in more profit going to his American competitors. That is not altogether a tenable argument; but to some extent it has force, and the Government in that regard have endeavoured, unsuccessfully as yet, to ascertain whether it is not possible to have a joint action with those states bordering on the great lakes. The common danger concerned to those states as well as to Canada has been fully placed before the authorities of the United States, and I understand that a commission last year went fully into this subject, and that it is still engaging the attention of the state legislatures. I am told, however, that it is a very difficult thing, and history confirms the statement, to carry through those legislatures regulations interfering very much with the operations of the fishermen—the fishermen there, as in this country, exercising considerable influence and control over their parliamentary representatives. I was speaking of the want of sympathy which the department receives as a rule in the different localities. The hon. member for Lambton spoke of the sportsmen. They have a strong case in claiming that all regulations should be enforced; but one of the bitterest complaints made by the fishermen is that these regulations too often are made in the interest of sport, and interfere with the legitimate operations of fishermen, which are necessary to maintain life. These difficulties are appreciated and understood, and the first step which it seemed necessary to take was to ascertain whether we could secure joint action or co-operation on the part of the neighbouring states to make more perfect regulations. The report sets out the representation which has been made to the United States Administration through the different states, and I will not longer refer to that. This report, criticizing Mr. Wilmot's suggestions, says :

"He has, however not dealt with two aspects of the question, which must certainly enter largely into its consideration before a satisfactory conclusion can be reached. The first is that to adopt a system of pound-net fishing to the exclusion of gill-nets would throw the business of fishing into the hands of extensive operators and capitalists——"

The hon. member for West Lambton has inveighed to-day against a man of whom I know but little, Mr. Gauthier, who is an extensive operator, and who would no doubt benefit largely if these views were adopted.—

—"and as a result paralyse that branch of the industry carried on by means of gill-nets, and in which the aggregate capital invested amounts to a very large sum, beside throwing out of employment a considerable number of our population who now fish for a living by means of gill-nets."

Then the difference in opinion as to pound-nets and gill-nets is given. and it is stated that a well equipped pound-net with boat, new, ready to set, costs $1,000, while a fisherman can equip himself with a boat and a quantity of gill-nets for $500. Another important feature has been pointed out by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) who is so well able to speak with reference to Georgian Bay, and that is, that it would practically put a stop to their fishing altogether, as you require a certain bottom for the stationary engines known as the pound-nets. There they are staked and fixed, whereas with the gill-nets they can fish over any bottom, and, as a rule, they fish in deep water where the pound-net cannot be used at all. We also met with another difficulty mentioned in the report, appended to Mr. Wilmot's report, a difficulty, however, with which he deals very ably. That is the difficulty that the different overseers and such men as would certainly testify, if a commission were issued, hardly agree upon anything. That is the universal experience. Look at all the commissions in England which have been issued in late years and past times, and it is a remarkable fact that when they have gone to the fishing localities and asked the men of experience, who would be supposed to have studied the matter very thoroughly, it is found impossible to obtain from them any system or any line of action upon which they will all agree. Each fisherman has his own way and ideas, and, as a rule, it has been found almost impossible to obtain from them any definite opinion upon which legislation can be based. Take the history of lobster legislation on the coast. The regulations have the merit of being according to theoretical ideas in this regard. They follow on the lines of experienced officers who, in other countries, have dealt with the subject, but it was remarkable, under that commission, that it was impossible, not merely to obtain any general line of action supported by the fishermen themselves, but by men who have had the greater advantages of travel and education. I refer to the capitalists and the factories. They all disagreed as to what should be done. So we find the position is surrounded with difficulties. The discussion to-day will no doubt be of assistance to us in arriving at a proper conclusion. I have not yet had an opportunity of considering the results of the deliberations of the chief officers of the fishery districts who met here a short time ago to discuss such matters as these. The hon. member for Lambton alluded to the value of our fisheries, and it is encouraging to know, that notwithstanding these inventions and notwithstanding the ingenuity of the fishermen in finding out every year more accurately the haunts of the fish and the best means of catching them, the fisheries of Ontario are of almost untold wealth, and the value of the fish caught is increasing year by year, and that, notwithstanding the regulations that may be imposed by the country to the south of us, there is an enormous amount of money made out of our fish. With reference to the revenue, while it is large, because year after year the operations are extended and licenses increase, and, I may add, owing also to greater vigilance exercised and more fines imposed, the revenue collected is not collected with the mere object of obtaining a revenue. The hon. gentleman alluded by way of contrast to the much smaller revenue in the Maritime Provinces, where the expense is almost equally great, but I may mention this fact that the license system does not obtain in Nova Scotia, except in so far as it is necessary for the same purposes, as in the case of inland waters, with regard to trap-nets for mackerel and so on. There the fee is imposed, not for revenue purposes, but in order to prevent too many applications and applications not bonâ fide being made. The feeling in those districts is that the time is not yet come when we can impose any license on coast fisheries or the inshore fisheries, as restriction of fishing will not increase the number of fish annually visiting our shores. Their haunts are far off and unknown, and it by no means follows that if we are very careful in restricting fishing to certain licensed individuals, that those fish would not be taken by the different competitors from Newfoundland and the United States and elsewhere. Consequently the revenue is a mere bagatelle ; but, nevertheless, there is protection by the enforcement of the law with reference to rivers and inland streams, not so valuable as those west but covering considerable extent of territory. The department, I know, is in a position to be very adversely criticized, because this question is one which presents great difficulties, not merely in this country but in all other countries, owing to the desire, elsewhere as well as here, to interfere as little as possible with the fishermen, and to move cautiously with regard to this unknown science as to how far we should enforce prohibitory legislation. With reference to Lake St. Clair, as I have explained across the House, in answer to questions, I have continued the policy that I found in force when I took charge of the department. The wisdom of it is fairly open to criticism. We state in the report that an effort has been made not to increase these pound-nets. So far, I am not aware that I have infringed upon the rule. In referring to Lake St. Clair, it was shown that the licenses were not more than they were in 1885 ; and if I could enforce my my own wishes in that respect, I would restrict them to a considerable extent. The difficulty in dealing with that water is that the regulations are not enforced on the other side. The argument often addressed to me to permit fishing, even in the close season, there, is that no such season is observed on the other side. With reference to another very important subject, which would occupy a great deal of time, if it were thoroughly threshed out, and to which the Government has been giving considerable attention, as will be seen by reference to the report—that is the operation of one feature of the McKinley Bill—the object of that is, just as the hon. gentleman shows, the result will be to place the control of our inland fisheries, or a large portion of them, in the hands of the American dealer, and to take them out of the hands of the Canadian dealer, and I must confess that object has been, to a considerable extent, accomplished. The officer there alludes to certain facts. The hon. gentleman mentioned well-known facts regarding the Buffalo Fishing Company and their large operating fish concern, and he showed that they controlled the fisheries by mock bills of sale, mock leases and so on, whereby, for nominal consideration, they receive from the Canadian fisherman a transfer of his net. That enabled the American fish dealer to make his entry into the United States, and to show that these fish, though caught in Canadian waters, were caught in American nets. Under those circumstances, they go into the American market free. The hon. gentleman recommends as a remedy for that that no licenses should be granted unless the department is satisfied that the applicant can carry on the business himself, that he is a free and independent fisherman. On reflection, I think the hon. gentleman will see that it is hardly practicable. In the first place, the Canadian is a free and independent citizen, and, if he applies for a license, it is a rather invidious thing to tell him that he has to satisfy the department on that subject.

Mr. LISTER. In many instances, the American fisherman brings over his nets, but the license is taken out in the name of some one who never owned the nets at all.

Mr. TUPPER. That may be so; but that is not the information which I have. I have made a very large enquiry on that subject, and have ascertained from all the fishing points what the practice is, and our officers say that the almost universal practice is what I have stated. But, after this fisherman had taken the line which the hon. gentleman suggests, we would have no means of following that up, and of ascertaining or checking what he is doing after obtaining the license, and whether he is carrying on his business for himself or for anyone else. I have known these fishermen to come to Ottawa to make their objections, and I must say with great force. I admit the force of the contention on the other side, and it would, no doubt, be a good thing if we could keep the cream of the fisheries or the profit in our own country which the American dealer now takes from the Canadian dealer. But the fisherman says he has a right to give his labour to whom he pleases, and, if he were not, he would be entirely prevented from enjoying the benefit of the market for which those fish are intended. These fishermen have urged with great strength many reasons for allowing them to take care of themselves, and to deal, if they choose, with the American dealer, provided he will deal with them on better terms than a Canadian dealer, or to deal with a middleman, who can operate in the American market more advantageousiy than the Canadian fisherman, for the reason which the hon. gentleman has pointed out, that the Canadian is met with the duty while the American is not. Another member from the Province of Ontario who spoke evidently did not appreciate the point made by hon. gentlemen opposite or he would not have wondered why this fresh, delicious whitefish is not to be found in the markets of Ontario. In the province from which I come, where we are surrounded by magnificent fish, by codfish and halibut, and all those fish which are so much more delicate and substantial than even the so-much-praised whitefish, where enormous catches are made, where the vessels come in loaded down with these fish, still it is often difficult to get a fresh fish in the market. The fish are bought up by the exporters and the local trade has to take its chances. Thus the tendency being towards the export across the lakes from these western cities, and the men who come over with tugs, as we have heard, taking the fish to the other side, shows that the markets for those fish are other than those in the cities of Ontario. It is not that the fish are less. They are not less. On the contrary, the catch is increasing. Of course, there is worse luck in one year than in another, and the fishermen have to go here and there to catch their fish, as the season changes; but the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has shown that the catch has been increasing, and that the number of licenses granted to the fishermen has increased. I was pleased to observe the very natural and very healthy desire on the part of each representative of a fishing locality to have a fish hatchery established at once in this locality, and I can tell those hon. gentlemen that it is only owing to the modesty of other members of this House that we have not twenty or thirty more of such applications. For myself, not professing to have had enough experience to give my own opinion to the House, I can say—and it will be giving an unbiassed opinion—that I think the success in the fish hatcheries in the inland waters has been greater than in the neighbourhood of the sea coast. At all events, it is not so easily demonstrated that it has been successful when the fish may wander out to the great expanse of the Atlantic Ocean, as it is to specify the result in the land-locked waters of our inland seas. The evidence of that is the increased attention and the enlarged expenditure which have been made by the United States from year to year. I believe that Canada was the pioneer in the establishment of fish hatcheries, and yet, while our expenditure here is a mere bagatelle, only $35,000 for all these great seas, we find that the United States Congress spend half a million a year on the fish hatcheries, in addition to more than $300,000 spent by the different States of the Union, and the results in many of the States have been enormous. We are handicapped in our operations by the small scale upon which our operations are conducted. It seems to be the almost universal testimony that, in order to succeed in the artificial breeding of fish, the contributions of fry to the different waters each year should be on an exceedingly large scale, or it would be better not to have them at all. The one difficulty in meeting all these requests has been hinted at by one hon. gentleman, and that is the question of money. That question, of course, has met the Fisheries Department in more places than one, but the compliance with these demands for fish hatcheries would require a very large expenditure. The day may come when Parliament may take a larger view of such subjects and may consider that the Government would be justified in extending a system which, though it has been tried on a small scale and in a few places, has fully justified the expenditure and the attention given to it. There is another question of a personal nature to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. He referred to the neglect on the part of some of the fishery officers. I have taken stern measures with many of them, and sometimes they have seemed almost too stern. But every one knows that there are cases where officers receiving a mere nominal sum do not deem it worth while to incur all the risks that an officer must incur in carrying out the fishery laws. The hon. gentleman mentioned one of the fishery officers. Well, the department learned that that officer had been disregarding the responsibilities of his office and had broken the law himself, and had been fined: as soon as those facts were officially reported and substantiated, the services of the officer were immediately dispensed with. With regard to the proprietor himself, Mr. Gauthier, all that I can say is, that the matter is not closed. As soon as the facts were represented to me that this gentleman, having a license to fish in our waters, had so utterly disregarded the rules and regulations of the department as to set his pound-nets across the Spanish River, for which no authority had been given whatever, we took the regular steps to ascertain immediately whether the representations were true, with the intention of cancelling at once all his rights; and hon. gentlemen do not desire that any other course should be adopted in such a case. At present, the defence alleged is that Mr. Chamberlin, formerly the foreman, and perhaps now foreman of Mr. Gauthier, had done this without his sanction and without his knowledge, and an enquiry is now being proceeded with to ascertain the correctness of the statement as to whether this man did or did not have the sanction of his employer. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we shall insist that the officers do their duty, and I will be only too glad to receive from him any information he has in such cases, and will act upon it. I may say that lately we have found, in dealing with this question to which reference has been made, that it is a very useful thing to take one official out of his district, altogether, and send him suddenly into another district, and vice versa. The same reasons that would induce one official not to act would not exist in a case of another official. On several occasions I have tried that plan with success, although we keep each officer in his own district, as a rule, and give him power as a justice of the peace over a large extent of territory, his own particular district being defined in the departmental instructions. Cases have occurred in Georgian Bay where this plan has stopped effectively, for a time, that species of abuse to which allusion was made, where fishermen have concealed certain fish in boxes and have sold them under other names. The hon. gentleman will pardon me if I mention, before sitting down, another difficulty which concerns the Fishery Department to-day. As everyone knows, in order to protect our waters, which are of such an enormous extent, we require, not merely the staff that we have, but a staff and an expenditure that this country could not afford. Indeed, no country, apparently, has yet found itself able to patrol and guard thoroughly its own waters in the right season, so as to prevent violations of the fishery regulations. However, I will take note of the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman to-day, and the spirit that has prompted him to make them, and I hope that we will be able to carry out his suggestions, so as to render these fishing apparata as little harmful as possible, consistent with the public interest, and that great vigilance will be shown in the districts referred to for the protection of the fisheries.

ADJOURNMENT FOR DOMINION DAY.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to refer briefly to a matter which is causing considerable anxiety, not only in the House, but out of it—that is, as to whether this House should sit to-morrow or not. I have just received the following telegram from Belleville :—

"Will the House be in session to-morrow? Please answer Belleville station immediately.

"H. CORBY."

I find there are some members present who, in case the House does not sit to-morrow, wish to leave by the 10.45 train this evening. On Thursday last, when the Minister of Public Works moved that when the House adjourned it should stand adjourned until Tuesday at three o'clock, there was more than one suggestion that the House should stand adjourned until Thursday. Several objected to that, and I made a few remarks, stating that I thought it was due to the people of the Maritime Provinces and the North-West that the House should sit on Tuesday, and if necessary on Wednesday. But to-day many members are representing that as to-morrow is private members' day, and but little business of importance can be done, the House had better not sit to-morrow, and I know there is a general feeling to that effect on this side of the House; and I have also heard the same opinion expressed by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I think the matter had better be finally settled now, so that if the House does not sit to-morrow those who wish to leave on the 10.45 train this evening may do so.

Mr. KAULBACH. It was very kind on the part of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), on Thursday last, to take the interest he did in his friends from the Maritime Provinces and British Columbia, or those representing constituencies by the sea, to propose that this House sit for the dispatch of business to-morrow (Dominion Day), feeling, as was very true, that they had a desire to dispatch the work of the session, and get to their respective homes as early as possible. It having been acknowledged and concurred in at the time by an hon. member from British Columbia, caused me to be silent, although I did not approve of it, and was not in accord. Hearing considerable dissatisfaction expressed since, by various members of this House, I felt that this matter ought to be brought up for reconsideration, and I am very glad indeed that my hon. friend has done so. There are many reasons why we should observe Dominion Day, when we consider the many benefits, since 1867, the British North America Act conferred upon this fair Dominion of ours. The most potent is for the respect and high esteem in which we held our grand old chieftain, who was the father of Confederation, and whose death we all so deeply deplore, and who, were he with us, would recognize this Dominion Day as our great national holiday, and assist in doing honour to it in every particular. I think, as members of this House, we should be the very first to set the example in observing the day. Therefore, I propose that we do not sit to-morrow for the despatch of business, but that we adjourn until Thursday next, and make to-morrow a gala day as far as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If there was any intention at all of keeping Dominion Day as a holiday it is most unfortunate that it was not decided long ago. A large number of members have returned at great personal inconveniece to be present here to-day, and to assist in carrying on the business of the country. Now, if we make to-morrow a holiday, not merely will to-day be practically thrown away, but to-morrow will be practically thrown away, and a great part of Thursday as well, and you might almost as well sacrifice this whole week. More than that, a very important committee has been summoned for to-morrow in consequence of their being unable to sit to-day. There, again, there will be a serious loss of time, and I must say for my part that under the circumstances I think, after the decision of the Government to the effect that they would sit to-morrow, it would be a very unfortunate thing if they should be induced now to alter their determination.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When this matter was before the House on Tuesday last it was discussed with a view to adjourning to Tuesday or Thursday of this week, and the expression of opinion was that we might adjourn until 3 o'clock on Tuesday, as was done, and the other days might be used as ordinary days for the business of Parliament; but I must say that since that was done, and during to-day especially, a great many members who were disposed to say that Dominion Day might be used for the business of the House, have expressed a different opinion. They hold that to-morrow should be observed as Dominion Day, not because if the House sat hon. members could pass a few notices of motion or matters of that kind, but because it is Dominion Day. A very large number of members have expressed the opinion that, after well considering the matter, they believe, although inconvenience may be caused to some hon. members who have been compelled to remain here, they should observe Dominion Day as it will be observed all over the Dominion. The Government were of the opinion that we should observe it if possible, but seeing that members of the House thought otherwise they did not object; but seeing the feeling that now prevails in the other direction, that we should not sit to-morrow, but observe it as Dominion Day, a day set apart to celebrate our political state as a Dominion, the Government are willing to accede to it. Under the circumstances, and as it was recommended that we should sit on Saturday to make up the loss of Wednesday, I think the House should observe to-morrow as Dominion Day, and the Government are ready to do so, and do it with great pleasure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the House has been deceived by the course taken by the Government. There are many hon. gentlemen on this side who live at a distance from here, and if they had been aware that the intention of the Government was not to sit to-morrow they would have opposed sitting to-day. I was anxious to go to London, but I could not go on a single holiday, and there are many members living at a distance who are in a similar position. Why were we brought here to-day if the intention was to make to-morrow a holiday. When the Ministers spoke about a meeting on Tuesday every hon. gentleman thought it was a choice between Tuesday and Thursday. No one for a moment supposed that to-morrow was to be taken as a holiday if we were to meet to-day. If hon. gentlemen feel strongly as to keeping the day as a holiday, and serving their country better outside of the House by attending sports elsewhere than by working here in the public interests, they should have expressed their opinion when the matter was under discussion. There is a fair prospect that under any circumstances we are likely to be here into August, and hon. gentlemen opposite apparently wish us to remain here until September. I may say for myself that I am opposed to making to-morrow a holiday. I suppose that our Roman Catholic friends regarded yesterday as a day of religious observance, or I would have been in favour of sitting yesterday. But to take more holidays than are absolutely necessary in the state of the public business is a monstrous proceeding. We should have been called together in February last, but instead Parliament was dissolved and we were sent to the country. We were called here at the most inconvenient season of the year, at a season when every man's private business requires his attention. We have been called on to make great personal sacrifices at this season for the purpose of promoting the political interests of hon. gentlemen opposite; and now, after stating last week that we were to meet on Tuesday and continue to sit during the week, it is proposed to change that decision; but the proper time to consider it was when the subject was under discussion before.

Mr. MASSON. I am surprised that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should object to to-morrow being observed as a holiday. I am very much surprised that any loyal Canadian should object to that day being a holiday. It is declared to be a statutory holiday all over the country, and it would be strange indeed that this House of Commons should override the statute in that respect and declare that day should not be a holiday when all over the Dominion it would be so kept. When the discussion took place as to the adjournment from Friday till Tuesday or Thursday objection was raised to the two days, and I do not think there were many members deceived. If the hon. member for Bothwell was deceived it was certainly not by anything said by the Minister of Finance or of any member of the Government stating there would be a sitting on Wednesday. Some hon. members suggested that the House should sit on Monday as well as Wednesday, and all this was due to the anxiety expressed by hon. members from a distance to hurry through the business. But as to the importance of sitting to-morrow in order to hurry through business, how much will business be advanced? Some private Bills will be advanced a stage or two and nothing more will be done. The business of the House will not be brought to a close one hour sooner by sitting to-morrow, and it is not only the consensus of opinion in the House but in the country at large that Dominion Day should be observed as a holiday.

Mr. FRASER. I trust that what was understood and acted upon when we parted on Friday will be carried out. I was very much struck by a remark made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who said he knew of no better way of honouring the day than by members sitting here and transacting public business. The hon. gentleman who spoke last seemed to think there was no understanding, or that nothing of this kind had been said. Either the hon. gentleman's memory must be defective or his loyalty must have carried him away. I am as loyal as any man, and I am ready to come here and work to-morrow, for I am far from home, while some hon. gentlemen can go home almost daily. It is very well for hon. gentlemen who can leave here at half-past ten at night and be home to-morrow with their friends, to observe the day there, but when members come hundreds of miles, and when the weather is not that of February, they are entitled to some little consideration. There is no reason why we should not sit to-morrow and do good work, and if hon. members wish to go home they can do so, and there will be a sufficient number left to transact public business. I, for my part, will see that I give no adverse vote to the Government which would prevent them from carrying on the business expeditiously. The proposition made by the leader of the House to-night shows a very vacillating policy, and I am much surprised at it. It was distinctly understood and stated by the Minister the other night that we should meet on Tuesday and continue to sit Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and had it not been for that understanding there are gentlemen here who would have gone home until Thursday, and it is not fair to them that a further loss of time should be proposed now. In the first place, the session is so late that we should meet here to do work, and in the second place it would be a breach of faith with the members of this House who accepted the statement of the leader of the Government that we should sit to-morrow. I shall vote that we meet to-morrow, because if we do not it is quite clear that very little business will be done this week.

Mr. MULOCK. The reason assigned by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) that we should adjourn over to-morrow is one that has evidently come to his mind since the discussion of a few days ago. He now rests a claim for the observance of Dominion Day as a holiday on the grounds of loyalty, but I will point out that in 1885 the Government did not deem it disloyal to sit on the 1st of July. The hon. member was in the House at that time. If he took part in the duties of the House on Dominion Day as a further proof that loyalty was not much in these days I may state that in 1885 the Government which sat on the 1st July did not sit on the 4th July, and now we find them in 1891 saying that it would be disloyal to sit on the 1st July. I think we had better argue the question from the standpoint of our duties to the public and our duties to ourselves. I would like to call the attention of the Government to the fact that there are only two days in the week now for private members, and if the House does not sit on Wednesday does the Government propose to give Saturday as a private members' day?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). On Thursday last a number of members wished to have an adjournment until next Thursday, in order that we might have an opportuity of returning to our homes, but many members on the other side of the House stated they were willing to come here to-day at three o'clock and continue on working all the week, Saturday included. The members who wished to get home yielded to the sentiment of the House at that time, and we have been kept here doing nothing since then in order to allow those who live nearer Ottawa to make a visit home. These gentlemen are now much more loyal than they were last week; and I would like to know when they got their loyalty. They knew last Thursday that to-morrow was Dominion Day, and surely they were as loyal then as they are now. The leader of the House then told us distinctly that the House would meet to-day and sit each day during the week, and it is a gross breach of faith with us if the proposition is now carried out that the House shall not sit to-morrow. I hope the Government will have sufficient firmness and stability to maintain the position which they took with regard to this matter, and that they will not go back on the distinct and positive statement they made to the House that we should sit from Tuesday during the remainder of the week, Saturday included.

Mr. KENNY. There is a very general opinion and a very natural desire on the part of the members of this House that the business of Parliament should proceed with all the dispatch which is consistent with the faithful and intelligent discharge of the duties which the people sent us here to perform. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred very feelingly to the members who live at a distance, and I desire to say, as one of the members of this House who live at a much greater distance from the capital than the hon. member for Bothwell, that on many previous occasions when short adjournments had been suggested I know that the members from the Maritime Provinces and from the distant western sections of the country have not objected to these adjournments, because it enabled their colleagues who live nearer to Ottawa to spend a few days at their own homes. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), during the course of the remarks he has just made, has stated that if we adjourn for to-morrow it will enable the gentlemen who live within easy access of Ottawa to go home and spend the great Canadian festival with their families. I do not think it would be possible to find a better argument in favour of adjournment than that which is given by my hon. friend. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) also tells us that we shall be here until some date in August, and if that is the case there is no great pressure of public business to-morrow, because it will be a private members' day; and, as has been remarked once before during this discussion, the prorogation of Parliament will not be expedited by one hour by us sitting to-morrow. As one of those members who live at a distance from Ottawa—a much greater distance than the hon. member from Bothwell does—and as one of those members who may have suffered by these frequent adjournments as well, it is my opinion that as this public holiday was made and proclaimed by the Parliament of Canada, as it will be observed as a holiday from Halifax on the Atlantic to Vancouver on the Pacific, as every Custom-house and post office will be closed, and as every civil servant connected with the public service will have his holiday. I think that we, the House of Commons of Canada, should also keep Dominion Day as a holiday. The senior branch of the legislature has in this respect shown us a very good example by adjourning over Dominion Day. With all deference to hon. gentlemen opposite, and though quite as anxious as any hon. gentleman who sits on that side of the House to get through the business, at the same time I think we should recognize and observe our great national holiday, and not sit to-morrow.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the statement made by the hon. Minister of Public Works has been misunderstood. In the report of June 24 it is stated:

"Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government have considered the fact that there are two holidays next week, and we believe that if we took Saturday of next week, thus having Tuesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, then the two holidays would not deprive Parliament of more than one day's work. Therefore, when the House adjourns on Friday we shall ask the House to adjourn until Tuesday at three o'clock, and then sit during the remainder of the week, except on Wednesday, which is Dominion Day."

I think it is quite clear from this that the intention stated by the hon. Minister was that we should have to-morrow as a public holiday. But in view of the announcement made by the hon. member for Bothwell that we are going to sit here during the whole of July and the greater part of August, I think we can afford to take a holiday now and then, and I believe it will be satisfactory to this House and the country that we should observe to-morrow as a public holiday.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman who has just spoken professes to read the conclusion to which the Government came on 24th June; but the hon. gentleman dealt with the House rather disingenuously, because he read the first statement made by the leader of the House before the discussion took place. But in that discussion the sense of the House was so manifestly against the suggestion of the Minister that he distinctly retracted his first statement, and at the close wound up in these words:

"I think the hon. gentleman may not have understood what I said. From the feelings expressed it appears that the House should, when it adjourns on Friday, stand adjourned until Tuesday at three o'clock, and then sit all next week."

That was very clear; every hon. gentleman understood the determination come to; no one protested at the time, and the members who come from the Maritime Provinces made their arrangements consistent with the understanding that they should stay here and discharge their public duties. There are some of us who would have given a good deal to be able to go and carry out business appointments which we had made; but in consideration of the late period of the session, the enormous amount of work to be done and the necessity of coming to a speedy prorogation, we waived our private views and desires and consented to meet here on Tuesday, on condition that we should sit all week and make up the lost time on Monday. If we go on debating as we have been doing to-night we shall make our loyalty somewhat of a burlesque. To say that a man who goes to a lacrosse match is a loyal subject, while one who attends to his public duties is disloyal, is a strange test of a man's loyalty. The late Prime Minister made it a test of our loyalty to sit on Dominion Day and attend to our public duties, and hon. gentlemen will consider his views as something of a test. We shall be dealing with the country in the most loyal way by staying here and attempting to discharge our public duties. I have heard the argument used many times that by adjourning over for a day we shall not lose any time. That may be believed by the younger members; but it will not be believed by those who have been here for a number of years. Some hon. members in this House make their attendance in Parliament a pleasant interlude in the week. They come late in the afternoon of Monday or on Tuesday morning, and leave on the 4 o'clock train on Friday, and then they think they have discharged their duties. The consequence is that the session is prolonged for three or four weeks more than it ought to be. And as for the meetings of this important committee, hon. gentlemen know well that owing to our not being able to get a quorum we have not done in two or three weeks more than ought to have been done in as many days; and if this adjournment takes place there will be not only no meeting of the committee to-morrow, but hon. gentlemen know that it will be impossible to get a quorum on Thursday morning. Possibly you may get one on Friday, and then some hon. gentlemen will go off on Friday afternoon for their usual holiday jaunt over Saturday, Sunday and Monday, returning possibly in time for the sitting on Tuesday morning. This thing is getting beyond bearing to the members from the Maritime Provinces, British Columbia and the North-West, who are compelled to stay here all the time. I think we have been rather long-suffering in this matter. We do not wish to object to reasonable adjournments, but the thing is being carried too far, and our good nature is being imposed upon.

Mr. DENISON. The hon. gentleman has referred to what took place on the 24th of June. By reference to the report for the 26th of June it will be found that Sir Hector Langevin moved:

"That when this House adjourns to-day it stands adjourned till Tuesday next at three o'clock in the afternoon."

Showing that there was no intention to adjourn over till Thursday; but there being no remark made by the hon. Minister of Public Works in regard to meeting on Wednesday, the inference is that we were not to meet on Wednesday.

Mr. McNEILL. I think my hon. friend who addressed the House the last but one will agree that there are few members in this House who desire to get home more than I should; there are very apparent reasons for that; and I must say that, actuated by that motive more than by the desire for business, I was very glad when I heard that the House was going to sit to-morrow. But on thinking the matter over, I must say that there is a very great deal to be said for the view that it is scarcely the thing for the Commons of Canada to set the example of ignoring the national holiday. If we have done it once before I think that is the very strongest reason why we should not do it again.

Mr. MULOCK. Why?

Mr. McNEILL. Because we are simply making a habit of it. If there were some exceptional reason why we should sit we might do it; but if we continued to sit on Dominion Day I think it would be a most unfortunate thing.

Mr. MARA. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Toronto has said, I certainly was under the impression that an agreement was entered into by both sides of the House that the House on meeting to-day should sit every day during the week, including Saturday. Now, I will not yield in my loyalty, either to the Dominion or the Empire, to any man in this House, but I do not think I would sacrifice either by sitting to-morrow. Let us bear in mind that this is an exceptional session. Circumstances over which we have no control have lengthened it, and the least hon. members living in the vicinity of Ottawa should do is to see that we should sit every day, and not take holidays simply because they are thereby afforded an opportunity of going to their homes. We ought to bear in mind that this is not a matter of sentiment. It is not, so far as British Columbia is concerned or the Maritime Provinces. The members from these provinces cannot go home. We had this session to leave our homes in the middle of April, and, in all probability, we will have to remain here until the middle of August. The time has arrived when the House should take some method of dealing with holidays, and not have so many statutory holidays. If a holiday comes on Tuesday there is no session on Monday, simply because members cannot go home and return, and thus two days are lost for nearly every holiday. There is also too much time wasted in this House. We had the whole of this afternoon taken up by an hon. gentleman in dealing with statements he had made in this House six sessions ago. I do not think that our time should be wasted in this way, and I am of opinion that we ought to sit, not only to-morrow, but every Saturday until the House rises.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in explanation of the vote I gave the other night on the amendment of the Finance Minister to the motion of Mr. Jamieson. I find that it has been assumed that in supporting the amendment I voted against a reference to the people. That is a strange misconception, for I had not only voted but spoken in favour of a reference to the people that evening. I am still, as I have always been, in favour of referring this question to the people, and although I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet I venture to say that this question will eventually be disposed of in that way. It is, however, I think, quite right that before the question is submitted to a popular vote the electors should be placed in possession (to the fullest extent possible) of information calculated to assist them in arriving at a sound conclusion on the subject. I cannot doubt that the investigations of the commission that is to be appointed will result in placing before the public a body of most important facts, which will be of great service in enabling men to make up their minds as to the merits of the question. And I would, therefore, have supported the amendment of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance unhesitatingly, but for one consideration, and this was that I had promised my temperance friends to support a resolution for immediate reference to the people. This pledge I felt I must keep, even though on reflection I was convinced that the wisest course would be to have the report of the commission published for the information of the people before the vote was taken. I could vote for a reference to the people and also for the commission. But I could not vote for the commission and the immediate reference consistently. But when Mr. Jamieson, as the mouthpiece of the temperance party, rose in his place and told us emphatically that he was instructed by the Dominion Alliance to say that they were opposed to a reference to the popular vote I felt that I was thereby formally absolved from any pledge as to reference I had given; that my statement as to immediate reference was no longer binding and that I was quite free to follow my own inclination and vote for the commission. But I hold my own views as to the advisability of a reference to the people as strongly as ever I did, and will always be prepared to support such a policy.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is rather transgressing the rule. This is a question of personal explanation, which should be made on the Orders of the Day being called, and can hardly be made on a motion to go into Committee.

Mr. McNEILL. I bow to your decision.

Mr. WATSON. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has paid very close attention to the debates to-night, and, no doubt, will act on some of the suggestions that have been made. I wish to call his attention to a regulation made recently, based on the report of Mr. Wilmot, who was sent to Lake Winnipeg to investigate and report as to the state of the fisheries in this lake. The department have seen fit to restrict companies licenses for commercial purposes to fishing within certain waters. I find that commercial licenses are granted to fishing companies for the purpose of exporting fish, and then there are domestic licenses granted the Indian and settlers to fish for domestic purposes. I claim that the people who catch fish under the domestic licenses should be allowed to export the fish, as well as the large companies. Last year the Indians and half-breeds and some of the settlers caught fish which they sold for export, about half whitefish and the balance pike and pickerel, and the sales amounted to some $25,000. These fish were caught in the winter time after the ice was formed; but, under the new regulations, it is proposed not to grant any except to companies who are able to invest large sums in building ice-houses to preserve the fish and to fish in deep waters. I hope the hon. Minister will see fit to allow the people who catch fish under these domestic licenses the same privileges with regard to export for all the fish they can catch under the ice as foreign companies.

Motion agreed to; and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Auditor General's office—Additional amount to cover outlay for clerical assistance (Governor General's warrant) $1,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In connection with this, probably the Minister of Justice would now be in a position to state what conclusion the Government have arrived at as to the matter to which I called the Minister's attention some time ago, as to restoring the power inadvertently taken away from the Auditor General in the compilation of the statutes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A Bill will be introduced in a few days to restore the Act to its former position.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is time to call attention to the abuse in obtaining money on Governor General's warrants. The statute authorizing the issue of Governor General's warrants lays down certain expressed conditions, and there is a laxity growing up in regard to the issuing of those warrants. I very much doubt if all the warrants issued this year are within the spirit of the Act. I am quite aware that last session a number of warrants were obtained in disregard of the Act. The subject had been discussed in Parliament, and, instead of the discussion doing any good, it seems to have resulted in larger warrants being issued this year than were issued last. There can be scarcely any greater violation of the privileges of the people, especially on the eve of Parliament, than the issue of Governor General's warrants, unless they are for purposes which are undoubtedly within the spirit of the Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I entirely concur with the observations made by the hon. gentleman. There is no doubt that the practice which has grown up is wholly at variance with the provisions of the Act. The Governor General's warrants ought never to be made use of, except upon some extraordinary emergency, which could not have been foreseen. I see that a large portion of these Estimates have been provided for by Governor General's warrants. Take, for instance, the fortification of St. John's Gate, Quebec. Was there any unforeseen injury occurring to the wall? Was it blown up, or was it only the ordinary decay?

Mr. FOSTER. Would it not be better to discuss these items as they occur, instead of running through the whole of the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not running through the whole of the Supplementary Estimates, except to illustrate the point I am making. The law authorizes the Governor General's warrants to be used in certain cases. Those are altogether different from the cases in which it has been used here. The hon. gentleman has used the Governor General's warrant to make expenditures which should not have been made, except upon an appropriation asked for in the House. I have looked over the whole of these Supplementary Estimates, and I am referring to these instances in order to show that these items do not at all fall within the rule laid down in the statute for the issue of Governor General's warrants.

Mr. FOSTER. This item I think does fall within that rule. Mr. Martin, a clerk in the office of the Auditor General, resigned his position, and that was entirely unforeseen by the Governor General or the members of the Government. The work had to be done, the salary voted for Mr. Martin was not available, and this extra work had to be paid for. I think there was nothing irregular in that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think my hon. friend will see that it would be better to have put this under the head of "Unforeseen Expenses." I think we vote something like $50,000 for "unforeseen expenses," and I think this amount should rather have gone under that head than have been paid by a Governor General's warrant. I do not think the amount voted for "unforeseen expenses" has been expended.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the vote was so large as $50,000. I think it was about $20,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would rather see a vote of $50,000, as it formerly was, and see it used for these small contingencies that must arise, than I would see the Governor General's warrant used for such purposes. There is no doubt that the power to issue Governor General's warrants has been abused.

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Government, and of the Minister of Justice particularly, to this fact: This item is included with a number of others in a statement brought down to the House of the Governor General's warrants and expenditures thereon, in accordance with the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Acts. The item in question is one included in this statement, and it appears that warrants have been issued to the amount of $1,310,876.38. Those warrants could only be properly issued if there was an urgent demand for the expenditure, and that the urgency was one which, in the public interest, was so strong, that the Government could not wait until Parliament met, that it was an unforeseen demand upon the exchequer, and that the other conditions which the statute lays down were complied with. We find, however, that only $750,000 of the amount granted under these warrants was spent, so that nearly $600,000 in excess of what was required was authorized by Governor General's warrants. We want no better proof than that of the laxity with which this power is now used. The Governor General is induced to sanction expenditure to that amount, and yet the expenditure was not wanted, it was not urgent, it was not necessary in the public interest to the extent of nearly three-quarters of a million dollars. I think that if this evil—for it has become an evil now, a perversion of the powers vested in the Government by the statute—if this evil is perpetuated it will have to receive, I think, more emphatic attention than a mere discussion in Supply, which is all it is likely to receive this session.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will just read the section relating to the use of the Governor's warrant:

"If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General, for the issue of the amount estimated to be required, which shall be placed by the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General to a special account, against which cheques may issue from time to time, in the usual form, as they are required."

Now, I think it is perfectly clear from that provision that the hon. gentleman has used the Governor's warrant where it was not warranted by the statute.

Mr. FOSTER. That is covered by the provision for unforeseen requirements.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is clearly the idea that is provided for by contingencies. The hon. gentleman is using the Governor's warrant for purposes that never were contemplated by the law.

Mr. FOSTER. That could not be covered by contingencies, because there was not contingencies enough for the purpose. Contingencies were voted last year on the estimate of the Auditor General for what he thought he would require, taking into account the permanent clerks that we had. In the course of the year one of the permanent clerks resigned, and in his place the services of this clerk were required. The circumstance was unforeseen and it had to be met, and I think it is fully covered by the wording of the statute.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If there is an appropriation made for the office which the clerk holds for twelve months, and he resigns before the time is up, the balance of his salary, of course, reverts to the Government, and may be used to pay his successor.

Department of Fisheries—Further amount required for contingencies.....$800

Mr. FLINT. Will the Minister explain this item?

Mr. TUPPER. This $800 is made up largely of items for the printing of the Herring Report; also, by the cable correspondence in connection, both with Behring Sea and Newfoundland matters, for which we had no vote.

Department of Justice—Further amount required for contingencies.....$3,000

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This sum is to make up the usual amount which has been required for contingencies in my department. In previous years the whole sum has been provided out of the general vote for contingencies, which we were allowed to draw upon as long as the whole sum is not exceeded. But last year the practice was adopted of having a specified sum for each department, and, in consequence, I am obliged to ask for this amount.

Department of Indian Affairs—Further amount required for contingencies..$2,000

Mr. DEWDNEY. There were some unexpected travelling expenses that were not provided for. It is very difficult to control contingent expenses in Indian affairs. The field extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This year contingent expenses have been almost one-half less than they were the year before, but we want $2,000 to make up extra expenses which we were forced to provide for.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of the Interior contends that the contingencies in his department are much less than they formerly were; but I would remind him that the expenses of the Department of Indian Affairs are increasing very rapidly. If the Minister will compare the cost of the administration of Indian affairs now with the cost five years ago I am sure he would be surprised at the tremendous increase of expenditure. The expenditure is many thousand dollars over what was quite sufficient five years ago. In this department the management of Indian affairs in the city of Ottawa is becoming onerous. I am not able to say that it is unnecessarily large, for I have not that knowledge of details that would warrant me in making that statement, except by comparison: but taking the expenditure of earlier years as evidence, I think there has been an increase of late years that is not warranted by the circumstances. The Minister refers to travelling expenses. On that point I would say that I have had occasion to look into the allowances made for some of his officers in connection with travelling expenses, and they are on an extremely liberal scale. Inasmuch as part of these expenses is charged to the Indian fund, I think that Parliament is specially bound to be careful and watchful, and see that there is no waste in the slightest degree of the trust fund belonging to the Indians. I had occasion to move for a return upon this subject a short time ago, and I have it in my hand now—an account showing the allowances made by the Minister or his predecessor, in 1885, for the travelling expenses, such as he refers to, of one of his agents, a Mr. Dingman. I would mention to the hon. gentleman that the amounts charged were for sums amounting to three times the actual disbursements made by the officer. I say that the return which I hold in my hand, giving in details moneys paid to one of the hon. gentleman's officers for an investigation made by him, contains items paid by the department, a portion of which I presume were charged to the Indian fund, as the Minister stated in answer to a question put to him during this session, to an officer who conducted the investigation held in the village of Sutton, amounting to three times the actual disbursements made by that officer.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think the return shows the amount paid for the work. Mr. Dingman had to visit the township of Sutton on three or four occasions, owing to the illness of the Indian agent, the complaint against whom he was investigating. The amount which the inspector received was the regular allowance provided by Order in Council, and which every officer receives when he is away from headquarters on duty. What his expenditure was I have no means of knowing; but I am quite sure he received only that to which he is entitled, because if he had claimed any more the Auditor General would not have paid him. In regard to the general question as regards the expenditure of the department, I admit the expenditure has increased considerably during the last six or eight years. In 1882 the staff at headquarters was composed of the Deputy Minister and 19 clerks; in 1890 it was composed of the Deputy Minister and 35 clerks; but a technical branch has been added since 1882, consisting of two or three surveyors, who are kept constantly busy. The Indian fund has increased by $331,000; the business of the department has increased over 100 per cent.; the volume of business passing through the accountant's branch, judging by the number of payments made, increased during those years about 400 per cent.; while the correspondence of the department, as shown by the letters, increased 100 per cent. Consequently, hon. members must see that although our staff has increased the business has increased in a far greater ratio.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think so.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to make a suggestion with a view to meet the necessities of public business? Some three or four days ago, when speaking about public business, I pointed out the necessity of passing these Supplementary Estimates so as to make payments for work already done and debts already incurred—services which have been fully rendered and which ought to be paid; and if we enter during the consideration of one item of these Estimates into a review of the Indian Department, and when we come to another item review another department, we will make no progress. It is very important we should pass these Supplementary Estimates, and that they, with those items of the Estimates we have already passed, for Civil Government and Legislation, should be embodied in the form of a Bill, and this Bill be passed through both Houses, and assented to. Otherwise, when to-morrow comes, and after, there will be no money to pay for services which must go on. Under these circumstances I asked that to-day should be given to the Supplementary Estimates. We came together at three o'clock and have wasted eight hours up to the present time, so far as business is concerned, and if we are to enter into a review of every department on items that are not here mentioned and which are not connected with it, we shall certainly not get through these Estimates for a long time. I ask the Chairman to enforce the rules, and I ask hon. gentlemen to cheerfully comply with them, so that we may get through the items; otherwise, I shall be under the necessity of asking the House to adjourn all matters of debate on the Budget and stick to those Estimates until they are through. I am making only a reasonable request, and I hope it will be complied with.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the Opposition to discuss the items at greater length than is required, but if the Minister of Finance thinks this is a matter of such urgency——

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want it to be considered that I am putting this forward as a matter of urgency; it is a mere matter of business. Surely an hon. member will not ask us on Supplementary Estimates for the current year, when the regular Estimates are yet to come up, and also Supplementaries for the next year, to enter into a review of the whole Indian Department. I am not pressing this as a matter of courtesy or urgency, but as a mere matter of business. But, in regard to getting these items through with such little discussion as will thoroughly ventilate them, that is a matter of urgency, and I ask hon. gentlemen to bear this in view.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I take it in that way. It is no doubt important to get these items through and have them embodied in a Bill, in order that the public service may be regularly conducted. But whose fault is it if this is not done?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not mine.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Certainly it is yours, or rather it is the fault of the Government of which you are a member. The Government dissolved the House at a time when they thought it suited them, they brought on the election when they thought fit, they called Parliament together at the most inconvenient season, when it was not possible to have the Estimates fully and properly considered; and that being the case, the hon. gentleman must not urge, as a good reason why the Opposition should forego their duties and not ask information, the urgency of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg your pardon; I was not raising any objection to asking particulars regarding the item under discussion. I merely called attention to the fact that none of the items before the House involved a discussion of the whole policy of the Indian Department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not think the hon. gentleman desires to do so. Certain information is nevertheless required regarding the items. Hon. gentlemen opposite must remember the fact that if inconvenience arises by amounts not being paid before 1st July it is a fault which lies wholly with the Government, and not with the Opposition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think there is a general disposition to facilitate the work of the session and pass the Estimates, but I do not think, when the Minister of Finance calls on the Chairman to exercise his authority, he adopts a very wise measure to further public business. It is not desirable, nor will the proceedings of the House be facilitated by doing it. Calling members to order on little items of this kind will not facilitate the business of the House. That is all I want to draw attention to.

Mr. MULOCK. After this waste of time, brought about by the interruption of the Minister of Finance, I will now proceed with the item I was considering, and I hope the gentleman will not delay this business further by again interrupting me as he did this moment. I do not propose to review the whole policy of this department, nor was anything I said fairly open to any such observation. The Minister of Finance is evidently a little excitable this evening over something, I do not know what; at all events, he does not appear to be in his usually cool and calm state of mind.

Mr. FOSTER. I am as cool as a cucumber.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the hon. gentleman will not be excused if hereafter in this discussion he makes such a mistake as he did already. In the account to which I refer, and to which I called the attention of the Minister of Interior at the commencement of this session, he says that the Auditor General is to blame if any larger sum was paid to Mr. Dingman than was disbursed. I presume he will qualify that statement by saying, "unless the payment was based upon some regular allowance."

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I would submit, then, that in cases like this it is not fair to the Indian Fund that a larger sum should be charged against that fund for travelling expenses than is really incurred. We are bound to be careful in the administration of that fund.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Is that the report in your hand which states that there is a certain amount paid for a secretary and for rent of an office out of the Indian Fund? The return, as far as I recollect, shows that these travelling expenses were not paid out of the Indian Fund.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister says that the department allows $3.50 per day for board, and as these agents are travelling many times a year there are thousands of dollars spent in that way. A portion of that comes out of the Indian Fund and a portion out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Most of the time spent by Indian agents in this work is perhaps spent on reserves, where the agent perhaps does not have to pay one cent for board; if he pays anything it is perhaps a very trifling sum, and if you allow $3.50 per day to the officer for board, the rate he will be charged at a first-class hotel, while he is on the reserve, you will see that you are making a very liberal addition to the salary of the officer and making a very unnecessary charge against the Indian Fund or against the general revenue of the country. I therefore object to the allowance of $3.50 per day to the inspector for board, in addition to all other supposed or possible expenses, when he has not incurred that expense. In the case under notice there is an item of $101.50 for board, and a portion of that, I do not know how much, was incurred while the inspector resided in a small village. He never paid any such sum as that for board; at the very outside he paid one dollar per day, and so you have allowed him three times what he has expended. A portion of that, I presume, is charged against the Indian Fund; if not, so much the better; but whether charged against the Indian Fund or the money of the country generally, I object to it as an expenditure that is simply an addition to the salary of the agent, and which makes it an object to the agent to prolong his enquiries, because the longer he is engaged in that service the more money it will be in his pocket. One of these agents got large sums of money in such a manner as this, and he must have cleared a handsome addition to his income by this liberal allowance. Without saying anything further at the present time, I hope it will not be necessary to again press this matter on the Minister.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Before this discussion closes it would be well to say, and the hon. gentleman must appreciate it, that it is very difficult to discriminate between one officer and another. This per diem allowance has been paid for years to the public officers when travelling; and I have no doubt, as the hon. gentleman says, that on some occasions the officers do make a little out of it, but there are other occasions when they lose by this allowance. I believe the inspector gets $3.50 per day, but all the officers do not get that amount. Where agents visit reserves on special work in the North-West they only get $2 per day. That is all regulated by Order in Council.

Mr. MULOCK. An Order in Council can be wrong, and this is one that ought to be amended.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Orders in Council can be wrong, and if it is thought advisable they can be rectified. The amounts which are paid for travelling expenses all over the Dominion are paid out of the general revenue and not out of the Indian Fund.

Mr. MULOCK. This very officer, Mr. Dingman, received last year for travelling expenses $1,606.86, and another officer $825.

Mr. DEWDNEY. He is the inspector, the only inspector we have got.

Mr. MULOCK. If he is the only inspector a great deal of his time must be spent in the vicinity of the reserves, and if you pay him $3.50 per day for the time he is on the reserves you are increasing his salary by $500 or $600 a year. That is not justifiable, and you are inducing him to be dilatory in the discharge of his duties as well.

To provide salary for Mr. T. D. Green as Technical Officer..... $900

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of this, "technical officer"?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The salary was voted in the Estimates, but his name was not put in as intended. He is a surveyor in the Indian Department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). He has been there for several years.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; he was in the Department of the Interior for some years, but I think he joined the Indian Department about eighteen months ago.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You had an appropriation before to cover his salary.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It was voted in the Civil Government estimates last year, but his name not being put in the Estimates he was unable to draw his salary, because it was above the maximum of his class in which he was put under.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not quite hear, perhaps. I asked what was meant by "technical officer"?

Mr. DEWDNEY. He is a Dominion land surveyor.

Mr. FLINT. I see an item of $2,300 to cover the cost of printing Indian treaties. I would ask if they have been published and will be placed in the hands of members, as they will be of great historical value.

Mr. DEWDNEY. They will be printed. Many of them are very old, and have almost gone to pieces, and it is almost impossible for the clerks to decipher them. There are 680 pages, with 69 lithographic plans, occupying 111 pages, and all the treaties from the early days to the present time will be included.

Mr. FLINT. Will they be placed in the hands of members in sufficient number to be distributed to libraries?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I trust that none of the treaties have been overlooked. I was myself searching for a treaty with the Six Nations Indians of the date of 1762, but I could not find it, either in the hon. gentleman's department or in the office of the archives. I trust that the archives have been thoroughly searched as far back as that date, and that all the treaties will be included in the work. I agree with the hon. member for Yarmouth that this is a valuable work, and that a sufficient number of copies should be printed to be supplied to libraries, where our Indian friends as well as others would have access to them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I see it stated here that the treaties go back to 1680. I do not know to what extent the hon. gentleman has collected treaties. There are two modes in which he may have proceeded. One is to publish all the treaties that may have been made with the Indians in the name of the sovereign of England; the other is to publish those relating to Indian tribes now found in British North America. The hon. gentleman, going back to 1680, goes back I suppose to the period when Lord Howard, acting as Governor of New York, entered into a treaty with the Six Nations, and I apprehend that he purposes including only those treaties made by the Crown with Indians who are now found in British North America. For instance, there are treaties with the Seminoles, the Cherokees and other southern tribes, entered into by the Americans and by proprietors on behalf of the British Government at a very early period. Then, there were a number of Indian tribes who at the time of the revolution came from the United Steates and settled in Canada; amongst these were the Six Nations, to whom my hon. friend has referred. They have on several occasions entered into treaties with the Government of Great Britain. A number of these treaties I think exist in manuscript form in the Indian Department, but all the treaties are not there. There are treaties with these Indians which will be found among the New York historical documents. Whatever form the collection assumes, it ought to be complete; but if the hon. gentleman confines it to treaties in the department it will not be complete in any form.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think this matter is worth considering. I will have an examination made, and if we have not all the treaties in the department it will be a matter for consideration whether we can obtain them elsewhere.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Coleman's History of New York contains some. I think all of them will be found scattered through the New York historical documents. Some made with the Delaware Indians may be found in the Pennsylvania archives, which are here in the library.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The collection is not in print yet, I presume?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What the hon. member for Bothwell says is important, and I think the House will be willing to give a sufficient amount to make the collection complete; it ought to be complete. For instance, treaties made with the British Government by Indians who came to Canada at the time of the War of Independence might have a bearing on the present rights of those Indians. Some of them are anxious to have a full understanding of what was guaranteed to them in days gone by, and if circumstances have altered since it will be easy to point that out to them. I think the Minister ought to avail himself of all sources to find these treaties, one of which I know is not in his own department or in our archives, so that we shall have a complete record, which would be satisfactory to the Indians and also of great historical value to the country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I remember very well one treaty made with the Six Nation Indians, before they left the State of New York, to which they attached very great importance; that is one in which they were recognized, not as subjects, but as allies of the sovereign; and they claim still to be allies and not subjects.

Mr. MULOCK. A short time ago the hon. Minister of Finance made an allusion to my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron). He stated that the day had been wasted. I presume he had reference to the discussion on the subject of the Indians raised by my hon. friend. That hon. gentleman has now appeared in the Chamber, and I think the Minister ought to say it to his face or withdraw it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. While this item is under discussion I might inform the hon. Minister of the Interior that a letter was sent to me from the County of Bruce in reference to Indian affairs there. It is signed by a gentleman of the name of Creighton. I know nothing of the matter personally; but I know that there are a good many Indians up there. This is a complaint made against the agent by Mr. Creighton, and I will read what he says:

"In March, 1889, Thomas McVittie was brought before James Muir, Esq., of Port Elgin, charged with giving liquor to Indians. It was proved on oath by two witnesses that it was Joseph Allen that had sold the liquor. Agent Allen tried to make the court believe that Joseph was employed by McVittie, but failed to prove it. Mr. Muir asked the agent why he did not bring Joseph there to prove that he was employed by T. McVittie. The reason he did not bring him was that he was the agent's son. The agent got him away until the time had expired for the prosecution. He gave them two bottles in the space of an hour."

This is the statement that Mr. Creighton makes in a letter over his own signature sent me to-day. I do not know Mr. Creighton except by name, but I bring this up in order to have the matter sifted. The other day I submitted a letter sent to me from that locality, and I told the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who, I am sorry, is not here, that I was going to bring this matter up. He made some remarks on that occasion in reference to the Indians. Now, I do not know the Indians out there, but I have always had the opinion that they are a peaceful class of citizens, orderly and respectable; but the hon. member for Bruce, referring to the charges I brought before the House, spoke in this way——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I believe the hon. gentleman is out of order. We are discussing an item to which this has no reference.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. member for North Bruce intimated to me that he proposed bringing that question up himself; then it will be a better time for the hon. gentleman to make his remarks.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to give the hon. member for North Bruce full opportunity to explain. I wish to keep him right, and the Government right, on this question.

Mr. AMYOT. We are on item No. 8, which covers the subject the hon. gentleman is raising, and it would be much shorter to allow him to go on.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am speaking to item No. 8 with regard to the contingencies of the department, and I just wish to read the questions which the hon. member for North Bruce put the other day. The hon. gentleman then asked:

"Since he has been acting as Indian agent, has Mr. Allen's conduct been such as to cause the department to give any credence to these charges? Are any of these charges of which the department has any cognizance preferred by Indians? Are baseless charges frequently preferred against Indian agents by Indians? Is it within the knowledge of the department that the last of these charges preferred against Mr. Allen is ridiculously untrue?"

I just wanted to take this ground, that I do think members of this House should speak very guardedly in dealing with the Indians. If there is anything calculated to stir up strife in the different communities, it is the habit that hon. members have, occasionally, in speaking disparagingly in regard to Indians. I was very much grieved to hear the Minister of Justice do that to-day and the hon. member for North Bruce do it the other day, and I wish to put a stop to that practice, which, I believe, will do a great deal of injury, considering we have so many Indians among us.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be equally out of place for the hon. gentleman to speak in an insinuating way against a gentleman outside this House, who has borne the highest character for probity for many years.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have not said a word against him and scarcely know him. I only read the statements made by Mr. Allen.

Mr. SPROULE. I refer to the questions put by the hon. member for South Grey, which really implied charges against Mr. Allen, the Indian agent for North Bruce.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I had nothing to do with these letters. They were sent me for the purpose of being investigated, and the names of the parties were appended to them. I know nothing of the character of these charges, but I know the people by name, and am entitled to bring their charges before the House. If I were a friend of Mr. Allen I would equally bring them forward here, where they could be defended; and I would not be friendly to Mr. Allen to go behind his back and make those charges in the department, where there will not be the same opportunity to answer them.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman say that he knew of his own knowledge that a respectable man like Mr. Allen would be likely to lay himself open to those charges?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not know whether he would or not, but if any man is slandered I want to have him put right.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think there are more proclamations issued by different governors during the early part of this century which may have a bearing on these treaties and surrenders. If those proclamations were printed in the blue books they would perhaps throw light on some of the treaties. Some will probably be found before the United States became independent, which have a bearing on the Indian treaties.

Mr. FRASER. I presume these treaties will include those of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as well.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

High Commissioner's Office—Additional amount for contingencies.....$1,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that this is precisely one of those items that it would facilitate business to allow to stand. There are two or three of these items which will create considerable discussion, though the amounts may not be large.

Mr. FOSTER. Then we will not get the Supplementary Estimates as a whole further advanced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I only suggest this in your own interest. Any of these can be amended, and it makes no difference.

Item postponed.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

Privy Council—Contingencies.....$ 4,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. FOSTER. The statement I have is that the telegraphic accounts, the telegrams to London, England, on Imperial questions, have been very heavy, that there is an increase in the work of the office, that the number of references is increasing largely, and that the amount of copying required has increased very largely. From 1886 to 1890 the amount of copying has increased from four million and a-half words to seven million and a-half words. That takes in a very large number of temporary clerks, and I think the estimate last year was smaller than in the preceding year.

Hon. W. W. Sullivan, Chief Justice, P.E.I., six months salary as Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, P.E.I.....$ 300

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Last year this was proposed by the Minister of Justice on the ground that the chief justice of Prince Edward Island, who discharged the duties of Admiralty judge, should be placed on the same footing as the judges in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who were paid $600 a year for discharging that duty. I should like to ask if the Minister of Justice has considered and is prepared to report on the application made in reference to the previous incumbent of that office. The late Chief Justice Farmer, who died in 1890, discharged the duties of judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court for sixteen or seventeen years—during which he never received any special pay from this Parliament to the extent of a dollar, while his successor receives $600 a year. Of course the same rule should be made to apply to the late chief justice, but I do not understand that any such claim is made, but that the Minister has been asked to grant a few thousand dollars on account of the service he rendered. It is true that during some of those years he had very little of this work to do, but in other years there was very important work before him. Some American ships were seized and condemned, and in some years very large ships were seized and long arguments took place before the late Chief Justice Palmer. His services should have been recognized in his lifetime, but they were not, and I understand that an application has been made by his family to the Minister of Justice, asking that, as the Government has recognized the right of the present chief justice to be put on the same footing as those in the other provinces, some consideration should be made for the services of the late Judge Palmer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have considered the subject fully, but I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman an answer this evening. I have to consult my colleagues on the subject. The representations made have been carefully considered, and I must say that they have my full sympathy.

Miscellaneous Expenditure, Administration of Justice, including North-West Territories.....$6,000

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The expenditure this year has been larger than usual, and this item is to make up the actual expenditure. The amount has been increased principally by some three or four items of litigation. There was one in the Supreme Court between the Attorney-General of Ontario and myself to settle a disputed point between the province and the Dominion, which cost $900. There was also an investigation as to the conduct of a County Court judge which cost $900 more. There was also a special report of evidence in a capital case which cost $280, and there was another constitutional case in the west.

L. A. Audette, for services in connection with Exchequer Court report..... $300

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Audette is the registrar of the Exchequer Court, and he has in course of preparation the Exchequer Court reports, which are to be published in a series similar to that of the Supreme Court reports. The registrar of the Supreme Court receives $600 for the Supreme Court reports, and I am asking half the amount for the registrar of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will they cause half the work?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am informed that it will amount to about two-thirds of the work. One volume has been issued, and another volume is in course of preparation.

Mr. AMYOT. What will be the cost of these reports?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The same as the Supreme Court reports, which I think is $3.50 unbound, and $5 bound.

Mr. AMYOT. I understood last year that the cost would be reduced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was reduced to $2.50 unbound.

Mr. AMYOT. With this difference, that they published two half volumes instead of one volume. I do not see the difference between paying $2.50 each for two volumes and paying $5 for one, except that it costs more to be bound and is therefore dearer in the end.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the same size as that for which the higher price used to be charged.

Mr. AMYOT. We ought to know what the price of these volumes is to be. It is rather dear to pay $5 each year for them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will ascertain the correct price.

Mr. FRASER. I understand that this amount will be continued to Mr. Audette, and the series of reports will be continued from year to year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Dominion Police..... $500

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the strength of this force?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is one commissioner, one inspector, two sergeants and twenty-seven men.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Have there been any appointments to the staff within the last two years?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; four or five a year; the staff is changing all the time.

Mr. AMYOT. Does the Government intend to utilize this force to protect the witnesses in the investigation now going on before the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the committee is able to take care of them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand that a number of volunteers from Victoria have been sent up into the district of Nanaimo, acting as a police force. Are they paid by the Government as a police force while they are there, or by whom are they paid? What functions are they performing there? Is there a riot, or disorder, or disturbance that requires their presence at that particular point?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The force was sent up in the usual way, on an application made by three magistrates to the officer commanding. They were not paid by the Government, as it is not usual in such cases that the Government should provide pay for the men. They were paid by the municipality or by the local authorities. There is a question upon the paper which is being put by my hon. friend from Vancouver Island (Mr. Gordon), the answer to which will afford all the information that the department have.

Penitentiaries—Dorchester—To pay for land for penitentiary purposes..... $3,100

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is to purchase a piece of marsh land in front of the penitentiary and add it to the farm. Most of the penitentiary property is upland, and the marsh lands, which extend in front, are very fertile. The upland, on which the penitentiary is situated, is rough and rocky, although a valuable property, on account of being covered with firewood. This is used almost exclusively at present. This marsh land, the warden thinks, can be bought at $72 an acre, which is a cheap rate, and it will be very convenient for prison purpose, and will enable the authorities to raise crops that they are not able to raise now. The land is also well furnished with a good stream of water, and the prison at present has to be supplied by a large tank containing water brought from a great distance.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice will perhaps remember that some time ago I called his attention to the work being done at the Dorchester Penitentiary, the manufacture of woodenwares in competition with free labour. On that occasion the Minister of Justice explained as one reason—I do not know whether it was his main reason, though it was a large portion of his argument—that the Government felt warranted in continuing that work on the ground that they were first in the field, being engaged in that industry before it had begun by free labour. Since that discussion I have received a communication from the firm I referred to during that debate, and they assure me that the Minister was in error—that there had been established industries of that character in Canada long prior to the Government entering upon that sort of work. I merely rise now to ask the Minister whether, in view of his having attached a good deal of importance to the supposed priority on the part of the Government, he would, during the recess, look into that matter; and, if so, I think my correspondents will give him information which will show him that the reason which he advanced as one reason for the Government continuing this business does not in fact exist. I think it will be shown that long before the Government was in the business in question it was carried on in the Province of Ontario to a very considerable extent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not intend to give the hon. member to understand the other night that when the prison machinery was erected there were no private establishments making woodenware. What I intended to say was that several of these establishments which are now complaining of over-production had come into existence after the machinery there was set up, and therefore the Government was not responsible for the over-production that is now complained of. I think that statement is strictly correct; I have a recollection of meeting these gentlemen in my office, and that point was fully discussed.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he intends to endeavour to provide other labour for the prisoners, if possible, and to drop that kind of business my correspondents are complaining of. Since the discussion that took place, those whom I speak for have taken very strong ground upon the matter. I have received communications from Toronto and from persons engaged in labour generally. There is a principle involved in the question, and I think, if I may venture a bit of advice, that it would be very satisfactory, both to the Government and to free labour, if the Government would, if possible, utilize its convict labour in such a way that it will not come into competition with free labour. Now that the question has been raised, I would ask the Minister whether, during the vacation, or in the near future, he will endeavour to remove the objections that have been made in this respect.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not like to promise the hon. gentleman that we will dispense with the machinery and abandon that kind of work. If it is possible by any means to keep the prisoners employed without interfering with free labour we will do so to the greatest possible extent.

To pay J. Dingwell, County Attorney of Cornwall, for professional services and disbursements.....$172.68

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is in connection with the Controverted Elections Act. When election petitions were being brought in, the Cornwall judge reported certain persons guilty of corrupt practices, and it became, under the statute, a duty to prosecute for the penalties. The prosecutions were carried on, like all other prosecutions, by the provincial authorities, but the Government of Ontario claimed that it was but fair that this Parliament should provide for the expenses attending those prosecutions. Acting upon that view, I incurred these expenses.

To pay C. H. Masters for drafting criminal law, and for other expenses in connection therewith, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act $250

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. When the work of preparing the Criminal Code was undertaken I found that Mr. Masters had prepared a great deal of material for a work upon the subject of criminal law, his investigation being particularly confined to criminal procedure. I was very glad to avail myself of the work which he had made on this subject. He is one of the barristers of the Supreme Court.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the Minister who has charge explain the item of $10,000 for printing voters' lists. If these were for the general election perhaps he will explain how it became necessary to print them, as I presume they would be in stock.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this amount is for printing the voters' lists as required for the election, and any payments made will appear to the credit of the Receiver General.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Were lists obtained by candidates which were not paid for?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Any of the lists sold will appear as receipts.

Mr. MULOCK. It is clear that this item should not be pressed on the attention of the Committee. The Minister of Finance thinks that it may be for a certain purpose, but he is not able to give more information than appears on the face of the item. The voters' lists are required to be printed under the general Franchise Act, and we are not warranted in voting $10,000 when no Minister can tell us the purpose for which it is to be voted.

Mr. FRASER. We had to pay for every copy we obtained, and I cannot therefore understand why this item of $10,000 should appear for printing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did I understand the Minister of Finance to say that copies of the voters' lists had been issued for which payment was not made?

Mr. FOSTER. I said quite the opposite—that payments had no doubt been made, and the receipts would appear under the head of the Receiver General. The expense of printing the lists is to be met by the Government, and if we sold the whole $10,000 worth this item would appear as a debt to the Government, while among the receipts would appear the amount we received for payment.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was this the case in regard to all the counties or only in regard to some of them, because the lists have not been revised since 1887.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understood the Minister of Finance to say that this item represents so many copies sold.

Mr. FOSTER. What I stated was, that this amendment was for voters' lists printed for the election. They were distributed throughout the different ridings and were paid for—that is, those which were distributed; I do not know what proportion were paid for—and the receipts will appear to the credit of the Receiver General.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Were the lists for the whole 211 or 212 electoral divisions reprinted?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether it covers the whole of them or not. I will obtain what information is necessary for the Committee, and I will bring it down on concurrence.

Mr. BARRON. I understood the Minister of Finance to intimate that the lists were sold. That is the law, and anyone who wants a list can obtain one for five cents for each polling division. It is generally rumoured that our opponents were able to get their lists for nothing. I know in one Riding in Ontario the boast was made by our opponents that they had not to pay for the lists. The revising officer has lists for sale apart from those for sale in Ottawa, but application was not made to him by our opponents because they said they could get the lists from Ottawa for nothing. I do not say that is the case, but it is the rumour prevailing, and there is a general opinion throughout the country that we are not all treated equally, so far as the lists are concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that when investigation is made it will be found that this is simply a rumour and not a fact. I suppose, if any one could get the lists for nothing a Minister might be expected to do so. I used a great many, but I paid for them, and others have done the same. It is not the fact that they are given away. It may be true that some persons received them free, if friends sent them and paid the expense.

Mr. BARRON. Do we not receive five copies each free of charge?

Mr. FOSTER. They come from the revising officer and not from the department here.

Mr. BARRON. I have received some lists from here and a bill has been sent to me.

Mr. DENISON. I got four or six copies from the revising officer, but I had to pay for all I obtained from Ottawa, and they amounted to about $50.

Mr. INGRAM. I paid between $30 and $40 for lists.

Mr. MULOCK. The Finance Minister supposes that perhaps this item was incurred for printing voters' lists for a general election. If I remember rightly, the Secretary of State intimated to the House that there would be a revision of the voters' lists before a general election. I find in the statement of Governor General's warrants an item: July 10, 1890, Franchise Act Legislation, $10,000. Is this the same $10,000 we are discussing now?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know, but I suppose it is; that is a Governor General's warrant.

Mr. MULOCK. If that is the item we have under discussion now, the Minister will see that the explanation he has offered will hardly be a correct one. The Secretary of State then gave the House to understand that there would be a revision before the general election, and how comes it that there was a warrant in 1890 for printing the voters' lists for the next election. Was it in contemplation in July, 1890, that there would be another revision before another election? The House had only adjourned for a couple of months then, and according to this statement Parliament had hardly prorogued when the Government had to get a Governor General's warrant to get ready for an election. Was there a change of programme after the Secretary of State had made that statement in the House? It is a most extraordinary thing if the Government had decided in July, 1890, that they were going to have a general election on the voters' list of that year.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman sure of the date?

Mr. MULOCK. The date is given in the return I have before me. If there is no explanation the item had better stand.

Mr. FOSTER. Let it stand if you wish, but it has got to be paid.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes; but we are paying altogether too much for this Franchise Act. There is a quarter of a million dollars paid for it this year, and here is another ten thousand.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the item stand.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice that this amount would give to each electoral district about $50 in addition to what has already been received by the revising barrister.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The item stands.

Cost of leather trunks for members as per resolution of the House.. $5,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be there is a resolution of the House, and if so I did not observe it, but I do desire to record my protest against this folly. I do not think it is compatible with our dignity, nor does it add to our dignity in the eyes of the public at large, that we should be supplying ourselves with leather trunks. The old trunks may have been bad enough, but they were only intended as receptacles for the box of stationery, and were good enough in their way. I do not think this item should ever have appeared before us.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite agree with you.

To promote the Dairy Interests of Canada in affiliation with Experimental Farms, including establishment and maintenance of Branch Experimental Stations.....$10,000

Mr. McMILLAN. This requires some explanation. I see there are $20,000 placed in the Estimates for the same purpose. That is a very large amount, and I think that we should have some explanation as to how this money is expended.

Mr. HAGGART. The $20,000 is for next year: there is only $5,000 in the Estimates for 1890 and 1891. This is for salaries for seven travelling dairy commissioners visiting cheese factories in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia: holding meetings $1,700, travelling expenses $1,500, cheese and butter-making apparatus for experimental dairy station $3,500, printing and stationery $200, expenses of shipment of dairy products in connection with experiments $500, and there is another item of expense on the Central Experimental Farm in connection with the new dairy building and experiments in the piggery, which are new branches undertaken since the last Estimates were made.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does this $10,000 refer to the past year?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes; that is the amount due up to to-day.

Mr. McMILLAN. By whom was this money expended last year?

Mr. HAGGART. There were seven inspectors travelling last year.

Mr. McMILLAN. Were they in the cheese interest or in the creamery interest?

Mr. HAGGART. The cheese interest, I think. The full account of it is given in the report of the Dairy Commissioner at page 132.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have looked over the report of the Dairy Commissioner but I have not observed that in it, although it may be contained therein. It is rather peculiar that when such a large sum is spent in the Province of Ontario already it should be necessary to incur the expense here. In the Province of Ontario the Dairymen's Association, assisted by the Ontario Government, has established an experimental station for cheese-makers to get a good education, and I think it is folly to have two rival teachers sent out in one province, one from the Dominion and the other from the local Government.

Mr. SPROULE. In our part of the country these men are very much appreciated. I think their operations this season have been confined to the examination of milk and instructing factory men to test it. After they have spent a few weeks at one factory they go to another. They have visited the counties of Grey and Bruce, and I think also Simcoe, and the people of that section appreciate them very much, and I think the money is well spent. In connection with this subject, I am informed that the item we had last year for the Dairymen's Association and the Horticultural Association has been dropped this year. I think that is a great pity, because it is a small amount, and it was used to great advantage last year.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. member for East Grey is not correct. The item of $5,000, instead of being dropped, has been increased to $20,000. I would ask if all the teachers were from the Experimental Farm, or if some were from the Dairymen's Association, and assisted by the Ontario Government?

Mr. SPROULE. I think three out of five were selected from the hon. gentleman's part of Ontario. They were good, practical men.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am sorry we have not the hon. gentleman as Minister of Agriculture. We have no one to answer for that department, and the hon. gentleman has to take the place of the Minister.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The hon. gentleman who talks broad Scotch forgets that these instructors were not confined to the Province of Ontario at all. They were instructors for the Dominion, and they went about the whole Dominion instructing.

Mr. McMILLAN. Well, if I do speak broad Scotch I am not ashamed of it or the country I came from, and I am not afraid to put any question to this House in broad Scotch just as well as the hon. gentleman who refers to it.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I claim the right to be Highland Scotch, and I admire any man who stands up for his nationality. At the same time, I did not know the constituency the hon. gentleman represented, and I referred to him by the only distinguishing feature which I observed about him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the work referred to by the hon. member for South Huron has been eminently satisfactory for the Province of Ontario. Before these instructors passed around we had creameries and cheese factories in our section that have done great service, and I am happy to be able to state that a creamery in the South Riding of Grey has attained such perfection that Mr. Adam Brown states in his report that it was awarded the first prize for butter at Jamaica. I think the work of improving dairying can be safely left to the promoters of these creameries alone; experience will be found to be a better teacher than theory. The men in the creamery business who have devoted themselves intelligently to their business have acquired such a standing that if the Government, instead of employing these lecturers, gave a bonus to the creameries, I do not know but they would do a great deal more good.

To complete the distribution in Canada of the two-rowed barley purchased for seed purposes, and to purchase specimens of two-rowed barley grown in Canada for experimental purposes (Governor General's warrant) $2,000

Mr. LANDERKIN. How has this turned out?

Mr. HAGGART. I think it has been a losing speculation, so far as the monetary part is concerned. The total amount expended was $22,058; the proceeds of sales, $13,093; balance, $8,964. The receipts for barley in 1891 were $2,911, less expense of sale of barley, and purchase for experiments in reference to brewing, $1,872. There are 150 bags still on hand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would be satisfactory if the hon. Minister would state to us what the total expense of running this farm is for the year, and what is the value of the products of the farm sold?

Mr. HAGGART. I shall be able to give the full information on the main Estimates.

Mr. FRASER. Might I ask, while this experiment has been a loss financially, whether the two-rowed barley is likely to prove a success as a crop in this country?

Mr. HAGGART. From the information they have in the department, they think it is a great success in the country.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to point out that this item is a Governor General's warrant again.

Mr. HAGGART. It is a lapsed amount.

Mr. MULOCK. I see that it was issued on the 18th of December for $2,000. On the 1st of May, according to this statement, you had expended only $1,200. On the 1st of May I presume you had distributed all the barley you are going to distribute this year. Why, then, did you ask for any more money than you expended? You have no barley distributed after the 1st of May in Canada.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to know where, and for what purpose?

Mr. HAGGART. A lot of bills came in, and there were experiments in reference to brewing with the two-rowed barley, costing $1,872, and there are some other accounts coming in.

Mr. MULOCK. Is this Government endeavouring to develop brewing?

Mr. HAGGART. It was engaged in finding what the value of two-rowed barley was for making malt for brewing purposes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I understand that this Government is paying out money to develop the brewing interest—to show that this barley is good for making beer.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think there is $450 in the main Estimates to be paid to the brewers for that purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where were the brewing experiments performed?

Mr. HAGGART. I think one in England and one here.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Was there any experiment made in London last year by the Carling brewery?

Mr. HAGGART. There may have been last year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I see $402 were paid for that purpose.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it mentioned in the Estimates?

Mr. HAGGART. I believe it is in last year's accounts.

Mr. MULOCK. It is very unsatisfactory to have nothing definite. The Minister ought to be able to give information when supplies are asked for.

Mr. HAGGART. I think you will see it in the Public Accounts.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not complaining that the hon. gentleman himself has not the definite information, because he cannot be expected to give information on a subject he is not conversant with, but the deputy head or somebody else ought to be in the precincts who could furnish the information.

Mr. HAGGART. He is here.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman was asked to state definitely whether or not the Carling brewery had made these experiments or not in London. He said he thought so. That is not a very satisfactory answer.

Mr. HAGGART. There were no experiments this year, but there is an amount of $400 in the Public Accounts for that purpose last year.

Mr. MULOCK. Has there been any report made with regard to these results?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the report here, but there was one.

Mr. SPROULE. There was a bulletin issued of which hon. members got copies.

Mr. HAGGART. I will get the information for the hon. gentleman. There were tests made in England, but I did not think hon. gentlemen would want to know the details. The barley turned out to be excellent for malting purposes.

Mr. MULOCK. Was there a report issued giving the information?

Mr. SPROULE. The report was issued this summer in bulletin No. 7 to the members of the Farmers' Institutes throughout the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who was right? The hon. Minister says the report did not come from England and the hon. member for East Grey says it is in No. 7.

Mr. HAGGART. The report from England is not here yet; the other may be here and may have been distributed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The comparative values of the two barleys are stated in the account presented to the Government by the Carling Brewing Company. Whether such was published in the documentary form and distributed I know not.

Mr. ROWAND. Were these tests made from barley grown from the product of the seeds of last year?

Mr. HAGGART. From barley grown in Ontario from the seeds of last year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is it in view of the importance attached to two-rowed barley the Government decided to increase the duty on malt?

Mr. McMILLAN. There was more seed grown and distributed than the seed brought from England. There was a quantity of seed obtained from farmers in the neighbourhood of Wentworth. Was it that or the seed brought from England that was tested?

Mr. HAGGART. I understand the seed sent from England was the seed grown in this country.

Mr. ALLISON. Was any brought from England to complete the distribution in Canada? Was the barley referred to in this item that which was brought from England?

Mr. HAGGART. The barley that was grown in Canada was sent to England for the purpose of being experimented upon, to see what kind of malt it would make.

Mr. ALLISON. The item says to complete the distribution in Canada. Was this grown in Canada or England?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentlemen wants to know if this is to pay for the barley brought out or the barley sent back.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the confusion arises from the fact that in this item there are two separate transactions placed together. This is an item for $2,000, to distribute two-rowed barley exported and to pay for experiments on Canadian barley. If there had been two items instead of one there would have been no misunderstanding. Further, I observe that the words used are:

"To complete the distribution in Canada of the two-rowed barley purchased for seed purposes."

I should like to know if this barley was to be sown in England or here?

Mr. BOWELL. This was purchased in England: it was sold to the Canadian farmers at the cost to the Dominion Government. The cost of distributing that barley throughout the Dominion was paid for out of the Dominion treasury, and the farmers were not charged for the distribution.

Mr. ALLISON. Was not $2 a bushel sufficient to pay for the whole expense?

Mr. BOWELL. No; it was not.

Mr. ALLISON. Then it must have been very expensive barley.

Additional amount required for Experimental Farms.....$7,000

Mr. McMILLAN. We require some explanation of this. There have been large expenditures made on these experimental farms. When we were asked to agree to establish these farms it was stated that $120,000 would be sufficient to establish the Central Experimental Farm, and that another $120,000 would establish all the branch farms, and yet we find that about $600,000 has been voted up to the present year. We were told that $120,000 for the Central Experimental Farm would put up the buildings, purchase the horses and implements, put up the experimental heating house, provide the heating apparatus, put up houses for the manager and staff on the farm, and yet we find that more than double that amount has been spent. On the Central Experimental Farm $326,373 has been spent, and, if you take off the amount for maintenance, it leaves about $284,000 spent in establishing that farm. I think it is time a halt was called in this, because it is more than twice the amount it was stated it would cost, and is about $40,000 more than we were told would establish the Central Farm and all the other experimental farms. We want to know what has been done with this $7,000? There was $110,500 voted last year for these farms.

Mr. HAGGART. The items of this $7,000 are these: Stock for Experimental Farm, Indian Head, N.W.T., $2,500; stock for Experimental Farm at Nappan, N.S., $1,800; printing account for bulletins, $1,500; extra office work in connection with distribution of bulletins, $700; forest trees and tree seeds, $500, making the total of $7,000.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is attention given to the publication of the bulletins in the French language at the same time as in the English language?

Mr. HAGGART. The bulletins are put in the hands of the French translators as soon as the English edition is printed, and they are issued immediately afterwards.

Mr. DEVLIN. I ask this question because complaint is made that sometimes these bulletins in French are received when they are too late to be of practical value.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In reference to the bulletins, I think that is a splendid plan of giving information to the farmers. I strongly approve of that, but I think the Minister of Agriculture ought to distribute these bulletins more numerously. This last year the Ontario Government are sending the bulletins from their experimental farm at Guelph to every member of the Farmers' Institutes in the province free, and I think these bulletins should be freely distributed all over the Dominion. They contain a great deal of valuable information, and there is no use in going to the expense of establishing these farms and acquiring large information, and then withholding it from those who could make use of it and derive great advantage from it. Therefore, I think the bulletins should be printed by the thousand and scattered broadcast. The cost of distributing them after the type is set is very trifling, whether the number printed is 1,000 or 20,000, and it would be well for the Minister to authorize one copy to be sent to every member of a Farmers' Institute throughout Ontario.

Mr. McGREGOR. I understand the department is anxious to send the bulletin to anyone who sends his name. I am informed that some members have not yet sent in their names.

Mr. SPROULE. Professor Saunders has stated that if the Farmers' Institutes would send in their names they would be supplied. I know that in the County of Grey the Farmers' Institutes have been supplied since last year. These bulletins are much larger than those issued by the Ontario Government, and are consequently more costly, but the number distributed is only limited by the number of names received. For many years in succession we have given the information to the Farmers' Institutes in the County of Grey, and to others outside of those institutes, who send in their names.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Are the bulletins which are issued here and those which are issued in Ontario similar?

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I put in some 250 names, about two years ago, to be alternately supplied with these bulletins if there were not enough issued every year for each. Do I understand that these names would be in the hands of the director, and that he would continue to supply them? If not, it might be necessary to send in another list of names.

Mr. HAGGART. The director informs me that when once these names are on the mailing list they are kept there. There are about 30,000 printed in English and 5,000 in French.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me the chief means of distributing this information ought to be through the ordinary newspapers. Of course, a certain number will be printed, but you could hardly undertake to supply the 600,000 farmers of the Dominion of Canada with this information in the form in which it is prepared. What is of special interest to the agricultural population will be in time discovered by the press, and it is in the interest of the press to publish whatever is of interest to its readers, and the press must remain the chief organ for imparting information of this sort.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I heartily endorse that sentiment; that is the proper way of distributing this to the people. It could be done more cheaply by the press, and would reach a greater number of farmers.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that some time ago, when the press was asked to print this information, some of the papers refused to do so. It was supplied to those newspapers who promised to print it. When the subject was up in the Farmers' Institute in our part of the country they distinctly expressed their wish that the bulletin should be printed in bulletin form, so that they could keep it as a matter of record from year to year.

Jamaica Exhibition — Governor General's warrant..... $15,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that this is an extremely objectionable mode of using the Governor General's warrant. The Government knew that the Jamaica Exhibition was going to take place before we parted last year. It was their duty, if they wished to take part in it, to have asked a vote for that purpose of a sufficient amount. I do not think this is at all a proper mode for using His Excellency's warrant, nor does it at all conform to the provisions of the statute to that effect. I should like to hear why the hon. gentleman has had recourse to it.

Mr. HAGGART. I know of no reason, except that the expenditure was largely in excess of the amount voted last year, which I think was $5,000. The expenditure altogether is very nearly $20,000. Of this sum over $7,000 was for freight, and two or three officers were over there with Mr. Brown.

Mr PATERSON (Brant). What amount of salary did the Commissioner receive for his services?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no salary in this vote, that I am aware of.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Was it purely honorary?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not as yet know that he is going to get any salary.

Mr. FOSTER. In the Supplementary Estimates the House will probably be asked to acquiesce in an item for Mr. Brown's services.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Were not his expenses paid out of the $5,000 appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Was he appointed with the view of giving him nothing?

Mr. HAGGART. I think a part of this item of $15,000 is to pay his expenses.

To pay Mr. Stephen Selden's claim (with six years' interest) for statistical services in accordance with a decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia....$400 52

Mr. FOSTER. I think this is to pay for services that were performed many years ago in connection with the statistics for the Province of Nova Scotia, a work which is now done by the Dominion. This claim has been before the Dominion Government and afterwards was brought before the courts, and the courts allowed the claim, to a certain extent, recommending that it be paid with interest for six years. Interest was claimed on the amount that was claimed from the first, which must have been shortly after Confederation. The Minister of Justice reported that the judgment of the court ought to be carried out, and that interest for six years ought to be allowed.

Census..... $50,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When will we be able to get some idea of the results of the census with reference to population?

Mr. HAGGART. I think, probably, at the beginning of August we will be able to give you the population.

Mr. FRASER. Will this cover the whole expense of taking the census?

Mr. HAGGART. No; that is to supplement the vote of last year. There will be a vote next year. I think the estimated cost of the whole census is between five and six hundred thousand dollars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. First and last, I dare say it will come to that. I would like the Minister of Finance to tell me where the vote is to be found which was taken with reference to this Jamaica Exhibition.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure a vote for $5,000 was taken. At first we supposed that the expenditure would probably come to $10,000. We thought that an exhibition could be made in Jamaica for that amount, and $5,000 were voted the year before last as preparatory. Then, when we had got the space and the department had entered into the work of gathering exhibits, so many were brought forward that it overran our original estimated expenditure, and so this vote of $15,000 has been added. The exhibition will cost about $20,000. The original vote was in 1889-90.

Quarantine..... $8,460

Mr. LANDERKIN. Do the same regulations prevail in reference to vaccination on the ships going out? Awhile ago passengers in the intermediate and in the steerage were all obliged to be vaccinated, and the passengers in the saloon were exempt from the operation of the Vaccination Act. I would like to know if that is continued?

Mr. HAGGART. I believe vaccination is compulsory for steerage passengers.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the reason that small-pox could not as easily get into the saloon as into the steerage? Why do you exempt one class of passengers in the ship and compel others to be vaccinated?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think that one class of passengers should be vaccinated and not another. If small-pox broke out it would spread all through the passengers, and I know of no means of protecting them except by vaccination. If we are going to make fish of one and flesh of another, the people should know it. I remember a gentleman who lived in my riding who crossed the Atlantic and was vaccinated. He was attacked with blood poisoning, and was laid up a long time. He complained severely that due precautions had not been taken in selecting the vaccine virus used. I do not know but that he had probably good ground for action against the Government if due precaution was not observed. It is highly desirable, if we are going to make this invidious distinction between classes in a vessel, that at least due consideration should be given to the quality of the virus, and if we are going to do this at all, it should be done thoroughly. Intermediate passengers have been almost in rebellion, and have held indignation meetings and protested against being vaccinated. Whether there has been any change in this regard to the regulations I do not know. The Government is responsible if they permit impure virus to be used which may result in injury, as was the case in the young man to whom I have referred who was quite healthy. What is the policy of the Government in this matter?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The person who performs this operation is not responsible to this Government, for he is the surgeon on board the vessel, and the virus is everything it should not be. My brother-in-law came over here on a business trip, and was sick two or three weeks on account of being vaccinated on board ship. If this has to be done, it should be done by a Government official who is responsible. Many of these ship surgeons I would not allow to perform such an operation on any of my own family, and, if under the regulations it must be done, all on board should be treated alike. I have been on board a vessel where there was nearly a mutiny, and where the passengers refused to be vaccinated unless all on board were vaccinated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it the case, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that a distinction is made between the different classes on board?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think the department has any control, for the vaccination is done by the ship surgeon. On arrival at the quarantine station here it is compulsory among the steerage passengers that they should be vaccinated, and only the steerage passengers. I do not know why the distinction is made.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Who makes it compulsory? Care should be taken that the officer who performs the operation does so with pure vaccine virus. As regards the operation, anyone can perform it; but the great point is the purity of the vaccine virus, and if it is done by authority of the Government, the Government must see that pure virus is in the hands of the physician. It should be compulsory on all on board if we wish to secure efficient protection, but above all the Government should know that pure virus is used.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand that the medical officer at Grosse Isle would not take a certificate that a steerage passenger had been vaccinated, or the testimony of a recent vaccination mark on his arm; and he informed them that unless they were vaccinated they would have to go into quarantine for a certain length of time. That statement was made to me by several parties who crossed the Atlantic and complained to me about this injustice. They also complained that the ship surgeon did not vaccinate them when starting on the voyage, for they would then have got well over the effects before reaching land. An instance was given of a mother with two or three children who were vaccinated a short time before landing, and they were obliged to remain a few days in Quebec instead of proceeding on their journey. This subject should engage the attention of the Government, and if it is necessary to thus protect the people they should all be placed on the same footing.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no doubt that Dr. Montizambert, medical superintendent at Grosse Isle, will have the best medical virus in the country. Vaccinations are performed by the ship surgeons on the way over. It is required from every passenger who lands either in the United States or Canada that he shall have signs of vaccination or have been vaccinated shortly before he lands, or he must be vaccinated shortly before his arrival here. That regulation applies only to steerage passengers. Saloon passengers neither in the United States nor this country require to be vaccinated; and the reason here is that a saloon passenger would never come over by the Canadian route if he was required to be vaccinated.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am informed that it is not the officer on ship board but Dr. Montizambert of whom the people complain, for although they offered to furnish vaccination certificates, he would not accept them. This is not in regard to steerage but intermediate passengers, I think; but as to that I am not sure. I was about to bring this matter up a year or two ago and the present Minister of Agriculture then told me the reasons why the saloon passengers were not vaccinated; but the saloon passengers should be put on the same level as other passengers, and all should be allowed to show a certificate that they were vaccinated. What is the necessity of vaccinating them if they have good marks on their arms? Why not put them all on the same basis and allow them to produce a certificate from a qualified medical man? If you do this you will do away with an invidious distinction and with all this bickering which arises on nearly every ship which comes to Point Lévis.

Ex-Constable G. H. Harpur, balance of pension to 30th June, 1891, on account of Rebellion of 1885..... $814.60

Mr. MULOCK. What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. DEWDNEY. G. H. Harpur joined the North-West Mounted Police on the organization of the force, on the 3rd November, 1873, and served continuously for nine years, during eight of which he held the rank of sergeant. Mr. Harpur who had volunteered for service on the outbreak of the Rebellion of 1885, was sent from Battleford to Clark's Crossing, to communicate to General Middleton the condition of affairs at the former place. On his return journey, in attempting to save the life of the horse of an Indian who accompanied him, he jumped into the water and was thrown from his feet by the running ice and carried some distance down the stream, the weather being bitterly cold. It was impossible to light a fire without bringing the Indians, who were numerous on that route, down upon them, and he was compelled to ride the 50 miles to Battleford with his clothing frozen upon his body. He was under hospital treatment for some days, but accompanied the column to Cut Knife where he was specially mentioned for his bravery and dash, although at the time suffering from rheumatism. For nine months after the rebellion he was confined to his bed with acute rheumatism and inflammation of the lungs. During the following winter he was laid up for six months from the same cause, and every subsequent winter has been confined wholly to the house and frequently to his bed. A medical board, composed of Senior Surgeon Jukes and Assistant Surgeon Paré, sat upon his case on the 15th of October, 1890, and reported that he was "suffering from paralysis of the extensor muscles of the right hand, from chronic rheumatism and from sciatica, which conditions he affirms, and which we, from the evidence laid before us, are constrained to believe, have resulted from the great fatigue and exposure to which he was necessarily subjected in the performance of the very arduous and important duties devolving upon him as a special constable during the Rebellion of 1885, and that the conditions to which we herein refer, absolutely incapacitate him from earning his own living, either by ordinary labour or as a clerk." An Order in Council was passed, 18th December, 1890, granting Harpur a pension of 60 cents per day from 1st July, 1885. The amount due him under this Order in Council, to 30th June, 1891, was $1,314.60. As he was in extreme need, $500 was at once paid him from the appropriation of last session for "Pensions payable on account of Rebellion of 1885, to Mounted Police, Prince Albert Volunteers and Police Scouts," leaving a balance of $814.60 to be provided by supplementary estimate.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I understand that this constable who did military service in the suppression of the Rebellion of 1885, had his case for the first time under consideration of the Government in 1890, and that the first decision arrived at was in December, 1890?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The board was held by the surgeons on the 5th December, 1890.

Mr. MULOCK. So that until October, 1890, or whenever after you paid him, he had received nothing by way of compensation for wounds or injuries sustained in 1885, and five years after the injuries were received the Government finds he was entitled to $1,304. Is that correct?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then it discloses an extraordinary state of affairs. If the reasons set forth in the paper which my hon. friend has just read are the only reasons for compensating him, surely these reasons existed five years ago. I would ask the Minister of the Interior when first there was a claim made on the Government for this pension?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have not that information, but I can get it.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it should be brought down. Do not understand me as being against the country doing justice to this claimant. The paper which the Minister has read shows, if it shows any thing, either that this man never made a claim until 1890, and in that case the Government was not to blame, or what is more probable, that he has been making a claim all these years and only in 1890 was his claim adjudicated upon. I would like the Minister who is charged with this matter to give us a full, frank and candid statement as to when this person applied for compensation, as to when adjudication was first had upon his claim, and as to whether the board at one time disallowed it and subsequently reopened and allowed it. If the facts, as set forth in this paper, are correct, and I must suppose they are, and if this man has been incapacitated all these years, it is incredible to my mind that he should have never made a claim for compensation until the fall of 1890. I think it will be found that the Government has adjudicated upon this claim previously and refused it, but that they afterwards decided to make the allowance. I have had occasion before this to complain of the manner in which those poor men have been dealt with here, and I think this case affords a very fair opportunity to see whether claims are reopened after being decided. If this case has been reopened there are other cases that require to be reopened also. Last year I had occasion to submit to the House two cases that called for action, and I was met with the statement that they had been adjudicated upon, although in one case the person staggered here from the hospital and was permanently incapacitated by reason of the services he rendered in defence of the country. It is incomprehensible that this claim has been standing for five years and has never been adjudicated upon until now.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will be glad to get the hon. gentleman all the information I can.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to have the item stand until we get the information.

Mr. DEWDNEY. All right let it stand.

To provide for repairing fortification wall at St. John's Gate, Quebec, (Governor General's Warrant) $1,081.90

Mr. MULOCK. Why was the Governor General's warrant issued for this?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will give the hon. gentleman the explanation which I gave to the Council when the order was passed. The architect of the Corporation of Quebec, Mr. Baillairgé, made a report to the Department of Militia stating that the water percolated through the wall, and when the frost came the wall became very dangerous to life, and that it was absolutely necessary that the Government should repair the wall immediately, or the Corporation of Quebec would have to do it on the account of the Government. In consequence of these facts, I sent the architect to make an estimate. I submitted his estimate and the facts to the Council, and the work was done

Mr. DEVLIN. When was the work commenced and when finished?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It was about December when the information came to us, and as soon as we could get our men to work we did so, and it is all completed.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 1st July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 123) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Oshawa Railway and Navigation Company, and to change the name thereof to the Oshawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Madill.)

Bill (No. 124) to further amend the Act to incorporate the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE—REPORT RE COMMISSIONER.

Mr. DAVIN asked, When the report of Mr. Fred. White, Comptroller of the North-West Mounted Police, who was commissioned to make a departmental enquiry into the conduct of Lawrence W. Herchmer, Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police, will be laid on the Table?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the report has not yet been completed, but it will be laid upon the Table when it is completed.

SISSIBOO RIVER—DREDGING.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Does the Government propose continuing the work of dredging the channel of the Sissiboo River, Digby County, N.S., during the year 1891, which was under progress during the season of 1890, and will the same be pursued to completion?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. An attempt was made to dredge this river last season, but the material to be removed is so hard and of such a nature that special plant would have to be procured to do the work, a plant which the department does not possess.

TARTE-McGREEVY ENQUIRY—COUNSEL.

Mr. McMULLEN asked for the name or names of counsel retained by the Government in connection with the enquiry in regard to the charges made by Mr. Tarte, now being conducted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections? 2. What is the rate of remuneration to be paid to each of such counsel?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The names of the counsel retained on the enquiry are Messrs. Osler, from Toronto, and Henry, of Halifax. I am not quite prepared to give the hon. member this afternoon the other details which he asks for, and it may be better that the question should stand in order that I may be able to inform him, besides those particulars, of the instructions which those gentlemen have received.

LANGEVIN BLOCK—CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What amount has been paid to Charlebois & Co., since 30th June, 1890, on account of construction of the Langevin Block?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount of $16,500 has been paid on account of the main contract, masons' work, and $10,000 on account of the contract for iron staircases.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What was the rate of freight charged by the Government for carriage of sandstone used in the construction of the Langevin Block, Ottawa, from Newcastle, N.B., to Ottawa? 2. What was the quantity of stone so carried? 3. Has the whole amount of the freight on said quantity been paid in cash to the Government?

Mr. BOWELL. The quantity of stone carried over the Intercolonial Railway for the new departmental building in Ottawa was 1,063¾ car loads, of 24,000 lbs. each, at $20 per car. The charges amounted to $21,275.39, which were paid over by the Grand Trunk Railway from time to time as the stone was forwarded.

RAQUETTE PIER, N.S.—CONTRACTS, &c.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Has the Government yet entered into any contract for constructing a new pier at the Raquette, Digby, N.S.? If so, what is—1. The contractor's name? 2. The contractor's price? 3. The name of the superintendent or overseer on the part of the Government? 4. What is to be the superintendent or overseer's compensation or salary? 5. At what time is the work by the terms of the contract to be completed? 6. What is to be the depth of water at the outer end of pier?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the first part of the question, yes—John Nicholson. 2. $475.78. 3. John Welsh. 4. $2.50 per working day. 5. On the 18th May, 1892. 6. 16 feet.

SAULT STE. MARIE WHARF.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. LISTER) asked, What arrangement is there with Mr. Plummer, for services in connection with the Government wharf at Sault Ste. Marie? If paid by salary, what is it? If by portion of fees collected, what proportion? What amount has been returned to the Government, as fees collected, up to the end of 1890?

Mr. TUPPER. By Order in Council Mr. Plummer receives $100 a year out of the dues collected from the Government wharf at Sault Ste. Marie, as salary. He had returned no fees collected up to 1889, and he claimed that the original agreement made with him had not been carried out by the Government, and he gives that as an excuse for not paying in the fees. My department has called on him for an immediate return of the dues collected, independent of any claims set up as to salary, which will receive consideration. The fees are payable to the Receiver General at once.

N. SASKATCHEWAN IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, 1. Did the Government of Canada authorize and instruct in 1883, the late C. J. Brydges, Esq., to have certain improvements made in the navigation of the North Saskatchewan River? 2. If so, did he undertake and complete the work? 3. How much money was set apart for the work; where and when, in what bank, and at whose credit was the amount deposited? 4. Had the Government report or reports made to them, showing the amount expended upon the work? If so, how much was expended? 5. Is there a balance due the Government? If so, how much? 6. Is the balance under the control of the Government? If so, have they claimed it? If they have not claimed it, why not? 7. Do the Government intend to close this account, by claiming the balance to its credit?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To the first question the answer is, yes. To the second question, the answer is, yes. To the third question the answer is, that $25,000 were advanced to the Hudson Bay Company, through Mr. C. J. Brydges, from March, 1883, to October, 1884. There was an Order in Council passed for that purpose. In reply to the fourth question, I may say that $23,890.55 was expended on the work. To the fifth question, there is the sum of $1,169.54 balance due to the Government. To the sixth and seventh questions the answer is, that Mr. H. E. Brydges has been requested to deposit the amount to the credit of the Receiver General, but it has not yet been done.

MAPLE SUGAR—PRODUCTION.

Mr. GODBOUT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant a bounty with a view to promote the production and refining of maple sugar in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the intention of the Government to grant a bounty with a view to promote the production and refining of maple sugar in this country.

CENTRAL EXPERIMENTAL FARM—EXPENDITURE.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, What is the total sum spent annually by the Government upon the Central Experimental Farm since it was established to the first day of July, 1890? Also, the total sums spent upon each of the other Experimental Stations up to 1st July, 1890?

Mr. HAGGART. I suggest that the hon. gentleman put his question in the form of a motion, as considerable work is required to provide the information. Mr. Mara has placed a similar motion on the Notice paper. The clerks in the Agriculture Department are preparing papers in answer to it, and as soon as they are down, I will furnish the hon. gentleman with the information.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS—INTEREST.

Mr. CHRISTIE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to raise the rate of interest in the Post Office savings banks to 4 per cent., for the benefit of depositors and of the Dominion?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the intention of the Government to raise the rate of interest in the Post Office savings banks to 4 per cent., for the benefit of depositors and of the Dominion.

CHICAGO EXHIBITION—INVITATION TO CANADA.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether Canada has been invited to take part in the approaching exhibition at Chicago? And, whether it is the intention of the Government to take the necessary steps to enable Canada to take part in this exhibition?

Mr. HAGGART. Only a few days ago the Government received an invitation, through the American Consul General, Colonel Lay, from the President of the United States, to assist in a World's Columbian Exhibition in 1893, and the matter is at present being considered by the Government.

ELECTIONS IN NAPIERVILLE.

Mr. MONET asked, Whether the Government has been informed that Charles Bédard, Esq., notary of the village of St. Rémi, and revisor of the electoral lists for the County of Napierville, took a very active part in the last two elections which took place in the County of Napierville on the 5th of March and the 9th of December last; that the said Charles Bédard acted as a general caballer; that he obstructed the free voting of several electors; that he lodged certain electors and gave them food and drink; and that he even gave various sums of money to certain electors to bind them to vote for the ministerial candidate? Whether the Government will dismiss this employé, if he is found guilty of corrupt practices before a competent court as the law now requires; or whether the Government intends to soften the rule in this case?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government have not the information which is stated in the question. The revising officer is not an officer of the Government.

LATE ELECTIONS—SENATORS AS CANDIDATES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Did any senators resign to become candidates at the late election? If so, who were they? Did the Government ask them to resign? Were they elected? If not, have they been recalled to the Senate?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Only one senator was a candidate at the late election, and he was the Hon. Mr. Howlan. He was not asked to resign, he was not elected, and he has been recalled to the Senate.

FORMATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Did the Minister of Justice or the Hon. Mr. Abbott, after the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, advise or suggest to His Excellency the Governor General that Sir Charles Tupper be asked to form a Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is a question, Mr. Speaker, which I think we ought not to answer.

KINGSTON POST OFFICE.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of the annual report of the Postmaster of Kingston, including the year 1889, and containing a list in detail of the several lessees of the boxes in the Kingston Post Office; also copies of the list of the said lessees for the said year 1889, containing the names of the said several lessees for the said year, beginning at the letter "B."

Mr. HAGGART. I may state in answer to the hon. gentleman, that there is no such information in the department here.

Mr. AMYOT. I will let the motion stand while I compare this answer with the other answer given to a previous question.

Motion allowed to stand.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return giving:—1st. The number of Chinese immigrants that have entered Canada since the date of the last Return ordered by the House, specifying: (a) The ports at which said Chinese immigrants were entered; (b) The amount of duty or head-money collected; (c) The number that entered by virtue of return certificates; (d) The number of return certificates issued during the same period, and the number of Chinese that during the same period passed through Canada in bond to destinations out of Canada. 2nd. The number that entered Canada as belonging to the Diplomatic or Consular service of China. 3rd. The number of Chinese that entered Canada during the same period, either as tourists, men of science, students or merchants. 4th. Copies of all correspondence, if any, between the Imperial Government and this Government, or between this Government and the Government of China, if any, or between the Government of British Columbia and this Government, or with any labour organization, or with any company, corporation or person, having reference to the Chinese Restriction Act or suggesting amendments to the same.—(Mr. Gordon.)

Correspondence, telegrams, letters, reports and other papers relating to the proposed "additional property accommodation" of Intercolonial Railway at St. John, N. B.—(Mr. Davies, P.E.I.)

Copies of all correspondence, reports, paper writings and documents respecting the seizure and sale of the schooner Marie Eliza, in 1887, by the Collector of Customs at Rimouski.—(Mr. Langelier.)

Copies of all reports of engineers respecting the proposed Soulanges Canal, showing the number of sections into which the work is to be divided, the length of each section, the quantities of the several classes of work in each section, and detailed estimates of the cost of each section; the whole to be accompanied with a continuous tracing or plan and profile of the whole line, showing the several sections and the structures of each section.—(Mr. Mousseau.)

Statement showing the amount of Dominion notes in circulation, May, 1891, and amount of gold and guaranteed debentures held in security on said date for redemption of said notes. Also statement showing the proportion of such gold reserve held by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, and the proportion thereof held by any chartered Banks for such redemption. Also statement showing the arrangements made with such Banks, under which they hold such gold reserve.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Copies of all correspondence and all documents, or other information in the possession of the Government, relating to entire horses stationed at the Central Experimental Farm, or at any other of the Experimental Farms in the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. McMillan.)

Copies of all petitions, correspondence and other documents respecting the late change in the Postmastership in Lobo Post Office.—(Mr. Armstrong.)

1. Copy of original plan and also of alteration made to Kingston Dry Dock, showing the additional excavations, crib work, extra masonry and additional iron works in caissons, together with the quantities of each class of extra work paid or undertaken to be paid for, and the rates of payment for the said extra work. 2. Copy of the Order in Council dated 5th July, 1890, concerning the contract for the building of said dry dock.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Return giving the dates of the publication and of the distribution of the English reports, bulletins, and other printed matter of the Central Experimental Farm, from its establishment up to the 1st June, 1891; also, the dates of the publication and of the distribution of the French reports respecting the same subject and for the same time.—(Mr. Devlin.)

Copies of all correspondence, letters or telegrams addressed to the Auditor General with reference to the payment of accounts as rendered to the Auditor General by the Returning Officer of the Electoral District of the East Riding of Elgin; also the names and post office addresses of the Returning Officer, Deputy Returning Officers, Poll Clerks and Constables for the Electoral District of the East Riding of Elgin; also the respective amounts as claimed by each; the amount actually paid to each up to date, including amount of balance, if any, as rendered by the Returning Officer in his original account to the Auditor General.—(Mr. Ingram.)

Return showing: 1st. The names of all permanent clerks in the department of Public Works, their duties and annual salaries; 2nd. Names of all extra clerks in the said department, their salaries, and the kind of work performed; also copies of their Civil Service examination certificates; 3rd. The names of all persons doing extra work outside of the building; and the nature of work, giving the names of ladies and gentlemen separately; 4th. The names of mechanics or others employed in the Government workshops at Ottawa; 5th. The names of all messengers employed in the said department, either permanent or temporary; 6th. The number and names of all labourers employed by the said department since January last, in and around the buildings under Government control at Ottawa, including Rideau Hall, stating the kind of work performed and wages paid.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Copies of all correspondence, papers and documents relating to the appointment of Customs Officers at Crystal Beach and Point Abino, in the Township of Bertie, and Carroll's Landing, in the Township of Humberstone, in the County of Welland.—(Mr. German.)

Copies of the report of Thomas Munro, Government Engineer, upon the Manchester Ship Canal.—(Mr. Mulock.)

ADJOURNMENT—DOMINION DAY.

Mr. DENISON moved that the House do now adjourn. He said: I make this motion on the ground that by sitting to-day we are setting a very bad example to the people of this Dominion when we make of this day a statutory holiday and then fail to observe it. We are also setting a bad example to all the employers of labour throughout the country by not observing the holiday we call on them to observe, and we, further, are showing scant courtesy to our own national day. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Cochrane, that the House do now adjourn.

Motion negatived.

SUB-COLLECTOR, PELEE ISLAND.

Mr. ALLAN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, letters and telegrams relating to the removal of F. B. McCormick from the office of Sub-Collector, Pelee Island; and copies of all letters, telegrams and telephone messages relating to the appointment of J. H. C. Atkinson to take charge of said office; also all copies of correspondence relating to the dismissal of Atkinson, and the reinstatement of McCormick.

He said: The subject of this enquiry has excited considerable discussion on the part of the people of Pelee Island and of the south riding of Essex, and has excited no little attention in the whole County of Essex, where all the facts and circumstances connected with this extraordinary shuffle in a public office are very well known and understood. The correspondence and papers asked for relate to this charge, and I have made my motion broad enough to cover all papers, correspondence, telephone messages and telegrams, relating to this whole matter, and trust they will all be brought down. The facts are simply these:

Mr. F. B. McCormick was appointed Collector of Customs in Pelee Island, not only against the wishes, but in spite of the very strong remonstrances of the people of that district. That feeling of dissatisfaction developed into a very strong opposition to the parties who secured his appointment, and the Government who were responsible for it,—a feeling which manifested itself at the very first opportunity at the polls. At the elections in June last, for the Province of Ontario, the first Liberal majority was recorded on that Island in favour of Mr. Balfour, M.P.P., a result which was said to be due largely to the dissatisfaction felt by the people with this appointment. And, Sir, the significance of that vote cannot be mistaken, for I have only to point out that Pelee Island previous to that contest, had always given a majority for the Conservative candidates and the Conservative party. At one election the entire vote of the Island, with the exception of one vote, went for the Conservative party. Coming down to the recent contest, the unexpected dissolution of Parliament, the sudden appeal to the country, and the midnight attack which hon. gentlemen opposite made upon the voters of Canada, the Conservative party found this Pelee Island matter unsettled, and the election had not proceeded very far when the party in that riding became alarmed at the news received. Unrestricted reciprocity was not only a powerful and potent factor in that contest, there as elsewhere, but the news came from all parts of the Island that unless Mr. F. B. McCormick was removed, instead of that Island going solidly Conservative, the candidate who now has the honour to address this House would practically sweep the Island. It was at this exciting and critical period of the contest that an act unworthy of the Government, and unworthy of the politicians in that riding, was committed. The people were made to believe that Mr. McCormick would be removed from his situation. Letters were shown throughout the Island, one purporting to be from the late First Minister, promising that Mr. McCormick would be at once and permanently removed and a person satisfactory to the people appointed in his place. Other letters to the same effect were also circulated, and the word given to the people that, if they would only support the Government candidate, a change would be made which would be satisfactory to them. I want to direct the attention of this House and the country to the extraordinary action of the Minister of Customs on that occasion. I say his action was extraordinary, and it will be his duty to explain it to the House and to the country. We find—at least, I believe I have evidence to prove it—that hon. gentleman, during a political contest, telegraphing from one part of Ontario to a party who had nothing to do with the office, that a collector had been appointed for Pelee Island. Pelee Island is an outport of Amherstburg, but the Minister of Customs telegraphed to the collector at Windsor:

"Inform J. H. C. Atkinson that he has been appointed Collector of Customs at Pelee Island."

That message was sent about the 20th February, when the election contest was at fever heat. Mr. Atkinson was a prominent man on the Island and was taking a prominent part in the contest. He was a pronounced advocate of unrestricted reciprocity; and we had the spectacle of the Minister of Customs wiring to the Collector of Customs at Windsor, who had nothing to do with Pelee Island, to inform J. H. C. Atkinson, with whom I presume the Minister of Customs had had no previous correspondence, that he was appointed collector of Pelee Island. I do not think the Minister of Customs could delegate authority by wire, and whatever was done should have been done through the Collector of Customs at Amherstburg. We find that the Collector at Windsor telephoned to Pelee Island, for there is a telephone between the two places, informing Mr. Atkinson that he was appointed Collector of Customs there, and on the strength of that telephone message, the office was handed over to him. I endeavoured to elicit some information from the Minister of Customs in regard to this matter by a question which I put on the Notice paper, and, while I do not intend to differ with the hon. gentleman on a question of fact, I will require him to explain his apparent contradictions. I asked:

"What is the name of the present sub-collector on Pelee Island? At what date was he appointed? Has he continuously discharged the duties of that office since the date of his appointment? Was any other person appointed sub-collector at that outport, or in any way instructed to discharge the duties of that office during the present year? If so, what is his name, the date of his appointment, and the amount of his salary, and is he still in the employ of the Government?

"Mr. BOWELL. The name of the present sub-collector on Pelee Island is F. B. McCormick. He was appointed on the 1st December, 1888. Mr. McCormick has not been continuously discharging the duties of that office since the date of his appointment. No other person has been appointed sub-collector at that outport. Mr. J. H. C. Atkinson was requested to perform the duties of sub-collector on Pelee Island during the absence of Mr. McCormick, who had been ordered to report for duty at Windsor.

"On the 28th of April, 1891, Mr. McCormick was instructed to resume his duties as sub-collector on Pelee Island, and Mr. Atkinson to be paid for the time he had acted as sub-collector, at the rate of $400 per annum."

The hon. Minister states that no other appointment had been made. I will ask that hon. gentleman to explain his telegram, of which I have a copy. The people of Pelee Island were assured that a change would be made; they were assured of it by these letters which I have and this telegram which I will read, and I desire to know by what authority this office was handed over. The Minister of Customs sent a telegram, not dated from Ottawa, but I suppose during his campaign tour through the country. This is a copy of the telephone message which was received:

"February 21, 1891.

"J. H. C. ATKINSON.

"The Minister of Customs has ordered me to inform you that you are appointed Customs Officer at Pelee Island in place of F. B. McCormick.

(Sd.) "MILES COWAN,
"Windsor."

Mr. Atkinson remarks upon that:

"I telephoned answer to Cowan accepting office I also wrote to him and also the hon. Minister of Customs by the next mail leaving the Island, accepting the office."

Here is a copy of the reply:

"OTTAWA, 26th February, 1891.

"J. H. C. ATKINSON, Esq.,
"Pelee Island.

"SIR,—The hon. the Minister of Customs is absent from Ottawa, but your letter of the 21st instant will be brought under his notice.

"Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) "E. L. SANDERS,
"Private Secretary."

Now I propose to read what purports to be a copy, and which I believe to be a copy, of the telegram sent by the Minister of Customs from Norwood. If this was a forgery, then this office was offered on the strength of a forgery to Mr. Atkinson. Mr. F. B. McCormick told people on the Island that he had been removed, and he at once left the Island. He was to report at Windsor, but instead of doing so I saw him on nomination day at Kingsville, and I found that he was going up and down the township lines and the side lines of Essex working for the party that had removed him from office. If he was ordered to report at Windsor, he went to Amherstburg, and he said he was going to discharge duties in that office, where they have already three collectors, though the business is less than it was when one collector did the whole work. This is a copy of a letter which confirms the telephone message upon which the office was given to Mr. Atkinson :

"COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
"WINDSOR, ONT., 21st July, 1891.

"J. H. C. ATKINSON, Esq.,
"Pelee Island, Ont.

"SIR,—I telegraphed you this morning informing you that the hon. the Minister of Customs had appointed you Customs officer on Pelee Island, and I now send copy of his telegram to me :

"'NORWOOD, February 20, 1891.

"'To COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, Windsor.

"'Inform J. H. C. Atkinson that he has been appointed Customs officer on Pelee Island in place of McCormick removed, and order McGlashan back.

(Sd.) "'M. BOWELL.'

"I remain, your obedient servant,
"MILES COWAN,
"Acting Collector."

This is the telegram on the strength of which the Customs collector stated that McCormick was removed and Atkinson was appointed. McCormick announced that fact on the Island and on the mainland, and every effort was made, and I suppose with a great degree of success, to secure for the Administration voters who were antagonistic to the Government on account of this appointment. This is an extraordinary spectacle. If it be not true, if these despatches are forgeries, the Customs collectors knew that there was a usurper on Pelee Island. On the strength of these messages, the office was handed over to Mr. J. H. C. Atkinson, and I say that the conduct of the hon. Minister on that occasion was unprecedented. We often hear hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House talk about British precedent. Why, Sir, do people imagine or believe that a member of the British Parliament, a member of the British Government, Lord Salisbury or any other distinguished man, during an election contest, would trample upon the appointing power in this way, and make an appointment for the purpose, as I believe, of deceiving the electors? Such, Sir, I believe to be the conduct of the Minister of Customs on that occasion. It will be his duty to explain the extraordinary haste with which he made this appointment; it will be his duty to say why this telegram was sent at a time when he was, probably, stumping his own riding, or the riding adjacent to his. I believe this extraordinary telegram was sent in order to influence the honest electors of Pelee Island after they had declared, a large number of them, that they would not support the Government candidate as long as that appointment continued. They had assurances of prominent men in that riding, they had the letters that I have mentioned, they had also the statement and the action of the Customs authorities of Canada, removing, apparently, the old collector and substituting J. H. C. Atkinson in his place. Now, the next information we have in reference to this matter is a letter written by Mr. Atkinson to George Gott, collector at Amherstburg, who has authority over this office. Pelee Island is an outport of Amherstburg, and after taking possession of the office, it seemed to be Mr. Atkinson's aim and effort to secure proper instructions as how to conduct that office. He says :

"I wrote to Geo. Gott, Esq., Collector of Amherstburg under whose survey this port is, on the 3rd May, 1891, for instructions. I received the following letter :—

"'CUSTOMS, CANADA,
"'COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
"'AMHERSTBURG, 14th March, 1891.

"'J. H. C. ATKINSON, Esq., Pelee Island, Ont.

"'SIR,—I beg to acknowledge yours of the 3rd instant, and in reply to state: I have no official knowledge of your appointment to the office at South Port. I direct all papers to the sub-collector, therefore if any change has taken place without my knowledge, the proper person receives the letters, papers and packages. I was astonished at the time I heard of changes being made, that I, the collector under whom said port is operated, and in whose survey South Port is situated, not being made acquainted with the matter. If any official orders should be received by me from the department in regard to the appointment, you will be immediately apprised thereof.

"'I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"'COLLECTOR.'"

That purports to be a copy of a letter from George Gott, Amherstburg, who expresses his surprise that any change should be made in the office of collector at the outport, which is under his district. Now, Mr. Gott, no doubt, was very much astonished when he addressed his complaint on that occasion to the wrong party, when he knew that some person had got possession of that office in an illegal way, and I think it was his duty to have called the attention of the Minister to that circumstance at that time. But, as a matter of fact, Collector Gott and all these collectors were in the ring, they understood the plot, they were working in order to secure the vote of the electors of Pelee Island, and he purposely, no doubt, kept quiet on this subject until long after the election. The next document I will present consists of notes communicated to Mr. Atkinson :

"Having received no instructions from either Ottawa or Amherstburg, at the opening of navigation I went to Windsor on 7th April, and called at Custom house ; could get no instructions there; telephoned Collector, Amherstburg, who informed me that he could give me no instructions. I then wrote to the Minister of Customs as follows:—

"'HON. M. BOWELL, Minister of Customs, "'Ottawa, Ont.

"'DEAR SIR,—On the 21st day of February, 1891, I received the following telegram from Mr. Miles Cowan, acting Collector of Windsor, viz.: 'The Minister of Customs has ordered me to inform you that you are appointed Customs officer at Pelee Island in the place of F. B. McCormick.

(Sd.) "'MILES COWAN.'

"I also received a letter from Mr. Cowan stating: 'Your telegram dated at Norwood, 20th February, 1891, which read as follows, viz.: Inform J. H. C. Atkinson that he has been appointed Customs officer on Pelee Island in place of Mr. McCormick removed, and order McGlashan back.

(Sd.) 'M. BOWELL.
"'For MILES COWAN, Acting Collector.'

"I at once took possession of what of the office I could get, and have since acted for your department on the Island by giving clearances and accepting duties. I have called for instructions and have not received them as fully as I should, and now apply to you to give them to me.

"Yours truly,
"J. H. C. ATKINSON."

The next communication was a letter from the collector at Amherstburg to J. H. C. Atkinson, dated on the 29th of April, as I wish the House to remember, after the election was all over and the excitement had subsided. Mr. Gott was a very active man in that contest, and I shall refer to that matter before I sit down. Now, to show that he was in this plot, here is a letter dated the 29th April, some time after the election. He allowed Mr. Atkinson to remain at his post, the man who, he states, had usurped the office and taken possession of it in an illegal way, and he now calls upon him to surrender the same:

"SIR,—I have to request you to cease acting as an officer of the Customs until you are legally authorized to do so. No person can have any right to act as an officer of the Customs until duly appointed, or until the office had been regularly handed over to him. I am responsible for the actions of all officers of Customs in my survey. I stated to you before that when I received any instructions about you, I would let you know; therefore, if you have taken possession of any Customs books, papers or other property of the office, you must at once deliver the same to F. B. McCormick, sub-collector of South Port. I know no other person on Pelee Island as an officer of Customs but him. You must understand I am personally responsible for any irregularity that may occur (if any). I therefore feel that I cannot allow the interests of the Customs Department on Pelee Island as now conducted.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
(Sd.) "GEO. GOTT,
"Collector.

"I have handed to officer McCormick a copy of this.
"GEO. GOTT, Coll."

This, Mr. Speaker, was evidently written on the collector's own account. He does not state that he was authorized in any way to request that the office should be vacated. He does it on his own account; he is collector and is responsible for the actions of all officers of Customs in his survey, a point which would have been well taken if it had been taken as soon as the collector knew about it. I have other documents which will throw light upon this matter. One is as follows:—

"CUSTOMS, CANADA,
"COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
"AMHERSTBURG, 30th April, 1891.

"J. H. C. ATKINSON, Esq.,
"Pelee Island.

"SIR,—The following is a copy of a letter of instructions I have received from the hon. the Commissioner of Customs, received since I sent a letter to you on the 29th instant.

"'CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT, CANADA,
"'OTTAWA, 28th April, 1891.

"'GEO. GOTT, Esq.,
"'Collector of Customs, Amherstburg.

"'SIR,—I am instructed by the hon. the Minister of Customs to inform you that, pending further investigation by a special officer of the department, the intended appointment of Mr. Atkinson as sub-collector of Customs on Pelee Island will remain in abeyance. You will, therefore, instruct Dr. McCormick to resume his duties as sub-collector on the Island until further instructed.

"'As soon as the special officer's report is received, such action will be taken as will be deemed most in the interest of the revenue and the people of the Island. Notify Mr. Atkinson and Dr. McCormick of the contents of this letter, and pay Mr. Atkinson for services rendered by him at the rate of $400 per annum.

"'I have the honour to be, Sir,
"'Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) "'J. JOHNSON.
"'Commissioner.'

"I have, therefore, to request you to call at my office at your earliest convenience, so that I may take account of your services.

"I am, Sir, yours respectfully,
"COLLECTOR."

Here is a copy of Mr. Atkinson's reply to Mr. Johnson's letter:

"PELEE ISLAND, 2nd May, 1891.

"GEO. GOTT, Esq.,
"Collector, Amherstburg.

"SIR,—Your letters of the 29th and 30th April have been received and contents noted.

"Yours truly,
"J. H. C. ATKINSON."

As I have pointed out, on April 28th when the hon. Minister had no political axe to grind, we find that he is animated by laudable interest in the revenue and the people of Pelee Island. Although the hon. gentleman perhaps did not know the extent of the plot, it was certainly very indiscreet and improper for the Minister of Customs, or any man in his station, to make an appointment in that way. The hon. Minister may not have been aware of the desperate efforts that were made in the South Essex contest, of which this matter is only one instance; but I submit that it is the duty of the Minister of Customs to explain to this House and to the country, and particularly to the people of Pelee Island and of South Essex, who have been deceived in this matter, why a telegram was not sent from Ottawa, the seat of Government, but from Norwood, and a public office handed over from one party to another to secure votes, and while I obtained the majority of the votes, I did not get the vote I expected, on account of these efforts of the Conservative party to secure a victory in South Essex. I have another matter in connection with this affair which shows the length to which these men proceeded at Pelee Island. The telephone between the mainland and the Island is under the control of the Government. It was well known to the political party to which I belong that it was very dangerous for us to communicate with the island by telephone; still in some cases we were obliged to do so. In regard to this collectorship business, I find—or the person who was temporarily appointed there but not really appointed, found—there was a telephone message intercepted at one of the stations, and that message was used by the Conservative Association of the town of Leamington. Complaint of the matter has been made to the Government or to the proper officer, the inspector of the Government telephone system, but no action has been taken. I propose to read an affidavit in regard to the way this telephone system is conducted, and to show the injustice and insecurity of the manner in which it is operated, to which the attention of the Government has been called. The affidavit is as follows;—

"PELEE ISLAND, ONT., May, 1891.

"1. I, John Finlay, J.P., do solemnly declare that on the 28rd day of May, 1891, I was personally present at the interview between J. H. C. Atkinson and F. B. McCormick, at the latter's residence at Pelee Island in the County of Essex, Province of Ontario.

"2. That J. H. C. Atkinson requested Mr. McCormick to give him information with regard to the interrupting and copying of a conversation which has passed between the said J. H. C. Atkinson and W. D. Balfour, M.P.P., on the 24th day of February, on the telephone cable between Leamington and Pelee Island.

"3. That F. B. McCormick did at first positively refuse to give the requested information, on the ground that he did not wish to get any person into trouble over the matter.

"4. That after some conversation regarding the matter, F. B. McCormick made a formal statement as follows:—'That on the 26th day of February, he, F. B. McCormick, was informed by Wm. Prosser, Fishery inspector, Leamington, that a copy of a telephone service conversation between J. H. C. Atkinson and W. D. Balfour, M.P.P., had been sent from station No. 2 of the telephone line between Leamington and Pelee Island to Mr. Smith, druggist, of Leamington, and secretary of the Conservative Association there. That he, F. B. McCormick, did see the said copy and learned that the conversation was intercepted at station No. 2 by a Miss Quick who was then visiting with the family of the operator, Wm. Grubb. That Miss Quick made an affidavit to the correctness of the said copy before him, F. B. McCormick. That he believed that the operator at station No. 2, Wm. Grubb, was aware of the transaction after the fact.'

"And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Act respecting extra-judicial oaths.

"Made and declared before me this 26th day of May, 1891. } JOHN FINLAY, J.P.

"JAS. I. SRIGLEY, Sen., J.P. for Essex."

I read this affidavit for the purpose of showing that the attention of the Government has been called to it, and I propose to put a question on the Notice paper asking what action the Government intend to take in regard to this very serious matter. That is not a private telephone company, but is under the control of the Government, and the attention of the Government has been called to this misconduct, as is proved by a letter of acknowledgment. The reason I bring this complaint in here is to have it placed on record, for the matter is going to be followed up. It is simply scandalous that a telephone office should be used in this way. It is well known in Essex by the Reformers that, during an election contest, we cannot use with any safety the telephone line to Pelee Island; and we have the fact in evidence, it may be important or not, that a conversation was intercepted, used by the local Conservative Association, and subsequently reported to the Dominion Government. In order to show that the attention of the Government has been called to this matter, I will read the following letter:—

'J. H. C. ATKINSON, Esq.,
"Pelee Island, Ont.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter on the 20th ultimo. The matter will be inquired into at once, and I will advise you of the result as early as practicable.

"I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,
"F. N. GISBORNE, Supt."

Nothing more has been heard of this matter. It was reported to the Government that there was evidence that such a conversation was intercepted and probably used. The parties complained to the proper officer, but, so far, they have been unable to obtain satisfaction. Now, Sir, these are serious charges, they are charges in which members on both sides of this House are interested. Most certainly the telegraph and telephone and post office service should be held sacred in this country. So far as that telephone line in Essex is concerned, we now know to our sorrow in many cases that it has not been so held. I do not know that I have anything more to say at this stage, except to call the attention of the Government to the conduct of the Collector of Customs in that riding.

Mr. BOWELL. Who signed that last letter you read; you did not tell us where it is from?

Mr. ALLAN. It is signed F. N. Gisborne, Superintendent of Government Telephone Service, Department of Public Works. I state, Sir, that I believe the course of the hon. Minister is unprecedented. I do not think it would be possible for him to find such conduct as his justified by the conduct of any British statesman. I do not believe that in the United States any politician would do such a thing at any time, not even during an election contest. We find the hon. gentlemen opposite stating that they copy British precedents, but I venture to say that neither in England nor in the United States would it be possible to find a precedent for their conduct. However, we very often experience that if there is anything bad in the United States' system of Government, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches copy it. They have copied the National Policy and the Gerrymander from the United States, and they are to-day, by their course of conduct, ushering in what I believe to be that most pernicious principle, namely, that to the victors belong the spoils. In our section of the country, and I believe it is the same all over Canada, they have encouraged paid officers of the Dominion to go out and take an active part in election campaigns. In the riding of South Essex, the collectors of Customs took the stump from the start to the finish of the contest. Mr. Gott, collector at Amherstburg, was an active worker in the campaign; he is not a speaker and he did not take the stump, but he was an active worker. Mr. McCormick, who was collector of Customs, and who was ordered to report at Windsor, took an active part, as did also Dr. King, of Kingsville, and Mr. Scott, of Leamington, two collectors of Customs. It is a matter of regret to me that civil servants of this Dominion should be allowed to act in this way. I deplore the day when the Government of this country placed upon the Statute-book the right of these men to vote, for I believe that we are drifting into a system which will lead to the adoption of the very worst feature in the American system, that is, the principle that to the victors belong the spoils. I believe that these public officers should be neutral, and that they should not take any part in an election campaign. I would not expect, of course, that every person appointed to every paltry office in this country should lose the right of citizenship; that is too much to expect, but the line should be drawn somewhere. If a person accepts an important position like that of collector of Customs—whether he be Reformer or Conservative, I don't care which—it should be the policy of both sides of this House to prevent such a man from taking an active part in elections. I refer especially to the County of Essex, because I know of my own personal knowledge what did take place there, but I believe the same system obtains everywhere else over the Dominion. Every one of these officials I have referred to were active and bitter partisans, doing all they could against the Reform candidate. Not only was this the case with the four collectors of Customs, but it was also the case with other officials in the office. One gentleman was so active, and so much in the secrets of the party as to what the Red Parlour was able to do, that he thought it safe to put up money on the result, and he lost four or five hundred dollars on the result in South Essex. That showed that he was prominent in the secrets of the party workers, because on the face of it South Essex should have gone for the platform the Liberals advocated by at least 500 majority. But this officer knew that there were such influences as public works and the Red Parlour, and he was so much in the secrets of the party that he lost four or five hundred on the result of the contest. I say that it is due to the people of Pelee Island, due to the County of Essex, and due to this House and to the Dominion of Canada, that the Minister of Customs should give an explanation of his extraordinary conduct in this matter.

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Speaker, there can be no objection to bringing down such correspondence as is in the Department of Customs, and I dare say also, such as can be found in the Department of Public Works. The hon. gentleman has a great deal more correspondence in his possession than I ever saw or heard of. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in much that he has said in reference to the feeling on Pelee Island, but there are one or two statements which he made which it would have been better had he verified them by facts. In the first place he stated—and I mention this because it refers to one who is no longer here—he stated among other things that in addition to the letter or telegrams which he read of my own, a letter was also sent by the late First Minister to the effect that if they would vote for the Conservative party, and against the hon. member himself, Mr. McCormick would be removed from the Island and another officer substituted in his place. Whether that be correct or not I am not prepared to say, for the reason that I never had any conversation with the late First Minister in reference to the appointment of Mr. McCormick, or the substitution of Mr. Atkinson during the short period in which he performed the duties of sub-collector on Pelee Island. I doubt very much whether, knowing as I do the cautious manner in which the late First Minister carried on correspondence of that kind, that he ever wrote such a letter. He may have written a letter. I am not prepared to say that he did not, as I repeat I know nothing about it, but I question very much whether any letter can be produced containing the promises which the hon. gentleman has said were contained in that letter. I shall say no more in reference to that matter. The statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Allan) is quite correct with regard to the difficulties which occurred upon the original appointment of Mr. McCormick and the feeling which existed on the Island at the time. Mr. McCormick—after the death of the elder McCormick, who was, I think, his uncle, but I will not be positive about that—was recommended to the department as being a man of education, and a man well fitted for the position to which he was appointed, and which was worth about $300 a year. A protest was at once entered by the people of the Island against that appointment. They declared the doctor, for certain reasons which they gave, to be unfit, morally and otherwise, for the position. I made full enquiry at the time, and found, to my satisfaction, that the opposition to the doctor arose more from family difficulties than from any want of knowledge or ability on his part to perform the duties of the office. Constant letters of complaint, and, if my recollection serves me aright, petitions demanding his removal were received by the department from the people there. I made enquiries through the inspector, Mr. Mewburn, who certainly will not be accused of being one of those monstrous Tories to whom the hon. gentleman has referred. He was one of the appointments of the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, and he is just as strong in his views and sentiments as the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House. But I will say this for him, that I believe him to be an honest and straightforward officer who conscientiously performs all the duties of his office. His report was that Dr. McCormick was performing his duties on the Island efficiently. Still, the rebellion continued, until I promised more than a year ago that I would make further investigation, and, if possible, make a change and appoint some one who would suit the people. At the time to which the hon. gentleman refers trouble had arisen, but not, so far as my knowledge goes, to the extent which the hon. gentleman has represented. I did order, not the dismissal of Dr. McCormick, but his removal to another port. That Mr. Gott may have felt a little chagrined at not being informed of what was done by the department may be perfectly true. There are many persons who, from the position they hold, think that whenever the head of the department or those who have the responsibility at headquarters, make a change, they should be consulted or should be notified of it. Dr. McCormick was ordered to report for duty at Windsor, where at that time an additional official was required. The hon. gentleman tells us that he did not go there. That was a matter that I knew nothing about until some time afterwards.

Mr. ALLAN. He did not stay there. He may have gone there.

Mr. BOWELL. I subsequently heard from Mr. Gott that he was at Amherstburg, and that he preferred not going to Windsor. A notice was given to Mr. Atkinson to perform the duties of the office. I think the hon. gentleman was quite correct in saying that my letter to Mr. Atkinson stated that he would be appointed. I was not in the city of Ottawa when that was sent, and the probabilities are that he would have been appointed, notwithstanding the fact, of which the hon. gentleman informs us, that he was a great admirer of himself and the unrestricted reciprocity—I was going to say fad, but I do not desire to be disrespectful—the principles of unrestricted reciprocity which the hon. gentleman was advocating, and on which he was contesting his election at that time. But I found the rebellion against him still greater and the objections to him much more numerous on the part of the people than they had been against Dr. McCormick. When the papers come down, the hon. gentleman will see the petitions were large and numerously signed; I do not vouch for their respectability, but I take it for granted that all the farmers and residents of that island are respectable people. After looking carefully into the whole matter, as there was such diversity of opinion, and as I had no positive information in the department of malfeasance of office on the part of Dr. McCormick, I decided that I would reinstate him in the position, and send an officer to make full investigation into all the charges made against him, personally as well as officially; and that, if it should be found that he had been guilty of any of the charges, I would remove him altogether from the service, and appoint some one else instead. It is quite evident that the people of the Island, for what reason I do not know, would scarcely be satisfied with anyone; and I can only come to this conclusion: that it would be much better to send a stranger there, although the patronage which is supposed to belong to those who live in the immediate locality would thereby be taken from them, though I do not believe in all cases that it is at all advisable, in the interests of the revenue, that in every case the parties living in the immediate locality should be consulted as to the person who should be appointed to the position of revenue officer—from the fact that if a collector of Customs or a preventive officer, or any person having to do with the revenue, particularly the Customs revenue, and with smuggling and violation of the law, has many friends in the locality, he is too apt to neglect his duty and befriend them at the expense, if not of the revenue, at least of the service and the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems that the daylight protectionists are nocturnal free traders.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is not original. I know he is philosophical; but I protest most solemnly against his stealing the utterances of my hon. friend who sits behind him. I have a distinct recollection of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) giving utterance to precisely the same language a few years ago, and I have no doubt he was quite honest in doing so, however wrong the sentiment may be in principle. I do not know anything of the action of the officers to whom the hon. gentleman has referred. What course Mr. Gott or Mr. King took in the election was unknown to me. I never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. King but once in my life. In fact, if asked what his politics were, I could not have answered; but I suppose Mr. Gott would have recorded his vote, if at all, in the Conservative interest. I do not know whether he did that or not, or whether he took any active part in the election; but if he did so, he did nothing more than many other Customs officials throughout this Dominion, who worked in the interest of the party with which the hon. gentleman is connected.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, no.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course I could not expect the hon. member for North Wellington to believe what I say.

Mr. McMULLEN. We do not expect any other statement from you, at any rate.

Mr. BOWELL. There is a species of insolence on the part of the hon. gentleman, which it would be unparliamentary to properly refer to. I reiterate the statement I made, that if the officers in the south riding of Essex worked against the hon. gentleman, I was not aware of it. If they did they did no more than many others who worked in favour of the party my hon. friend supports. The hon. member from Wellington may deny that if he pleases.

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us the names.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to stand here and be catechised by the hon. gentleman. I make the statement, and if the hon. gentleman can controvert it, let him do so. But let him ask any hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, whether officials connected with the Customs there did not work, and work energetically against the Conservative party in that Island.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I fail to know it.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say he knows the action of every officer on the Island, whether a preventive officer or other officer, or whether in Charlottetown or elsewhere?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman appealed to members from Prince Edward Island, and I answer him by saying that my knowledge of the Customs officials there is not limited, and I know none in Prince Edward Island who supported the Opposition candidates.

Mr. YEO. I also come from Prince Edward Island, and I know none.

Mr. BOWELL. I have heard of a case in which a man was accused of stealing a horse, and only one man swore to the fact, when the accused told the judge very seriously that he could bring a dozen men who would swear that they did not know it, and did not see him stealing the horse. I think my hon. friends are exactly in the same position. When I receive complaints demanding the dismissal of an official because he worked for his own party, I positively refuse to comply on the ground that the law gives Customs officials the right to vote and work in the interests of their party, and I lay down the principle that it would be dangerous to adopt the view which the hon. member for South Essex takes, when he says that to the victors belong the spoils. Of course, I believe that in all cases when there is a vacancy, that vacancy should be filled by the party in power from its own ranks; but I presume what the hon. gentleman means to imply is that we should adopt the principle which obtains in the United States, and which did obtain before Confederation in Prince Edward Island, namely, that upon the accession to power of a new Government, every officer opposed to it should be dismissed from his position and another appointed.

Mr. ALLAN. That is what it will come to.

Mr. BOWELL. Why should it come to that?

Mr. ALLAN. By the course the Government have taken.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman did not, during the whole of his speech, cite an instance of an officer who had opposed the Government having been dismissed for that reason. Neither did he give any instance in which a political opponent of the Government had been removed from office and a supporter of the Government put in his place.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will give you one in a few minutes.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman wants to obtain a pretext—thinking that the time is not far distant when his party will be in power—which will justify his party in carrying out the principle he advocates. I know nothing of the information the hon. member for Wellington may give the House, but I venture to make this assertion: that he will furnish no instance in connection with the Customs Department of an officer having been removed for political reasons, since I have had control of it, at any rate. I challenge him to furnish any such instance. He may instance cases of which I know nothing, and I am confident that in any cases he will mention there are other reasons than those of a political character which prompted the removal. There have been men removed, as I stated in the answer I gave in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, for having been insolent to their superior officers and for having been intoxicated while on duty. These are good reasons for dismissal. Such instances may have occurred during an election contest when party feeling runs high, but party excitement is no justification for the insolence of any official towards those who are over him. I know nothing of the telegrams to which the hon. gentleman referred. I never heard of any conversation through the telephone being used for political purposes, and if any such be brought to my notice or that of my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of Public Works, we will give it the fullest possible consideration and punish any one who has betrayed the trust reposed in him in so responsible a position as that of a telephone or telegraph officer under the control of the Government. As to the charge made against all these officials, of being in a ring or plot, I have nothing to say, for the simple reason that I have no knowledge whatever of the kind. My whole conduct in connection with this Pelee Island business has been directed by the reasons I have given; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that if I had the same thing to do over again, I would not hesitate for one moment, under the circumstances, to repeat my action, and I tell the hon. gentleman if Mr. McCormick is found to be what some members of his own family have represented him to be—if he be as bad as they say he is, I shall take care, if I remain in the Customs Department, to have him removed. If I find, however, that the feeling is simply of a personal character, I shall not deem it my duty to recommend to my colleagues his dismissal. And it is just as well the hon. gentleman should understand that the feeling against Mr. Atkinson is just as strong, if I am to believe the petitions sent to the department demanding—for that is the manner in which the people of Pelee Island treat their officials—to have him removed, as it is against Dr. McCormick. I have no reason to think that Mr. Atkinson is unfit for that position. I believed it to be in the interests of the revenue and the Customs Department that Mr. McCormick, at the time, should be removed to another sphere of usefulness where he would be away from those personal feelings which are so strong against him, and another man put in his place. I found, however, that the personal feeling was just as strong against the person who was recommended for the position, and, under all the circumstances, I felt it was only a matter of justice to Mr. McCormick that he should be reinstated, as the other gentleman had only been temporarily named and not appointed by Order in Council. I did use, I doubt not, the word "appointed," but, under the circumstances, had I reflected, I would not have done so. The gentleman named was placed in the position by a letter from the head of the department and not by an Order in Council, so that it rested with the head of the department to remove him in the same manner. I shall not reply to the hon. gentleman's tirade against the officials. So far as I know, they perform their duty. If they had worked against him, I do not think I would have said they did not do their duty in that case, but that, however, is a matter of opinion. So long as the law gives Customs and other officials the right to record their votes, and they do so in an inoffensive manner, without insulting their opponents or members belonging to the other party, I shall never interfere with them. It may be a question, as the hon. gentleman says, whether any official should be given his franchise. That is, I admit, a disputable point, and when the House decides that officials shall not vote, it will then become the duty of any Government to remove them should they violate the law in that respect. But, so long as they have the right to vote, I shall not individually find fault with them as long as they simply record their vote and exercise their franchise in a legitimate and gentlemanly way.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not the complaint. The complaint is that they have taken the stump.

Mr. BOWELL. I have already told the hon. gentleman that I am not aware of that, and if the hon. gentleman lays down the principle that men in the employment of the Government should be removed for taking the stump either for or against the Government, I am inclined to think that there are a good many of his friends in the Dominion who would lose their positions. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but human nature is the same in the Grit as it is in the Tory.

Mr. LAURIER. You should make the punishment the same on each side.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no doubt that, if the hon. gentleman were in power, and his friends were to advocate his policy, and try to keep him in office, he would keep them in their positions, and that, in his quiet and pleasant manner, he would turn out of office every one who spoke against him. That is the interpretation which I put upon his statement, because we all know the course which the hon. gentleman will take whenever he crosses the floor, which I hope he will not. The hon. member will have these papers brought down. He has made a mountain out of a very small mole-hill. I do not begrudge the hon. gentleman the feeling that he owes his election to the appointment of this man at a salary of $200 or $300, but, surely, if by our action we could transform the opinions of all the Conservatives in the country and lead them over to the other side, hon. gentlemen opposite should thank us for doing so. It is the first time in my many years of political life that I have heard Liberals complaining of the Government for making people their friends. I will endeavour, if I live long enough, to visit that Island, which I believe is a garden situated in the midst of a lake, in order to see that the people there are re-converted to the true faith, and that they do not vote for the hon. gentleman again.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We have been hearing lately of so many questionable transactions on the part of the Government that a new case, when it is brought forward, seems not to strike the House with the force it otherwise would, but I think you, Mr. Speaker, must agree with me that this is a very serious charge, and that the idea of prostituting one of the public departments so as to disarrange the public service for the purposes of an election is a charge which should receive serious attention at the hands of this House. The Minister of Customs virtually admits that my hon. friend (Mr. Allan) has presented his statement truthfully and fairly, but he says he has tried to make a mountain out of a mole-hill. The Minister has had the reputation of being a very efficient man at the head of his department, but I fear he will lose his reputation in connection with this matter. What are the facts of the case? He takes exception to the statements made in the letter which was alluded to, and says he does not know whether that was so or not. My hon. friend says this letter was used among the electors with the intent of influencing the election. The Minister said he does not know anything about it, and that is the only answer. Here is a sub-collector of Customs at Pelee Island who is so obnoxious to some of the people of that island that they object to support the Government candidate, provided this officer is retained in his position. That came to the Minister's knowledge. He frankly admits that it came to his knowledge before this, and that he took the precaution of enquiring into the charges against this officer in order to see whether the objection taken was owing to his neglect of public duty, or was due to personal pique or private malice on the part of some who had feelings against him. The result was that he ordered Mr. Mewburn, the inspector of Customs, to visit that outport and report, and the Minister of Customs states that the report was that Mr. McCormick was discharging his duties in the public interests and in a satisfactory manner, and that any feeling against him was a local feeling and the result of a family feud that had sprung up there. Consequently the Minister left him in possession of his office. He did not deem that the fact of some of his relatives not desiring him to retain that office was a sufficient ground for removing him as long as he was discharging his duties satisfactorily in the public interest. If that is so, and no one finds fault with that, how comes it that, when he had already judged that man to be a proper man to retain in office, when he had the report of the official whom he sent there that he was a proper man to retain there, how comes it that, with no subsequent violation of duty on his part, the Minister of Customs, who had stood by this officer from 1888 to 1890, thinks proper on the eve of an election to remove that officer and appoint another in his place? Is that the way in which the Customs Department is administered? He does not deny that, from a village in the County of Northumberland, away from his department, away from his duties, he telegraphed, not that an appointment was intended to be made, but that the appointment of Mr. Atkinson had been made in place of Mr. McCormick, and that Mr. McCormick was to report himself at Windsor because they wanted an extra man there. Mr. Atkinson then assumes the position, but Mr. McCormick does not report to Windsor where they wanted additional help, but, in violation of the Customs rules and regulations, and by a clear act of insubordination, Mr. McCormick goes to the port of Amherstburg, where the Minister does not say he is required at all; and then, because he has been insubordinate and has not performed the duty he was ordered to perform, instead of his being punished, we find he is reinstated in his position, while the man who was appointed in his place is summarily dismissed. Is that the way the Customs Department is worked; that servants who are insubordinate and refuse to obey the demands of their superiors, are to be rewarded by being restored to their position again? Now, then, he says that Mr. Gott, the collector at Amherstburg, of which Pelee Island is an outport, might have felt a little chagrined about this, but he wanted them to understand that the heads of the department might do as they pleased in reference to this matter, but he was not bound to consult them. Does the Minister of Customs want the House and the country to understand that this Mr. Gott, who is the officer at Amherstburg, in which district Pelee Island is an outport, who himself says, as he has stated in the letter that was read by the member for South Essex, that he is responsible for the action of the sub-collector at Pelee,—does the Minister want us to understand that he is at liberty to appoint a man to that position without notifying the officer at Amherstburg, without receiving any instructions from him, and placing that man Atkinson in possession there, while the collector, under whom he worked, to whom he was responsible, who was responsible for his work, has no official communication in reference to that matter at all, and refuses to give him any instructions with reference to it? Sir, the action of the Minister of Customs was this: with the view, as I verily believe, of influencing the election, he placed this man, irresponsible, according to his own showing, in that outport of Pelee; that man was there giving clearances, acting in the name of Her Majesty, receiving Government fees, discharging the duties of the position, and he is there without any authority or responsibility to any one, and without any instructions from any one. That is the position in which the Minister has declared this matter to stand. Sir, the House, I think, will admit that of the many transactions of a questionable nature that have been brought to their notice, this, perhaps, is the most questionable of all. Viewed from whatever point you may view it, viewing the fact of the dismissal and the removal of a man against whom, he says, there was no charge of neglect of public duty, the subsequent insubordination of that officer after his removal, if we are to accept the testimony of the Minister; then after that his reappointment over this other man that had been placed there, and this man only being removed, because, as the Minister says, there were complaints against him as well as against McCormick. Well, he says he intends to send an officer up there to look into this charge against McCormick, and if he is really blameworthy, he intends to have him removed. Why did he not send his commission up before he removed Mr. Atkinson? Why did he not investigate the charges against Atkinson, the recently appointed man, appointed by himself? Why did he not give him an opportunity of an investigation? Why is he summarily dismissed, when receiving a salary at the rate of $400 per annum, while McCormick, against whom the charges are made, and made so strong that he had him removed during the election, was appointed in his place? Sir, I think the position of the Minister of Customs will not bear investigation on that point. They talk about the American system. What has that to do in reference to the cause of the dismissal of Atkinson, that the Minister of Customs should have referred to it? What is that but the American system? Is it the Canadian system? Is it the British system, that a man who is appointed by a Minister to a position in the Civil Service of Canada, shall, without any charge being proved against him, without an investigation being made, be summarily dismissed? Is that British precedent? Is that the administration of Canadian affairs? But that is what the Minister has done in this case. He appointed a man. He says there have been charges against that man; he has not investigated them; but without investigation, simply upon the charge, he has dismissed that man from the public service. Are the public servants of Canada holding their tenure of office on so slight a thread as that the Minister may one day appoint them and a few days after discharge them, without any charges being made against them by any one, without any charge being sustained or admitted to be sustained against them? No, Sir, the House must admit that it is a questionable transaction, that the hon. member for South Essex has made his point, that the Minister of Customs was not above using his official position in order to influence an election in one of the ridings of this country, even though he demoralized the public service, the service of his department, in order to accomplish it, and has been guilty throughout it of irregularities in the removal of Mr. McCormick and reappointing him, after insubordination, to the same position, and in the appointment of Mr. Atkinson and his subsequent dismisal without any charge being alleged against him. Sir, the Minister of Customs seems to justify these men as having acted properly and rightly in the discharge of their official duties. These different Customsofficers, we have been told, went through the County of Essex appearing on a public platform and using their influence in the contest upon the Government side. He claims they had a perfect right to do so, and he instances the alleged fact that officers were found doing that on the other side, and so far as he was aware they have never been discharged. He was unfortunate in citing the case of the officers of Prince Edward Island, unfortunate, at least, from the circumstance that two of the prominent members from the Island were unable, from their own knowledge, to substantiate that statement which he had made. He alleges that on the Intercolonial Railway, at some place, men may have been dismissed who were taking an interest in elections. The two hon. members from that province state that these men were not dismissed because they took an active part in political matters, but because of insolence to superiors. Sir, we can understand that when the Government wish to discharge a man, they may, perhaps, be able to find some reason that will justify the action to themselves; but whether that be the case or no, the fact remains that this man Atkinson, appointed by the Minister, discharging the duties assigned him by the Minister and, so far as the Minister knows, discharging those duties efficiently and well, is summarily, without any cause being proved or established against him at all, removed from his position. Sir, I need not enlarge further on that point. It is well that it is not a controverted point. It stands in all its nakedness before the House, as presented by the hon. member for South Essex, a shocking transaction in its own character, as viewed I trust by the majority of the members of the House, and I regret that the Minister of Customs himself has not been able so to view it.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he approves of Ontario officials taking part in provincial or Dominion elections, either on the platform or otherwise?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. member were not a new member, I think the Speaker would call his attention to the fact that he is not discussing the question at all. At the proper time and in the proper place, I will give the hon. gentleman the answer he wants.

Mr. INGRAM. In rising to ask the hon. gentleman this question, I believe that I am performing a public duty. A few years ago I entered the Provincial Legislature of this province, and I contended then, as hon. gentlemen are contending now, that civil servants should not be permitted to take part in elections. I am acquainted with the gentleman whose name has been brought before the House to-day, Mr. McCormick. I have known him for a number of years, and I believe he is competent to fill the position of collector of Customs for Pelee Island. I know also that there is a local prejudice against Mr. McCormick on that Island, caused by family quarrels and other things of that character. I do not pretend to justify the course taken by the Minister of Customs in this case, nor do I intend to condemn the Minister of Customs for his action on this occasion. I have thought it best to wait until the evidence was brought down to this House, in order that I might be in a position to judge whether he has done wrong or right. While a member of the Local Legislature I called the attention of the Government of this province to the fact that many civil servants were taking part in elections. I believe civil servants who are drawing money from the public treasury have no right to take part in elections, while I hold they have a right to cast their ballots in favour of whomsoever they please; but if they go beyond that, they were not doing their duty and should not be permitted to remain any longer in the service. The Government told me: Why did I not use my influence with my friends in Ottawa and have them carry out these views? I contend that so long as a man is in the Civil Service he has no right to go on a public platform and discuss public questions.

Mr. MULOCK. What about Sir Charles Tupper?

Mr. INGRAM. I do not look on the High Commissioner as an ordinary public servant. I believe he was quite justified in the course he took in the last election, knowing that if the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power he would immediately cease to hold that position. If hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared, and if this Government is prepared, to frame a law that will deprive civil servants of the power to take an active part in elections, I am prepared to support it. But what astonishes me most is that hon. gentlemen opposite should rise in their places and condemn this Government for the very acts that are committed by the Provincial Government, which they support, and against which they have not a word to say. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when civil servants of the Local Government take part in their elections, should first condemn them for doing so, and then they could consistently ask the Dominion Government to prevent the civil servants of the country taking part in the elections.

Mr. McMULLEN. From the time I first had the honour to sit in this House, down to the present moment, I have never noticed a more flagrant case of impropriety charged against a Minister of the Crown than that brought forward to-day in connection with transactions at Amherstburg. It is quite clear that the Minister of Customs was very anxious that Mr. Wigle, who was running in that constituency, should be elected, and he was quite prepared to do any amount of wriggling in order to bring about that result. He was prepared to do anything if he could possibly bring about a change of votes, which would result in the election of the Government candidate. The Minister of Customs is a wily man and one who has been long in office, and no doubt he has skilfully kept his own name out of the ring, but at the same time, he managed to make the people of Pelee Island acquainted with his views, and sought if possible to secure their votes in favour of his particular friend at that time. The hon. gentleman, when he last addressed the House, mentioned me by name and challenged me to name a case in which a Government servant had been dismissed because he had opposed the Government. I will give a case. I admit it does not belong to the hon. gentleman's own department, but to the Post Office Department, and I am glad to notice that the Postmaster General is listening to my statement. I remember a case in Orangeville. A man had carried the mails from the station to the post office for over eight years, a man against whom no word of complaint had been laid, a man who discharged his duty efficiently, and a man who had carried the mails 19,000 times from the station to the post office, and the Postmaster General cannot out of all his correspondence bring forward any proof that a tittle of complaint had been made against him. About November 15th last he applied for a renewal of his contract. It was renewed for four years from January 1st last. But a very short time before the elections he was notified that his contract would end in ninety days. The reason, no doubt, was simply that he was not prepared to declare himself in favour of the Government candidate. He was dismissed in accordance with the notice he had received. He applied to the department for a reason why his appointment was cancelled, and from that day to this he has never received anything to show that a complaint was made. Of course, there is a clause in all contracts providing that the Government can at any time cancel a man's appointment if they see fit so to do, for reasons best known to themselves; but in all justice to a civil servant who has served his country so long, the Postmaster General should have given him the satisfaction of knowing if any complaints had been made against him. The hon. Minister would not go so far as to say there were or were not complaints made; but he was summarily dismissed from his position, after the contract had been renewed and he had prepared himself with a vehicle to enable him more efficiently to discharge his duties. This man was dismissed because he was not prepared to support the Government candidate then running in the constituency. There is a case, and I challenge the Postmaster General to place before the House all the particulars in regard to these cases. I am aware that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) knows a little about this case; his name is mentioned in the letter I have before me. The Government have been asked for explanations and have been written to by several parties—I will not name them—in order to obtain an explanation, but none has been given. Moreover, the candidate running in the interests of the Government in that constituency declared that the appointment of the mail carrier between the post office and the station would not be made until after the election, and he held the appointment in his hand, and the other had been dismissed. The Minister of Customs challenged me to name a case, and I have given one, and it is one that is not creditable to the Government or to the department.

Mr. BOWELL. Why do you not quote correctly? I challenged you to give an instance from the Customs Department. I said nothing about any other department.

Mr. McMULLEN. You said I could not give an instance in connection with the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. No; and I am not prepared to admit that this is an instance.

Mr. McMULLEN. You spoke generally at first and afterwards you spoke in regard to the Customs Department. My hon. friend did not pay hon. gentlemen opposite a compliment when he said that no member of the British House of Commons or the British Government would be found mixed up in a transaction of this kind. I admit that, and it was no compliment to compare them with the class of Canadians in the Government at the present time. They would not consider it a compliment if they read the remarks of my hon. friend from Essex on this matter. I contend that the course adopted in dealing with all petty offices of this kind had been clearly shown to be for the purpose of trying to keep the party in power, and the standard of political morality has been lowered and lowered until it has descended to a level when a petty official occuping the position as mail carrier from the station to the post office, at a salary of from $60 to $190 a year, is removed because he will not vote for the Tory candidate. It is quite clear that hon. gentlemen opposite wish the country to understand that they intend to follow the principle to the victors belong the spoils. It is quite evident from the case brought before the House by my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Allan), that a gross outrage was perpetrated in his constituency, but it did not succeed.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to reply to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and to teach him a lesson in prudence so far as regards attacks on the Government. I found in my county that nearly every official was the opponent of myself, who was running in favour of the Government of the day. The most important positions in my county were held by prominent Grits, as we call them, or Liberals if you like to call them, and the county from one end to the other was honeycombed by Government officers appointed by the Liberal Administration, or by the sanction of my opponent, Mr. Mitchell. Those men fought their way from one end of the county to the other with petitions soliciting votes for my opponent, and they canvassed from platform to platform, and from parish to parish, and hounded the Government of the day although they were in receipt of salaries from the Government ranging from $1,200 to $500, and some of them even down to $100 per annum. I recognize the great principle that these officials had a right to cast their votes in what way they pleased; but the moment they took to the public platforms, the moment they went from village to village to oppose the policy of the Administration of which they are the servants, then it is the bounden duty of the Government—no matter what Government may be in power—to dismiss those public servants who attacked the Administration from which they received their salaries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or who supported it, either.

Mr. ADAMS. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says "or who supported it." I may tell the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that if the official who acts this way is a supporter of the Administration he takes his position in the palm of his hand, and he is liable to dismissal. That is a clear principle; but if the official is in the employment of the Government in power, if he is a servant of the Crown, what right or what justification has he to take the platform against a supporter of the Government, and to hawk round a requisition up north and down south, and for hundreds of miles in the interior of the country, soliciting names to that requisition which guaranteed to the opponent of the Government the confidence of the electors, and which, if sufficiently signed through their canvassing would return the opponent of the Government at the polls? Let me call the attention of the House to a further fact in connection with this matter. A census enumerator was appointed on my recommendation by the Minister of Agriculture, and in the recent election contest I found my opponent declare on the platform and with uplifted hands, that if the Government were defeated in the contest, he, as a follower of the Liberal party, guaranteed to the people the dismissal of this census commissioner; and further, that every official in the county holding office under the present Administration would be immediately ejected from their offices. My opponent declared that if the Liberals were returned to power no Liberal-Conservative would any longer hold an official position in the County of Northumberland. If that be a correct declaration of the principles of the Liberal party, if that be a declaration which guides the policy of the Liberal party throughout the country; then the remarks of the hon. gentleman who last spoke are in exceeding bad taste coming from his lips, and I think that the Government should be censured for keeping in office men who are traducing the principles of the Government, and the policy of the Government, and the acts of the Government from every platform; men who are condemning the Government and holding them up to ridicule and scorn, and vilifying and maligning every public act which the Government does. In my opinion, these officials, instead of being recognized by the Administration of the day, should be immediately removed from office, and the policy should be established that in future any person holding an office in the gift of the Crown or under the Executive of the country must keep neutral in an election contest. He should vote for whomsoever he pleases, for no person has a right to take from him his franchise, and no power has a right to influence him to the right or to the left, as his conscience may dictate; but the very moment an official takes the platform and attacks the Government, during an election campaign, then that moment dismissal should follow. I have contested two elections in my county, one in 1887 and one in 1891, and, during the election of 1887, I found that Government employés, receiving large salaries from the Crown, were the most active, bitter, unrelenting and determined opponents of the Government and of myself. They followed me from parish to parish in my county, and endeavoured to refuse me a hearing in certain parishes. The lighthouse keepers especially, as also the brother of Mr. Mitchell, while others went from place to place to try and refuse me a hearing, by disturbing the audience. And yet, after all this, these men hold their position to-day, and there is not one word from the lips of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House about the conduct of these officials in opposing me.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I desire to say a word or two in answer to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who ventured the statement that the Government had dismissed, because of his political leanings, the contractor who carried the mails from the railway station at Orangeville to the post office in that town. That statement rests upon no other foundation than the imagination of the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have his letter here.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I care not what letter the hon. gentleman has. I happen to be thoroughly acquainted with all the facts connected with this matter, and I will frankly tell the hon. gentleman what all the facts are. About a year ago when it was known that this contract would expire in the month of October, I think, I wrote the Postmaster General and I asked that this contract should be put up to tender, in order that an open field might be given to all persons in that locality who desired to tender for the carrying of the mails. The Postmaster General answered me that that course would be pursued, but through some inadvertence in the office it was not done, and the contract was renewed to Mr. Mann, who had been the contractor, as the member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has said, for the preceding eight years. When that course was taken I remonstrated with the Postmaster General, and upon my remonstrance he cancelled the contract after it had run for about three months, and advertised for new tenders. Mr. Mann had the same opportunity then of obtaining the contract as every other gentleman in that locality had, and the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer at a saving to the country of $55 per year. Mr. Mann's price was $230 and the price obtained by the present contractor is $175. That is the whole story of this contract from beginning to end, and the hon. gentleman can see if he wishes to that the contract was not cancelled because Mr. Mann was a Liberal in politics. So far from that being the case, I believe that Mr. Mann was a supporter of Mr. Wm. Henry Hunter, who was the candidate in Centre Wellington at the recent election. The contract with Mr. Mann was cancelled, simply because, through inadvertence in the Post Office Department, the opportunity which other gentlemen in that locality desired to have of tendering for the contract was denied to them, and when this mistake was rectified and the decision was arrived at to call for new tenders, the lowest tenderer was awarded the contract. That is the whole story in connection with the mail carrying contract at Orangeville.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would have very little to complain about if he knew the difficulties which I, the Government supporter in the great district of Algoma, had to contend against. During my recent election I found that I had not only to fight a whole army of Ontario Government officials, but also had to fight an army of officials appointed by the present Administration. I found some of the postmasters appointed under the present Administration were adverse to the interests of the Government, and I found that to the extent that where notices of meetings were sent out in my district to be distributed to the people, they were held back by the postmasters until after the date for the meeting had expired.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That's a very common thing.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). No doubt it is, but it should not be a common thing by any means if the postmasters would perform their duties, and particularly so when the postage was paid upon these notices. I found more than that. I found that a postmaster in the District of Algoma was using the mails for his own business purposes. When I brought that to the notice of the Administration, what answer do you suppose I got? It was not that the man should be dismissed summarily, although he was a political opponent of mine and of the Administration of the day. They simply said: We cannot dismiss a man for that thing; something stronger must be brought against him. It was the same with other officials in that district. Every one of them without exception, I will venture to say, did not lose an opportunity to do what they could, not for me, a supporter of the Administration, but for the Opposition. The hon. member for North Wellington has nothing to complain of. I have very much more to complain of than he has, and I feel it strongly.

Mr. McNEILL. I move, seconded by Mr. Wood, of Brockville, that the House do now adjourn. I think this would be a fair compromise.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman cannot make such a motion in the midst of a speech.

Mr. McNEILL. I would ask who was speaking?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman had not finished his speech.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman had resumed his seat.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I am willing that the House should lose the rest of the speech.

Mr. LAURIER. Some members rose desiring to speak on that motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not see anybody rise.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have something to say.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Bill (No. 77) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company (Mr. LaRivière) was considered in Committee and reported.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 60) respecting the Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company.—(Mr. Denison.)

Bill (No. 86) to incorporate the Brighton, Warkworth and Norwood Railway Company.—(Mr. Cochrane.)

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Kingston and Pontiac Railway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Renfrew.

Bill (No. 90) to amend the Act to incorporate the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Cochrane.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Ontario and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COCKBURN. Before the Orders are proceeded with, I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand a copy of the Daily Examiner, a paper published at Charlottetown, P. E. I., dated Thursday, the 25th June, 1891, and bearing, as its motto, the following quotation from Euripides: "This is true liberty when free-born men, having to advise the public, may speak free." Following this guiding star, I find under "telegraphic news, special despatches, tunnel correspondence," these words, dated Ottawa, June 25:

"In moving for correspondence regarding the tunnel, Davies made an excellent speech from a Prince Edward Island standpoint, avoiding all party politics, stating the Island's case powerfully, and made an admirable impression. Cockburn, one of the Toronto members, who is the present buffoon of the House, and who had evidently more than he could carry, attempted, in reply, to show that the Island was indebted annually to the Dominion by $600,000."

Further on, the zeal of the honourable reporter had carried him so far that, in speaking of the appointment of the Royal Commission, he used these words:

"A good deal of noise and personal talk was indulged in during the debate. Several members were under the weather."

Now, I am rather at a loss to know what to do under circumstances like these, but I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, as the guardian and representative of the liberties, privileges and rights of members of this House, to say if no means can be adopted, when members who endeavour honestly to do their duty in this House are blackguarded in this way, to put a stop to it. I find the paper, or rather the sheet, is on file in the reading room, and I think any man who could send a telegram of this kind or any paper that would receive it is no longer fit to be placed on the files of our Journals. I have not the slightest doubt that my friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) knows nothing about this matter. He is too honourable and too high-minded a gentleman to have anything to do with it directly or indirectly, though I have been given to understand that this is an organ supporting him personally, but I think it right to state, in his absence, that I am as sure as I stand here now that he had nothing whatever to do, directly or indirectly, with this baseless and foul calumny.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What is the paper?

Mr. COCKBURN. It is a little fly-sheet called the Daily Examiner and published in the thriving town of Charlottetown, and its guiding star is, "This is true liberty when free-born men, having to advise the public, may speak free."

Mr. AMYOT. Is it a Tory paper or a Grit paper?

Mr. COCKBURN. Really, I do not know. I was not aware that the paper was in existence. If this is a specimen of the papers published in the Island, I think the Island would be better without them.

Mr. LANGELIER. They say it is the principal Tory organ of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. COCKBURN. I have been given to understand the very opposite, but I do not think it matters very much on which side of politics a sheet like this is. It will only hurt the side it supports. I have brought this matter up in order to ask counsel of our Speaker as to whether there is no means under our constitution by which a stop can be put to blackguardism of this kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think I can throw a ray of light on the question as to which side of politics this newspaper belongs to.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I must interrupt my hon. friend, as there is nothing before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I shall not keep you long; I shall only occupy one moment.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND TUNNEL.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Davies for correspondence, &c., relating to the surveys for and construction and cost of a submarine tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not my present intention to interfere with the just rights of Prince Edward Island in any form, but in connection with this question I may say that I find that the Charlottetown Examiner received in the last year of grace, according to our Auditor's report, $131.70 for advertising, and $1,537.50 for printing, so that, if my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) wants to deal out even-handed justice to this pestilent Tory sheet, the means are in his hands and in those of the Government.

Mr. McLEAN. In rising to address this House for the first time, I do so with a great deal of diffidence, especially as the subject under discussion is one of very great interest to the county I represent in this House, as well as to the Island from which I come. When the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), made his speech the other day, in asking for the papers in connection with the proposed tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, I listened to him very attentively, and I was very much pleased with the speech he made on that occasion. I think he laid the matter before this House in a very plain, reasonable and modest way, from a Prince Edward Island standpoint, and if there was any fault at all to be found with his speech, it was that he did not put the case of Prince Edward Island as strongly as he might have done, or as strongly as I believe he would have been justified in doing. The figures he used on that occasion to specify the amounts contributed by Prince Edward Island to the general revenue of the Dominion, I think, were underneath rather than above the mark. I notice, in looking over the blue-books, that the hon. member for Queen's did not take into consideration the amount contributed to the Dominion treasury from Excise, which amount I find is $185,000. I think he gave the amount contributed from Customs correctly, as $4.60 per head of the population, or for a population of 125,000, the sum of $575,000. But he seems to have omitted the amount contributed from Excise, which is $1.48 per head, or $185,000. Adding these two amounts together, allowing that the people of Prince Edward Island contribute as much per head as do the rest of the Dominion, they contributed to the general revenue, from Customs and Excise, the sum of $760,000. I may say that the remarks I would have made before this House at that time, had I spoken on this subject, would have been quite different from what they will be to-night. I was very much surprised to find that the opposition to this measure, as soon as it was moved, came from the hon. member from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). Sir, I believe that figures were never taken from the blue-books which did a province more injustice than the figures used by that hon. gentleman did to the Province of Prince Edward Island. It would be unreasonable for me, if I were attempting to-night to make a speech on the temperance question, to go to the blue-books and say that the city of Toronto from which that hon. gentleman comes, was the most drunken city in the Dominion of Canada. I have never been in the city of Toronto. But I could go to the blue-books and I could prove to this House just as conclusively as that hon. gentleman proved that Prince Edward Island had only contributed the sum of $400,000—I could prove to the satisfaction of this House, taking the blue-books as they stand, that the city of Toronto consumed more liquor per head of the population than does any other part of the Dominion. I find on referring to the blue-books that the city of Toronto pays a duty on spirits of $801,341; on malt liquors, $8,056; on malt, $155,676, which sums together amount to $965,083. Now, I do not give these figures to show that the people of Toronto are addicted to the use of spirituous and malt liquors more than any other part of the Dominion, but I want to show that if I took the blue-books and gave the city of Toronto credit for drinking the amount of liquor produced in it, I should be pursuing an argument on the same lines as the hon. member for Centre Toronto the other night, when he showed that the city of Toronto paid more duty into the Government than the whole of the Maritime Provinces together. I want to show this House that duty was paid in Toronto on liquor that the people of Toronto never drank. The liquor was scattered over the whole Dominion and the parties who consumed it paid not only the duty on the liquor, but they paid the cost of manufacturing it, they paid the profits of the wholesale dealer and of the retail dealer; therefore I claim that every province that imported any of that liquor from the city of Toronto, contributed to the revenue of this country just in proportion to what they drank. If I were to show from these figures —and the figures I have quoted will show it—that for each man, woman and child in Toronto, they consumed 10 gallons of spirituous liquor and 24 gallons of malt liquors, that would not be correctly stating the fact. I do not claim that it is so, and for that reason I want to show this House how ridiculous it is for any hon. gentleman to go to the blue-books and try to prove that a province, because it does not contribute directly to the revenue, is, therefore, a drag upon the rest of the Dominion. Taking the blue-books and referring to the Province of Ontario in another way, I think I can show this House, that Ontario does not stand in that proud position that the hon. gentleman would lead this House to believe. I have taken the provinces as provinces to show the population, the value of the imports, the value per head of the imports, the value of the exports, the value per head of the exports, the Customs duties, and the Excise duty, and the amount contributed per head in each province :

Province.	Population.	Value Imports for Consumption.	Per Head	Value Exports.	Per Head	Customs Duty.	Excise Duty.	Customs and Excise Duty per Head.

do do exports do	2,303,750
do do Customs duties, estimated at	575,000
do do Excise do do	185,000

Now, I want to show by these figures how unfair it is to go to the blue-books and take this mode of calculation. Every hon. gentleman in this House knows that the reason why British Columbia is credited with $15.28 per head, is because the goods that come to British Columbia are imported there directly, instead of being imported to other provinces and redistributed. To show how ridiculous those figures are when taken from the blue-books, and not explained to the House, I may say that in 1889-90, the years these figures are taken, Prince Edward Island imported only $585,859; whereas in 1872, or nineteen years ago, before Prince Edward Island came into the Dominion, she imported $1,801,935, or over three times as much as she is credited with importing last year. I quote these figures to show how ridiculous is the position that the hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto wished to put Prince Edward Island in, by the figures he quoted the other night. I leave it to himself, and I give him these figures, and I think I can safely say that he will not find a false figure in the lot, even although they are taken from the blue-books, and he must have seen them all. I thought when we came to submit the question of the tunnel to this House, whatever other province we might find opposed to the project, it would not be the Province of Ontario. I have taken the trouble to prepare statistics to show the House how much Prince Edward Island imports from Ontario. Of flour, we imported to the value of $335,000; of farm implements, and I believe this is far below the mark, $150,000; organs and sewing machines, $20,000; pianos, $10,000; of waggons, I have the amount down as $30,000, but to my astonishment, when I made enquiries from some of the manufacturers, I found that a friend of mine in Summerside, Mr. McLeod, imported last year from one Ontario manufacturer waggons to the amount of $26,000, and the Island imported from Ontario sundry other goods to the extent of $440,000. I believe that I am actually far below the correct figures in those I have given. It is, however, difficult to arrive at really satisfactory figures with respect to the trade between the Island and the mainland, but undoubtedly the total imports from Ontario amount to $985,000. I claim that if we were looking for favours for the Island with respect to the tunnel scheme we should appeal to Ontario, and I will attempt to show the House the grounds on which we could do so. The Province of Nova Scotia exchanges goods with the Island almost to the value of what she receives; New Brunswick does the same. In the case of Quebec this is not done to the same extent, but she exchanges goods largely with the Island. But to Ontario we contribute yearly $100,000 more than we export from the Island to all countries outside of the Dominion. According to the blue-books, Prince Edward Island exported to countries outside of the Dominion products to the value of $887,755, while we imported from Ontario goods to the value of $985,000. I, therefore, claim that if we were looking for favours from the provinces, we could fairly appeal to Ontario. Ontario differs from any other province in regard to Prince Edward Island in that Ontario scarcely buys one dollar's worth of Island produce, whereas Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec are customers for the products we raise. To Ontario alone have we to send hard cash, and that province is the one interested in seeing that the Island should obtain the best market possible for its products. For these reasons, I repeat, we should look for sympathy from Ontario if we were looking for favours. While we expect the support of every hon. member from Ontario and from Quebec, I believe we will certainly obtain the support of every member from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, because they know our position better than do the representatives of the other provinces. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) in speaking of the Island made a very ridiculous statement when he said that the few eggs and potatoes raised were not of sufficient importance for the Dominion to consider the desirability of building a tunnel from the mainland to the Island. No doubt he led many hon. members to suppose, members who know the hon. gentleman very well, and he has, I understand, a very good reputation for calculating and putting figures in their proper relation if he is disposed to do so, that the Island is not capable of exporting much produce, but only of importing goods to the value of $585,000, according to the blue-books, and, therefore, the item of exports should not be considered in this question. I have gone over the exports of the Dominion for 1890, and I was surprised to find that the Island exported to countries outside of Canada more potatoes than did all the rest of the Dominion. I will give the hon. member for Centre Toronto the figures. The exports of potatoes for 1890 by Canada to countries outside of the Dominion amounted to 1,458,797 bushels. Of this quantity Prince Edward Island shipped 749,049 bushels, while the whole of the other provinces shipped 709,000 bushels. Hon. members may be led to believe that 749,000 bushels was the total quantity the Island had to export; but such was not the case. The Island exported that year to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick 350,000 bushels, and there was produced of starch 1,600 tons, each ton representing 200 bushels of potatoes, or in all 320,000 bushels. So that the exports of potatoes from Prince Edward Island really aggregated 1,419,849 bushels. This was not an extra year, as all hon. gentlemen who are farmers know, and when the accounts come in for the year which closed yesterday the figures will be found far to exceed those I have given. Now, as to the amount contributed to the general revenue by the Island, the people of the Island have not complained that they are paying more than their share to the revenue. That is not the reason why I point out that the Island contributes as much per head as do the other provinces, but whenever this question is brought up, and it is alleged that the Island is a beggar and contributes $600,000 less to the Dominion treasury than she receives, it is desirable to point out that this is not only wildly inaccurate but that if true it should be no reason why the terms of Confederation should not be fulfilled. That is the reason I bring it up. In 1886 a statement showing the amount contributed by the Island, was prepared by Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson, who were appointed a delegation from the Provincial Government on a question of winter communication, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. This statement shows the amount contributed by the Island, and I cannot do better than read it to the House. After the speech delivered by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who put the case very clearly from the Island standpoint and very moderately, I was quite willing to leave the question as it was then submitted to the House, although I might have supplemented his remarks by adding a few figures which I thought he had omitted. The statement to which I refer says:

"The difficulty of arriving at an absolutely correct calculation of the amount of dutiable goods which the people of Prince Edward Island consume cannot fail to be appreciated, yet the undersigned submit that there are several methods by which it may fairly be estimated. It must be premised that the people of the Island are very large consumers of dutiable goods, for the reason that, being chiefly engaged in agriculture and fishing, their manufactures are very small as compared with the rest of Canada, valuing, according to the last census returns, only $31.33 per head to $72.63 per head of the other provinces.

"In proof of the assertion that the people of the Island are principally engaged in agriculture and fishing, the undersigned would again advert to the census returns of 1881, which show that (the North-West Territories not being included)—

"One-half the area of Prince Edward Island is cultivated.

"Only one twenty-fifth of the other provinces is cultivated.

"Prince Edward Island has a population of 51 to the square mile.

"The other provinces only 4·72.

"Prince Edward Island owns 55 head of live stock for every 100 acres of improved land.

"The other provinces only 28.

"In field products, Prince Edward Island raises to the acre of improved land 108¾ bushels.

"The other provinces only 61¼ bushels.

"From the fisheries, Prince Edward Island produces $17.08 per head value.

"The other provinces $3.55.

"The people of the Island are generally in comfortable circumstances, in proof of which may be adduced the amount of deposits per head in the Savings Banks, which averages $16.59 for the Island against $7.66 for the rest of the Dominion.

"These figures clearly prove that the people of Prince Edward Island, from the fact of their not being extensive manufacturers, are under the necessity of using imported goods to a large extent, while the fertility of their soil, the value of their fisheries, and their general independence, demonstrate their ability to purchase. This being understood, the undersigned submit the following calculations, designed to show that the imports of dutiable goods into the Island are very much larger than suggested by the Committee of Council, and consequently the contributions to the revenue proportionately greater."

They take three methods of arriving at the amount that is paid into the general treasury by the people of Prince Edward Island. The first method takes the average revenue of the Dominion They say:

"METHOD 1.

"The average revenue of the Dominion from Customs and Excise, for the three years ended 30th June, 1884, was $27,603,479. The population of Prince Edward Island to that of the whole Dominion is in the proportion of 1 to 39·7. Upon this ratio, the Island's share of the Customs and Excise revenue would amount to $695.301.

"METHOD 2.

"In 1872, the year before its admission into the Union, Prince Edward Island imported directly from countries beyond Canada goods valued at	$1,372,581
The duty on which amounted to	.....	$184,227
And from Canada, goods the growth and manufacture of other countries, valued approximately at	428,354
The duty on which amounted to.....	.....	89,168
	$1,801,935	$273,395

That was according to the duties levied before Confederation, which were only 11 per cent. There was, I believe, a duty 2½ per cent. on account of the railway being built, but as there was a large free list, the average duty did not amount to 13 per cent. They go on to say :

"It will surely not be argued that, in thirteen years, with a large increase in population, the Island's imports from countries outside the Dominion have decreased from $1,801,935 to $822,966, or over 45 per cent., yet this would appear to be the contention of the Committee of Council.

"In 1861 the imports of the Island amounted to $1,021,669; in 1872 they had increased to $2,439,064, or at the rate of 138·7 per cent. At the same rate, its imports from countries beyond the Dominion should have increased from $1,801,935 in 1872 to $4,304,824 in 1884, which, at the present average tariff (free and dutiable combined) of 18·64 per cent., would give a Customs revenue of $802,419.

"METHOD 3.

"It is a well established principle that the imports and exports of a country bear a reasonable relation to each other. The imports of the Island for the ten years preceding Confederation aggregated in value £3,543,147 sterling. The exports in the same period, £2,559,091 sterling, showing that the imports exceeded the exports by about £100,000 sterling, or $500,000 annually. The imports of the Dominion for the last seventeen years aggregated in value $1,732,983,486; the exports in the same period, $1,390,946,803, showing that the imports exceeded the exports by about $20,000,000 annually, or in the same proportion, according to population, as the imports of Prince Edward Island exceeded the exports in the years already quoted.

"The exports of the Island have steadily increased during the last twenty-five years. In 1861, it exported to all countries goods valued at $793,810, which had increased in 1872 to $1,497,058, or at the rate of 88 3-5 per cent.

"In 1872, the Island exported to countries beyond the Dominion goods valued at $722,333, which had increased in 1884 to $1,310,039, or at the rate of 81¼ per cent.

"Apply this rate of increase to the Island's imports from countries beyond the Dominion in 1872, and we have as a result for 1884, imports valued at $3,267,509.

"But the figures contained in the Dominion Trade and Navigation Returns do not represent the total exports of the Island to countries beyond the Dominion, inasmuch as a considerable proportion, being shipped through Nova Scotia and New Brunswick territory, is credited to the exports of those provinces. The annual export of horses from the Island to the United States is not less than 1,500, valued at $150,000. The Dominion returns for 1883-84 credit the Island with only 256, valued at $27,486. This is but an instance of many. A considerable part of the large trade which the Island does in eggs with the United States, is credited to New Brunswick, while fish and potatoes, which are largely exported to Newfoundland, St. Pierre and the West Indies, are, much of them, credited to Nova Scotia, being shipped by way of Halifax. In view of these facts, it would be within the mark to estimate, as indeed the Committee of Council admit, that the Island's foreign export trade has doubled since 1872. Apply the same rate of increase to its imports from the countries beyond the Dominion, as they stood in 1872, and we have, as a result, for 1884, imports valued at $3,603,371, yielding under an 18 64-100 per cent. tariff, an annual revenue of $671,668.

"The exports of Prince Edward Island, since Confederation, have increased in a much larger ratio than have those of the Dominion, as the following figures will show :—

"The total exports of the Dominion for 1871-72, were $82,639,683, for 1883-84 exclusive of the Island, $90,096,437, or an increase of only 9 1-42 per cent., as against 100 per cent. by which the Island's exports have increased in the same time.

"To recapitulate the results of the various methods:

"Method 1	$695,301
"Method 2	802,419
"Method 3	671,668
"Average annual contribution by the Island from Customs and Excise	$723,129

Mr. McLEAN.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to show the House that by the three methods which they adopted, the total results they bring out are so nearly alike that I think none of them can be very far astray and that they can be admitted by this House as being as nearly correct as it is possible to get them. The first method of calculation gives a revenue of $695,301, the second $802,419 and the third method $671,668, and if we strike an average it gives us a total of $723,129 that Prince Edward Island contributes in Customs duty and Excise. It will be remembered that the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), leaving the amount of Customs and Excise out altogether, gave us credit for $200,000 received from various sources, and if we add that other amount, $723,000, we have a total of over $900,000 contributed by Prince Edward Island. I claim that this is far nearer and more in accordance with the returns given in the blue-books than the amount mentioned by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). If I were to carry out the calculations and take the ten years before we went into Confederation I could show that from 1862 to 1872 and from 1872 to 1882 and from 1882 to 1891 there was such an increase in the goods imported by Prince Edward Island that we would have imports amounting to $4,756,000, and the duty at the rate we paid last year would be $1,608,937. I do not claim that these figures are correct, because we all know that Prince Edward Island purchases more goods of the manufacture of the Dominion of Canada since we went into Confederation than we did before. But because the hon. member for Centre Toronto did not find that Prince Edward Island did not pay any duty on sugar in the years I have quoted, it is not fair to say that the people of Prince Edward Island did not consume any sugar in those years. Nor was it fair on his part to say that because he found that Prince Edward Island paid very little Excise duty on tobacco, there being only two factories on the Island, therefore the people of Prince Edward Island do not consume any tobacco. I believe that the people of Prince Edward Island consumed a portion of the liquor manufactured in Toronto; but because the hon. gentleman found that there were no distilleries on Prince Edward Island it was unfair to claim that Prince Edward Island did not consume any spirits or malt liquors at all. It is eighteen years to-day since Prince Edward Island entered Confederation, whether for good or for evil. The people of that Island have never complained of the amount they have had to pay; but they do complain that the Dominion has not carried out the pledges made to Prince Edward Island at that time, with regard to winter communication. Whatever else the members of this House may disagree upon, they will agree that the terms of Confederation, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, have not been carried out. That is the grievance of the people of the Island, and they resent the imputation that they have not contributed their share to the general revenue. They have paid all they have been asked to pay; they have contributed all that the contract made with them at Confederation called on them to contribute; and they ask in return that this great Dominion shall carry out the pledges it made to Prince Edward Island at that time. This is the question before the House at the present time. But for the speech of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, I would not have troubled the House with the array of figures which I have read to-night; but I think I am only doing my duty to the people who sent me here in resenting any imputation that the people of Prince Edward Island do not consume as many goods per head as the people of the rest of the Dominion. They do not, it is true, manufacture as much or import as much from abroad as they did before Confederation; but I am satisfied that if the hon. member for Centre Toronto enquired among the merchants of Toronto, he would find that a great many of the goods imported there from Great Britain and the United States, find their way afterwards to Prince Edward Island. Mr. Speaker, a tunnel is believed by the people of Prince Edward Island, and by a good many people outside of that province, to be the only means by which the terms of Confederation can be properly carried out. In the memorandum submitted a few days ago by the hon. Minister of Finance, we find that world-renowned engineers have pronounced the construction of a tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland to be feasible. There are three estimates made of the cost of the work—one a little over $5,000,000, one about $8,000,000, and one about $11,000,000. I do not think, with the information before the House at the present time, that I could take it upon myself to say which of these tunnels the Government should give to the people of Prince Edward Island. I claim that in constructing this tunnel the Government would not be giving it to the people of Prince Edward Island alone. The trade done with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is of as much service to the people of those provinces as to the people of Prince Edward Island. In equalizing the prices of farm products alone, it would have a beneficial effect on Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. But to the people of Prince Edward Island it would be the means of giving a market, and extending the time during which that market would be available. Now, I say that both parties in this House are pledged to give Prince Edward Island efficient communication, summer and winter, if it is found possible to do it within a reasonable amount; so that the only question for this House to consider is whether the amount necessary for the construction of a tunnel is a reasonable amount. I cannot do better than show this House the loss which the people of Prince Edward Island sustain in being unable to ship their products to market. In Prince Edward Island, as hon. gentlemen belonging to the Maritime Provinces know, although it may not be so well known in Provinces like Ontario where they have an early harvest, our harvests come in very late. Last year, for instance, our harvest was not housed until the middle of October, owing to the unusual wetness of the season. In ordinary seasons we are not able to complete harvesting our grain until the 1st of October. In that respect we are placed in a different position from the other provinces. Prince Edward Island raises more potatoes to the acre than any other province of the Dominion. A great many farmers raise as much as 2,000 bushels, and some as much as 4,000 bushels. The farmers of this House can understand how long it will take a farmer to house from 2,000 to 4,000 bushels of potatoes in the fall of the year. An hon. gentleman the other evening, in speaking of a railroad, remarked that in some parts of the Dominion the people did their fall-ploughing at the very time that the people of Prince Edward Island housed their potatoes. The people of Prince Edward Island have a very short time in which to do their fall-ploughing; in fact, in seasons like last year they get scarcely any done at all. During the month of October, when the farmers are housing their potatoes, the markets in the United States and in the neighbouring provinces are low and the most of the potatoes that find their way to the Boston, New York and Philadelphia markets go there before they are housed at all. They are shipped to these markets at a time when the products of those countries come into competition with them. It is the 1st of November before any potatoes are shipped in quantities outside of those shipped to the Maritime Provinces. This being the case, as a merchant doing business in Prince Edward Island, I find that whereas you can charter a vessel to take potatoes to Boston in October at from 12 cents to 15 cents a bushel, at the time the market is likely to be of any service, as in November or December, these rates go up to 18 cents and sometimes as high as 25 cents a bushel; and as soon as the 1st of December arrives, every hon. member in this House knows that in the Gulf of St. Lawrence insurance rates go up from 1, 2 to 4 or 5 per cent., and sometimes it is not obtainable at all. These expenses have all to be charged against the products of our farms, which are shipped to the neighbouring provinces and the United States. Again we know that, from the 1st of November until the middle of December, the people of the Island have only six weeks in which to ship 1,500,000 bushels of potatoes; and any hon. gentleman who will give this matter a moment's attention will understand how hard it is for us to send 1,500,000 bushels of potatoes to a near market like the neighbouring provinces or to the United States and find a profitable sale for it, while the people of the Island are competing with each other in these markets. It is well known that sometimes we ship a good many of those potatoes to the Halifax market, which is the market, to a fair extent, for many of our products. It is also well known, and the hon. members from Halifax will bear me out, that sometimes after westerly winds have prevailed for several weeks, which prevent our vessels reaching their destination, an easterly wind sets in and as many as 70,000 to 80,000 bushels of potatoes arrive in the Halifax market in the one day; and you can understand, Sir, how hard it is for our people, who have no shipping advantages, to have to face this state of things, for they have to make all their shipments in the fall season, within a space of six weeks. If they do not ship in the fall season, they have to house their potatoes until the spring, so that during the winter, while the markets in the United States and the neighbouring provinces may rule very high, the people of the Island are as much excluded from them as if there were no such markets in existence; and besides, in a great many cases, fully 25 per cent. is lost of the quantities they have to store in their cellars before they can be shipped. Again, we have only a market in those places from the middle of May to the middle of June, because then the markets fall off; and if not shipped in the previous fall, the potatoes have to be shipped in a very short time in the spring of the year, so that we are obliged to compete against one another. And what is true of potatoes applies to all other Island products. Those are some of the disadvantages the people of Prince Edward Island have to contend against, through not having the means of getting their products to market. Another loss which the people have to sustain, and which was not touched upon by the hon. member for Queen's, probably because it was not so plain to his mind as to the mind of a merchant, is due to the fact that the imports to the Island—and its imports amount to about $3,000,000 per year—must be brought in during the month of October, or, at the very latest, before the 1st of November, in sufficient quantities to carry us over until the 1st of May of the following year, so that we are obliged to import six months in advance and carry those goods over during all that time. I claim that there is at least a million dollars worth of goods carried over to the Island from October to May, which we would not be obliged to carry were we provided with continuous communication with the mainland. We lose the interest on that money, and more than that, a great many of these goods, in all probability, might have been purchased at lower rates during the winter months. Any business man will know that under those circumstances it requires twice as much capital to carry on the same amount of business in the Island as on the mainland. Take, for instance, a man engaged in the flour trade, and there are 75,000 barrels of flour imported into the Island during the year. A merchant doing business at Pictou can order a carload of flour in Ontario within four or five days of the time that his stock runs out, and is not obliged to import to any extent in advance, whereas on the Island we have to import in October sufficient flour to carry us over until the spring, instead of importing it as we require it. I admit that the cost of the tunnel makes the undertaking a very serious one; but, on the other hand, it would confer more than commensurate benefit to the people of Prince Edward Island and of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; and I believe that if the question were submitted to the people of the two latter provinces they would be quite satisfied to support the scheme provided it can be accomplished for a reasonable amount of money. And it has been declared by those world-renowned engineers who have pronounced upon the subject to be feasible. I believe also we would have the good will and assistance, not only of the men doing business in these provinces and who know the advantage it would be to them as well as to the Island, but that even the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), when he comes to think the matter over, will not be so unfair, representing, as he does, one of the largest constituencies in one of the largest provinces of this Dominion, as to take the stand that because the Island is our smallest province it should not get what is its right; and I am confident even he will give his support to the scheme when the House is called on to vote the money. The Government lose at present the cost of the winter service over what revenue we derive from that service, which amounts to $15,875. They lose also the interest on the cost of the steamer, which amounts to $5,438; and the depreciation and insurance of that steamer amounting to $29,000 a year, and the summer mail subsidy amounting to $5,500, which would not be required if we had the tunnel. That makes a total annual loss of $55,813. Now, there is a loss on the Prince Edward Railway of $105,000 per year. If we had the tunnel built and were in continuous communication with the rest of the Dominion, that loss would be reduced by $75,000 per year. I will explain how that reduction would take place. Any hon. gentleman at all familiar with Prince Edward Island knows that the railway runs almost from one end of the Island to the other. It runs within at least ten miles of each shipping place. It runs from Tignish to Alberton, from Alberton to Summerside, from Summerside to Charlottetown, thence to Georgetown and Souris, all being shipping ports. At present, suppose a man, doing business in Souris or Georgetown, wishes to have a carload of freight carried over to the mainland, he ships to the nearest shipping port; and I venture to say that the loaded cars hauled on the railway are not on an average hauled a distance of over twelve to fifteen miles. For instance they will go from St. Peter's Bay to Souris, or from Morell to Mount Stewart, or from midway between Tignish and Alberton to either Tignish or Alberton. If we were placed by means of the tunnel in communication with the mainland, these cars, instead of being brought to a shipping place and the freight then transhipped on board vessels would travel the whole length of the railway from the place where loaded to their final destination. Not only that, but I claim the tunnel itself would give a revenue of about $75,000 a year; and I further believe, in case that revenue be doubted, that if the matter were submitted to the people of the Island, they would allow a rate to be imposed on the goods passing through that tunnel, which would, beyond doubt, bring the revenue to $75,000 a year. I claim again that if the tunnel were completed, it would increase the trade of the Intercolonial Railway by furnishing it with additional traffic to the extent of $100,000 over and above what the Intercolonial Railway receives at present. Take the articles of potatoes, or oats, or any of the classes of goods shipped from the Island. Any hon. gentleman who will consider for a moment, will know that it is almost tempting a loss to ship from 3,000 to 5,000 or 8,000 bushels of potatoes in a vessel, when they are not actually seasoned, because if we commence early in the season we have to ship the potatoes right out of the field, and if we house them that entails additional cost. I believe that four-fifths of the potatoes shipped from Prince Edward Island to Boston, New York, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, would pass over the Island railway first, and then go through the tunnel, and then pass over the Intercolonial Railway, and be the means of increasing the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway to the extent of $100,000 over its present traffic. If I am right in these figures, they amount to $305.000 per year, which this Government would receive if the tunnel were built, and I claim those figures are pretty nearly correct. I believe that if the Prince Edward Island Railway were in connection with the Intercolonial Railway to-day by any means, the Island railway, instead of showing a loss of $105,000 per year, would be a paying institution, because, if it does not pay at present it is on account of the hauls being so short. For that reason, I claim that, if these figures are right, or nearly right, the terms of Confederation can be carried out with Prince Edward Island without any material loss to the rest of the Dominion, and I sincerely trust that, when this question comes up, we will have the votes of hon. members on both sides of the House, and that they will not claim that, because Prince Edward Island is the smallest and most insignificant province of the Dominion, the terms made by the older and richer provinces with that province shall not be carried out. A point was raised that this was not a party question. I claim that it is not a party question, but it was a live issue on the Island, as the member for Queen's said, at the last election, and I for one do not wish to deny it. Hon. gentlemen can understand that the question of the tunnel was in this position. The people of the Island were not sure whether the engineers would pronounce it feasible or not, whether the estimates would show that it would cost $5,000,000 or $25,000,000, but they expected that this Parliament, after the reports of first-class engineers had been received, if those reports showed that the tunnel was feasible and could be built for a reasonable amount of money, would deal honestly and fairly with the Island. There were letters and telegrams received from gentlemen on both sides of politics, and I will trouble the House by reading some of them. There was the following letter from the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald to Senator Howlan :—

"EARNSCLIFFE,
"OTTAWA, 6th February, 1891.

"MY DEAR HOWLAN,—In response to your pressing request with respect to the tunnel across the straits, I desire to repeat that, under the present circumstances, the Cabinet are not in a position to deal with the question. If, as I believe, the country will continue to give us its confidence, the Ministry will, under my guidance, take the matter up without delay. I understand that Sir Douglas Fox is of opinion the scheme is a feasible one. The chief thing still unknown is the cost of construction. I fully appreciate the nature and extent of the obligation incurred by the Dominion to maintain continuous communication between the Island and the mainland. We have tried to carry this out by the Stanley, but of course she cannot fight against the elements. So, if the cost comes within a reasonable amount, such as Parliament feels itself justified in incurring, I shall be prepared to submit the question for their favourable consideration.

"I am, yours sincerely,
"JOHN A. MACDONALD."

I claim that that was just such an answer as we might expect, the question being in the position it was at that time. The right hon. gentleman did not know, when the estimates of the engineers came down, whether they would be such as could be entertained. We have a telegram from Sir Charles Tupper to Hon. D. Ferguson :

"I regret deeply that it is impossible for me to go to the Island as the Stanley cannot cross, and I dare not attempt the Capes. I have satisfied myself that the tunnel can be made for six million dollars, and you may rely upon all the aid I can give to that important and necessary work.

"AMHERST, 28th February, 1891."

I claim that this is quite a proper telegram. Sir Charles Tupper knew exactly the terms upon which Prince Edward Island entered the union, and he knew that these terms had not been fulfilled, and that the expenditure of $6,000,000 would place Prince Edward Island in a similar position to that of the other provinces—in such a position that they would feel, as they have not yet felt, that they are part and parcel of the Dominion, that they are truly a province of the Dominion in every respect, and that every dollar's worth of taxation placed upon the rest of the Dominion they should assume their share of. They have not felt that yet, but if they have this communication afforded them they will not hesitate to bear their share of the burdens of the whole country. We also had a telegram from the leader of the Opposition. I always heard, before I saw him, that he was a man of honour and stood high in this country. We know, of course, that he must stand high before he could occupy the position he does to-day. Since I came to this House, and since I have seen and heard him, I have come to the same conclusion—that he is an honourable and high-minded man ; and it is clear that he knew that this would be a live question in the Island at the last election. Here is a telegram from the Hon. Mr. Laurier to L. H. Davies, Esq. :

"I am in favour of the tunnel, provided the surveys show the scheme is reasonable and practicable."

That telegram is quite correct and proper. He knew the terms upon which the Island entered in as well as other hon. gentlemen did, and this telegram is quite correct and proper. Then there is a telegram to the editor of the Guardian, and I am quoting these telegrams, not to find fault with them, but to show that on both sides these gentlemen knew that this was a live issue, and made these statements not to influence the election but as a promise to carry out the terms of the union. This is a letter from the Hon. Mr. Laurier to the editor of the Guardian :

"DEAR SIR,—I have your favour of the 2nd February inst. I hardly would have thought that an expression of opinion as to the construction of a tunnel to connect the Island of Prince Edward with the mainland should be required from me. Every man who has given any attention to the condition of things and the necessities involved by the entering of the Island into Confederation must admit that such a tunnel must be constructed if the thing is reasonably practicable. The first requisite is to have an accurate survey and reliable estimates. I am only sorry that these were not obtained long ago.

"W. LAURIER."

This puts the two political parties in this House in exactly the same position. They both realized that the terms of Confederation had not been carried out, and those letters were written to show their willingness to have the terms carried out, so soon as an opportunity offered. In conclusion, let me say that I would not have troubled the House so long but that I felt that I would not be doing my duty to the county I represent and the Island from which I come, did I not place this matter fully before the House, and I have endeavoured to do so fairly and honestly, as the case presented itself to me.

Mr. PERRY. The other night I was trying to make a speech when the hon. gentleman rose who has now addressed the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. PERRY. I do not think that gentleman is very deaf and I think he can hear me ; I am sure he can. I intend to divide what I have to say into two parts—one as to the consideration of the question itself, and the other to address a few words to my friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). Really, I sympathise with that gentleman. I felt sorry when he had to attack a Tory newspaper published in Prince Edward Island and condemn it. I was also sorry to hear his friend the Tory member for King's County (Mr. McLean) give him such a tongue-lashing, and I think he might well exclaim: Save me from my friends. I will first pay some attention to the tunnel, because I think it is of more importance to the people of Prince Edward Island than all the gas which may emanate from the hon. member for Centre Toronto. The question of a tunnel has, from the time I entered this House, agitated the people of Prince Edward Island. We had a question for some years of a subway, a metallic tunnel, but some time last summer the scheme was found to be impracticable; and Senator Howlan, who was the manager and agitator of this scheme, commenced to agitate the building of a tunnel as the most feasible scheme to enable the Government to carry out the terms of Confederation which were signed between them and Prince Edward Island. During last fall and winter Senator Howlan had some correspondence with certain engineers on that subject. One of the engineers was Sir Douglas Fox, of London. I am told one of the ablest engineers in the world, who was assisted by Mr. Palmer and Mr. Bayne. Sir Douglas Fox has made a report on the subject, and the Minister of Finance told us the other day that he had made an estimate. I do not know whether the Government have a good report; I cannot say, as I am not in the secrets of the Government. I do not know whether they have a report in full. We are told by the Minister of Finance that Sir Douglas Fox made an estimate for a 12-foot tunnel, a 16-foot and an 18-foot tunnel.

An hon. MEMBER. Will the hon. gentleman speak a little louder?

Mr. PERRY. If hon. gentlemen opposite cannot hear they had better come over on this side of the House. No one is so deaf as those who will not hear. If the hon. member opposite will keep quiet I will get through sooner. I think it is the part of a gentleman, when an hon. member is addressing the House, to behave himself, and if he does not know better I will teach him. As I said before, it is not for me to say whether the estimate for a 12-foot tunnel is correct, or whether a tunnel of that size is sufficient for the traffic between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. It is not for me to say whether we require a 16 or an 18-foot tunnel. I leave that to the engineers; but I do say that the Government, having decided to spend a few dollars in trying to ascertain a proper estimate from an engineer, we have a right to ask the Government to tell us whether a 12-foot tunnel is sufficient to carry on the traffic between Prince Edward Island and the mainland; and we have a right to ask them to tell us whether a 16 or an 18-foot tunnel is required to carry produce and passengers between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I am not aware whether the Government have pronounced themselves upon it; I dare say they would do so if we were on the eve of an election, because this question has been made use of in the Province of Prince Edward Island, as a general rule, on the eve of an election. We know very well that it was made use of in 1887 as a means of endeavouring to return members supporting the present Government. They failed. We know very well that in the last election it was made use of to support the candidates of the Government; we know very well that the Government induced Senator Howlan to resign his seat and to run for the House of Commons, with the understanding that if he was defeated he would be reappointed to the Senate. He came to the province fortified with a tunnel scheme; he supposed that nobody else in the Island could speak in favour of the tunnel but himself, and he found he was mistaken. The people in Prince Edward Isand are so much in favour of a tunnel that every candidate for or against the Government was pledged to support it. Senator Howlan was defeated; he got his reward and was reappointed. But, Mr. Speaker, the fact that Senator Howlan was defeated does not show that the people are not in favour of a tunnel. At that time every Liberal in Prince Edward Island expected, as they had a right to expect, that there was going to be a change for the better in the management of Dominion affairs. Sir, we expected that the present leader of the Opposition would lead the Government; he surely will do so if there is going to be a day of salvation for this country. Well, Sir, knowing the present leader of the Opposition to be a man of honour, the Liberals of Prince Edward Island, and even the Tories, trusted him—we have the acknowledgment of one of the rankest Tories in Prince Edward Island that the Tories of Prince Edward Island have every confidence in my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. That was enough to satisfy the Liberals and Tories of that province that if the Liberals got into power, having the word of the leader of the Opposition to that effect, we were satisfied the tunnel would be constructed under his administration, if it were found to be practically feasible, and to cost within a reasonable amount. Sir, the leader of the Opposition has not pledged himself any stronger than did the late right hon. gentleman who had the honour of leading this Parliament for so many years. I am not going to take the trouble of reading his letter; it has been read by my hon. and learned friend from Queen's County, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies); it has been read by my friend on my left, the member for King's County (Mr. McLean), and I am not going to trouble the House by reading it again. The House has also heard the telegram from the High Commissioner, and that telegram must mean something. When Sir Charles Tupper penned that telegram to Mr. Ferguson, in Charlottetown, who was then a candidate in the interest of the Government, with a view of trying to secure the election of that hon. gentleman, surely he meant to carry out his promises. We know well that he was sent for by the Dominion Government—they have acknowledged it—in order to help the Government to secure their re-election; and when he got through with his campaign in the west he was sent down to the east to influence the election on behalf of the Government. Well, Sir, he did not reach Prince Edward Island; he could not reach it—and why? Because there was no tunnel. If there had been a tunnel the High Commissioner would have gone to Prince Edward Island and he would have been able, I suppose, to get some of the candidates returned to support the Government, and perhaps the whole of them, because he is all-powerful, although I doubt very much whether he would have been able to bribe the electors of that province. I know that he is a great hand at making promises, but it requires more than promises to bribe the electors. I hope and trust that when the people of my county allow themselves to be caught by chaff like that it will be in a moment of weakness. Now, I contend that the Government are morally bound, if they can see their way clear, to build that tunnel, if it can be built for a reasonable sum. If it is not going to cost more than $6,000,000 they are not only bound to build it, but the people of Prince Edward Island will hold them to it; and I tell the Government now that they need not be surprised if the Government of Prince Edward Island enters a suit against them for damages to the extent of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 if they do not soon commence that work. Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that promises have been made. Are they going to allow the honour of Canada to be trampled upon? Are they going to allow the whole world to frown upon Canada because she will not carry out her sacred compact with the smallest province in the Dominion? I was expecting the other night, when the member for Queen's made his address, that the Minister of Finance would stand up here and tell the country what the policy of the Government was going to be, or whether they had come to any understanding or conclusion on the matter; but we did not hear one word from the Government. We merely know that they have had an estimate from Sir Douglas Fox as to the cost, but we do not know whether they officially consider the scheme to be feasible. We know that some of them think, including Senator Howlan, that the scheme is a feasible one. Sir Douglas Fox has said so, but I complain that we have not got officially the opinion of the Government upon that point. Perhaps they have got these papers in their pockets; and while I am on that subject I want them to produce the information which I asked for on the 12th May last, for certain documents, certain statistics from the Department of Marine, showing the yearly cost to the Government of carrying out, in an inefficient and slovenly way, the means of connection between Prince Edward Island and the mainland; and I want to show by those papers that the yearly expenditure of the Government in carrying out winter navigation will be very nearly the interest that we would have to pay on five or six million dollars to build the tunnel. But to my sorrow and surprise, I have not yet obtained those papers, although six or seven weeks have elapsed. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) the other night gave figures that I believe are in the return. I believe that he got them from some member of the Government, and if he can have these figures, while I, a member interested in the building of the tunnel, and a member having made a motion in the early part of the session, only thirteen days after the meeting of the House and four or five days after we had been in session, and when the time of our sittings could be almost counted in minutes, it does not reflect credit on the Government. What are the Minister of Marine and his subordinates doing in the department? I offered him my services gratis the other day, and if he would allow me to have the use of these papers I could make a compilation in a few hours. How could the member for Centre Toronto tell us that only seventy passengers came to and went from the Island, unless he had seen the papers or return, or unless the Minister had told him? Have we come to this, that a member who is not interested in a certain project can obtain information to enable him to reply to a member representing a different province, and thwart his views and wishes? I do not believe this should take place. I consider the Government bound in honour to build the tunnel if it is feasible. That it is practicable we know; the cost we do not know. We know the cost of a 12, 16, or 18-foot tunnel. I contend it is the duty of the Government to ascertain which of these three sizes is required for the Island tunnel. I do not stand here to say that either the 12, 16, or 18-foot tunnel is sufficient. It is the duty of the Government to find that out. The people of the Island, moreover, demand that the Government shall, before the close of the session, announce themselves squarely on this question, and state whether they are going to adopt any of these sizes, and whether they are going to commence operations as soon as practicable, or whether they are going to give up the project. Our people do not intend to give up the agitation for a tunnel, or the agitation to force the Dominion Government to carry out the terms of union which three representatives of the Dominion Government signed in 1873. What were we told by the Colonial Minister in 1885, when delegates from the Island laid at the foot of the Throne a memorial from the people of the Island, signed unanimously by both Houses of the Legislature? Lord Granville said:

"As I stated in the earlier part of this despatch, although Her Majesty's Government is unable to take the question out of the hands of the Dominion Government, and although I have not seen more than a prima facie opinion as to the feasibility, at a moderate cost, of the proposal for its solution, I hope that it will be found to admit of a satisfactory settlement. On the one hand, the expectations of the province in regard to the establishment of a constant and efficient communication with the mainland have not been fulfilled."

Those words mean a great deal. Lord Granville told the Government of Canada that their promises had not been fulfilled, that the terms of union had not been carried out, and that they owed it to the Island to carry out those terms. If the Government want to carry out these terms of Confederation they will not do it by the steamer Stanley or any other steamer, although I am bound to say that the Stanley is a very fine boat, and I doubt if any other boat could be built to perform the service any better; but all who are acquainted with the navigation of the Straits of Northumberland know there are certain times during the year when a steamer cannot cross. Much information will be afforded to the House if we had the return for which I moved on 12th May. We would know how many trips the steamer made; when she commenced and closed; the number of days she was in ice at different periods; how long the people of the Island were without their mails; whether on a certain day the steamer was eight or ten days in the ice five or six miles from shore, and the passengers had to take their lives in their hands and walk over the ice to the shore, facing the danger of drowning? But I suppose the Minister of Marine expected this question would be disposed of before this information was obtained. If that was his idea, I do not think it is much credit to him or to the Government. Lord Granville proceeded to say:

"But on the other hand, the Dominion Government has shown that it has made considerable efforts to improve the communication, in the face of serious physical difficulties during the winter season. There seems to be reason for doubting whether any really satisfactory communication by steamship can be regularly maintained all the year round, which makes it all the more important that the proposed 'metallic subway' should receive a full, and, if feasible, favourable consideration on the part of the Government of the Dominion."

That is very friendly advice given to the Government by Lord Granville—advice which the Government should attempt to carry out. The noble Lord proceeds to say :

"The establishment of constant and speedy communication by rail would be a great advantage both to the province and to the Dominion, and I should suppose that the development of the traffic on the Island railroads, and of the capabilities of the province generally, would produce a large direct and indirect return on the expenditure.

"It would reflect great credit on the Dominion Government, if, after connecting British Columbia with the eastern provinces by the Canadian Pacific Railway, it should now be able to complete its system of railway communication by an extension to Prince Edward Island."

This was sound advice. Up to this time the Government have not taken a single step towards carrying it out. It is true they have estimates from Sir Douglas Fox; I suppose they have had them five or six weeks, but we have not heard anything in regard to them. The Government has not told the House what the estimates contained besides the cost, for we have so far received very bald information. I expect, before the session closes, that the Government will come forward and tell the House whether they are going to build the tunnel or not. Much has been said by the hon. member for King's with respect to this matter. He has dealt more particularly with figures than he has dealt with anything else, and his figures were so numerous and extensive—I will not say they were not to the purpose—that he has left very little for me to say on that score. I wish to show now the great hardship and great loss to the people of Prince Edward Island through the want of having direct communication with the mainland, summer and winter. The potatoes which we grow on the Island, and which are one of our chief articles of export, are not worth so much as the potatoes grown in Nova Scotia, and for what reason? Simply because the people of Prince Edward Island are not able to reach the markets in time to get a fair price. The time that our potatoes should reach the market would be during March and April, and at that time we are not able to send them across, while the people on the mainland, who ship their potatoes to the United States at that time, get the best price for them. I will read to the House a table which will show the effect of this. In 1889 Ontario shipped 102,253 bushels of potatoes, which realized $66,615, or 65 cents a bushel; Nova Scotia shipped 672,872 bushels, which realized $355,655, or 52 cents a bushel; Manitoba exported 90,858 bushels, which realized $47,059, or at the rate of 47 cents a bushel; New Brunswick exported 350,846 bushels, realizing $161,482, or 46 cents a bushel; Quebec exported 169,845 bushels, which realized $76,507, or at the rate of 45 cents a bushel; and Prince Edward Island exported 1,294,056 bushels, which realized $343,177, or 26 cents a bushel. This shows conclusively that it takes two bushels of potatoes in Prince Edward Island to realize as much money as one bushel sold in Nova Scotia—and why is that the case? It is because we have no tunnel, because we have no means of transporting the potatoes from the Island to the mainland at that time of the year when we should be able to take advantage of the market. That shows that the people of the Island are labouring under a great many disadvantages. But there is more than that. Our merchants in the fall of the year have to import goods very largely; in fact, they have to provide themselves with stock for the whole winter, and the result is that they are paying heavy interest on large amounts, as they have to carry a large quantity of goods in their shops for the winter season; whereas if they were in daily communication with the mainland they could get these articles across as they wanted them, and the people of Prince Edward Island would be able to buy the articles which they consume much cheaper than at the present time. I wish now to show the House the quantity of the produce in Prince Edward Island, and even if you deduct a large amount for home consumption you will find that there is still a large amount of agricultural produce to be exported. According to the census of 1881 we find that there were grown in Prince Edward Island oats to the value of $3,538,219, 6,042,191 bushels of potatoes and 1,191,817 bushels of turnips. These are only a few items, but they show that Prince Edward Island is a productive country, and the only means which the people have to make a little money and to pay their debts and become a little comfortable is by what they can obtain from the land. My hon. friend the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) told us the other day in his jokes—certainly his jokes did not please me very well, and I do not know how he pleased others, but I suppose he pleased himself—he told us that the Island paid in revenue and Customs and Excise only $190,000 a year, and that we should be satisfied with the expenditure of that $190,000, and that that is all we should have. The rumour went abroad some time ago that the hon. gentleman was sure to get a seat in the Cabinet, and if that is the case the Lord help poor Prince Edward Island. If the time has come when the administration of public affairs is to be left in the hands of such narrowmindedness as that, all I have to say is: God help the country. If each province is only to get according to the revenue it pays in Customs and Excise as shown by returns, I am sorry to have to tell the hon. gentleman that his Province of Ontario is going to come out very short indeed. I find from the returns that in the year 1881 the average per head paid by the population of Quebec in Customs and Excise was $7.29 per head, and in 1884 it was $7.54. The Province of Ontario in 1881 paid $4.78 per head in Customs and Excise and in 1884 it paid $5.14 per head of the population. If the narrowmindedness of the hon. gentleman's policy is to be carried out, then the Province of Quebec would have to get a refund of $3 per head of its population each year, for over twenty years, and if that was the case where would Ontario be found? Why, Sir, if Ontario had to turn to now and recoup Quebec to the amount of twenty or twenty-five million dollars where would the hon. gentleman's policy be? If the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) is going to carry out that policy, and if that policy is to be applied to little Prince Edward Island, he must apply the same principle to the larger provinces. I hope that in future the hon. gentleman will be a little more charitable, and a little fairer, and that he will sleep to-night and get up to-morrow morning with a sense of doing justice to the smallest province of the Dominion. If the hon. gentleman had been brought up in the climate of Prince Edward Island and had been fed upon its products he would never have in his breast such narrowmindedness as that; he would follow the principle which is our motto in Prince Edward Island—Parva sub ingenti, which means, I suppose, that the smaller one should be protected by the larger one. But according to my hon. friend's policy, the dear help the little one in the bonds of the big one. I think I have read enough to show that Prince Edward Island is not such a despicable little country—that it does a great deal to keep Ontario, that it has a large trade with Ontario, that it buys a great deal of flour, machinery, waggons and other goods from Ontario, perhaps amounting to $100,000 a year, perhaps $200,000, perhaps half a million; I have not the statistics here to show. Let me tell my hon. friend that a tunnel from Prince Edward Island to the mainland will not be for the accommodation of the Island alone, but for the accommodation of travelling agents from Ontario, who are there every day in force trying to cross. Sir, they have overdone their manufacturing in Ontario, and they must find new markets somewhere else; but my hon. friend is so narrow-minded that he will not let the people of Ontario come to Prince Edward Island. How can we pay our bills to the people of Ontario? Can you show me one instance where a Prince Edward Island customer of an Ontario manufacturer has dishonoured his bill? Echo will not answer. And how did they pay their bills? By selling their potatoes and paying twenty-five cents a bushel for the privilege of sending them to the United States market; by paying two dollars on a barrel of mackerel; by paying thirty per cent. on their horses. This is the way the people of Prince Edward Island are handicapped, and they must go to the United States to find a market. The hon. Minister of Finance may go to the West Indies, he may go to China, if he wishes, he may go all over the world, to endeavour to open up new markets for Canada; but he will not do it; it is impossible, and all the brains and power of the Government will not enable them to alter the geographical conditions of the world. The United States will always be the nearest market for the people of Prince Edward Island. We are asking the Dominion of Canada to carry out the sacred compact made with Prince Edward Island, so as to enable our people to compete with the Dominion; but, Sir, we hear not a word from the Government. The hon. Minister of Finance will not stand up and tell us what they intend to do. If there were another election I have no doubt he would come to the people of Prince Edward Island and make them believe that to-morrow or some other day they would go on with this tunnel. But I do not want this tunnel to do service in another election. Let us have fair-play and justice; that is all that the people of Prince Edward Island are asking for. If the Dominion of Canada does not intend to carry out its pledge with Prince Edward Island, in the name of common sense cut us adrift. We are not afraid to go on our own way; we were a successful and happy people before we entered Confederation. But we are handicapped now, and we are inclined to find fault with the Government. They tell us: Why do you not send members to support us? If you had elected Senator Howlan, no doubt the tunnel would be built. The men sent to this Parliament were pledged to support a tunnel, and I have yet to learn that every man in a province must be a Government supporter before that province can obtain justice at the hands of the Government. If that is the policy of the Government, and I must say it looks very much like it, let us know it. But let me give the Government this bit of advice, that the sooner they make up their minds what they are going to do in this matter, the sooner Prince Edward Island will prepare for the alternative. I am not going to say what it is; but let me tell the Government that we do not intend to sleep over our rights. Although we are a small people, perhaps not more than 120,000, we know how to look after our rights, and our rights we will get. We have the Colonial Minister to advise fairly and squarely what to do in this matter, and there is no fear but that we will get justice. It may take some time, but the day will come when the people of Prince Edward Island will get justice, and that may be much sooner than my hon. friends on the other side expect. It may happen before this session closes, perhaps before next session, that the hon. gentlemen now occupying the Opposition benches will occupy the Treasury benches, and if they do the tunnel is going to be built. I believe that if the Opposition got into power to-morrow, they would go to work honestly to carry out the terms of Confederation between the Island and the Dominion, and the tunnel is the only means that I know of by which the terms of Confederation can be carried out. Although the Government pretend to be so deaf as not to hear a word when a man shouts at the top of his voice, still they know very well that the terms of Confederation have not been carried and cannot be carried out without a tunnel or something like it. To send a steamer to cross from Georgetown to Pictou is not carrying out the terms of Confederation. The crossing by the Capes is not praticable in winter. A sub-way was spoken of for several years, but it is a fizzle; it has fallen to the ground. The only satisfactory means is a tunnel, and we have an engineer of the world-wide reputation of Sir Douglas Fox stating that the construction of a tunnel is perfectly practicable. We have also the promise of the late Sir John A. Macdonald that if practicable and if the cost would be within a reasonable amount, he would, if returned to power, advise his supporters to build the tunnel; we have the telegram of Sir Carles Tupper stating: "I am now satisfied the tunnel can be built for $6,000,000, and you may depend on me doing all I can to support the scheme." Having all these promises, is it anything but reasonable that the people of Prince Edward Island should call upon the Government to give them the opportunity of realizing the expectations thus held out to them? I have yet some faith that the Government is going to build this tunnel. They have already some little money engaged in it. I suppose they paid some money to Senator Howlan when he went on that mission to England. I do not know how much they paid him, but the Government of the Island paid him $400 and the people have a right to know what has been done with that $400. I do not mean to say that Senator Howlan did not make good use of it, but we have a right to know what the estimates are, and whether the Government are sincere, and when they are going to begin.

Have the Government satisfied themselves that the scheme is practicable and that it is within our means to build it? The people of Canada, if they have paid $1,000 or $2,000 towards this business, have the right to know what has been done with the money. They are entitled to know whether the sending of Senator Howlan to England was only a farce, or whether the Government were really honest in their intention to ascertain whether this work was feasible and what it would cost. I contend that the people of Prince Edward Island have a better right to expect the building of the tunnel than the people of Nova Scotia had to expect the building of the Chignecto Ship Railway, which is going to cost fully as much or more than the contemplated tunnel. There was no obligation on the part of the Government to build that railway, nor was there any immediate want of it, for the Straits of Canso will let any vessel out from the shores of Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick or into those shores. But that is not the case with the Island, which is completely isolated at present; and it would be far more reasonable for the Government of Canada to spend $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 in building the tunnel and thus carry out the terms of Confederation than to spend the same amount of money in building this ship railway, concerning which there was no obligation whatever. I do not find fault with the people of Nova Scotia for getting all the money they can, and they appear to believe that they have a right to suck from the Government all the milk they can get. It is nothing but railroads here and railroads there with them, but while I wish them luck with their railways, I would like to see every other part of Canada equally well treated; and I protest against this tyrannizing over the smallest province of the Dominion. Our Island has paid her fortieth share of our $270,000,000 public debt, and we have to bear our share of interest on that money; and what are we getting in exchange? Hon. gentlemen opposite need not cast up to me that Canada has built a railway for us. That matter has been explained by my hon. friend from King's, the railway belongs to the people of the Island. We were charged $3,500,000 in the financial statement between the Island and Canada at the time of Confederation, and if the Government had not built that railway we would be drawing 5 per cent. on that amount, or $165,000 annually from the Dominion exchequer besides the amount on which we are drawing interest now. That goes to show that the railway was built at our own expense. The Government may say that they are sinking $50,000 or $60,000 a year in it. No wonder. If there was constant communication with the mainland that road would pay, because there is no country in the Dominion more productive than the Island. Every mile through which that road travels is renowned for its fertility. Now, with respect to the statement that we pay less into the Dominion exchequer than we get, a table was made up in 1885 by the delegates we sent to England, which shows that we paid into the Dominion Exchequer $153,913 a year more than we get. The Committee of the Privy Council was at that time composed of Mr. McLellan and Sir Alexander Campbell, and they reported that we got yearly from the Dominion $723,129. Now any one who examines the blue-books knows that, in 1873, at the time we entered Confederation, when we had a tariff of 12½ per cent. our revenue was something like $400,000. At that time we had a population of 81,000, which has since increased to 115,000 or 120,000. And what has been the increase of the tariff? More than 100 per cent., and in some cases 150 per cent., and if you will make the calculation in this case, you will find that the revenue of Prince Edward Island must be $1,000,000. Again, the revenue of the Dominion, yearly, is about $40,000,000, and the population of Prince Edward Island is one-fortieth that of the Dominion; and I am sure every hon. gentleman must admit that Prince Edward Island consumes as much per head of the population as any other province in the Dominion. If we do not import direct from England, we import from Quebec, Montreal, Ontario, St. John, N.B., and Halifax, and you will find, Sir, that our contribution to the revenue will be in the vicinity of $1,000,000. That being the case, we have a balance against the Government of over $200,000 per year, which, in eighteen years, amounts to a very snug little sum, and what will it be in the future? The Government cannot boast that they have ever done much for the Island. They cannot boast that they have built any great works there. It is true they have built a very valuable breakwater at Souris, but that is not the only thing required on the Island. There are many other things required, and let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that Prince Edward Island is part and parcel of the Dominion, and, I would ask, is she to be tyrannized over because she is the smallest province? I trust the Government will act magnanimously and do its duty, and that is all we ask. All we ask is for a certain measure of justice. We want no favours, but we want our own or, at all events, a part of our own; and I have yet some hopes that the Government will, in the future, see their way clear to doing us justice. If the Government think they require an addition to their number, and if they will to-morrow set to work earnestly to build that tunnel I will give them my support.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PERRY. Let us see how honest and sincere you will be on that side of the House, and whether you will carry out what you say. I am afraid those are crocodile tears and that they resemble the "hoo-hoo" of the owl. I hope my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) will have a good sleep to-night and that, when he wakes up, he will not find he has been too badly hit. When he began to read from that newspaper, I thought he must be reading from the Patriot, which is a Grit newspaper, but I found he was reading from the Examiner, one of the most rabid Tory papers, a paper which is subsidized by this Government at the rate of $2,000 a year, and one for which my hon. friend from Toronto has given his vote. Is he prepared to swallow and endorse all that? I will have some charity for him and will not say much to him. What is he going to say to my friend from King's County (Mr. McLean)? I never heard such a skinning as he got from his Tory friend. I suppose it was sweet, because it came from a Tory, but, if it had come from a Grit, I suppose there would have been a row. I hope my hon. friend has a different opinion now as to the capacity of Prince Edward Island. He will find, if he goes there, that the people will entertain him as a gentleman, he will have potatoes, beef, pork, mackerel, codfish, salmon, cheese, butter, cream, tea—not green tea, but black tea—to drink, and he will come home satisfied that Prince Edward Island is the prettiest place, the most wholesome place and the most fruitful place in the Dominion of Canada and that the people are the most hospitable. I have always heard a good name of the people of Ontario, and I have travelled in that province, but I think the hon. gentleman must be an exception, he must have come there very lately; I do not think he is one of the original race of the people of Ontario, but I know that from this time out he will have a different opinion of the character of Prince Edward Island and the productions of that Island, and, when we ask for what is fair, he, expecting a seat in the Cabinet, will not again attempt to turn the Island into ridicule. He insulted every man in Prince Edward Island. He insulted every Tory in Prince Edward Island. There are not many of them, but he insulted those that are there. He insulted the intelligence of the people. I was almost going to say he insulted the Almighty who created the Island, and He was not penurious when He created it for He gave it a very good soil. When the hon. gentleman gets that seat in the Cabinet which we know is in prospectu, he may be more liberal. We have some hopes that the Government will redeem their pledges and carry out their promises to the people of Prince Edward Island, and that, before we meet here again the work on that tunnel will have been commenced, so that we may see that the Government of Canada is in earnest, and if that is so, every man, woman and child in the country will bless them, and they want a little blessing.

Mr. KENNY. I was not in my place when the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) made the speech that has fallen so unpleasantly on the ears of the hon. gentlemen who represent Prince Edward Island in this Legislature. I understand from their remarks that the hon. member for Centre Toronto undertook to criticize the trade of Prince Edward Island and to strike a balance between its contributions to the Dominion treasury and the amount of imports at Charlottetown and the other outports of the Island, and the amount of the Dominion expenditure in Prince Edward Island. I think the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island are quite warranted in finding fault with that mode of treating the question. I think it is not fair to Prince Edward Island and to the other "shreds and patches" of our Dominion that their contributions to the federal treasury should be so criticized. The hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) takes the blue-books and strikes a balance and comes to a conclusion on which he builds an argument that the per capita contribution of Prince Edward Island to the Dominion Treasury is only what is shown by these blue-books. That is a most erroneous manner of dealing with the public accounts of the country. We know, those of us who live in the smaller provinces of the Dominion—I speak more particularly of the eastern provinces, and I am as fairly familiar with the trade of Prince Edward Island as nearly anyone who has not the pleasure of living on that Island, that a very large amount of the goods consumed in Prince Edward Island contribute to the federal treasury at ports like Halifax, St. John, New Brunswick, Quebec, Montreal and even Toronto. I hope my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) will accept the invitation which has been extended so cordially to him by the two gentlemen who have addressed the House this evening, and will visit Prince Edward Island. If he does so, he will find a country which can be compared in agricultural wealth, to say nothing of the invaluable fisheries which surround its shores, but dealing with agricultural wealth alone—because that seems to be the only basis of wealth that gentlemen from Ontario are willing to consider—he will find that Prince Edward Island will compare favourably with the most productive districts in his own Province of Ontario. He will also find there a population as industrious, as law-abiding, as well gifted in all the good things of this world as can be found in any portion of the Dominion. I contend that the people of Prince Edward Island contribute per head to the federal treasury as much as the people of Ontario or any other portion of this Dominion. I must dissent entirely from the form of calculation which I am told my hon. friend had adopted. I should have expected to have heard of it from the other side of the House. That is the kind of argument we are familiar with. Hon. gentlemen opposite are forever telling us, for instance, that this terrible Intercolonial Railway is a great incubus upon Canada. I repeat what I have often said before in this House, and following the line of argument of the gentlemen from Prince Edward Island who have spoken this evening, that the Intercolonial Railway is of more value to the millers and manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec than it is to the people of the Maritime Provinces. My hon. friend need not go all the way to Prince Edward Island to become familiar with the trade of that Island. The next time that the hon. member for Centre Toronto, in his own constituency, will take an opportunity of calling upon any of the large importers there, he will find that they are in the habit of sending their travellers to distant Prince Edward Island, and that a very large amount of the goods consumed there come from the merchants of Toronto and Montreal. Now, Sir, I must entirely dissent from the conclusions of the hon. member for Toronto. The hon. gentleman from King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McLean), made to-night a speech so reasonable and so candid, so energetic and so eloquent, that it won for him the sympathy of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, and I have never heard a question more fairly and more candidly treated than it was by that hon. gentleman. He enumerated only a few articles, the products of Ontario, which are annually consumed by the people of Prince Edward Island, and his figures amounted to something like $600,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I noticed recently in one of our Maritime Province newspapers that one county of Prince Edward Island had exported, within a comparatively short time, potatoes alone to the value of $100,000. As regards the manner in which this question has been treated, that is, drawing conclusions simply from figures in the blue-books, I noticed the other day in looking over the savings banks returns, that the people of Prince Edward Island had in the Government savings banks of this Dominion something over two million dollars. The same page told me that the people of the wealthy city of Toronto had $600,000. Why, Sir, adopting the mode of the member for Toronto in drawing conclusions from blue-books, I might almost say that the people of Prince Edward Island are more wealthy than the people of Toronto, because they have more money in the Dominion savings bank. Reference has been made at great length to the tunnel by which it is proposed that Prince Edward Island shall be connected with the continent. This is a subject in which we can readily understand that the people of Prince Edward Island are much interested, and concerning which, I think, the members of this House generally are prepared to deal in a fair and impartial manner. Those of us who are living near Prince Edward Island, and are more familiar with the conditions of its population, hope and desire that some such communication may be established between the Island and the mainland; and one hon. gentleman who addressed the House on this matter, asked that when the returns are laid before Parliament, when all the engineers' reports are submitted to this House, if it is then found that this important work can be built and put in working order for what these gentlemen term as a reasonable sum, then this Parliament shall be prepared to deal with the question, and I must say that it is not an unreasonable position for these hon. gentlemen to take. The hon. gentleman who spoke last referred, although not in a complimentary manner, to the action of the Hon. Senator Howlan with reference to this important work. Well, as Senator Howlan is not here, I think it is only fair to him to say, in his absence, that if at any time within the life of any of us a tunnel shall be built, and I hope it will be built, it will be due to the exertions of Senator Howlan more than to the exertions of any other man in Prince Edward Island. The hon. member for King's, Prince Edward Island, pointed out the great disadvantages which the people of that province labour under, owing to their geographical position and the fact that they are compelled to force their agricultural products on the markets of the Maritime Provinces and of the United States, at a season of the year when those markets are, to some extent at least, overstocked with supplies from their own farmers. If the tunnel were built it would, I believe, add to the wealth of the farmers by enabling them to obtain a higher price for their agricultural productions, because they would have a market then open to them at all seasons of the year; it would add to the material well-being of Prince Edward Island, and we cannot improve the condition of the people of Prince Edward Island without their improvement reacting upon the whole Dominion. Therefore, anything we can do to benefit Prince Edward Island will be a benefit to the whole country. Now, Sir, the hon. member for King's, during the course of his very interesting speech, expressed the hope that when this question came to be dealt with by Parliament, it would be dealt with in the broadest possible and comprehensive way. I trust and believe that it will be so. I have no sympathy with gentlemen who are prone to deal with this question from a local or sectional standpoint. I have no sympathy with the Globe newspaper when it announces that the people of Ontario are tired of carrying a habitant and a fisherman on their backs. I think that such expressions are to be deplored, coming from the organ of a great party, even if the quasi leader of the party is disposed to refer to the Maritime Provinces as mere shreds and patches of the Dominion, for such language is not very funny and cannot be very pleasant to us; it is hardly dealing with the question in a way which will contribute either to the popularity of that paper, or to the influence of the gentlemen who make use of such statements, or in a manner which will redound to the general well-being of the country. I have very much sympathy with the gentlemen from Prince Edward Island in their efforts to secure better communication with the mainland, and I am quite sure that when the question is submitted to this Parliament, it will receive that careful consideration to which its importance entitles it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I feel it my duty to say just a word or two on this question. I must congratulate hon. members from Prince Edward Island for the gallant fight they have made on this question. Having had the pleasure last fall of visiting that beautiful province, which is called by the inhabitants the garden of Canada, I am in a position to know the importance of this question for those people, and the necessity that exists for the Government of the day, be it Grit or Tory, to build this tunnel, if it is feasible. I think the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), did not give a good reason when he argued that we should not give the Province of Prince Edward Island this tunnel, because the province is so small, and the people pay so little revenue to the Dominion. I think that when the Government took these people into Confederation they knew that the population was small, they knew that the income would be small, and having induced them to enter Confederation upon a pledge to build a tunnel, or to give them in some way permanent communication with the mainland, I think they must take up that pledge and carry it out. I have only to say that, having visited those people, having seen the importance of the Island, having observed the opinion of the people in favour of the tunnel, and seeing that they were induced to join Confederation because they expected the tunnel would be built, I think the Government ought to undertake that work if, as the hon. members from the Island have said to-night, it is at all feasible. The older provinces have had their share, and in acting on this matter we must not look only to our respective provinces, but to the Dominion at large. Ontario, the North-West, and British Columbia have had their shares by the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The people of Prince Edward Island have paid their share into the public treasury according to their population, and they have paid their share to the public works carried out in the older provinces. We in the Province of Quebec are asking for a bridge, and we hope to get it, and we will ask the people of the other provinces to pay their share. If the people of Prince Edward Island have a right to have the proposed tunnel, if the work is feasible, the Government should endeavour to see its way to give it to them. The Island is a very nice place to visit, and sometimes it is very easy to go there, but very hard to return; it may be a great pleasure to go there, but it is a serious matter to be detained five or six hours in the Straits of Northumberland on a cold day, and especially on Christmas day. I repeat that the Government are bound to build this tunnel if the work is feasible, and if the cost is not too great. The older provinces have had their share of public works, and if the people of Prince Edward Island are entitled to have tunnel communication I hope the Government will see its way to carry out the work, and fulfil the pledges given during many years and especially during the last election.

Mr. McMULLEN. My remarks will be made mainly for the purpose of referring to the unfortunate position which the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) occupies on this question. When he made his statement in the House he sat alongside of the Minister of Marine. I felt satisfied, and a number of members came to the same conclusion, that all the figures and facts had been supplied by the hon. Minister.

Mr. COCKBURN. They were not.

Mr. McMULLEN. They were very voluminous, and I shall be glad if the hon. gentleman will state where they came from, for they were not complied by him. I am glad, however, to hear the hon. gentleman say they were not given to him by the Minister of Marine. I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had been led into a trap. My reason for thinking so was the fact that one of the hon. members for Prince Edward Island criticized his utterances in a manner that was certainly not complimentary, coming as the criticism did from an hon. gentleman on the same side of the House as himself. In the next place, the senior member for Halifax made a speech somewhat in the same direction. I had come to the conclusion that the hon. member for Centre Toronto was an aspirant, and justly so, for a position in the Cabinet. I do not know any hon. member in the Conservative ranks, west of Belleville, who is better entitled to a position in the Cabinet than he is. The hon. gentleman comes from one of the most important constituencies in Ontario. I did think from the utterances of the hon. gentleman, and of hon. gentlemen who have followed him that a job had been put up on the hon. member for Centre Toronto. I hope I may be mistaken in that opinion, although I must say that it looks very much like a job. There are a great many members in Western Ontario, and it has been pointed that there is not a member in the Cabinet representing a constituency west of Belleville, and I think no other member is better entitled to become this representative in the Cabinet than the hon. member for Centre Toronto. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) does not aspire to a position of that kind in the face of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) could hardly expect that he would be honoured with that seat when the member for Centre Toronto is in the House. So I considered there was a probability of the hon. member for Centre Toronto of becoming a Cabinet Minister, and when I heard the speech he delivered and saw what I considered to be a job put up on him, I thought it was done for the purpose of killing the prospects of the hon. gentleman. I hope I may be disappointed in my conclusion, but we will quietly and patiently watch and wait the results. I have no doubt it will prove a difficulty in the way of the hon. gentleman's elevation, because it is well known that an hon. gentleman seeking a position in the Cabinet endeavours to remain on favourable terms with all the provinces, and the hon. gentleman by his speech has certainly not improved his prospects of getting on friendly terms with Prince Edward Island. I am glad to know, from the hon. gentleman's record, that he is under the impression that a job has not been put up on him, and I certainly hope it is true; but I must be allowed to retain my opinion that this has been attempted, if it has not been accomplished. It looks very much like it, but I earnestly hope it may prove not to be true. I will watch the movements of things political some time, before that opinion will be completely obliterated from my mind.

Mr. YEO. With the permission of the House I I desire to offer some remarks on this subject, which the people of the province from which I come and the people I represent consider one of very great importance. The subject was so well and ably dealt with some days ago by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in making this motion, and by the two hon. members from the Island who have spoken to-night, and by the senior member for Halifax, and by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), who has just resumed his seat, that I am sure that every hon. member who has given the matter his consideration must be convinced of the justice of the claim put forward on behalf of the people of Prince Edward Island. So much has been said on this subject, and the ground has been so fully traversed that I will have very little to say. But I will recall to the recollection of the House the fact that previous to Prince Edward Island entering Confederation the people were contented and prosperous. It was with much reluctance they cast in their lot with the larger provinces of the Dominion, but once the terms of Confederation were arranged, the people loyally accepted the situation, and so far as they are concerned they have fulfilled their part of the arrangement faithfully and loyally. But I regret to say we cannot say so much for the Dominion Government. One of the terms of the union on which this province joined the Confederation was that the Island should obtain continuous communication with the mainland, and we know that this important part of the terms the Dominion Government has failed to fulfil. Now, Sir, as has already been stated, attempts were made to maintain communication, first by placing the Northern Light on the route between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and although this steamer did remarkably good service we know that she signally failed to keep up continuous communication, and the same may be said as regards the Stanley which has taken her place. Both of these steamers have done excellent work in certain seasons of the year, but it is well known to everyone who has given the matter much consideration that during the greater part of the month of January, all of the month of February, and the greater part of March in almost every year, these steamers are not able to keep up anything like continuous steam communication with the mainland. Hon. members of this House who are in the habit of receiving their mails with regularity every day can appreciate the difficulty which business men residing in Prince Edward Island have to contend with when during the winter season they are days, and sometimes even weeks, without receiving their mails. The same is true with regard to the difficulties of the passenger traffic. It is not an unfrequent thing for persons wishing to get to Prince Edward Island in winter to travel to Pictou and when they get there to ascertain that the steamer is somewhere in the ice between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and they have to retrace their steps to New Brunswick and cross from Cape Tormentine on the ice-boats. That is a state of things which should not exist. When winter properly sets in the trips of the steamer are protracted and irregular, and usually in mid-winter the mails have to be conveyed on ice-boats between the mainland and the Island. The ice-boat service which we have now is practically the same as we had before Confederation. Some slight improvements have been made in the shape of building boat-houses on the Island and on the mainland, but these improvements are very slight indeed, and during the greater part of the winter our means of communication are little better than they were before we entered Confederation. I think that we in Prince Edward Island have very good reason to complain of this, and to ask that justice should be done us. It is acknowledged on all sides that the terms of Confederation on which Prince Edward Island entered the Dominion have not been carried out. I am free to admit Senator Howlan has taken a great deal of pains and trouble in endeavouring to improve the means of communication between the Island and the neighbouring Provinces of the Dominion. We know that for some time the question of the construction of a subway was spoken of, but that has been dropped, and what appears to be the much more feasible project of a tunnel has been taken up. Some few years ago the construction of a tunnel appeared to be likely to involve a larger expenditure of money than perhaps the Dominion Government could feel justified in undertaking, but as it is clear now that the cost of tunnelling has been very much reduced I consider that the Province of Prince Edward Island may very fairly come forward and ask that this question should be seriously taken up by the Government. The tunnel question was brought prominently before the people of Prince Edward Island previous to the last election; I may say that it was not made an issue in that election, because the people of the Island, from one end to the other were unanimously in favour of it, and as all the candidates were pledged to the construction of a tunnel, it was not an issue in the contest. As I have said before, I believe there is very little doubt in the minds of those who have given the matter consideration, that the terms of Confederation have not been carried out. In that respect we have the opinion of one who perhaps was as well, or better able, to give an opinion on the matter than anyone else. I refer to the late Prime Minister. In his letter which has already been referred to, he clearly states that up to that time the Dominion Government had failed to carry out the terms arranged with Prince Edward Island when that Province entered into the union with Canada. During last winter while the elections were pending we were promised a visit from the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, but unfortunately perhaps for Prince Edward Island he was unable to reach it, and I may say that if his coming there would have been the means of furthering the tunnel I regret very much he did not come. However, he did the next best thing to coming to Prince Edward Island by sending a telegram which has been read here to-night, and the purport of which is that the tunnel is feasible and that he will give it his support. We have therefore the opinion of these two hon. gentlemen that the terms of Confederation have not been carried out, and we have the further promise that this measure would receive their support. I think, therefore, that we can very fairly come before this House and ask that the matter be taken up and dealt with in the way which the Province of Prince Edward Island demands. It is unnecessary that I should refer to the letter sent by the late Prime Minister to the Hon. Senator Howlan who was a candidate for a county in Prince Edward Island last election, but I feel sure that his promise, as well as the promise of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, ought to ensure that this question will be taken up and dealt with fairly and properly. We have not very many particulars as yet about this tunnel, but the estimate of its probable cost has been laid before the House. I am not an engineer and I am not capable of giving a professional opinion, but it occurs to me that it is perhaps possible that the surveys which have been made across the Straits of Northumberland have not been as full and accurate as the importance of the undertaking would demand. Perhaps I am not justified in saying this, but I make the statement because I see that Sir Charles Tupper in his telegram says that he is assured that the cost of the tunnel will not exceed $6,000,000. I suppose in speaking of the tunnel he spoke of a tunnel of sufficient size to give the necessary accommodation, but the estimate which has been placed upon the Table of the House is somewhat in excess of the amount he stated. It would, therefore, appear to me that the engineer—a very eminent one I believe, Sir Douglas Fox—who has furnished this estimate has not had all the information which was necessary to enable him to give a very correct estimate. There is every probability that if his estimate is astray, it will be that he has erred on the larger cost, and the probability is that if his information had been more precise and correct, we would find that the cost estimated by him would be very largely reduced. On this point, of course, the Government can speak with more certainty than one who knows nothing about it beyond what the hon. Finance Minister has stated here. Mr. Speaker, I think it has been frequently represented in this House that Prince Edward Island has not been very generously, perhaps not very fairly, dealt with. Even in the matter of official salaries, from the highest officials we have down to the humblest employé in the railway service, I understand the salaries paid are very much below those paid in the other provinces. I do not know why that should be so—why we should be treated as being inferior to our fellow-citizens in other parts of the Dominion. Taking the people of Prince Edward Island man for man, I feel sure they will compare favourably with our fellow-citizens in the other provinces, and I do not consider distinctions of this kind are, to say the least, very fair. We in Prince Edward Island have been obliged to contribute our share to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the large subsidies which have been granted to railways, and to the large sums of money which have been expended on the construction of canals and other public works, while we have received scarcely any benefit from these expenditures, and our own public works on the Island—they are not very many—have not been attended to as they should be. In many parts of Prince Edward Island we have wharves which were taken charge of by the Dominion Government, and which are not in a good state of repair. I have not had the opportunity of calling the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Work to this subject ; but if he knew the state of our wharves, he would authorize an expenditure for their repair. If they are not attended to immediately these wharves will fall into decay and be of no use. I merely speak of these things because we in Prince Edward Island consider that our wants have been overlooked. I know that the attention of the Government has been called to these facts by representatives of Prince Edward Island in previous sessions and by representations from the Local Government ; but up to the present time they have not been attended to in the way we think they ought to be. Now, I intended making some reference to the speech of the hon. member for Centre Toronto ; but I feel that he has been, I was going to say so properly dealt with by the press of Prince Edward Island and by the two hon. gentlemen from that province who have preceded me, that I do not think it is necessary to say anything on the subject. I have no doubt that he himself is now sorry that he did not take a little more trouble to investigate the facts more fully, and to lay more correct information before this House. It has been shown by the hon. junior member for King's County (Mr. McLean) that Prince Edward Island, instead of being a burden to the Dominion, is quite the reverse—that instead of receiving from the Dominion more then we pay into the federal treasury we receive less. The hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who, to a great extent, is disinterested in this matter, has also shown very clearly that the hon. member for Centre Toronto was quite at fault in making the comparisons he did. The hon. member for Centre Toronto intimated that he would honour Prince Edward Island with a visit during this summer. I hope he will do so. If he goes there and sees that province and has an opportunity of speaking again in this House, I am sure he will speak in a very different tone from what he did the other evening. While the Island is a pleasant place to visit in summer, I would like the hon. gentleman, and many other members of this House, to visit it in winter. They would then themselves experience some of the difficulties which the people of Prince Edward Island have to contend with. They would find them to be very great indeed. We in Prince Edward Island know that we have been a long-suffering and patient people. We have had this difficulty to contend with for eighteen years. We have hoped from year to year that things would be better, but we find that with the exception of a small improvement we are in the same condition to-day with respect to winter communication that we were when we became part of Confederation. I have noticed that whenever any allusion is made in this House to Prince Edward Island it is sneered at. It is said . You are only a small province with a small population, and hardly worth considering. I think that is an improper way to treat a province of this Dominion. If it is a small province, it ought on that account to appeal more strongly to the sympathies of the hon. members of this House. However, I am not here on the part of the people of Prince Edward Island to plead for sympathy or to ask for favours, but only to ask that justice shall be done to us. If we get justice, that is all we want. We are satisfied, if we get fair-play, to work out our own business in every way. I have no doubt, from the speeches which have been made on this question at this time, that we are coming near to a solution of this question. I think hon. gentlemen see that there is a necessity of something being done—that they cannot allow us as part of the Dominion to go on in this unsatisfactory manner much longer. We do not wish the Government to rush hastily and recklessly into an expenditure ; but we would like them to take the matter up immediately. It is not unreasonable to ask the Government, if they are satisfied that they have sufficient information before them to go on with the construction of the work, that they will do so. If, however, they consider it is necessary that more accurate surveys should be made and other estimates obtained, they should at once take steps to have this done. We do not wish to have this matter laid over, by either this or another Government, until on the eve of a general election it is brought up again. We want it dealt with when an election is not in view, and dealt with in the way the terms of Confederation require that it should be. Now, the hon. gentleman who leads the Government in this House has stated that it is the intention of the present Government to adhere to the policy of the late Government. I am not very particular about that ; but there is one thing I hope they will do—that they will adhere to the policy of their late leader in regard to a tunnel for Prince Edward Island ; and I hope —and it is the hope of all the representatives of that province on either side of politics—that they will fulfil the promise made by their late leader and bring this matter to a close as soon as they possibly can. If they will do that, they will be doing an act of justice to, not a large province, but to as loyal and faithful a people as there are in this Dominion ; and they will be fulfilling the sacred terms of Confederation which were entered into between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, and concerning which there can be no doubt as to their binding character. We have waited and waited patiently, and have not taken extreme steps in any way, but the time has now arrived when something should be done. The disadvantages under which we labour have been pointed out very clearly. The junior member for King's (Mr. McLean) has gone into this matter very fully ; he has shown the disadvantages which we labour under with regard to mails and passengers, and from a commercial point of view, and I believe these are difficulties and disadvantages which every hon. member of this House must appreciate. I trust, therefore, that the Government will see their way clear to take immediate steps to bring this matter to a conclusion.

Mr. WELSH. At this late hour I do not intend to detain the House very long. I have listened with great pleasure to the very able speeches of the hon. member for King's (Mr. McLean) and of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Yeo), and also to that of my hon. colleague, who introduced this matter the other day in what I considered was a very moderate, temperate, non-partizan speech. He put the matter very calmly and deliberately, and I think his remarks should have been received by hon. gentlemen on both sides with the courtesy they demanded. I am somewhat astonished that we have had no reply from any member of the Government on this matter. The only Minister who spoke was the Postmaster General, who brought to the notice of this House the fact that the postal service in Prince Edward Island is not self-sustaining in proportion to that service in other provinces. Naturally so, since we are isolated, and the conveyance of our mails is a very complicated business. In the fall of the year there are three routes over which our mails have to be conveyed—at one time from Cape Tormentine to Cape Traverse, at another time from Charlottetown to Pictou, and again from Georgetown to Pictou; and those routes have to be changed very often, thus entailing very heavy expenses. I might also ask how you could expect our postal revenue to equal that of other portions of the Dominion where there is continuous communication, whereas in the Island we are at times a week or ten days without any mail. How can you, Sir, expect a revenue from a service conducted in that way. But I must compliment the hon. Postmaster General on the able way he has conducted the postal service of Prince Edward Island since he took charge of that Department, for it was never shown previously the consideration it has since then received. In former years our newspapers were full of letters complaining of the inadequacy and mismanagement of that service. Talk about the letter in the Examiner, that Government organ of which the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) complains; the strictures in that letter are mild compared with those that appeared concerning the management of the postal service in those days. You do not see anything of that kind now, but on the contrary you see every consideration given to Prince Edward Island which it is possible for the Postmaster General to give it; and if His Excellency the Governor General had called on me to form a Cabinet I should have been very happy to have asked the Postmaster General to remain in his present position. The hon. member for Centre Toronto applauds, but he will not applaud so quickly now. He scribbled off a lot of figures and statements. His scribbling some recompense may meet, and raise this Daniel to the judgment seat; but I doubt whether his scribbling will bring him to that position to which we are told he aspires. That hon. gentleman's statements were totally uncalled for. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have refrained from ever interfering with any hon. gentleman when discussing the wants of the district he represents, as I consider every representative on the floor of this House is the proper party to understand the wants of his own constituents, and I hesitate about passing an opinion on subjects in the district of another hon. gentleman. Those subjects I leave to be dealt with by the member representing the district interested; but here is an hon. gentleman who never took the trouble of coming to look at Prince Edward Island, and who gets up in this House and insults, not only every person from the Island, but the memory of his late leader, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. He insults also the intelligence of Senator Howlan, who resigned his seat in the Senate to give this matter of the tunnel his serious consideration for a number of years, and who spent his time and money in trying to get a scheme adopted by which continuous communication might be kept up between the Island and the mainland. He insulted equally the intelligence of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who visited the Island and crossed in the winter time, and therefore knows the difficulties under which we are labouring. And what do we ask? Do we ask an impossibility? Is our request an unreasonable one? We only go as far as Sir John A. Macdonald went, and the leader of the Opposition went, when we ask, if this matter is feasible and not too expensive, that it should be carried out. We know that since we have been in session we have been flooded with petitions for prohibition from all sections of the country. No one here attempted to sneer at those petitions, and how have they been dealt with? They have been dealt with by means of a Royal Commission to investigate as to whether prohibition is required or not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would you favour a plebiscite on the tunnel question?

Mr. WELSH. If there is no better mode of settling this matter, we will have to do what the Finance Minister did with the prohibition question, and appoint a Royal Commission to investigate it. There are a good many other matters that might be brought up. My hon. friend, the member for King's, made a magnificent showing of the benefits this scheme would produce to Prince Edward Island. He has shown that in the fall of the year our shipping time is limited to the month of November, as the harvest is gathered in and the potatoes taken out of the ground in October, so that November is the only month we can ship our produce. Our produce is then forced out by every means we can get and run into our limited markets, which are then glutted; whereas if we had a tunnel our farmers could ship their supplies according as the markets required them. If the tunnel were built, do you mean to say, Sir, that the postal revenue would not be increased and be equal in proportion to that of any other part of the Dominion? Of course it would. And the Prince Edward Island Railway, instead of running at a loss of $100,000 a year, would run at a very much decreased loss, if indeed it were not made profitable. The Intercolonial Railway and other railway connections on the mainland would be benefited, so that this tunnel would be a means of profit to the whole Dominion. I think that we ought to have some statement from a member of the Government as to what course the Government intend to pursue, for in Prince Edward Island we are neither Liberal nor Conservative, so far as this question is concerned. On this question we are all united, and are going to stand no nonsense about it. It is not necessary for me to go through all the figures which my hon. friend has quoted, and I have to thank the senior member for Halifax for his kindness in making the statement he did. This scheme would not be a wild-cat scheme if it is feasible, and can be carried out for a reasonable amount of money. There was no trouble about giving $150,000 to dump a pier at Cape Tormentine. Allow me to ask any member of the Government, who asked them for it? Is there a man from Prince Edward Island who asked for the $150,000 to be dumped into the sea at Cape Tormentine? Then they went into the Chignecto Railway scheme, which I call a wild-cat scheme, and which will cost at least three millions of money. Look at the reckless way in which the millions have been scattered round that place, and they say Prince Edward Island will get the benefit of it. When Sir Charles Tupper was here as Minister of Railways he said, pointing to me: Here is a man who objects to this railway, and it will do more benefit to him than to any man in this Dominion. I think, when a man does not ask for a thing it is hardly worth while giving it to him. I maintain my opinion on the subject. Time will tell whether I am right or not, but I believe the money is thrown away. We are told it is for Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island never asked for these things. Now we ask for something which all the members from the Island are united in asking for, and that is consideration for this tunnel scheme. The Government in the last Parliament, when it was presided over by the late lamented leader, sent surveyors and had the Gulf surveyed, and then they had the matter left to Sir Douglas Fox for his estimate. The opinion of Sir John Macdonald was, that if it could be built for five or six millions it would be well to go on with it, and he would lay the matter before his Government? Is that the opinion of the Government to-day? I hope it is, and I think the sooner this matter is decided and the Government lay it before the House the more satisfactory it will be to the people. At all events, the people of Prince Edward Island are determined, as far as they can, to have something done to see that the Government fulfil the terms of Confederation. Now we come to a real simple matter. We entered into Confederation in good faith with the Government of this Dominion. The Government pledged themselves to establish continuous steam communition between Prince Edward Island and the railways of this Dominion. Have they done so? They have not. They have failed in doing it, and what excuse can any hon. gentleman give for their not fulfilling those terms? If one gentleman has an agreement with another and fails in carrying it out he is liable for damages. The amount of $5,000,000, which the Conservative Government of Prince Edward Island demanded in their Address to the Queen, for the non-fulfilment of the terms of Confederation up to date, would nearly build this work. I will not detain the House further, but I fully endorse all that has been said by my hon. friend from King's (Mr. McLean), my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Perry), and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), and I hope the Government will give the members and the House a clear understanding as to what they intend to do in regard to this matter.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not intend to occupy the attention of the House by any remarks on this question, but I think it is perhaps hardly fair that the discussion should be confined to the members from Prince Edward Island, and my hon. friends from Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn), and Halifax (Mr. Kenny). Some of the remarks which have been made by the last two gentlemen who adressed the House have, I think, hardly been made in the fair spirit which has generally characterized this discussion. All through the discussion, I think, there has been an endeavour by every person who has addressed the House on this subject to deal with the question fairly, and upon its merits. The speakers to whom I refer, however, seemed rather disposed to complain that the terms of Confederation had not been carried out as far as Prince Edward Island was concerned, and that the Government had not made an earnest effort to carry out those terms. I think that those charges against the Government are hardly justified by the facts. The speech which my hon. friend from Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) made was intended to show that Prince Edward Island had received an amount from the Dominion treasury which was very large in proportion to her contributions to the general fund. While I do not endorse what I regard as the extreme view which the member for Toronto Centre took of that subject, I cannot on the other hand endorse the sentiments of the last two speakers, that the interests of the Island have been entirely neglected by the Government. The hon. member for Prince said that the people of Prince Edward Island were in no better condition to-day than they were before Confederation. I think any hon. gentleman who will compare the condition of things to-day with the condition of things before Confederation will agree with me that the hon. gentleman was not justified in making that remark. We well know that during the winter season, during which the greatest hardships are suffered, before Confederation the only means of communication with the mainland was by the ice-boat service between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine, that the service was very inefficient at that time, and that after people from the Island had crossed the Straits they were obliged to take a long journey by road. They had to go from Cape Tormentine to Sackville or Amherst, on the mainland, and I think as far as the county line on the Island. The drive on the mainland was about 40 miles, and I think, though I am not quite certain as to the figures, the drive on the Island was about 20 miles. If they compare that with the service they have to-day, even at the Capes, and remember the fact that instead of being obliged to drive this long distance in the cold with horses and sleighs, they can travel by train comfortably and quickly, the hon. gentleman will be hardly in a position to say that their condition is no better than it was before Confederation. The same gentleman referred to the efforts of the Government to establish steam communication in the winter by the construction of the Northern Light. That boat was constructed by the party of which the hon. gentleman is a member and the Government which that party supported. It proved in time that that boat did not efficiently perform the service for which she was intended; but in 1883 the Government, in response to the request of the representatives of Prince Edward Island, appointed a committee to enquire into the whole subject of this communication with Prince Edward Island. That committee spent some weeks in investigating this subject; they had a number of gentlemen brought to Ottawa from Prince Edward Island and from the mainland, who were familiar with the question of communication there. They took the evidence of these gentlemen and presented a report to Parliament; and as a result of that report, which emanated, as I say, from the representatives of Prince Edward Island, we have at the present time the Northern Light replaced by a new and, I believe, as good a steamer as can be built for the service—the steamer Stanley. We have in addition to that an ice-boat service between the Capes, very much improved, and placed under the control of the Government. We have also the two railway systems, the Prince Edward Island system and the Intercolonial Railway on the mainland, connected by branch lines. This is the result of the action of the Government, founded upon the reports of the committee which was appointed in 1883 to investigate this subject. I believe there is a disposition on both sides of this House to deal fairly with the question, for it must be admitted that whether the terms of Confederation are literally carried out or not, there has been every possible effort made on the part of this Government, and I think on the part of the Government which preceded it, so far as possible, to carry out the terms of Confederation and give the Island the very best communication with the mainland which it is possible to do under existing circumstances. Now, with regard to the construction of the tunnel, I do not wish to occupy the time of the House any further in discussing that question. The speech of the hon. member for King's P.E.I., (Mr. McLean) has really exhausted that subject. He went into a number of calculations to show the saving that would be effected in the present expenditure for communication with the mainland, if this tunnel were constructed. There can be no doubt in the mind of any one of the enormous advantages which would result to the farmers of Prince Edward Island if they could have continuous communication through the winter season. The advantage of having access to the markets of the Dominion for their farm produce, during the winter season especially, would be of great importance to the farmers, and would very greatly improve their condition. I believe that the Island embraces an area of something like a million and a-half acres of land, and that about half this quantity is under cultivation, say 700,000 acres. Now, in my judgment, if constant and regular communication during the winter could be established, it would very greatly enhance the value of the whole of the farm lands of Prince Edward Island. If the present cultivated lands were increased in value by $10 an acre, we would have an increase in the value of the agricultural lands of the Island, by the construction of the tunnel, amounting to $7,000,000, which is, at all events, half the cost of that work, perhaps more, perhaps it would be the entire cost. If we take the whole land of Prince Edward Island and put the same increase upon it we would have $15,000,000 added to the value of the property of the Island by the construction of this work. This may or may not be a correct estimate, but I believe that it is an estimate which is within the mark. I am convinced that in a country which has such great agricultural advantages as Prince Edward Island, which has such a fertile soil, which is capable of producing such excellent crops, if they had regular access to the markets of the rest of the Dominion, the value of their farm lands would be very greatly enhanced, and I think the estimate which I have made is not beyond the mark. If I am correct in this view, this subject certainly demands from the Government the most serious consideration. I am glad that it is receiving so much attention at the present time, and I am glad that the leaders of both political parties in this House have, during the last year, committed themselves to the construction of this important work, if it is found to be practicable, and can be done at a reasonable cost. I trust that some steps will be taken during the present season to have further surveys made, and such other information regarding this work obtained, as will enable the Government and the House to come to an intelligent decision in regard to its practicability.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I will not detain the House at this late hour with many remarks on this subject. As it is not a political subject, I had hoped that the remarks made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) and my hon. colleague from King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McLean), and the hon. gentlemen from Prince (Mr. Perry and Mr. Yeo) would have exhausted the subject so that it would not be necessary for the other gentlemen from Prince Edward Island to take up the time of the House. However, as all the other representatives from Prince Edward Island have spoken on this subject, I will offer a very few remarks. I must thank the House for the manner in which they have received the remarks of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this, to us, all important subject. I think that my hon. friend the junior member for Prince perhaps made a little slip when he said, or insinuated, that we were being sneered at in this House; I do not think that he intended his remarks to apply to the present House, at least. I must congratulate my hon. friend and colleague from King's (Mr. McLean) for the manner in which he presented the facts to the House. He has taken up all the points, I think, as fully and as thoroughly as they can be taken up, and he has shown that we are fair contributors to the treasury of this country in proportion to our population; and if we had the advantages that other portions of the Dominion have, of regular and steady communication with the mainland, our railroad, instead of being a loss to the treasury of the Dominion as it is now, would be self-sustaining. He has also shown that if the tunnel scheme was carried out the province would become a contributor towards making the Intercolonial Railway self-sustaining. There is no doubt that at the present time we are under great disadvantages because of our isolated position, and I trust and believe that the Government will take the earliest opportunity to investigate this question of the tunnel with a view of seeing whether it can be carried out at a reasonable cost. The question of the size of the tunnel is one which we are not prepared and do not wish to go into now. The Government have a report before them from eminent engineers, showing the cost of different sizes of a tunnel, and in any case, as I understand the matter, it is advised that a shaft be sunk on the Prince Edward Island side of the Straits to a certain depth in order to reach the strata that forms the bottom of the Strait and runs across to the mainland; and if this strata is found to be such as geologists suppose it to be, that fact will be of the very first importance in the construction of the tunnel, and the formation is everything that could be desired. I trust the Government will see their way clear to put a sum in the Estimates, even this present session, in order to sink such a shaft and demonstrate whether the tunnel can be carried out successfully. I do not intend at this late hour to encroach on the time and patience of the House by offering further remarks on this question, but I would just say that I do not know but that after all we have to thank the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr.

Cockburn) for the remarks he made on this subject, because I think if he has not done anything else he has aroused the sympathy of the House and given my hon. friend near me a chance to demonstrate that the figures which the hon. member for Centre Toronto presented to the House were not based on a proper foundation.

Mr. COCKBURN. May I be allowed to say one word before this motion is put?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can only make a personal explanation in regard to any portion of his speech which may have been misrepresented.

Mr. SPROULE. I move the adjournment of the House, with a view to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to say a few words.

Mr. COCKBURN. I regret that any remarks which I may have considered it my duty to make with respect to this question of a tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland should have given umbrage to hon. gentlemen who have been sent here to represent that Island, and certainly I had no such intention when I brought forward those figures and data that I laid before the House. It was far at least from my mind to offer anything like an insult, as my words have been characterized, to members representing the Island of Prince Edward. I have been asked if my figures were given to me by any member of the Government. The reply I had to make was that the figures were entirely my own, that I had culled them from the Auditor General's Report, and that I marked opposite each item the page from which I had extracted it; so that I take full responsibility for those figures on myself. I have been accused of narrow-mindedness, of having a provincial cast of mind, of being unable to develop any political worth. All I can say is, that I never brought forward my data with a view to establish any principle like this, that in dealing with any province we should consider how much we receive from it and how much we give to it. I stated distinctly, at the beginning of my remarks, that I regarded it as a Dominion and not simply as an alliance of provinces, that I was proud to stand here as a Canadian, and though I have the honour to represent a part of the city of Toronto, yet the interests of the Island of Prince Edward or of Vancouver are no less dear to me, and I claim I have the right as a citizen of this Dominion to take up and lay before this House any data I may have with reference to any one part of it. I cannot for a moment allow the ground to be taken by anyone here that because he happens to represent a particular district, we are all to be precluded from offering any advice with respect to any request made by that district. My figures have been called in question. It is unnecessary for me, and it would be foolish for me at this early hour of the morning, to take up the question of these figures in detail; but I cannot help directing the attention of the House to the fact that the amount of Excise mentioned by the two hon. gentlemen who wish to controvert my figures was $185,000. That is the amount claimed to be paid for Excise by Prince Edward Island. The Island I understand is under the Scott Act, and the only town where spirits are sold or that is free from the operation of the Act is Charlottetown, which I believe is a prosperous city of 12,000 or 12,500 inhabitants. Accordingly, taking $185,000 for Excise it becomes necessary for me to divide that amount among the 12,500 inhabitants of Charlottetown, which gives on an average an amount of $15 per head for every man, woman and child. Or, if I were to look at it in the other light of supposing that young children were not addicted to drinking, and look at it simply in the light of ascertaining how much each head of a family would consume, I would multiply 15 by 5 and get $75 for every head of a family as the amount of Excise paid by him, and this would involve his consuming no less than 55 gallons of whiskey per annum. We are told that Toronto was a drunken city by my return, but in common sense what must Charlottetown be, with every head of a family consuming every week no less than one gallon of whiskey? I simply mention this point as an illustration—I might take other instances of the manner in which my figures have been attempted to be dealt with. My figures are there; my figures are correct.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) No.

Mr. COCKBURN. Apart from these matters, there is the broad question, is it advisable to build this tunnel under the circumstances?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The hon. gentleman was widely astray in regard to the amount paid for Customs.

Mr. COCKBURN. Is it advisable under the circumstances to build the tunnel? That is really the question before us. I take the ground that, considering all the circumstances in which we are placed, the heavy indebtedness under which the country lies, the fact that we have just been relieved of two millions or three millions of revenue, the fact that there has been an earnest desire expressed on both sides of the House to curtail our expenditure and to delay all unnecessary expenditure and to put aside all expenditure we could put aside for the moment, I took the ground, and I take it still, that it is not advisable at present under the circumstances to deal with this question at all. We must await developments, and perhaps in the future, as we have seen within the past two years how very great has been the reduction effected in the cost of submarine tunnels, that a tunnel which would cost a few years ago $24,000,000 could now be obtained for $12,000,000, perhaps in a few years this tunnel may be obtained for a very few millions. It will then be time, I think, for us to take up this question; but until the expense can be brought within a reasonable compass I contend it is within our duty not to be holding out false hopes, but to improve as far as we can the machinery we now have for effecting continuous communication with the mainland and the Island. I have to thank hon. members who are kind enough to invite me to visit their pretty Island. I have no doubt if I went there I should meet with that courteous reception which one gentleman would extend to another, and I can assure them that, while we think a great deal of Ontario, we have never ceased to think well and to speak well of the pretty Island of Prince Edward, and we have always been glad to receive the representatives from the Island who have come up to Toronto with the greatest courtesy and the greatest kindness, and I trust that if there has been any feeling excited by any words of mine the other evening with reference to Prince Edward Island, it shall be considered that the facts were stated because I believed them to be true, as I still believe them to be true, and because I believe the facts and the statements which I made were in the best interests of our common country.

Motion to adjourn the House withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not my intention to waste, or to take up any of the time of the House at this late hour, and I should not have spoken were it not for some remarks which have been made by gentlemen from Prince Edward Island especially, and because of the fitness of things that it would be well that a motion of this kind should receive some remarks from a member of the Government. There is no doubt of one thing: I think those hon. gentlemen who come from Prince Edward Island, and who have debated this subject in so judicious a manner in the main, must have been pleased with the kindly and generous interest which has been manifested in it by the members on both sides of the House. I do not think, at any time in the previous history of Parliament since I have had connection with it, that any question which has come from Prince Edward Island has received a more careful consideration at the hands of the House than the question which we have been discussing to-night. That arises I suppose from the fact of the earnestness of the desire of the Province of Prince Edward Island for this improved means of communication, and from the fact also, that it has come to be a question in which the whole Island is interested, and it so rises to a certain extent above mere party politics. That interest is due to a great many causes ; it is due to the natural situation of Prince Edward Island and the difficulties which, on account of nature, are in the way of her having communication continuously with the mainland. It is due also to the very strong efforts which have been made by certain citizens of Prince Edward Island, notably, amongst others, Senator Howlan ; and while speaking on this point, I wish to say that, to my mind, the criticism upon Senator Howlan for his having been anxious to resign his seat in the Senate and to contest an election for this Parliament and so gain a victory for the Government, is not, I think, a just criticism under the circumstances. That a man who has a seat in the Senate, in the receipt of the same indemnity, and possessing much the same honours as are held by a member of this House ; that he should resign that seat and take part in an arduous and heavy contest in the winter season in Prince Edward Island, argues, I think, a state of mind and an earnestness of purpose which should shield him from criticism of that kind. I know from personal knowledge that Senator Howlan was not asked by the Government, and was not pressed by the Government to resign his position as Senator and to contest this seat for the House of Commons ; but he did it because he believed in the tunnel, he wanted to advocate the interests of the tunnel, and he wished, and I believe he still wishes most earnestly, to see it an accomplished fact. I wish also to correct another impression—an impression which seems to have been shared in by my hon. friend from Prince County, who I am sure would not wish the House to have a wrong impression of the facts. The hon. gentleman from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) seemed to go on the same assumption, and that is, that there was a pledge at the time of Confederation that the tunnel should be built, or that a means of communication which could only be brought about by something like a tunnel should be provided, and further, that Sir John Macdonald pledged himself that if it were possible, and the expense reasonable, the tunnel should be built, for the reason that Canada had not carried out its pledge given at the time of the union of Prince Edward Island with the Dominion. Now, Sir John Macdonald's letter does not, I submit, carry with it that meaning at all. and I wish to read the letter so that it may be fresh on the Hansard and in the minds of hon. gentlemen at the time this assertion is made. Sir John Macdonald's letter is as follows :—

"In response to your pressing request with respect to the tunnel across the Straits, I desire to repeat that, under the present circumstances, the Cabinet are not in a position to deal with the question. If, as I believe, the country will continue to give us its confidence, the Ministry will, under my guidance, take the matter up without delay. I understand that Sir Douglas Fox is of opinion the scheme is a feasible one. The chief thing still unknown is the cost of construction. I fully appreciate the nature and extent of the obligation incurred by the Dominion to maintain continuous communication between the Island and the mainland. We have tried to carry this out by the Stanley, but of course she cannot fight against the elements. So if the cost comes within a reasonable amount, such as Parliament feels itself justified in incurring, I shall be prepared to submit the question for their favourable consideration."

Now, I do not consider that that letter admits that this Government, or any other Government preceding this, has not tried to carry out, and has not carried out the practicable engagements made at the time of the union of the Province of Prince Edward Island with the Dominion. You must read that of course in the light of circumstances and in the light of the time, and taking it in that sense, and considering what has been done by the different Governments, I do not think the cause of the tunnel will be advanced, and I do not think plain, practical, honest men looking at this matter from an unprejudiced standpoint will admit, that the cause of the tunnel will be furthered, by advancing the statement and by making the contention that the Dominion has broken its pledge of good faith with the Province of Prince Edward Island ; and that in order to redeem itself and to prevent it from standing under that disgrace it must build a tunnel. My own impression is that everything that has been promised, everything that was promised in the terms of Confederation has been honestly and loyally carried out by the Dominion, and to say, as some gentlemen have said, that the state of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland is not better to-day than it was before the Island entered Confederation is to state a thing which is I think on the face of it plainly absurd, and which will not go down with practical and sensible men. I do not wish to go into the discussion of that matter to-night, for there is not time. With reference to the tunnel and with reference to the position of the Government upon it, I may simply say this : The Government has always felt a kindly desire towards Prince Edward Island. That is a feeling which I suppose every Government would entertain for Prince Edward Island. It is a smaller province, it has difficulties to contend with as to its communications. Every word that my hon. friend from King's (Mr. McLean) said in his most excellent and sensible speech is true in that regard, and the advantages which would accrue to Prince Edward Island from a continuous and open communication of this kind would be incalculable to that province. There is no doubt about that, and any Government would have sympathy with an Island situated as it is, and as being a part of Confederation and labouring under these disadvantages. I think that whatever claim the Province of Prince Edward Island has to urge before this Parliament and this country must be placed upon that basis, and not upon the basis that a pledge given has been violated, and that consequently in order to keep faith the tunnel must be built if it is at all a possibility. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. McLean) touched another very practical point, and it is one which I talked over with Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Sullivan on two or three occasions when they visited Ottawa for the purpose of pressing this scheme on the Government. The Province of Prince Edward Island must in the first place admit that this tunnel, if it is feasible at all, is only so at a large cost which must be chiefly borne by the Dominion at large. What is the Province of Prince Edward Island prepared to do in return for that? It struck me, and I so canvassed it with those gentlemen—and I noticed that my hon. friend took up that point to-night—that in the working out of the feasibility of this scheme, we are to come somewhere near to this point. If it is feasible, it would be an excellent thing for the Dominion, and the Province of Prince Edward Island to have the tunnel built. In the first place, we ought to see what it can be built for. That is, is it feasible at all, and if so, at what cost? The Government has I think done all it can be asked to do in this regard. It has carried on its investigations, and at the request of delegates from Prince Edward Island, it has borne the cost of an investigation by Sir Douglas Fox and others, with a view of getting estimates, on such data as were available, of the cost of the tunnel. These are now in the hands of the Government and will be placed in the hands of the House. It may be possible, and I believe it is true, that there are not yet sufficient data for getting at what may be termed the fairly certain cost of the tunnel; and I think it will be the duty of the Government, and I am sure it will also be its pleasure, if there is something else needed in order to carry on investigations which will give the data as nearly as possible for a pretty definite and certain estimate of the cost and feasibility of constructing a tunnel, to do this if it can be done without too great cost, as I am quite certain it can. So far, the Government has evinced its desire to do all that is possible under the circumstances. Then the question comes, what kind of a tunnel is necessary—one of 18 feet, one of 16 feet, or one of 11 feet? That is to be determined by the cost of one or other of these tunnels. But the cost of the larger one may preclude the possibility of its being built. If so, would a smaller tunnel be of such clear benefit to the Province of Prince Edward Island that it would be worth the cost of building? These things are treated in the report in part, and will have to be considered carefully by the Government and by the House as well. Then, if we get at the cost of the tunnel, it seems to me the next question comes for Parliament to decide, what would be the cost of carrying the interest charge on that tunnel and working it? When you have that, it is fair to set opposite to it all that it costs the Dominion now to keep up the communication which we have been keeping up year in and year out, by way of vessels, mail service and whatever other cost there may be. That it is perfectly fair to set over against the interest charge of carrying the cost of the tunnel. Then there is something which may be said in favour of the contention that a bit of railway on the Island, disjoined from the system on the mainland, even though in a productive island like Prince Edward Island, cannot be under such favourable conditions for paying its way as if it were joined to the mainland by continuous communication; and I think it is a fair ground of argument that if the tunnel were built and this continuous communication were kept up, the deficit at present existing on the Island railway would be largely diminished, if it did not entirely disappear. That would depend in part on the size of the tunnel and as to whether the cost could be met of building a tunnel which would allow of communication by railway through and through. That would create the necessity of widening the rails on the Prince Edward Island side, which would be attended with additional expense. But there is a fairly practical consideration in that point, which was particularly mentioned by my hon. friend. If this tunnel would be beneficial, and we all acknowledge that it would be, and if the loss to-day is what we know, the loss is on account of the shipment of produce having to be made at once without the possibility of keeping it until prices are high, and on account of shipment not being continuous; if the loss to Prince Edward Island is great in that respect, why should not Prince Edward Island bear its fair proportion of the tolls on every bushel of potatoes, every bushel of grain, and every bit of produce that is now lacking its best and continuous marketing for the want of the tunnel? That is a fair thing for the people of Prince Edward Island to think of. After you have all these other charges offset against the interest charge, and find that the deficit is still too large for the people of this country fairly to assume, consistently with maintaining the interests of the other parts of the Dominion, it is a fair thing, when making an arrangement so costly and yet so advantageous to the Island, to think of putting upon its products a certain moderate toll which will act as a continuous revenue to offset the charges over and above the present outlay for services. I am prepared to say as a member of the Government that, when you put these two together and find that there is yet a certain deficit, the Dominion out of pure good heartedness, out of generosity to a smaller province, out of consideration to the peculiar natural difficulties which that province has to contend with, would be justified in giving a certain amount in addition in order to carry out the construction of a work of so great advantage to that province and of some further advantage to the other parts of the Dominion. That is about the way this matter strikes me; and so far as the Government is concerned, it has done what I have stated, and I think it is prepared to say that if further estimates are necessary to get at the cost of the structure, they will be got; and after that the Government will seriously and earnestly consider the question as presented in the light of those facts, and ask Parliament to consider it as well. It will then be for this Parliament to say whether or not under all the circumstances it considers that the case is reasonable upon which the construction may be undertaken.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.30 a. m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 2nd July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

That the names of Messrs. Desjardins (L'Islet) and Masson be substituted for those of Sir Hector Langevin and the late Sir John A. Macdonald on the Committee of Privileges and Elections.

That the name of Mr. Hodgins be placed upon the Committee of Railways and Canals in lieu of that of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, and that the name of Mr. Henry Corby be substituted for that of the late Sir John A. Macdonald on the Committee of Public Accounts.

He said: The House will understand why these changes are proposed. I may say, on behalf of Sir Hector Langevin, that, under the circumstances, he desires to be relieved from the responsibility attaching to his position as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. Before taking up the items, I may state what I propose to ask the House to do, under present circumstances, which course I have talked over, in part, with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I propose, if the Committee will help me in it, to pass as soon as possible the Supplementary Estimates for the past year; to pass, in addition to what we have passed, in the main Estimates, the items for pensions, which involve no discussion, as a rule, and those for the Post Office service, which it is very important we should pass in order to provide money for current expenses, and to ask the House to concur in these items, after they are passed; to put them in one Bill, send it to the Senate, and have it passed as soon as possible. I believe arrangements have been made to give assent to some Bills during the early part of next week. I ask the co-operation of hon. members in endeavouring to have this programme carried out as rapidly as we can, consistently with fair discussion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not understand, when the hon. gentleman spoke to me on this subject, that he proposed to include the Post Office service.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not at that time, but it has been represented to me that, if possible, these items should be included, as the operations extend over the whole country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be a very fair course to adopt to take a proportionate vote for the Post Office. We do not, of course, want to interfere with its operations; but as to passing all the items in bulk——

Mr. FOSTER. I would not ask that to be done. We will have time to have the usual discussion on the Post Office items.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should have supposed that it would have been better to have adopted the course followed on similar occasions in England, and that is, to take a proportionate vote of one-tenth or one-twelfth of the total amount required. There are certainly some items in the Post Office estimates which will be likely to involve some discussion, and these might protract matters.

Mr. FOSTER. We will see when we come to them; some might be omitted, if there is not sufficient time. But during to-day and to-morrow we shall be able to consider them and give them a fair discussion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a vote of want of confidence pending, but that stands over, I suppose.

Canadian Pacific Railway—Construction.....	$13,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire an explanation of this item.

Mr. BOWELL. This amount is to pay part of the expenses and salaries in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway arbitration now going on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then this is really for legal expenses?

Mr. BOWELL. It is in connection with the salaries of those connected with that staff, and also other expenses attending the arbitration. I will give the hon. gentleman some particulars if he desires them. This sum is to pay salaries and expenses in this connection to the extent of $10,000, and to pay claims and salaries and expenses connected with some old claims under the original contract.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In that connection it will, no doubt, be of interest to the Committee to be advised, first, as to when the present arbitration is likely to close; and second, whether the award is likely to be final, and whether further and ulterior legal proceedings will then be in order. Seeing what that arbitration has cost us and how long it has continued, I have no doubt it would interest the Committee and professional men to know what probabilities there are of further proceedings in that direction.

Mr. BOWELL. I am informed that the arbitration is likely to close very early, and it is anticipated that that will be the end of it—that is, at least, our hope, and I am informed there is no probability of an appeal from the award.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know from the Minister of Justice whether the award is likely to be final, or whether, if either of the parties is dissatisfied, the matter is likely to go further and the case be reopened?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The arbitration is practically concluded; the investigation and arguments are concluded, and the arbitrators are deliberating on their award. An award may be expected in a few weeks, and by the terms of the reference the award is to be final, saving only, of course, any errors or misconduct: but in other respects it is final. It is not final in this respect, however: that there is one claim which will not be adjudicated upon, I understand, at the time when the award is made. That is a minor claim arising out of the Pembina Branch, and I believe it has not been investigated at all. The award, which is expected to take place in a few days, is upon the investigation as to the British Columbia section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it will finally determine that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the amount stated?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Both on questions of fact and law?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that the term "construction" is hardly the expression to use for this appropriation of $13,000. Part of it is for legal expenses, and it seems to me there ought to be two items instead of one.

Mr. BOWELL. My connection with the Railway Department has been of very short duration, as the hon. gentleman knows, but I am informed that any arbitration or any expense incurred in connection with contracts is always considered as in connection with the construction of the road. I can see no objection to putting in the words "construction, and for expenses of arbitration," if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. FOSTER. It has gone under the appellation of construction for a number of years.

Mr. BOWELL. I believe that other arbitrations of this character in connection with contracts have been charged to construction.

Intercolonial Railway — Increased accommodation at Moncton..... $12,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the cause for that demand; you have increased accommodation there every year, I think.

Mr. BOWELL. Up to the 31st December, 1871, there has been expended on the erection of a house and round-house, $7,405.19, and up to the 31st December, 1890, there has been expended on the extension of the freight sheds, $1,831.04; machinery for hoisting cranes, $1,250; nut tapping machine, $500; drilling machine, $150; machine for grinding plane knives, $60; amount due upon ground rent, $1,305.17, making a total of $12,500.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the machine for grinding plane knives?

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose it means knives in connection with the planers in machine shops for planing iron.

Mr. LAURIER. For grinding axes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot understand how items of this kind should be charged to capital account.

Mr. BOWELL. It has been the principle in the past that all new material added to the road is charged to the capital, but that which is purchased to supply material which has been worn-out, or repairs to machinery, would be charged to revenue account. That is the principle on which these estimates have always been prepared.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has there been anything of this kind used before in the workshops?

Mr. BOWELL. I have no doubt there has, but this machine is charged on the principle of a new engine or an additional engine to the present ones on hand. If an engine were destroyed and another purchased to take its place that would be charged to revenue. I have sent for the engineer for information with regard to these minor details.

Rolling Stock..... $43,000

Mr. BOWELL. This $43,000 is required to pay for three parlour cars purchased under a contract from Mr. Crossen, $29,400; steam-heating apparatus, $600; electric lighting, $1,800; buffet outfit, $1,200; total, $33,000. The appropriation last year was only $27,000, and there is now available for this purpose, $10,000. The balance is for air-brakes on freight cars, fitting up of twenty locomotives with steam-heating apparatus at $60 each; forty-four cars with fixtures for heating with steam from engine, $200 each; being $8,800 for this purpose; making a total of $43,000. I may add, that the expenditure up to the present time has been, on the air-brakes and the locomotives, $24,000, and the balance is to pay.

Mr. McMULLEN. What number of cars of this kind are now on the line?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot give that information to the hon. gentleman just now, but if he will call attention to it on the main Estimates, I will let him know.

Mr. McMULLEN. What quantity of rolling stock of this kind has been worn-out and replaced by new rolling stock within the year?

Mr. FOSTER. I will make a note of that and give the information later on.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not wish to detain the Committee, but I must point out that last year when we had a discussion on the increase of rolling stock and other matters connected with the Intercolonial Railway, we tried to get some information with regard to the principle on which that road is operated. We know perfectly well there is a heavy loss on the running of the Intercolonial Railway, and while anxious to facilitate the Finance Minister, yet the responsibility rests upon the Opposition to get all the information on this matter. I remember very well that Sir Charles Tupper said that, in every instance when a car was worn-out and a new car put in its place, that the charge was added to the capital account. While we add to the capital account by adding new rolling stock, we would like to know what has been put on in the place of the worn-out stock. We should know the quantity of rolling stock on that road in the past, we should know if it is kept up to its proper standard and efficiency in point of repair, and if a car goes over a bank and gets smashed we should know if the new car put in its place is charged to working expenses or capital account. We want to know if this principle is carried out.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman must have misunderstood the remark of the Minister of Finance. We have no objection whatever to give the information he has asked, and I will take a note of it and answer him later on.

St. Charles Branch..... ..... $14,146.37

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this for?

Mr. BOWELL. Up to the 30th of April there has been expended for land damages, $12,010.29, and in legal expenses in connection with land claims, $2,136.08.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of the St. Charles branch up to date?

Mr. BOWELL. $1,686,743.91.

Mr. MULOCK. To a question I put yesterday, in regard to the carrying of freight over the Intercolonial Railway, I received only a partial answer. Is it customary for the Government to carry freight below cost?

Mr. BOWELL. Not that I am aware of. I have not yet investigated fully the working of the road.

Mr. MULOCK. Could the hon. gentleman say what is the lowest cost of carrying freight per ton per mile over the railway?

Mr. BOWELL. I shall have to ask my hon. friend to defer these questions until the chief engineer comes. I will accept the questions at any time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the estimated cost of the St. Charles extension?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not got that. I will endeavour to obtain it.

Increased accommodation at St.John. $5,092.50

Mr. McMULLEN. What is this?

Mr. BOWELL. This is for land damages, $4,355.17, and legal expenses $737.33. I am informed that the total expenditure from the commencement of the works at this point has been $998,412.95.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman give us any idea of the freight tonnage at this point?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot. On page 41 of the annual report, however, there is a statement showing the total number of locomotives and the various classes of cars on the 1st July, 1889, and on the 30th June, 1890.

Mr. FOSTER. And on page 23 the hon. gentleman will find the answer to his first question.

"Y" at Truro..... $1,500

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is this?

Mr. BOWELL. This is for the construction of a "Y." I can give the hon. gentleman the items. The land cost $4,318; surveying, $143.40; track labour, $644.56; progress estimates, $300.58; legal expenses, $49.60; masonry, $301; total, $5,757.64, and $1,500 will be required to complete.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was the necessity for that "Y?"

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will see on page 20 of the Railway Report that the "Y" was required on account of the increased traffic, and that when completed it will facilitate the amount of traffic.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was there a turn-table at this point before the "Y" was put in?

Mr. BOWELL. There was. This "Y" was put in for the accommodation of the Mulgrave train.

Cape Breton Railway—Construction and equipment... ..... $399,700

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this close the expenditure?

Mr. BOWELL. No; there is an item in the main Estimates amounting to about $30,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the entire length of this line?

Mr. BOWELL. Ninety-eight miles.

Mr. McMULLEN. What proportion of rolling stock will this give to the mile?

Mr. BOWELL. About eight engines and tenders, six first-class cars, four second-class cars, and three or four baggage cars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost?

Mr. BOWELL. $2,973,042.41, exclusive of the Grand Narrows bridge, which amounts to $525,365.02.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will that leave the road fully equipped with rolling stock?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cost of construction per mile? It appears to have cost an enormous amount of money. What is the cost without rolling stock?

Mr. BOWELL. The engineer informs me that he has not the figures without the rolling stock, but that it costs between $29,000 and $30,000 per mile, including the rolling stock. He will endeavour to have a separate statement for the Committee when we reach the main Estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are there any claims along the line remaining unsettled?

Mr. BOWELL. There are a few small claims; nearly all the claims were settled as the work went on.

Mr. McMULLEN. At the inception of this scheme what was the estimated cost?

Mr. BOWELL. The original estimate was about $20,000 per mile, but the calculation was based on wooden structures, which were afterwards changed to iron or steel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did that include the bridge over the Narrows?

Mr. BOWELL. No; as it was at first intended to use a ferry. That was found impracticable, and it was thought better to have a permanent structure.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a very large increase. I remember that when the Bill was introduced, it was stated that the cost would be something in the neighbourhood of what the hon. gentleman mentioned. It appears, however, to have cost $10,000 a mile more than that. I cannot understand what changes could be made in the construction which would entail this increase of 50 per cent. over the estimated cost. Unfortunately, it appears that all the lines we build cost twice, and, in some cases, three times the first estimate. This was the case in connection with the St. Charles branch and the Oxford and Glasgow and the Pictou branch. All those lines appear to have been launched with the understanding that they would cost within the limits of a respectable sum, but when we come to settle up we find them overrunning the estimate 50 per cent. on an average. The St. Charles branch cost treble the amount anticipated when the scheme was first presented. Surely that cannot rest with the engineer. If it does, it reflects seriously on the engineering skill of any man who would prepare statements authorizing any Minister to say that a road can be constructed at $20,000 a mile, when it turns out to cost $30,000 a mile.

Mr. BOWELL. I am aware of the enormous expenditure which was incurred in connection with the St. Charles branch, though I do not think it can be attributed to the engineers who made the first calculation, as a large portion of the expenditure was unforeseen, as far as the Government and the engineers were concerned. The cost of the right of way was enormous and far beyond what was expected. Referring to the Cape Breton Railway, I find that the original design was for wooden structures, culverts, bridges, abutments and piers. The culverts have been built of solid stone, and the road has been made a first-class road. It was found that the cost of introducing steel bridges and stone culverts would not at the outside exceed the cost of renewing wooden structures, when worn out, and that the changes would practically make the work permanent, and a first-class road in the first place.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was the contract let in the first place on the understanding that the bridges and culverts were to be wooden?

Mr. BOWELL. The engineer informs me that the decision to change the character of the road was made before the contracts were let.

Mr. McMULLEN. In that case, there cannot be any serious claim for payments in consequence of a change in the plans and specifications. There is nothing of that kind now pending, is there?

Mr. BOWELL. I understand that there are no claims consequent upon the change of the specifications.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then we are to understand from that, that there are no claims at all pending upon any contracts in connection with that road?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say that.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is what I want to know.

Mr. BOWELL. What I said was, that I understood there were no claims arising out of a change in the specification or the contract. There are claims in reference to the classification of some of the work, that is, as to whether some material should be classed under one head or under another, which is now under consideration.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the claim presented under that head?

Mr. BOWELL. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the information on that point just now, but before the House rises it will be fully informed of all the facts, that is, if any claim is recognized; as in such case we will have to ask Parliament to sanction it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was the work all let to one firm?

Mr. BOWELL. No, it was let to two different contractors.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will this cover the cost of the railway?

Mr. BOWELL. Everything but the rails and the rolling stock.

Cape Breton Railway — Bridge over Grand Narrows..... $95,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the total cost of this bridge?

Mr. BOWELL. The total cost of the construction of the Grand Narrows Bridge was $525,365.02 up to the 1st June, 1891.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the length of this bridge?

Mr. BOWELL. 1,800 feet.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the height of the bridge?

Mr. BOWELL. It is about 75 feet from the mud bottom to the level of the water, and 11 feet above that, with a draw.

Oxford and New Glasgow Railway— Construction and equipment.... $233,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the total cost of that road up to date?

Mr. BOWELL. The total amount up to 30th June, is $1,768,027.96, including the amount for which a vote is now asked.

Mr. McMULLEN. What class of road is it?

Mr. BOWELL. This also was intended in the first place to be built with wooden structures, but the Government, on the advice of their engineers, decided to build the bridges of steel and the culverts of masonry. In fact, they made the same change in connection with this as they did in regard to the road under discussion a few minutes ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was this change made before the contract was let?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, before the contracts were let.

Mr. McMULLEN. There have been no serious changes made in the plans and specifications since the contracts were let?

Mr. BOWELL. The engineer informs me that there have not been any.

Short Line Railway—To pay judgment of Court..... $24,563 02

Mr. BOWELL. This line was originally subsidized for $3,200 per mile, and the Montreal and European Short Line Railway Company entered into a contract under the Subsidy Act to build the road. They commenced the work, and after doing some grading and masonry, and providing a large quantity of timber and ties, they failed to carry on the work and left large bills unpaid. These were adjudicated on by Judge Clarke, and under his ruling, $149,233.09 was paid by the Government to the creditors of the company. The Government passed an Act expropriating their property, and the company brought action against the Government and received in addition to the sum mentioned, the sum of $100,777.68 principal with interest at 6 per cent., from July, 1887, and costs, $2,363.04. So that the payments were made of the following amounts: Under Judge Clarke's adjudication, $149,233.09; paid to company, $80,000; to the lawyers and creditors, $24,563.82, making a total of $253,796.91.

Annapolis and Digby Railway—Construction..... $108,000

Mr. FLINT. I do not see any appropriation placed in the regular Estimates for this railway, and I would ask if this is the final appropriation to pay for the so-called missing link? Are there likely to be further appropriations for that purpose?

Mr. BOWELL. The engineer informs me that he is not aware of any claim that will necessitate asking for a further appropriation.

Mr. FLINT. I understand the road is almost completed, and there is, of course, a general desire and anxiety in the western portion of the province to enjoy the facilities which it will afford. I would like to ask the Government what progress has been made in concluding an arrangement between the Government, the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, the Western Counties Railway and the contractors for running trains over the new line? Is it likely that conclusions can be reached at an early date so that trains can be run over the road?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is nothing pending with regard to that. The Western Counties Railway will be permitted to run their trains as soon as possible. The Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company have nothing to do with it. There is every desire on the part of the Government that that road should be afforded facilities as soon as possible.

Mr. BOWERS. I would like to call the attention of the Government to an act of injustice which this railway has done to the inhabitants of Bear River and Smith's Cove, and to the inhabitants of Hillsburg, in Annapolis County. The country around Bear River is a very hilly section of country. The inhabitants had a nice level road for teaming, and the Government, or the contractors, I suppose, of the company who built this line, have taken this road from the people and have forced them to go up over two steep hills to get to the depot at Smith's Cove. They have spent something like $5,000, I am informed, to enable them to get to the depot, and now they find that when they get near Smith's Cove, they have to go over high hills, where they cannot haul over half a load. They have to discharge half the load and come back half a mile or more to get the balance of the load. This makes it very inconvenient for the people. I would like to know whether it is the Government's fault, or whether it is the fault of the contractors, and whether any arrangement is going to be made whereby the people can be accommodated in this matter. I think they sent a petition about this matter a year ago, and they feel deeply hurt. They think the Government or the company have treated them with great injustice, and caused them large expense. It must be remembered that the part of the county I am speaking of is not such as most of us live in, but it is very hilly, and the company have taken the level road away from them and forced them to go further inland, and they want the Government or the company to make this road as good to them as the old road was. In this connection I wish to mention the bridge that crosses Bear River. It is always usual to build piers on the outside and on the inside of the bridge, so that vessels coming through the draw may be able to lie alongside of this pier until the bridge is open. Now, there are no piers built where the draw is to enable vessels to warp through the bridge, and when there is any wind blowing vessels are apt to be driven ashore on the rocks and damaged. I would like to know when the Government is going to build these piers?

Mr. FLINT. I have had correspondence on this subject, and the difficulty seems to be this: Bear River is a deep and at times rapidly-rushing stream between very high hills, and vessels going down the stream or coming up the stream, cannot count on finding the draw open at the precise moment when they arrive in the vicinity of the draw. As there is a large amount of trade here and a great number of vessels, comparatively speaking, there is a strong demand that in order that the public be accommodated in this respect the Government should provide piers or other conveniences so that vessels may attach themselves while waiting, and save themselves from heavy currents, squalls or gales, or during a period of detention, so that they may pass through the draw-bridge at their leisure and with complete safety. The danger is much more imminent than to a stranger would at first appear. I am informed by parties familiar with the trade that this is a matter of great importance. Have the Government had any information on the subject, and what are their views?

Mr. TUPPER. I am aware that applications have been made from different localities with respect to "walking piers" or buoys, but on enquiry I ascertained that while there are a great many of these in Canada, in no instance has the Marine Department ever paid the cost. In some cases they have been supplied by the railway corporation owning the bridges, and in others by the municipalities interested.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I desire to call the attention of the Government to the damage done by the construction of a railway bridge across the Rivière du Sud, in the County of Montmagny. I think the works that are necessary in this connection should be carried out while the water is low. I hold in my hand a report from Mr. Coste. After visiting the spot he reports:

"In conclusion, I must say, that, in my opinion, the railway bridge, if not the absolute cause of the damage, has without doubt accelerated the wearing away of the bank above the railway bridge."

Mr. Perley says in his report:

"I agree with Mr. Coste in his conclusion that the wearing away of the bank has been caused by the railway bridge."

This subject has been before the department for four or five years, and we have never obtained satisfaction. It has been stated that the amount required for a wharf was about $3,000. I think the department knows all about the matter, but I am compelled to say that it is the ill-will of the chief engineer that prevents the work being done. In his own report, he estimates the cost of protecting the road immediately above the Intercolonial Railway bridge at $3,000, and although the Government expend large amounts on other works, yet when we ask for the expenditure of the amount estimated, no steps are taken to carry out the work. I do not understand why we do not have the work carried out, and at all events if it is not to be carried out, let us know it, for I do not like to be waiting month after month. This work should be done while the water is low, for a few months hence it will be too late and great damage will be done next spring.

Mr. BOWELL. The only information I am able to give the hon. gentleman is— and I must say it is very inconvenient to discuss every railway question on a special item—that a report was made on the subject, and the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) has quoted from it, to the effect that the Government are not responsible for the damages to which he refers. The hon. gentleman is aware that I informed him that as soon as I had time I would look more closely into the claim he made; but the information I have received is that all the engineers who have considered the question have declared that the Government are not in any way responsible for the damage done. It is true Mr. Coste made the report to which the hon. gentleman refers; but as to the wording of it there is nothing positively stated. It is very objectionable for members to animadvert on an official who can have no personal interest either for or against the parties making the claim. His duty is to make an investigation, to report fully to the department the facts as presented to him, irrespective as to how they will affect the Government or any individual. I cannot believe for a moment the insinuation of the hon. gentleman that the officer who made the report was actuated by any personal feeling against that locality. If a statement of that kind was made it was unworthy of any hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I admit that the hon. Minister has done his best to give me justice. I fully expected the answer he has given, and here is my answer to his reply. The first report was made by Mr. Mackenzie, who was sent to the locality in winter when there were two or three feet of snow on the ground, and when it was impossible for any one to know how much damage would be done at another season of the year. More than that: this officer went to Montmagny and took the evidence of witnesses, and he made a report on the information of some parties interested as to what had been done. I subsequently went there with Mr. Coste to ascertain what those people had stated, and he said to them: Last winter you said so and so; and they replied: We never said that. The former engineer, who could not speak French, went there with several gentlemen, among them the leader of the Tory party, who acted as interpreter, and the witnesses then said quite the contrary to what they stated to Mr. Coste. When I went there with Mr. Coste I asked those people if the statements they were reported to have previously made were true, and they said quite the contrary. I am compelled to say, and I am sorry to have to say it, that I believe it is bad will on the part of the chief engineer. Last summer he passed through my place with his employés in a special car, very comfortable indeed, but I am not jealous of that. He stopped for a while, about an acre from the station; he was not in a hurry, as he had a special car, and I asked him very politely to stop for a minute and come and see the place. I said to him: You are an engineer, and if you say upon your authority as an engineer that there is no damage done and that the bridge is not the cause of this damage, I will take your word for it. I believe that no man of common sense could view that place and say that that bridge was not the cause of the injury. The chief engineer refused positively to stop for a minute, and he said he must at once go to Quebec. I said to him: You are paid to look after the road, and surely you can stop for a minute to see if this damage is being done; but he positively refused to look at the place, and that is the reason I say there is bad will on the part of the chief engineer. I suggested to the chief engineer that as he said Mr. Mackenzie had reported against me, and as Mr. Coste had reported in favour of my contention, that I would agree to take the opinion of an independent engineer, not under his control nor under the control of the Government, and I would accept his report as correct. That proposition was refused also, and if that does not show bad will on the part of the chief engineer, I am very much mistaken. I must say that the acting Minister has always accepted my suggestions with the greatest kindness, and I am obliged to him for that. When the chief engineer was in my constituency, I, as a member of Parliament and as one interested in the county, asked him, as a favour, to wait there for a moment and look at the place, but he refused to do so and continued on to Quebec in his special car. I told him that he was paid to look after the road, and that, as he was on the spot, he should do so, and I told him that I would bring the matter before the House, as I do now. I ask the Government, as a favour, to name a third engineer, who is not under the control of the chief engineer, to make an impartial report, and I am ready to accept the report. I maintain that this bridge is causing great damage to the people in the neighbourhood, and it is just the time now to have the work done, if it is to be done at all.

Mr. BOWELL. My information is that Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. Archibald and some other engineers have made reports on this matter.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. What are they?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know what they are.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I would like to know, because I was told in the department that Mr. Mackenzie was the only one who reported against it.

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Mackenzie reported against it, Mr. Archibald verified that report, as did another engineer also whose name the chief engineer does not now remember. As I understand, in the winter the hon. gentleman referred to, there was nothing done except the taking of evidence. Of course if the hon. gentleman impugns the honesty of the examiner, who he says happens to be a Tory, and apparently in his estimation must be a perjurer——

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Not all.

Mr. BOWELL. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for making some exceptions, but he impugned the honesty of this gentleman because he said he happened to be a Tory. I would be very sorry to attribute that character to all the party to which my hon. friend belongs. I am quite sure the Government could have no possible object in depriving these people of any just rights or of any just claims for damages which may arise. The chief engineer tells me that at the time the hon. gentleman asked him to wait at that station he had already examined that locality and examined the effect which the water was supposed to have on the land, and he did not deem it necessary to go again. I am strongly reminded in this connection of the constant applications I have in my own department when a decision is given against a man, and I fear my hon. friend partakes of that particular character. Some people are never satisfied unless the decision is according to their own wishes, and if the decision is against them they bring it up next year and the year after, and if not decided in their favour before an election then the claim will be sent to the representative of the constituency who is elected, and that unfortunate member has to go through the same ordeal as his predecessor in trying to get the penalty, or whatever it may be, reversed. I do not find fault with the action of my hon. friend. I rather admire the interest he takes in his constituents, but I do not think it is fair to attribute motives to the engineers. If the hon. gentleman will promise me to say no more about it, and if I remain acting Minister for any length of time so as to enable me to select some man in whom the hon. gentleman will, I hope, have confidence, I will see that even another investigation is made, and if the report of Mr. Coste is verified I will try to do justice to the hon. gentleman and to his constituents.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I will try and explain myself.

Mr. BOWELL. Remember it is on condition that you say no more.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I wish to say that I have nothing to say against Tories, but when this engineer came down there——

Mr. BOWELL. Remember you are going to break my offer.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. One of the Tory leaders who is revising officer in my county, and who has been disqualified by three judges of the Superior Court, when asked by the engineer, said there is no damage done there. When Mr. Coste came to my place we went specially to these gentlemen, and Mr. Coste asked them if last winter they said such a thing before Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Hebert, and they said, "No; we never said that, we said quite the contrary." Am I to judge of them that they made a mistake or that Mr. Hebert made a mistake? I did not say anything against the Tories.

Mr. BOWELL. Those people who denied that were interested, and, of course, it was to their interest to do so.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I beg your pardon; some of the people whom Mr. Mackenzie asked were adversaries of mine, and they did their best to get the Government not to do the work, so as to be able to say: You have a member of the Opposition representing you, put a good Tory in his place and you will get the work done. That was the position they took. I am glad that I brought up this matter, because I have now the word of the acting Minister that a third engineer will be sent to report, and that has been refused me by a letter from the department. I will stand by the report of any impartial engineer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another interesting matter in connection with this. We would like to know how long the hon. member will be acting Minister of Railways, as he has intimated it will be for some time. Now, the House, in passing supplies, would like to know who will administer the votes they are giving. I think the hon. gentleman, having excited our curiosity, ought to satisfy it by giving us some notice as to how long he will be acting Minister of Railways.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Referring again to the item under consideration, I would like to enquire whether in this appropriation is included the cost of station houses between Bear River and Annapolis? In the construction of this missing link between Digby and Annapolis, I understand that station houses have been erected at Bear River, Clementsport and Smith's Cove. When the right of way was paid for some twelve or fifteen years ago, the County of Annapolis paid for ground for station houses, not only at Bear River, Clementsport and Annapolis, but also at Deep Brook and Upper Clementsport. As I understand, no station houses have been erected at Deep Brook and Upper Clementsport. I would like to know whether, in connection with this item, the necessity of these station houses has been considered?

Mr. FORBES. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he can give me the total length of the line from Annapolis to Digby, and the total cost? I would like him also to say whether the cost includes rolling stock, whether any is to be provided by the Government, and whether, when the line is completed, it is intended to hand it over to the Western Counties Railway Company?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. $620,000 is the actual cost. Rolling stock is not included, there is none to be provided by the Government, and the road belongs to the Western Counties Railway Company.

Mr. BOWERS. I would like to know whether the Government intends to do anything in regard to the injustice I complained of, that an important road has been diverted from the side of the river and carried over two hills, to the detriment of the interests of the people who have to use it. The Minister said he did not think it was necessary to build the piers which I spoke of in the Bear River. When the Western Counties Railway built the bridge across the Sissiboo River, they also built piers, so that vessels could pass through without trouble, and if the Government have obstructed the navigation of the river by the construction of this bridge, they ought to remove all impediments and leave room for vessels to pass through the bridge. It is utterly impossible without these piers for vessels to get through the bridge.

Mr. BOWELL. In addition to what my hon. colleague the Minister of Marine has stated, I am informed that everything has been done at that bridge that was recommended as necessary to the safety of shipping, by the harbour master, who the department supposed would know what was actually required. I am not acquainted with the locality, nor do I know who the harbour master is; but that is the information I have from the chief engineer. In regard to the road to which the hon. gentleman has referred, I am also informed that the grades upon it are easier and much safer than they would have been had the old alignment been continued—that, in fact, a change was made to avoid what are termed two-rail crossings, in order to avoid accidents which very often occur at these crossings. If anything further is found necessary to facilitate the passage of boats, it will be the duty of the Railway Department to see that it is provided. If an additional pier is necessary the department will see that it is built.

Mr. BOWERS. I am satisfied with the hon. Minister's explanation, for I know that the piers will be built if he makes enquiries. As to the road the hon. Minister is mistaken. Every person knows that if you carry a road along the edge of a river bank it will be level. This road has been diverted from the edge of the river and forced to pass up over two hills. I have a diagram here showing its position.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like now to ask what is the cost per ton per mile for carrying stone from Newcastle to Quebec?

Mr. BOWELL. I am informed by the chief engineer that the actual cost is half a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I would ask whether the stone referred to in my question of yesterday was hauled over that particular portion of the road?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, 411 miles, the engineer tells me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May we take half a cent per ton per mile as roughly representing the minimum cost of the haulage of all goods?

Mr. BOWELL. The engineer says yes, approximately.

To rebuild pivot pier for swing bridge at Hastings	$1,000
For iron swing at Hastings	430
To complete dry dock at Bobcaygeon	1,250

Mr. BARRON. I understood the hon. the Finance Minister the other night to say that these estimates were only for work that had been done.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a liability which was incurred during the past year.

Mr. BARRON. I hold in my hand the report of Mr. R. B. Rogers, superintending engineer, and in that report he refers again, as he has done frequently before, to the fact that the bridge north of the lock at Fenelon Falls is still an impediment to navigation. He says this part of the route cannot be used till the swing bridge is placed in the railroad bridge above the upper entrance to the lock. It has been in that condition ever since that lock has been built, and the Government are paying a lockmaster $250 a year, although nothing can go through the lock by reason of this bridge being there an impediment to navigation.

Mr. FOSTER. The Trent Valley Canal will come up in the main Estimates, and then we will have an opportunity to discuss the whole matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What means this item to complete the dry dock at Bobcaygeon?

Mr. BOWELL. That is to be dropped out, the lock being, no doubt, completed.

Towards filling a pond at St. Catharines	$1,849 75

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of filling that pond? It looks like a sink hole. Will this fill it?

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose so. This pond was created by back water from Lock No. 2 of the canal. It was a public nuisance, the main sewer from the town of St. Catharines emptying into it. The work executed has abated this nuisance.

Rideau Canal, lands and damages	$1,000

Mr. McMULLEN. How long has this been standing? I have noticed that every year there is some little item of damages in connection with this canal. What is the cause of this even sum?

Mr. BOWELL. I remember asking the same question when considering the estimates with the deputy, and it appears that in all our public works, though they may have been built for years, there are damages arising every year in some form or other. This was paid on the report of the engineer sent to examine into the claims made.

Mr. MULOCK. It appears there has been some expropriation or acquisition of land.

Survey above Kingston Mills	$1,200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the necessity for this?

Mr. BOWELL. The work has been performed and paid for. A number of claims were made for compensation for wash of shore, extending a considerable distance—the contour being about 50 miles. It was thought advisable to have a survey made in the winter, so that the contour of the land might be ascertained and fixed by a plan.

Mr. MULOCK. Who was the surveyor?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Wise, the Government surveyor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I only called attention to this because I have observed that, by some curious phenomenon, regularly, before a general election, a survey is made above Kingston Mills. I think this is the third or fourth time that such a survey has been made just before a general election, and I have noticed that sundry parties have come to me and said that a survey was about to be made above Kingston Mills, and, therefore, we were sure to have a general election.

Mr. FOSTER. That was valuable to keep as an indicator.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, and I did not forget the pointer.

Towards deepening the Basin at Ottawa	$800

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this for? Is this to clear out some more sawdust?

Mr. BOWELL. This sum is to pay the balance due on the final estimate for the deepening of the basin above the bridge in Ottawa. The hon. gentleman will remember that the work was done last year.

Mrs. J. B. Courville, gratuity equal to two months' pay of her late husband, in his lifetime Lockmaster on the Lachine Canal	$ 76
Widow of late Narcisse Bosquet, in his lifetime Foreman Carpenter, St. Ours Lock, gratuity equal to two months' pay	100
Joseph Daoust, formerly Lockman, Beauharnois Canal, gratuity equal to two months' pay, he having been incapacitated by sickness resulting from exposure while on duty	76
Gratuity equal to two months' pay to the representative of P. Ryan, formerly assistant Bridge-keeper, Lachine Canal	76
J. V. Callaerts, compensation in full for injuries received whilst employed on the works of the Chambly Canal.	400
D. Stark, Engineer, employed on works in Canada for the period of 48 years, of which 25 were in the Government service, gratuity equal to one year's salary, on leaving the service	3,000
	$3,728

Mr. BOWELL. This first gratuity was paid to the widow of Mr. Courville, who died from blood poisoning, the effect of an injury which he received when he was assisting in the repairs of the break in the Cornwall Canal. The husband of Mrs. Narcisse Bosquet was canal foreman for twenty-three years, and he contracted a disease in the service, from which he died. John Daoust, formerly lockman on the Chambly Canal, was injured by the fall of some frozen earth while working there, and died from the exposure which resulted from his injury.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Interrupting the hon. gentleman, I may say that I have no objection to the payment of two months' salary to any officer who died in the service, but I think this was one of those items for which the vote of Unforeseen Expenses was expected to serve, and, unless you are going to introduce the practice of introducing all these details in the Estimates in future, I would suggest that it would be better that they should be paid out of Unforeseen Expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. This requires a vote of the House, because these are not permanent officers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My impression is that a lockmaster is a permanent officer.

Mr. CURRAN. No; the lockmasters are only employed by the season.

Mr. FOSTER. They do not come under the clause of the law which allows us to pay the gratuity, as they are not appointed by Order in Council.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not dispute the position of the hon. gentleman, and, of course, no one will dispute the items.

Mr. FOSTER. If it were possible to charge these to Unforeseen Expenses, they would have been charged to that item.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to ask if D. Stark, engineer, who is said to have been employed for forty-eight years on works in Canada, of which twenty-five years were in the Government service, contributed to the superannuation fund?

Mr. BOWELL. He did not. He worked on the Trent Valley Canal and on the Ottawa River, and, as I am informed, he was first employed forty years ago on the Lachine Canal, and has been constantly in the employment of the Government since.

Mr. MULOCK. When did he leave the service?

Mr. BOWELL. A very short time ago, and this gratuity is given to him on account of his failing health, as he could not avail himself of the superannuation fund, to which he never contributed. I am informed that scarcely any of the engineers are on the permanent staff. There are a few, but not many.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does he reside in Ottawa now?

Mr. BOWELL. He has been a resident of Ottawa during his illness for some time past, but he has left the city since he has been relieved from duty. Where he has gone, I do not know.

Mr. CURRAN. I would ask the Minister to amend the item granting two months' pay to P. Ryan, so as to allow the Auditor General to pay the amount and to make it payable to Helen Ryan, wife of P. Cassidy, daughter of the late P. Ryan.

Mr. MULOCK. Is she the person to receive it?

Mr. CURRAN. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Is she the only child?

Mr. CURRAN. She is the person with whom her father resided, and all the others are satisfied she should get the money. She maintained her father in her own house, and there is no trouble about it.

Mr. BARRON. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works will be kind enough to say, if it is possible to grant compensation to the widow of the late Mr. Streng, who was an engineer at Kingston. He was required to prepare some plan for a dry dock at a time when he was ill, and he had to leave his sick bed, and subsequently he died, and the doctor attributed his death to having left his bed in that condition. I understand the widow has been left almost destitute. An application has been made for simply a year's salary, if I am not mistaken. The matter has already been brought to the attention of the Minister, and I would like him to say whether there is any likelihood of her getting a pension.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter was brought to the attention of the Government, and the hon. gentleman will do well not to persist in his question now, because I think he will see that this case has not been forgotten when further Estimates are brought down.

Improvement of ship canal between Quebec and Montreal—Governor General's warrant	$20,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the beginning of April of this year, the department found itself with only $4,000 left. Dredges had to be put in order, and as the money to be voted by Parliament would not be available, we asked for a Governor General's warrant, in order not to stop the work until the 1st of July. This $20,000 is a portion of the $100,000 that I stated last year would be required to complete the work which the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal had determined to do when these works were taken over by the Government. In the ordinary Estimates we shall ask Parliament to divide into two parts the balance of the $80,000 which will be required to complete the work undertaken by the Harbour Commissioners. Hon. gentlemen will see that $50,000 are asked for that purpose, and the balance of $30,000 will be voted next year.

Kingston Graving Dock — Governor General's warrant..... $60,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This sum was required in order to go on with the works on that dock. According to the reports submitted by the chief engineer on the 16th March last, the balance then available of the appropriation of $160,000 made by Parliament during the session of 1890 for the construction of the Kingston dock, was only $4,000, a sum quite insufficient to carry on the work up to the 30th June. Besides the contract for the construction of the dock proper, contracts had also been entered into for furnishing caissons for closing the dock. It is further contemplated to erect an engine house by contract. Moreover, it was expected that the caisson and pumping plant would be completed by or before the 30th June; therefore, though this sum of money has been asked, it will be applied towards the same work, and so much less will be required for the year that began yesterday.

Mr. MULOCK. What progress has been made in the construction of this dry dock?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We believe the contract work will be completed in September or October of this year.

Mr. MULOCK. Have there been any changes made, either in alterations or specifications, with regard to its size?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No change has been made since last year, when the whole matter was before the House. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be glad to know the dimensions. Length, 280 feet; width, 49 feet; width at coping level, 72 feet; depth from coping to floor, 26 feet; depth of water on sill at low water, 15½ feet; width of entrance, 48 feet.

Mr. GIBSON. Did not the chief engineer report that the entrance should be made 55 feet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There were two large vessels, one of them the Cibola, which could not enter the dock, and it was enlarged a little to accommodate them.

Mr. MULOCK. Are we to understand that the contract has been in no way interfered with, so that no question can arise of increased charges or damages on the part of the contractor? Has the contract been carried out strictly in accordance with the plans and specifications, without any alteration?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No. It was stated at the time that these representations had been made by the owners of these vessels, I do not know how many months after the works had been going on. Then we stopped them in order to have a decision of council as to whether the enlargement should take place. It was stated at the time what the enlargement would cost, but I do not remember now what it was.

Mr. MULOCK. Was there a schedule of prices agreed to with regard to the increased size of the locks, or was the contract let before the increased size was decided upon? Now, when the increased size was decided upon, was there a schedule of prices agreed to by the contractor for carrying out this increased size?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, it was according to the same schedule, because they were asking on one item something more, and council said: No, we will stick to the item in the original contract.

Mr. GIBSON. When the contract was first let the opening was 48 feet, and it was afterwards recommendeded by the chief engineer that, owing to the large size of the vessels plying upon the lakes, the opening should be increased to 60 feet. Accordingly, an Order in Council was passed that this opening should be made 60 feet without any additional cost. In the course of twenty days, after it was discovered by the engineer in charge that there was no necessity for making the opening 60 feet, that 55 feet would do, it was ascertained that $35,000 would be required additional to make the opening 5 feet less. I should like to know how, if 60 feet would cost nothing, an opening of 55 feet involved an increased cost of $35,000? I was one of the contractors who offered to do the work. According to the calculation I made in regard to the opening of the dock, instead of an increase being made to the contract, with the exception of the folding part of the castings, there should have been a reduction of $24,000 in the estimate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken about the report that 60 feet would cost nothing.

Mr. GIBSON. I read it from the documents sent from the department, which were in the hands of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot).

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was never intended by the engineer, as is quite evident. The enlargement of the work must incur additional cost, and the engineer at first reported 60 feet, and afterwards, before the work was given out, he reported that after making minute calculations he thought 55 feet would be sufficient, and that reduction would somewhat curtail the expense. The result was the engineer reported accordingly. It was worth the money to get the dock so widened.

Mr. GIBSON. I still adhere to my statement. It will be remembered that 48 feet was the original opening for the dock, and it was recommended by the engineer that it should be enlarged to 60 feet without any cost to the country. In twenty days it was changed to 55 feet, at an additional cost of $35,000. There is less masonry for a 55-foot opening than for a 48-foot opening—and I know what I am talking about.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot give further information at this moment, but I furnished all the information last year. When we come to the ordinary Estimates I will then be ready to give all the information the hon. gentleman requires.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In asking a vote the hon. gentleman should be ready with the information.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I could not expect, in view of the fact that I gave all the information last year regarding the enlargement, that I would be asked to give it again this year. When the ordinary Estimates are taken up, I will be ready to give the information required.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the Minister state the contract price for the work as originally entered into, as the result of advertising for tenders?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About $261,000.

Mr. MULOCK. There has been no change in the specification or contract price with the exception of increasing the opening to 55 feet, at an increased cost of $35,000?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $35,000.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that all the change made in the specification for the work and in the contract price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. So I am informed. Of course, there are other works not included in the contract.

Mr. MULOCK. I am speaking of the contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; I do not see anything else.

Mr. MULOCK. What other works at Kingston were there connected with this work, which forms the subject-matter of this vote?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There were the wrought iron castings, hauling gear, pumping plant, engine and boiler house, tools, coal shed, fencing and gates, shores, wedges and blocks, storehouse, residence of the dock master and engineer, dock office, plant, expense incurred for the site, &c.

Mr. MULOCK. Without referring to the land, and confining myself to the work, I should like to know if all these works enumerated were let after the publication of advertisement for tenders?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Some of them.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say which?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Pumping plant; contractors, Inglis & Son, Toronto. Wrought iron castings; contractors, Dominion Bridge Company. I think there is another contract with respect to the engine and boiler plant.

Mr. MULOCK. I understood you to state that the contract for that work had not been let.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think that is one of the works to be let.

Mr. MULOCK. What have been let?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Those I have mentioned.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman state the names of the contractors for works not let by public tender, and the amounts of the contracts?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have not the names of the contractors here; I have only an estimate of the amount for each work.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman will see that tenders were invited for certain public works at Kingston, and, subsequently or contemporaneously, a large number of other works were let, for which public tenders were not invited. It is important to avoid such a system as that, and I should like to know, if possible, the amounts of the contracts that were let at Kingston to private contractors, and the names of the contractors. I ask that these contracts be laid on the Table of the House, and perhaps the hon. gentleman, at the same time, will bring down a copy of the report of the Minister to Council on which the Governor General's warrant was issued. The Governor General's warrants are not forthcoming in connection with all these special items, and, as I have mentioned before, I think the time has arrived when attention should be drawn on all occasions to the exercise of this extraordinary power by the Governor in Council, in passing warrants for money not having previously been sanctioned by Parliament. Here we find that on the 16th of March last, at a period when apparently it was impossible to make any reasonable use of the money, an Order in Council was passed for the expenditure of $60,000, a portion of which, at least, had never been sanctioned by Parliament. I think that the report and the argument upon which that warrant was issued should be laid on the Table. I would like to ask who is the local engineer at Kingston in connection with all these works? I may say, for the hon. gentleman's information, that the report of the previous year gives the name of George F. Perley as engineer at Kingston. I would like to know if he occupies any office other than that of assistant engineer at Kingston in connection with these various works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; he is one of the assistant engineers in my department and he was sent up there, and is paid only for the work he is doing there.

An hon. MEMBER. Is he a relation of the chief engineer?

Mr. MULOCK. I should have said that the gentleman's name is George E. Perley. I am asked if he is a relation of the chief engineer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. If it were not urgent to have these items passed, I think it would be only right that the whole of those items should stand over until all this information is before the House. The hon. gentleman has stated that there have been some contracts entered into in connection with this work without being put up for tender, and I think we should not dispose of this item until we have all the details. I would not wish to delay the progress of the Estimates if we are allowed to discuss the subject at some later stage.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will bring down all the details on the main Estimates.

Mr. MULOCK. That will be satisfactory. It is understood we will have the same freedom of discussion on the items as we would have now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to know if the Minister would lay before the House a detailed statement of the quantities and classes of each kind of extra work embraced in the sum of $23,253 that were paid for the altering of the opening of the dry dock at Kingston. I find there is only one item of 2,500 cubic yards of extra rock excavation given in that estimate, and that was put in at a sum of $2 per yard, which the Council saw fit to reduce to the original price of $1 per cubic yard. I would like to know how many yards of concrete were put in for the $1,500; how many yards of masonry and pounds of iron in the caisson for $3,300, and in the chamber for $1,500? I find they were allowed for the coffer dam $10,000, for unwatering $1,170, for loss of time using contractor's derrick $750, for cribbing $3,250, for cutting the cribs $750, for removing plant $600, and for caisson rollers $770. Now I find there were $16,520 allowed for this extra dam which the contractors of the original dam put in at $25,000; or, in other words, there were paid for extras to the contractors two-thirds of the original price. I would be glad if the Minister would give us the information as to the quantity of concrete, the number of pounds of iron in the caisson, the quantity of masonry in the extra walls he speaks of, and all the other items included in this charge of $23,253.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Most likely the hon. gentleman will give a list of what he wants, and he will be put in possession of the information.

Mr. GIBSON. I will give the hon. Minister a memorandum of the information which I want.

Mr. AMYOT. I moved yesterday for papers concerning this very same work. We want to understand thoroughly the work done there, as well as the extra work, and I hope this report will be brought down in time for the discussion on the Estimates. I may say that we have tried also to find out who that Mr. Bancroft is who was the successful tenderer. We cannot find any trace of his existence, and I have asked already for the name of the lessee of a certain box in the post office at Kingston, and Parliament has been refused that information. I now protest against that refusal. I have been answered by the Postmaster General that these boxes in the Kingston post office belong to the country, they are rented every year, the postmaster keeps a list of them, and I have applied to know who was the lessee of a certain box in a particular year. We are told that annual reports are made, but we cannot find who was the lessee of that box for that year. This is a very extraordinary state of things, and I draw the attention of all the members of the Executive at present in the House to it. I would like to know what is the reason this information is refused to the House; are we not entitled to know who was the lessee of the post office box for that year at Kingston, and why does the Government withhold that information from the public? It has a direct bearing upon the dock under construction at Kingston. I hope that when the Government will see the importance of the question they will try to put themselves right before the country, and not make the people believe that they participate in what we are afraid is at bottom a huge fraud. Mr. Bancroft says, in his tender, that his address is such a post office box at Kingston; he is perfectly unknown at Kingston, and I want to know who was the proprietor of the post office box he indicates at that time. The question is a very proper one, Parliament has a right to know who has furnished the money belonging to the country, and who has been the proprietor of that box for the year. I do not think that the Government is justified in withholding that information from the country. I hope that I am heard and understood. I will repeat it again, in order that I may get the attention of all the members of the Executive in this chamber. I say that Bancroft, who was one of the tenderers for the Kingston dock, is a person perfectly unknown at Kingston and in the country. I say that he gave as his address a certain post office box in Kingston. I do not now remember the number; I think it was 524. I say that I have reason to believe that Bancroft has never had any post office box in Kingston, and I want to know who was the proprietor of that box. That will give us a clue to the fraud which, I think, has been perpetrated upon the country. I want that information, and I do not intend to let the matter stand until I succeed in my efforts, in which I am animated by nothing but considerations of public morality.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. If the word morality does not express my feeling, I mean the safety of public money and the protection of the public against frauds. If the Government can find any good reason for withholding that information, let them at least have the spirit of justice to say so; but for the present they cannot plead impossibility. They cannot say that their postmaster at Kingston has destroyed his books; or, if he has, he should be at once dismissed from the service. They cannot say that he and all the officers of the Kingston post office have forgotten the name of the person who leased that box. We have a right to know it, and I would ask it in the name of the interests I am charged with.

Mr. HAGGART. I gave to the hon. gentleman the fullest information that was in the hands of the department. I, of course, did not know for what object the hon. gentleman asked the names of the lessees of the different boxes in the Kingston post office. I told my deputy to enquire for the list at Kingston, and I will give the hon. gentleman the whole of the return made by my deputy to me:

"The postmasters of the city offices do not report to the department the names of the lessees of boxes, and consequently it is impossible to give the information required with reference to the Kingston post office. The statements furnished by the postmaster at Kingston contain only the number of boxes let and the amount collected, copies of which statements for the year 1889 are herewith appended."

We did apply specially for the names of the lessees at Kingston, and the postmaster's answer was that he did not keep a list of names after the year expired.

Mr. AMYOT. In the first place, he should keep a list; but will he say on oath that he does not remember, and that none of his officers remember, who had the box? When a person has a box in which papers and letters are every day constantly deposited by the officers in the post office, how can it be said to an intelligent man that every one of them has forgotten whose box it was? It is preposterous. There must be some interest in hiding the name of the person who had that box for that year.

Mr. HAGGART. There is none that I am aware of in the department. The hon. gentleman must understand that the party may have rented that box for that particular object and only for that particular time, and may not have used it afterwards.

Mr. LAURIER. Are we to understand from what the hon. Postmaster General says that at the Kingston post office no record is kept of the leases for boxes entered into between any individual and the post office there? It seems to me that a record ought to be kept, and if no record is kept, the Postmaster General ought to see that the office is not conducted as it ought to be.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. leader of the Opposition is mistaken about my answer. My answer was that the postmaster kept a record each year of parties who leased boxes for that year; but his information to the department is that after he made his return to the Government at the end of the year, he destroyed the documents, having no further use for them.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a very strange practice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the books of the department would show who paid for the box. The hon. gentleman's inspector would have had to inspect the vouchers with regard to all such matters.

Mr. HAGGART. Here are the vouchers furnished from the post office every month. They only show the total amounts received; they do not give the names of the lessees.

Mr. AMYOT. When I go to the Quebec post office to lease a box, I pay for it and get a receipt on an official form, and the postmaster keeps the stub of the receipt. Surely, if he destroys the list, he must keep the stubs of the receipts.

Mr. LAURIER. But I understand that at the end of the year these vouchers are destroyed.

Mr. AMYOT. That is not what the hon. Minister said. What he said was that the list is destroyed at the end of the year. Of course, that is the information given to him, but it is improbable, and if it is correct, the practice is blameable. You will not find any such thing done in any properly organized establishment. But there is another source of information. When the money is paid, there must be entry made of the payment; how, otherwise, could the Government verify the return to the department of the proper amount of money? A third source is the memory of the living witnesses of the party who rented that box. Under the circumstances, I do not think the Government would be justified in withholding any longer this information.

Mr. HAGGART. I will make further enquiries and find out whether any of the clerks there have any recollection of the party who had the drawer in 1887. The request made to the department in Kingston was to send down the names of parties who were lessees of the different boxes in 1887. The answer to that was that they had not kept any record of the names, as they were in the habit of destroying them at the end of the year, and the information never came to the department here. I suppose these vouchers are checked over by the inspector in the office at Kingston to see that the returns are correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would not the cash book at Kingston post office show what sums were received and from whom?

Mr. HAGGART. My deputy informs me that often the same box is let three or four times during the year, and the boxes credited with the amount paid, and not the lessees. I do not know that the names are kept at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is Mr. Bancroft, and did he get the contract? The Department of Public Works ought to know all about him.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is Bancroft & Connolly.

Mr. AMYOT. I know all about them. Mr. Bancroft, who is a perfectly unknown party, was one of the tenderers, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. were other tenderers. When Bancroft was found to be the lowest tenderer, a letter reached the department stating that he had formed a partnership with Larkin, Connolly & Co., for the purposes of his tender. Larkin & Connolly's tender was higher than Bancroft's, which was the lowest, and Mr. Bancroft got the contract because he had joined with Larkin & Connolly, who were said to have vast experience in those contracts, as I believe they had. After that large extras were granted, under circumstances into which I will not go now; but I had hoped to be able to find out who Mr. Bancroft is. I wanted to know who was the lessee of the post office box which he had given as his address in Kingston, and this information we are refused. This information should be given us, as the Kingston post office is a branch of the Postmaster General's Department, and under the control of this Parliament. Not being given that information we are inclined to believe there is some reason for not giving it. I hope the Government will not expose this House to any further enquiry or trouble in the matter, and that they will do their best to find out who was the proprietor of this box. That might be one of the elements of their defence later on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. Minister of Public Works know about Mr. Bancroft? Is he one of the parties now carrying on the contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. All I can say is that the contract was given to Bancroft & Connolly, and that it is that firm which is building the dock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The contract is given in the name of Bancroft & Connolly?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. The tender of Mr. Bancroft, which was the lowest, was the tender accepted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the contract was, as I understand, subsequently assigned, in part or whole, to Mr. Connolly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And is now in the name of Bancroft & Connolly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, Bancroft & Connolly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister of Public Works must be able to give my hon. friend the information he wants as to who Mr. Bancroft is? He can say if the contract is now being carried out by Mr. Bancroft in connection with Mr. Connolly.

Mr. AMYOT. We might learn if he is a Chinaman, or an Indian, or an African, or what he is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it not the practice to require each individual party in a firm to sign the contract? And does this contract show the signatures of the parties?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no doubt the contract is signed by the two parties.

Mr. AMYOT. Would the hon. Minister of Public Works have any objection to allowing some members of the House to see to-morrow morning the original tender of Mr. Bancroft, so that we might enjoy the pleasure of seeing his written signature. Bogus names may be sent in to a department so important as that of Public Works to give facilities to other tenderers to come in and frustrate the regular and honest tenderers, who would do the work at better prices in the end. If that be allowed, the public have a right to know it. When tenders are sent in they should be honest, bonâ fide tenders, and not tenders sent under bogus names. It will be readily understood how easy, under that practice, it would be to defraud the public. Here is a man who sends in a tender under a false name, and at an absurd price, and he knows the tender will be accepted, because he will form a partnership with a well-known contractor. He will have taken the contract at a very low price, but will make up by extras. He will make it up by changes, additions, by enlarging or diminishing the work, and thus will obtain undue preference.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If Mr. Bancroft got the contract at the lowest tender and Larkin & Connolly came in and assumed it with him, the country gets the benefit.

Mr. AMYOT. The department says: I give you the contract for $200,000, but I will grant you $80,000 for extra work, which will cost you $10,000, and in that way the country is defrauded of $70,000.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is your view of the matter.

Mr. AMYOT. That has been done in this instance. If my hon. friend would read the incomplete report which is before the House, he would not lose his time by making the remarks he did. He does not know the facts, because his intelligence and devotion to his country are too great to allow him to make the remarks he has made had he known the facts.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is not given to the average member of this House to know as much as the gallant Colonel who has just spoken. Nevertheless, the House will agree with me that what I said was perfectly right. The country has got the benefit of the action taken by the Department of Public Works, notwithstanding anything the hon. gentleman has said. If the department allowed these extras afterwards, any person, I care not how little intelligence he may possess, must see that it has nothing whatever to do with granting the contract in the first instance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Well, just be good enough now to explain where I am wrong.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman has not properly understood the question. If a bogus tenderer, under a false name, obtains the contract at an undue price, as was the case in this instance, it is unfair to the genuine tenderer. Let us understand that point, first. If, after he had obtained that contract by means of a bogus name, he obtained extras that made up for the loss of tendering too low, and if he makes besides a large profit, it is not only unfair to the bonâ fide tenderer, but it becomes unfair to the public, and neither this House nor the country will put up with such a state of things.

Committee rose; and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say something in reference to this item of $60,000. I think some very decided changes must have been made in this graving dock after the contract was let. The facts presented to the House by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) this afternoon seemed to prove that there was collusion between the contractors after the work was let. I do not blame the Minister of Public Works for this, but there seems to have been a decided change made in the work, which resulted in a very increased cost. Whether that was necessary or was by agreement we do not know. We do not know whether the work was changed from the original contract, or what necessitated the increased expenditure, or what caused the generous dealing of the Minister of Public Works with the contractors. I am not disposed at present to insinuate that there was anything of that kind, but we know that in the Esquimalt graving dock very serious changes were made, and large sums were agreed to be paid and were paid. In no single instance does it appear that any contract has been carried out under the department in accordance with the specifications prepared or the contract as it is first made. The first contract always appears to have been a fictitious contract and not intended to be carried out according to the specifications, but that the contractors should have a new price made afterwards. This has principally been done by a firm that has been doing a large amount of this work under the Minister of Public Works. I do not say that anything of this kind has taken place in regard to the Kingston graving dock, but, in view of all the insinuations that have been made, I think the Committee should have laid upon the Table, first, the contract itself, and secondly, the reasons why the Government decided to change from the original contract to an altered contract, the schedule prices which were arranged and all the facts and figures connected with the whole work, before we are required to give consent to the passage of this item. I think it would be better to allow this item to stand over.

Mr. FOSTER. I will take the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and will allow this item to stand.

Mr. AMYOT. This afternoon I spoke of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., but I see that in this case Larkin and the firm of the Connolly's did not tender together. They made separate tenders, Nick and Mick Connolly in one tender and Larkin another. I may call the attention of the Minister to some information which we will require. By the first report of the engineer, it was stated that the opening of 48 feet for the dock was not sufficient, as some vessels would have to go into it which would be 55 feet, and it was then suggested that the opening of the dock should be widened so as to make it 60 feet instead of 48 feet as originally stipulated, and thus to allow the large vessels to go into it. The chief engineer reported that the making the opening of 60 feet instead of 48 feet would entail no expense to the country, and it was accepted of course, as it would make the country incur no expense. But a few days afterwards it was reported by the engineers in charge of the department that it was no longer necessary to make the opening 60 feet in order to receive vessels of 55 feet, but that an opening of 55 feet would suffice, and that this would entail an additional cost of $34,000. We require some explanation as to how it is that a change from 48 feet to 60 feet will cost nothing and a change from 60 to 55 feet will cost $34,000, and also how it is that a vessel of 55 feet cannot go into a dock less than 60 feet, and afterwards can go into a dock of only 55 feet. I will be told that that makes a difference in the caisson. Of course it must, but a caisson of 12 feet longer than was stipulated by the original contract must cost more than one that is only 7 feet longer than was stipulated originally. How can you build a caisson of 60 feet or a gate of 60 feet, that will not cost the country more than one of 55 feet? The hon. Minister will understand that I do not cast any blame upon him personally, but we are entitled to some information from our Executive Committee, as those hon. gentlemen are in the habit of calling themselves, and as they really are. We want explanations, because we have seen by the papers already laid before the House that the same Connolly's had employed some of their employés to tender, and they benefited by their bogus tender—in order afterwards to get them out of their way, when they found out that by doing so they would become the lowest tenderers. Their boldness increased, I presume, and so far as we can judge now, they did not think it necessary to take the trouble of using the names of their employés because it might cost them something, perhaps, to get them out of the way. So they said to themselves: If we send in bogus names and if we get the answer to the tenders addressed to our own post office box, we will manage the whole thing without a cent of expense, and it will be very easy for us—under the circumstances, I am entitled to make these suppositions—it will be very easy for us to write in the same handwriting that the tender was written with, and we will withdraw our tender. Then the Connollys, Nick and Mick, would manage to get Bancroft's contract; if there was anybody between their tender and the Bancroft tender, they would benefit by going into partnership with Bancroft; but if there was nobody between Bancroft and themselves, then they would remove Bancroft and would still hold their ground. In any circumstance, they were sure of their contract, but the bonâ fide tenderers were prevented from receiving the contract, and this is a most injurious state of things for the country. If you allow the public to believe that there is no fairness in granting contracts, that the tenderers have no fair-play at the hands of the department, then honest tenderers will give way, and will not take the trouble to make tenders, and the consequence will be that the country will be robbed. Another consequence is that if these bogus names get the contract, and if they are able to obtain extras, they can make up for the difference of the higher price, and they can still have a very paying contract. We must see our way through all these things, and we must learn how the contracts are given in this country. We know very well that when elections come round we are overwhelmed with money; it is very hard for us to resist the power of money, and we want to find out whether that money is public money or not, and whether it has been obtained through the Department of Public Works. Public opinion must have some weight and some power in this country. I have made these remarks in order to let the Minister of Public Works understand exactly what we want, so that the public opinion may be relieved in this matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. It might be well that the Minister, when he brings down the information for the Committee, should furnish the Committee with the amount of the cheque deposited by Bancroft when he sent in his tender, and the bank on which the cheque was payable, and where the money was deposited. They have either got to deposit the money or the cheque—probably they deposited the cheque. Now, we might know the bank on which the cheque was drawn, whether it was marked "good," and so on.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) might have waited until the papers I promised before six o'clock, were brought down to the House. He would then have avoided, most likely, being unjust towards my department and towards myself. I think fair-play is the proper thing. When the hon. gentleman remarked that certain documents would be required for the discussion of this item, I said I would bring down these papers. I have just spoken to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, and he suggested, on behalf of the Government, that we postpone this item in order that I may have an opportunity of bringing down the papers. When the papers are before this House the Committee will be in a position to discuss the matter intelligently, and will then be able to make up their minds about it. But until then, I hope the Committee will suspend their judgment about this item; for I am sure, when they come to examine it with all the documents that will be brought down, they will find that the work has been properly given, and there is nothing wrong in the matter.

Mr. TROW. I would like to make one suggestion to the hon. Minister of Public Works that will aid him in his search for the papers to bring down, that is, in reference to the enlargement of this opening from 48 to 55 feet. I understand from the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that a vessel of 53 feet would need an opening of 55 feet. Another point that he would do well to bear in mind is the fact that in enlarging the opening from 48 to 55 feet it could not involve any additional expense, for much less stone work would be required in the opening, while the increased iron work for the gates would be sufficient to make up for the diminution in the stone work. The next question that suggests itself to me is to enquire whether, when the dock is enlarged for these two extra-sized vessels, such enlargement exceeded the original contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in putting those questions, and I will take a note of them. No doubt hon. gentlemen understand that members cannot be exactly au fait with the dimensions of that dry dock; however, we know that if we enlarge the entrance of the dock in order to admit a larger vessel than was intended in the first instance, the consequence is that you must enlarge the dock itself. If you do not enlarge the dock you will not be able to work on the sides of the vessel, because some space will be required between the side of the vessel and the side of the dock. This is a matter I have obtained from the engineers, and I mention it that hon. gentlemen may see that if we enlarge the entrance for larger vessels, we must enlarge the dock itself.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not so understand the matter. It was stated on the 2nd July that it was necessary to enlarge, not the dock, but the entrance to the dock—that is a great difference. If you diminish the entrance to a dock you increase the length of the walls, and the expense will increase. The recommendation to enlarge was in these words:

"To accommodate all the steamers and propellers plying on Lake Ontario and the River St. Lawrence, and which will hereafter use this dock for repairs, some of which take a breadth of beam of nearly 55 feet."

It is recommended that the width of the entrance be made at least from 48 to 60 feet. This was on 2nd July. In the report before the House the Order in Council is not included, although it was asked by the motion. On 2nd July it was declared that this alteration will not entail any modification of the present contract so far as prices are concerned. On 22nd July another report was sent in. The Cibola has not diminished in size, but still exists. It was, however, found necessary, instead of having a 48-foot opening, as originally proposed, instead of having a 60-foot opening, according to the amended proposition, and which would entail no extra expense, it was found advisable to make it 55 feet for $34,000 extra. That is the position in which the matter stands. I am accused of unfairness for having stated that. On the contrary, it would have been unfair on my part, knowing these facts, not to have warned the Minister so that he would have his explanation ready when the whole matter came up. He should thank me instead of blame me. I would be very sorry to be unfair towards him. It is true the Government were not fair to me when they refused to let me know who was the lessee of a certain post office box in Kingston. They took my enquiry in a very joking way, laughing at my request, and the persistence with which I sought the information. They did not show much fair-play then. I asked the Minister this afternoon a very simple question: He should give hon. members permission to go early to-morrow, before any mysterious angel could do anything, and see the writing——

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is an insinuation the hon. gentleman should not make. It is not worthy of the hon. gentleman to make an insinuation of that kind. There is no one to interfere with the papers. The papers I promised will be brought down. I will bring down the original tender of Mr. Bancroft. I will bring down the contract as signed. I will not have copies of them, but I will bring down every paper connected with the matter, and I think the hon. member should suspend his remarks until then. The papers will speak for themselves. The hon. gentleman wishes to appear to be very fair towards me, but it is very unfair to act in this way. The papers have been promised, the papers will be brought down, and brought down here, not to be seen by one member but by all members of this House, and the House cannot ask more than that.

Mr. AMYOT. I would be very sorry to insinuate anything against the hon. gentleman, but when I see that papers in connection with the post office at Kingston have disappeared, I have a right to entertain some suspicion. I do not throw the blame on the Postmaster General, but if he thinks that they are to be allowed to make papers disappear in the departments connected with the Government, and we are not to be allowed to resist it, he is mistaken. I said the hon. Minister of Public Works had not been fair to me when he would not answer the question I put to him, whether or not he would permit us or any member to see the papers to-morrow morning early. He has not answered that question. He now says he will bring down, not copies, but the originals. I am very glad to hear it; I have not heard it before. After all, when we see we cannot reach the bottom of things we have a right to certain suspicions. I do not want to throw any doubt on the hon. gentleman personally, but there are divers parties concerned in these contracts. If you take them as extended now and as they existed in the beginning, they are of a very suspicious nature, and the quicker the Government will throw light on the whole matter the better for the hon. Minister and for the reputation of the department and for this country. We are playing with millions of dollars and with the fortunes of the people, and we who have been chosen by the people at large to watch public affairs are entitled to receive the fullest information. It never came into my mind that at this period of Confederation the Government would stand before Parliament assembled and would deny the information we have asked to-day. The information I ask may have looked simple, but when I am told that Mr. Bancroft never existed, and when I find that his address is Box 524 Post Office, Kingston, I ask, who was the lessee of that box? Was Mr. Connolly the lessee? I am refused the information. When we are told that we should not have the permission to state what we think, and when information is refused to us, we are being treated in no fair way and the Government dare not admit to the people the facts as they exist.

Mr. FOSTER. Are we really to have a long discussion on this matter? Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know the purpose for which we wish to put through these Estimates. If I had asked the Committee to pass this item without sufficient information, there would be very good cause to protest on that side of the House. I did not do that. All the information asked has been promised to be brought down, and I myself stated that the item would stand over until the information was brought down, and I did that for the purpose of facilitating our purpose of getting through these Estimates. I think the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) is not quite fair in this matter; he does not intend to be so, but to one who is simply an onlooker and watches the proceedings, it does seem he has been unfair. He was told this afternoon with respect to the name of Bancroft——

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentleman intends to go on with the discussion we must reply to him.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not have spoken on this question at the present time except for the fact that the hon. gentleman, taking advantage of this discussion, has left a very unfair impression not on the House, but on the country, when this debate goes out without any answer being made to his assertions. He has intimated that the Government stands between him and a laudable and proper claim for information. For a purpose not known to the Government and not known to the House, he wished to get the name of a certain lessee of a box in Kingston post office. He received the information which the Postmaster General had at his command, and the facts as brought out this afternoon were these: that the post office boxes are let by boxes, that is by numbers, and that the postmaster keeps his accounts by the numbers and not by the names, and therefore he has not sent to the Postmaster General a statement of name, and it is not in his power to say who was the lessee of that box. After having obtained that return the Postmaster General stated that he had asked his deputy to communicate with the postmaster at Kingston and find out if he could from his personal knowledge tell the name of the lessee of that box. When all that is considered and taken into account it does not seem quite fair for the hon. member for Bellechasse to state that the Government is standing between him and proper information. With respect to this question under debate is it not more fair, as certain challenges have been thrown out and certain information applied for, when the Minister has declared that the originals of all papers will be brought down and laid before the House, to suspend the discussion under the circumstances until that information is here? I am not looking at this matter from a partisan standpoint or anything of that kind, but simply as to the fair, honest treatment that should be shown by man to man, and for the purpose of facilitating the work we have in hand.

Mr. LAURIER. The remarks just made by the Minister of Finance completely justify and vindicate the course followed by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). Within the hon. gentleman's own hearing this afternoon, within my hearing, and within the hearing of every hon. gentleman, the hon. member asked for the production of a certain tender and contract. An answer never came. Not one word was said that the papers would be laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been stated since dinner.

Mr. LAURIER. It has been stated just now, when my hon. friend has asked the Government again and again. Now the Government has said: Very well, we will bring down the papers. If that answer had been given this afternoon, probably my hon. friend would have been satisfied and would not have made his attacks. But the hon. gentleman must himself feel that the Government have no right to make the complaint they are now making, since it was simply after the persistent attacks of my hon. friend that the Government thought proper at last to give him the information which he had been seeking for during the last few hours. Why did not the Government do that at first? If they had done so I would understand the complaint now made by the Minister of Finance. I am quite sure that after the promise, which I must say has been extorted—I cannot use any other word for it—after the promise extorted by the repeated attacks of my hon. friend a promise was given that the contract would be brought down, and certainly my hon. friend is satisfied because he has gained his point. But that is not all. Are we to understand from the Government that they have no power in their hands at this moment to let us know who was the lessee of box 524 in the Kingston post office? Are we to understand that the post office at Kingston is kept in such a loose manner that it is impossible after a lapse of two years only to obtain such information as that. I do not know, nor do I care how the books are kept at Kingston post office, but if I am told by the Postmaster General that it is impossible to find out by any records in the Kingston Post Office who was the lessee of that box in 1889, then I must say that the post office at Kingston requires some reform.

Mr. FOSTER. Not necessarily at all.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend who last spoke referred to the production of the contract; and in order to prevent any misunderstanding arising out of that remark, I would say that I understand that the Minister intends to produce a great deal more than the tender and contract.

Mr. LAURIER. That is certainly understood.

Mr. MULOCK. I would suggest, so as to prevent any misunderstanding, that all the papers in the department, from the very commencement to this present moment, should be produced. I mean all the specifications and conditions that were referred to in the original advertisement for tenders, the tenders themselves, all the correspondence and all other papers of any matter and kind connected with the contracts, whether let by tender under that advertisement or otherwise, and also a statement showing the changes in the contracts. That is what I understand by the papers to be produced.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, that was understood.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it be possible to have these papers laid on the Table, at least a day before the item is to be considered, so that we may have an opportunity of looking over them?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before six o'clock I answered the hon. gentleman, and a couple of other hon. gentlemen, that I would bring down the papers, and I meant by that all the papers.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it be convenient to have them down before this item is brought up?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will take care of that.

Mr. GIBSON. There seems to be a misapprehension as to the length of the dock——

Mr. FOSTER. If this is to continue, the Committee had better rise, and we will go on with some other business.

Mr. LAURIER. I would advise my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) to defer his remarks for another occasion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sproule). The question is not before the Committee, because the item has been dropped.

Mr. AMYOT. Do not put it on that ground. We consent to let the item stand for the moment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sproule). The hon. gentleman will remember that I only used the words used by the Finance Minister, that the item stands for the present until these papers are forthcoming.

Hull Post Office..... $105

Mr. DEVLIN. What about this item?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is for an expenditure for small works, such as painting.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does that complete the expenditure in connection with the Hull post office?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN. Have you an idea what the Hull post office has cost up to date?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A little over $30,000.

Mr. DEVLIN. I merely invite the attention of the hon. Minister to the item because I wish to suggest that since something over $30,000 has been expended on the building, another small amount might be provided to place a clock in the tower of the Hull post office. I called attention to this question in the early part of the session, and I received for reply that it was not the intention of the Government to complete this work. Considerable merriment at my expense was provoked at the time in the columns of the Montreal Gazette, which said that I got for my reply that the clock would not be placed there, and that when I wanted to know what hour it was I could either buy a watch or consult a policeman. I intend now to consult the Minister of Public Works, who is more affable, and I intend asking him to see that the building shall be properly completed. If he crosses the river, and if he looks at the building, he will find that such is not the case, for the tower is there, and a place for the clock is there, but it is boarded up, although I believe the original intention was to place a clock. This is an eyesore, and it deteriorates from the appearance of the post office, which is perhaps one of the finest buildings in the County of Ottawa. The edifice reflects credit on the Government, but as it stands at present it cannot reflect all the credit it should. The cost of a clock would be very small, and I can assure the hon. Minister of Public Works that discussion on this subject may cost more to the Government than the placing of a clock in the Hull post office would cost to the country. At all events, I ask that the building should be completed, because as it stands now it is not perfect. At the present time great improvements are being made in the neighbourhood of the post office, and handsome buildings are going up in its vicinity, the appearance of which will not be added to by this incompleteness in the post office building. If the Government do not intend placing the desired improvement in the tower, perhaps they would give permission to the citizens of Hull to put a clock there.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) would put a clock there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would keep Grit time.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be an objection.

Improved vault accommodation in Eastern Block for Finance Department (Revote of lapsed amount—Governor General's Warrant)..... $8,990

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does that vault cost altogether?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $42,698.

Walkerton Post Office, Custom-house, &c.. $7,500

Mr. LANDERKIN. What will be the total cost of this building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With this vote it will be about $17,500.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What was the contract price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $14,560. That is only for the building. In addition, there are the fixtures, the furniture and the fence.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did the building exceed the contract price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About $3,000.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How was this?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That comprises the inspector's salary and the architect's work. Then there was some extra work on account of the foundations.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who was the inspector?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot give the name of the inspector.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You have not an inspector there, but a clerk of works; so you informed me some time ago. I asked at that time what his occupation was. One would suppose that a gentleman appointed to inspect a public building, to see that proper material was used and that the work was properly done, would be a mechanic. In this case, the clerk of works is not a mechanic; he has been engaged in buying grain. It would be almost implied that no mechanic could be got in Walkerton or that part of the country, and that a layman had to be employed to do the work of a qualified builder; and he gets $75 a month, I think.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $2.50, I think, working days.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When did he begin?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot give the date, but he began as soon as the work began.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He has been on continuously since?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, until the work was completed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He has also been engaged in other employments; he does not give his whole time to this work. I know that he spent about a month last winter in the election. That very fact had a tendency to open the eyes of the people, and it did not result in very much good to the Government. Probably, if the Government would take the hint and call off these officials in some places, it might be better for the Government and for the country, too. If he is employed to do work for the Government, the Government ought to see that he does that work, and I do not think he should be paid when he is not performing the work for which he is employed. If the Minister will say that he was employed as an election agent, then we will know.

Cobourg Post Office, Custom-house, &c.—Balance due contractors for new wing, &c.....$1,152.75

Mr. HARGRAFT. Is that building completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; there is a balance of $1,202 due on the final estimates.

Mr. HARGRAFT. What was the cost of that building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When this is paid, it will be about $53,700.

Winnipeg Immigrant Buildings..... $2,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the extent of accommodation there now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The building measures 126¾ by 30¾. It is all wood. Above ground is two stories, and a kitchen to the rear, the whole standing over a basement and store.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many emigrants can be accommodated there?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I can only give the dimensions, and I must refer the hon. gentleman to another department for the information he requires.

Regina Industrial School..... $5,400

Mr. McMULLEN. Was this put up last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; it began in 1889, and a much larger sum was voted in 1890. The cost altogether will be about $50,000. That will nearly complete it.

Mr. MULOCK. To what use is it put?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It was finished, I think, the end of last year and opened early this spring. It is a school under the supervision of the Presbyterian denomination, and is one of the largest schools we have in the territories. It is exclusively for the Indians. I think there are now some forty or fifty pupils in it, and we expect in a short time it will be filled to its greatest capacity. We teach farming and different trades there.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me rather surprising that we should have spent $50,000 on an industrial school and have only fifty pupils.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It has been open only a few months, and pupils are coming in from all parts of the country.

Three Rivers Pier—To complete..... $2,800

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is required because there was a settlement of the work, and there had to be built two or three tiers more.

Three Rivers Harbour—Balance of purchase price of deep water lot..... $775

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cost of that lot? Is it land or water?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a property purchased some three years ago, and this portion was left behind because we could not get a clear title. Now that the title is declared by the Department of Justice to be correct, we will have to pay the amount.

Lévis Graving Dock..... $1,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is to cover expenses for indispensable repairs.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

Southampton, Ont.—Urgent repairs to breakwater..... .....$1,600

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This expenditure was caused in consequence of the repairs done to the western portion of the breakwater at Southampton, which was damaged by fire to an extent of over 200 feet.

General repairs and improvements, harbours and rivers, Ontario.....$2,500

Mr. SOMERVILLE. In reference to the wharf at Big Bay, in the Township of Keppel, in North Grey, I asked for a return which has been brought down, but the repairs are not given in detail. I find that the expenditure amounted to $2,065, but there is no statement as to what the repairs consisted of.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As I did not expect that question this evening I have not the data here; but, if the hon. gentleman will be good enough to send me a note across, I will enquire into the matter and give him an answer.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Where have these repairs been made?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have a certain amount to expend on these general repairs. Sometimes it is too large, and, therefore, the balance lapses. In other years, when there are storms and damages are caused, the amount voted is not sufficient, and we have to ask for a small amount additional to cover the difference.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand that, but will the hon. gentleman now say where these repairs were made? The reason why I ask is that I know of several harbours in the west, which were built by the Government, where no repairs have been made for some time, the result being that these works are practically useless. There are several in the locality from which I come, such as Goderich, Port Albert and Bayfield.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I see that we expended at Port Albert $14, at Goderich $615, at River St. John $147, at Sault Ste. Marie $169, and the balance on other works.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am afraid the amount spent at Port Albert is almost entirely thrown away. The hon. gentleman has already expended several thousand dollars there, and, so far, the expenditure has been of very little practical use, because every season the drift of sand closes up the channel to a considerable extent, preventing vessels gaining access to the pier. I think that representations have been made over and over again to the department, especially by my predecessor in the representation of West Huron, but the Government have not seen fit to attend to them. It is true that the hon. gentleman sent dredges there last year, but perhaps not one-fifth of the time the dredge was there was it doing work at Port Albert. The hon. gentleman knows that we have expended over half a million of money in constructing the Goderich harbour, and yet, singular to say, the larger class of vessels that usually navigate Lake Huron cannot get into the harbour at all times. On account of the drift down stream, the entrance is often closed up. The town corporation have over and over again presented this fact to the Minister of Public Works, and I know that over and over again the Minister has promised to look into the matter, but it has not been attended to. It is true that occasionally the hon. gentleman sends a Government dredge there, but I state here, on my responsibility as a member, that a large part of the dredge is there it is not working. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could find out from the captain, or whoever is in charge of the dredge, the reason of its inaction. It is stated to me that much of the time the dredge does nothing while it is there. The hon. gentleman knows that $50,000 has been expended by the Government at Bayfield, and I tell him that that money has been practically thrown away. At first over $40,000 was expended to make a pier on the south side of the stream. Then the hon. gentleman has expended four or five thousand dollars in repairing the north pier, but the repairs were so poorly made that within 48 hours afterwards they were made wholly useless by the waves. Pine and cedar piles were driven into the river on the north side so carelessly that within 48 hours they were floating in the lake and were being picked up by the farmers of the locality and used for fence posts. If the hon. gentleman sends his engineer, when he is up in that locality, to visit the harbour, he will find that what I am stating is absolutely correct. The whole of that $4,000 was not given out by contract, but was done by day's work, and it was done in such a manner that the whole of the money was absolutely thrown away. It might just as well have been thrown into Lake Huron, because the material it purchased went there within a very short time. Now, it is not right that the country's resources should be wasted in this manner. There is no use in the country spending large sums of money on public works unless some attention is paid, not only to the works when under construction, but to the works after they are completed. Now, the hon. gentleman has been in that locality, he knows the harbour of Goderich, probably as well as I do, and he knows that it is a magnificent harbour for vessels. I think he knows pretty well, also, that large vessels have not been able to gain admission to that harbour, at intervals, for several years back. For instance, the Beatty line of steamers, plying between Sarnia and Duluth, are often unable to make the harbour, heavily laden as they are with grain and iron, and all because a little necessary attention has not been given to keep the channel and entrance to the harbour clear. If the hon. gentleman sees that his dredge goes there at a fitting season of the year, and is kept occupied while it is there, he will be doing an immense benefit to the place and to those engaged in carrying grain. And so with Port Albert. The proprietor of a vessel stated to me a short time before I came down, and has written to me since, that he is hardly ever able to make an entrance to Port Albert unless upon the calmest possible day. Now, it will not take more than a month of dredging at Goderich, and perhaps two or three weeks at Port Albert, to accomplish nearly all that is desired in those two places. At Bayfield, unless the works are to go to utter ruin, the hon. gentleman will have to spend four or five thousand dollars to put the harbour in repair. As I already stated, the four or five thousand that have already been expended there within a few years have been utterly wasted, and the channel to the harbour is practically blocked up. All the money the hon. gentleman has expended on the north pier has been wasted, for the drift down the lake has filled up the channel. Now, if the hon. gentleman will put these three places in repair he would be doing a service not only to the country's trade, but to the towns and villages where these harbours are.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has spoken of Bayfield and Port Albert, but he has especially dwelt upon Goderich. I know the difficulty about Goderich; it has lasted for years and years. There is always a bar forming there or some other obstacle at the entrance, or at a short distance from the entrance; therefore it has to be dredged nearly every year. This year I could not do that for want of money. The difficulty this year is caused by the lateness of the session, but when the money has been voted by Parliament I will see what are the calls upon the department. I have always thought that Goderich harbour has received a good deal of money from time to time. We must do some dredging there in order to allow vessels to come in, but I am not in a position just now to say how far we can go,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon. gentleman said nothing about Bayfield. Does he propose to allow the whole expenditure there to be lost? I have just pointed out to him that the last four or five thousand that he expended there are altogether lost, because the work was done so inefficiently. I tell the hon. gentleman that the timber he last put in there soon floated out in the lake, and the navigation to the entrance to the harbour is now blocked up.

New dredging plant, revote of lapsed amount, Governor General's warrant $6,000

Mr. ALLISON. I would like to ask the Minister whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for dredging Napanee River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say that just now. The Supplementary Estimates for the present year will be considered by Council, and will be brought down. I cannot say whether there will be a vote for that purpose.

Mr. BURDETT. Is it proposed that the dredging at Belleville harbour be prosecuted vigorously? I call attention to the fact that the spring freshets that occur there have caused great damage at the mouth of the river. This year, especially, many persons have suffered to a very great extent. If the work which has been commenced is actively carried on and properly completed I have no doubt the current will keep the mouth of the river free, and I hope, therefore, the work will be thoroughly done, and done at once. I am aware that an active interest is being taken in the matter, and that it has been brought prominently before the Government, and I again draw attention to it in order that it may be actively prosecuted and facilities provided for carrying it on in future. I understand from old residents that 60 or 70 years ago many rocks were placed up the river for the purpose of forming a wharf, as boats in those days went much further up the channel. In later years the boats have been obliged to land at the lower end of the harbour, and those obstructions which remain should be removed. I call the attention of the Minister to the matter, because I am aware that great interest is being taken in it, and it is important that the work should be carried out.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the ordinary Estimates this work has not been forgotten. If a further sum is required, the matter will be brought before my colleagues for their consideration.

Mr. BURDETT. I am not complaining in regard to the work.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. With respect to dredges, do the Government ask for tenders, or purchase them by private contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For the scows, we have asked tenders in different parts of the country where they are required. We have also purchased some timber for one built in the yard of the department. As a rule whenever we can do it we call for tenders for the scows.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. On what was the amount of $6,000 spent, and where was it spent?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was to pay for timber and lumber that had been purchased for reconstructing the keel of a vessel and purchasing a scow on Lake Ontario, and also for new dredging plant.

Mr. FORBES. Is this amount of $6,000 to supply dredging plant for the Maritime Provinces? Dredging is much required at a number of places in the Maritime Provinces, and the usual answer given to enquiries is that there is no dredging plant available.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is for plant for Ontario. I admit that a new powerful dredge is required for the Maritime Provinces as well as for the Province of Ontario, but during the last two or three years we have not felt ourselves able to ask for a vote for this purpose. The time may come, but not this session.

Mr. FORBES. Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates to purchase a large dredge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not this year.

Mr. FORBES. When was this dredge destroyed or lost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Three years ago.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not catch from the explanation of the Minister whether he intends to place a sum in the Estimates to clear the mouth of the Thames River.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. These votes are only up to 1st July. When we take up the ordinary Estimates perhaps the hon. gentleman will renew his question.

Mr. BARRON. It will be remembered that three or four years ago, at the instance, I think, of the late member for South Victoria, $3,000 was placed in the Estimates for the purpose of improving Scugog River near Lindsay. At that time an election was expected, and every one pretty well understood why the money was placed there. Since that time the money has not been expended, and the Minister of Justice will recollect that I asked a few years ago which Government exercises jurisdiction over those waters. The Ontario Government has expended a large sum for the same purpose as $3,000 was placed in our Estimates. The people of South Victoria would like to know why the money has not been expended, and, if not to be expended, why it was placed in the Estimates. The Minister of Justice will remember that he gave an evasive answer to my question and said that some dispute still existed as to jurisdiction. The people are entitled to some explanation as to this matter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have heard about this Scugog River before to-day. I heard it from my hon. friend who represented that county; he came to my office several times and was very anxious to have the money expended. The Ontario Government decided to spend a large sum to improve the river, and they have done so, and we thought it better to allow the rich Government of Ontario to expend their money there.

Mr. BARRON. Do I understand the Minister to say that because the Ontario Government is spending money there this Government declines to spend the money which had been voted by this House for that work? I do not think that is right. The members of this House some few sessions ago voted a sum of $3,000 to spend on these waters, and I do not think the Government should now say that they are not going to spend that money because the Ontario Government is spending money there. The Minister must remember that this Government has emphasized its jurisdiction over these waters. They have Mr. Rogers, their superintendent, exercising jurisdiction over these waters, and they should spend this $3,000 which the House voted. The Minister must know that a superintendent goes over the Trent waters perhaps two or three times a month, and yet he says that because the Ontario Government is spending money he is not going to spend the money which was voted a few years ago. The Government knew of these facts at the time they asked the House to vote the money, and why did they ask us to vote that sum if they are not going to spend it? When I asked the Minister of Justice a question in reference to this matter some two or three years ago, he did not tell us that this Government did not claim to exercise this jurisdiction and he should give us some explanation now. I may point out that the Ontario Government assists railways and that this Government assists them also, and even suppose you exercise joint jurisdiction over these waters why should you not expend the sum of $3,000, which you were told to spend by the representatives of the people in this House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member has referred to me. I did not hear what was the name of the waters he was referring to.

Mr. BARRON. The hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. Fairbairn) knows all about it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member referred to me and not to the hon. member for South Victoria. I do not remember the hon. gentleman ever asking me this question before, and I certainly did not intend to give an evasive answer if I did answer him. I may have been uncertain and indefinite in the answer I gave, and necessarily so if he asked me about this matter four or five years ago, because at that time it was uncertain whether the Ontario Government claimed jurisdiction in these waters or not. It is not however a question of jurisdiction, but it is a question of property; and it is not six months since we have ascertained what the claim of the Provincial Government with regard to these waters is. I do not remember the particular stream that the hon. gentleman refers to having come into dispute, but in the case of the Southampton River, I think, the question arose about two years ago. There was correspondence on the subject which evidently it was useless to pursue because the Provincial Government were determined to claim not only jurisdiction over these waters, as the hon. gentleman says they claim over railways, but the absolute property in these rivers. A few months ago it was agreed between the Ontario Government and this Government that this question should be set at rest by an agreement for a case for the opinion of the highest courts, involving both the question of the property in the rivers themselves, and the control over them as regards fishery, &c. It would seem to be true that in the meantime, and not having that question in view, Parliament has been asked to make an appropriation for a public work there. That appropriation by no means involves the expenditure of the money, it is simply an authority to the Government to expend it. Since last session we have ascertained not only the full extent of the claim of the Provincial Government, but we have arrived at a conclusion with the Provincial Government as to the best means of ascertaining the merits of that claim. In the meantime, we certainly could not be expected to expend one dollar of Dominion money upon a property which is in dispute. The first thing is to get the title settled.

Mr. BARRON. The Minister of Justice must know that the jurisdiction over the River Scugog, running through the town of Lindsay, has been in dispute for years. The Ontario Government has for years been making improvements on those waters, and the Dominion Government has been making improvements alongside these, and to-day you have your inspector up there exercising jurisdiction over these waters. Do I understand the Minister of Justice to say that this Government is not going to spend any money in view of the doubt existing and the likelihood of the jurisdiction remaining in the Ontario Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do say that while we claim jurisdiction, and while we exercise control in the way that the hon. gentleman describes, and in regard to the fisheries, I think it would be most improper for us to spend a dollar in improving the property of other people. We claim and will assert our rights in the meantime.

Mr. BOWERS. I understood that $8,000 was put in the Estimates last year for the dredging of the Weymouth River. Do I understand from the Minister of Public Works that he found the channel so hard that he could not dredge the river with the appliances he had on hand? I would like to know whether the whole of this vote of $8,000 was expended last year. I understand that a dredge went down there last fall, at an expense of something like $75 per day, and that she could only work a few days on account of the weather being stormy. It is money wasted to send a dredge down there during the fall; she should have been sent there in fine weather, in summer time, when she could do work. If the $8,000 was not spent last year, I would ask that the balance should now be spent in dredging other parts of the river where the mud is soft. Weymouth is quite a growing place, and the river badly requires to be straightened and dredged.

Mr. ALLISON. It appears that this item of $6,000 under consideration was paid for new dredging plant. I would like to ask the Minister where this dredging plant was made, by whom it was made, and who has it in possession now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As these are purely and simply the balance of accounts voted last year, I would ask hon. gentlemen to defer their questions until we come to the item in the main Estimates for new dredging plant for the current year, and I will then be in a position to give the information they require. In the Estimates for the current year there is an item of $24,200 for dredging plant, and if hon. gentlemen will be kind enough to put me their questions when this comes to be voted I will give all the information then.

Indians, Ontario and Quebec..... $5,234.55

Mr. MULOCK. I would like an explanation of the vote of $1,501.62 to cover over-expenditure in the Province of Quebec on relief and seed grain account.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In the Province of Quebec there are a great number of Indians who, although they raise a little grain, cannot be induced to save their own seed, and when the spring comes round it is imperatively necessary that we should give them some.

Mr. LANGELIER. There is a vote of $2,236.73 to cover expenses incurred in the survey of Indian reserves. Have these surveys taken place in the Province of Quebec or in the Province of Ontario?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In the Province of Quebec, on the Betsiamis Reserve, the Rougemont Reserve, and the Lorette Reserve. The survey of the Rougemont Reserve was paid for partly by the Quebec Government and partly by this Government; it was for the purpose of defining a boundary, because of trespasses which had been made on the timber there. The survey on the Betsiamis Reserve was for the running of a boundary line and laying off a portion of the reserve for the purpose of the Indians. They surrendered the other portion of the reserve with the request that the timber might be sold, and I believe it is going to be advertised in the near future. In the case of the Lorette Reserve there was a dispute between the seignior of the surrounding property, Major Duchesnay, and the Indians regarding the boundary, and the court ordered the survey.

Mr. LANGELIER. What is the amount for the survey of the Lorette Reserve?

Mr. DEWDNEY. $1,662.60, which includes legal and other expenses as well.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would like to know whether this amount includes the expenses of Mr. Pelletier, of Quebec, in connection with the case between him and the Dominion Government?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This includes expenses; but I do not know the exact proportion.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would like the exact amount of the legal expenses as distinguished from the expenses of surveying.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will get that information for the hon. gentleman.

Compassionate allowance under the authority of an Order in Council dated the 31st January, 1890, to each of three children of the late James Payne (who, in his lifetime, was farming instructor on the Stony Reserve, Eagle Hills, N.W.T., and was killed by an Indian of the Stony Band), at the rate per annum of one-tenth of his salary or $600, from 1st March, 1885, to 30th June, 1890, six years and four months, at $180 per annum..... $1,140

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why was there so much delay in doing justice?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The reason was that Mr. Payne was an Englishman who came out here some years ago and became one of the instructors. After he died we heard nothing of him and did not hear from his friends until some time after he was murdered. Then we had communications from his friends in England, who applied for a pension to his three children whom he had left in England under the charge of their grandmother. He was a married man and his wife had died. There was a great deal of correspondence, all of which had to be referred to the Department of Justice, which went into the whole matter, and we were only in a position last year to take it up.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the amount allowed to each child?

Mr. DEWDNEY. $60 each, until they are of age.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that is a very reasonable allowance. I well remember the circumstances of the death of this man who was assassinated. I am surprised that the amount should be so small, and hope the children have other means of maintenance.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not know that they have, but they are satisfied with this, as far as I can gather. The grandmother applied for relief as well, but we found she had means on her own.

Mr. MULOCK. Is this according to some regular scale adopted in similar cases?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, adopted under Order in Council passed in 1885 with reference to families of officers of militia. This is exactly on the same basis.

Preliminary expenses in connection with Mackenzie River and Peace River treaty..... $3,500

Mr. DEWDNEY. I ask that this may be dropped this year, as we have had no expense as yet.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the object of entering into treaty relations with the Indians of Peace River district? Surely we will not undertake any settlement there for half a century to come, and there is no reason why the Indians should be interfered with.

Mr. DEWDNEY. For several years past hon. gentlemen opposite have been very anxious that the petroleum interests in that country should be developed. We cannot deal with any in that territory until we have a surrender from the Indians, as we consider we are under a moral obligation to obtain such surrender. And it was for the purpose of quieting their minds that we proposed to take a surrender from them next year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman does not suppose he is going into the mining of petroleum two thousand miles north of any settlement?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Those petroleum deposits will be within eighty miles of a railway within a week or two.

To enable the department to pay a balance due to Dr. W. F. Smith for medical attendance, from 1st January to 30th June, 1888, given by him to Indians in the County of Halifax, N.S..... $71.50

Mr. McMULLEN. How is it those items are allowed to remain over so long?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is an old claim. Dr. Smith only presented his account last August, and there were no funds to pay him. We were not aware of the indebtedness, but it was examined into and found to be correct.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We have just passed over the items with regard to Ontario, and I wish to refer to a matter which I brought to the notice of the Minister some time ago. It is charged that in the case of informations laid by the Indian agent against people in North Bruce for selling liquor to Indians, he keeps the whole fine. I would like to know here from the hon. gentleman what he has to say about this.

Mr. DEWDNEY. We cannot believe the charge. That is the Indian complaint, but the department does not believe it. We have given the inspector instructions to investigate into the matter, and I hope to have his report shortly. We cannot believe that Mr. Allen, who bears such a good character as an agent, has been keeping the fines for his own profit.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Indians say that they were not paid the fines which they were entitled to. It is very desirable that the Minister should look into that matter and remedy it. If it goes on, it will create friction which would be disagreeable for the department and for the people up there.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot tell what disposition was made of the fines belonging to the informers, but, on enquiry, I found that all the fines belonging to the department were sent in, and I hope soon to have some information as to the others.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then, in regard to certain charges which are made against persons for selling liquor to Indians. I find that legal advice is obtained and the expense is considerable. In North Bruce, within the last few years, from answers I have obtained from the department, I find that a large amount of money has been paid by the Government in these litigated cases, and it is hard to estimate now the amount which it has cost the people in these cases. Some of these are brought against hotel men for selling liquor to Indians when these Indians are almost white, and some of these are electors under the Franchise Act. It seems an anomalous thing and one which should not exist, and it seems to me that there is a disposition to unduly crowd the revenues in this way. Some of these men, when they get out of employment, shove some one up to lay an information against a man who keeps a good hotel, and who is deceived perhaps by the complexion of the Indians, and yet he is tried and fined for giving liquor to these Indians who appear to be white men. In the town in which I live, the agent came with an interpreter who apparently was not an Indian. He asked for liquor, and the hotel man was nearly caught, as he was scarcely able to distinguish the Indian from a white man.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh!

Mr. LANDERKIN. The gentleman laughs, but the fact is that the interpreter was so fair that it was almost impossible to tell that he was an Indian.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am aware that there is a difficulty in regard to that, and that in the North-West, even amongst the wild Indians. There is one of the Cree chiefs, for example, when he puts on a black suit and a black hat and goes to Manitoba and passes as a white man, he can get liquor and it has been sold to him under the impression that he was a white man. We have a difficulty in that way, and we have to use every exertion we can in order to bring the whiskey seller before the courts and punish him. In certain parts of the territories, we are called upon to stop the whiskey trade with the Indians. Of course, in an old settled part of the country like North Bruce, I dare say there is a great deal of difficulty, and I am sure the hotel keepers are often placed in a false position, and that it is almost impossible to distinguish a white man from an Indian, and that, if people put up a job on a man, they can easily carry it out; but, when our attention is called to it, we have to prosecute—we cannot help it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But you need not prosecute if you see fit not to do so, and if you are satisfied that it is a plot. I do not wish to see the law relaxed in any way in regard to the selling of liquor to Indians; but I think if a fine is to be given to informers, and the result is to cause litigation, the question should be investigated, because the result is simply that a premium is given for promoting suits, and these informers are continually laying traps because they get half the fine.

North-West Mounted Police, further amount required to meet expenditure for the year..... $30,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this in addition to the amounts paid last year as shown by the Auditor General's account?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is for the balance of the year just ended. The Auditor General's Report refers to the year before.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the total cost of the North-West Mounted Police for the past year?

Mr. DEWDNEY: The expenditure for 1887-88 was $862,965; for 1888-89, $829,701; for 1889-90, $753,000; for 1890-91, $739,250. The reason for this extra expenditure was that, on account of the Messiah craze to the south of the line, it was necessary to keep the outposts on the frontier during the winter, though they are usually brought into headquarters where the expense is of course nothing like so much. The whole of the patrols were kept out on the southern boundary, and that is the cause of the extra expenditure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The cost of this force is about equal to the maintenance of two regiments.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). How many men are there in active service?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The force is 1,000 strong, but it is generally short by from thirty to fifty men.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Does that include officers?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the hopes as to reducing that force now that the North-West is filling up and that there is some settlement scattered about there? Does the same necessity exist for keeping that force up to its present strength?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think so. We have found that, as settlement has increased, the work of the police has very much increased. The Government have not taken it into consideration whether it would be advisable at the present time to reduce the force or not; but my own opinion is that it would be very unwise to do it, because it is a force that does a great deal of good from one end of the country to the other, which gives confidence to the settlers, and is respected and at the same time feared by the Indians.

Mr. TROW. What is the annual expense per annum for hay?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have not the memorandum here, but I will give the information on the main Estimate. I know it is a large item.

Mr. TROW. Would it not be possible for a portion of the Mounted Police to have their services utilized in preparing hay?

Mr. DEWDNEY. You mean that they should cut their own hay? That was attempted at one time, but it was found not to be satisfactory. It was found that the men were scattered about at different points and it interfered with their discipline and was altogether unsatisfactory.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do they do their own freighting in the North-West from one post to another?

Mr. DEWDNEY. When they are travelling from one post to another, they take all their bedding and supplies with them. But their supplies are all delivered to the different posts by contract.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am sorry to hear the Minister say that there is little probability of the police force being reduced. Surely in the year 1891 we hardly require a thousand policemen up there to preserve the peace. The hon. gentleman's predecessor, the late right hon. the First Minister, in 1884, declared that thereafter the police force would be greatly decreased. He gave reasons why, at that particular time, the force could not then be decreased, but those reasons have nearly all disappeared now, and having so disappeared the force ought to be decreased. Now, in 1884, the then First Minister gave as a reason for maintaining the force at its numerical strength, first, the enormous increase of the cost of transportation in the North-West. The second reason he gave was the necessity of scattering the force all over the territories in order to attempt to suppress the introduction of liquor from, I suppose, the United States. Third, the extra cost of getting Indians upon their reserve. That reason has surely disappeared. There can be no necessity for keeping the force at its present strength for that purpose. The first reason has surely disappeared, because the means of transportation there are infinitely better now than they were in 1884. Then another reason the hon. gentleman gave for maintaining the force, was to keep the peace among the railway men. That reason has disappeared, there is no necessity for keeping a police force there to suppress apprehended riots. The fifth reason he gave was to prevent the stealing of horses. I do not know myself whether in the North-West the thieves are bigger thieves now than they were in the earlier days, but I should suppose there would not be the same necessity now for keeping there now as large a force for suppressing horse-stealing that there was then. Then, another reason he gave was, the price of food, beef especially, which he said was double the price in the North-West then that it was elsewhere. That reason cannot possibly exist now. I suppose meat is as cheap up there as anywhere else. When we consider the enormous number of ranches, well stocked, in that country, we might suppose that meat would be very nearly as cheap as it is in other portions of the Dominion; so that reason cannot prevail, at all events, to justify the enormous expenditure we are making now in comparison with what we made then. Another reason he gave was the price of fuel. Well, that reason cannot exist now. Coal is discovered there in almost every quarter, and the price of coal cannot be as high, by one-half, as it was when the First Minister gave his reasons for maintaining the force at its then strength. Now, as most of these reasons have disappeared, one would naturally expect that, not only the expenditure, but the force itself, would gradually decrease. After that speech was delivered, the force, later on, in 1885, was doubled, or nearly doubled, for special reasons known to us all. But these reasons have all disappeared since then, and if the force in 1884 was then, in the late First Minister's judgment, a force that circumstances would, in the natural course of events, decrease, and if in 1885 we doubled that force for special reasons which no longer exist, one would naturally expect that the force would be reduced even below the number at which it stood in 1884. Yet, we are told by the Minister of the Interior that there is no reasonable probability that the force will be diminished. Now, one would like to know the reason why the Minister of the Interior so says, why he dissents from the opinion that was entertained in 1884 by the late First Minister. One might well justify, in 1884, the maintaining the force at its then numerical strength, somewhere between four and five hundred men; but it has now reached a thousand men, and we are told that it is not to be decreased. I believe the North-West is as peaceable a section of country as any other portion, and why you should have a thousand policemen, with officers, up there, I cannot well understand. Why we should have to pay well on to a million of money in order to maintain this force, when the necessity has so far disappeared, I cannot well understand. I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to give reasons for the statement he has made, because there is an impression abroad that the force at present is unnecessarily large.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is the first time I have heard any one mention that the force in the North-West is unnecessarily large. I must say that no one who knows the work that force is doing, no one who has lived amongst them, can doubt that the thousand men are all needed. They patrol the whole of the southern boundary from Manitoba to the Rocky Mountains. Every forty-eight hours the whole of the border is patrolled by them. Everyone that crosses the border is known, and they have been the means of stopping horse-stealing and smuggling along the border, which was being carried on most extensively, and was creating great trouble, not only amongst our Indians, but amongst the white people. Perhaps we might reduce the force a little if the House would agree to do away with the obnoxious prohibitory liquor law. A great number of these men are engaged in the service of preventing whiskey being brought across from Montana and from the southern counties into our North-West Territories, and they are also checking, as far as they can, whiskey being taken on the Canadian Pacific Railway into that country.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). We will help you abolish that.

Mr. DEWDNEY. You would be a very popula man in the North-West if you did that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman desires to abolish the restrictions on the sale of liquor in the North-West?

Mr. FOSTER. No, that is not the policy of the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I must say that I think it would be very unwise at the present time to attempt to cut down the strength of the force. It requires a large number of men to patrol that southern country, and there must be detachments kept at the posts in the North-West country. With regard to the expenditure, I have not at hand the cost of maintaining 500 men in 1884, but I think the remarks then made by the First Minister were correct. I think you will find by looking at the figures that the expense now is very much less than it was then, because coal is cheaper and meat is cheaper.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Have you got the cost of 500 men in 1884?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have for 1887.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There were 1,000 men then.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You have very little less now.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I want to compare the cost of the 1,000 men now with the cost of 500 in 1884.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The cost in 1884 was $770,000.

Mr. TROW. It is questionable whether 1,000 men are necessary, notwithstanding this statement of the hon. gentleman. A force of 1,000 men costing a $1,000 per head is a great expense to this country. The Minister states that there is a great deal of work for the force to do in connection with suppressing the smuggling of liquor in the North-West. So far as that is concerned, permits are continually given by the Lieutenant Governor, and the permit for five gallons of liquor will manufacture 500 gallons. If a party gets a permit the quantity is replaced again and again month after month, and if the liquor is intercepted the license is produced.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend is under a complete misapprehension in reference to this force, and also in reference to the permits issued by the Lieutenant Governor. Without giving the exact figures, I may say that the whole police force cost in 1884 over $1,000 a man, and at the present moment it costs less than $800 per man. The cost has, therefore, been reduced a good deal more than the ratio of reduction in regard to food and coal. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) says the price of coal has been greatly reduced in the territories. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken about that matter. In 1884 the cost was $14 per ton. In arguing as to the cost of the police one must not deal with the ought-to-be but with the fact. As a fact, soft coal is about $1 per ton cheaper than it was in 1884, hard coal is also about $1 cheaper; but coal is still high in the territories. We still pay $8 per ton for soft coal and $12.50 for hard coal. The hon. member for Huron spoke about the duties the force has to discharge as though their duties are diminishing. The late Prime Minister stated in 1884, as was quoted correctly by the hon. member for Huron, that these policemen were employed to prevent the stealing of horses. But the number of horses in the territory has increased certainly by about 400 per cent. since that year, and bands of horses are lifted in those territories at this moment, and a great loss would accrue, for those horses would be taken across the border but for the activity of the Mounted Police along the line. The chief reason why it is necessary to have a force of that size has not been brought out, although it has been alluded to by the hon. member for Huron. The hon. gentleman spoke of 1885, when we had a little war on our hands that cost us a large sum. He probably is not aware that the Indians to the south of the line in the United States, where they are very numerous, are in communication with our Indians, that they are very restless, and if we had not a sufficient force to overawe and watch the Indians south of the line, as well as those in our own territory, the chances are that we might have an Indian war on our hands at any time. To preserve the peace there and prevent an Indian war is a consummation devoutly to be wished, and I believe the Mounted Police do that effectually. If I saw any reason to reduce the force I would certainly advocate it, but at present there is no reason for a reduction. In a short time, two or three years, perhaps, as more population goes in and as our territory is more organized, then we may have to consider this question, but then what will happen? We will have vast territories to the north opened up; we will have Indians not now under treaty brought in; they will come into contact with civilization, and railways will be constructed, and navvies such as the Prime Minister spoke of in 1884 will have to be kept in order, and still it may possibly be necessary to have the police force at the full strength it is at present.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) does not hold out a very hopeful prospect in regard to the condition of things in the North-West. We have expended a very large sum of money in that country, and we hoped in time there would be some return by having others to assist us in contributing towards the revenue and towards the maintenance of that country. But the hon. gentleman says that is wholly illusory.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I did not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says that when the North-West Territories are occupied there will be a vast territory to the north to open up, railways to build, of course at the public expense, and the Indians must be kept in order by the maintenance of the existing police force; a paradisiacal prospect the hon. gentleman holds out as to the future to which this country must look forward. I take a more hopeful view of things at no distant period than is taken by the hon. gentleman. I am astonished to find the hon. gentleman advocating such pessimistic views. I thought he was an optimist and always took the most hopeful view of the situation; but that certainly is not the view the hon. gentleman has presented to the Committee this evening. From 1878 to 1885 we found 500 police a sufficient force, and for the five years preceding 1878, 300 police in the whole of the North-West Territories when the Indians were less civilized, and when they were more warlike than at present, were found sufficient to maintain peace throughout the North-West. When settlers went into that country, of course it was desirable that the Government should give them some assurance of protection and that protection was given by a small augmentation of the force that had previously existed in the territory. But the prospect held out to us by the Administration for many years was that when settlers went into that territory, that the more settlements became established and villages and towns sprang up a volunteer force might be organized and protection might be given in this manner at comparatively little cost to the community; and when ranches came to be established they would provide for themselves proper police protection. In fact that amount which otherwise would be paid in the shape of taxes for the maintenance of the Local Government would be paid by these men exercising their own police supervision and giving protection to their own property. The hon. gentleman suggested to us a condition of things to which we would not desire to look forward, and I hold it is desirable to maintain a large police force for the purpose of giving adequate protection to our population, to protect our property against thieves, or if I understood rightly the contention of the hon. gentleman it is this that there is a large population still to the south of the border committing most of the thefts.

Mr. DAVIN. A large population of Indians.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, but the hon. gentleman does not say that the Indians do the thieving altogether.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon. friend will allow me I spoke of the Indians south of the line as restless and of the danger of an Indian war.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman speaks of the danger of an Indian war, and of course that is another matter. It is another reason given for the maintenance of a large police force. Well, there are a large number of Indians in Oregon Territory and in British Columbia—on both sides of the border—and these Indians are quite as warlike as those east of the Rocky Mountains, and yet the hon. gentleman does not fear any demand on the part of the people on either side of the line for the maintenance of a large force as necessary for the purpose of preserving the peace. So far as the exclusion of intoxicants from the North-West Territories is concerned, all the complaints that have been made during the last two years have been rather against the Lieutenant Governor than against smugglers. The contention has been that the Lieutenant Governor has issued permits to anyone who asked for them, and that the sale of intoxicants is not in violation of the law and in consequence of the efforts of smugglers to introduce intoxicants across the boundary. It seems to me that the peace may be preserved, and property rendered secure, with proper vigilance on the part of those specially interested in the territories, and that a large reduction in the police force might take place. We all know under what circumstances the increase was made in that force. It was at a period of great disturbance and of a civil war in the North-West Territories; that war has long since ended, peace is restored, life and property are secure, and with moderate attention to the good government of the population, there is no likelihood that a second war will occur. I apprehend that the two lessons that have been given to the gentlemen on the Treasury benches are sufficient to prevent a third mistake of the same sort that occurred on two previous occasions.

Mr. McMULLEN. From the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) and other members of the House, including the Minister of the Interior, I think that a considerable amount of the expense of the Mounted Police should be charged to the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments. It appears to me that the Mounted Police have considerable work as preventive officers, in preventing liquors and goods of all kinds being smuggled into the country, and in that way they may render a very desirable service. If it is necessary to keep a preventive force of that kind, some of the expense should be charged to the Department of Customs.

Mr. FOSTER. That would not alter the amount to be paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the expense would be charged to the proper account. Our ranching grounds in the North-West Territories are rented to people who only pay about two cents an acre, and I do not think that we should pay a large amount at the expense of the country to guard the property of those who only pay us two cents an acre. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says that the number of horses has increased 400 per cent., and that is no doubt because there is such an amount of ground used for ranching purposes. It is not right that we should keep a Mounted Police Force to protect the property of private individuals; they should protect themselves.

Mr. TROW. The suggestion made by the last speaker would make no difference in the total amount. If the expenses of the police were subdivided, it would all have to be paid by the country in the end, and it would cause considerable more book-keeping. The system he advocates would entirely ruin us.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. BOWELL. The duties performed by the Mounted Police for the Customs Department are additional duties, they being given the authority vested in sub-collectors and preventive officers, while patrolling the frontier from the Rocky Mountains down to Manitoba. They get no extra pay for it, and it is simply additional duty imposed upon them while they are protecting the frontier from the smugglers, and raiders, and murderers, and horse thieves, who are constantly crossing the border from Montana and Northern Dakota. When I travelled through that country from the Manitoba boundary to the Rocky Mountains, as I did two years ago, I came to the conclusion that if there was any money expended to the advantage of the country, it was in maintaining the Mounted Police force. They are an admirable force, they patrol the country about twice a week from the Rocky Mountains to Deloraine in Manitoba, and sometimes down to Turtle Mountains, and I suggested then to the late First Minister who had the management of the force, that these patrols should be given all the power and authority of Customs officers in order to relieve the country from the expenditure which would necessarily follow of placing Customs officers all along the border. Knowing the extent of the country and the difficulties of preventing smuggling of all kinds, one can easily understand how absurd it would be to place a dozen Customs officers a hundred miles apart. The smugglers would not cross where the officers were stationed, therefore the officers would be obliged to have horses and conveyances to travel from one part to the other, which would entail great expense. I am sure that a moment's reflection will show to the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that the course pursued by the Government in this respect was the best that could possibly be pursued in the interests of peace and good order, and in the interest of economy in the administration of the Customs Department.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. As the Minister is speaking of economy in the Customs Department, I would ask him if it would not be proper to exercise economy in the service in the Province of Ontario as well as in other sections of the Dominion. I would bring to his attention, and to the attention of the Committee, the fact that for, I think, two years, one of the principle offices in the Customs Department was left vacant at the command of a gentleman who occupied a seat in this House. I would like to ask the Minister——

Mr. BOWELL. That item will come up in a few minutes and we will discuss it then.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it the intention of the Minister to keep the Mounted Police force up to its ordinary number? You say it is fifty or sixty below; do you intend to refill the ranks as these fellows drop off?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The force generally keeps at about that number. Unless you keep the force above the number it is impossible to keep it up to exactly 1,000 men. There is no particular pressure used to keep it up to the maximum number, but as a trooper comes along and there is a vacancy he is taken in.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Are supplies, such as coal, and coal oil, purchased by tender?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; there are tenders for all the supplies, I believe.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not propose to discuss the question just now, but I find in the Auditor General's Report that coal cost $15.50 per ton at Regina, and only $10 at Morden.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Is that for hard coal?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No; the hard coal is put down at $20 a ton at Regina.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think that is a mistake. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the explanation at present, but I am quite sure that hard coal does not cost more than $12.50 or $13 at Regina; it has been at that price there for the last seven years. However, I will make enquiry on that point.

Mr. MULOCK. The Mounted Police were originally organized for the purpose of preserving the peace. If it is neeessary to keep it up to a certain extent to protect the revenue, that portion of the cost of maintenance should be charged to the Customs Department.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That would be another argument for lowering the tariff to prevent smuggling. The force, I understand, is considerably engaged in overcoming the operations of the permits which, it is charged, are indiscriminately given for the sale of beer in the North-West.

Mr. WATSON. I find an item in the Auditor General's Report for 177 tons of coal for stove purposes, at $15.50 per ton. I think the reasons for this high price was given in this House some years ago. The further you go from the coal mines, the cheaper the coal becomes. This is because the Government have practically given the Galt Company a monopoly of the coal supply in the west. The price is regulated by the competition of the eastern coal. The result is that you can buy coal cheaper in Winnipeg that you can at Calgary.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is not Galt coal.

Mr. WATSON. If it is not Galt coal, and if we have good coal in the west, I think the Government should use western coal. It seems strange that the Government will purchase coal at $15 a ton when good coal should be got at Regina at one-half that price.

Expenses re survey Burrard Inlet, B.C. $2,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this? This amount will not cover the cost of surveying Burrard Inlet.

Mr. TUPPER. The hydrographic survey is not large. In consequence of the undercurrents there having, it is supposed, created obstructions at certain points, the original chart became exceedingly misleading. Arrangements were made with the British Admiralty for the correction of the survey by the Marine Department here, and $2,500 was Commander Boulton's approximate estimate of the cost. The portion to be surveyed was comparatively small.

To pay Wm. Gliddon for special services as expert in preparation of vouchers for arbitrators in case of McLean, Roger & Co. vs. the Queen..... $300

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Perhaps the Minister would give us some information as to the position that matter is in now?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is still in the Exchequer Court. It was originally commenced by arbitration, but there having been a disagreement upon the terms of the referee, it was sent to the Exchequer Court, which appointed as referees the two gentlemen originally selected as arbitrators, with Mr. Cassels as the third. I presume this vote is for the purpose of preparing the papers for them.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is this William Gliddon?

Mr. FOSTER. He is an accountant in the Department of Stationery. It was necessary in this arbitration that the Government should produce all its vouchers, showing all its transactions, and Mr. Gliddon was appointed to discover and produce them. This involved a greal deal of work. Mr Gliddon was the proper officer to do it. He did it all out of hours. He was paid at the rate of 50 cents an hour.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is his salary?

Mr. FOSTER. He is a first class clerk, I think.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was this work in connection with the duties of the office in which he is engaged?

Mr. FOSTER. It is in connection with the arbitration we have been speaking of.

Additional plant for Printing Bureau...$4,160

Mr. FOSTER. This is required to meet two payments not foreseen last year, the one being for an engine to run the dynamo for the electric light, and the other to provide tools for the repairing shop, in which minor repairs to machinery are made.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would it not be better to give up the practice of voting contingencies, and allow all these things to be settled by Governor General's warrant. I see all along the paper contingencies without number paid in that way.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Was the engine bought by tender or contract?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not aware.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it the case that the voters' lists are not being printed at the Bureau?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman has had the information before that they are to be printed here.

Mr. BARRON. Is the hon. Minister sure about that, because my information is that the voters' lists are to be printed now in the respective towns?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman's information is altogether incorrect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member for North Victoria refers to preliminary lists, which is a very small matter.

Amount required to reimburse Mr. J. I. Dufresne, D. L. S., for expenses incurred by him in consequence of the loss of one of his limbs while in the service of the Government—G. G. Warrant.....$1,258.33

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Dufresne has been in the service, off and on since 1883. In the fall of 1885, while in the service of the Government in the district of Prince Albert, he cut his foot badly, and in consequence of the great distance at which he was from medical aid, the accident resulted in the loss of one of his feet. He is incapacitated from working in the field, and he is now working in the survey branch. This amount is that presented to us by that gentleman as the cost of medical treatment, both in the North-West and after he came to Montreal or Quebec.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Government make a habit of paying surveyors when they get hurt? Was this contract work or day work?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am not quite sure, but I fancy it was contract work.

Mr. WATSON. It appears to me if a surveyor takes work by contract he takes all the risk, and I do not think it is right to vote money for any person who may get hurt while in the Government employ. No doubt this gentleman got fair pay for his work, and had to run his chance of meeting with accidents. My hon. friend beside me says he is a cousin of the hon. member for Assiniboia, but I doubt that as the name is not the same. If it were a case of day work, the case might be different.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not going to find fault with this item, because I hope the hon. Minister of the Interior will not forget my friend who lost his thumb.

Mr. DAVIN. I may say this gentleman is no cousin of mine. I have no relatives in Canada, and if I had, I would not use any influence to have them appointed.

Expenses of Litigation..... $20,750

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was necessary to institute proceedings in connection with questions arising in Behring Sea, and this sum was required for the purpose of carrying on that litigation. The case would have been argued but for the illness of one of the judges, and it now stands for argument early in October.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Did it require the whole of this amount to pay the charges so far in connection with the litigation then pending?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has not been fully expended yet, but the greater part has been; it is all intended for that service.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Of course, that item is not objectionable standing by itself. The Government are engaged in the litigation and must pay for it, but it does appear to me that the cost of litigation every year is very high. I find in the Auditor General's Report about $100,000 paid in law costs to various lawyers throughout the Dominion, and among the items we have passed this evening, many embrace costs of litigation, and I venture to say that, excluding the amount we are now asked to pass, the whole will amount to $125,000. It seems to me that is a very large sum to be expended on litigation. Looking at the report I find the amounts distributed unfairly. Some lawyers get from ten to a thousand dollars while others only get one or two dollars. The hon. Minister of Justice ought to mete out something like fair-play among his fellow professionals. I find that Borden, Ritchie & Co. got $2,178, while poor Mr. Boucher only got $5. Wallace Graham—whoever he is—got $9,751. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Justice knows something about him. Mr. James Grace only got $15. Kingsmill, Seymour & Co. got $1,000 and Mr. Martel only $5. J. A. Macdonell, whose bills we have before us every year, got $2,865. I wonder if this was Mr. Macdonell who was in this House at one time?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He had not a seat in the House, but he appeared at the bar.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Then I find W. J. McGill, $7.01. There is also D. O'Connor, who is or was the president of the Conservative Association in Ottawa, $10,619.30. The amount for legal expenses appears to be very large, and I think the cost of litigation should be cut down in view of the efficient staff which the Minister of Justice has in his department, and that it should not amount to $100,000 as appears in the Auditor General's Report, though I believe it really was more.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no doubt the amount for legal expenses will be reduced as soon as the large and important cases we now have on hand, such as the Pacific Railway claim and others, are disposed of, but the hon. gentleman is not quite correct in supposing that all these amounts are paid for fees to lawyers. They include disbursements by our solicitors in all parts of the country, and often costs which are taxed against the Government. For instance, when lands are expropriated for public works, and the finding is against the Government, the costs are taxed against the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Then there is something more than the ordinary disbursements of suit charged. In Mr. O'Connor's case, for instance, I should like to know if that covers more than the ordinary charges and disbursements?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That includes the disbursements.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose this $20,750 does not include the counsel fees in the case still to be argued?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It includes all the fees paid and likely to be paid.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is an estimate for the year past. If anything is intended to be paid in October next, it should not come here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have paid our counsel fees for the argument which took place in May, and for the occasion when counsel were ready to argue, and the books were printed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is not the greater part of this for compensation to foreign counsel and not to Canadian counsel?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Almost entirely.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Nearly the whole of it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I see an amount of $231.92 paid to A. R. Dickey,. Who is A. R. Dickey?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These are costs taxed against the Government in a suit which Mr. Dickey had against the Government

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who is A. R. Dickey?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume it is the hon. member for Cumberland. The initials are the same.

Mr. BARRON. In suits in which the Government retains counsel and employs solicitors, is there any means by which their bills are taxed by any taxing officer?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are taxed in my department by an officer according to a scale which has been fixed.

Mr. BARRON. The officer is not a taxing officer, is he?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, he taxes every bill.

Mr. BARRON. He is not a taxing officer in any court.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Support of Ontario and other lunatics, temporarily charged to District of Keewatin.....$ 3,196

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What does this mean?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is to pay the cost of lunatics from Keewatin who are placed in the penitentiary. We found that the amount required for this purpose had been increasing for the last year or two, and when the hon. the Minister of Justice was visiting Mr. Mowat last summer in reference to some other matters, I asked him to consult Mr. Mowat in order to see if he would pay us for the lunatics who came from what was the Disputed Territory, and is now part of Ontario. Mr. Mowat replied that Ontario took charge of lunatics from other parts of the country, and he would not do it, but he would leave it to arbitration and answer it when the other matters were finally considered. The Minister of Justice thought it would be unwise to leave the matter over as the Ontario Government are in the same position as ourselves, and might come down upon us for the support of lunatics from other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see how any charge could be made for lunatics from the District of Keewatin, because I do not think there are any settlers in that district at all except a few Indians. I suppose what is meant is the western portion of Ontario which was called the Disputed Territory.

Contingencies, N. W. T.....$1,600

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). That requires some explanation. The expenditures in connection with that department in the North-West are startling. In reading the report of the Auditor General, one is amazed at the charges made against the Government. I will reserve any observations I have to make on that subject till we reach the general Estimates, but I think this item of $1,600, in addition to the item for contingencies in the general account, requires some explanation if it can be given off hand. I am sure that the attention of the Minister of the Interior has not been called to many of the charges made against the Government in connection with the North-West Territories, or they would not be tolerated for a moment.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have not the explanations with regard to the main Estimates with me.

Mr. McMULLEN. Perhaps when we are discussing the main item of the Estimates the hon. gentleman will give some explanation of this item for contingencies.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this is a very objectionable way of making up the estimates for the North-West Territories. We have given to the people of the North-West Territories representative government. I understand they are asking for responsible administration, and although we may not be prepared to confer upon them at this moment the same extent of authority that is possessed by a province, it does seem to me that, whatever moneys are placed at their disposal for local purposes, ought to be granted for the Legislature of the North-West Territories to appropriate. Now, I understand that the method of appropriation is a vote by this House, as we have it before us at this instance, and that the money is put at the disposition of the Lieutenant Governor, and not under the control of the population there at all. Now, these people are contributors to the taxes, exactly the same as people in any other portion of the Dominion. They have representative institutions, they have a representative legislature, and why should we not grant them a lump sum, whatever it may be, and place it at their disposition, for their own purposes, and allow it to be distributed by them according to local necessities, and as the people may desire? They are upon the ground; they are better capable of saying how the moneys that are expended in the North-West Territories ought to be expended, than we are. I am perfectly willing that the administration shall take the opinion of the representatives of the North-West Territories on all appropriations that are being expended for Dominion purposes, those works that are under our exclusive control. But that is not the rule that is adopted. We are voting appropriations here for local works and undertakings; we are acting as much for them as if they had no Local Legislature or representative institutions at all. I think that is not a satisfactory way of administering affairs in the North-West, and I trust that at no future meeting of this Parliament will we have estimates of this sort submitted to us for local purposes.

For translating North-West Territories Gazette, 28 numbers at $10 each.....$280

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is there any check on this expenditure for translation? I hold in my hands a book the translation of which has been paid for, it seems to me, at an extraordinary price, when we compare it with the cost of translating the Debates in this House. I refer to the North-West Gazette. There is really only about 100 pages of print translated. I want to know if there is any check.

Mr. DEWDNEY. An arrangement was made by which Mr. Jules Royal was paid $10 a month for translating the Gazettes. They come out, I think, every week.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Twice a month. By whom was the arrangement made?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I presume by the Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who is the official who does the work?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. J. A. Royal, son of the Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. DAVIN. I think I can explain this. As a fact, we have not many French gentlemen in Regina who could attend to this. I doubt if there is anyone who could do it, except Mr. Jules Royal

Mr. Forget, who used to attend to this sort of thing, is in the Indian Department, and is unable to do it. I do not think the price is too high. I certainly would not do it for the amount that Mr. Jules Royal gets for doing it. I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that, instead of 119 pages, you have 211.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They are only half-pages.

Mr. DAVIN. But if you take the length and size of these pages you would find that they make very nearly a whole page. It is simply the printing of an ordinary sized book, and if you got that work done here in Ottawa, you would pay something like a dollar a page for it. Another thing I want to point out to you is something that is known, I think, in the office where this is printed —I think it is printed in an office in Regina.

Mr. MULOCK. The Regina Leader.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it is not; it is printed in an office where there are no French printers.

Mr. MULOCK. You don't know that.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I happen to know it.

Mr. MULOCK. You don't know what is printed at the Leader office.

Mr. DAVIN. This is printed at an office where there are no French printers, and Mr. Jules Royal does the revising as well as the translation, and I consider the amount that is paid there is a minimum sum for the work that is done.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. If he does the revising as well as the translation, this item ought to be amended so as to state that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice on every single occasion when an item is objected to with regard to expenditure in the North-West, these people are prepared to say that they work for almost half nothing. My hon. friend here has always defended the cost, no matter what it was, and says that the country is always getting full value.

Schools (Governor General's warrant, $14,993.04) $46,175 04

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the Minister upon what plan or rule the school appropriation is made. Is there a corresponding amount raised by general taxation? Is there any condition attached to that amount? Is it distributed amongst the schools according to average attendance, or is there any limitation for pupils as to the amount that is to be received?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is a school ordinance passed by the Local Legislature to whom we hand over the school money that is voted here in a lump sum, and the Legislature expends it under that school ordinance. That ordinance provides that the Government shall pay about 75 per cent. of the salaries, and the salaries are fixed in accordance with the ordinance at so much per month, according to the grade of the teacher. I think it is regulated also by the attendance, and there are some other conditions attached. The ordinance is very long and clear, and is a very good school ordinance, so far as it goes. We have only found this difficulty. That the Legislature have had all the say in reference to the fixing of the salary, and we have come to the conclusion that the salaries are too small in proportion to the salaries paid in other parts of the Dominion. We have drawn the attention of the Lieutenant Governor to that, and next year we anticipate that a change will be made. They are authorized by Order in Council to spend this money that we hand over to them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If I rightly understand the Minister, it would seem that the Local Legislature fixes the salary of the teachers in the school districts, and not the trustees.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The trustees fix them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it seems to me that we ought to vote a lump sum and not allow the local Legislature to say that we shall provide for 75 per cent. of the money required for the maintenance of the schools. I do not suppose in any of the provinces that 20 per cent. of what is called the Government grant is furnished towards the maintenance of the public schools of the country or anything like it. There is in the Province of Ontario, and I believe the same rule is adopted in some of the other provinces, a general taxation equal to the amount of the public grant, whatever it may be, but that county assessment and provincial appropriation taken together do not make more than 40 per cent. I do not know how much money is required to pay the teachers' salaries. Certainly if we are paying 75 per cent., it is a very large sum.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Government has come to the same conclusion as that to which the hon. gentleman has arrived. In the early days of the North-West we had to be very liberal in regard to the school vote. We have now come to the conclusion that we have been extra liberal, and we have called the attention of the local authorities to it.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not divided among the denominational schools of the North-West?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. What is the proportion given to the Catholic and Protestant denominations respectively. It would be interesting to know the amount paid to the separate schools.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have not the information here, but I will give it when the main Estimates are under consideration.

Mr. MULOCK. I ask the Government when are we going to have a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee? This item and other items should form the subject of investigation before that Committee. I will not say how many times we have met. It is absurd to create a committee to examine into accounts and practically never convene the Committee. The Committee was called for organization and sat five minutes. It was called another time——

Mr. FOSTER. And you were not ready.

Mr. MULOCK. We were ready. We moved motions for papers and they were carried, and after struggling for six weeks we got a meeting which lasted a short time. If we are supposed to have a committee to supervise the accounts of the year it should meet, and it is not a sufficient answer to say that there are other large committees to meet also. It is necessary that several committees should meet at the same time. I ask the Minister of Finance to call a meeting at the earliest possible day, as there is business to be brought before it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is very important that this Committee should meet, as there are several matters requiring to be investigated, or we may not have an opportunity to conduct a proper investigation into certain accounts which should be investigated in the public interest. There is a matter which I have in charge in regard to which I have not had an opportunity of bringing before the Committee. We should have frequent meetings of the Committee, as it is one of the most important, and its business must not be set aside because other important investigations are proceeding. I ask the Government to have a meeting called as soon as possible, and to have frequent meetings called during the session.

Mr. FOSTER. We will have a meeting called as soon as possible, and I hope the hon. gentlemen will be ready, because the last time we met they were not ready. We were there for business, and the business frittered out very quickly. I offered the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to have the Committee meet every day for a week if he wanted it, and it was at his own suggestion that the meetings were left off for a time. If he wants a meeting of the Committee, let him say when, and we will have a meeting called.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Finance is entirely in error in his account of what occurred at the meeting of the Committee in question. I was present at that meeting. It was called for an early hour, in order, if possible, to accomplish some business. An officer of the Government was directed to be present. He attended, and when I came to examine him he knew so little about the books and papers, and the subject for which he was brought there, that he could not give any information whatever. I asked the Minister of Finance to have a meeting called for an early day later, and he will remember that so far as regards the business in which I was concerned, the witness, Mr. Fuller, said it was useless to call a meeting next day as it would take several days to inform himself sufficiently to be examined. I asked how far ahead a meeting would suit him, and he said Thursday, the meeting of which I am speaking having been held on Monday. He said he would not be able to give evidence for the next two days, and the second day was a holiday and he asked that the meeting should not be called sooner than Thursday. He subsequently came to me in this Chamber, and told me he would not be prepared by Thursday to be examined. I wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee, stating that Mr. Fuller had told me he could not possibly be ready, and I said I would not raise any objection if a meeting was not held that week. Having made that remark to the chairman I would not have found fault if a meeting had not been held that week, but I did not expect there would be an interval of ten days. I hope the hon. Minister of Finance will take back what he said.

Mr. FOSTER. I think you corroborate it.

Mr. MULOCK. If so, the hon. gentleman has a very curious idea as to what I have said. The Minister of Finance is wholly in error, and is misrepresenting my position. I want the Minister of Finance to take back his statement.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not worth while.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting what took place at that meeting, and I will not allow it. Have I not described correctly what occurred at that meeting?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, fairly so.

Mr. MULOCK. I have explained what took place at that meeting, and that the postponement was because the officer was not prepared to give evidence, and did not know his business.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an allegation against an officer which should not be made, and the hon. gentleman should take it back.

Mr. MULOCK. If you will call a meeting, I will for what I have said.

Mr. FOSTER. When do you want it called.

Mr. MULOCK. On Saturday.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. What is the total amount expended on the maintenance of insane patients in Manitoba Penitentiary last year?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It will be about $12,000 for the year. For the first four months it was $3,827, and the number of inmates has not increased since then. I think the number is 25.

Mr. WATSON. What rate does the Government pay?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The average rate per day, 1887-88, was $1.02; for 1888-89, $1.01⅘ cents.

D. D. O'Meara, Surveyor in H. M's. Customs, Quebec, addition to salary as Acting Collector 1st July, 1883, to 1st March, 1891.....	$2,200 00
James Churchill, Clerk in H. M. Customs, Coaticook, addition to salary, as Acting Collector, 1st April, 1890, to 20th August, 1890...	100 00
Customs share (one-half) of cost of repair and maintenance of Government steam yacht Cruiser, during season of 1890.....	2,254 63
Refund and law costs, &c., as per judgment of the Exchequer Court, in the suit of the Vacuum Oil Company vs. Regina	5,331 11
James Douglas, Surveyor in H. M.'s Customs, Toronto, addition to his salary, as Acting Collector, 1st November, 1888, to 1st March, 1891	2,666 66

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say that Mr. D. D. O'Meara is not entitled to this sum, but I am prepared to say that this item, and also the concluding item, point to a very gross abuse of their duty on the part of the Government. We find here that for a period of two years and eight months that office was left unfilled. Now, Sir, I say that the Government had no right whatever to keep that office unfilled, and I say they kept it unfilled simply and solely for the purpose of acting as a bribe for some particular political friends whom they desired to serve. That was still worse in the case of the collectorship of Customs at Toronto, where for fully two years and a quarter this office was left vacant, as is perfectly well known, for the convenience of an hon. gentleman then a member of this House. I say that in the latter case in particular it was a direct violation of the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act; but in any case, I say that keeping offices of this kind vacant for a period of nearly three years as was done in the case of the collectorship at Quebec is utterly at variance with all good government, and is a thing which ought never to have been allowed to be practised by this House. I think that the Minister of Customs is bound to state why it was, that for a period of nearly three years, these offices were not filled. There are many objections to it, and not the least in my opinion is, that officers of the department are naturally very considerably discouraged if they find that these offices are not given to those who have served the public, but are kept entirely as a reward for political services.

Mr. BOWELL. I frankly confess that in the main I think the hon. gentleman is correct so far as the filling of these offices is concerned, but it is a practice which has prevailed in the past by previous governments and I have no doubt will continue to prevail in the future. The practice has not been confined to the Dominion Government, as my hon. friend well knows: circumstances sometimes arise with our Local Governments where registrars and sheriffs and other offices are kept open—not, I hope, for the purpose that has been intimated and suggested by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—although, so far as the filling of these offices is concerned, in the Province of Ontario the law provides that they shall be filled forthwith. I think that the Attorney General of that province has decided that "forthwith" means in cases where it was found convenient, but, at all events, they have acted on that principle for a long time past. I do not say that because they did wrong we should follow in their wake, but the hon. gentleman knows very well that sometimes circumstances will arise in the conducting of a government, under which it is not convenient to fill these offices. I know for no reason, other than personal reasons and not political reasons, why the Quebec office was kept open.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps you could not get anyone to fill it.

Mr. BOWELL. I believe that is generally a difficulty not particularly in the Province of Quebec. It is with the greatest difficulty in the world, as my hon. friend suggests, that the people can be found to sacrifice themselves in the interests of the public service when the salary is small. I may say further that there is one justification at least for all this, and that is, that something was saved to the revenue, and more particularly in the case of Toronto where the collector's salary was $4,000 per annum.

Mr. McMULLEN. That was a small matter.

Mr. FOSTER. That is borrowed; that is Mr. Blake's.

Mr. BOWELL. Never mind, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is quite correct in repeating a good thing, a pun is always good no matter whence it comes, and it is charming, delightful, and refreshing on this side of the House, to have a pun emanate from that gentleman, because it is not very often that he says a pleasant thing; he is generally of the vinegar character, and when he smiles and perpetrates a pun, even though it is borrowed, he has not only my sympathy but my congratulation.

Mr. McMULLEN. A "bun" would be better sometimes than a pun.

Mr. BOWELL. I hope the hon. gentleman does not object to that. I may be wrong if I agree with him even once, and if I am I will try not to do it again.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are getting facetious.

Mr. BOWELL. I think we have been all indulging in that a little, and if I have I hope it is pleasant to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the "customs," I suppose.

Mr. BOWELL. I think that pun is better than the other one; try it again. Now, speaking seriously, the principle upon which these allowances are made, as in the cases of Mr. Douglas and Mr. Churchill, is to give one-half the difference between their respective salaries and those of the collectors, whose duties they performed until their successors were appointed. That is the principle that was adopted by the House in 1888 in the case of Mr. Surveyor Mackenzie, of Hamilton, and I am glad that my hon. friend from South Oxford does not object to the amounts which we propose to pay. When he considers the saving of revenue, he will, I am sure, forgive the other lapse of duty, if I may so call it, in not filling the offices. We will try in the future to fill them as fast as they become vacant. In reference to the item in the case of the Vacuum Oil Company vs. Regina, I may say that that was a suit arising from what I should call a misapprehension as to the meaning of the law in imposing the duty upon what was believed to be the value of the oil in the principal markets of the United States whence it was exported and imported into this country. However, the judge of the Exchequer Court decided that we were wrong, and the appropriation of $5,331.11 is to refund the duty collected in excess of the amount which should have been collected, and costs.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then we are to understand that the Minister of Customs pleads guilty to the charge that he is not justified in allowing these offices to remain vacant so long as he did, not only in the case of the collector at Quebec, but also in the case of the collector at Toronto. The collector at Toronto was not appointed for two years and four months after the decease of the former collector, and if the duties of the office can be discharged by the acting collector for two years and four months, so efficiently as to secure the commendation of the Government, what necessity is there for appointing another man at a salary of $4,000 a year to discharge duties which have been so well discharged by the acting collector at a much less salary? If this saving can be effected by the Government in the administration of the Customs Department, I think it is the duty of the Minister of Customs who is so very economical in all his expenditures to refrain from appointing these men who are so unnecessary. If the acting collector at Toronto could discharge his duties as well as a collector, and at a much less expense, why not continue him, instead of appointing a collector? I think the hon. Minister of Customs has acknowledged that he committed an error in allowing these positions to remain vacant so long, and he excuses himself by saying that the Government of Ontario has been guilty of similar conduct. I do not think that is an excuse for a man who professes to stand so high in the estimation of the people of this country as the Minister of Customs. I think he occupies a more exalted position than do the members of the Government of Ontario, and should be above following the example which he says they set; he he should set a good example to them. Every person in this country knows that the vacancy in the Toronto Custom-house was allowed to remain open so long for the purpose of supplying a soft place for Mr. Small, after he had ceased to serve his party in this House as one of the representatives of that city, and for no other purpose. It was reported in the newspapers of both parties that Mr. Small was to get this position, and he got it when it suited the convenience of the Government and the hon. Minister of Customs. I have been accustomed hitherto of saying flattering things of the hon. Minister; I believe his department is well administered as a rule; but in this case he has transgressed in a way that he cannot justify.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think there is a position vacant in the Windsor Custom-house. I see no appropriation for re-imbursing the man who is there acting as collector of Customs. I would like to know if anything is to be put in the Estimates for that purpose?

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Customs what he meant when he referred to the number of applicants in the Province of Quebec. If there is one quality the hon. gentleman possesses above another, it is that of being perfectly candid, and if in this instance he gives a candid answer, he will say that there are as many office-seekers in the Province of Ontario as in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that I said that there were a number of applicants for the office. The hon. gentleman I think is quite correct in the last statement he made. The population of Ontario is much larger than that of Quebec, and I fancy that the same sentiment pervades most of the population, that if they could get an office they could fill, and in some cases that they could not fill, they are quite as ready to take it as the people of Quebec.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am quite satisfied with the answer of the hon. gentleman. I understood him to say that the office was not filled because there was no applicant, and I also understood him to remark that there were a great number of applicants in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman reflects a moment, I think he will see that he is a little over-sensitive. I did not refer to that matter at all. It was one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who said that he supposed the reason the office was not filled, was because nobody could be got to fill it, and I facetiously said that there were plenty of applicants, I supposed.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am perfectly satisfied with the explanation given. I may be a little over-sensitive when the Province of Quebec is attacked, and I am quite certain that that feeling will not desert me.

Mr. LANDERKIN, I understood the hon. Minister of Customs to say that they could always find plenty of applicants, especially in Quebec. I would like to know what his colleague the Minister of War says about it. I know it was stated some time ago that the hon. Minister of Customs had eradicated every officer in his department who spoke the dual language. Perhaps the hon. Minister will say whether that is correct.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend quite mistook what the Minister of Customs said. Instead of saying that in Quebec there would be a great many applicants, he said it was well known under the circumstances that there would be very few.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have not read the items, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The discussion has been going upon all the items.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I beg to call your attention to the fact that we are allowing these items to go through with very unusual rapidity. Until the present moment every item has been read through, and I insist that that shall continue to be done, or no further items will be taken to-night.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think that threat comes with a very good grace from the hon. gentleman. If we are to have the rules adhered to, let it be so understood. Then in future we will discuss each item separately, and not discuss them all, and then pass but one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have had all these items read regularly and I insist on that being done.

Mr. BOWELL. The rule is to discuss each item on its merits or demerits, as the case may be. The Chairman is justified in supposing that the general item, in which these four amounts is included, is passed because each one of them had been discussed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By no means. The only one discussed at all was D. D. O'Meara's.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. Minister of Customs has failed to answer the question I put him. I said it was rumoured that he had removed all the French civil servants from his department. Is that true?

Mr. BOWELL. Like a great many other Grit reports, it is a falsehood.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Tell us the number you have.

Mr. BOWELL. Precisely the same number in the department as there was when I entered.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You have not killed any of them off yet?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not one.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am ready to read every item, but hon. members sometimes ask that the whole vote be passed without reading the items. If we read item by item, every hon. member will have to speak on the item alone for which a vote is asked We have had a discussion upon the item with reference to Mr. O'Meara, and upon that relating to Mr. Douglas, which is the last item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are entirely in error, Sir, about that. It is quite true that the hon. Minister of Customs alluded to Mr. Churchill, but nothing was discussed except Mr. O'Meara. Necessarily some allusion was made to the pactice of keeping these Customs positions vacant for several years, and in connection with and as an illustration of that, some reference was made to the appointment of the collector at Toronto having been held over for two years and a half. But, as a matter of fact, the only item we discussed was that relating to Mr. O'Meara.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The practice has been to read each particular item of the vote included in the bracket, but at the same time it was open to hon. members to discuss any item included in the bracket, and I think there is a very great deal of convenience in that way. When my hon. friend from South Oxford referred to the vacancy in the Custom-house at Quebec, I think my hon. friend from Brant alluded to the vacancy in the Custom-house at Toronto, and the hon. member for Kent to the vacancy in the Custom-house at Windsor. That was all for the purpose of discussing the principle of keeping these offices open for an indefinite period of time, and I do not understand that that was disposing of the items here bracketed, because the vacancy in Toronto is not referred to here nor the vacancy in the Custom house at Windsor. They were merely referred to for the purpose of illustrating the objectionable character of the practice of keeping important public offices open for an indefinite period. I think it would be well to adhere to the rule that the Chairman should read each particular item, and the Committee be free to discuss any general principle involved in all the items bracketed. I have been watching some of these items with a view of saying something, if I thought proper, when they were reached, but when you, Sir, declare the whole lot carried, you may cut off some member who may have something to say on some particular item, without interfering with the general discussion of some principle involved.

Mr. BOWELL. If we only carry out the suggestion of the Chairman and adhere strictly to the rule, by confining our discussion to the item itself, and not discuss the whole of them, we will save time, because if we discuss all the whole vote, when each item is called, then when we come to the next item we shall have the whole discussion over again. I do not think it is at all dignified that we should contradict each other in the manner we are doing point blank. When the notes of the reporter are read in reference to this question, it will be found that the first member who departed from the rule now enforced is the hon. member for South Oxford. So far as my memory serves me, he commenced a most violent attack—or perhaps the word "objectionable" would be more suitable—on the course taken by the Government with reference to the Toronto collectorship.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I did was perfectly correct. I objected entirely, as I always have, to this vicious practice of keeping an office open for political purposes. It has been done constantly by the Administration of which the hon. gentleman is and was a member, and nothing can be more derogatory to the independence of Parliament than to hold offices vacant for the purpose of bribing political supporters.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. On which item are you speaking ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. D. D. O'Meara, surveyor to Her Majesty's Customs. These offices are kept vacant for a long time for the purpose of bribing political supporters, and that practice became doubly vicious when, as in the case of another item which I used for the purpose of illustration, it was notorious that a member of Parliament sat in this House for years who had the promise of one of these Government appointments in his pocket. That was doubly disgraceful, doubly injurious to the public service, and detrimental to the independence of Parliament. That illustration was properly made in the discussion of the allowance to Mr. O'Meara.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking to the point of procedure, it is quite impossible to confine discussion in Committee of Supply within hard and fast lines. The discussion to-night has taken no more latitude than has always been allowed. These items, which are bracketed together, are one item for the purpose of discussion, but it has been the invariable practice to read each sub-item separately before the whole vote is passed. That latitude of discussion must be allowed now, as in the past.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am willing to do anything I can to please everybody and expedite business, but I find it pretty hard to do so. The hon. gentleman who spoke last has said that I was wrong in desiring to read this item by item, but my impression was that, as I find in a book before me here, this was one vote of $12,552.40. I wanted to read the whole thing, and let hon. gentlemen see the whole. But if we proceed, item by item, I think the law is clear, and I will read it, so that hon. members may understand it. Hon. gentlemen do know it, but, unfortunately, those who know it the best are those who transgress it the most.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am in order, and I am here to maintain order.—

"As in other committees, each resolution must be proposed and discussed as a distinct question, and when it has been formally carried no reference can again be made thereto."

Some hon. gentlemen referred to it again and again.—

"Neither is it regular to discuss any resolution before it has been formally proposed from the Chair."

Here is a question about Mr. Douglas from Toronto, which has not been proposed from the Chair, and yet it has been discussed.—

"Each vote or resolution is necessarily a question in itself to be proposed, amended and put as any motion or Bill in the House. Sometimes there are a number of items in a vote or resolution."

Like this one.—

"And then these may be generally discussed as forming part of a single question. Each item may then, if the Committee think proper, be taken up as a distinct question, and so discussed and amended. The debate in such a case must be confined to the item, and when it has been disposed of no reference can again be made to it when the subsequent items are under consideration.'

If we follow that rule, we will not go astray.

Mr. CASEY. Who made that rule ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. These are the rules laid down by a man who has carefully considered the rules of Parliament and who is looked upon as an authority on this subject, that is Dr. Bourinot.

Mr. CASEY. The rule of this House is the invariable custon of this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have many times suggested to the Minister of Finance, as I do now, that I think it would be for his convenience in future not to adopt in the Supplementary Estimates the practice of massing as we find it here, but to divide these items. I think it would be for his convenience in the future to have these placed as separate items in the Supplementary Estimates so that each might be discussed in detail and this kind of bickering would be avoided.

Mr. FOSTER. I have largely done that this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is true, but I think it would be better to do a little more in regard to the Supplementary Estimates. It is impossible to discuss these, particularly when a principle is involved, without making some reference to other items, but our practice, I think, has always been since this concern commenced to read each separate item.

Customs share (one-half) of repairs and maintenance of Government steam yacht Cruiser during the season 1890..... $2,254.63

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who pays the other half?

Mr. FOSTER. The Fisheries Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this is the yacht that used to belong to Mr. Gilmour. It is a very good little craft for Mr. Gilmour, but I do not think it is fitted for the purpose intended. I think it is a vessel of light draught, about 4 or 5 feet, and that it is very much more adapted for the purposes of a pleasure yacht than for any practical work in the upper lakes.

Mr. FOSTER. It is discarded now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then what on earth was the use of purchasing a vessel that you have to dispose of within two or three years?

Mr. FOSTER. We got her very cheap.

Mr. TUPPER. The amount we paid for her was either $5,000 or $6,000. As the hon. gentleman says, the experience was that she was not adapted to the rough waters of the Georgian Bay, where the fishing tugs can scarcely keep out. It has therefore been decided to dispose of her, and she is to be taken at her cost of $5,000 for the purchase and over $4,000 for repairs, on account in the purchase of the vessel which is to take her place.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the other's price?

Mr. TUPPER. I think about $30,000.

Mr. MULOCK. Who is building her?

Mr. TUPPER. Coulson, of Owen Sound.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When was the contract let?

Mr. TUPPER. I think it was on the 18th March, in this year, and the vessel is almost completed.

Refund, law costs, &c., in the suit of the Vacuum Oil Company vs. Regina..... $5,331.11

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances connected with this?

Mr. BOWELL. I explained that the other day, but I will repeat it. As we interpret the law, we hold that the ad valorem duty is to be levied on the price at which the article is sold in the place where it is purchased, provided that be the principal market in which it is sold whence it is exported to this country. This company took exception to that interpretation of the law, contending that we should not have adopted as a value for duty the price for which similar oils were sold in the markets of the United States. The Court of Exchequer decided that both these objections were well taken. I do not desire to discuss the grounds of that decision, nor to criticize that decision, but the interpretation of the department was that we should exact a duty upon a higher price than that placed upon it when exported from the United States to Canada. I propose, however, at the next session of Parliament, if we are here, to ask the House to change the law in that as well as in other respects, so as to avoid misunderstandings and difficulties in the future.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it would be regular at this moment to discuss the Toronto appointment. The hon. Minister has already, in the discussion of the first item, referred to the offices in Ontario that have been left vacant by the Government of that province, and he has stated that he is doing nothing more than following their example.

Mr. BOWELL. I said nothing of the kind. I did not say I was following their example.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman say they were following his example?

Mr. BOWELL. I merely called attention to the practice in the different provinces.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and the hon. gentleman called attention to the practice for a purpose, and that purpose was in extenuation of his leaving this office vacant. I do not know what the hon. gentleman calls that, but I would call it following an example, and since he refers to that as a precedent, I think the hon. gentleman cannot call my statement a misrepresentation. But there is a marked difference between the cases to which he has referred, and the case of the Toronto vacancy. The Toronto office was kept open for the purpose of affording a place for a gentleman who was during the whole period that it was kept open, a member of this House. Now, there could not well be a more palpable and more flagrant violation of the Independence of Parliament Act than that particular case exhibits. What was the object of keeping the place open? Mr. Small sat in this House; there are many in this House who know Mr. Small, and who, perhaps, think the office was too big for the officer. However, that may be, he was a member of this House and a supporter of the Administration. Mr. Small accepted the office, and the Government intended that he should receive it. It was a matter of common rumour, it was known on this side of the House. I want to know whether Mr. Small did not sit here in violation of the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act. Was he not exactly in the position of one who had been appointed to an office? Was he any less disqualified from sitting in the House, from the fact that the office was a prospective one so far as he was concerned? Why, Sir, after the passage of the Independence of Parliament Act in England, Mr. Fox's Bill, a gentleman, a member of the House of Commons, was asked to accept the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He gave his consent, but in the meantime the King became insane before he could accept the appointment, and it was held that his seat in Parliament had become vacant because, from the very moment that he gave his assent to the acceptance of that office, he could no longer sit in Parliament without violating the principle of the Independence of Parliament Act; and the fact that the King did not recover made it impossible that he could be appointed, and the party who held office continued in office, and the party who had agreed to accept it was compelled to go back and seek election at the hands of his constituents. Now, Mr. Small was here expecting an appointment from the Administration, and the Administration expected the support of Mr. Small. I say that Mr. Small was at the time being a paid employé of the Administration, and therefore was disqualified from continuing to sit in this House. He was as much dependent upon the Administration as if he had already been sworn into office, and it was a most flagrant violation of the Act relating to the independence of Parliament to keep that office open for the purpose of filling it at the close of Parliament by a gentleman who was then a member of the House. It was as much so as if the hon. gentleman had already taken office at the hands of the Administration. Now, I say that there must have been an understanding, and Mr. Small must have agreed to accept that office. The Government must have communicated to Mr. Small that it was their intention to offer him that office; and so both on the part of the Administration and on the part of Mr. Small, the Act relating to the independence of Parliament was violated in that particular matter. Now, we have this item in the estimates asking for $2,666 to compensate some other party for the discharge of the duties of the office that Mr. Small received and that Mr. Small, it was known, was to receive, at the hands of the Administration. Now, it may be an improper thing that an office should not be promptly filled. It seems to me that it is a great responsibility for any Administration to assume, whether it is Dominion or Provincial, to continue to keep an office vacant for a long period of time. But there is something more than that in the case of the Toronto vacancy, because it is a case in which a member of this House was morally disqualified for the discharge of his duties as an independent representative of the people, by the promise that must have been made to him, and by the course that the Government pursued towards him under the circumstances.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice that Mr. Small was duly grateful for the pledges that were given to him in reference to this. A couple of days after the general election he wrote a poem, which I will read.

Mr. BOWELL. Who wrote the poem?

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is signed "John Small, ex-M.P." He seemed to be duly grateful, he seemed to understand that it was a union of hearts and of hands that had brought him into the office that gave him the salary which he is now receiving. This is the way he expressed his gratitude:

"A union of hearts,
A union of hands,
A union that none can sever;
A union of lakes,
A union of lands,
A Canadian union for ever."

That was the idea of a patriot who had secured the office, having been retained in the House as a placeman during the last Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. FRASER. I understood the Minister of Customs to say that the methods that he did not attempt to defend prevailed in all the provinces. I want to say distinctly, as an ex-member of that Government in one of the smaller provinces, the no such practice prevails in the Province of Nova Scotia. I say this in order that the Minister of Customs may not shield himself at least behind that province. When an office becomes vacant we make the appointment at once; that was the practice of our predecessors as well as of ourselves.

Mr. BOWELL. Are you sure I said in all the provinces?

Mr. FRASER I understood so.

Mr. BOWELL. If I did, I will withdraw it with reference to Nova Scotia.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that the Government of Ontario supply a precedent for the action of this Government in reference to the appointment in Toronto. The Ontario Legislature does not, I think, supply a precedent such as has occurred, that of promising an office to a member of the House and the member sitting in the House for a long period afterwards.

Mr. WALLACE (York). Mr. Badgerow, of East York, is an example.

Mr. MULOCK. Is the hon. gentlemen aware that he had a pledge?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Just as much as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows that Mr. Small had a pledge.

Mr. MULOCK. If so, it was a bad precedent.

Mr. MASSON. What about the sheriff of Ontario?

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Paxton was not appointed sheriff while he was in the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not wish to detract from the loyal utterances of the Commissioner of Customs of Toronto on the day after the election. I have been informed that he read a Yankee poem. I do not know that the fact that he read a Yankee poem entitled him to a place in Her Majesty's Customs. It is said there is an annexation feeling spreading in the Government ranks, and whether this appointment was made in obedience to this growing sentiment I do not know.

Excise $4,171

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain the item of $3,500 further required for contingencies?

Mr. FOSTER. The vote for contingencies taken last year was $70,000, of which about $20,000 was estimated to be required for stamping tobacco and cigars, leaving $50,000 for Excise contingencies proper. The Excise and Customs stamps for 1889-90 cost $22,640, and as the tobacco and cigar revenue has slightly increased during the first half of 1890-91, it is estimated that at least $22,500 will be required on this behalf. This will account for a considerable portion of the increased vote. In addition to this, the growing demands of the service rendered it necessary to engage in the leading centres temporary employés, who have since been replaced by permanent officers or by the return to duty of 3 or 4 officers who were on lengthened leave of absence on account of illness. It is hoped that this source of expenditure having been removed, or rather having been placed in the Estimates for next year under the proper sub-head,—that is "salaries of officers," which item has been correspondingly increased, the expenditure under the head of Excise contingencies for 1891-92 may be kept within the reduced estimate, namely, $65,000, including the stamping of tobacco and cigars.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Are the stamps printed by the Bank Note Company, and if so, when does the contract expire?

Mr. FOSTER. In October next.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it the intention of the Government then to invite tenders for the work?

Mr. FOSTER. The question is under consideration of the Government. I think tenders will be called for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen opposite should make up their minds, and tell us what they intend to do. There was a long unpleasant discussion with respect to this matter three or four years ago, and at that time an understanding was arrived at that in future tenders would be invited for this work and due notice given. If there is any intention to depart from the resolution, I will not say the pledge given, intimation should be given to the House before it rises.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give an intimation to the House before it rises. With respect to $576 commission to Customs officers, Customs officers have to be employed on a commission of 5 per cent. to collect the Excise duties where Excise bonding warehouses have been granted in places in which not sufficient business is done to warrant the stationing of a permanent officer of the Inland Revenue staff. The requirements in this way have exceeded an estimate made last year, which was $3,500.

Cullers' salaries..... $1,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had hoped they were to be reduced and not increased.

Mr. FOSTER. There was a mistake in the Estimates, the amount being $1,000 short.

Weights and Measures, contingencies.. $1,000

Mr. FOSTER. Two officers have had to have their places supplied by temporary employés, during their temporary illness, for a somewhat lengthened period. This will probably require about $600. The additional amount, namely, $400, is to provide for the payment of six months' allowance to Mr. Miall as Commissioner of Standards, withheld during the last half of 1889-90, during which year, owing to the non-payment of this and other items, this vote was under-expended to the extent of some $500 to $600.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the total cost of carrying out the Weights and Measures Act now?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Public Accounts he will see the total cost. I propose to reduce this amount to $600.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then you ask the Governor General to sign a warrant, and you throw it back in his face.

Mr. FOSTER. He will not object.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand the Governor General's warrant was issued for $1,000. It included a small sum that was not urgent, and therefore was not warranted by the Audit Act. On what principle did the Minister make the report on which the warrant was issued? Is that the principle on which warrants are issued now?

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is no inconsistency in that. It may have appeared to the Minister at the time that this was necessary, and he so made his report. The Minister of Finance has nothing to do with that except to certify that there was no appropriation for it voted by Parliament. It was found out afterwards that the necessity did not exist, and we did not spend the money. Surely my hon. friend need not grumble at that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That hardly covers the objection of my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock). There is a very strict definition of the purposes for which alone a Governor General's warrant can issue, and it does appear there was an abuse of it in proposing to pay a sum of money to Mr. Miall, an officer in the receipt of a very tolerable salary in the department. It is one of these things which ought never have been done. I cannot see, for the life of me, how it can be defended under the Audit Act, to make a proposition to use a Governor General's warrant to pay $400 to Mr. Miall.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is struck out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know, and it is quite right it should be struck out, but it was very wrong that a Governor General's warrant should be asked for such a purpose. The sum is small, but the principle is one of very great moment. We, on this side of the House, have found occasion, time and again, to object to the use made of Governor General's warrants, and this undoubtedly is a case in which I cannot conceive how any Minister could, by any possibility, defend, under the terms of the Audit Act, the action which has been taken. As the Minister of Inland Revenue is not here, I should like to know from the Minister of Justice or from the Minister of Finance how such a thing can be presumed to be within the four corners of the Act. It appears to me that this is the very last thing that should be paid by a Governor General's warrant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In this case two persons are receiving $300 each out of this contingency appropriation, because the two other persons were unable to discharge their duties. I would like to know from the Minister of Finance whether those two gentlemen who could not discharge their duties were not out in an election expedition, and whether this money is not really to pay persons for canvassing during the election.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must admit in his cooler moments that that insinuation does not tally with his ordinary fairness. He should not suppose a thing of that kind. The two officers were seriously ill, and these two gentlemen were appointed to do their work while they were ill. This $600 is for the payment of those two officers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And they were not away during the elections?

Mr. FOSTER. I should not judge so. I would have to be very suspicious indeed to enable me to think so.

Mr. DEVLIN. Perhaps we would be able to get the names of these two officials.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know of one of those cases personally, because I had to do with him professionally. I refer to the case of Mr. Macdonald, of the Hamilton division, who was ill from cancer, and who died before the election.

Mr. WALLACE. I know that one of these sick inspectors was Mr. Kinnee who has since died.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the question of Governor General's warrants I do not think there is any difference of opinion between us as to the restrictions imposed upon them. As the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) read to us the other evening, they are to be used only in cases of urgency, unforeseen cases, and cases in which the money is immediately required. The list of warrants this year is unusually large because Parliament met very late, and at that time of the year when most of those warrants were drawn the moneys were for what in an ordinary year would have been voted in these Supplementary Estimates for the current year. The service was required to be provided for in that way to an unusual extent in consequence of our not having Supplementary Estimates for the current year. As regards this particular $1,000; the case fully comes within the statute as regards $600 of it, and the other $400 must have been passed through an oversight. I was not aware of it myself until it came to be explained here. The $400 has not been paid.

Mr. MULOCK. I am quite satisfied with the explanation which the Minister has given. I think it is satisfactory to have the Government really live up to the Act. It is not the $400 that we are discussing but the abuse of the Act. Of course it is possible to make a mistake, and this appears to have been done by mistake.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The point I had in my mind with regard to the $400 being included in the Governor General's warrant, is that I do not see how it could escape being paid out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has not been paid out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). From what the Minister says, that the recommendation did not pass Council the question would then arise, how came it to be included in the warrant?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was an application before the Council to pay this $400, and in view of the fact that it could not be voted in time, it would seem to have been included improperly under one of these warrants.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the warrant would be subsequent to the recommendation by Council.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It ought to have been.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was done in a moment of weakness.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it was a moment of too great strength on the part of some one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A very curious thing about these Governor General's warrants is the fact, which my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) has alluded to before, that you take warrants for urgent expenditure required to be immediately carried out, apparently to the amount of $1,310,000, and of that sum it would seem you have expended only $750,000. There must have been some grave oversight when the Governor General was made to sign warrants for the purposes of urgency for nearly double the amount actually expended.

Mr. FOSTER. The amount expended at that time was the amount expended when the report was brought down to the House. We have not been able to get money from that time up to this, and the amount given there is not the amount expended up to this present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the Governor General's warrant is only intended to meet cases when Parliament is not sitting. That is the special object of it. The Government can, when Parliament meets, on a requisition of urgency, obtain a reasonable vote if they make out a sufficiently strong case. This $750,000 expended went down to the date when Parliament had assembled.

Mr. FOSTER. We have no authority given us for any expenditure yet under these Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that, but you might have got authority from Parliament.

Murray Canal staff..... $3,000

Mr. MULOCK. Is this not included in the main Estimates?

Mr. BOWELL. I am informed not. Of course the hon. gentleman is aware, I suppose, that the Murray Canal has only been opened for traffic a short time. Experience showed that it was necessary to have a larger staff than was contemplated at the time of the main appropriation, because a great many more vessels passed through the canal than was anticipated. It was necessary to have men at night to take charge of the lights, as well as during the day.

Williamsburg Canal staff.....$1,000

Mr. MULOCK. Does the same explanation apply to this?

Mr. BOWELL. This is required to meet the payment of extra men employed on the locks on account of the work of construction being carried on.

To pay expenses for negotiating a settlement of outstanding balances of hydraulic rents at the Chaudière,.....$3,009.38

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whom does this go to?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is in settlement of law expenses, and so forth, arising out of claims in connection with the Chaudière rents. Suits were commenced against all the proprietors of the Chaudière lands for arrears of rent, in compliance with instructions from the Committee of Public Accounts. Negotiations were entered into for a settlement, which resulted in the adjustment of new leases and the payment of upwards of $63,000 of arrears. The solicitors, Messrs. O'Connor & Hogg, who conducted the matter, had an engagement in writing with the department for the collection of rents, which entitled them to 10 per cent. The agreement had been entered into some years ago, with the view of collecting small sums. This amount was to cover the costs of suits as well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are the rents paid at the Chaudière fixed according to the horse power?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the rent is not now paid according to the power of the respective mills. The leases contain a great many conditions, which I do not now remember; but I think the rent is so much for each lot, with a restriction as to the power to be used.

Mr. MULOCK. What was the face amount of the claims originally?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We did not throw off any substantial amount. The claims were paid in full. The principal difficulty was in getting a settlement of new conditions.

Mr. MULOCK. Has that agreement been rescinded?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, it has not. It applies still, I presume, to the small amounts collected. I am referring now to the Inland Revenue Department.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be prudent to put an end to the agreement, so that in future if such services are required, the agreement will be made applicable to the particular transaction.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There never can be again for many years, at any rate, so large an amount as this put in their hands for collection.

Militia expenses in connection with the rebellion in the N.W. Territories..	$8,017
Pension—J. Franckum, late Gunner "A" Battery, pension from 19th July, 1890, to 30th June, 1891, at 30 cents per diem.....	104.10

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This is for militia pensions on active service. Franckum was discharged from "A" Battery on pension the 19th of July, 1890, at 30 cents per diem. The Order in Council was passed the 27th June, 1890. Franckum entered in July, 1881. By a rifle bullet striking him above the ear, while marking at the rifle butts for his battery, he became injured. He had to pass the medical board and was so severely wounded that he became insane and is in a lunatic asylum. All the papers were submitted to the Department of Justice, and the whole matter submitted to Council before the Order in Council was passed. There is an amount for legal expenses, $350; for transport, $1,450; for clerical work re North-West claims, $500; North-West Navigation Company, judgment of the Exchequer Court, $5,400.

Mr. WATSON. Is it the intention of the Government to pay the claim made by Mr. Bremner in connection with North-West rebellion matters?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is only a week since that came in, and it has not yet been examined.

Seed grain and expenses collecting and receiving grain.....	$2,338.71

Mr. DEWDNEY. Last year $3,150 were voted in the Supplementary Estimates for seed grain. Out of that, at the end of the financial year, there was $666 of the appropriation lapsed, as the accounts were not all in within the three months which we were allowed to pay the accounts which had been incurred at the end of the financial year. Therefore, all the addition we ask on account of those accounts is $600. We expect to have $1,000 more to pay for the expense of receiving the seed grain which is now being paid back. We have to pay a small percentage to some parties for collecting, and as the grain is sold and paid for the money is paid in to the Receiver General.

Mr. MULOCK. When did the distribution of grain take place?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A year ago last spring. None has been distributed since and none is asked for this year.

Mr. WATSON. How much has been paid back?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have a rough memo. of the account for seed grain advanced in 1888-89 and 1889-90, showing $81,882, and the amount refunded has been $45,435.

To pay ex-constable G. H. Harpur balance of pension to 30th June, 1891, on account of Rebellion of 1885	$814.60

Mr. DEWDNEY. Harpur's first application for pension was made by letter from him dated Battleford, 21st April, 1890, and inquiries were continuous into the case until the matter was taken up by the late Premier on the 15th November, 1890, when application was made in Parliament. Harpur stated that his expenses for medicines and medical advice had far exceeded those for the necessaries of life; that he had been unable to perform any ordinary bodily labour since 1885, and that to support himself and pay his doctors' bills, he had been compelled to sell all his personal property; that he had been frequently urged to apply for a pension but put it off in the hope of ultimate recovery, and, having expended all he possessed in supporting himself, he was compelled to ask for assistance.

Mr. MULOCK. I am quite satisfied with that. I was only anxious to find out if the department had had this case before it for years without taking action.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.10 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 3rd July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That Government Orders have precedence on Wednesdays for the remainder of the Session, and that the order of business for Wednesday under Rule 19 be made the Order for Mondays.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would consent that this rule should not apply to next Wednesday, but that next Wednesday should remain members' day. I have no objection to the motion taking effect next Wednesday week.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We thought that it would be sufficient to take the Orders for next Wednesday on Monday next, because the number of measures in the hands of private members is very small, and the hon. gentleman will see himself that it will be necessary to expedite the business of the House. Perhaps if members have the afternoon of next Wednesday, the Government could take the evening.

Mr. LAURIER. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the paper is not much loaded with business in the hands of private members, but still there is a good deal to be yet disposed of. There is, for instance, Mr. Cameron's Bill to amend the Criminal Law, which is an important measure, and it may take some hours' discussion. I think it would be better if next Wednesday should be allowed to remain as members' day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I agree to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. I am sure that he and his friends will make up for that on other days and help us to get through the business.

Mr. LAURIER. We have no desire to remain here in this hot weather longer than we can help it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may mention in connection with the Bill referred to by the hon. gentleman, that I propose to ask, after any discussion that may be thought necessary upon it, that it shall stand over for circulation with the Criminal Code which has been drafted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Code has not been brought down yet.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has been brought down, but it has not been distributed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

House again resolved into Committee on Bill (No. 13) to provide for the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction within Canada, in accordance with the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will state, at the outset, what I intend to suggest with regard to all the clauses that were allowed to stand. I propose that the appeal to the Exchequer Court from a Vice-Admiralty judge shall be optional with that to the Supreme Court. I propose that the tenure of office shall be during good behaviour, like that of other judges. I propose to abolish all fees payable to the Vice-Admiralty judges, and to make provision for the appointment of deputy judges, to take the place of judges who are interested or unable to sit, and surrogate judges with subordinate jurisdiction, and with such authority as may be conferred upon them by the general rules which may be made in pursuance of this Act. The object of having surrogate judges is to facilitate procedure in cases instituted at a distance from the place of registry. These are the principal amendments.

On section 4,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This was allowed to stand, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) had some doubt as to whether it did not curtail the jurisdiction given by the other clauses. I think it merely provides the places where the court may exercise its jurisdiction, and does not restrict the powers of the court.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would suggest whether it would not be better to do for admiralty jurisdiction what has been done with regard to controverted election cases, and allow the admiralty cases to be dealt with by the ordinary courts of each province.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman was not here the other day when that question was raised by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and I endeavoured to reply by stating that that view had been very fully considered, and that while I had to admit it had many advantages, such as the consolidation of all the litigation in one tribunal, there were other decided advantages in favour of pursuing the course of keeping this court under federal authority. One was that the power to legislate on this subject was lately given to us, and it may be very useful to have the organization we are making by this Bill available for other purposes than mere admiralty jurisdiction; and, besides, we avoid, by retaining the present officers, providing pensions for some twenty officers, whom the Imperial Parliament have legislated in favour of, in the way of pensions, if we dispensed with their services.

Sections 20, 21 and 25 struck out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In moving that the Committee rise and report the Bill, I may say that the resolutions to provide for the salaries which will be necessary in consequence of the abolition of the fees, will be moved separately, and that a separate Bill will be introduced to provide for them so as not to interfere with the progress of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest that the Committee should simply report progress, and that the Minister should have the Bill reprinted, so that we may see how it stands and whether any error exists before it is passed. No time will be lost by that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the Bill is reported I will agree to have it reprinted before the third reading.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

High Commissioner's office. $1,000

Mr. FOSTER. The estimate for contingencies last year amounted to $6,789.22. There have been over-expenditures, and additional will be required in order to complete the year, of about $1,000. There have been expended up to the 10th of June, on rent of offices and fuel, out of an estimate of $2,800, $2,100; cleaning and gas repairs, there was an estimate of $250, and there were expended $343; the expenditure, therefore, has overrun on that amount. Printing and stationery, the estimate was $650; the expenditure was $852, that item having overrun by about $200. Postal expenses were $33 over the estimate. In travelling expenses there was a decrease, the expenses being $68 out of an estimate of $200.

Mr. MULOCK. You are not charging for the trip out to Canada the other day?

Mr. FOSTER. No, that would not bring him out. There is an increase in the income tax. The messenger's estimate was $700; the amount expended up to the 10th of June was $516. Extra clerk in place of one who has retired, $73. So that altogether, taking into account these over-expenditures up to the 10th of June, $1,000 will be required to meet the expenditure up to the last of the year.

Mr. MULOCK. Why not take it out of that $2,000?

Mr. FOSTER. We cannot do that this year.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no desire to detain the Committee at any length on this item, but I want to say this. The items for contingencies in connection with the High Commissioner's office in London are very minutely detailed in the Auditor General's Report, but I cannot see unless from the remarks the Finance Minister just made, that there is any necessity for granting an additional sum of $1,000. Now, there were some remarks made with regard to the contents of the High Commissioner's report, which was pretty well criticized at a previous stage of this session. As I said then, I cannot see that there is a necessity for all the expenditure in connection with that office that we are called upon to bear each year; and, in my humble opinion, there ought to be a very carefully and minutely prepared statement of all these expenditures, so that we might fully understand how every item of this money has been spent. I notice that it is increasing every year. It is to be regretted that year after year the cost of that office is rising. You go back five years and you will find it was very much less than it is now. It was less under Sir A. T. Galt than it is under Sir Charles Tupper. I do not for a moment doubt that, perhaps, he performs duties and does a considerable amount of travelling and so on. The duties of the office may be increasing, but I say in justice to the people of this country who are tax-payers, and in justice to this House, we should have a pretty detailed statement of all the moneys expended within and under the office of High Commissioner in London. In the first place I would like to know whether there has been an increase in the number of officers employed.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there has been a decrease of one.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad, that is a step in the right direction; because, from the report we have received, I do not think there can be a necessity for the extensive staff that is kept there.

Mr. FOSTER. They are all kept at work.

Mr. McMULLEN. Judging from the report that has been sent in, it seems to be more in the line of an emigration office. While we have emigration agents in Liverpool and in other towns of the United Kingdom, whose duty it is to attend to that particular matter, I cannot see that a large amount of emigration business can devolve upon the High Commissioner and his staff in London, because those emigration agents must perform a very large part of that service. I want to get some idea as to when we may be able to reach the ultimate limit of the increased expenditure under the head of the High Commissioner. In order that we may ascertain that limit, we should have a very minutely detailed account laid before Parliament so that we can form some idea as to whether this money is being well expended or not. There are increases in a great many lines, and it is our duty, as an Opposition, to oppose unnecessary increases, and closely to criticize them in the public interest. If we find, upon careful investigation, that they are justifiable, then we should consent to them; but if they are not justifiable, it is our duty to resist any further increase. In my opinion, the High Commissioner has been rather disposed to spend more money than was necessary in the general interests of this Dominion, and I would suggest that every detail of his expenditure should be closely criticized.

Printing voters' lists and election expenses —Governor General's warrant..... $21,500

Mr. FOSTER. These are the Governor General's warrants about which we were talking the other day, and none of us knew much. The details of the printing of the voters' lists, as given to me, are these: There was a Governor General's warrant taken, and the expenditure to 10th July was for the items which I will read: Pay of printers—that, of course, is the cost of the printers engaged upon the printing of the voters' lists, $1,922; pay of clerks, $2,000; Dominion Type Founding Company for type, and another company for type, $1,500; express company, $1.10; telegraph company, $10; another telegraph company, $24; Queen's Printer for printing stationery, $331. Then there was an item advanced to the two revising officers by the Auditor General, to enable them to get to work upon the duties of their office, which is simply, of course, an advance of so much upon their salaries, which is sometimes done. The whole amount of the expenditure was $6,702. Then there was a question raised as to the returns for the sale of the lists. The amount received for sale of voters' lists is $3,907, making an expenditure over and above income of $2,795. Now as to the details of elections—that is, the other returns. Out of $11,500 there have been expended $9,381. These expenditures have been for expressage. I may say that up to the past election there was an arrangement between the Dominion and the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, by which they had a joint ownership of the ballot boxes, and in the provinces there is a rather close connection between the municipalities and the Government, and for municipal elections, which are conducted by ballot, the same ballot boxes were used. So whenever an election came round the officers had to send men all over the country to scour up these ballot boxes, and this was attended with much difficulty and expense. An arrangement has been carried out with the Province of Quebec, by which that province bought the old boxes jointly owned by the province and the Dominion, and paid for them, and we got new ballot boxes in Quebec for ourselves, which are to be our very own and not to be trotted around and loaned, so that we will know where they are when we want them. A similar arrangement has not yet been completed in Ontario, but negotiations are being carried on. At all events, with regard to Ontario we adopted the same plan and got our own ballot boxes. The item for ballot boxes amounts to $6,000, the cost of each box ranging from $2 to $2.50. They are considered to be very good boxes. The item, Queen's Printer, $1,314, is explained in this way:

Heretofore in elections the instructions to voters and instructions to returning officers and that class of work were printed locally. This work has been done by the Queen's Printer, and consequently it appears here in a lump sum, instead of coming into the returning officers' expenses to be paid afterwards as part of the expenses of the elections. There are items here also for the expressage of the ballot boxes to their various destinations, and there is an item for clerical work, the largest portion of which is paid for the preparation of the return to be presented to the House of the results of the election in the different constituencies. These items make up a total of $9,381, as follows:—Express charges $199, clerical work $966, ballot boxes $6,600, printing and stationery $1,380, travelling expenses $100, telegraphing $50.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with the ballot boxes, it is a pity that the Government did not adopt more care in the construction of those boxes. In my constituency each ballot box is made with a lock, and the key is tied to the handle. When the deputy returning officer has performed his duty, he locks the box and leaves the key attached to the handle. Thus the locking of the box is a fallacy. The Government should have taken some means of obtaining boxes that were self-locking, and the boxes should have been given by the returning officer to the deputy officer, closed, but unlocked. When the deputy returning officer had performed the necessary inspection in the morning before the poll was opened he could close the lock with a spring, and there should not be a key attached to the handle. The hon. member for Grey had a very narrow escape owing to these keys being attached to the boxes, because the premises were opened and the keys being there the ballot boxes were unlocked and ballots were changed and others substituted.

Mr. FOSTER. Who would count the ballots at the close of the poll?

Mr. McMULLEN. There would be trouble on that point; but the ingenuity of the Government engineers would be able to devise some means of overcoming the difficulty. With respect to the printing of the lists, can the Minister of Finance say what rate is now paid to printers at the Printing Bureau. A few years ago the pay was $10 a week, and it was raised to $11, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. The same pay now prevails. Is it not a fact that a seal is attached to each ballot box?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I doubt very much that a seal is attached, although the law may provide for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Something of the kind was done to the ballot boxes in the division in which I voted. I remained there till the close of the poll.

Mr. FRASER. It is not sufficient security unless the returning officer is thoroughly honest. There is security if there is only one key to the box, and it is given to the presiding officer, and that key at the close of the poll is placed in an envelope secured and initialled by the agent of both parties, and afterwards given to the returning officer and opened in the presence of the parties.

Mr. McMULLEN. The reason I asked with respect to the rate of wages paid to the printers is, that it was understood the pay should be $11 per week, but on speaking to a printer whom I know he told me the rate is $14 per week.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave the hon. gentleman my own impression. I have not charge of that department, but I do not think any change has been made. However, I will enquire and give the hon. gentleman the information.

Intercolonial Railway.....$300,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We desire to have very full explanations from the Minister as to the causes of this enormous sum demanded on behalf of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. BOWELL. This sum of $300,000 required for the Intercolonial Railway: $4,000 for the Windsor Branch, and $30,000 for the Prince Edward Island Railway, is to make up a deficiency in the running expenses of the road during the present year over the appropriation which was made during the last session of Parliament. The estimates as originally presented by the department included these sums of $300,000, $4,000 and $30,000, but by some means they were omitted from the Estimates when they came before Parliament. These sums are to provide for the amount that was really asked for by those who were managing the department last year. The same sum is asked this year, namely $3,700,000. It is made up of items for locomotive power, car expenses, maintenance of way and work, station and train expenses and general charges, making as near as they can approximate it $3,700,000. It is only a repetition for me to say, that had not the Estimates been changed last year by some error, this deficiency would not now have to be asked for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course the hon. Minister of Customs was not Minister of Railways at the time, but I am afraid that the reason for leaving out that sum, after it had been applied for, was because there was a great reluctance to disclose to the House or to the country the enormous extent of the expected deficit on the Intercolonial Railway; more especially as a good deal of attention had been called to the fact that by reason of certain changes, and by reason of the construction of a line across the State of Maine, we were likely to add enormously to the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway. The statement now made by the hon. Minister would appear therefore, without, I think, any unfair straining of the facts, simply to imply this: That last year the Government, or the party in charge, thought it expedient not to take the House into their confidence as to the amount which was likely to be charged, and the amount of the deficit which was likely to be incurred. Now, I would like to know from the Minister if he can inform us, what at the present time is the charge for conveying coal on the Intercolonial Railway per ton per mile; say from Spring Hill mines, for example?

Mr. BOWELL. Three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Three-tenths of a cent is about half a farthing or a little more. On the English lines, if I am correctly informed, the charge for conveying coal is five-tenths of a cent per ton per mile, and if my memory does not altogether mislead me, it was stated last night by the Minister of Customs in reply to a question from me, that five-tenths of a cent is the lowest rate at which heavy goods can be conveyed on the Intercolonial Railway. The consequence is, and the House, which is now asked to vote $300,000 additional for the Intercolonial Railway, may make a note of it, that according to the statement given us last night, and according to the statement given us to-day, whereas it costs five-tenths of a cent per ton per mile to convey such goods, the country is conveying this coal for three-tenths of a cent or about one-half; or, in other words, on every single ton of coal which is hauled we sustain a loss of about one-fifth of a cent per ton per mile. I do not think, Sir, if that is a specimen of the way in which a good many of these charges are regulated, it is at all a matter to be wondered at, that there is now a deficit of over half a million dollars per year on the working of the Intercolonial Railway. So long as this system goes on, so long the whole of the country is going to be taxed for the purposes of conveying coal to oblige the proprietors of a particular railroad.

Mr. FRASER. I think there are other reasons why there is a deficit on the Intercolonial Railway, and I can very well understand why it is necessary that this $300,000 was not included in the Estimates, and has to be voted now. I was very much pleased with the speech made by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) a few days ago when he referred to the Intercolonial Railway. It is becoming a very serious matter, and while I can conceive that the country is very much benefited by a Government railway carrying goods at a cheaper rate, still if we can find other reasons than that why a deficit occurs I think we should enquire into them. Now, Sir, I think that all thoughtful men ought to move in the direction indicated by the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), and for this reason: I take it that the Intercolonial Railway is badly managed perforce. I think perhaps that even a stronger Government, a Government of stronger moral back-bone than the present Government, would make a mistake in running that road because there are so many people who look upon that Government road as something made for themselves and their friends, that the Government put anybody and everybody into office upon that road. During the last election we had a very fine example of the system under which the Intercolonial Railway is run. In every town there was a book of passes ready to be filled up with the names of voters, and these names were filled in and given to every man who wanted to go anywhere over the province to vote. I will give you one example of this, as I happen to have the evidence of it right in my hand. For example, the secretary of the Conservative Association for the County of Pictou is an official of the Dominion Government, he is keeper of the Savings Bank in the town of New Glasgow, and a very worthy man, and he was secretary of the Association in New Glasgow. A letter is addressed to a gentleman in New Glasgow, and is sent with the inscription "please have this delivered at once," and the name of Mr. Cameron, secretary of the Conservatives for the County, is put upon it to deliver it to the voter, and he does deliver it. The voter who lived in New Glasgow, but who had a vote in the County of Halifax, opens the letter and he finds that it contains two passes. The man has no idea of voting, but his name is found on the list in Halifax, and it is discovered that he lives in the town of New Glasgow, and so adroitly is the work done that he gets a pass as an employé of the railway department. The pass reads as follows:—

"Intercolonial Railway—For employés only."

Of course, every man that votes is an employé of the Government, and this pass is for employés only—

"Pass—A B—From New Glasgow to Dartmouth."

I do not give his name, but I substitute the letters A B for it. He did not live in Dartmouth, nor did he need to go to Dartmouth at all, but so adroitly is the business managed, that in order to put the people off the scent, he is given a pass to Dartmouth. The pass says:

"Why granted"——

And there is a stroke after the words "why granted," because it could not be granted to him as an employé. The pass is good up to 5th March, and it is signed by D. Pottinger and was countersigned by P. S. Archibald. The pass was just handed to the man and he could go on that to Halifax to vote, but he did not go and did not vote. There was a return pass for this man, and the return pass is of a like character. It says:

"Pass—A B—From Halifax to Barney's River."

Barney's River is 20 miles beyond New Glasgow, where the man lives; they make it appear that he did not live in New Glasgow, and so they give him a pass to Barney's River, 20 miles beyond that, in order to bring him back from Halifax. I make the statement here, and I take the responsibility of the statement, that, if the books of the Intercolonial Railway are searched, during the time of the last election, it will be found that hundreds of voters were granted passes in the same way. Now, that is not fair to the other voters. If the Intercolonial Railway is to be used for election purposes, they should give passes all round. Why should unsanctified Grits be compelled to pay, when they go to vote, while these loyal Conservatives can get passes anywhere they like along the Intercolonial Railway? You will notice, of course, that the passes do not come from Ottawa at all: it is all done down below. The acting Minister of Railways knew nothing about it, or else he would frown upon it, and the chief engineer—whom I am glad to see on the floor of the House, instructing the Minister, and who conducts so well the business of the Intercolonial Railway—would not do it, of course; everyone knows that. You see, it is done at Moncton, and these books of passes were in the hands of the agents of the Conservative party; the book was handed to the Conservative agent, and he could fill it up with any name he liked. The Government found it was necessary to use so many more engines, and so much more coal, and to keep so many more men at work, that they, of course, found the money voted last year was not sufficient, and that is one of the reasons why this $300,000 had to be drawn on a Governor General's warrant.

Mr. FOSTER. To carry your hundred voters.

Mr. FRASER. I submit that it is high time the Government should take this matter into their serious consideration. I tell you, that the fact that the people know that a Government road—and the Government are the trustees for the people—is used for political purposes to carry men to vote from one end of the province to the other, is doing much to sap the public morality. It is bad enough when a railway company does this, for to a certain extent they are paying it out of their own pockets, but when the people's money is expended in this way at the rate of half a million dollars a year, to meet that deficit caused by carrying voters belonging to one particular party, I submit that it is high time that this matter should be enquired into. Now, I have got the papers here, and I can give the Government the names to show how these agents go behind their backs in this matter. I am not holding the Government altogether responsible. No man would ever think that the present Minister of Railways, or the late Minister of Railways, would be guilty of authorizing the granting of these passes. I only mention the fact to show that there must be looseness somewhere when the employés on the road could use their powers to pass voters from one part of Nova Scotia to another. There is a clamant need that the road should be run by men who cannot be influenced by pressure from persons who come to them and say: "This man or that man has a vote and should get a pass," or "Put my son on the railway," or "Give me a pass over the road because I am going to vote." Those who issued those passes are far worse than the men who took the passes; but so anxious were the Government to make the deficit larger that they sought the voters out and granted them passes. This occurred in Halifax, and I know that the hon. gentlemen who represent that county will repudiate it. I only mention this to show how, behind the backs of the Government, those men in some way or other hoodwink the authorities and abuse their powers. I call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and all hon. members from Nova Scotia and elsewhere whose fame has been tarnished by these villainous officials, to unite together and see that these things do not happen again. The deficit on the Intercolonial Railway is becoming a very serious matter indeed, and I do trust that before the next session of Parliament something in the direction indicated by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) will be done. After the way the railway has been run, I admit that it would be very hard for the opponents of the Government, if they came into power, to stop these practices. It is very difficult for a Government in running a railway to resist this pressure; but they should draw the line somewhere; and in winter especially, when everybody knows that the expenses are greater than in summer, they should not allow the road to be used for carrying voters free. I have heard a good deal since I have been a member of this House about the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway carrying voters. It is a bad thing to find any railway company doing that; but I maintain that it is far worse when the Government enters the lists and uses a public railway for election purposes. I care not whether it is one party or the other that does it, it is demoralizing. That is one of the reasons why it is necessary to vote this $300,000. If the Minister means that this amount was voted last year——

Mr. BOWELL. No. What I stated was that the officials in the department had asked for a sum sufficient to cover this, but that in the House the amount was reduced for some reason or other.

Mr. FRASER. No reduction could be made except by the Government. That strengthens my argument and shows conclusively that it was the operation of the road during the election that made this vote necessary. I trust, however, that the serious attention of the Government will be given to this matter, and that no passes will be granted in future.

Mr. FOSTER. There will be, either on this item or on the main Estimates, an extended discussion on the management of the Intercolonial Railway. I know that personally, because a number of gentlemen on this side of the House have spoken to me about it, and some of them have asked me just now whether they should take this discussion at the present time or defer it until the main Estimates are under consideration. I should much prefer that the discussion should go over to the main Estimates, and that the present discussion should be confined to the item before us; but if the House thinks otherwise, we can have the discussion now. I should like to ask the opinion of the hon. member for South Oxford on that point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid that there is no alternative unless this item stands. To postpone the discussion until the main Estimates are before us may mean no discussion at all. It is quite possible, looking at the state of the House, that the vote might not be reached until a late period, and the statement made by my hon. friend, and some of the other statements, do undoubtedly require to be discussed and explained. If it is convenient for the hon. gentleman to withdraw the item, I am quite agreeable to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that that would be convenient.

Mr. MULOCK. If the item stands, perhaps the Minister would make enquiry as to the number of passes which were issued during the election, so that we may discuss the question with a full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. It will not be possible for this vote to go over for any great length of time, as it is for the service of the year now up, and the amounts are pressing for payment. However, if it will facilitate matters, I will promise that very early in the consideration of the main Estimates the item of the Intercolonial Railway will be brought up, and the utmost freedom of discussion will be given upon it, and all information that can be brought will be brought. There is no wish on the part of the Government to avoid a thorough discussion of the Intercolonial Railway. In fact, I should welcome it myself as an individual member of the House; and I should like to have, so far as I am concerned, not the partisan, but the cool and well-thought-out opinions of members on both sides, in relation to the management of that railway. It is for no purpose of burking discussion that I make this suggestion; but the hon. gentlemen know how we are situated. Our desire is to have sufficient voted to provide for the working expenses of the railway. Under these circumstances, I am willing to promise that there will be full opportunity for discussion.

Mr. BOWELL. The amount that has been credited to the management of the Intercolonial Railway has been exhausted, and it was only through the courtesy of the bank that the last pay rolls were met. Pay rolls for the past month are now unpaid, and unless the bank extends its favour still further, the employés of the road will have to wait. For that reason it is absolutely necessary, in order that the men on the road should be paid at the end of the month, that we should have this money placed at our disposal. I quite concur in the remarks made by the Finance Minister. There will be no attempt whatever to shirk any debate. We shall have the fullest and most extended investigation into the charges that may be made against the management of the road. I may say to the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) that I have no knowledge, personal or otherwise, of the charges he has made. I will say, however, that in the short time during which I have had connection with the road I have come to about the same conclusion as himself, that the people of the country think that the road is theirs, and that they have a right to use it. But in justice to the chief engineer, who directs the management of the road, I will say that if there has been any abuse of the pass privilege, it has not been on his part.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister of Finance desires that when this item comes up again it shall receive full business-like discussion. That will involve information regarding the working of the road, which will enable us to discover how it is money has been lost, and, if possible, provide a remedy. The information, therefore, I have asked for will be very necessary. Are passengers being carried for less than a fair rate or for nothing? And if so, to what extent? Then, if the schedules of rates are not always adhered to, we should have information as to the exceptions made. Further, we should know to what extent the pass system has been adopted, not merely in connection with elections, but generally. I have been told that it is an ordinary occurrence to see a passenger train of dead-heads pass through as railway employés. People consider it is their own railway, and that they have the right to travel on it free. If there are any books to show that, we should have the information. I would like the acting Minister of Railways to say also whether passengers are allowed to travel over that road without any pass at all, and whether a custom does not prevail of carrying people free by car loads at election times without even having passes. We also should have a statement as to whether the road is used for political purposes or a party character such as have been referred to by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the hon. Minister of Finance has made the suggestion, and as I think it extremely likely that this discussion, once entered into, may go to very considerable lengths, I would suggest to my hon. friends that they should, provided the Minister of Customs sees his way to accept the suggestion, supply him with statements of such information as will be required, and we will agree to forego at present the general discussion, on the understanding that this will be the first item brought up after the Budget debate is disposed of.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. member for Guysborough will put in writing what he has stated, and if the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) will put in writing what he wants, I will endeavour to obtain all the information I can get on these points. But I can assure these hon. gentlemen that passengers are not permitted to pass up and down the road free, unless the conductors violate their instructions and defraud the revenue.

Mr. FRASER. I am bound to say in corroboration of what the hon. Minister has stated, that at any other time there is the greatest possible strictness with regard to the general public, who must show their tickets or passes every time, or pay their money.

Mr. LANGELIER. From my own personal knowledge I know that on the day when a certain public meeting at Rimouski, during the last election, was to be held, there were two special excursion trains bringing the people to the meeting, the one from the east and the other from the west, and I saw the system which was resorted to in order to allow the Tory voters to get to that meeting without paying.

Mr. FOSTER. Are we to abide by the understanding suggested or go into a discussion now? If these charges are made, they must be met.

Mr. McMULLEN. In order that the Government should have the necessary information when the matter comes up, it is highly desirable that we should provide them with it now.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not highly desirable that all sorts of charges should be made by hon. gentlemen opposite, involving the good name of the railway, and that those charges should go to the public in the Hansard without any reply being made to them. The Minister of Railways made a fair proposition. Whatever information any hon. gentleman on the other side wishes to have let him send the Minister a note of it, and he will furnish the information as far as possible. I do not think it is fair that charges should go upon the record without any rebuttal appearing, as there are many people who will simply read the charges and not follow the sequence in a fortnight or three weeks later.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. Minister of Customs said that the practice mentioned did not take place, or that if it did, it was in violation of the rules of the department. My hon. friend from Quebec wishes to give the hon. Minister the information in advance of violations of that rule to his knowledge.

Mr. McMULLEN. All we desire is to place the Government in possession of the information which they must have before them when this question comes up for discussion. We do not want them to be in a position to say that we did not intimate our intention of putting these questions. We want to know, when this road is not paying working expenses, whether we are running any cars at the entire cost of the Dominion, as we have reason to believe is the case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not understand that the observations addressed to the Committee by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) were, in any way, a departure from the understanding which was had. If that hon. gentleman is able to inform the acting Minister of Railways of certain facts that came within his own observation, the Minister of Railways might very well explain them now, if he can, or if he cannot now, he may explain them when we come to discuss the general Estimates. In fact, it gives the Government the opportunity of knowing what the complaint is and what the defence is.

Mr. BOWELL. The complaint which has been made by the member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) will be enquired into. Did I understand him to say that these people were carried free on these trains?

Mr. LANGELIER. I had not finished my remarks, but I stated that one train was started from the east and one from the west to come to Rimouski, and I saw dozens of people, who were supposed to be in favour of the Minister of Militia, who showed me the kind of pass they had to go over that railway. They had not paid one cent, and they told me that hundreds of other people, in fact all the other people who were there attending the meeting, had been passed in the same way. I venture to say that no record has been made of the passes to travel on those trains. I was shown the pass they had, and it was a little piece of white paper with a hieroglyphic written on it by a Conservative wirepuller, and that is what dozens and dozens of people showed me as having passed them on board that train. I would like to have the information, because I desire to find out how much these two excursion trains paid to the Government. There were hundreds of people on these trains. There were many other special trains during the election, and I do not know what they paid to the Government, but I am speaking especially of those that came to the large meeting which was held at Rimouski a few days before the election. I do not know if any of these people paid, but all those that I saw told me they had these passes. I think it would be very important to find out how these trains were managed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can see that the hon. gentleman could not read these mysterious signs on that little bit of paper which he refers to as a pass for the friends of the Conservative party to travel free on the Intercolonial Railway. I did not see any of these pieces of paper, these pieces of ordinary paper with an extraordinary sign, and it appears to be extraordinary that the friends of the Conservative party should have selected the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) to display these passes to when I saw nothing of them. I had complaints —and the hon. gentleman will understand that in the midst of an election fight many of your friends expect you to do more that you can—from many of those who came, as the hon. gentleman truly says, from the east and from the west on those two special trains, that they could not be admitted on either of those trains without having to pay their fare. It was stated to me that orders had been issued by Mr. Schreiber or Mr. Pottinger—I will not be sure which —that every man should pay special rates, which meant excursion rates. I am positive of that, and that complaints were made in regard to their having to pay anything, and that was especially the case on that day to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) refers, when he and his friends were at that meeting at Rimouski. I did not see the mysterious white papers allowing the friends of the Conservative party to travel free. All I know is that my friends complained to me that strict orders had been issued that they must pay, and they said: You being in the Government, it seems to us very natural that you should be able to pass your friends free. I said it was impossible, that I had nothing to say to the chief engineer who had the management of that road, and, as far as those I saw were concerned, I can say that they had tickets, but I do not know what colour the tickets were or what was on them.

Mr. MULOCK. Did they pay for the tickets?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot say. Certainly they did not pay me.

Mr. LANGELIER. It would be well, before we come to this question in the main Estimates, to have a statement of how many special trains went in there during that election, from what places the trains ran, how much each train cost and how much it earned?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I intimated to the Minister before that I desired to know the total amount of coal transported from the Spring Hill collieries over the Intercolonial Railway, and the rate per ton per mile which was charged.

Mr. BOWELL. I will get the information, as well as that for the hon. member for Quebec, and will state the result when we come to these items in the main Estimates.

Deficiencies in the Estimates for 1890-91 caused by the increase in the rate for mail service over the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Montreal and Vancouver.....	$75,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If, as is quite likely, there will be a long discussion on that subject, it might be well for the Minister to state now in such reasonable detail as will partly explain it, the cause of this additional sum of money being required. In that case, I dare say the general discussion can be allowed to stand, on the understanding that it will be brought up at an early date as the discussion will be brought up on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. HAGGART. The detailed explanation might occupy a considerable time. This is simply an increased allowance for the carrying of the mails on the Canadian Pacific Railway, making the amount $105 a mile on the full length of the road per annum. The payment before was at the rate of 12 cents per mile.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The present arrangement is to pay $105 a mile on the whole of the main line?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what length of time does that last?

Mr. HAGGART. Until it is changed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What notice must you give to change it?

Mr. HAGGART. We can change it at any time—three months, I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you change it at a month's notice?

Mr. HAGGART. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I would ask that, before this comes up again, and at the earliest convenience of the Postmaster General, he might lay on the Table of the House a copy of the Order in Council fixing this rate, and that he might append to that the regulations showing the cost last year under the 12 cents per train mile rate.

Mr. HAGGART. It amounts to the difference between $75 and $105. Twelve cents a mile would be about $75 per year. There would then be an increase of about $30.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the practice before? Was the Canadian Pacific Railway receiving $105 on part of its track, and 12 cents on the remainder, or was it receiving 12 cents on all?

Mr. HAGGART. This increase applies solely to the main line, the $75,000. You will see in the other estimates, there is an increased expenditure from Montreal to St. John.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then do I understand from the Postmaster General that virtually under this vote the post office allowance to the Canadian Pacific Railway is changed from $75 per mile to $105 along the whole line?

Mr. HAGGART. On the main line between Montreal and Vancouver, which is 2,915 miles; it is a change from $75 per mile per annum to $105 per mile per annum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then if you will just lay the Order in Council making that change on the Table at your earliest convenience——

Mr. HAGGART. I will lay it on the Table on Monday.

Amount required to cover unprovided items for 1889-90, as per Auditor General's Report, page A—79.....$709,748.64

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The details I find on page 78. Take, for instance, the item for railways, under the head of collection of revenue. There I see an unprovided expenditure of $302,958. Surely that would have been foreseen before the end of the year 1890, and ought to have been provided for in the Supplementary Estimates of last year. Prorogation took place on the 23rd of May, that was within five weeks of the end of the year, and I should like to know of the Minister of Finance how it comes that so very large a sum as $302,958 should have been left unprovided for. With common care on the part of the officials of the department that sum ought to have been foreseen, and the Government ought to have been communicated with. Were the Government communicated with, or did the officials not know before the 25th of May that so large a deficit would have to be met?

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this matter I cannot say from recollection that the Government was communicated with. I think if the Government had been communicated with, it would have brought down the sum in the Estimates to cover the deficiency.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The chief official is there,

Mr. FOSTER. No, he is gone.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, he ought to be sent for, because that is a matter which, to my mind, rather reflects, and reflects seriously, on the management of the Intercolonial Railway, and is a thing about which we ought to have some explanation—unless there was some extraordinary cause which it is not easy to understand. It was that officer's duty to have communicated to the Government, long before the 23rd of May, that there would be a very serious deficiency, giving the Government the option of obtaining a vote from the House. It is quite clear that, primâ facie, this reflects gravely on the management of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. It may not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say, primâ facie it does. The idea that this House should rise on the 23rd of May, and a department like that of railways should not know within $302,000 what its expenditure was going to be, sheds a very ugly light on the way in which that department is managed—unless there is some explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. The estimate would have been brought down six weeks before that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the department ought, in all conscience, to have advised the Government before the House rose, that there was going to be this deficiency, if they knew it, and it was very difficult to see how they could have avoided knowing it. I do not myself complain about a moderate sum of unprovided items, knowing that these expenses will occur. For instance, in the Post Office, which is our nearly next largest expending department, there were items unprovided for to the amounts of $56,230, and lapsed balances to the amount of $56,319; so that I would not be at all disposed to complain of that. There are always certain amounts in each department which lapse over, but here you will see there was only an insignificant lapsed balance of $15,900, and this huge gap.

Mr. FOSTER. If you look at A—74 you will see that the whole of that amount is covered by Governor General's warrant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be, but that is exactly what the Governor General's warrant should not be taken for, unless there was a reasonable ground for alleging that it was entirely unforeseen. That is an abuse of the Governor General's warrants, and we have been complaining against the system for several years back in this House. The departments, knowing that the Governor General's warrant is issued nowadays without sufficient investigation—I do not reflect on the hon. gentlemen, but I speak of the facts—knowing that they neglect to apprize the Government before the House rises of the fact that the expenditure is to be largely exceeded; and then we come to have such items as this one before us.

Mr. FOSTER. Whether the Governor General's warrant was taken before the House or not, it should have been covered in the Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A thing of that kind could by no possibility escape the attention of the Ministers. Long before 24th of May they must have known there was going to be a big gap.

Mr. FOSTER. I think probably that Governor's warrant was got before the House met in 1891, not after it had risen. That fact is no justification, for the amount should have been embodied in the Estimates if it was issued before the House met.

Mr. MULOCK. Why should not the reports of Ministers on which Governor General's warrants are issued be laid on the Table. We have simply a statement, but not a report.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the hon. gentleman would obtain much more information if that were done.

Mr. MULOCK. Then what is the use of the reports to the Governor General?

Mr. FOSTER. The report, if the hon. gentleman got it, would inform him that so much money was required, and there was no appropriation out of which it could be taken, and it was so declared on the report of the Minister of Finance, and, therefore, a Governor General's warrant do issue. In some cases there might be a more detailed statement. The hon. gentleman fears there is not a truly strict revision of Governor General's warrants. He is more or less right as regards the past, and it may be there is too much laxity at present; but, so far as I am concerned, I have tried during the past year to revise all such statements, and before I sign the report to satisfy myself, as far as possible, that there was really a ground for issuing a warrant. Then we have adopted a new principle within the last few months, that all Governor General's warrants before being passed by Council shall be referred to the Treasury Board and undergo the revision of that board. That, I think, will be a very good extra check on the issue of Governor General's warrants. So the hon. gentleman will see that every disposition exists to keep as nearly as possible to the line.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Finance says the reports of Ministers would not throw light on the matter. The report of the Minister should not be a mere echo of the statute, but it should contain on the face of it the facts that warrant the exercise of this special power. The facts form the basis on which the Council comes to a conclusion on the application.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is quite right in that, and it was that consideration which led to the determination to refer the reports to the Treasury Board. Since that reference has been made several instances have occurred in which we have had officials from the departments to give information as to the necessity of issuing Governor General's warrants.

Mr. MULOCK. Then in future these reports will be of service, and will be laid on the Table of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to laying them on the Table, if the House wants them—that is, any that may be called for.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see that the change suggested by the Minister will quite meet the case. If a Minister is without the necessary funds he applies to his colleagues for a Governor General's warrant, and that if it is referred to the Treasury Board I suppose the only question that can come before it is whether the money is required in the public service, and there is no appropriation for the purpose. I do not suppose the Treasury Board would prevent the money being obtained, if it were made perfectly clear that no appropriation existed and that money for the purpose was required. But it will be seen from an examination of the Act that while it may be necessary that the money should be obtained, it is not such a necessity as is contemplated by the provisions of the Auditor's Act authorizing the issuing of Governor General's warants. It is the duty of officials of the department to inform the Minister as to the money required for the public service of that department, and there is great neglect of duty if that information has not been given in order that the appropriation should be had at the hands of the House. The statement of the Minister of Finance shows great neglect of duties in these particulars. If the money has not been appropriated, why was not application made to Parliament for an adequate sum for the public service? What is contemplated by the Auditor's Act is an appropriation upon a Governor General's warrant for some unforeseen emergency. There may be some public work which the Government require to maintain, destroyed by fire, or in some other way. There may be something arising which requires an appropriation of which neither any Minister nor the House could know anything at the time the appropriation was sought. But these sums which are provided in the Supplementary Estimates by Governor General's warrants are sums wanted in the ordinary course of the administration of each department, and it certainly indicates very great laxity in the administration of the affairs of the department when the authority is employed for the purpose of supplementing the sum asked that ought to have been provided when the House was in session.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give the House the fullest information before concurrence.

Country Savings Banks, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island—
Salaries	$11,650
Contingencies	1,750

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there is a small decrease in this item.

Mr. FOSTER. That is because, according to our policy, these savings banks are being absorbed into the post office savings banks whenever by death or other cause the incumbent for the time being vacates the office. By this means we save a considerable portion of that vote and add very little expense to the management of the post office savings banks.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad to learn that the Government is going to carry out that policy. Has this reduction been caused by the death of any of the office-holders?

Mr. FOSTER. We transferred three savings banks last year; the keepers of two having died and one keeper having resigned.

One-half of 1 per cent commission on $7,222,271.57 for payment of interest on public debt	$36,101.35

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before we quite leave this subject of the savings banks I would like to ask the hon. Minister, although I shall not press him to answer the question unless he chooses—I would be glad to know whether any sort of understanding has been come to, or whether he expects to come to any sort of understanding with the various banking institutions of the country as to the rate of interest? The alterations which were made last year in the Banking Act would, in my judgment, under certain conditions, render that possible. It is an important question of policy, and if the hon. gentleman for any reason does not see proper to make any statement upon it, I shall not press the question further.

Mr. FOSTER. You mean the interest on deposits?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, as to whether any arrangement has been made, or is likely to be made with the banks on this subject, so as to create something like a uniformity, and prevent heavy loss.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a subject which has been engaging my attention for the last four or five months, and although I am not able to make any definite statement now, I may say that the Government has been in communication with the banks with that end in view, and that so far the prospects seem—I think I may say—fair towards that conclusion which will, I think, be beneficial all round. I would not like to make a more explicit statement at the present time upon that subject, but simply to say to my hon. friend that it is engaging my attention and that communications are at present being had upon it. It would be desirable for the banks, and desirable for us as large holders of deposits, that a uniform and fair rate of interest should be agreed upon, if it can be agreed upon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is one other point which I would like a little information about. I do not know exactly what relations the hon. gentleman has with our chief bank; that is to say, the Bank of Montreal; but it still continues practically to all intents and purposes the Government bank. I observe that the bank has been in a number of instances rather outbidding the Government whose banker it is. It seemed to me a rather strange proceeding that the Bank of Montreal, which is the Government banker, should be offering a higher rate of interest for deposits than the Government are paying, in the shape of savings banks opened, as one might say, almost in direct competition with the Government in many places. Has the hon. gentleman any information to give on that point, which is a distinct and specific point in the administration?

Mr. FOSTER. No changes have been made in the relations between the Government, so far as its deposits and business is concerned, and the Bank of Montreal—which, as my hon. friend says, is the chief bank with which we do our business—except this: that, possibly, the Bank of Montreal may have had, during the past year, reason for complaining that the usual amount of money kept on deposit was not kept on deposit by us, we having been obliged to let it run very low at times. The Bank of Montreal has established a savings bank branch. It has had to do that, possibly, to some extent on account of the competition of other banks, but I do not think it was the first, by any means, to introduce the system. The arrangement which is possible and about which we had a conversation a few moments ago, may obviate that to a certain extent; that is, it may eventuate in a uniform rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The only reason that I make that remark is this: that, unless the circumstances had been very exceptional, the spectacle of the Government banker outbidding the Government for deposits, as was done in a great many cases, is peculiar, to say the least of it, and there is no doubt that the Government lost heavily under the operation, and that a very considerable number of deposits were transferred straight to the Bank of Montreal. Now, had the Bank of Montreal no communication with the Government, there is not a word to say; but, in the very close relation which the Bank of Montreal is to the Government, it strikes me as slightly peculiar they should have done a thing of that kind, unless by previous conference with the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. How many different holders are there of Canadian stock? The reason I ask the question is that each year we have an item of $36,000 odd, being one-half of 1 per cent., for paying out the interest on the Government debt. The work of distributing dividends is merely clerical work, and $36,000 a year for distributing a little over $7,000,000 does strike one as a pretty high figure.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will recollect that this matter has been up for years; and ever since Confederation we are under an agreement with agents by which certain commissions are paid to them, commissions on the negotiations of loans and on the payment of interest. If we take the net percentage of the ten years preceding this ten year period, we will find that the amounts which we paid were much larger than those which we are paying now. The last arrangement, which was made in 1882, I think, contemplated an existence of ten years, and the rates were largely reduced from what had been previously paid for all these services. That arrangement is subject to denunciation in 1892. I have already been in communication with our agents, and when we can revise that, we shall go over the whole matter with a view of making, if possible, better arrangements. However, it has been a fundamental principle hitherto that we must have the aid of strong and reputable houses in London in making our loans, and we have always found it the wisest course in doing our work there. I do not know whether any revision can be made which will result more favourably. That remains to be seen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observed, as I think everybody did, with great regret, that one of our financial agents, the house of Baring Bros., had been compelled to suspend and go into liquidation. I am aware that no loss was sustained by the Government; but at the same time, when this item is up, it is necessary for us to know first of all whether the Barings, or rather the limited liability firm which takes their name, are retained as the agents of the Government for the time being, and also what their intentions may be. Without in the slightest degree desiring to reflect on Baring Bros., who are always, I believe, so far as we were concerned, very useful and valuable friends, it is a matter of grave question whether their successors are able to render services at all commensurate with those rendered by the great house of Baring Bros.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that the present firm of Baring Bros. are retained as our agents. Of course, one cannot say very much about that; but it is a matter that is engaging the consideration of the Government. My deputy is over in London just now in connection with some financial transactions which we are carrying on. He was over last year in connection with a temporary loan, at the time the troubles were at the acute stage; and, on consideration of the matter then, it was considered advisable, under all the circumstances, not to change our agency in that respect. I have here a statement of the agents' commission. In 1881 one per cent. was paid on payment of dividends and principal on maturity on Canada 6 per cents., and on the first issue of Intercolonial Railway 4 per cents., and one-half per cent. on all other guaranteed bonds and ordinary Dominion loans. On 1st January, 1882, the other arrangement was made, and it is terminable on one year's notice from and after January, 1892, so that it is only terminable on the 1st January, 1893. By that arrangement, instead of one per cent., we pay one-half per cent. on interest and sinking funds; one per cent. on all new loans, to cover all charges, except stamp duty and actual brokerage payments; no commission on loans negotiated by the agent; one-half per cent. on conversion of Canada fives and other securities.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that apply to the old loans, of which there are some outstanding?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The only provision is that on any loans where the charge is less than one-half per cent., it is not to be raised.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister seems to justify this high expenditure for commissions on the ground that it is necessary to have strong financial agents in London. I thought he had taken the ground that his Administration had so improved the credit of Canada that it could take care of itself, and that it was not necessary to bolster it up by such arrangements as that which he is compelled to resort to. I called attention last year to the manner in which the sinking fund that was redeemed was taken care of, and I call attention to the same matter now. I understand that some of the bonds are payable to bearer. I suppose our agents in London redeemed some of our public debts. What becomes of the redeemed debt? It is not cancelled, I understand, but is still kept alive when it falls due, and is redeemed by sinking fund.

Mr. FOSTER. That is retained, of course. It is still an investment.

Mr. MULOCK. In whose hands is that investment?

Mr. FOSTER. In the hands of trustees.

Mr. MULOCK. Who are they?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not remember their names.

Mr. MULOCK. Could the hon. Minister state the amount of Government securities in the hands of trustees?

Mr. FOSTER. About $22,000,000, I think.

Mr. MULOCK. The trustees have control over these securities.

Mr. FOSTER. They hold them in trust.

Mr. MULOCK. They are negotiable.

Mr. FOSTER. No, they are held in trust investments.

Mr. MULOCK. They are in the hands of the trustees, and would be negotiable if the trustees chose to commit a breach of trust.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, they are simply bought upon the market by trustees, just as any person else would buy them. Then they are held by the trustees, and instead of the interest being paid it is kept and added to the investment, and in that way it accumulates.

Mr. MULOCK. That is just the position in which I understood it to be, and that is why I call the attention of the Committee to the fact that to day $22,000,000 of these securities of Canada are in the hands of trustees. I will assume that they are good strong men; but apparently their standing is not of sufficient importance to impress their names on the Minister's memory. This system of redeeming securities is going on, and year by year there will be larger amounts of trust securities in the hands of trustees, and we are running an unnecessary risk, it seems to me, in leaving our securities beyond our control, even in the hands of trustees. I felt a degree of anxiety when the crisis occurred last year, knowing that a large quantity of the securities of Canada were held by the bank in question in trust for the people of Canada. I am glad to know that nothing has occurred to occasion any loss to the country; but it is not a satisfactory position, in my opinion, and I trust that the Minister, now that he is going to revise our whole financial arrangements, will make provision for doing away with any unnecessary risk. I am unable to understand why we cannot cancel the redeemed debt at maturity and be done with it, instead of keeping the securities alive, a source of danger. In all future issues, it seems to me it would be a wiser plan to provide for redemption and payment of interest at the same time.

Mr. FOSTER. There is the condition of the law.

Mr. MULOCK. I know you cannot alter existing contracts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. Minister know whether these various securities, amounting to $20,000,000 or thereabouts, are in the position of inscribed stock, or whether any portion are held as bonds?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say what proportion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have several times mentioned the extreme desirability of having all those put in as inscribed stock. When they are put in as inscribed stock, instead of as bonds, I think that, so far as the security goes, it would probably be sufficient; for, if my memory serves me, one of the trustees is our own Receiver General. We have altered the status of that functionary so often that I really forget whether the Minister of Finance does not combine in his own person the position of Receiver General. I think he does, and in that case these securities should be in his name as well as in the name of one or perhaps both our financial agents. I rather think there are three trustees.

Mr. FOSTER. There are three at least.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that if our Finance Minister and one of our agents and some third party be the holders of the inscribed stock, specifically described as in trust, there would not be any very material danger.

Mr. MULOCK. Quite so; but it seems to me all the securities should be in Canada. I understand that the redeemed bonds are in London, England. Why not have them in our own custody here?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you mean the sinking fund or the redeemed debt?

Mr. MULOCK. The redeemed debt.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean those which have been used for the sinking fund or those where the debt is matured?

Mr. MULOCK. I mean where they have been redeemed out of the sinking fund.

Mr. FOSTER. These are held by trustees.

Mr. MULOCK. They should be here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whenever any purchases are made and invested in inscribed stock, the bonds must be delivered up and destroyed. Two classes of securities cannot remain outstanding.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite so. I know that the last year or two the drift has been entirely towards the change to inscribed stock.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon. Minister could, at a later date, give the information to the Committee as to whether any of the debentures which have been redeemed are now in London and where they are.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did I understand the hon. Minister to say that it required a year's notice before any change could take place in our financial agents?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, from the 1st of January, 1882. It is a ten years' arrangement.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the contract is for ten years, it would expire itself without notice.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a condition of the contract that, at the end of a certain time, it can be terminated on giving one year's notice.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then I notice that one-half of 1 per cent has been paid. Of course it is a very large amount, $36,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It is one-half what we formerly paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. Still it should be less. Does the hon. Minister look forward to being able to utilize our High Commissioner in any financial arrangements in London with regard to our debt? I remember when the late First Minister made the statement in the House, at the time of the appointment of the High Commissioner, that he would be of decided advantage to us in financial matters in London. Does the hon. gentleman expect to be able to use him so as to save us a considerable portion of this money?

Mr. FOSTER. The High Commissioner in London is in a position to be of great service to Canada in connection with our financial arrangements, and the negotiations of loans, in the way of advice and co-operation. In those respects he has been of great service and will continue to be of great service, but I do not think he could ever take the place of a banking house or firm in these operations. If my hon. friend were acquainted with the modus operandi of the London market, he would see that, under present conditions, it is quite impossible for the High Commissioner to take the place of our banking agents in the negotiations of loans. He could not do so any more than I could myself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In connection with that matter I must reiterate the remark which I made before, and which has been made several times from this side. If our High Commissioner in London is to meddle in any London transactions whatever, I must say that it is extremely inexpedient that he should be mixed up in any form or shape with companies of any sort or description. Mischief will arise, as mischief has arisen, and I think it should be distinctly intimated by the Finance Department, whose servant, for that matter, he is, that the High Commissioner should, if he is to be trusted in any financial matter at all, abstain from any dealings with other companies of any kind or description.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be extremely unwise to mix up the present High Commissioner with our finances. He has had connection of a more or less intimate character with several financial enterprises, and I have not heard that they have succeeded. I do not know that it is because of his connection with those financial associations, but it is necessary for us to have our business in the hands of a strong financial man, and we can hardly regard our present High Commissioner in that light.

Mr. McMULLEN. If in the opinion I have expressed I am astray, I was led astray by the remarks of the late First Minister, made by him some years ago, when impressing on the House the desirability of appointing a High Commissioner, who, he said, would save us in commissions much more than would be expended by the creation of that office. I quite agree with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that it is highly desirable our present High Commissioner, mixed up as he has been with some of those concerns with which his name has been associated during the past year, should not have anything to do with our financial arrangements. For instance, a company which has been formed recently and with which, I understand, he is connected, has completely collapsed; and certainly the man whom we send over to the other side for the purpose of representing us should not allow himself to be mixed up with such questionable concerns, to the serious impairment of our credit and dignity in the financial world. We should rather have a representative who will keep up the credit and dignity of this country as a borrowing country. I hope the Finance Minister will see that if in future we are to become borrowers, we should be represented by an official in London whose career, financially and otherwise, will reflect credit on us, and who will keep free of these questionable associations with which our present High Commissioner has become connected within the last two or three months.

Expenses in connection with the issue and redemption of Dominion notes.. $5,000

Mr. CHARLTON. What are these expenses?

Mr. FOSTER. You will find them detailed in the Auditor General's Report, page B—23. It has reference to the counting of the notes in the department, taking them in, numbering them and destroying them.

Mr. CHARLTON. When these notes are brought in are they cancelled and new ones issued?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, whenever they are damaged in the least, they are cancelled and destroyed, and all precautions are taken in regard to the destruction. That also takes in the signing of the notes. Of late we have had one name lithographed, but the other has to be signed.

Mr. CHARLTON. What precautions are taken to prevent the cancelled notes from being put in circulation again?

Mr. FOSTER. They are immediately destroyed?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who superintends their destruction?

Mr. FOSTER. The comptroller.

Mr. CHARLTON. How many have been cancelled since the issue commenced?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot state now.

Mr. MULOCK. Who witnesses the destruction?

Mr. FOSTER. There are certain officers who do that. There is the comptroller, and, I think, the accountant.

Mr. MULOCK. It is not usual to have only one officer to supervise the destruction?

Mr. FOSTER. No, there are two or three.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There should not be less than three.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there are three.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the highest denomination of notes which are issued?

Mr. FOSTER. We have $1,000 notes, and, I think, we have $5,000 notes for the securities in the banks. In fact, I think, we have as high as $10,000 notes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What form of securities are you issuing in London just now?

Mr. FOSTER. Treasury bills.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are they exactly similar in form to the English Treasury bills?

Mr. FOSTER. Precisely.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that involve the deposit of any security?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these only for a period of one year?

Mr. FOSTER. The present issue is only for one year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And at what rate?

Mr. FOSTER. Four per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are they payable half-yearly?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Printing Dominion notes.....$50,000

Mr. CHARLTON. How is this work done? Is it by contract?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, by contract.

Mr. CHARLTON. By whom is the work done?

Mr. FOSTER. It is done by Mr. Burland in the new building which he put up here in Ottawa about two years ago.

Mr. CHARLTON. To what extent were tenders invited for this work?

MR. FOSTER. This is an old question which has been discussed here before. The contract has been running for four years and, I think, terminates in October.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the rate allowed for printing these notes?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the contract here, but you can find out the rate by the statement on page B--23 of the Auditor General's Report, where the number of notes and the price of the sheets are stated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It amounts to about 6 cents per note.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the amount of Dominion notes in circulation is about $16,000,000?

Mr. FOSTER. About that.

Mr. MULOCK. I have been told by banks that the cost of printing their bills amounts to about 1 cent each. I do not know what the average life of a bill may be, or how many million dollars worth of bills are printed a year.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the average life of our bills is rather less than that of the bank bills because we are careful to keep them as clean as possible.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that 1 cent a bill is what the banks calculate as the cost of printing.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot state just now what is the cost of printing our bills or the bills of the banks, but I know that we have the right of revision each year under the contract, and each year an investigation is made. The last investigation which was made—I think January—showed me that this firm were doing the work at as cheap rates as it was being done in the best houses in New York.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many notes would be contained in one issue?

Mr. FOSTER, I cannot tell you now, but I will find out and give you the whole cost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What we want to know is roughly what is the cost per note. Of course there would be a difference in regard to the large notes of which only a small number are printed, but say in reference to the one's and two's.

Printing, advertising, inspection, expressage, miscellaneous charges, including commutation of stamp duty..$10,000

Mr. CHARLTON. This requires a little explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. You will see the account of expenses under that in the Auditor General's Report, page B—23. It takes in the advertising by our agents in London and the express charges on silver and notes and the like of that, as well as legal services, the travelling expenses of the financial inspector and the assistant inspector, and the stamp duties on the inscribed bonds at home.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 88) to incorporate the St. Catharines and Merritton Bridge Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 16) to amend the Acts relating to the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 120) respecting the Salisbury and Harvey Railway Company.—(Mr. Hazen.)

Bill (No. 121) to amend an Act to incorporate the Montreal Bridge Company.—(Mr. Desjardins, Hochelaga.)

Bill (No. 123) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Oshawa Railway and Navigation Company, and to change the name thereof to "The Oshawa Railway Company."—(Mr. Madill.)

Bill (No. 124) further to amend an Act to incorporate the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Desjardins, Hochelaga.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 125) to incorporate the Rocky Mountain Railroad and Coal Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. Having passed the items with regard to financial management we have taken up all the individual items I propose to ask the Committee to pass during this sitting. I have had a conference with the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and owing to the peculiar circumstances under which we are placed, having entered upon the new year with expenditure constantly accruing and the different services of the country going on, we are at present without any funds for current expenses. Any appropriations made for last year, the balances of which are left, cannot be used, of course, for any expenditure for the present year. In order to facilitate matters and have the business of the country and its service to go on smoothly we have agreed to take up the different items untouched, and to pass one-tenth of each appropriation asked for without discussion, leaving nine-tenths of each appropriation afterwards, when the fullest discussion will be allowed on each item. After we have passed these, I will ask the House to go into concurrence on the Estimates already passed and these resolutions, so that they may receive their several readings and be put in the form of a Bill and assented to as quickly as possible. That being so, then the first item is for census and statistics, the full amount asked being $175,000, and the resolutions will be taken in their order, each calling for one-tenth of the amount asked for in the vote.

Mr. McMULLEN. If we should strike any item that is looked upon on this side of the House as being very objectionable it might be allowed to stand and another item allowed to take its place.

Mr. FOSTER. That cannot be. The hon. gentleman might object, for example, to the item for dredging, and ask that it be allowed to stand. The result of that would be that the Minister of Public Works would have to discharge his men and do nothing towards dredging. It is plainly impossible to allow the items to stand if we wish to help the services of the country, but I do not think any items will be found so objectionable that one-tenth cannot be passed without discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman as I understood him at the private conference to which he has alluded, intends to take such items as are absolutely required to carry on the business of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not ask for any vote of one-tenth for new services, for public works not commenced.

Mr. LAURIER. Only for services going on now. There can be no objection to that principle, and the only objection can be to the amount of the item and these we can discuss later; but to-day in order to carry on the business of the country, I consent with great pleasure to the proposal of the hon. gentleman.

Prince Edward Island—Extension of Cape Traverse Wharf..... $40,000

Mr. FOSTER. That item is to be withdrawn.

Mr. LAURIER. Why is it withdrawn?

Mr. FOSTER. In the revision of the Estimates, it was put in by mistake.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there no necessity for that extension there?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no extension to be undertaken this year.

Mr. LAURIER. That does not answer my question. I asked if it is required or not?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not considered to be required this year.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply, May 19, 22, 26; June 5, 16, 30; July 2 and 3.

Intercolonial Railway..... $300,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Minister can give the explanation of this now?

Mr. FOSTER. I have seen the chief engineer since that vote was passed, and the information I have gathered from him is that the deficiency arose from an error in estimating. The Supplementary Estimate was made on the 1st January, 1890, and there were two things which he did not take into consideration. Basing his estimate on the receipts and expenditures of the preceding year, he thought the estimate was sufficient, but he left these two things out of consideration. One was purely an error, a want of thought, and that was that an amount would be required for the new railing which takes place at the end of the year, and which, in that case, amounted to nearly $200,000. That was a pure omission, something which escaped his mind. The other part was the added expenditure due to the opening up of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the consequent passage of extra trains from St. John to Halifax over the Intercolonial Railway. These two sums made up nearly the sum of $300,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then are we to understand that, in addition to the cost of subsidizing a road across the State of Maine, an extra expenditure of $300,000 is to be saddled upon the country for the special convenience of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know, and I did not say whether the expense from that alone was $100,000. The new railing cost about $200,000, and there would be required about $100,000 to make up the deficiency, but whether the whole of that was caused by the new trains being put on I do not know. There may have been some other deficiency included in that. Of course, that takes no account of what would be the extra receipts from the extra trains between St. John and Halifax.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand the matter, all the explanation the engineer gives is that, in January, 1890, he made certain omissions. Now, before the 23rd May, 1890, it must have been clear to him that his supplementary estimate would be enormously exceeded, and what I desire to know is whether any representations to that effect were made by the department prior to the 23rd May.

Mr. FOSTER. The engineer did not tell me that he had made any, and, if that error or omission had escaped his attention, he probably did not call the attention of the Government to it before the House adjourned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The omission must have occurred in January and not in May?

Mr. FOSTER. We adjourned in May.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that we adjourned on the 23rd May, about five weeks before the termination of the fiscal year, and it appears to me that it was impossible that the engineer in charge of the Intercolonial Railway should not have known by that time that his estimates would be $300,000 short. If he did not know it by that time, it is difficult to understand how he can be fit for his position.

Mr. FOSTER. There might be an omission of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of $300,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Of what might be necessary for the new railing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can understand that in January it might be possible that such an omission, though a very extraordinary one, should have taken place, but that, by the 23rd of May, by which time I take it a very large portion of these new rails had been put on, he should not have discovered how seriously astray he had been seems impossible on the supposition that the engineer knew what was going on upon the Intercolonial Railway. If we had closed say at the end of March, such a thing might be barely possible, but, closing on the 23rd May, it is almost entirely out of the question that the engineer should not have known it.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the explanation I have received.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, that I must say is a very unsatisfactory explanation. Now, is there any necessity that these unprovided items should be passed? The money has actually been paid, every penny of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. All paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, I think we had better let the item stand, because we would have to bring it up in some form afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. If you think that is necessary, I do not think I can give you any further explanation on that. I might get something fuller.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, I know the hon. gentleman is giving me exactly what has been stated to him; I am not imputing any blame to him. But the whole circumstances connected with this show such an extraordinary negligence, such extraordinary looseness in keeping the accounts, that it is necessary we should have some more explanation. Therefore, I shall ask the hon. gentleman to let this stand, as no possible detriment can accrue to the public service thereby.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow it to pass, the explanations can be asked and received just the same as on the item for the Intercolonial Railway in the main Estimates. Keeping these little tid-bits floating around is not desirable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it must be distinctly understood that we will have the power of returning to these unprovided items——

Mr. FOSTER. To this one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And also that the engineer will be here, and that some more satisfactory explanation will be given than we have had.

Mr. FOSTER. I will get as full explanation as I can.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If there is any explanation to be had.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.15 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 6th July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 83) respecting the Septennial Benevolent Society.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Order of Canadian Home Circles.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 126) to amend the North-West Territories Act. He said: This Act is very similar to the one introduced last year. It provides for the election of members of the Legislative Assembly for three years, making clear a doubt that existed about the provision of the Bill of last session on this point. It proposes to abolish the advisory council and the legal experts. It gives the Assembly all the powers it had previously by Order in Council, in addition to the disposition of the liquor question. There is a clause providing that a lump sum of money shall be placed at the disposal of the Legislative Assembly. The Bill also does away with the system of justices of the peace sitting in conjunction with the Supreme Court to hear criminal cases. It provides for the establishment of gaols in the North-West Territories and for applying to these the same regulations as are applicable to penitentiaries. It makes it illegal for any man to have liquor in his possession unless he has a permit in his own name. Section 110, which deals with the dual language, is altered in accordance with the resolution of the House of last session. The Bill also gives power to the Legislative Assembly to repeal all the provisions of the Act relating to the liquor traffic—this provision was in the former Bill—and grants to the Legislative Assembly the same powers as the provinces possess in regard to licenses, that is, after a general election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman state whether he provides that the advisers of the Lieutenant Governor shall enjoy the confidence of the majority of the Legislature?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is no provision for an executive at all.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate the Montreal and Atlantic Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Ives.)

Bill (No. 80) respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—(Mr. Ryckman.)

Bill (No. 96) respecting the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company.—(Mr. Jamieson.)

Bill (No. 87) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Desjardins, L'Islet.)

Bill (No. 91) to revive and amend the Act to enable the City of Winnipeg to utilize the Assiniboine River Water Power.—(Mr. Macdonald, Winnipeg.)

Bill (No. 70) to incorporate the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company.—(Mr. German.)

Bill (No. 107) to incorporate the Burrard Inlet and Westminster Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Corbould.)

BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CURRAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 82) respecting the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company.

Mr. AMYOT. Have the amendments made in the Railway Committee been printed?

Mr. CURRAN. I do not think they are printed, but they are on the Table.

Mr. AMYOT. We do not know what those amendments are yet?

Mr. CURRAN. I thought you knew in the Committee.

Mr. AMYOT. I want to know what the amendments are, and if they have been printed. This is a company incorporated by a local Act, and now it is proposed to have it declared to be for the general advantage of Canada and to have it incorporated here. I want to know if the consent of the Local Government has been obtained to this Bill, and also why the railway was first declared to be of local interest and now of general interest. I want to know what circumstances have changed that since. If there are no circumstances to change that, it would be invading the domain of the Local Parliament to pass this Act. It is not a matter of course that it should be passed here because it has been passed through the Committee. We are entitled to some information in regard to it.

Mr. CURRAN. In answer to my hon. friend I would say, in the first place, that I am instructed, and have reason to believe, that there is no objection on the part of the Local Government at Quebec to this legislation being carried out in its present form, and to this company being granted powers from this Parliament constituting it a work for the interest of the Dominion of Canada. As regards all the other questions connected with the Bill, which are the subject of discussion, I may say that my hon. friend will find that clause 6 of the printed Bill provides that "the time for the completion of the railway to Paspebiac is hereby extended to three years." To meet the views of those who objected to the extension of the time, that was reduced to two years, and it is so written in the Bill now. The time for the completion of the road is reduced from five years to four years, and the section is made more comprehensive in the way of clearness of expression. Now section 6 is also amended to this effect:

"And the company shall also be subject to all the liabilities and obligations of the company existing at the time of the passing of this Act; and any suit, action or proceeding pending, or judgment existing at the time of the passing of this Act, may be continued, completed and enforced against the company in the same manner as if this Act had not been passed."

So that there is not only a general provision in this section of the Bill that no rights shall be interfered with in any shape or form, but there is the further provision made which I have just read, and which leaves no room for doubt, all interested parties being present and agreeing that this covered their views. Then, we have added to section 5 the following:—

"The rights, powers, privileges and obligations of the company respecting the construction of its line, shall apply to the extent in mileage from the junction with the Intercolonial Railway at Metapedia to Gaspé Basin, a total distance of about 180 miles."

This is incurring very much larger responsibilities than the Legislature of Quebec had forced the company to undertake, because, whilst in the Bill obtained in the Local Legislature the company had the right to go as far as Gaspé Basin, by this Bill the company is forced to go to Gaspé Basin, and all the line is hypothecated for any claims that may exist. Then again, there is a change made in regard to the directorate; but, in everything connected with the principle to which my hon. friend referred in opening his remarks, the greatest safeguards have been thrown around the rights of all parties concerned, either public or private, and larger liabilities are incurred by the new company even than had been incurred in the original corporation under the provincial Act.

Mr. AMYOT. I am glad to hear that the local authorities have been consulted. I take the hon. member's words, of course, and I assume that it is correct, and that the Parliament of the Province of Quebec accepts the Bill. I want this to be clearly stated. I must say that, as a general rule, I find that the law which allows this Government to declare local works of general interest is very dangerous of application. In the second place, I suppose the Government have taken notice of this disposition of the Bill, because when this Parliament goes on to declare a certain work to be of public interest it assumes at the same time corresponding obligations. With this explanation, I will not object to the Bill going into committee.

Mr. JONCAS. I can corroborate the statement just made by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). I have always understood that the Provincial Government made no objection to this Parliament granting a charter to this company.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose it is useless to enter into a discussion of the question as to whether this House has jurisdiction over legislation of this particular class, but as there have been a number of measures, most of which are open to the same objection, to my mind, which lies against this Bill, I propose saying a word or two before we go into committee upon the Bill. It seems to me that we greatly abuse the provisions of the 92nd section of the British North America Act, subsection 10 of which authorizes us to declare that certain works are for the benefit of Canada, and that by such a declaration we may bring them within our jurisdiction. I confess that although this Parliament has for some years, at all events since 1883, committed itself to the principle of making every local work or undertaking which it chooses to declare to be for the benefit of Canada a work coming under the jurisdiction of Canada, I must say that I think that is a misinterpretation of sub-section 10 of the Act. Where is this subsection placed? Why, Sir, it is placed in section 92, which deals with the subjects enumerated that are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. That is the object of section 92. There are certain matters excepted out of that section in a portion of sub-section 10. Now, subsection 10 begins in this way:

"Local works and undertakings, other than such as are of the following classes:—"

Then follows an enumeration in clauses a, b and c. As clause c of sub-section 10 is being interpreted, it would be in the power of this Parliament to declare any work or thing undertaken to be for the general advantage of Canada, and in that way take to itself jurisdiction. For instance, there would be nothing to prevent this House declaring that the street railway which runs along Wellington street, from Bank street to the Canadian Pacific Railway station, is a work undertaken for the general benefit of Canada, and that street railway would be placed under the absolute jurisdiction of this Parliament. Now, I do not understand the section in that way. It seems to me that you are obliged to give such a construction to sub-section 10 of section 92 as that there will be something left under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures; for it is obvious to any one who will reflect for a moment that the assumption upon which we have been proceeding for the past eight years is an assumption which places no limitation upon our powers in reference to local works and undertakings. Now, is that a true construction of this Act? Was it intended to be so construed? I do not think so. There are certain classes of work here mentioned in sub-sections a, b and c, and it appears to me that the rule, ejusdem generis, applies to the whole—not to those mentioned in section a alone, or in section b alone, or in section c alone, but to the whole of these sub-sections taken together. If that is so, then I think that all these tributary railways that are situated within the limit of any province are under the exclusive jurisdiction of that province, and cannot be brought under the exclusive jurisdiction of this Parliament by a simple declaration on our part. There must be certain characteristics that belong to local works or undertakings that will preclude this Parliament from making the declaration upon the subject. For instance, a canal connecting the Georgian Bay with Lake Ontario, although a work wholly within the limits of the Province of Ontario, yet if it should make a continuous waterway extending over several provinces it might be regarded as a work for the general advantage of Canada. So if there is a railway in one province and a waterway in another, and a canal was required to connect the two, although it might be situated in one province, yet, when it was made, it might be considered to be for the general advantage of Canada. Then that declaration would be right enough, and it would leave a great portion of the work of a local and provincial character still within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. But it is clear that we are in these measures putting an interpretation on the Act which would enable this Parliament by a simple declaration to declare any work, any street railway, any macadamized road, any work, however local or insignificant in its character, to be for the general advantage of Canada, and thus be brought within our jurisdiction. I do not think it is a reasonable and a sensible construction of the Act. It is an abuse of the powers conferred upon us, and it is intended to enlarge our jurisdiction in a manner never contemplated by the framers of the Act and never acted upon for many years after it came into operation.

Mr. FAUVEL. As representing the constituency through which this road is to pass, I beg to state that I am quite satisfied with the Bill and its amendments, and at the same time I hope that on a future occasion, when the House shall be called upon to grant some subsidy to this road, we shall have our share of the public moneys.

Motion agreed to; Bill considered in committee and reported.

PAPERS RESPECTING KINGSTON DOCK.

Mr. AMYOT. I beg permission to ask the Minister of Public Works if the papers concerning Kingston dock have been laid before the House? They were to be brought down, if I understand rightly, on Friday last, in answer to a request I made to be allowed to see them in the department. After recess we were promised they would be laid at once on the Table; and if they have not been laid on the Table, I should like to know when that will be done, and when they will be brought down.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was promised by my deputy that he would send them down before the sitting of the House. I may have them before six o'clock, or afterwards.

QUEBEC POST OFFICE—SUNDAY CLOSING.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. LANGELIER) asked, Whether the Postmaster General, or any other member of the Government, received during the course of the past year a petition signed by His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau, Dean Norman and many citizens of Quebec, asking that the post office of the said city may remain closed on Sunday?

Mr. HAGGART. Such petition was received in March last year, and an answer was given on 20th of the same month.

MAILS BETWEEN CANADA AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. By what line or lines of steamships are the mails carried between Canada and Great Britain? 2. What does the Government pay for such service?

Mr. HAGGART. The mails are forwarded from Canada to Great Britain by the following lines, and at the prices mentioned: Allan line, via Quebec, 50 cents per pound for letters, and 5 cents per pound for other matter; Inman line, Cunard line and White Star line, via New York, 5 francs per kilogram for letters and 50 centimes per kilogram for other matter.

CIVIL SERVANTS AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, How many civil servants resigned to take part in the elections? Did the Government ask them to resign? How many of them have been reappointed to office since?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No civil servant resigned to take part in the elections, and no civil servant was asked to resign by the Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What about the statement made the other day that the postmaster at Galt had resigned?

HARBOUR AT CASCUMPEQUE.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is the work of improving the harbour of Cascumpeque, P.E.I., going on? If not, why not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work at Cascumpeque was suspended on 30th June. No appropriation has been made for continuing it during 1891-92.

DREDGE PRINCE EDWARD.

Mr. PERRY asked, Why is the dredge Prince Edward not working? Will said dredge do any work this season? When will the work begin, and where?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My answer to the first question is: because the repairs were not completed until the end of June. To the second question my answer is, yes. To the third question my answer is: the dredge has been ordered to Summerside, and will commence work immediately on arrival.

POSTMASTER AT HOLSTEIN.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Did the postmaster at Holstein tender his resignation? If so, when? Was it accepted? If not, why not? Was it withdrawn? If so, when? Did any persons apply for the office? If so, who were they? Were petitions sent into the department on behalf of any candidates for the office? If so, in whose behalf?

Mr. HAGGART. The postmaster at Holstein tenderd his resignation by letter dated October 30, 1890, and it was accepted under date November 30, 1890. There is nothing to show that the resignation was withdrawn. The only application for the office was from Mr. George L. Gilroy. No petitions were received in Mr. Gilroy's favour.

INSPECTOR DINGMAN.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Have the Government taken any, and what action about the following letter:—

"SIR,—Inspector Dingman of Indian Agencies arrived in Port Elgin on Saturday, the 20th inst.; on Monday he was in Southampton and at the Indian reserve. Agent Allen was from home. Inspector Dingman had a conversation with R. Johnston and T. Solomon; he told them they must be easy with Allen, and said he would hold an investigation in Allen's house at ten o'clock on Tuesday; Johnston and Solomon wanted it held at the Council chamber; the Inspector held it at Agent Allen's house with closed doors; chiefs, councillors and others were excluded from ten o'clock (except adjournment for dinner). The whole day was taken up trying to persuade Johnston and Solomon that they were only entitled to witness fees, and trying to worm out of them who had written the letter for them, and asked them if Creighton had not written it for them.

"Now, if Johnston and Solomon were only entitled to witness fees, why did Agent Allen give Johnston an order for $10 to Mulvaney's store, Port Elgin? Agent Allen was sent to the reserve with full power of two magistrates to adjudicate on all matters occurring on the reserve, and outside matters where Indians are concerned; it is his duty to protect them, and have violators of the law punished. When Solomon and Johnston lodged their information against McVittie and Briggs with Agent Allen, they expected half of the fine, but instead of them getting it they are told 'it was not you made the information, it was I who did it,' and he pockets half of the fine the Indians ought to have. Inspector Dingman occupied the whole of Tuesday with closed doors to get Allen out of his difficulty; he does not even call a witness. If that is what the department pays Mr. Dingman for, the sooner the public know it the better.

"I am, Sir, yours truly, (Sd.) "JOHN CREIGHTON.

"SOUTHAMPTON, 27th June, 1891."

Mr. DEWDNEY. The letter from John Creighton, a discharged Indian agent, of which the above is supposed to be a copy, was only received by this department on the first of this month. No action has as yet been taken thereon.

MANITOBA SCHOOL LAND.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to put into the market the Manitoba school land this year? If so, when?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; it is proposed to sell some of the school lands in Manitoba. The date is not actually fixed. It will depend largely upon the time when the crop is harvested, and will take place as soon after that event as convenient. Due public notice of the date or dates will be given.

LIEUT. COLONEL ARTHUR BEAUDRY.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cancel the commission of Lieutenant Colonel Arthur Beaudry, Commandant of the 81st Battalion, Portneuf, in view of the fact that the said officer has, in violation of No. 74 of Regulations of the Militia of Canada, for several years past resided outside of the County of Portneuf, wherein his battalion is formed? Whether any complaints or reports have ever been made against him, and if so, when, and by what persons?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not compulsory for commanding officers to reside within the limits of their command. No. 74 of Regulations and Orders reads as follows:—

"Officers of the Active Militia must be resident within the limits of the city, county, or countries from which men composing the corps are drawn. On their ceasing to reside within such limits, their commission may be cancelled."

The only complaint against Lieut. Col. Beaudry is one filed in February, 1886, by one Levis Dussault, for not accounting for band allowance to his regiment. This matter was settled to the satisfaction of all parties, according to a report of the Deputy Adjutant General of the District.

NEW ENGLAND PAPER COMPANY.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Has the Government or any of the public departments purchased any paper within the past six years from the New England Paper Company, or Mr. J. Brookes Young, or any agent of theirs? If so, how much and to what value?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The only transaction with the New England Paper Company found in the books of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, during the last six years, is as follows:—

"November 26th, 1890, 252 reams printing paper, 25½x36—55-500s. at 7¾ cents. Value, $1,074.15."

No purchases in the name of J. Brookes Young, nor any through any known agent. There are certainly none during the last three and a-half years.

POSTMASTERS' SALARIES.

Mr. GERMAN asked, Did the postmasters at Niagara Falls, Niagara Falls South, Thorold and Chippawa, or either of them, receive as salaries for the years 1889 and 1890, or either of said years, a larger sum than 40 per cent. on the first $800 of actual postal revenue, and 25 per cent. on the revenue in excess of $800? And if so, for what reason?

Mr. HAGGART. Niagara Falls—year ended 30th June, 1889: This being an office at which night duty was performed the postmaster received the percentage usual in such cases of 50 per cent. on the first $800 of revenue. Year ended 30th June, 1890: Same rate of allowance maintained, the circumstances being unaltered. As revenue of office was falling, however, salary was reduced in former year by $80, and in the latter year $60. Niagara Falls South—year ended 30th June, 1889: This being an office at which night duty was performed the postmaster received the percentage usual in such cases of 50 per cent. on the first $800 of revenue. Year ended 30th June, 1890: Night duty having ceased the salary was reduced from $560 to $500. The latter amount was still in excess of 40 per cent., but certain returns in possession of the department indicated that the revenue from sale of stamps did not fully represent the business of the office. Thorold — Year ended the 30th June, 1889: Postmaster was allowed slightly less than 40 per cent. on the revenue, certain returns received by the department indicating that the actual postal business of the office was less than stamp sales. Year ended 30th June, 1890: The salary allowed was in excess of 40 per cent. on the first $800 of revenue. The revenue had fallen off and the department was unwilling to reduce it suddenly to the exact figures warranted by the established sale. It was reduced, however, by $80. Chippawa—Year ended 30th June, 1889: This being an office at which night duty was performed the postmaster received the percentage usual in such cases of 50 per cent. on the first $800 of revenue. Year ended 30th June, 1890: The amount of night duty not being so great the rate was allowed of 45 per cent.

FORT ERIE AND BUFFALO FERRY.

Mr. GERMAN asked, Has the Government instituted an enquiry into the management of the ferry running between Fort Erie and Buffalo? What is the result of such enquiry, if any? What action, if any, does the Government intend taking in the matter?

Mr. COSTIGAN. A report was made but no action has yet been taken, further information being necessary.

OXFORD AND PICTOU MAILS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Does the Government intend to have the mails carried on the Short Line from Oxford to Pictou and delivered at all stations along the line?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government do intend to have the mails carried on the Short Line from Oxford to Pictou, and, I think, delivered along all the stations on the line.

LIVERPOOL, N.S., POST OFFICE.

Mr. FORBES asked, Whether the Government is aware of the insufficient postal accommodation in the town of Liverpool to meet the requirements of the people of said town, and whether it is the intention of the Government to supply a building of sufficient accommodation by construction, purchase or lease, to satisfy the requirements of the town?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has taken no action about the erection of a building there yet.

STONE FOR LANGEVIN BLOCK.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What number of miles was the stone used in the construction of the Langevin Block carried over the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. BOWELL. 411 miles.

EXPORT OF WILD FOWL.

Mr. McKAY asked, Whether, in view of the fact that a large number of petitions has been sent to this House praying for certain amendments to the Customs Act prohibiting the export of wild fowl, &c., it is the intention of the Government to amend the Act in that direction?

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce a measure this session to prohibit the export of wild fowl.

MR. LAFORCE LANGEVIN.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Whether one Laforce Langevin, who has for several years been employed as assistant engineer of the Quebec Harbour Works, with a salary of $1,800 a year, has ever obtained a diploma as civil engineer, and if so, when, and from what institution?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Laforce Langevin holds a certificate of membership of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, a society incorporated under Act 50-51 Vic., chapter 124. The following is a copy of the certificate:—

"THE CANADIAN SOCIETY OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.
"Established, 1887.
"Incorporated by Dominion Act, June, 1887.

"These are to certify that Hector Laforce Langevin is an Associate Member of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, a society established for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a Civil Engineer, whereby the great sources of power in nature are converted, adapted and applied for the use and convenience of man.

"Witness our hands and seal at Montreal this 27th day of June, 1888.

"C. S. GZOWSKI, President.
"HENRY T. BOVEY, Secretary."

CAPTAIN OF THE ALERT.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Who is the captain of the steamboat Alert? Did this captain undergo an examination before being appointed to this position? Did other persons undergo an examination of fitness for this position at the same time that he did? If there were such other persons, who were they? Was the appointment made in accordance with the results of the examinations? If such was the case, what was the number of points obtained by each candidate?

Mr. TUPPER. No captain has been permanently appointed. One has been temporarily employed on probation, Charles Koenig. He underwent an examination before being appointed to this position. He was examined by the Board of Examiners of Masters and Mates in 1873, and granted a master's certificate of competency, seagoing, on the 21st March, 1873, by the Department of Marine. Capt. Koenig was again examined by Capts. Smith and McElhinney on the 15th April, 1891, with other applicants. Capt. Koenig was taken on board the Alert on the 29th May, and his abilities and qualifications practically tested under the supervision of Capt. McElhinney, who reported to the department that he was satisfied that Capt. Koenig is competent for the position of master of the steamer Alert. Other persons underwent examination of fitness for the position at the same time as Captain Koenig. They were Jean Baptiste Bélanger, Arthur Morin, Onésime Bernier and Sigismond Bélanger, and they were examined by Captains Smith and McElhinney on 15th April, 1891. There were also examined by Captain McElhinney alone, Sigismond Bélanger, Jean B. Bélanger, Charles Koenig, Arthur Morin, Onésime Bernier, H. O. Bernier, A. Sansterre and D. F. Pelletier. Captain Koenig was employed as the best available man in accordance with the result of the examination. No points were given for answer to questions, as the examination was not conducted upon the system of giving merit marks for each question, but was conducted with a view to ascertain what were the abilities, general knowledge, experience and practical qualifications of the candidates for the position of master of the steamer Alert, to be engaged in the supply service. The applicants all hold certificates of competency, having passed previous examinations.

CITY MARKET PROPERTY, HALIFAX.

Mr. FRASER asked, What correspondence or interviews have taken place between the Government and any members or ex-members of the syndicate who purchased the City Market property, Halifax, for $20,300? What is the price asked by the syndicate, and do the Government contemplate purchasing said property at the price asked, or at any other price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not aware of any correspondence or interviews having taken place between the Government and any members or ex-members of a syndicate who purchased the City Market property at Halifax.

WHARF AT KNOWLTON'S LANDING.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. RIDER) asked, 1. Has any survey or other enquiry been made respecting the building of a wharf at Knowlton's Landing, or at any other place on the shore of Lake Memphremagog? If so, has any report been made? If a report has been made, what is the nature of such report? 2. When and by whom was such survey or enquiry made? 3. If the report is favourable to the construction of such wharf, when will the work be undertaken? 4. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with this work this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A survey has been made. Two reports have been made. The first reported on the construction of a wharf at an estimated cost of $2,800, the second on making an existing wharf available at a cost of $950. The examination was made in February and March last by Mr. Assistant Engineer Lafleur. The matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether in cases of claims for damages against the Crown resulting from accidents on the Intercolonial Railway, and petitions of right filed in relation thereto, it is the intention of the Government to plead prescription as a defence, or to resist such claims solely on the merits and facts in each case?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would not be the policy of the Government to plead prescription in any case where the delay did not occur through the fault of the plaintiff, or in any case in which the plaintiff delayed on account of waiting for the adjudication of his rights in any other case.

THE DUTY ON BINDING TWINE.

Mr. MULOCK moved:

That the House do go into Committee of the Whole to consider a resolution: That binding twine be placed upon the free list.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion which I am about to place in your hands I gave notice of on the 1st of May, but at the request of the Government I have allowed it to stand until the present time. In view of the long time that has elapsed in unsuccessful endeavour in this way to ascertain the intentions of the Government, and also in view of the fact that in the Budget speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance a few days ago no reference is made to this important subject, I deem it my duty now to bring the matter to the attention of the House. In proposing that binding twine be placed on the free list, in order to establish a case it will only be necessary, I think, to show a reasonable prospect that a reduction in price to the consumer would result from the adoption of the course this motion suggests. I would, therefore, trouble the House with a few figures, which I think are reliable, showing the prices which obtain to-day in Canada and in the adjoining country. I am informed by what I consider a reliable authority that the prevailing price of binding twine in the United States to-day, in car loads of ten tons, is as follows: pure manila, 11 cents; pure sisal, 7½ cents; pure New Zealand, 7 cents; whereas the prices in Canada in similar quantities are as follows: pure manila, 14 cents, and pure sisal from 11 cents to 12¼ cents. Thus you will see that there is a difference between the prices in the States and in Canada of upwards of 3 cents per pound.

Mr. McMILLAN. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to give us the source of his information for these quotations?

Mr. MULOCK. The figures I have read are from a letter which I received from a dealer. I will read the letter without giving the signature, unless it is really important.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. MULOCK. I am willing to give the name if desired. The letter, upon which I partly base my information, is written to a firm of manufacturers of implements, and is an application to them to do business through the writer. It is as follows:—

"DEAR SIRS,—The National Cordage Co. of New York quote me prices as follows:—Ten-ton lots pure manila, 11 cents; pure sisal, 7½ cents; New Zealand, 7 cents. At these prices you should do some business. Do not say much about it, as I do not want the Canadian cord men to get after me. I expect to place over twenty cars here, as I can undersell them nearly a cent and make $250 a car on it. The duty is 25 per cent. I got samples of this twine and find it is superior to any of the Canadian makes. They also make mixed twine of different prices."

I have had the advantage of information from persons in the trade and others, and I think that the figures I give represent substantially the difference in prices prevailing in the United States and Canada to-day.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Would the figures you give apply to car loads in Canada as well?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes; the figures I give apply to car loads of ten tons each in the United States and Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. Has the hon. gentleman any information as to whether that is the American charge at which they propose to send to Canada, or is it the export price for Canadian consumption?

Mr. MULOCK. The prices I have read are the prices at which the company in question are prepared to sell to the Canadian dealer for the Canadian market.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Do they sell their own dealers at that price?

Mr. MULOCK. I believe the Americans have a system that obtains in Canada as well. I understand the Canadian manufacturers of binder twine, taking advantage of the tariff, exact a higher price from the Canadian consumers than they do from those abroad.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). That is a Yankee trick.

Mr. MULOCK. It is being copied here. Our National Policy is only a Yankee imitation. At all events, on reading that valuable work on combines, which was the outcome of the enquiry directed by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), a couple of years ago, you will find it there sworn to that the Canadian manufacturer of binder twine sells the article at a lower price, of about a cent, I think, a pound to those outside of Canada than to the Canadian consumer. The result is that the Canadian consumer is obliged to pay, to-day, on an average, about 3 cents per pound more for the twine than he otherwise would have. I presume that if an American manufacturer wishes to trade abroad and chooses to sell to-day to Canada at less than he would sell in the United States he would adopt that same policy, whether there be a tariff wall or not.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is familiar with the policy of the American manufacturers. I am not, any further than what they have made public. But following out my reasoning, I find that the result is that the farmers of Canada are compelled to pay, on an average, 3 cents a pound more than the article is worth; for it is reasonable to presume that the American manufacturer does not sell the stuff either to the people of Canada or the United States at less than its value. It is not our business if he is selling to the United States consumers at a higher price than he can get from the Canadian consumer plus the duty. It is sufficient for us to look after the interests of Canadian farmers, and I think on that point there can be no doubt the tariff to-day has placed the Canadian farmer, in respect of binder twine, entirely at the mercy of that industry, which is using the tariff to exact unreasonable advantage and profit from the Canadian people. Just to bring this matter home to myself, I made a calculation as to what the excessive price costs the people of the County of York; and taking the last returns, the returns for last year, from the county council of the County of York, I find it is there stated that there are now in the County of York 529,044 acres of land assessed, and assuming that one-third of that is under grain crop there would be 176,348 acres of crop to take off. Thus, if it takes two pounds of twine per acre—which may be taken as a fair average, perhaps rather under the amount than over it——

Mr. CASEY. Rather under it.

Mr. MULOCK. At all events, assuming that is not an outside estimate, it amounts to this, that the farmers of the County of York pay $10,580.88 more than this twine is worth. They are compelled to do that by reason of the tariff, and I think it is fair to assume that if the present duty were abolished the price of twine would fall in proportion. I have only to point to what has happened within the last few days, since the Budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance—a speech to a certain extent on the lines of a second resolution of which I had the honour to give notice, and which is on the Paper, to place sugar upon the free list—I need only point to what happened in the sugar market of Canada as soon as his Budget speech was made as a sure indication of what would follow were he to announce a similar policy in regard to binder twine. Why did the price of Canadian sugar fall when the hon. Minister took off the duty on certain grades of sugar? It fell simply as effect follows cause. The cost of the article was reduced, and the consumer got the benefit. Such would inevitably be the result, I have no possible doubt, were he to adopt the same policy with regard to binder twine. If the present condition of the farmer in regard to his binder twine is what I have stated, what is it likely to be should what is indicated in the papers really be the case? It is asserted, with what truth I do not know, by prominent journals, that one great corporation in the States, the National Cordage Company, has acquired control of the binding twine factories of Canada. For example, in the Ottawa Citizen, 20th of June, 1891, there appeared the following telegraphic despatch from Halifax :—

"A BIG DEAL.

"A SYNDICATE SECURES CONTROL OF LEADING CANADIAN CORDAGE MILLS.

"HALIFAX, N.S., 19th.—It is learned here to-day that the National Cordage Company, of New York, has purchased the business of the Dartmouth Rope Works Company. The importance of this transfer can only be properly realized when the magnitude of the turn-over is known. The concern employs over six hundred hands, and the sales exceed one and a-half millions per annum. It is claimed that the National have now secured all of the Canadian mills, eleven in number, and intend to materially increase the capacity of the larger concerns in the Maritime Provinces to compete for export business, owing to cheap labour and other advantages possessed by these mills."

The advantages of manufacturing in Canada are so great that this factory proposes to be able to export to the free markets of the world, and there enter into open competition with twine manufactured all over the world; and yet the Government proposes to make the Canadian farmer pay 25 per cent. more than the free market price for this product. On Saturday the following article, taken from the Boston Daily Advertizer, appeared in the Globe :—

"The Boston Daily Advertizer, in the course of a favourable notice of the National Cordage Company's affairs, says:

"'The company actually has purchased all the cordage mills in Canada, and the cordage business of the Dominion of Canada is protected by a tariff wall which enables the business to work at a profit.'"

Now, if it is true that the National Cordage Company, of New York, has obtained control of the Canadian manufacture, we will simply have in an intensified form the evils from which we were suffering a short time ago. I find, again, in the Journals of this House of 1888, page 403, the evidence of Alexander W. Morris, of Montreal, manufacturer. I understand that this evidence has never been contradicted, and, therefore, we may assume that it was correct. A committee was enquiring into the working of combines, and into the question of the binder twine combines. It appears that Mr. Connors was a member of the combine, and the evidence contained in this book shows that the manufacturers of binder twines had arranged to limit their productions and pool their profits. Mr. Morris was examined as to how the combine affected the trade. He gave the following evidence :—

By Mr. Gillmor:

"Q. Mr. Connors is in your combination? A.—He was in, but there is no combination now.

"Q. How many were there in the combination?—A. Five.

"Q. You were proportioned out what each one should make?—A. Yes; we each had a stated percentage.

"Q. What proportion of all the quantity that was to be made for Canada did he make?—A. On binder twine last year he had a percentage, I think, of 10 per cent. of the whole; and I think he manufactured about two tons of twine.

"Q. How much did he get last year out of the pool, as you call it, as near as you can tell?—A. I think about $6,000 or $7,000. Perhaps as much as that. It might be $5,000.

"Q. For not making rope?—A. No; not making binder twine."

So, for not having manufactured binder twine, he receives a bonus of about $5,000, or about a dollar a pound for what he did not manufacture. How did the people who were in the pool come to be able to give $5,000 for the work which this man did not do? He toiled not, neither did he spin. If the opportunity is again afforded, we will find that there will again be one corporation which will absorb the whole of this industry. I think the farming population are entitled to the relief which I ask for in this resolution, which I, therefore, move.

Mr. GRIEVE. It is not my intention to take up the time of the House very long this afternoon, but I feel it my duty to my constituents to say a few words in reference to the resolution which is before the House. As a young member of this House, representing a farming constituency, and one of the most progressive agricultural constituencies in the Province of Ontario or the Dominion of Canada, I think I would not be doing my duty if I did not raise my voice against the unjust tax which is now being levied on the farmers of this country. I do not intend to enter into a general discussion of the tariff, but I shall confine myself to the resolutions which are before the House. For my part, I am not aware whether there is any combination in regard to the manufacture and sale of binder twine or not; but, if I were to judge by the reports which are presented, I could come to no other conclusion excepting that there is a combine for that purpose. Combines of this nature are about the worst that the farmers have to contend with. I remember when a great combination existed between the binder manufacturers of Canada, though the twine manufacturers were not in the combine at the same time. I remember when the farmers were forced to pay $210 cash for a binder, while the same article was sold for $65 less money after the combination was terminated. Some of the farmers who paid $210 when they should have obtained the same binder for $145 have come to the conclusion, as we must, that they paid the extra amount simply because of the protection which was afforded to the manufacturer of the machines. I understand that now our responsible rulers are not satisfied with the invoice of the article. A Canadian dealer imports an article of twine and receives an invoice for it, and he pays 10 cents per pound, or 2½ cents per pound duty, but our Customs officials insist upon charging him on the value of the article in the Canadian market, and they charge him from three-fourths of a cent to 1 cent per pound over and above the actual cost. That is a very serious item. I have in my possession several samples of twine which I would be willing to show to hon. gentlemen. They are samples of sisal and manila twine. The American quotations of mixed twine are 8¼ cents a pound, while the Canadian quotations are from 12 to 13 cents a pound. The American quotations for sisal twine are 7¾ cents and the Canadian quotations 11 cents, or 3¼ cents in favour of the American twine. Now, I consider this a very serious item to the farmers of Canada, more especially to those of Ontario, Manitoba and the North-West Territories, where twine is used to a much greater extent than in the other provinces. Let us take into consideration the enormous amount of twine that is annually used to bind the harvests of this country. I find, in looking over the returns made to this House in 1888, when a committee of the House was appointed to investigate and to report upon alleged combinations, Mr. Massey, of Toronto, one of the largest and most successful manufacturers of Canada, who was examined before this commitee, gave it as his opinion that it would require over 3,000 tons of twine to bind the harvest of 1888. If his figures were correct, and I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will admit that probably no better authority could be found in that respect in the whole Dominion of Canada, I think I am within the mark when I say it would require 4,000 tons of twine, or 8,000,000 pounds, to bind the harvest of 1891, provided that the harvest of 1891 is as bountiful as it was in 1888; and I am sure we all wish that it may be so. Now, taking the price of American and Canadian twine at the present time, we find at the least calculation, at 3 cents per pound, the farmers of Canada have got to pay between $250,000 and $300,000 over the legitimate price of that article. Now, I contend this is a very serious matter indeed. And what excuse have the Government for extorting that amount out of the pockets of the farmers? Is it to enrich the treasury? If that amount of money went into the Dominion treasury the Government might hesitate in taking action on the matter; but, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1890, we imported into this country, for home consumption, only 27,990 pounds of twine, valued at $4,915, and on that we received of duty $1,279.18; so that the farmers of Canada are annually forced to pay nearly $300,000 over and above the legitimate price of their goods in order that the treasury may be enriched to the extent of $1,279.18. Some people talk about encouraging home industry, about encouraging home manufacturers. I believe that the great majority of the farmers of Canada to-day would rather buy their machines and twine of Canadian manufacture if they could get them at the same price, but I do not believe there is a single farmer in Canada who would rather buy twine of a Canadian manufacturer at 12 and 13 cents per pound, when he can get an equally good or better article of American manufacture at 10 cents a pound. Now, I will show the House how this affects the farmers in my own County of Perth, that I have the honour to be one of the representatives of. There is probably only one way by which we can get at the amount of twine used in that county, and that is by taking the number of acres that are put under crop. I find, according to the report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries for 1889—the last report issued by the department—that in the County of Perth there were 39,474 acres under fall wheat; 1,853 acres under spring wheat; 17,728 acres under barley; 68,184 acres under oats; 44 acres under rye—making a total of 127,283 acres of grain. It may not be correct to say that all that grain was harvested with binders, but I believe I am within the limit when I say that at least seventeen-twentieths of the farmers throughout the county have binders, and the majority of those who have not generally hire their neighbours who have binders to cut their grain. Now, as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) stated truly, it requires, at the least calculation, two pounds of twine to bind an acre of grain, and I am satisfied he was within the figure when he said that. If the Canadian farmer has got to pay 3 cents a pound for twine over and above the legitimate price, he has got to pay 6 cents an acre over and above what he would be obliged otherwise to pay if there were no duty upon twine. That means to the farmers of the County of Perth no less a sum than $7,636.98 that is wrung out of their pockets in order that two or three manufacturers may become millionaires. Now, I do not think that is a proper position for this Government to place farmers in, when we take into consideration that the farmers of Canada form 75 per cent. of the total population. It seems to me absurd that they should be taxed to that enormous extent in order to make fortunes for a few manufacturers. In the House the other afternoon the Minister of Finance said, in reference to abolishing the duty of raw sugar:

> "But the Government has looked over the whole question, and on two conditions it has come to the conclusion to sweep away, from the burden of the great mass of the people, with one stroke of the pen, $3,500,000 of taxation; and I venture to say, Sir, that never in the history of Canada, either before Confederation or since Confederation, has any Government come down to the House with such a large reduction of taxes as is involved in this proposition."

Now, it seems to me that the Government deserves a considerable amount of credit so far as that article is concerned. We are willing to give them credit where credit is due; the only thing we can complain of is, that they did not do away with the duty upon sugar years ago. I would ask the Minister of Finance that, with another stroke of his pen, he would relieve the farmers of Canada of their burdens to the extent of $300,000 that the Government now take out of their pockets annually by means of the duty on an article so necessary to them.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the price of mixed binding twine was 12 cents. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. GRIEVE. I said 12 or 13 cents, and sometimes as high as 14 cents.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not propose, upon this question of binding twine, to go into the whole argument between protection and free trade, but I would point out that there is a great difference between the duties upon sugar and the duties upon binding twine. The duty that has been taken off sugar has been taken off the raw material, and as I understand it, the raw material of binding twine is admitted free, so that there is all the difference in the world. Therein lies the whole principle of the National Policy—that the raw material is admitted free while duty is placed upon the manufactured article. Now, something was said about the price of binders. The hon. gentleman has given up the whole case with regard to binders, because he has admitted that the price of binders was brought down $65 on each article. Well, Sir, under the National Policy I say, and there can be no contradiction to it, that the price of agricultural implements has gone down very nearly, on the whole, 50 per cent. since that policy came into operation. What absurdity it is to say that the National Policy, as regards these articles, has imposed a tax upon the farmers. We know there is no foundation for it. Now, with regard to binding twine, having pointed out the distinction that must be made between the duty upon the raw material and the duty upon the manufactured article, I beg to tell the hon. gentleman, and those who have spoken on this question, that I have got that same mixed binding twine that he speaks of as worth 12 to 13 cents—I have bought it in quantity of 100 pounds at 10 cents. I bought it myself the other day, and that is the regular price in the town of Barrie, where I get my supply. It can be bought at retail by the 100 pounds at that price, and I was assured that the article was sufficiently good for all practical purposes. I could have got a cheaper article—I am speaking from memory now, because I am not positive about the other articles—I believe I could have got an inferior article at 8 cents, and I could have got a better article at 13 cents and 14 cents. The very highest price quoted to me for the best twine was 14 cents; for the medium quality, which I purchased, and which seemed to be sufficiently good for the purpose, 10 cents, and, if I had desired, I could have obtained an inferior article for 8 cents. Those prices were at retail for 100 pounds, and there are very few farmers who would want less than that quantity. If that is the case, it does not matter whether the duty is 25, 50 or 100 per cent. If we get the articles as cheap as we would do otherwise we have nothing of which to complain. The assumption is made in all these cases that the consumer pays, in addition to the cost of the article or what the cost of the article ought to be, the duty. That is to say, if a man ought to be able to buy binding twine at 10 cents, with a duty of 25 per cent., he really is called upon to pay the difference between the true cost and 25 per cent. If that were so, it would be very good ground for an attack on the National Policy. But hon. gentlemen must establish that as a matter of fact, otherwise there is no foundation for their argument. What is the case? I, for one, would never stand in this House or elsewhere to defend a policy which would place anything like an unfair advantage in the hands of the manufacturers. I do not think the consumers should pay an additional price in order that any man or any body of men should make fortunes. It is our duty as regards the consumers to watch the operations of the National Policy, and if we find any articles on which any manufacturers or combination of manufacturers enforces a higher price in consequence of the duty, it is our duty to interfere, to step in and tell the Government that as regards that article or any article of the same class the duty should be reduced and the protection, of which the manufacturers are taking an unfair advantage, should not any longer be continued. But so long as the duty operates simply to prevent the introduction of foreign-made articles and does not increase their price to the consumer, the National Policy is answering its legitimate purpose and the purpose for which it was proposed in 1878 when it was adopted. If my figures are correct, my case is proved, and the hon. gentleman has nothing further to say. He may argue from now to doomsday the theoretical advantage of free trade as against protection, so long as we are satisfied that the prices of the articles entering into general consumption are not enhanced to the consumer by the consumer paying the duty on the manufactured article. That seems to me to be the whole case. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to make out his case, and the figures he gave were, no doubt, quoted fairly and honestly; but the whole question depends on whether his figures are correct or not. My case also depends on the accuracy of my figures. The hon. gentleman says he paid 12 cents; I paid 10 cents, and I say I paid no more than I should have done. The Government in the matter of sugar simply did what they ought to have done in accordance with the principles of the National Policy, and that was to admit raw sugar free of duty.

Mr. MULOCK. It took them a long time to do it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It may be a fair ground of attack to say that they should have taken this action long ago. The answer to that would be that the duty on sugar provided a certain revenue, and until the Government saw their way to replace it they could not remove the duty. It is evident that this was the case, for we are obliged to make up a portion of the deficiency by increasing the tariff on other articles of a similar nature. One of the articles of a similar kind in which the farmers are personally interested is that of salt; and so soon as the Government found the operation of the National Policy was doing a great injustice to the general consumer they stepped in, as they ought to have done, and as they ought to do in all such cases, and reduced the duty, so as to prevent combinations taking advantage of the circumstances and placing an undue tax on the consumer. I say the whole question rests on this: whether, as a matter of fact, the consumer is made to pay the duty upon the manufactured article. Of course, if there was a duty on the raw material, necessarily the consumer would have to pay the duty; but if our manufacturers, having the raw material free, can produce the manufactured article and sell it to the consumer at as low a rate as it can be bought outside, then the consumer pays nothing. This duty might as well be 50 per cent. or not enforced. It is a mere matter of form as to what the duty is, so long as the consumer does not pay it. The whole article comes down to a question of figures and the prices we really pay. I have given my experience and the hon. member has given his, and the House can ascertain which figures are correct.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman made a valuable admission at the close of his speech. He said, if the Canadian manufacturer can get his raw material free he can produce quite as cheaply as any one else, and it is a mere matter of form as to what the duty is on the manufactured article. According to the hon. gentleman, it makes no difference in the price of the finished article whether the duty is 10, 50 or 100 per cent., so long as the raw material comes in free. I should like to ask him if he would follow out that statement logically by asking the Minister of Finance to raise the duty on refined sugar to double the present duty, the raw material of which comes in free, and then see if the price of the finished article would not be increased. The hon. gentleman has stated clearly the only ground on which a protective policy can possibly be defended.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I stated two conditions; please state both.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman says that a protective policy can only be defended on the ground that the amount of the duty on the finished article has no relation to the price afterwards, so long as the raw material comes in free. The only difficulty as regards that basis on which to build an argument in favour of the protective policy is that it is not true. My hon. friend made several statements that were as distinctly logical as that to which I have referred, and more correct. The hon. gentleman says we may argue as long as we like on the theoretical advantages of free trade so long as we cannot show that the prices are enhanced by the National Policy, and it is merely a question of figures and prices. That is quite correct. It all depends on the accuracy of the figures. In this particular instance the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Grieve) has obtained correct figures, and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. O'Brien) has been misled by the name of the twine he says he bought for 10 cents. I do not doubt he bought twine for 10 cents, but he was doubtless misled into supposing that it was the same kind of twine as that to which the hon. member for Perth referred. I think the kind of twine he bought, as he will find if he will look at the packages when he goes home, was the one called Silver composite twine. That is the kind of twine which is sold at 10 cents, and which is quoted by Masseys and others at 10 cents. I cannot tell what the Silver composite twine is made of, because it is a patent, and the composition of it is kept secret; but the kind of twine to which my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Grieve) referred as being quoted at 13 cents is composed of manila and sisal, and is known as "Red-cap binder twine," and that cannot be purchased under 13 cents. That is the kind of twine to which my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Grieve) referred, and if my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) tries to buy twine composed of manila and sisal he will not get it, either wholesale or retail, at less than 13 cents; at all events, he will not get it from the large manufacturers of binders. I come now to another argument of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He said there was a great difference between taking the duty off dark sugar and off binder twine, because one is the raw material and the other is the finished product; and he adds, that the principle of the National Policy is to admit raw materials free while taxing only the finished product. My hon. friend from Muskoka has not carefully read the tariff or he would not make that statement. Is pig iron a finished product? Pig iron is the raw material out of which agricultural implements are made; pig iron is the raw material used by all our manufacturers of farming implements, and it is taxed heavily; it is taxed to the amount of 30 or 35 per cent. on the average price. Coal is not a finished product; it is the raw material of the manufacturer, and yet coal is taxed. I might at great length continue to point out other raw materials which are taxed, but these two examples will suffice to show that whatever the principles of the National Policy may have been when it was first invented or constructed, those principles have certainly not been carried out in practice to the extent of avoiding taxation on raw material. But even if it were so, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to you, and to the House, and to my friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that binder twine is raw material to the farmer. It is the raw material with which he prepares his product for the market; and I contend that the farmer is just as much entitled, if not more so, to have his raw material put on the free list as anybody else in the community. I have tried to secure a copy of the annual report of the Ontario Department of Agriculture, in order to see the number of acres of land under grain in Ontario last year, but I have been unable to obtain the report, because it appears there is only one copy kept, and that is out of the Library. I think we should have more copies of such an important document as that. I will take the figures given by my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Grieve), whose calculation is, I presume, correct. Last year there were 8,000,000 pounds of twine used, involving a tax upon the farmers of between $250,000 and $300,000. The hon. gentleman referred to the removal of the tax from sugar and stated that that caused a very serious loss to the revenue; but in asking for the removal of the tax on binding twine we stand in a very different position; we ask the Government to relieve the farmers of a tax of from $250,000 to $300,000 at a loss to the Treasury of only about $1,000 or $1,200. We think that is very little to ask from the Minister of Finance for the benefit of the farmers of the country. Besides that, looking at it from the manufacturers' point of view, we believe that if the American manufacturers, as stated by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) can sell twine at a low price, our manufacturers can do the same thing, and they will not be ruined in any sense by what we ask. I will go further than that, Sir, I will say that if every one of the twine manufactories in Canada were ruined, we have still a right to ask for the removal of this duty. If the manufacture of binding twine in Canada was entirely stopped by the passage of this resolution the farmers have a right to ask for the removal of this duty, not as a favour, but as a right. What were the principles of the National Policy when it was first presented to this House? It was declared to be such a rearrangement of the tariff as would foster all the industries of the country, and the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other industries were to be put upon the same level. It was declared to be the intention of the National Policy to foster the agricultural industry just as much as the manufacturing industry, and considering that according to the last returns there are only five manufacturers of binding twine in Canada, as against millions of farmers, I contend that the interest of the millions should be considered as against the interest of the five manufacturers, even if the interest of the five should be injured by what we ask. I beg leave to tell this House that the time is coming—I believe, in fact, that the time has already come—when the farmers will be forced to organize in their thousands and their millions for their own defence against the highly-protected manufacturers of this country. If combines of manufacturers are entered into against the farmers, if the Government sets itself in a declared position of hostility against them, they will be compelled to organize themselves in their thousands and their millions to protect themselves against those manufacturers who are organizing against them and fleecing them. The Government which identifies itself with the combines, and identifies itself with the taxation of the farmer for the benefit of certain individuals, will suffer such a crushing defeat in the near future that their return to power will be a very indefinite possibility. It is bad enough to be taxed and fleeced—I can use no other word than "fleeced"—for the benefit of home manufacturers; but if it be true, as stated by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), that a Yankee syndicate has bought up all the cordage mills in Canada for the purpose of working them, and of enriching themselves at the expense of the farmers of Canada, then this taxation becomes intolerable. We might submit to a low tax for the benefit of home manufacturers, but to be taxed for the benefit of foreigners is something intolerable. I hope that the House will show by its vote to-day that its members are in sympathy with the people of this country in resenting foreign aggression in Canada.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to say a word or two on this subject, because, so far as the argument has gone, it does not show the full extent of the injustice inflicted on the farmers of Canada by this binder-twine combine, and for this reason: the tax upon raw material in the United States is $25 a ton on manila, and sisal pays $15 a ton duty in the United States, and the tax on the raw material there amounts to something like 1 cent per pound on the finished article, whereas the Canadian twine manufacturer has all his raw material free. If the American manufacturers had their raw material free they could allow us to have the binding twine at 4 cents per pound cheaper than the Canadian manufacturer sells it, instead of 3 cents cheaper, as at present. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has told us that he paid 10 cents per pound for his twine. I have no doubt he got his twine for that, but, if he did, it was of a very inferior quality. Manila twine, for which the farmers of Canada now have to pay 14 cents a pound, could be sold for 11 cents if the duty were removed. Let us go back to the time when Mr. Massey, a gentleman in favour of the National Policy, appeared before the Combines Committee. He stated there most emphatically that he could purchase binding twine in the United States, pay the duty, bring it into Canada, and have a small margin left; and he objected to the manufacturers in this country making a profit which, in consequence of getting their raw material free, equals the whole amount of the duty on the manufactured article. The hon. member for Muskoka said something about implements being cheaper. We admit it; they are coming down in price every day; but does that hon. gentleman or any other on that side of the House mean to tell us that we can purchase implements to-day as cheaply as we could if the duty were removed?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Cheaper.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns a list of implements, and I have added the price and duty together to find out what the Canadian farmer has to pay. I find that on each seed drill he has to pay a cost of $29.30, and a duty of $8.30. Who pays this duty, if not the Canadian farmer? Upon each harrow that comes in he has to pay a cost of $16.15, and a duty of $5.66. Upon mowing machines, of which 309,000 are brought to this country from the United States, he has to pay a cost of $128.41 each, and a duty of $9.94. Upon harvesters, of which sixty-nine come from the United States, he has to pay a cost of $109 each, and a duty of $38.40. So that when hon. gentlemen tell us that the Canadian farmer has not to pay a higher price for his agricultural implements on account of the National Policy they tell us what is not borne out by the Trade and Navigation Returns issued by this Government. Now, I wish to say a word or two with respect to the number of acres under crop in the Province of Ontario. We have 4,140,109 acres of wheat, oats, barley and rye, all of which can be tied. I do not mean to say that this is all tied; but according to the statement of Mr. Massey, made in 1888 before the Combines Committee, it would require at least 6,000,000 pounds of twine to do that work at that time; and as there must have been a considerable increased demand since that time, the 8,000,000 pounds estimated by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Grieve) is not over, but under the quantity that would probably be necessary to supply the needs of Canada to-day. As only a little over $1,200 of revenue is derived from the duty on binding twine, the result is that for every dollar that goes into the treasury $190 goes to the manufacturers' combine. I was very much astonished to hear the other day that the combine had bought out the St. John Cordage Company—or, rather, that they had paid that company $15,000 to allow their works to stand still, the result of which was that 90 workmen were turned out and had to leave this country and go to the other side to seek employment; and now we are told that a company from the United States have bought up all the cordage companies of Canada; so that the duty on binding twine now exists, not in the interest of the manufacturers of Canada, but in the interest of manufacturers from a foreign country. Allow me to say that it has become a very grave question indeed with many farmers whether or not, at the present price of binding twine, it pays to use the binder, which is perhaps the greatest labour-saving machine on the farmer. Last year on my own farm the principal crop was oats, and it cost us nearly 50 cents an acre to tie the grain. Now, I hold that it is the duty of the Government to give the farmers this relief. Hon. gentlemen cannot say that it is going to embarrass the treasury, because it will have the effect of doing away with only some $1,200 of revenue. The farmers are alive on this question, which affects them very seriously all over the country, though perhaps most in the Province of Ontario and the Province of Manitoba. I have always held that one of the reasons why Manitoba and the North-West have not been settled more rapidly is the very large amounts of duty which the settlers there have to pay on agricultural implements and binding twine, The first purchase of the settler in the North-West after he reaps a crop is some kind of agricultural implement, and upon that he has to pay a very heavy tax. I heard it stated the other day that a man and a boy could to-day perform as much labour in the harvest field as four men could do some years ago; but when we take the price of binding twine into consideration it is a question whether it does not cost about as much to do the harvesting with a binder as it would with hired hands. I warned the Government last year, and I think that since that time they have got a lesson in the western part of Ontario. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, that many of the agricultural constituencies have changed their political complexion. Give them another opportunity and I can assure you the tables will be turned, and hon. gentlemen opposite will have to take their place on this side of the House. I do not know that I need say any more. Our manufacturers at the present time are benefited by this duty, not simply to the amount of 3 cents a pound; but, when we take into consideration the duty on the raw material, they have an advantage of 4 cents a pound. This is a burden that has been borne too long by the farmers of Canada; they have been a long-suffering race, but if the present Government do not grant them the relief they desire before it comes to an end hon. gentlemen opposite will never have another opportunity.

Mr. WALLACE. I was not going to trouble the House with any remarks on this occasion, but owing to some statements which have been made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) I wish to say a few words. He, like all hon. gentlemen opposite, has stated that the price of binding twine in Canada is far in excess of what it is in the United States, and he added that the manufacturers in the United States pay a duty on their raw material of $15 a ton for sisal and $25 a ton for manila, while these raw materials are admitted into Canada free. It is quite true that these materials are brought into Canada duty free, and it is equally true that they are brought duty free into the United States. I hold in my hand a copy of the Tariff law of the United States of 1890. In the list of free articles, on page 44, I find jute, manila, sisal grass, fibrous vegetable substances, unmanufactured and undressed, and not specially provided for in this Act. I presume the hon. gentleman was rehearsing to us his campaign speech, or some speech of his of a previous year, which he had forgotten to revise up to date. With reference to the statement of the hon. member for North Perth, that the consumption of binder twine in Canada was, according to his estimate, about 4,000 tons, I have here the statement made by the largest manufacturer of binding twine in Canada, Mr. A. W. Morris, of Montreal. In his evidence before the Combines Committee he stated that the amount sold by the manufacturers in the combine was a trifle under 1,800 tons. Now, although we have improved in agriculture generally, and have increased our cultivated area, I do not think that increase has been so great as to require a jump in consumption from 1,800 to 4,000 tons of binder twine in a couple of years. Mr. Massey, the implement manufacturer of Toronto, also stated before that committee, in answer to Mr. Bain, of Wentworth, who asked him what was the actual cost, including the duty, of the American article:

"We had to import a large quantity for the North-West last year. We could not get it in Canada. We laid it down in Manitoba at about the price we had to pay in New York, and duty added. It cost us about the duty extra."

To bring it in from the United States it cost more than he could buy it for in Canada, by about the duty. In another statement Mr. Massey goes into particulars, and shows that $11.50 was the price for the American and $11.87 the price for the Canadian, and the duty had to be added to the American, so that the price in Canada and the United States was about the same.

Mr. WATSON. I am much pleased that the hon. member for North York has brought this matter up in the shape of a resolution. I was sorry to see that the hon. Minister of Finance had not thought fit to make a change in binding twine the same as on sugar. I assure him that the people fully appreciated the change on the latter. To-day we find, however, hon. gentlemen on the opposite side using the same arguments with regard to binding twine as they were in the habit of using formerly with regard to sugar. We used to be told that because sugar was cheaper in 1890 than it had been in 1878 the consumer had not to pay any more for it on account of the high duty; and we are now told, because binding twine and machinery are cheaper to-day than in 1878 the consumer is not paying more for his machinery and binding twine than he would if the duty were off. The fact that the Government have taken the duty off sugar and that the price has consequently been reduced clearly proves that we on this side of the House were right in our contention. In discussing the question of binding twine we must not confine it altogether to the price per pound at which it can be secured, for the quality has a great deal to do with the matter. I have made enquiries, from what I considered to be fair sources of the most reliable information, and have obtained figures from Toronto and Chicago. I have not taken the figures from Manitoba, because the greater portion of the twine is used in Ontario, although in Manitoba we use more binding twine per capita than any other portion of the Dominion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have you the figures from Manitoba?

Mr. WATSON. The freight has to be added to get at the price in Manitoba?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I mean the quantity used.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; I will give the quantity used. It is easy to get at the quantity if you know the number of acres under cultivation. The figures I received from Toronto are as follows:—

	Cts.
Red Cap	12	½ Manila ½ Sisal.
Crown	11	½ do ½ do
Blue Ribbon	14	Pure Manila.
Composite	9	Jute.

I asked for information from Chicago, and received the following—the prices are jobbers' prices and not manufacturers' prices :—

	Cts. per lb.
Diamond G Standard	8¼
Diamond H	8
Standard Manila	10¾
Diamond K Standard, mixed	8¼
Diamond I Pure Manilla	12¼

Now, you have to make the comparison between the different samples of twine, and I have those samples of twine in my desk, so that any gentleman, competent to judge, may examine them for himself, to see whether the inferences I have drawn are correct or not. To ascertain the relative values, I have taken the trouble to weigh and measure the twines, because the value depends a great deal on the number of feet you get per pound. The following is the result as regards Canadian twine, at Toronto prices :—

	Cts.
Red Cap	12	525 ft. per pound.
Crown Brand	11	490 "
Composite (Jute)	9	589 "
Pure Manila	14	could not get sample.

The following shows the American twine at Chicago prices :

	Cts. per lb.	Cts. per ft.
Pure Manila	12¼	693
Standard Manila	10¾	522
Standard K, mixed	8¾	498
Standard G	8¼	522
Standard H	84	522

In making a comparison as to the relative value of those twines, it would not be argued by any hon. gentleman in this House that pure manila is not a better twine than the mixed twine which is known as red cap brand. Canadian Red Cap gives 525 feet to the pound and American pure manila gives 693 feet to the pound. Therefore, taking the difference in feet, you will find that this Red Cap mixture will cost 15·84 cents in Canada as compared with the pure manila, which costs 12¼ cents per pound in Chicago. So that a mixed twine costs more in Canada than the pure manila does in Chicago. Take the Crown brand, a great portion of which is sold in job lots at 11 cents per pound ; and I was informed to-day by a retailer that it was sold here at 12½ cents per pound, the difference covering the freight from the factory and the profit. Comparing that brand of twine manufactured in Canada, which gives 490 feet to the pound, with Diamond H American twine, with which I think it would be fair to compare it, that gives 581 feet to the pound and costs 8 cents per pound, and you find the price of our Canadian twine is brought up to 13 cents per pound. In figuring on the twines, as has been stated, the hon. Minister of Customs saw fit to fix the prices at which they shall be entered into this country, so that in reality, instead of paying 25 per cent., we often pay 30 and 35 per cent. duty.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the difference in cost between the best manila made in Canada and the best made in the United States ?

Mr. WATSON. It is the difference between 14 cents and 12¼ cents, or 1¾ cents, but the hon. gentleman must bear in mind the difference in the quantity. Unfortunately, I have not got a sample of Canadian pure manila ; but in comparing the others, it will be seen there is a greater number of feet in the American than in the Canadian, and consequently it is worth more per pound to the farmer. We have agents in Manitoba who sell certain binding twines. They sell American and Canadian implements, and they tell me that they could furnish American binding twine at the same price to the consumer as Canadian binding twine—that it was a matter of choice for the consumer. They prefer to handle Canadian twine, because they have not to pay cash for duty on receiving the goods, so the Canadian farmer has to pay the amount of the duty in every case, whether the article comes through the Customs or not. If the amount which we have to pay more than we should have to pay went into the revenue, we as loyal Canadians might not object to contribute our taxes on that as well as on any other article, but we find that last year the amount collected in revenue, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, was only $1,279.18. The protection on binding twine is, therefore, practically prohibitory. If this was an industry which employed a large number of men and required skilled labour, we might benefit by making a market for our products in manufacturing this twine, but we know that the labour employed in this manufacture is very cheap and very small. In fact there are not more than 400 employés, as I understand, engaged in these rope-walks, and thus for the sake of five or six rope-walks we are taxed this large amount. In Manitoba alone, which is a province more affected by the tariff than any other, as it has to pay more per capita than any other province in the Dominion, particularly on binding twine and machinery, there is about 1,300,000 acres in crop this year. This is a very low estimate of the land under crop, and it requires at least two pounds of binding twine to the acre, especially of the Canadian product. The American twine would go further, and two pounds to the acre would be about the amount required, but this year it may take two and a-half pounds, as we have the prospect of a magnificent harvest. Taking only two pounds to the acre, at 3 cents a pound, the people of Manitoba will have to contribute, not to the revenue, but to these manufacturers, $78,000 this year. The tax on machinery is bad enough, God knows, but this tax on binding twine amounts to 6 or 7 cents an acre this year, and the Government, acting under the name of protection or the National Policy on this article of binding twine, which every farmer needs in order to bind his crop, is taxing the farmer not for the benefit of the revenue, but for the benefit of the manufacturer. In this debate I do not know that it is well to refer to anything except the articles under discussion. I have expressed my views in regard to the matter, and I think I am expressing the views of every one who has undertaken to consider this question from Manitoba and the North West. Hon. gentlemen may say that binding twine can be bought as cheaply in Manitoba as in Minnesota and Dakota, but such is not the case. I am willing to leave that question to those who have to buy the article, and to the quotations which have been given by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and I am willing to leave it to the better judgment of the men who are selling this article to the consumer. We are compelled to pay at least 6 cents an acre for all the crop bound in Manitoba this year. Thus we are compelled to pay $78,000 in that.

province, although only $1,200 altogether goes into the revenue, and that is a small province in regard to population, though it is a large province in regard to the output of grain. I hope the Minister of Finance will see that, notwithstanding this paltry sum of $1,200, he could not do anything more popular than to adopt this proposition as he adopted his policy in regard to sugar. There is no excuse for this in point of revenue, and the only excuse is that a few people are employed in the manufacture of this article. We were told by the First Minister a few years ago when we were discussing this question, and a member who had a rope-walk argued in favour of the duty on binding twine, "Certainly the member for Halifax supports me, and I support the member for Halifax who manufactures binding twine." I say it is very unfair to tax the masses for the sake of the few. If the hon. gentleman would ask the representatives of the farmers they would tell him that they would be prepared to board these twine makers in an hotel if the hon. gentleman would take off the 25 per cent. duty from binding twine. I think it has been shown that this duty should be taken off, and from our present prospects the condition of affairs is likely to be worse than it has been in the past, and we know that our farmers have paid nearly every cent of this protection to the manufacturers.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) should have arranged their arguments before they rose, because they do not agree. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) estimates the cost of binding twine at about 6 cents an acre to the farmers of Manitoba, while the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) said it would cost about 50 cents an acre to bind his crops.

Mr. WATSON. That was two years ago.

Mr. SPROULE. He said he could bind his crops by hand for about the same price. Now, I will tell my hon. friend from South Huron that in our part of the country last year you could get grain, whether wheat, oats or barley, cut by the binder and bound, including the price of the twine, for 90 cents an acre.

Mr. MULOCK. Does not the cost of cutting and binding by machinery depend somewhat upon the yield, upon the amount of straw that is produced?

Mr. SPROULE. The highest price charged in our part of the country to any farmer for cutting a crop, taking the crop all round, was $1 an acre, and many of them got it cut for 90 cents an acre, including the binding twine. The hon. gentleman says that it cost 50 cents an acre for the binding twine alone. Now, you can get grain cradled for 50 cents an acre; then how much will the farmer have left to pay for binding it by hand? Any one can see that the argument of the hon. member for South Huron will not bear examination. I think these hon. gentlemen ought to meet together and compare their arguments before they present them to the House, because they are certainly not in accord. Now, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), in introducing this question, gave as a reason for taking the duty off this article that it was controlled by a combine; then he goes on to tell us that the National Cordage Company has bought out eleven factories in this country. What is the National Company. It is a combine that controls the output in the United States; and if the combine then controlling the output in the United States has got the control of the output here in Canada, what benefit would it be to our farmers to take off the duty? I would like to remind this hon. gentleman that when a Bill was before this House designed to control these combinations and to stop their injurious operations in this country, many hon. gentlemen opposite were lukewarm on that question, and many of them opposed it because it came from this side of the House. Now, that Bill is on the statutes, and it is the duty of the Provincial Government to enforce that law. Have we found any of these hon. gentlemen, or their friends, or the Attorney General of Ontario, trying to enforce that law controlling these combines? Not a single effort has been made. In some of the farmers' institutes where this question has been brought up it was held that this Bill would be no use to control these combines—in fact, the Bill was rather ridiculed by Reformers present. Now, I say that if the output of this article is under a combine we ought to do away with the injurious influence of that combine, and give the article to the farmers of Canada as cheaply as possible. If it is a fact, as hon. members have assumed, that the Cordage Company have control of the production in Canada, taking the duty off twine would practically amount to nothing. Now, Sir, allusion has been made to the price of the implements that farmers use. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) says that by virtue of the duty the farmers of Manitoba and the North-West have to pay so much more for their implements. The hon. member for Huron also quoted the price of harrows, and the price of mowers and binders and reapers in this country. Now, it is a very strange fact that notwithstanding the duty, whatever it is, on these farm implements, the manufacturers of Canada are making them here and are putting them on the Australian market alongside the American manufactures, although the Americans are said to manufacture them so much more cheaply than we can. I have here a letter from the Mercer Bros. & Co., who are manufacturers in Allison, and although they have been in the business only two years they say they are able to put their implements into the port of New York for $160, F.O.B., and they tell how large a number of implements they sent to Australia last year, 300. They say: "We are amongst the highest exporters of these articles, either from the United States or Canada." Now, why are these gentlemen able to manufacture their implements so cheaply to-day as that they can compete with the Americans? It is by virtue of that very National Policy which was introduced a few years ago, giving the Canadian manufacturer the Canadian markets. And now they are competing in the outside world with the Americans, although the Americans can make implements so much cheaper; yet in the markets of the world, open to both Canadians and Americans, our manufacturers are able to hold their own, although they had a much larger distance to send their goods, for they shipped via New York, as the steamers had not then been put on from Victoria to Hong Kong, and they have sent their goods by the port of New York to Australia, and still they are able to compete with the American manufacturers. I think the Canadian farmer is not paying more for his implements than he would pay if the duty was taken off. The hon. member for Marquette did not make a comparison between the price of the implements in Canada to-day, and the price in the United States, as he should have done; I think I am correct in saying that in almost every instance, taking into consideration the quality of the implements, whether it be a plough, or a binder, or a mower, they are sold just as cheaply in Manitoba and the North-West as they are across the line. In my section of the country there were two farmers, brothers, who went, one to Dakota and one to Manitoba, and no longer ago than last year I saw letters written by both of them, making comparisons as to the price of implements in the two countries, and there was practically no difference between the two, except that in the United States, when the implements were sold on credit, they had to pay at least 10 to 12 per cent. on the money, whereas in Canada only 8 to 10, and that was the only difference. It was in favour of Canada. That was the information these two brothers gave, and there is no reason to doubt the correctness of their information. I believe the more this subject is investigated the more we will be driven to the conclusion that the Canadian farmer is paying no more for his implements than the American farmer, notwithstanding the duty that is put on them. This holds with reference to binding twine. In our part of the country, last year, it was retailed at 10 and 12 cents a pound; that was the common price. The hon. member for Marquette gave quotations for different grades. He may be correct; I do not know; I have not had an opportunity to verify his quotations; but I know that it has been sold in Ontario for 10 and 12 cents. I do not know whether he gave quotations by the car load or by the hundred pounds.

Mr. WATSON. I gave it in thousand-pound lots, or over.

Mr. SPROULE. It is certain that American twine is sold at just about the price that it is retailed here. I do not see that our farmers are suffering much in that. I say this: that, if the output of that article in Canada is under a combine to-day we should rather direct our attention towards bursting up that combine, because, if the article is controlled by the same men who are controlling the output in the United States, taking off the duty would not accomplish the object.

Mr. WATSON. We could get twine from Great Britain; part of it came from there last year.

Mr. SPROULE. It is possible we might; but there is the same duty, I suppose, on twine coming into the United States that there is on that article coming into Canada; and taking the duty off between the United States and Canada I do not think would alter the price of the article very much. Certainly if the production here is controlled by the same men who controlled it in the United States they would still be shrewd enough to figure out a price that would cover the duty and give them a reasonable profit. Now, the member for Marquette has made some reference to the number of acres under crop in Manitoba—something like one million. The member for North York gave us some information about the County of Simcoe. I notice that the member for North York gave us the gross acreage under crop in the County of Simcoe, and he assumed that it would all be bound by binding twine. I would like to ask, if the farmers of Simcoe bind their grass, their clover and their pease—because part of the crops in Simcoe must be of grass, unless the farmers in that county follow a different style of farming from the farmers in our part of the country. I think his argument was just about as faulty as the argument of the hon. member for Huron. It is evident that they have not gone over this question carefully, and they have not presented such arguments as will stand criticism and stand examination by the practical farmers of this country, who have got to pay the price of the twine.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BAIN. When you, Mr. Speaker, left the Chair at six o'clock, the matter of binding twine was still under consideration of the House. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) made a reference, in passing, to the effect that it was desirable, before hon. gentlemen on this side attacked the policy of the Government, that they should first reconcile the position which they themselves occupied on this question, and he quoted a statement made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) with respect to the cost to the citizens of Manitoba of the increased burden placed upon binding twine, and he drew a parallel from a statement of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) respecting the total cost of binding twine in handling his own crop. I do not know how it appeared to the hon. gentleman, but no reconciliation was necessary in the matter. If I understood the hon. member for South Huron, he simply made the statement that it cost him, with his heavy crop, 50 cents per acre for binding twine. The hon. member for Marquette was not speaking of the total cost of binding twine per acre, but he said that the net additional cost in consequence of the 25 per cent. duty took out of the pockets of the Manitoba farmers 6 cents per acre over the necessary cost of that article. Under these circumstances, there is nothing to reconcile. The two statements are perfectly fair and compatible with each other. Again, my hon. friend took the ground that if, as the statements made seemed to indicate, the National Cordage Association on the American side has the control of the Canadian cordage companies, it was a matter of no consequence whether we had increased duties or not on the goods in Canada because they would be charged one price anyhow. That is a mistaken view of the question. We may assume, in the first place, that if American cordage manufacturers are under the control of one large monopoly they will at least see that the prices at which their goods are sold to American consumers are not lower than prices which will leave them a sufficient margin to carry on their business successfully. Then why should we in addition enable them to take 25 per cent. out of the pockets of the Canadian consumers for similar goods? Why should we not put ourselves upon an even basis, and then we would at least be on a level with the American consumer of these goods. There is another feature of this question to which I wish to direct the attention of this House, and it seems to point to this as being a settled fact, that the Canadian cordage companies have passed under the control of this great American combination. The Journal of Commerce, published in Montreal only a few days ago, pointed to this fact, that for the first time the stock of the National Cordage Company of New York was listed on the Montreal Stock Exchange. If these facts do, as I think they do, point unitedly to one direction, I hold that it is time for the Government to consider whether the altered circumstances do not require some action on their part. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) argued from a protective standpoint that it was desirable that Canadian manufacturers should not be placed in a position of disadvantage as compared with American or other companies, and that the National Policy was inaugurated for that purpose. Under these circumstances, I ask if it would not be wise for the Government to revise their position, and either sweep away entirely the duty on binding twine or else place us in the same position as the Americans occupy under the McKinley tariff. The hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) quoted approvingly the action of the American Government in the operation of the McKinley tariff, when they swept away the duty on the raw material of sisal and manila that hitherto American manufacturers had to pay. What has been the result of that action on their part? Parallel with that, they reduced the duty on the finished goods from 35 per cent. down to seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound; thus sweeping away, practically, the whole protection that American manufacturers had against the outside world. Yet our Government to-day, in the face of these altered circumstances, propose to maintain our tariff at its old rate of 25 per cent., with the raw material, as it always has been, free to Canadian manufacturers. I want to draw the attention of the House to another fact. If this binding twine manufacture was the whole of the production of our cordage companies in Canada then there might be some reasonable justification for discussing the propriety of maintaining the protection imposed for the purpose of enabling those industries to live and prosper. But if we look at it from a reasonable standpoint we will find that last year all the binding twine imported into Canada was of less value than $5,000, on which the total duty collected was less than $1,300. That is a mere bagatelle in the revenue of this country, and while the consumption of binding twine is a large and growing item to farmers, and to western farmers especially, it is after all only a small proportion of the cordage trade carried on by this great combination. I find, on looking at the returns of last year, that we imported cordage to the value of $73,000, on which nearly $15,000 in duty was paid into the public treasury. In addition we imported twines, hammocks and manufactures of twines to the value of nearly $50,000, and upon that sum we collected between $12,000 and $13,000 of revenue. These so far have been a substantial source of income to the Dominion Government, but the impost on binding twine was only a burden on the farming population of the country, without giving any corresponding benefit to the revenue. Under these circumstances, I submit that it would be only just and equitable for the Dominion Government to revise this whole question of the duties imposed on binding twine, so as to take this burden off the farming community. The last official census of 1881 shows that the rural population, as compared with the city population of this country, was 78 out of every 100. Why, in the name of common justice and reason, should 78 people be taxed at this rate when it yields practically no revenue to the country, simply for the purpose of enabling a small proportion of the other 22 to put additional money in their pockets in a branch of business that ought to be able by this time to stand alone. But there is another side to this question to which I wish to draw the attention of the hon. members, and especially the Minister of Customs. The importations of binding twine last year were very small. There was a circumstance that came under my attention that goes a long way to show the reason why the importations were very small. We have heard to-day the present prices of binding twine on the American side and on the Canadian side quoted against each other, and I think every one will agree with me that if the prices quoted prove anything, they establish that there has been a reduction to the American consumer in the cost of binding twine compared with a year ago, and that in this respect the reduction of the duty imposed on those goods has been followed by a corresponding reduction in the cost of those goods to the consumer. We have a striking illustration of that when the Government, notwithstanding their protest that they stood up independent in the face of all creation and that they were not influenced by anybody outside of this country, reduced the duty upon sugar, and followed suit the moment our American cousins reduced the sugar duties, and with the result that the Canadian consumer is getting sugar at a correspondingly lower price. I maintain that if you take this 25 per cent. duty off binder-twine, or at least reduce it to the corresponding position of the Americans, namely, seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound, the Canadian farmer will get his binder-twine correspondingly cheaper; and if the combination is on the part of manufacturers in the United States as well as in Canada, I will engage beforehand that that combination will see to it that the Canadian farmer does not get his binder-twine at such a price that they are losing money in manufacturing it. But, Sir, there was another difficulty in connection with this matter which came to my observation last year, and I will quote a bona fide transaction which took place through the Customs of this country. A merchant of my acquaintance in my vicinity, early last summer, bought a consignment of pure sisal binder twine on the American market, He bought it at 8¾ cents net per pound, and that was after allowing a deduction of half a cent, the rebate allowed on the exported article. Assuming that this binder twine had been passed through the Customs at that price, or even at 9 cents per pound, the result would have been that the twine would have been placed on the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer to buy at 11½ cents per pound, which would enable the merchant to have a good margin of profit upon his goods. When this merchant came to enter these goods at the Custom-house, what position did he find himself in? Instead of these goods being valued at 8¾ cents per pound, or 9 cents per pound, which would be an equitable charge, we find that they were valued at 14¼ for dutiable purposes. If they had been rated at 9 cents per pound it would have been a liberal allowance of increase when put upon our market, but we find that the duty, instead of being $45 per ton, was $71.25, and the practical effect of this was that the duty, instead of being 25 per cent., was increased to 40 per cent. by this extra valuation of the Customs officials at the port of entry. At the very time that these Customs officials were valuing these goods for duty purposes at 14¼ cents per pound, that very same twine was being sold at Cleveland in the United States, by retail, in small quantities, for 13½ cents per pound, after all the various dealers had had their profits on it, and when it was going by retail into the hands of the farmers. Under these circumstances, need the House be surprised that the importations of binder twine are very low, or that the Canadian combine have been able to put their prices up so high. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, one result of that operation. It is this: On the first of July when the farmer was launched into the busy season, we find the Canadian cordage combination again constructed solidly, and the first thing they did was to put up the wholesale price of their binder twine by one-half cent per pound. How did these prices compare last season? My friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has quoted to us to-day the price of the composite twine he purchased at ten cents per pound. My experience, and the experience of our farming population is, that on grain which is green and heavy it is impossible to use the composite twine to any advantage, for the simple reason that it is thick and soft and is perpetually blocking the needle and getting the machine out of working order. The experience of our practical farmers is, that taking the cost of the various twines, from pure manila and pure sisal, down through all the various mixtures and grades, the highest-priced twine is the cheapest in the end, and for two reasons: one reason is that it is finer, and smoother, and harder, and it runs through the machine and through the needle with less trouble and less difficulty in catching and breaking. The second reason is that in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, where everyone knows the farmer is alert to handle his grain at the earliest possible moment it can be handled with sufficient ripeness to cut, these cheap-priced twines are utterly worthless for all practical purposes. One of our dealers last season compared the various prices of twines, with the result that the American sisal which was, as I said, purchased at 8¾ cents per pound would measure from 560 to 660 feet. The pure manila which our Canadian manufacturer turned out then and which was known as "blue ribbon" was sold at the same time for 15 cents per pound and ran out to 660 feet, and the composite and mixed twines ran all the way downwards at various ratios below this. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the position which the Canadian manufacturer occupies to-day with regard to this very same class of twine. One of our dealers has furnished me with the relative position of the Canadian highest grade manila twine this year as compared with last. The "blue ribbon" twine which last year was sold at 15 cents per pound and which measured up to 650 and 660 feet, is, at this season, sold at 13 cents per pound, but it only measures about 550 feet, or 100 feet shorter than last year. The secret of that is this: This combination are using the New Zealand article mixed more or less with this manila; it is a heavier fibre, and the result is that the farmer, while he is getting nominally the same grade of twine at 13 cents per pound is really paying as much as he did a year ago at 15 cents per pound. The American standard sisal has been imported this season and the duty paid on it, and it is being sold to-day at 10 and 11 cents per pound, according to the different grades offered on our market. I say that, under these circumstances, the Canadian combination have just had enough protection at the expense of the consumers in this country, and I submit that even on the lines of the National Policy—because I assume that while the National Policy is to protect the manufacturer it also assumes, to a certain extent, to give the consumer fair-play in the transaction—I submit that it is necessary for the Government to take some action now in this matter, and not leave this burden any longer on the farmers of this country. This tax yields no revenue to the Government, and I say that it is a standing discredit to the country, where 78 per cent. of its population are a rural population, that this tax should be allowed to exist without any gain to the revenue and simply for the purpose of enabling this large American National Cordage corporation to control our cordage manufacturers and put money in their pockets. I submit that if that is one of the fruits of the National Policy, it will discredit it in the eyes of the farmers of this country; and there is no longer any justification for maintaining that condition of things. Now, I say that the farmers are entitled to some consideration at the hands of this Government. It has been pointed out, in the course of this debate already, that in many of the rural districts of this country representatives have changed sides from the last Parliament, and that on that account the Government are here with a decreased majority. Under these circumstances, it would be only a graceful act on the part of the Government to place the farmers of the country in such a position with respect to binding twine that they would at least be on an equality with the American farmers. I heard it argued to-night, on the implement question—and I think we should not mix the two questions—that the Canadian manufacturers have successfully competed with the American manufacturers in foreign markets. I grant that; and why should not the Canadian manufacturer make as good an implement as any other man on this continent? Are we to be told that Canadian energy and enterprise are not equal to American energy and enterprise, and therefore that our manufacturers should fall behind their competitors in any part of the world? I want to call attention to one fact in this connection, which will not be denied by any hon. gentleman: that is, that both American and Canadian manufacturers of agricultural implements put their goods on the foreign market at a lower price than they sell to us at home. Under these circumstances our farmers require a little equity and justice. We do not ask for anything more, and we shall not be satisfied with anything less, in the matter of this duty on binding twine, which bears heavily on the farmer and brings nothing into the treasury. The importation of binding twine is practically impossible, because the 25 per cent. of duty applies to all grades. If the Government propose to retain any duty at all, they ought at least to put us on a basis of reciprocity with the Americans, and reduce the duty to seven-tenths of a cent per pound, or, better still, sweep it altogether out of existence, seeing that it has now become a nuisance to the farmers if ever it was a benefit to the manufacturers.

Mr. STAIRS. Before the motion is put, I would ask the privilege of saying a few words on this question. I am afraid that some hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken on the subject do not know very much about it. It is a rather complicated question; but it is one of which I have had some knowledge since binding twine has been manufactured. Everybody knows that the manufacture of binding twine is the creation of possibly not more than ten years ago. Its manufacture in Canada was commenced about the same time as its manufacture in the United States. The company with which I am associated took steps to go into the manufacture of binding twine for our Canadian farmers. I may say that I quite appreciate the importance to the farmers of new countries like Canada and the United States, that they should be able to obtain their supplies of binding twine at a reasonable price; and I claim that its average price in Canada since it has been made has been as low as the price in the United States. Canadian manufacturers can, on the whole, I think, make twine as cheaply as American manufacturers. If there is any difference at all, it is so slight that it does not form an element in the calculation. Although matters during the last eighteen months, or perhaps two years, have become so complicated, owing to the consolidation of the United States manufacturers in a very peculiar way, as to make it rather more difficult at the present time to make a comparison than it would have been some years ago, yet I believe that even now, in the exceptional circumstances which exist, the prices of binding twine in Canada are no higher to the farmer than in the United States. I will show this more clearly a little later on. In the meantime I want to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of some hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) has fallen into an error, unintentionally I know, in regard to what he calls "blue ribbon" twine, which he says was sold last year for 15 cents a pound and measured 660 feet, whereas the same brand sold this year at 13 cents a pound and only measured 550 feet. So far as I know, there has been no "blue ribbon" twine manufactured in Canada this year, all that has been sold having been the product of last year; so that I do not see how twine which was 660 feet long last year could be reduced 100 feet in length this year.

Mr. BAIN. I am quoting a Conservative dealer.

Mr. STAIRS. I cannot help whom the hon. gentleman is quoting. I am only quoting the facts. I have something to say in reply to some of the other hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) stated that he supposed that if American manufacturers could make twine and sell it at a certain price, Canadian manufacturers could do the same. As I said before, I believe this is the case in the main, although there may be exceptional circumstances which may occasionally produce a little difference in the price on one side of the line from the price on the other side. I am not going to make comparisons between the different prices of twine which that hon. gentleman mentioned, because I am going to show later on that when hon. gentlemen opposite compare the prices in Canada with those in the United States at the present time, they are not comparing prices in the same circumstances, but in totally different circumstances. The error into which the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) fell when he claimed that there was a duty on manila hemp in the United States of $25 a ton and on sisal hemp of $15 a ton, was pointed out by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), but I refer to it because a little later in his remarks he stated that on account of the duty the difference in price to Canadians was 4 cents a pound instead of 3 cents. I want to state most emphatically that no such difference exists to-day between the prices on the two sides of the border as 3 cents a pound. There is one remark which has been repeated by different hon. gentlemen opposite, and which is to the effect that the high duties on binding twine in Canada, are imposed for the benefit of a few millionaires. If by millionaires these hon. gentlemen mean those engaged in the manufacture of twine, I am sorry, Sir, to say that they are entirely mistaken; and I have only to mention the case of a gentleman, whose name has been referred to already this afternoon, and which, therefore, I do not mind mentioning again, to show hon. gentlemen opposite that in this respect they are entirely mistaken. I refer to my friend Mr. Morris, whose name has been mentioned with reference to the evidence he gave before the Committee of the House a few years ago. Any gentleman from Montreal, and any gentleman acquainted with commercial affairs in Canada, must know very well that, unfortunately, my friend Mr. Morris' investment in the manufacture of twine has not made him better off than when he commenced. I very much regret it, but it shows that the manufacture of twine has not been the great bonanza some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think it is. It has been stated that the twine made in Canada is not as good as that made in the United States. I deny that altogether. The whole gist of the evidence from a large number of manufacturers of implements in the United States, who are conversant with the qualities of twine used in Canada as well as in their own country, is to the effect that the average make of twine in Canada for some years has been better than that made in the United States. There can be no question but that it is. I have heard that opinion expressed by impartial men, men, at the same time, well qualified to know what they were talking about. Now, I just want to say a word or two upon the general question. In the first place, I want to explain to the House that the manufacture of binding twine and cordage, in the United States has, during the last year or two, been in very exceptional circumstances. The company, which has been referred to here, the National Company, almost entirely controls the manufacture of this article, most unfortunately, I think, for the general interests of business, not only as regards the power of manufacturing twine and the prices at which it can be sold, but also as regards the facilities which have heretofore existed for procuring a supply of the raw material. This company has practically got complete control of the particular fibres which enter more largely into the composition of binding twine, so that it is difficult, indeed, for a small manufacturer to secure the raw material unless at prices that preclude his doing a profitable business. In the matter of sisal fibre, this is particularly proved to be the case. Every hon. gentleman will understand in what a difficult position this state of affairs puts the manufacturers of binder twine. This company is so large, its interests are so widespread throughout the United States, its capital so extensive, that it is almost impossible for these small men to compete with it in getting their supplies. As a matter of fact, it runs the market up and down at will, and thereby makes it most unsafe for any other company to engage in the manufacture of these articles. I have had myself practical experience during the last few years of the great danger which has arisen through the manufacturers of twine in Canada endeavouring in the autumn of the year to secure a sufficient supply of hemp to manufacture the twine required for the coming season. Having to buy at that particular time, and to buy at very high prices, through the manipulations of speculators, and the market being subsequently lowered by similar means, these manufacturers have incurred very heavy losses. Then, as I have stated, in referring briefly to the manufacture of twine in the United States, this company has secured very nearly the monopoly in that line. They own nearly all the machinery running to-day in the United States in the manufacture of this article, and are in a position to sell twine at any price they like. The company is in the position of the Standard Oil Company, so that it is impossible for any competition to be started against it with any likelihood of success, and during the last year or eighteen months, this National Cordage Company has been selling twine at very much lower prices than it was formerly sold at in the United States some years before, and simply for the purpose of crushing competition. I wish to point out that the prices of twine existing in the United States to-day are not normal prices at all; and when hon. gentlemen take these priees and compare them with the prices in Canada, they are not fair to the Canadian manufacturers. Take the manufacture of cordage, the prices charged by the company in the United States to-day are not paying prices. One of the hon. gentlemen from the other side said that Canadian manufacturers could manufacture as cheaply as Americans. I believe they can, but they may not be able to manufacture and sell as cheaply as Americans, when the Americans are selling below cost, and selling below cost for a definite purpose, I am convinced that the prices at which different kinds of cordage are being sold in the United States to-day are not more than paying the labour it takes to make the cordage, leaving nothing at all for the interest on the plant, for the wear and tear, for the interest on the capital invested and the profit, so that cordage to-day is practically being sold in the United States at less than cost, and a great deal of twine is being sold on the same basis. I want to explain a little more fully what I referred to a few moments ago, when I said it was not fair to compare Canadian prices with those ruling in the United States, as hon. gentlemen who make this comparison are comparing two different sets of circumstances. The American prices which have been referred to in this debate and with which Canadian prices have been compared, are to a very large extent—and certainly this is entirely the case with regard to the prices given by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock)—the wholesale prices in New York, whereas the Canadian prices with which these prices have been compared, are list prices. Furthermore, the New York prices are net prices, while the Canadian prices are list prices, subject to a discount, in some cases to a very large discount—different discounts, of course, in proportion to the quantities given; and the Canadian prices are the prices at which Canadian twine is sold in Canada to-day to the farmers.

Mr. BAIN. Will you give us the wholesale prices?

Mr. STAIRS. No; I will not give you the net prices. I will give you the list prices, but it would not be fair to the firms to whom it is sold to give you the net prices.

Mr. WATSON. Are the prices quoted by the jobbers in Toronto correct?

Mr. STAIRS. The prices which are given to the farmer, and which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has compared with the manufacturers' prices in New York, should not be compared at all. I know that, while binding twine can be sold in Ontario for 10½ cents to-day——

An hon. MEMBER. What brand?

Mr. STAIRS. Crown brand.

An hon. MEMBER. What is that made of?

Mr. STAIRS. It is a mixed twine. I was going to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that it is impossible to compare the prices of mixed twine, because that is such an indefinite article. Pure manila twine would be sold to-day at 13⅓ cents to the farmers in Ontario.

Mr. WATSON. How many feet of that would there be to the pound?

Mr. STAIRS. Probably 625 feet—whereas pure manila is sold in New York net in large quantities to-day for 11 cents per pound. I do not put forward these prices of manila as entitled to very great weight, because there is very little pure manila twine sold either in the States or in Canada. The principal twines sold are mixed twines, and it has been found by experience that they will do the work, if not quite as well, practically as well as manila for the farmers. I want hon. members to remember that these comparisons of prices have not reference to exactly the same things, and also I wish them to recollect that the circumstances which exist in the United States to-day are exceptional, and it is hardly fair to found any arguments upon them. It is not unlikely that matters will be very different indeed in another season, and you may find that the American prices will be very much higher than they are to-day. It is very difficult to compare the prices which exist from one year to another, because the prices of hemp from which these twines are made are subject to great variations. It may be only a question of months, sometimes, and the price of hemp may go up 2 or 3 cents a pound, and the manufacturer might be getting less for his goods than he did at the lower price. All things taken into consideration, I think the farmers of Canada have been fairly treated by the manufacturers of binder twine. A very large amount of capital has been put into the business. I know that an extra amount of capital was put in by the firm with which I have been connected in order to develop that industry for the benefit of the farmer. Last year about 600 tons of the composite twine were used, and very satisfactorily used, in Canada, and if it does not work quite as well as the other twine, it has, at all events, the effect of keeping down the price of the other articles. I repeat what I said before, that I thoroughly appreciate the importance of the farmers getting the cheapest binder twine they can, and, taking the average of a few years, and not selecting one year in particular, hon. members will find that the price of binder twine has been less in Canada than in the United States. There is, therefore, no reason why the Government should take any action in the line suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think the resolution which has been moved should not receive the support of this House.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I have listened with some little attention to hon. gentlemen opposite who have addressed us this afternoon on the subject of binding twine. I will say, as a farmer, and I think that I understand as much about twine as any of the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, and have used as much of it, and I have tried all kinds of twine, that I find no twine like our Canadian Halifax twine. I say above board, that I agree very much with the hon. gentleman from Wentworth (Mr. Bain) that the cheapest is not the best or the cheapest in the end. The first great principle is to get the best twine in the interests of the farmer, because, we are engaged in using it when time is valuable, and when anything which interferes with the reaper and the binder is a loss to the farmer. I was surprised at my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) who treated us with the same course of argument he used last December in South Victoria, when he preached blue ruin to the farmer. I, as a farmer, do not agree with that style of argument. I do not agree with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I think that he and I having succeeded in Canada as we have succeeded, having our herds and flocks about us and enjoying prosperity, should be ashamed to decry our country, and I would be the last man to say that the small trifle of twine which was produced here in Canada should make us pick holes in the National Policy, which is the national existence of Canada. What does it amount to? Three years ago I bought 1,200 pounds of twine, and I have some of it yet, and I harvest 300 acres of land. I have raised 80 bushels of oats to the acre, and it never cost me 50 cents an acre to bind them, and I think I grow as much to the acre as any of the western farmers. I think this matter is of too small importance and ought not to be entertained, and I will vote against breaking into the National Policy and the national interests of this country in this particular.

Mr. ROWAND. In discussing this question, as in some other questions which I have heard discussed in this House, I do not see why the National Policy should be trotted out at all. It seems that, whenever an advantage is asked for the farmers or it is demanded that the farmers should be placed on an equal footing with the other classes in this country you have to trot out the National Policy. Now, we have an admission from the manufacturers themselves to-night that the Canadian is able to hold his own against any other manufacturer. We have a gentleman who, I am told, manufactures binding twine in the city of Halifax, who says he is able to compete with the Americans. Now, we have the conditions alike in the United States and in Canada; we have the raw material in both countries free, we have just as cheap labour in this country as they have in the United States. Now, why should we have to pay more for our binding twine than they do in the United States?

An hon. MEMBER. We do not.

Mr. ROWAND. We do. It has been shown to-night we do. I would refer to the statement that was made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), who says that American twine, with duty paid, is sold in Manitoba alongside Canadian twine. If you want any stronger evidence than that I do not know where you will go for it. Now, I am not going to speak as a manufacturer; I am going to speak as a farmer, and I will speak as briefly as possible on the subject. In regard to the cost of binding twine, it was stated by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, I think from South Victoria (Mr. Fairbairn), that he never consumed 50 cents worth of binding twine per acre in his life. Well, I have consumed that, more than that, and I have consumed a great deal less than that sometimes. I think myself that 2 pounds per acre of binding twine is a very fair average in this country. But when we take 2 pounds of twine we have got to take into consideration the difference in the article. My experience has been, and I have watched my neighbours around me whose experience is the same, that it does not matter very much what kind of twine we use, it just costs about the same number of cents per acre. The better kinds of twine, as has been stated by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), I believe, are the most profitable. You lose less time with your machine, and seldom get into a snarl; you seldom break your thread, whereas the coarse twines do not run so well in the needle. In my county we pay between $8,000 and $9,000 in duty on binding twine. Now, I want some advocate of the National Policy to tell me how the farmers of Bruce get that $8,000 back into their pockets through the National Policy. It does not go into the treasury, at least only about $1,200, I think, altogether went into the treasury last year from binding twine used in the country. No, Sir, it goes mostly into the pocket of our friend who spoke here a short time ago, and others who are engaged in that business. We would not grumble so much if it went into the treasury, but it goes into the pockets of those gentlemen, and how it gets back out of the pockets of those gentlemen into the pockets of the farmers again, is what I would like to find out. We may be told that the duty does us no injury. That is not our experience. Our experience is that we are paying just 50 cents an acre for binding twine when we ought to be paying 44 cents. That is the condition of the matter. Now, some people are always talking about protecting the industries of this country; it is said that we ought to protect the infant industries. But in our experience in this country they never get to be anything else but infant industries and the longer they live the larger infants they get to be, and the more nourishment they need. Now, I claim that I represent the largest industry in this country, as a farmer. The farmers compose something like 78 per cent. of the population of this country, including those who depend upon them in our towns and villages. Now, we do not ask for any protection, but we do ask that we have fair-play in this country. We want to buy where we can buy the cheapest, and sell where we can sell the dearest, without any restrictions being put upon us at all, and we are perfectly willing to grant everybody else the same liberty that we ask for ourselves. We are the largest industry in this country; we have the largest amount of capital invested, larger than in all the other industries combined, but we have the least protection and the smallest returns for the money we have invested. Now, Sir, I hope that the Minister of Customs or the Minister of Finance, will take this matter into his consideration, and if he does not feel disposed to throw off the whole duty and give us binding twine free—which I believe would be just as popular a move in this country as was the removal of the sugar duty a few days ago—if he cannot do that, let him at least put us on a level with the Americans.

Mr. GILLMOR. I was a little struck with a remark made by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs). He said that the farmers in Canada were very fairly treated by the manufacturers of binding twine. Now, the farmers of Canada, numbering some millions, ought to be under great obligations to the five or six manufacturers of binding twine in Canada that they used them so fairly, that they are so generous to them, that they do not impose upon them. It is a most remarkable thing that the great mass of the people, the farmers and agriculturists, those who till the soil in all ages, have been under the control of a few folks who make binding twine. The slave-holders, the slave-owners, would get up and tell you that they treat those who till the soil well; they feed them well, clothed them well; they take good care of them and use them for their own benefit. The landlords of Russia used the serfs well, I suppose, those who till the soil in that country, and the landlords doubtless use their tenants well in Ireland, England and Scotland—the great mass of the people who work and toil and feed the world. And here comes up a gentleman, one of the half dozen manufacturers of twine in Canada, and talks about treating well the millions of independent toilers, and says they ought to be thankful that the manufacturers use them so well. He did not tell us anything about the combinations. He made a very learned speech about the difficulties that they had in getting raw material, but he did not tell us anything about what arrangement he had made in his manufacture, and how it was being worked now, whether he was in the combination, and how much he was getting out of the arrangement. There is the factory down in St. John; I do not know the prices, I do not live there, but the National Policy was instituted to give labour, to make employment for the people, and to create home industries. They boasted of a rope manufactory that existed for years and years, when you had no protective system, and furnished employment for a certain number of people, I cannot say how many. And where is it now? Is there anybody employed in the rope factory, or the binding twine factory, in St. John? The representatives from that city know—there may be; but I say that under this fostering policy, this National Policy that was to give employment, to make a home industry, they have shut down the factory, and the people had to go off and find food and labour somewhere else, and Mr. Connors is getting, I am told, $15,000 a year for walking about and doing nothing, and furnishing no employment. Who pays the $15,000 that goes to pay Mr. Connors, and who pays the $30,000 to Mr. Stairs? It is the men who are using binding twine, and the rope and cordage in this country. I say the farmers deserve no better treatment if they do not unite together and take charge of this country, and not allow a few combines to fleece them and enrich themselves at the expense of the bone and sinew of this country. I think that our friends are too modest in claiming privileges. Of course, I cannot go into the prices, but I know that the farmers who use binding twine are paying these men, and those who make it make enough to satisfy themselves and pay the others to shut down their manufactories, in order to give them a chance to do it. They talk about this tariff, and I have heard some of my friends on this side of the House admit that under a tariff for revenue, when you take off the duty, it lessens the price. A tariff means a tax for revenue or protection. Hon. gentlemen opposite boast about having reduced the price of sugar; but if they want to give free sugar, let them take off their protective tariff and the people will get 25 lbs. instead of 20 lbs. for a dollar. I do not give the Government credit for what they have done with respect to sugar. I admit the people are going to get a few more pounds of sugar for a dollar; but the Government are not giving these protected industries any less profit. It is true they allow sugar used in manufacture to come in free of duty, but the raw material that comes in free cannot be used by the people, and therefore it does not come into competition with the manufactured article. The people have now a taste of free sugar, and the National Policy is doomed. I remember reading the history of the repeal of the Corn Laws and the breaking down of the protective system in England, and the first breach made in the wall of protection was that of free sugar. And the people once having got a taste of free sugar will demand the removal of protection on the whole class of articles consumed by the people. The moment you remove the duties, goods become cheaper and the people get more for their money. Hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to hold on to the National Policy; but, thank God, the people have got a taste of cheap sugar, and they want cheap food and clothing and the necessaries of life, and they will obtain them.

Mr. McNEILL. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, that the people will very much approve of cheap sugar. They will learn a lesson from cheap sugar, and it will be one that will not tend to lead them to approve of the arguments advanced on the other side of this House to-night. The lesson they will learn from cheap sugar will be this, that during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, when they were carrying out the policy which they advocate to-day, sugar did not get any cheaper, rather a little dearer; but when the National Policy was introduced sugar did become cheaper, very much cheaper.

Mr. MULOCK. Why?

Mr. McNEILL. Simply because we were not under the control of the combines, which hon.

gentlemen seem to admire so much, on the other side of the line. Sugar became cheaper when we manufactured our own sugar. Now sugar has become so much cheaper under the National Policy by reason of the prosperity brought on this country through the operation of that policy, and the Government have been able to reduce the price of sugar to such an enormous extent that hon. gentlemen opposite can hardly hold their tongues about it and barely permit the matter to be referred to for a moment. Nevertheless, the people have the fact that, by pursuing a system of fair protection to our own national industries we have succeeded, in this one very important article of sugar, in reducing the price to a most extraordinary extent. In the same manner we hope and believe we have reduced, and will still further reduce, the price of the greater number of articles we are manufacturing in this country. Agricultural machinery, to which reference has been made to-night, is another example of it. The price of agricultural implements, as everyone knows, has come tumbling down year after year. Hon. gentlemen opposite no longer say, as they used to tell us, that the effect of the National Policy was to enormously enhance the price of all articles, but they tell us they should be even cheaper still. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us that the people of the United States, in order to obtain control of our markets, are prepared to sell their implements to buyers who will bring them into Canada cheaper than they sell them in their own markets. What does this mean?

Mr. McMILLAN. I made no such statement. I did not state that the Americans were prepared to sell cheaper here. I enumerated different articles and stated the prices and showed the amount of duty paid.

Mr. McNEILL. Some hon. gentleman opposite made the admission, and it does not matter to my argument whether it was the hon. member for Huron or not. What does this state of things mean? It simply means this, that American manufacturers are paying the duty. American manufacturers, I repeat, in order to gain access to our markets, are prepared to pay the duty. If we remove the duty we would not be better off than we are now, because the American manufacturers would not have to pay the duty in that case to enter here, and the price paid would be that prevailing in this market. I suppose this argument, as applied to machinery, does not go down with hon. gentlemen opposite, but if I applied it to the case of horses sold to Americans it would no doubt be accepted. If an American were to say that he could buy a horse which would sell for $100 in the States in Canada for $70, and it was the duty that made him pay $100 when he got it from the other side of the line, hon. gentlemen opposite would agree with that proposition. But the same argument has been used with reference to machinery. So far as binding twine is concerned a great deal of fuss is being made over very little. It seems to me, further, that it is most astonishing that hon. gentlemen opposite can, one after another, talk in the way they do talk about the farmers of this country, as if they thought the farmers were such a wonderfully stupid set of people that hon. gentlemen opposite required to rise and pretend to be so wonderfully in earnest in defence of their interests. The farmers of this country are sufficiently common-sense people to know well that any Government whatever they may be, must consider the interests of the vast majority of the electors. Do they not understand that any policy which the Government adopts cannot be such a policy as is directly opposed to the interests of the enormous mass of electors? Any Government must consider the interests of the farmers, and it is absurd to say that any Government will consider the interests of five men in the place of two or three millions of people. Yet that is the buncombe which hon. gentlemen are talking to-night when they are endeavouring to persuade the farmers that the Government are considering the interests of five men rather then the interests of two or three millions. I wonder hon. gentlemen opposite do not consider, as I do, that it is impertinent to the farmers to talk to them in any such manner. What does the matter of binding twine amount to after all? The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Waton) told the House that the price of the best class of binding twine in Chicago, manila twine, was 12¼ cents per pound; and the junior member for Halifax, who is better informed on the question than any other member of the House, has told us on his responsibility as a member that the price of that class of manila binding twine in Canada is 13¼ cents per pound, or a difference of only 1 cent per pound.

Mr. WATSON. 1¾ cents, and there is a difference of 75 feet in the length of 1 pound.

Mr. McNEILL. I have quoted the figures of the hon. gentleman for the Chicago article, and I have quoted the figures of the hon. member for Halifax for the Canadian article. I am taking the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Stairs) as the representative of Canada, and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) as the representative of the United States in this matter, and I say that the representative of Canada states that the price of this class of binding twine is 13¼ cents per pound. and my hon. friend to my right says that the price in the United States for a similar quality of binding twine is 12¼ cents per pound. You can only compare the same classes of twine, for the other twine is all a mixture, and it is quite impossible to compare mixtures when you do not know what the mixtures are. But here is a pure class of twine, and we can compare these two cases; and, so far as I have been able to gather from the discussion which has taken place here to-night, the price in the United States, according to my hon. friend from Marquette, is 12¼ cents, and the price in Canada is 13¼ cents.

Mr. WATSON. Give us the length?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman told us himself, when he was speaking that he could not give the length.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Stairs can tell you.

An hon. MEMBER. 525 feet.

Mr. STAIRS. Do you refer to manila?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. STAIRS. About 650 feet.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You said 625 feet before.

Mr. McNEILL. That is the twine which my hon. friend who interrupts me continually, sees is the same length as the American twine.

Mr. WATSON. The American twine is 693 feet.

Mr. McNEILL. There is a difference of 43 feet in favour of the American twine, and how much thinner it may be as compared with the Canadian twine, and how much inferior from being too thin we do not know. So far as I can see, as between those two classes of twine there is a difference of 1 cent per pound and 43 feet in length to the advantage of the American twine. That is the result of all this tremendous discussion to-night, and the cause of this display by hon. gentlemen opposite on behalf of the ruined farmers of Canada, because of the fact, even if it is admitted, that on this very highest class of twine there is one cent difference; and for the sake of saving that one cent per pound difference, hon. gentlemen opposite are ready to send out of the country the total of this 12¼ cents per pound on all the twine manufactured in Canada, and to give the benefit to the United States. They are ready to ruin the binder twine industry in this country for the sake of promoting the industry in the United States. It is the same way with regard to the agricultural implement industry, and with regard to every other industry in this country. On the very same principle the gentlemen opposite are prepared to stifle, and to ruin, and to trample under foot the industries of Canada which have been built up under this National Policy, and the industries which will continue to grow and develop under the National Policy, in spite of all my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), and his friends on the other side of the line, may say or do.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but I would take the liberty of asking a question which, if answered, would do much to clear up the minds of members of the House on this subject. I have a right to assume, and I do assume, that the mover of this resolution moved it in good faith, and from his standpoint he no doubt believes that its adoption would result in good. The chief argument he used in sustaining this resolution was a letter which he read containing a proposition from an American manufacturing firm to a firm in Canada, and which letter contained a request that the offer should not be made known to the Canadian twine manufacturers. If that was a bonâ fide offer, why was the request for secrecy made? If we could know why that request was made, I have no doubt that the answer would clear up the atmosphere a little.

Mr. MULOCK. The letter which I read was forwarded to me by a firm of binding implement manufacturers in Ontario. There was a letter sent to them by a Canadian dealer in binding twine, quoting the terms of an arrangement which he had made with the National Cordage Company of New York, and if the hon. gentleman desires to have the name of the manufacturer I will give it to him.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I do not ask that.

Mr. MULOCK. I shall be quite pleased to give the name of the writer to him, or to any other hon. gentleman privately, but not for the purpose of the press. When I was asked for the name before I said I would give it to the Minister of Finance, and I am ready to do so still.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not understood my question, or may be I have misunderstood his proposition. I asked him why that letter contained a reservation that the offer should not be made known to the Canadian twine manufacturers?

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman ought to be quite as capable as I am of drawing his conclusions, but since he cannot, I will. At present the Canadian manufacturers are selling, or were selling at the time of that letter—you must remember that I gave notice of my motion on the 1st May, and I have allowed it to remain in abeyance until to-night; I have not kept track of the markets of Canada on this subject, and, therefore, I am depending on others for information—I should judge from that letter that the writer concluded that the Canadian manufacturers were endeavouring to place their goods on the Canadian markets at an excessively high price, and this man had succeeded in supplying himself with the wherewith to supply the Canadian market at a very much reduced price, and he was anxious to promote a trade before the Canadian manufacturers came down to competition prices.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). I wish to correct the statement made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson). He stated that the prices of agricultural implements and of binding twine were higher in Manitoba and the North-West than they were in Dakota. Such is not the case. The delegates who came over, and who are coming over all the time, from Dakota to Manitoba and the North-West Territories, representing farmers in the various counties of Dakota and looking out for another home in Canada, in order to leave Dakota, are arriving in Winnipeg every day. Some of them arrived there from Dakota last winter. They called on me in my office, and I secured for them the price lists of the various Canadian agricultural implements used in Manitoba and the North-West. I went to the different agents and got the printed price lists of the Canadian implements, and also the price lists of the American implements sold in Manitoba and the North-West. They, the delegates, had with them the price list of farm implements quoted for the farmers in Dakota. They compared these two lists in my office and in my presence, and they found that binding twine last year was quoted at precisely the same rate in Dakota as it was quoted in Manitoba and the North-West. In going over the lists further, they found, as far as they could make out, and as far as I could make out, that there were only two classes of implements sold at a higher rate in Manitoba than in Dakota, and these were American implements. On the other hand, we had four or five agricultural implements which sold at a lower price in Manitoba and the North-West than they sold in Dakota. Many of these delegates were Canadian farmers settled in Dakota for years; they came over to see what advantages, if any, we had on the Canadian as against the American side, and they were anxious to discover the advantages and disadvantages, so that they could represent them to their people. These delegates came to the conclusion on the whole that prices were cheaper in Canada than in the United States. There was a Mr. Cumming, a farmer who had been a Liberal in Canada who previously resided in Halton County, but who moved to Devil's Lake, in Dakota. He told me he had read a speech in the Winnipeg Free Press which was delivered by the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) a year or so before, and he expressed his surprise that any Canadian member of Parliament should have made the statements that gentleman did. He said that the hon. member for Marquette had given prices for agricultural implements in Dakota which were not the prices at which those implements were sold to the farmers there, and he said that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) must either have been misled, or else he had quoted the wholesale prices instead of the retail prices, for the prices quoted were not the prices at which the farmers had to purchase these agricultural implements in Dakota. I object entirely to this continued acting as the hon. member for Marquette is doing—trying to represent to this House and the country that we in Manitoba and the North-West are suffering more than they are in Dakota. Such is not the case. People are moving from Dakota to Manitoba and the North-West in hundreds; at least 1,000 of a farming population have moved from Dakota to settle in Manitoba and the North-West this year.

Mr. WATSON. Will you give us the prices in Dakota?

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). My recollection is that it is 17 cents for binding twine.

Mr. WATSON. The prices of implements.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). I had them, but I have not got them here.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I always listen with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). He is generally original, and generally very clear and concise in his statements, except when the National Policy is attacked or in danger; then my hon. friend falls into the old rut, and adopts the old fallacy of his friends in power. To-night he falls back on the old story of sugar and agricultural implements, and all the other things the farmer uses being cheaper under the National Policy than they were under the previous system. It is the same old story and the same old fallacy. These hon. gentlemen always keep in the background, carefully concealed out of sight, the fact that the prices of these articles in the markets of the world, have fallen at least one-half since the National Policy has been inaugurated. Take sugar, for instance, and I venture to say that it is one-half cheaper in Great Britain, and in all the leading markets of the world to-day, than it was in 1879. Most of the sugar-producing countries in the world have bonussed the production of sugar, the investments in it have been larger; greater enterprises, keener competition, and cheaper methods of production have all tended to reduce the price most materially. The fact is just the same with regard to agricultural implements and most other articles. I need not tell this House that the price of iron, the raw material used in the manufacture of these implements, has fallen one-half; and that improved methods of production and skill in working mines and in manufacturing, have all contributed to the fall in prices; and not one iota of the reduction is due to the National Policy. My hon. friend from North Bruce and all the other sensible men of that party know in their hearts that this is the case. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) opposes free twine on the same ground, he says, that he favoured free sugar. He says that in the case of sugar we admit the raw material free, and we do the same in the case of binding twine. Let us look at that for a moment. So far as sugar is concerned, it is true we have thrown the duty off the raw material; but what practical benefit is that to the farmer and the general consumer? You have to get a revenue, and if you throw the duty off one article, you must put it on something else; you are just shifting the taxes, and the farmer and the consumer will have to pay them; but they are not relieved one whit by the introduction of raw sugar. But with regard to the money which goes into the pockets of the manufacturers, which they ought not to have, which is direct robbery of the farmers and the other consumers to give them, they have more of than they had before. Under the present protection of eight-tenths of a cent a pound at least $1,800,000 is taken out of the pockets of the consumers, of which not one cent goes into the treasury, but every cent into the pockets of the refiners. That is what we complain of in the case of binder twine, which the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who is concerned in its manufacture, gets up and pleads for to-night. I think it would have looked as well if he had allowed others to plead for it, because he is not a disinterested, but an interested witness, and is not in a position to give a fair decision on the matter. Now, let us look at the conditions of the case. We use in this country 8,000,000 lbs. of binding twine in a year, and so little is imported that we only derive about $1,200 of revenue from it. I need not tell you that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is very careful to get all the duty he can from what is imported. Some three years ago a Mr. McDonald, of Mitchell, undertook to bring in a quantity of binding twine. He had bought it in the United States at 7½ cents a pound, and he produced his invoice, expecting to pay the duty upon that price; but the Customs Department charged a duty, not on the invoice price, the actual price which he had paid, but on a valuation equal to what the manufacturers of twine in this country sold it for, namely, 11 cents a pound; in other words, they made him pay duty on 3½ cents a pound more than he had paid for the article. Now, suppose that the 8,000,000 lbs. of binder twine used in the country were valued at 10 cents a pound; if that were all imported, the duty upon it at 25 per cent. ad valorem would amount to just $200,000. Well, here is just how the matter stands. Our manufacturers, with equal facilities for manufacturing to those in the United States, with the raw material just as cheap, with the taxes just as low, with all the conditions for manufacturing just as favourable, have exactly $200,000 of protection. And where does that money go? Not one cent of it goes into the treasury. Now, the stand I take is this: The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) said that we should not apologize in the matter, that we should not ask it as a favour. We do not. We say the farmers of Canada have been robbed long enough, that it is not fair to take $200,000 from them every year, not one cent of which goes into the public revenue, and put it into the pockets of five individuals. That is the ground we take. We demand it as a right, and the time is not far distant when, if it is refused now, we will get it.

Mr. DALY. I do not intend to take up very much time of the House, as, on a former occasion,

I have addressed the House upon this question, Nor do I intend to follow the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, because his statements are as extravagant as those of the hon. gentlemen who preceded him on the other side. I simply desire to confine myself to the question at issue, as to whether or not the motion before us should carry. I do not think any evidence has been adduced by hon. gentlemen opposite to satisfy my mind that the farmer has been injured in the slightest degree by the duty on binding twine. I showed to the House last session, in the speech I made during the Budget debate, the exact position in which our farmers stand with reference to this question as compared with the farmers of the United States. At that time I had received a letter from the Massey Manufacturing Company—a company which hon. gentlemen must admit is one of the largest concerns in Canada, and which is concerned very largely in the manufacture of binding twine. I will quote an extract from that letter, which, I think, will satisfy any unbiassed mind, that, at all events in 1889-90, the farmers of this country were not suffering from the duty on binding twine. They say:

"We certainly consider twine made by the leading manufacturers of this article in Canada to be fully equal and in some instances better than that made in the United States. The price of a standard twine manufactured out of half manila and half sisal hemp we believe is worth in Chicago to-day in wholesale consignments of, say, 100 tons, about 13½ cents to 14½ cents a pound, while pure manila is worth from 15 to 15½ cents a pound, with a discount of 3 per cent. for cash at ten days. It might possibly be a little higher than this now, but certainly not any less, as a rule; and we can vouch for the past two or three seasons that binder twine of equal quality has been retailed in the United States at a greater price than in Canada. To further substantiate the price named above, we enclose you herewith a clipping from the Farm Implement News published in Chicago."

I will read the clipping from the Implement News later on. They go on to say:

"You will notice that the lowest quotation made to us in 100-ton lots is 9 cents per pound f.o.b. cars, New York city. We might say for this same twine, which is being manufactured by the Dartmouth Ropeworks Company of Halifax, and which we are using a goodly quantity of, we are retailing to Ontario farmers, payable on the 1st day of October next, at 10 cents per pound, and in Manitoba delivered at farmers' stations at 13 cents a pound. The standard manila twine as indicated above, we retail in Ontario at 15 cents, and in Manitoba at 17 cents, which goes to show that we retail twine to farmers in Ontario at about the equivalent price as it is being wholesaled by the manufacturers and dealers in the States, and only a bare addition of 2 cents a pound, to cover the additional freight and expenses incurred in the Manitoba trade."
