"The binder twine situation has not improved. Those whose interests are merged with the association, are persuaded that established card prices are bound to prevail a little later on in the season, on a basis of about 16½ cents for pure manila sold out of St. Louis. In support of this position they cite the fact that seventeen mills of the National Cordage Company have been sold, so as to permit the cleaning out of the old stocks. But the demoralization of prices goes on merrily in spite of all warnings and admonitions; and it is to be noticed that more cheap grades of twine than ever are offering. For instance, there has been a wonderful increase of the American and New Zealand hemp article, whose usefulness is claimed to be greatly advanced since the fibre is presented in single rather than in the three-ply form in which it went to the market two or three years ago. Furthermore, dealers complain that certain jobbers are having sisal made up on half-and-half, one-half being coloured to represent manila. In such circumstances the low price people are getting the lion's share of the trade going; but buying is, nevertheless, not to say active. The prices ruling for the business are about as follows:—Manila, 15c. in car lots, and 15½c. in less than car lots; standard, 13½c. and 14c.; hemp, 11½c. and 12c.; jute, 10½c., 11c. and 11½c. These are close, too, if they are not the lowest quotations obtainable by half a cent."

Now, the quotation from the letter of the Massey Manufacturing Company and the quotation from the Farm Implement News will indicate to any fair-minded man, that, so far as the farmers of Ontario and Manitoba are concerned, they were getting manila, in that year, at a lower price, or, at all events, as cheaply as it could be got in the United States. I communicated with the Massey Manufacturing Company this year, in connection with the very motion before the House now, and they wrote me as follows:—

"Your favour of 4th instant received, informing us of the item that Mr. Mulock has on the motion paper in regard to putting binder twine on the free list. The question as you put it to us is rather a difficult one for us to answer, as the conditions of the trade given varied so much during the past year or two, and we would briefly state the facts as they just now present themselves to us. Last season binder twine was sold in Canada at 1 to 2 cents per pound less than it was in the United States, unless it might be in some of the States where the crops were poor. And with the anticipation of raw material being cheaper for this season, the manufacturers and dealers in twine unloaded their stocks at prices below what it actually cost them; raw materials have been greatly reduced during the past six months, and raw material being placed on the free list now in the United States, the Government, we believe, has promised the manufacturers on that side of the line a rebate equivalent to the amount of duties they have paid on the raw material on all sales that they have made of the manufactured article, up to a given date; and as they carried over a very large quantity of high-priced material, with the duty added on it, they are doing their best to unload, and believe that prices are generally quoted lower just now than they are in Canada. But everything being equal, we believe there would be a very little difference between the prices of Canadian manufacturers and those of American manufacturers. To cite an instance, we would say that last season when we were retailing a twine here to the Canadian farmers at 10 cents per pound, freight and duty paid to their nearest stations, and for which we accepted their paper payable 1st October following, we could not buy the same article in the United States in lots of 100 tons, f.o.b., New York, for less than 9 cents per pound cash; whilst we believe the same twine is being retailed in the United States to the farmers at 10 cents per pound, and which will be the price obtained for it here this season. Surely farmers do not want their twine cheaper than this. If they do, some one practically will have to be robbed, in some shape or form. We also believe that a large quantity of inferior material is being used in the composition of twine, with manila and sisal hemps, and coloured so as to prevent detection; these fibres being a very cheap class of goods of course assist to reduce prices on the other side. * * * *

"We have bought a considerable amount of twine in the States for export and would refer you to the National Cordage Company of New York, the Elizabethport Cordage Company of New York, the Boston Cordage Company of Boston, all of which are reliable houses."

Now, the data given in that letter will convince any hon. gentleman that, so far as the farmers of Ontario and Manitoba are concerned, up to the present they have not been affected by the duty on binding twine; but I am given to understand that the National Cordage Company of the United States, which is referred to in the communication of the Massey Manufacturing Company, has made some arrangement with the binding twine concerns in our country; and it may be that in the course of another year our farmers may be injured by the effect of the duty. They may be injured by this combine brought about by the National Cordage Company of New York, because the effect of that combine will be that all the binding twine manufactured on the American continent will be controlled by that company. If this motion were to carry to-night it would not affect the price of binding twine to our farmers in the slightest degree, since all the wholesale purchasers have laid in their stocks long ago and no doubt the majority of the prudent farmers of Manitoba have also purchased their supply: but if it be true that the National Cordage Company have made this arrangement with the concerns in Canada, the Government will no doubt take this matter into serious consideration. I have myself laid the matter before the Government, and I hope sincerely that the views which we have placed before the Government will have sufficient weight to induce them to take this matter into serious consideration, and, if the existence of the combine made by the National Cordage Company is going to raise the price of binder twine to the farmers of Ontario and Manitoba, I hope the duty on that twine will be thrown off during the next year.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that I should have troubled the House after the full discussion which has taken place, if it were not for the way in which the administration of the Customs Department has been animadverted upon by some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. They seem to have forgotten that there is a law on the Statute-book, and that it is the duty of the Minister of Customs and his officers to carry out that law rigidly and to the letter. They seem also to have forgotten that the provisions which are now in the Act were in force when they sat on this side of the House and sustained on every occasion the gentlemen who then controlled the destinies of the country. It is not very often that I have to complain of any remarks of my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). I have often said that he was one of the most consistent free traders in this Assembly, and I think he exhibited that to-night, but he forgot his own conduct when he supported the late Administration. When they came into power, the Finance Minister imposed a specific duty on tea—an article which the people had been consuming for some time free of duty—of 4 cents a pound on green and 3 cents a pound on black. I think my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) supported the proposition of the Government of that day in that matter. Not satisfied with that, the Finance Minister, with the aid of my hon. friend, increased the duty on tea to 6 cents and 5 cents a pound respectively. If my hon. friend could thank the Almighty for free sugar, and could state that, having once had the taste of that sweet article in their mouths, the people of Canada would never again allow a duty to be placed upon it, surely he ought to have remembered that other article, occupying a somewhat similar position to that of sugar, and I do not see how, after his solemn prayer, he could have given his support to the imposition of a duty upon an article which is a prime necessity just as much as sugar is.

Mr. FOSTER. He was not converted then.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, he was just as ardent a free trader then as he is now, but the difference was that he was then on this side of the House and had his friends to support instead of being, as he is now, on that side of the House and having his opponents to oppose. A good deal of fault has been found with the manner of carrying out and imposing the duty on binding twine, which applies, I may say, with as much force to any other article imported into this country. The gentlemen who have spoken know well that the provision of the law is that the value of an article for duty when imported into this country is the price of the article at which it is sold for home consumption in the country from which it is exported. Knowing that to be the case, is it fair, or I may say is it honest, to abuse the administrators of that law for enforcing it rigidly and to the letter? Let me ask these hon. gentlemen, especially the Finance Minister and his colleagues who then occupied the positions we fill to-day, if they did not try to enforce the law as rigidly as we do now? Perhaps I am putting that a little too strong. I will ask them if they did not issue instructions to every collector and Customs official throughout the Dominion to enforce the law as rigidly as it has been enforced by this Administration? The only difference between these gentlemen and this Administration was this: They gave instructions for the enforcement of the law, but they never carried it out; we, finding the law on the Statute-book, not only gave instructions to the collectors to enforce it, but we have steadily, at all events from the time that I have occupied the position that I do now, seen that the law is enforced. If the law is wrong, it is in the power of Parliament to change it. My hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) is not as fair as he usually is in the case which he gave to illustrate his argument this evening. He informed the House that a Mr. McDonald in the West had purchased binding twine at a certain price, and that the Customs Department, in enforcing the law, had compelled him to pay a duty on a higher price—the difference, I think, between 7½ cents and 11 cents a pound. The hon. gentleman is right, but we had the best evidence which we could possibly obtain that 11 cents or 11½ cents was the price it was sold at in the American market for home consumption, and it was therefore our duty under the law to enforce its provisions. It was found, however, after full investigation, that, from the time of our issuing the order instructing the officials to collect the duty upon 11 cents, and the time when he purchased, it had fallen in the market, and it would have been only just and fair, and much more honourable, if the hon. gentleman had stated that, after a full investigation had been made, an investigation which was the result of sending an official from Canada to the United States for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, the amount which he had paid over the price at which it was sold at the time he purchased it in the United States, was refunded to him. That is the policy which has been pursued by the department in the administration of these provisions of the Customs Act. Now, when my hon. friends opposite were in power, they were just as ready and anxious to enforce the law, and upon almost every stump they told the manufacturers of this country that they were enforcing the law in precisely the same manner in which it has been enforced by the present Administration, of which the supporters of our predecessors are now complaining. I have here a speech delivered by the late leader of the Government, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, at Sarnia, on the 11th October, 1875, when he said:

"The complaint of Canadian manufacturers has been that this (United States competition) has made what is called a sacrifice market for their goods, and no doubt it has been productive of great provocation to our manufacturers and injury to the trade of Canada."

Having made that admission, he went on to say:

"That the policy of his Government was never to permit United States manufacturers to introduce their goods into this market at the valuation at which they were willing to sell them.

When he used the expression "the valuation at which they were willing to sell them," that was when they were selling their goods for export at a much lower rate than they were selling in their home market for use in that country, so that, no matter how much you may complain at the present moment of the administration of the law, you supported it when your friends were in power, and I venture the prediction that, if unfortunately that party crosses to this side of the House, you will do the same thing in the administration of the Customs Act, unless, forsooth, you adopt your unrestricted reciprocity resolutions, when you would have no Custom-houses to look after. One hon. gentleman complained that we had drifted from the question before the House into a general defence of the National Policy. Well, I am not prepared to say that that sin lies at the door of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL. My hon. friend has drawn altogether a wrong inference from my remarks. I say that there was scarcely a member on his side of the House who has spoken to-night who did not attack the National Policy in almost every particular, apart altogether from the question of binding twine, and it scarcely lies in their mouths to find fault with us for defending, on this side, a principle which we have steadily sustained and voted for during the last twelve years, when that principle had been attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite. When I used the expression that it had not been mooted on this side, it was not with the intention of leaving on the minds of the House the impression that we were not prepared to defend it, and to defend it successfully. Now, so much has been said upon the question of binding twine, that one can scarcely go into the arguments without repeating something that has been said. As the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has pointed out, we have heard so many conflicting statements from hon. gentlemen opposite that it reminds me of an anecdote that was told of an eminent English statesman. After the Cabinet had discussed a question in Council and had come to a decision as to what course they intended to pursue when they went to Parliament, one of the Ministers asked the question: "Is this to raise the taxes upon the people or is it to lower them?" "I am not particular which," answered the Premier, "but be sure to tell one story when you get outside the Council chamber." Now, it seems to me that when those gentlemen make a general onslaught on one particular item of the tariff, it would be just as well for them to meet together, and agree upon some story to tell in order that they might not present the spectacle they have presented to-day of telling half a dozen different stories, and coming to about a dozen different conclusions upon the one subject. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us that it cost him 50 cents per acre for binding twine, and his statement was verified by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Rowand). So far as I can remember to-night, the highest price that has been paid, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, for binding twine imported into this country, has been 14 cents a pound. Now, 2 pounds of twine would be sufficient for an acre of ground, and the hon. member for Bruce admitted that it was, notwithstanding that he had just informed the House that it cost him 50 cents an acre. That would make the value of the twine 25 cents a pound. Now, I leave that little bit of difference to those hon. gentlemen to settle among themselves. It is only one of the absurd I was going to say, but I do not desire to be disrespectful—it seems to me one of the absurd statements that have been made on this occasion. The hon. gentleman from Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) also told us that the farmers had been robbed of $200,000 upon the binding twine they had used in one year. If that be the case, then it would imply that the full amount of 25 per cent. duty which is imposed upon the article, had been added to the value of it. Now, we have heard over and over again statements made here to-night, and the most indubitable evidence given that such is not the case, that, in fact, binding twine has been sold in this country in some cases at a less price than it was sold in the United States; and if you sell in Canada at the export price, and you calculate the duty upon the price at which it is sold, and then add it to the price paid by the importer, you will find that it was not higher in Canada than in the United States. Do you want an illustration of that? I have a statement before me in which, I think, that principle is very well illustrated. Senator Vest, in discussing the question of combines in the Senate of the United States, gave a table of prices for export and for home consumption, and if you take the prices given by that gentleman, you will find that if you add the 35 per cent. to the price at which the article is sold for export, you then get it cheaper than you would if you had your—I was going to say, unrestricted reciprocity, but I believe you have abandoned that altogether and now call it "continental free trade." If you had continental free trade, then, there would be no necessity, nor would there be any inducement for the manufacturer in the United States to lower his price, and the Canadian farmer then would have to pay the whole price, the price at which it is sold in the home market, plus the freight, to that portion of Canada into which it was imported. Now, I will prove this, although it has no bearing upon this particular question. As I said a moment ago, I do not desire to enter into the general question of protection or free trade, or the success or non-success of the National Policy, but I think there are arguments sufficient, and there are facts in abundance to show that the farmers have not only been provided to a very great extent with a home market for their products, but they have purchased their articles as cheap and cheaper than they did previously to the introduction of that policy, proportionately to the price.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Put on more tax.

Mr. BOWELL. We have heard that taunt so often that it is a chestnut that is baked almost to a crisp. The hon. member for Middlesex made use of the same argument in discussing the question of sugar. He said that my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) was not fair because he did not point out the fact that the price in the country of production of that article was much lower than it is to-day, arising partially from the fact of the Government having given bounties for the production of sugar. But if he had taken the tariff as it was left by hon. gentlemen opposite when they left the Government and applied it to the price of sugar at the present day, and applied the present tariff to it, sugar would be dearer to the consumer than it is under the present tariff.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, I make that assertion, and it is quite susceptible of being proven. I have gone fully into that calculation; I have taken the price of sugar in 1878-79, I have applied to it what is termed the Cartwright tariff, and if you take the price of sugar to-day under the tariff as it existed before the reduction was made on the 24th of last month, I repeat the statement that if you apply the tariff of the late Administration to the sugars which would be imported to-day under the tariff which was in existence before the 24th of last month, the people would have paid more for their sugar than they did under the present tariff. Now, let me come back to this statement of Mr. Vest. I find that he gave two statements, one regulating prices for Canada and the United States, and the other the price of the articles which were sold to South America. They are very strange. I find that a plough when exported to a foreign country sold for $9, but when sold for home consumption the price was $18. In another kind of plough the difference was between $4 and $8. If we take mowers, there is a difference as between $40 and $65. I admit there is great disparity in these prices. But if you take the first article, a plough at $9 and add 35 per cent., which is $3.15, you will then have the plough laid down plus the freight, at $12.15, being $5.85 less than the price at which it is sold in the whole market. But apply the law as it exists on the Statute-book and impose the duty upon the $18, then you would have the article at a less price than that at which the American farmer could buy the same article. If you carry the principle through the whole of the list, except in one or two items, you will find the result precisely the same. For instance, take a feed cutter No. 3 at $60, and add 35 per cent., or $21, the total would be $81, or $9 less than the price when sold to the home consumer. But if you impose a duty on the $90, which is the price at which it is sold in the home market, even then it will cost only $1.50 more than the home price. So you may carry the principle from the smallest article even to the highest, and it is that principle which is contained in the provisions of the Customs Act to which I have called the attention of the House. Apply the principle of continental free trade, as advocated by the leader of the Opposition, or the unrestricted reciprocity theory of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), or the still more ridiculous theory of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and every consumer in this country would have to pay, not the price at which the article was sold for export, but the price at which it is sold for home consumption in the United States, plus the freight.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. member explain what the theory of the hon. member for Norfolk is? I should like to have it defined.

Mr. BOWELL. The theory of the hon. member is rather enigmatic—chameleon-like is a better term. I have heard the hon. gentleman from this side of the House make one of the most convincing and able protective speeches ever delivered here. I have heard the hon. gentleman on that side of the House say that all he said on that previous occasion was wrong, that he had been converted since then, and he thereupon made a free trade speech. I have heard him tell the people that every cent of protection put on an article was paid by the consumer. I have read speeches delivered by him in which he told the people that every cent that the Americans placed on articles exported to Canada was paid by the consumer. Talk about his theory or his policy, it is as changeable as the weather and as variable as the hue of the chameleon. Every one knows that it is so, not only on the question of protection but on everything else. The hon. gentleman is an ardent and thorough equal righter. He carries out his principles admirably, particularly when he applies them to the question of a commercial policy. He is everything to everybody and anything to anybody. I have never known a single question discussed during the time he has had the honour to occupy a seat in this House, on which he has not made a speech on the opposing side. He is a free trader in grain, but a protectionist in wrecking. He has a reason for that. He is a protectionist in coasting, and is a free trader in logs, which he exports to the United States. What his policy is I do not know. The leader of the Opposition when he crosses the floor and becomes Premier will find that the hon. gentleman is fit for any position into which he could put him. There is no conceivable question which he is not able to discuss and defend; but unfortunately for him, and I fear it will be very unfortunate for the leader of the Opposition, when leader of the Government, he will never be able to convince the people of this country who read and think, that he is honest. He is quite prepared to defend the hon. gentleman here as his leader; here he falls down and worships him. When he gets abroad, where he thinks a different position will be more popular, he denounces that hon. gentleman because he belongs to a certain race and a certain religion. He can embrace even the "machine politicians" when he sits here, but out in the country he is so honest he condemns them all. Yet he asks me, with that coolness characteristic of the hon. gentleman in everything he does, what his policy is. Well, I do not know. I leave that to the future, when he gets into power.

Mr. LAURIER. By-and-bye.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman says "by-and-bye." The speech the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk will make after I sit down will not be the speech he would make if he sat here, or the speech he would make before another audience. He will change as rapidly as it is possible for anyone to change. I do not propose to press this discussion further. We had the question raised by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) as to what constitutes the raw material.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the question before the House?

Mr. BOWELL. That is what I have been trying to find out. I believe the question is whether binding twine should be placed on the free list or not. We have drifted off into every subject that one could conceive or think of. I leave it to the House to say whether the attacks on the administration of the Customs are warranted under the facts or not. I leave the House to judge whether binding twine has cost more to the people of the country than it would have cost if there had been no duty placed upon it. A point was tried to be made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) as to the number of feet in a pound of twine. Every one who has given any attention to the subject knows that the number of feet is exactly in proportion to the strength of the fibre out of which it is made. If it is a pure manila there will be a greater length than if it is composed of sisal and manila, and if of sisal it will be still less. A composite article, a new discovery, is being manufactured, which will be a much cheaper article, and one equally strong. Such are the claims put forward; but whether that proves to be the case or not I am not prepared to say, further than that the information I have is that such will prove to be the case. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) put the question fairly before the House. The Government are always alive to that which they believe to be in the interests of the consumer as well as the manufacturer. Whenever they found that the salt industry was controlled to such an extent as to become at all burdensome to the people they took the first opportunity to reduce the duty. And if it be true that the American combination for the manufacture of twine has or is about to secure all the cordage factories in this country and keep up the price, then it will be the duty of the Government to see how far they will go in regulating it, in order to prevent the colossal fortunes to which hon. gentlemen have referred being made by the manufacturers. But supposing that to be the case, supposing the statement to be true as made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the combination is so great and that it is shown that this combination is about to purchase all the cordage factories in this country, it will make very little difference to them whether the duty is taken off or not. If they can control the market in Canada by controlling the manufacturers, and at the same time control the market in the United States, it will make no difference to them whether the duty is twenty-five per cent. or whether it is nothing, for they will exact from the people of this country just as high a price for the binding twine as if there was no duty at all. Any one who thinks for a moment will see that this must be the effect of a combination of this kind. However, I do not fear that combination, because I am much of the opinion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), that the industry, the perseverance and the wealth of our own manufacturers is sufficient to enable them to carry on the work in this country as successfully as they have done in the past. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) has given a better illustration of the benefit of the continuance of the industry in this country than any member on this side of the House has given. He told us that this combination was of such a character that they paid one of the manufacturers in Portland, which is now a portion of St. John, a large sum of money in order to shut up his factory, and that the result of that was that some ninety people had to seek employment in foreign countries or somewhere else. Now, if the combine in the United States has shut up one factory and thrown out of employment ninety people, thirty of whom I presume were heads of families, then at the rate of five to each family it would give us a hundred and fifty persons, and the other sixty would make a total of two hundred and ten persons who were deprived of means of support in that city, simply because one small factory had been closed. Upon the same mode of calculation, if all our manufactories were closed down how many people would be thrown out of employment in Canada, who are to that extent artisans that they understand the manufacture of rope and cordage, and who would have to seek employment in the United States where the large cordage factories are. If you make the same calculation, the farmers of this country would lose at least from 1,500 to 2,000 people whom they now supply with food from their surplus products. I suppose this is what my hon. friend desires. I believe that the closing of our different factories, in this country would be to compel the artisans who had learned trades, and who had worked in factories, to go to these countries, and to the factories where the business to which they had been brought up was carried on. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), the farmer who produces so much from his land, would then have to send his products to that country in order to feed the persons who had left Canada; provided of course that the United States farmers did not produce sufficient to supply them, and from the statistics we know that the United States in every section, from one end to the other, produce more than is necessary for the consumption of its own people. Under these circumstances it is questionable how far that market would be of any benefit to those who are now raising cereals on their farms which they cannot sell at home.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sure we all listened with a very great deal of pleasure to my hon. friend the Minister of Customs in his laboured and involved defence of the policy of the Government. I scarcely know myself what the hon. gentleman has been aiming at, and I should hardly have spoken to-night if he had not succeeded in offering some remarks with regard to myself, which I should term insulting if offered outside the floor of this House. The hon. gentleman has treated us to a wonderful display of eloquence; he reminds me of a ballad which I read once, and which describes the struggles of a Mississippi steamboat on a sand bar:

> "She hove and sot and hove and sot
> And high her rudder flung,
> And every time she hove and sot
> A wusser leak she sprung."

The hon. gentleman got himself on a sand bar, and then he got into deep water, and I doubt very much if he himself comprehended what he was trying to explain to the House. He referred to the policy of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, he referred to the policy my hon. friend the lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition, and he referred to the still more ridiculous policy of myself, and when I asked him to define what that policy was I do not think he succeeded very well. However, he did succeed in making some remarks in reference to my course which I feel bound to allude to. The hon. gentleman's charge with regard to inconsistency is one that I think perhaps he had better have employed some other man to have made. I remember the time, Sir, when Orange deputations came down here to urge upon the leader of the Government of that time the propriety of appointing that hon. gentleman to a position in the Cabinet, and I remember, too, that on an occasion when one of the principles of his order were at stake, he basely deserted them and proved himself to be an unworthy ex-grand master of the order he was supposed to represent here.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is not the Minister of Customs sorry he spoke now ?

Mr. BOWELL. Both these statements are not true.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. Minister of Customs, in the course of his speech, made allusion to the fact that I deemed it proper to defend the policy of the Government with regard to "wrecking," and he could not even admit that I had acted in that matter honestly. He could not admit that I had pursued a policy in advocacy of any feature of the Government policy that I could be commended for, and he attributed to me base motives in doing so. I assure the hon. gentleman that it will be a long time before I will go out of my way to advocate or defend anything that he may advocate again. Then he refers to the question of the export duty on logs. He has travelled over a wonderful lot of territory and a great many degrees of latitude and longitude in his speech to-night. He referred to the log question, and he says that I am in favour of free logs, whether I am a protectionist or not. I think perhaps the log question is one that the hon. gentleman might just as well have left alone. He has been an ardent supporter of the export duty for many years, yet he and his colleagues last fall very wisely dropped that duty, and they dropped the duty because the American Government made it an object for them to do so. The McKinley Bill made it an object to the extent of a dollar a thousand to the pine interest of this country to drop that useless, exorbitant and unjustifiable duty, and I hope now that having dropped it they will have the wisdom to leave it where it is, because if they put on the duty again they will find the American Government adding the Canadian export duty and the American former import duty and leaving the Canadian lumbermen to pay $4 a thousand instead of $1 upon lumber.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman alluded to my past course upon the protectionist question. It is true, Sir, that I came into this House, nineteen years ago, with protectionist principles. It is true that as late as 1875, I urged upon my hon. friend the Minister of Finance of that time, the propriety of increasing the duty to provide for the deficit and to satisfy the protectionist sentiment in this country. But, Sir, I advocated no such system as has been since adopted. The degree of protection I advocated was 20 per cent, an increase of 2½ on 17½ per cent.—not an exorbitant degree of protection, in fact, simply a revenue tariff. Now a man may be consistent through his life and he may not; a man may have weak moments in his past life. Even so bright and shining a light as my friend the Minister of Finance told us the other night that he had changed his views, and that in a moment of weakness he once did what he now declines to do: that he once voted for a prohibition policy, but he would not do it now. It may possibly be that I knew less in 1876 of political economy than I knew five or six years afterwards, when I devoted myself to the study of the subject. I came into this House educated a protectionist. Just as a man receives his religion from his forefathers, I received my political economy from my instructors. But in 1876 I sat on the Depression Committee of this House, and in the revelations made before that committee, before which manufacturers and sugar refiners were examined, I saw the hollowness of the pretensions put forth by protectionists. I saw that the whole scheme was one designed to rob the people for the benefit of the combines; and I changed my opinions on the question of protection. I acknowledge freely that I once entertained opinions on this subject that I do not entertain to-day. I believe in the truth of the saying of Carlyle, that the only consistent animal is the jackass, for he never changes his opinions; and if my hon. friend the Minister of Customs has that kind of consistency, I have nothing more to say. Any man who claims to be so consistent as never to have changed his opinion is a human donkey. We must live to learn. The man who sees no reason for modifying his opinions in the course of a long life is a man who does not investigate questions or arrive at conclusions. I profess to be a man who has arrived at conclusions. I have a policy to-day, and my policy is to strike the shackles from trade, to give the overtaxed people of this country better markets for what they have to sell, and to enable them to buy more cheaply. My policy is to increase the prosperity of Canada, and all the sneers and jibes which my hon. friend makes against that policy I throw back in his face.

Mr. BOWELL. I am glad you have told us. We never heard it before.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have laboured to impress on my somewhat obtuse friend what this policy is, but he does not seem to have comprehended it. I will at some other time endeavour to make it plainer to him than ever.

I have one more remark to make. I did not rise to discuss this question, which has been fully discussed already. I may say, however, that it is absurd that five or six men should have power to tax the farmers of this Dominion for their own benefit; and I say it is a disgrace that any Government should become the tools of five or six men for the purpose of enabling them to plunder millions by the creation of a binding twine combine. With regard to the allusion of my hon. friend to something which I said some two years ago with reference to the leader of the Opposition, I have a word or two to say. I did give expression to the opinion that the Liberal party of this country would be better with an English leader than with a French leader. It was merely a matter of opinion as to the availability of a gentleman who was the leader. I expressed no opinion with regard to the character of the leader. I do express an opinion now; I have expressed that opinion before on the floor of this House; and my opinion is that the character and the qualifications of that hon. gentleman fit him in the most eminent degree to be a successful leader. I have always held that opinion of him, and I see fit—for I am not a thoroughly consistent man you know—to revise somewhat the opinion I expressed two years ago with regard to the availability of that hon. gentleman; and I express the opinion to-day that he is the most available man as the leader of the Opposition, that he is the strongest man we have for a leader, and I gladly accept him as the leader of the Opposition. So much for the inconsistency, if any exists, in the opinion I once expressed that an English-speaking leader would be more available than a French leader, as contrasted with the opinion I express to-night that we have got the right man in the right place.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to see that hon. members are anxious to arrive at a division on this question, and I will not for any length of time stand between them and that division. But I should like to say one or two words on the twine question as well as on the general question that has been raised. Now, my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) spoke with the most extraordinary enthusiasm in regard to the reduction of the duty on sugar. He thought that was the opening of the sluice, and that the flood of the free trade would afterwards pour in. Well, Sir, that has been dealt with very ably by the hon. Minister of Customs. He has referred to the time when the friends of the hon. member for Charlotte were in power, and when they put a duty on tea, and he has told us how the hon. gentleman remained mute in his seat at that time. These hon. gentlemen, and especially my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), speak as if this were a free trade question. They know very well that if parties were to cross this House they could not give free trade to this country. They know very well that they might have to deal with the tariff, but they could only modify it in a certain direction; and when they talk in this vague way about free trade they are simply talking to please the ears and deceive the judgment of the people; they are not talking sound sense or anything they could fulfil if they came in. Now, I will ask the House to bear with me while I read a few words from the speech of the hon. member from North Norfolk, which has been alluded to by the hon. Minister of Customs. He did not merely state in that speech the creed he had learned from his forefathers; he was not talking as a young neophyte emerging from the paternal home with all the innocence of youth on his brow; he was talking as a man of mature years, and he gave the reasons of the hope that was in him. In that speech he said:

"What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations or risks of foreign trade. Look at the progress of the cotton trade in that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cottons in 1824, British manufacturers crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the Republic; but the imposition of 25 per cent. duty on foreign cottons had the effect, in a few years, not only of building up manufactories, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufactories before their own industries were established. In 1860 the United States were exporters of cottons, exporting nearly 10 per cent. of the whole amount manufactured. The same way with the iron trade. All attempts to establish iron industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher, on the average, than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But when a protective duty was imposed, iron manufactories were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market."

After some other remarks, the hon. gentleman said:

"Why is it that we are so desirous of selling to the United States articles of food? It is simply because they have by protection built up manufacturing cities with a numerous population that consumes not only the vast products of their own country, but also afford a better market for our products than we in the Dominion possess."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Raw cotton especially.

Mr. DAVIN. I understand by that that the hon. member for Bothwell, as the hon. member for Norfolk has lapsed into free trade, is coming over to protection. Is that what I am to understand? As I understand this twine question, it seems to me that the Government has been taking in regard to that a course perfectly consistent with their policy as laid down on National Policy lines. As the hon. Minister of Customs says, if it should be found that any harm is being done, any given duty can be modified or taken away but what have we heard here to-night, and what is it those who are conversant with the facts have been impressed with? Why, you have a vast company of great wealth, with great designs in the United States, the National Cordage Company, established—for what purpose? To lay hold of every cordage factory in the United States. They are reaching over their claws of monopoly into Canada, and suppose the hon. Finance Minister had taken off the duty, what would he have been doing? He would have been playing into the hands of that monopoly, and instead of doing anything for the advantage of the farmers he would have been betraying the farmers into the hands of that monopoly; whereas by helping, in accordance with the very reasoning of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the farmer, that is to say, by giving a chance to our own cordage manufacturers here to fight against this monopoly, he has really been acting in the interests of the farmer. Should that Cordage Company come over here and seize our cordage factories, then will be the time for the Finance Minister to act. When it is once seen that that monopoly is stretching its upas shade, not only over the United States but over Canada, then will be the time to act in accordance with the principles those of us who uphold the National Policy have always held. We do not hold to the cast-iron theory that you should put a duty on everything, but that you should put a duty on the things we can manufacture successfully, and not only manufacture successfully, but sell cheaper in consequence of that successful manufacture. The hon. member for Middlesex spoke to-night on this subject, and I could not but be reminded of the remarks he made with regard to one of his leaders, the hon. member for South Oxford, two years ago. The hon. member for South Oxford, last year, and two years ago, and four and five years ago, just as he has this session, talked in gloomy tones, "in hues of earthquake and eclipse," whenever he spoke of the farmers of Canada. Then the hon. member for Middlesex spoke as follows:—

"Neither do I advocate this measure on the ground which, I am sorry to say, has sometimes been taken, that the farmers of this country are a poor, miserable, half-starved class, that cannot live without it. Any such statement is a libel on the farmers of the Dominion. Considering the industry of our farming population, the intelligence and the skill they bring to bear in their profession, it is impossible under any circumstances they can be any such poor miserable class as——"

As was described in other years and this year by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. member for Middlesex continues:

"I repudiate the idea altogether."

We have the sons and brothers of those farmers in the North-West. Is it to be supposed, for one minute, because you may be sure they keep an eye on prices, if they were paying more as compared with the prices in Dakota for binding twine, I should not have heard a complaint? I have never heard in my constituency one word of complaint as to the price paid for twine. We have had, within a few weeks, in Regina, a large number of farmers from Dakota, who were interviewed as to the prices of things in Dakota and Regina, and they declared that, with regard to all things the farmers use on their farms and in their business, down to the clothes they wear and the food they eat, the prices in our North-West compare advantageously with those in Dakota. A great deal has been sought to be made out of this, and it has been somewhat suddenly put before the House as though to strike a blow at the National Policy, but I think the scheme has totally failed. My hon. friend and colleague from Marquette (Mr. Watson), who takes great interest in this question, has had letters from manufacturers and dealers in binding twine, and has specimens of that twine, but he has completely failed to prove to me, and, I think, to satisfy the House, that there is any excessive price charged to the Canadian farmers. What sort of evidence did he give us? He gave us a letter from a dealer in this twine from Chicago. That man knew very well it was a Canadian member of Parliament who wrote him. In fact, my hon. friend was kind enough to show me the letter, and no doubt he would have no objection that I should repeat the postscript asking "that you should call on me when you went back." This man knew that my hon. friend was a guileless Canadian member of Parliament, who wrote to him to know what the price of binding twine was.

Mr. WATSON. Do you deny the accuracy of my statement?

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all, the figures were accurate. What I mean is this, that that man would naturally put the prices at the very lowest figures he possibly could, even lower than he would like to sell at as a rule, because his obvious object would be to try and get an entrance for his goods into Canada. I know, in my own experience and that of my constituents, that the thing has been done. They have sent for prices to Chicago, St. Paul, and prices have been quoted which, when compared with prices actually paid by the people in the States, did not at all correspond. My hon. friend takes prices given him in Toronto and compares these with prices given him by a gentleman in Chicago. I say, Sir, that you can place no reliance whatever on that comparison. The true comparison will be to take the farmers in Dakota, to take the farmers in the country districts around St. Paul and around Fargo, and to ask them what they paid for binding twine, and then to ask the farmers around Winnipeg and Regina what they paid, and I venture to say that those on the other side of the line did not get their binding twine for 10 cents as my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said he was pleased to get it. The fact is that these Dakotans who, as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Ross) has said, are coming over to the North-West by hundreds, and I hope by thousands—at all events, it is the first sprinkling of a shower which will pour from Dakota into those territories—declare themselves satisfied that not only is the land better, but that all the conditions of life are better in the North-West Territories than they are in Dakota, and if there were a difference in any one item they would have dwelt upon it. I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but as it took a wide range, and as the North-West Territories were especially referred to, I thought I would say a few words and, at all events, give my honest impression as to how this question affects the North-West.

Mr. WELSH. My hon. friend seems to think that, by keeping the duty on binding twine, we are benefiting the farmers of the Dominion, and that by taking it off our farmers would not get their binding twine any cheaper. I think that is a very erroneous principle. We were told that the removal of the duty on sugar would not enable our people to get their sugar any cheaper, but directly the Finance Minister removed that duty the people got their sugar 2 cents a pound cheaper; and I say that, if the duty is taken off binding twine the farmers will get it 20 or 25 per cent. cheaper, and no man of common sense in this House will dare to deny it. My hon. friend here (Mr. Davin), with his plausible manner of putting things, would make black white or white black, but, when you come down to a hard matter of fact, when you look at it from a business point of view, you will see that if you take the duty off the people of the Dominion will get the benefit of it. The amount of $3,000,000 was taken off sugar, and that amount ought to go into the pockets of the people who use that article, and, if you take the 25 per cent. off twine, it will be a great boon to the farmers, who will get the benefit of it, and if you take the duty off everything else, the cost of living will be so much less, and the people of Canada will benefit so much more. I am opposed to this protection or National Policy system from beginning to end. We were told that this National Policy was to be only a question of a few years. Sir Charles Tupper said, give us this National Policy for two years and we will obtain reciprocity. That was endorsed and sworn to by every hon. gentleman on that side. Well, what do we find? We have had that policy now for many years, and it is getting worse and worse. They say: We will nurse these industries, and then the duty will be taken off. It seems to me that they want a great deal of the bottle; they want a great deal of feeding. I think we should take the bottle from them and let them get their food some other way. I am surprised at my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Davin), representing as he does a farming community, and I think this is a great burden on the farmers who use binders and reapers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WELSH. My hon. friend laughs. Is he a farmer? I am told he is a lawyer. Well, he can find a way to put money into his pocket without putting a duty on twine. I think the farmers have been hoodwinked long enough, but they are getting their eyes open. I buy a good deal of binding twine, and it is a heavy tax on a farmer to have to pay $30 to $40 a year for that. I go on the principle of buying in the cheapest market. I am opposed to all the taxes which injure the farmers. The least the Government could do would be to take off this tax. According to the blue-books there is only a thousand dollars collected in the way of revenue, but how many thousand dollars have the farmers paid? That does not go into the treasury but into the pockets of the manufacturers. I support the motion of my hon. friend that this duty be taken off.

Mr. MULOCK. I was not at all surprised at the remarks which fell from the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) or at the remarks of any of the representatives from Manitoba. If this were the first occasion on which I had listened to them, I would have been surprised, but, when I remember their attitude on the monopoly question, when they stood, as they said, by their country and opposed railway competition in that part of the country, and when I again hear them to-night defending an institution which they know in their hearts they should not defend, or at least I would give them credit for sufficient intelligence to know that, I see that it is only history repeating itself, and I am not surprised. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) read a letter from Mr. Massey stating that he could supply the article from Canadian manufacturers as cheaply as it could be got from abroad. In 1888, this same Mr. Massey gave evidence under oath, and he is reported in Appendix No. 3 to the Journals of 1888, volume 22, page 354, to have said on this subject:

"We can buy the same material that is sold here, the same finished twine, from the Americans, paying a duty of $1.79½ per 100 lbs, cheaper than we can buy it in Canada. On that we pay the duty."

He could afford to import American twine, paying the freight and duty, cheaper than he could buy it in Canada.

Mr. DALY. That is three years ago.

Mr. MULOCK. That is true, but I am afraid that the same condition of affairs obtains to-day. My hon. friend shakes his head, but he stated to-night that he had been privately making representations to the Government that he believed this combine was going to enhance the price of twine, but he is going to wait until the blow falls, he is going to wait until his constituents suffer, and then, when he cannot help himself, he will give an unwilling consent to relieving the people of this burden. When the Minister of Finance threw off the tax on sugar, he said he was giving back a large amount of money to the people. What did he give back to the people? It is true that, in that case, the whole amount did not go into the pockets of the manufacturers; some went into the treasury; but it was pretty much in the same position as this manufacture which we are now discussing, and to this extent he made an approach to a free trade basis and thus lowered the prices to the consumers. I can undertand a gentleman like the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) defending this tax and I can partly understand the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I can partly understand the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), defending this tax. And why? It is true that they represent, in a sense, rural constituencies, but I am afraid they are losing some of their sympathy for the people whom they represent. I am afraid the few votes and speeches the hon. member for East Grey has made in the line of the speech he made to-night, account largely for the reduction in his majority, that has fallen from 400 to under 20. He came here a few years ago defending this National Policy up to the hilt, and he barely acquired a seat in this House at the last election, although he represented a constituency overwhelmingly strong in sympathy with the party he belongs to.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to see you come up there and run me?

Mr. MULOCK. I am satisfied to draw conclusions from the last race you ran. The hon. member for North Bruce as well represents what he thought was a safe hive at the time, a rural constituency, but why has he turned his back upon the farming community of that district? Is it because they refuse to endorse him in his restrictive policy? Is it because he has in the past resisted all propositions for the amelioration of the farming community? I fancy if the vote was analysed it would appear that he too has been losing his hold on the people of his riding, and that his reduced majority is about the same, I believe, as that of the hon. member for East Grey. He too fails to show that sympathy which he ought to have for the great farming community of the country. But, Sir, when I listen to the hon. gentlemen, one and all, I find running through all their speeches, an apology for their action, and they seek to take shelter behind the arguments of the hon. the junior member for Halifax. As I said before, I do not wonder at his attitude; I would be surprised if it were otherwise. But I think that the farming community ought not to depend upon one whose interest it is to crush them, or to oppress them, for that is what protection to him is doing to them.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, oh.

Mr. MULOCK. If the indescribable noise that the hon. member for West York has just given expression to, is the best argument he can advance, he must certainly have a very weak cause. The hon. member for Halifax stated that the manufacturers of twine in Canada could manufacture cheaper than could those of the United States. If that is so, on what principle is it that he demands an additional price for the wares he has to sell to the people of Canada? He further said that the price in the United States to-day was cheaper than in Canada, but other hon. gentlemen who wish to follow his lead and keep up the tax, refuse to accept him as a witness in regard to that point. It is true he offered to assign a reason for the lower price in the United States, but, nevertheless he stated the price there was lower. The Minister of Customs, however, has advanced a new doctrine. He says that the United States manufacturer sells to the foreigner, to the Canadian, cheaper than he does to the American, and that is the effect of a protective policy; so that the country that is protecting its own people is protecting them to the extent of supplying cheaper goods to these abroad than to these at home. Now, let us apply that rule to Canada. The people of Canada, we will suppose, protected as they are, seek to establish a foreign trade; according to the reasoning of the Minister of Customs, they must sell their goods abroad cheaper than they sell to the people of Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. Does that follow?

Mr. MULOCK. It must follow, and it does follow. The hon. gentleman from Halifax tells us that his company proposes to embark in the foreign trade. I read in the Citizen to-day a telegram from Halifax stating that this cordage company proposes to take advantage of the cheap labour of Canada to supply the foreign market. Protection, then, according to the hon. gentleman's doctrine, comes to this: If the protected country developes a foreign trade, it must be at the expense of its own people. The protected country supplies the manufactured article to outsiders, at a less price than to the people at home; therefore cheap goods are supplied abroad at the expense of the people at home. Now, I would like to have had the hon. member for Halifax give us some further information in regard to these combines, and, before this debate is closed, I shall call upon him to tell exactly the position of the matter. He told us a great deal about the comparative prices here and there, but he failed to tell us anything about the organization of this Canadian combine. I am told that there has been a combine; I am told that the National Cordage Company, indirectly, under another name, has acquired control of a great many of the twine manufactories of Canada. I would ask the hon. gentleman, does he know if that is correct or not?

Mr. STAIRS. If the hon. gentleman asks me for information, I will tell him that that is a question which I am not going to answer. It is a question concerning my own business, and I am not bound to give him an answer. I will only tell him this, that half the reports and half the statements that he has made here to-night are incorrect.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman specify?

Mr. STAIRS. I have already replied to them.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that the hon. gentleman is the president of the Canadian Consumers Cordage Company of Canada. Is that a correct statement?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am perfectly in order in what I am saying, and in what I am about to say. I want to show that when arguments are advanced to the people of Canada in order to induce them to approve or disapprove of a certain course or policy, it is due to the people of Canada that we show what interest the person has who uses those arguments. If the hon. gentleman, for example, or any hon. gentleman, is deeply interested in this trade, it is but right that we should know that he is so interested. It is not a dishonour for him to have an interest, I am not finding fault with him for having an interest, but it is material to know what his interest is, in order that we may know what value to place upon his arguments. If, for example, to put a suppositious case, the hon. gentleman is now president of that cordage company that is extending its ramifications throughout the whole of Canada, endeavouring to capture every factory where binding twine is made—and understand that that has been accomplished, or is about to be accomplished—if he is the president of that company, I would like to know whether the farmers' representatives in this House are content to follow his lead, when he asks the House to maintain his privilege. If that is not his policy, let him rise in his place as a man and say so. It is due to us before we have this vote that he should tell us exactly the truth on this question. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) says that we ought to wait for a year, to give this company one year longer to plunder the people of Canada—perhaps two years. I say it will not do to leave our constituents at the mercy of a voracious institution for two seasons longer, no, nor for one season. The member for Selkirk says it is too late to grant relief this year. I deny that. The farmers have not yet bought their supplies. I gave this notice on the first day of May, and I waited patiently, week after week, hoping that the Minister of Finance would see and act upon it. I let it remain quietly, trusting that he, in his own judgment, having taken the advice of his friends, would do as he did regarding in the sugar question—come down like a man and deal with it. But we have now arrived at a late period in the season, when the farmers are just about putting their binders into the fields, and it would be postponing it too late to give them relief if I did not, on this occasion, press my motion. Up to this present moment, I believe, the farmers have not bought their supplies, and if we pass this resolution to-night, to-morrow morning, as certainly as the sun rises, so certainly will the price of twine fall by the amount of duty that is taken off. The hon. gentleman seems to think that there are no manufacturers in the world but in the United States. Where is their regard for Great Britain? How is it that they cannot remember that it is the greatest manufacturing country in the world, that binding twine is made in Great Britain, and on the continent; that binders are to be found all over the world wherever grain grows. Let us take down this tariff and we will give relief to the mother country, and we will have the satisfaction then of supplying ourselves with British-made twine instead of doing what we are doing to-day, transplanting an American institution from the United States to Canada. I protest against such a monoply being established in Canada for the aggrandizement of its proprietors, even, although it has for its mouthpiece a member in this House a supporter of the Government. I have now done my duty in calling the attention of the House to this proposition, and I hope the House will approve of the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Before this debate closes, I desire to say a few words, and they will be very few, on the subject which has been so long discussed. I, for my own part, would have been one of the first to welcome a fair, a candid and exhaustive debate upon the question under discussion with a view to the instruction and information which would be evolved therefrom. But I cannot say that any desire like that on my part has been very much gratified by the tone and tendency of the larger part of the discussion on this subject to-night, for it seems not to have been entered into with a view of getting at the rights of the case, at the facts in the case, so much as to use it as a party engine in a partizan way against the Government and against the supporters of the Government. There would have been a great deal of advantage to be gained if it had been carried on in a fair spirit. But I suppose it is almost too much to ask that that be done by hon. gentlemen opposite, considering their long toil, their long struggle and the fruitless outcome of that struggle against the principles which were dear to the people and have been sustained by the people on three or four different occasions.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But in a moment of weakness.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps in a moment of weakness, and perhaps in other moments. I want, in the first place, simply to point out the unfair methods of argument which have been used, to point to a few of the statements which have been made, and made just lately, by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I want to ask the fair and candid sense of this House what difference in the world it makes whether a man is rich or poor, whether he is a dissenter or a churchman, whether he is a Protestant or a Catholic, whether he is a manufacturer or a farmer, when he rises in his place in this House and places an argument before it. Is not the argument to be weighed, and not the man's circumstances or surroundings? I say the hon. gentleman never did a more unfair thing, and never, to my mind, did a more despicable thing in a political point of view than when he attempted to influence——

Mr. MULOCK. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right, in my opinion, to say I did a despicable thing.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state it again.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the expression in the sense in which it was used was unparliamentary, but I think it should be withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER. I will withdraw it with very great pleasure, and will substitute another. I never heard the hon. gentleman use a more unworthy argument than he has just used, when he attempted, not to prejudice the minds of hon. gentlemen here, because that cannot be done, but when he attempted to prejudice the minds of the people by using the insinuation that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax was interested, largely interested, and stood up in his place in this House on account of the interest he had in it. Why did he not attack the facts and arguments of the junior member for Halifax? Why did he not show that what he said was untrue, badly based, that his arguments were not fair or his conclusions were not well drawn? The hon. gentleman did not attempt to do that, but he used another kind and a more unworthy kind of argument to catch the minds of the people by appealing to their prejudices, and saying: There is the monopolist; of course he wants your taxes. Do not look at the arguments, do not weigh the truth, do not take even balance and weigh fairly the arguments that are made. Oh, no, do not appeal to what is fair and reasonable, but appeal to the ad captandum argument, appeal to the prejudices, appeal to the most unworthy part of the audience to which you can appeal. I leave it to this House to say if the junior member for Halifax made any pressing argument in favour of the present duty. I leave it to this House to say if his statement is not as fair and unbiassed as any one could give. He made nothing but a business-like statement of facts, and he did not go to the length of pressing his arguments in favour of the continuance of the present system. I say it would have been infinitely fairer and better for the hon. gentleman opposite to have met his arguments, which he did not in one single case attempt to do, than to attempt, as he did attempt, to prejudice the people against my hon. friend and against us in this matter which we are discussing. After having shown that, I wish to present another of the arguments. The cloven hoof came out at the very first, it showed as plainly at the last. Is this an attempt to deal with the subject of binding twine alone? No; it is simply using that as a sort of means of getting at something else, and it came out in the last part of the argument of the hon. gentleman, as it came out in the first part. It is an attempt to tear down the fiscal policy, the National Policy, which this country has reaffirmed time and again. This is the attack; but hon. gentlemen opposite have learnt wisdom from circumstances and from adverse circumstances too. They have dashed themselves with their strength, but puny strength it has proved to be, against the people's wishes and against the progressive spirit of the Canada of to-day, and they have dashed themselves against it in vain. Having been thrown back in 1882, having been thrown back in 1887, and having been thrown back but a few months ago, they have learnt wisdom, and they come up to the attack now by these by-ways and alleys with a pretension of immense sympathy for the poor farmer. They attack the great subject of binding twine, and if they can only make a breach in the wall in this respect, they will do it. Why? Because they want to undermine the whole foundation, and to pull down the walls that this country has built after so many years of persevering toil.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite may interrupt me, but they are walls of protection for the best interests of the people in a material, in a social, and in a trade point of view as well. So that this is an attack on the whole system, an attack veiled under a specious expression of sympathy for a suffering class in one particular, and one particular alone. The hon. gentleman used another specious, but not a good argument, and it was not a very true one, I think, as based upon fact. He stated that the junior member for Halifax declared that they manufactured this twine cheaper in Canada than in the United States, that they were able to do it. I did not so understand my hon. friend. I understood him to say that Canadian manufacturers could manufacture this article as cheap, or nearly as cheap, as the people of the United States could manufacture it. That was the statement made, and it had its weight and its direction, but the hon. gentleman misquoted the statement. He misunderstood it, I dare say. However, he used the statement in a very different sense from that in which it was used by my hon. friend. He endeavoured to create the opinion abroad—he could not create it in this House, because this House has gone through the whole discussion, and this is a sensible business House—but he endeavoured to create the impression in the country that raw sugars and binding twine stood upon the very same level, and he endeavoured to point the argument and to catch the people with it: that because the Minister of Finance recommended that the duty on raw sugars should be taken off, the Minister was inconsistent if he did not take the duty off—not from the raw material out of which binding twine is made, but from the manufactured product itself. Sir, therein lies the very essence of the difference between gentlemen on this side of the House and gentlemen on that side of the House. Therein lies the very essence of the difference between the two policies. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they carry out to their logical result their preachings upon this and upon other points in their programme, and their statements upon the tariff and the fiscal policy as a whole, would undermine the entire system and policy of protection as we have used it, and been benefited by it in this country. Sir, it is consistent for us to take the duties off raw materials, and to-day more than one-third of the total imports of this country are free materials, most of them are raw materials which are used for the purposes of manufacturing, and for the benefit of this country in that way. We believe we might just as well manufacture these articles in our own country, and pay our own labour for making them, and build up our own homes and villages, and towns and country places as well, by the making of these things in our own country, as to be always hewing wood and drawing water and sending the money that we make in some way or other off to a foreign country, to pay for the making and the labour and the product of these commodities in these foreign countries. That is just the difference between our policy and the policy of the gentlemen opposite, and when we took the duty off raw sugar we put into the hands of the people just that amount of money which they paid out last year, and would have to pay this year, and we give it to them entirely. But at the same time we retained the refining industry, one of the many branches of the industry which has grown up under this National Policy. I have the admission of an over-candid friend on the other side of the House that we were successful in giving three and a half million dollars to the consumers, without at all hurting the sugar refiners of Canada. That is a very good kind of a policy. If we can keep up the industries of this country and secure employment for our people, together with all that this employment means to this country, and at the same time manumit taxes to the people, that is a very good kind of policy, and that is a policy which the people of Canada will be very glad to endorse. Well, Sir, I think in this debate so far there have been proven two things: First, that binding twine has in the years that are past, and up to the present time, been sold cheaper in the Dominion of Canada to Canadian farmers, than it has been sold in the United States to United States farmers. That has been the rule, and that has been the rule up to within this very year. It has not been proven that this very year, even with all the disturbing and abnormal conditions which exist in the United States, that the price of binding twines of equal grades and qualities, is very much dearer—if dearer at all—to the Canadian farmer than it is to the United States farmer. It has not been proven in this debate, that even taking into consideration the abnormal conditions of the year, binding twine is any dearer here than it is in the United States. The kind of argument used by gentlemen opposite in the country, before the people, is well illustrated by the arguments of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), who, in trying to show the immense disadvantage we had in comparison with the United States, made the astounding assertion here that the raw material for making twine was taxed $15 per ton in the United States, while our manufacturers had it free. How much duty have statements of that kind done in the political contests of this country? Was not that grand voice of my hon. friend, that grand Scotch voice that he has lifted up through the valleys and hills in the constituency which he represents, telling the people what an iniquity it was that while the manufacturers of the United States had to pay $15 per ton duty on the raw material, our bloated monopolists did not pay a single cent, and that, nevertheless, even under these conditions, the Government must keep up this duty upon binding twine? That is the kind of statements they make before the people of the country; these are the kind of ad captandum arguments they attempt to use before the people. Ours is not that kind of policy. We are in favour of the National Policy and of relieving the burdens of the people as we can. You, gentlemen, are against the National Policy, you would take it away, you would introduce free trade, you would bring in unrestricted reciprocity, and where would you raise your taxes then? Why, Sir, my hon. friend who sits there with his wealth of wisdom which he gives us from time to time upon these matters—he would take the duty off binding twine, and he would take the duty off everything else; but how would he run the Government? How would we keep the service of the country going? Does not my hon. friend know that when he uses an argument like that he does not go far enough, and if he is honest with himself and the people he must say: if we take the taxes off these things we must put them on you, or upon something else, because we must have money to carry on the service of the country. My hon. friend knows he must in honesty say that. My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) said that the people had got a taste of free sugar, and that they were so hankering after that taste that they would not be satisfied until they had free everything. I ask the hon. gentleman if the people had free everything what then would happen? We have got to raise $38,000,000 to spend in this country and who is to pay that? You have got to have it from the people some way or other. Our policy is this: that whilst we raise that sum of money, and whilst we spend that sum of money in the services which are essential to the country, essential to its progress and advancement, we dispose of it in such a way that it induces the employment of labour, builds up our industries, keeps our own people at home, and helps us in the race of progress with other nations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and our policy would have kept very many more of our own people at home if it had not been that gentlemen opposite, misguided in their opposition to this policy, have been preaching the doctrine of blue ruin to the people; have been preaching the doctrine of blue ruin to the Canadian people I say, and have been painting the skies as always bright on the other side of the line. If gentlemen opposite had not conducted themselves upon that plane and pursued that policy, we would have had very much fewer people leaving our shores to-day, and we would not have the spectacle which we have seen within the last two or three months of Canadians lured to Dakota by the reasoning of these same speakers, sorry the very hour they got there that they ever had gone, and glad to get back to Canada now, after the sacrifice of every dollar they had perhaps made in the meantime; glad to get back to Canadian skies and to Canadian soil, and, if you like, to Canadian binding twine as well. Now, Sir, there have been three threads running through the discourses of hon. gentlemen opposite to-night, and one of them has been the execration of monopoly. Oh, how these hon. gentlemen hate monopoly, and how they hate monopolists! And yet for the last twelve months this country has been ringing, from every hustings, with arguments of every kind from these same gentlemen, asking the people to do what? To tear down all tariff walls between us and the United States of America, and to go in for unrestricted reciprocity which cannot be obtained on any other basis than a uniform tariff and that tariff the tariff of the United States. They hate monopolies, even that of binding twine; and yet they will welcome a fiscal system which will put them under a monopoly twice or three times as great, so far as the uniform rate of taxation goes, as that which we have to-day. And, Sir, I challenge them, without evasion, in a manly, straightforward way, if they deny that they must have a uniform tariff, to show me two things: first, show me a respectable authority on the United States side of the line which supports you in your assertion that you can get unrestricted reciprocity and yet keep the full control of your own tariff, to make and amend it as you please; and in the next place I ask you to show, without any evasion, in a straightforward, honest way, how you can work such a thing as that between these two countries, with fairness to each country. These two things have got to be stated and proved, or else you will have to lie under the aspersion that while you execrate a monopoly at home, as you call it, you are willing to embrace a monopoly three times as great for the purpose of carrying out a certain pet form of fiscal policy which you have espoused, and which you expect the country to espouse as well. The other thread which has been running through this discussion is a general condolence with the farmers—you love them so well now. When you had a Government, and had five years of rule, what did you do for the Canadian farmer? Your fiscal policy was such that both our exports and our imports fell by millions. You never thought of taking a bit of taxation from the people; but your Finance Minister came down with a million, and a million, and a million of taxation to be placed on the farmers of this country. And yet, to-day, when we have built railways on which the farmers' goods are carried at a third of the cost that they were formerly; we have built a canal system and opened it up to free communication, when we have opened up the great North-West by the expenditure of a great deal of money on a great railway—while we have done all that, and have given the farmers not only the means of developing this country, but the means of carrying their products by the cheapest possible routes to the markets of the world, what have you to show for your five years of power? You did nothing but load on your millions of taxes; whereas this Government has done all that I have said, and at the end of the period comes down and takes $3,500,000 of taxation from the shoulders of the people. Mr. Speaker, when hon. gentlemen opposite can show some deeds and fewer professions, they will gain more in the hearts of the people, and they will see light in the future that have not gladdened their eyes for many past years. With reference to this particular duty which is under discussion, the Government's eyes are not closed. The very action they have taken with regard to salt shows that. We have a salt industry and salt wells in this country, which a protective policy has brought to a certain state of perfection; but when at a certain period it was shown to the Government that that protection had evolved a monopoly, and that the farmer was not being helped by it, the Government came to the rescue, and to-day the farmer gets his salt at one-third less than he did before. And what the Government did in that respect, it proposes to do, not on mere doctrinaire principles, not out of the books; but it proposes in view of the circumstances of the time, to make this policy meet the needs of the time, whether by laying on taxation or by taking off taxation; and if it be proved that a monopoly takes hold of this business as it has taken hold of the salt business, and that the farmer is injuriously affected by it, it will be for this practical Government to do for the farmer in that case what it has done in other cases. My hon. friend put his motion on the paper on the 1st of May. If he had been honest in his endeavours to help the farmer?——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I take that word back; if he had been earnest to help the farmers from the very first, that was his time, not an hour was to be lost. The day was approaching when the farmer would be making his bargains for his twine for the season; the day was perilously near. Why did the hon. gentleman wait and wait until to-day, on the 6th or 7th of July, before moving his motion, when, even if it should succeed, he could not get it embodied in a law and get the Governor General to assent to it in time? Why does he wait until the men have drowned, according to his own theory?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why did you ask him?

Mr. FOSTER. I leave it to this House if the first man to ask that it be allowed to stand, was not my hon. friend there?

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I never asked it to stand, from the day it was on the paper to this moment. I will tell the hon. gentleman if he will allow me, what I did say: When I put the motion on the paper, and the hon. gentleman asked me day after day to let it stand, I said at last: "It is very inconvenient to me to be watching this every day; if you want it to stand, you had better have it stand for a reasonable period instead of obliging me to watch it;" and the hon. gentleman said: "let it stand for two weeks;" and he added: "and when that is up, it will have to stand a great deal longer after that."

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps my impression may be wrong in that respect. Nevertheless, my hon. friend, with his sturdy frame, his independence, and his great persistence, is not of such weak temperament to give way when the farmers' interests stand in the balance even at the wish of the Government. Does my hon. friend sit here in the farmers' interests, in the interest of a bleeding country, to get measures passed, by putting a motion on the Order paper, and then meekly letting it stand because a member of the Government asks to have it stand? My hon. friend knows that he could have brought on his motion at any moment he wished; he had power to do so; and if he was not willing to let it stand——

Mr. MULOCK. Why did you ask to have it stand? I thought I could have trusted the hon. gentleman when he asked to let it stand. I thought the hon. gentleman had an honest motive—that he intended to deal with the question. Will he now inform the House why he asked to let it stand for these two months?

Mr. FOSTER. I simply asked that it should stand because I thought the hon. gentleman wished it to stand; and the hon. gentleman never once, from the 1st of May till to-day, pressed that motion. If he had pressed it, it would have gone on, and no person knows it better than my hon. friend himself. But to-day, on the 6th of July, when it is too late to help the farmers, even if his resolution passed, he presses his resolution. I say, then, that the Government in this, as in other things, is keenly alive to the best interests of the farmers, as well as every other class in this country. The Government, however, is not of that frame of mind that is continually setting class against class. It believes that the farmers have interests; it believes that the industries of this country, other than the farming, have interests as well. It believes that the farmer should have fair-play; it believes that the man who builds a factory should have fair-play as well; and it is a tenet of this party that all the interests of this country are better not fighting one against the other, but that they should be joined in one harmonious whole, the advantage of one being in every case the advantage of the other, and the advancement of one the advancement of the other; and while this Government has done for the farmer many things which were never attempted by hon. gentlemen opposite, while it has done for the country things which have never been attempted by hon. gentlemen opposite, it will in the future, as in the past, carry out the very same policy and if, as I said before, in this or any other case, it becomes clear to the mind of the Government that any interest has not been fairly treated in this country, the remedy will, so far as it lies in the power of the Government, be applied, and the people's interest, as a whole, will be safeguarded.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must confess that I have been not a little surprised at some portions of the speech the hon. gentleman addressed to this House. I have been here a quarter of a century, and I must say a speech as disingenuous as that which the hon. gentleman has, on this occasion, addressed the Parliament, I have not before heard. The hon. gentleman has asked my hon. friend to allow his motion to stand. He has asked him, again and again, since the session began. It could not have remained on the motion paper if this had been done. Twice at least while I was present in the House, this session, the First Minister of the recent Administration asked my hon. friend to let this motion stand, and now the hon. gentleman, after my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has allowed this motion to stand for nearly two months at the request of the Administration——

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell),—taunts my hon. friend with a want of sincerity and earnestness because he did not press his motion at an earlier period. I venture to say that so extraordinary an argument has never been heard on the floor of this House.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I rise to a point of order. On the 13th May Mr. Mulock——

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) The hon. gentleman may make a speech at a latter period in the evening, but I have no intention to allow him to interject his speech into the observations I propose to address to the House.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is a question of fact.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman ought to know that a question of fact is not a question of order. The hon. gentleman can raise his question of fact at a later period of the evening. The hon. Minister of Finance has charged my hon. friend with want of earnestness in pressing his motion. The hon. gentleman seems to have judged of my hon. friend for North York by himself. He supposes that my hon. friend, in a moment of weakness, put this motion upon the paper, which he had no intention of pressing upon the attention of Parliament. Now the hon. gentleman has told us that we have been overwhelmingly defeated in the country, and that we are seeking to do, in an indirect way, what we have not been able to accomplish with the sanction and support of the people. I think the hon. gentleman is about the last member of this House who should have addressed an argument of that sort. I do not think he has had such overwhelming support, such an exhibition of overwhelming confidence on the part of those he has for some years represented in Parliament, that he should taunt hon. gentlemen on this side with a want of public confidence. Why, if I understand the position of matters fairly, the hon. gentleman ran away from his constituency immediately after the election was over, lest he might be counted out.

Mr. FOSTER. All wrong information.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman exhibited on that occasion something like weakness. It was one of those moments of weakness which overtook the hon. gentleman, and made it impossible he should remain in his constituency and ascertain who was actually elected at the late election.

Mr. FOSTER. I knew before I left.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the hon. gentleman may have known whom the returning officer would send to this House. I have known that myself on more than one occasion, but whom the people actually returned to Parliament may have been a wholly different question. And so I think that the hon. gentleman made a mistake when he introduced into the discussion this evening the statement that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House do not enjoy in any degree the public confidence. Now, the hon. gentleman also said that we on this side had been preaching blue ruin. What did the friends of the hon. gentleman, the leaders of the hon. gentleman, do when they sat on this side and we sat on that? Did they represent the country in a most prosperous condition? Did they say that the people were remaining at home, and that the state of public affairs was entirely satisfactory? Did they denounce those who made statements complaining of the financial and commercial and material condition of the country, and the material prosperity of the population, and did they hold that everything was entirely satisfactory? Why, Sir, if I chose to detain the House, for a time, I could point to the speeches made by the late leader of the Administration, by the Minister of Customs, by the hon. member for Frontenac, all of whom depicted a far more dark and gloomy aspect, all of whom represented the country as in a much worse condition than my hon. friend for South Oxford has ever declared it to be in. And they did so without warrant. On that occasion we were told that thousands of people were leaving the country, and they said: Give us an opportunity of getting possession of the Treasury benches, and we will put an end to this emigration. We will make the country so prosperous that every one will be anxious to remain at home and those who have gone abroad will return. That was the representation made. At that time, there were about 22,000 people a year leaving the country. During Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, as shown by the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, 122,000 people in all left Canada for the American Republic. Hon. gentlemen opposite came in and were given the opportunity they desired of trying the experiment, and what was the result? During their first year of office, 40,000 people left the country; during their second year, 68,000 left; in the third year, 80,000 left, and in the next year, 125,000. More people in 1882 left this country and went to the United States than the whole five years of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration. These gentlemen had the opportunity of trying their experiment and the people of this country left in fourfold greater numbers than they ever did before. Have they abandoned their experiment? Have they ceased to administer the medicine which, they said, would prove a panacea for the ills we complained of? Not at all; and the country is fourfold worse off than it was during the period they represented as a disastrous period. The hon. gentleman said that we did nothing to relieve the agricultural population when we were in office. Well, we gave the agricultural population protection for life and property; we left them to be the architects of their own fortune; we left them free to engage in whatever business they thought would be most profitable; we did not make one man subordinate to the prosperity of another; we did not plunder one portion of the population for the sake of promoting the prosperity of another and a smaller section. Hon. gentlemen opposite boasted that they would decrease the expenditure. Why, Sir, they added $100,000,000 to the public debt and $15,000,000 to the annual expenditure of the country. What is the condition of the North-West Territories? Have these hon. gentlemen obtained the revenue from the lands there which they promised? Have they secured the population they predicted would flow in there? The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) has told us this evening that the people are returning in thousands from the United States. I have heard the hon. gentleman repeat in this House, every year since 1883, the same story. He has told us of the thousands and tens of thousands——

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). I never did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said it to-night, and he has said it before.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). I never did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I can show that he said it. He has said it in reply to myself, and he has said it again and again, and he has read statements to show again and again that all those who have gone from Manitoba to Minnesota and Dakota were coming back again.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). Never.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will verify what I state and I will not take back a statement which I know to be perfectly true as to what the hon. gentleman said. The hon. Minister of the Interior put so much confidence in these statements, that he caused a census to be taken in the North-West Territories. The Minister of Agriculture produced evidence before the Immigration Committee of this House for the purpose of showing that 153,000 people had gone into the North-West Territories and Manitoba between 1883 and 1885, and, when the census was taken, I think it was found that there were about 123,000 short of those numbers. If the people were returning by the thousand every year, why did not the census exhibit that fact? I I have no doubt that, if the census were taken again, the same result would occur, and the same mistakes would be shown as were shown on previous occasions on the part of hon. gentlemen. Hon. gentlemen come here and indulge in confident predictions and tell us what is transpiring. Mr. Speaker, we know what is transpiring there. We know the condition of things in the North-West Territories, and we know that, as long as a great railway corporation, built largely out of the funds of this country, carry wheat from St. Paul to the seaboard at a cheaper rate than they carry it from Winnipeg to the seaboard, the people will naturally go to the south of the line rather than to the north, and therefore hon. gentlemen should interfere if they can where their interference will be effective. The hon. the Minister of Finance seems to have taken fright in reference to the prohibition question. He thought he was going to lose a large amount of revenue from the adoption of a prohibitory law, and he has that phantom before him whenever any question affecting the tariff is brought before the House. Whenever the tariff is discussed in any form he asks: "Where are you going to get the revenue?" What is the revenue from binding twine? It is $1,200. So the hon. gentleman is afraid that the loss of this $1,200 will create a deficit that will affect the public credit. I think, from the argument which the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House, and after the extraordinary argument of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), that it is evident that in this matter the hon. gentleman was not looking to revenue. I thought this tax was put at a high figure to prevent revenue being obtained. The argument was that this tax should not go into the treasury, but into the hands of special favourites of the Administration, into the hands of those who enjoy a monopoly to the extent at least of 25 per cent. What was the object of the hon. gentleman in imposing this tax? His object is to keep up the taxation, to keep out the American article, and if he keeps out the American article he does not get the tax. I could understand the argument of the hon. gentleman if he were taking an excise tax from the home producer equal or nearly equal to the tax which he is demanding from the foreign importer. It is only in England that they do that sort of thing, but the hon. gentleman will not follow the example of England. He prefers to follow the example of another country. He tells us of the monopolies which exist on the American side of the border. How are those monopolies produced? They are produced by the very system which the hon. gentleman is seeking to establish in this country. They are produced by that system of which the hon. gentleman is always a consistent or inconsistent supporter in this country, and he is here to-night to defend this monopoly, which can only exist, as it does exist, by the interference of the Government, and to the detriment of the agricultural population of this country. The hon. gentleman says that we represent the farmers as a very poor class. Well, Sir, are they not a very prosperous class at the present time, and they have been less prosperous year after year for the last ten years. The hon. gentleman tells us what the present Government have done for the agricultural population of this country. I can tell him what they have done. They have reduced the value of farm lands throughout the country by about 30 per cent.; they have made every agriculturist poorer to that extent by the legislation which they have adopted and by the fiscal policy which they have pursued. The hon. gentleman talks about building up the towns and villages of this country. Where are the villages and towns that he has built up? Why, Sir, the villages and towns have been killed by the policy of this Government. The few manufacturing institutions that existed in the towns have been killed by that policy, or they have had to unite and to remove to some great centre which the hon. gentleman has fostered and helped, but the villages and towns have been well nigh extinguished by the policy which the hon. gentleman has pursued. The hon. gentleman has been wrathful this evening because my hon. friend said that the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) was too much interested in this question to be trusted, as far as his argument was concerned. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that was a most outrageous argument to address to this House, that it was an appeal to the prejudices—of course, not of this House, because we are said to be too intelligent to be affected by any such appeals—but that it was an appeal to the agricultural population without. Well, it is a rule in court that a man ought not to be a judge in his own case; it is a rule that, where duty and interest come in conflict you cannot act; it is a rule in this House that a man is not supposed to vote in a question in which he is interested; and, under the circumstances, is it extraordinary that my hon. friend should state the proposition he did? We have not yet reached such a stage of sublime and ideal perfectibility that we are uninfluenced by our own interests. I suppose that most men are to a greater or lesser degree influenced by their occupation in their actions, and if the hon. gentleman refuses to recognize that fact I do not think he could very long continue to act as Finance Minister. Now, the hon. gentleman has told us, as other hon. gentlemen have done, that it is with perfect propriety that the Government keep the tax on the binding twine—that the farmers are better off in consequence of this tax that the Government have placed on binding twine. They are all going to make it cheaper by a 25 per cent. tax than if they had free trade. The hon. gentleman tells us that the way that our institutions are built up, and that industry is diversified in this country, is by the interference of the Government, by the burdens which Parliament has imposed upon the population of this country. Well, Mr. Speaker, what an unfortunate condition the people of this country would be in if some one were generously to pay the public debt. If the Government of the United Kingdom were to interfere on behalf of the people of this country, and to resume the public debt and relieve us from taxation, we would become bankrupt, we would have no excuse for taxation, and our industries would be ruined. That is the logical outcome of the argument which the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House. Now, I wish to say a word or two with reference to some statements of the Minister of Customs. The Minister of Customs says: Why, we are all in the same boat; why, you sat on this side of the House many years ago, and when you were sitting here you were in favour of high taxes, just as we are in favour of high taxes now; and he maintained that we were not then in favour of relieving the people of taxation any more than they are in favour of relieving them from taxation now. Well, the hon. gentleman overlooked the difference at that time, I think a genuine difference. We never maintained that the hon. gentleman's views were just the same as our own, that his opinions of the proper fiscal policy of our country were just the same as ours. The hon. gentleman said: Oh! you put a duty on tea and on coffee! Well, we did tax them, and what was the reason? Because they were proper objects for taxation. Then we put a tax on tea. It did not affect the price of any other article, and all the tax the people paid went into the public treasury. Can he say the same thing in regard to the tax on binding twine? Does he see no difference? Why, last year $1,200 went into the public treasury from that article, and I dare say there were a hundred thousand dollars of taxes that went into the pockets of the manufacturers. Is that all the same thing? The rule of taxation laid down by Adam Smith a hundred years ago was, that you should tax the community in such a way that all the taxes you impose should go into the public treasury. That was the policy we adopted; we think that was a sound policy. What we complain of in the policy of the hon. gentlemen is, that they impose millions of taxes upon the people of this country that never find their way into the public treasury at all. The hon. gentleman said, speaking about the tax on sugar, that we imposed a higher tax on that article than the Government does to-day. Yes, Sir, we did; but all the tax went into the public treasury. The hon. gentleman says sugar is cheaper now than it was in our time. That is true, but it is not because of the difference in taxation; it is because sugar is cheaper in the markets of the world by 50 per cent. than it was 13 years ago. Centrifugal sugars, in 1878, were selling for nearly five cents a pound in the Island of Cuba, and in 1886 they were selling for less than two and a-half cents a pound in the same island, caused by the great sugar industries of Europe; and there was no possibility, if the hon. gentleman wished to relieve the people of this country of taxation, of keeping up the price to any such figure as the price of sugar is at this moment. The hon. gentleman says that he has relieved the people of this country of a tax on sugar. Well, Sir, the more appropriate time to discuss that will be when the motion of my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) comes again before the House. But I will just say this in passing: The hon. gentleman has retained a tax of $1,800,000 on the sugar that will be consumed in this country, and not one dollar of that goes into the public treasury. And in whose interest was it done? In the interest of two or three manufacturers, who employ 400 men; and if you were to wipe out the whole of the sugar tax and pension those men on the public treasury of this country at $400 each, the people of this country would save a million and a quarter—more, a million and a-half, by pensioning every labourer in Canada engaged in the sugar industry, rather than retain the tax which the hon. gentleman has kept on. Yet the hon. gentleman comes to the House and talks about the relief that he has given to the people of this country. He has created and attempted to maintain an enormous monopoly in this country, a monopoly that can never be in the interest of the population, because it has taken a large sum of money from hundreds of thousands of people who can ill afford to pay it, and given it to those who do not need it at all. Then the hon. gentleman tells us that in the United States a kind of plough that they send abroad for $9 is sold at $18. How comes that about? Why, by that very system of protection which the hon. gentleman is seeking to fasten upon the people of this country. Such a condition of things could not exist otherwise, and the Minister of Customs knows well that there are many articles protected in this country that are sold in the first instance at two or three times the cost of production. I remember very well when I was a member of the late Administration we had to seize a large number of sewing machines that were being imported, called the Singer sewing machines, because they were imported at what we thought less than their value, and when experts were brought on from New York they proved that those machines that were entered here at $17 each cost actually to produce them about $9. They had been entered at nearly double their value, and their retail price to the people of this country was something like $48. Now, I would like to know who it was that needed protection—the poor woman, who was earning her living by the use of that sewing machine, for which she paid $48, or the manufacturer of a like machine in Canada, who was producing it here at the time under a protection of $7.50. The hon. gentleman knows well the enormous profits on most of these protected manufactured articles which the people of this country have to purchase. I say there is no justification for the maintenance of these protective duties, and that the fiscal policy which the Government has adopted in this country is one that is disastrous to the industrial interests of this country. During the last thirteen years it has sent 1,200,000 people across the borders to the United States; it has increased the population of that country and diminished the population of this. It has lessened the value of the farm lands of this country, it has diminished the income of the farmers, it has done irreparable mischief to a large section of our population, because it has induced them to look to the Government and to the protective policy of the Administration for their profits, rather than to the careful management of their business, and to the careful and improved appliances with which that business is now carried on. Now, I am not going into a discussion of the general policy of the Administration. I have undertaken to answer a few of the observations made by the Minister of Customs and by the Minister of Finance that have been addressed to this House. I say that the statements made by the hon. gentlemen on this side, and by the mover of the resolution, show that the article of binding twine is sold to the farmers of this country at a higher price than it ought to bear, and that it is a burden—an unnecessary tax upon the agriculturists of this country. I will say further, that I believe when the Government asked my hon. friend to let this motion stand they had some notion of adopting the policy suggested in that motion. I apprehend that the Minister of Finance would not have the audacity to ask this House from day to day to let the motion stand if the subject was not under consideration. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, did not for a moment intend to ask the House to allow the motion to stand and leave it open to be believed that the matter was under the serious consideration of the Government with a view to an alteration of their policy in that particular if such an intent was not seriously entertained. And when the hon. gentleman has now this evening resisted this motion, he ought to have gone further and told the House why it was that, after considering it for two months, they came to the conclusion not to place this article on the free list, but to continue the tax on the agricultural population. Was it because there were among the supporters of the hon. gentleman men of influence and power, whose opinions the hon. gentlemen were not at liberty to disregard, and they thought it to be of more consequence to consider their wishes than the interests of the agricultural population? If so, I think the hon. gentleman has had another attack of weakness, and he has yielded on this occasion, not to that which was best, but to that which was most selfish, and that doing so he has inflicted serious injury on the agricultural population of Canada.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It was not my intention to seriously disturb the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) when I rose from my seat a few minutes ago. My object was simply to call attention to the fact that it was not at the request of the Government, nor at the request of the Minister of Finance, that the discussion of this resolution was postponed. I think the hon. member for Bothwell had no desire to misrepresent the facts, and I therefore felt it my duty to put him right as regards who it was that asked that this resolution be deferred. The hon. gentleman will find in Hansard of 13th May, page 191, when Notices of Motion were called, that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) said:

"I would suggest to the Minister of Finance to allow these two notices appearing in my name to stand for a little time, so that I may not be under the necessity of watching them every day—say till a week from Monday."

Mr. MULOCK. That is exactly what he said.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Then the Minister of Finance answered:

"That will be the minimum."

Therefore, the hon. member for North York is responsible for deferring the discussion on this resolution since Monday in the early part of May. This is the point to which I desired to call the attention of the hon. member for Bothwell when I interrupted him. It was not my intention to make a speech, or to do anything else but call his attention to the fact that it was the hon. member for North York who asked for the postponement of this resolution. As I am on my feet, however, I may be pardoned for saying a few words on the question of the National Policy, which has been opened up in all directions by the discussions to-night. I think that the first object of a Minister of Finance should be to raise a sufficient revenue for the purpose of defraying all the legitimate expenses of the Government during the year. The National Policy therefore has for its object, first, to raise a sufficient revenue for all the annual requirements of the Government. This is the essential requisite of the National Policy or of any other policy that would be adopted by a wise Government of such a Dominion as ours. The National Policy has subserved that purpose fairly well. It has given us sufficient revenue for the purpose of providing public works throughout the Dominion, which are useful and necessary for the purpose of distributing the products of this vast Dominion; but we find that the object of the Opposition is to tear to pieces the National Policy by shreds and patches. They desire to take one item at a time, and ultimately they hope to destroy its usefulness altogether. At one time they attacked the duty on flour, which I observe is not intended to be done during the present session. At another time they attack the duty on coal, at another time they attack the duty on corn, then the duty on rice, and last, but not least, the duty on binding twine. They attack one line after another, until they hope at last to obtain that grand policy which they term unrestricted reciprocity, regardless of how they can raise the revenue for the purpose of meeting the annual demands on the treasury. There is not an hon. gentleman opposite who does not admit that we require a revenue of $40,000,000 annually for the purpose of defraying the legitimate expenses in this Dominion. Any Government that will undertake to govern this Dominion with a less annual revenue than $40,000,000 will undertake to do so to the prejudice of the best interests of the country, and therefore if the Government will undertake to so reduce the revenue as to diminish public expenditure on railways, canals and public works which are necessary for the country, they will fail to fulfil their duty to the people. But we are told that the duty on flour increases the price of the flour, that the duty on coal increases the price of the coal, and that the duty on every commodity increases the price of that commodity on which the duty is placed. We believe very differently; we believe that the price of any article on the market which is useful or necessary for the consumption of our people is regulated by the supply and the demand. I do not believe there is an intelligent member of the Opposition who will doubt that position. The principle is this, that if you increase the supply of a commodity which is required for home consumption, which is useful or necessary, beyond the demand in the Dominion, the price must fall. There is no member of the House, no intelligent farmer, miner, fisherman or labourer, who does not know that if a policy is calculated to increase the quantity of any commodity required for consumption there is a tendency to lower the price of that article. We had during last session, a short discussion on the price of flour. Those who occupied seats in the House during the past session may recollect such a discussion taking place. Those who were here then, I have no doubt, may have restrained their decision from moving this year in the direction of taking the duty off, very likely because those who took a prominent part in proposing that reduction last year fell by their folly. I may refer to the discussion which occurred on that occasion, because it was rather a spicy one, and it occurred in very much the same way as this discussion arose to-night. It was a kind of innocent interjection of mine in the House, and it brought me to my feet to explain the reason why I asked what I considered at that time a pertinent question. The then hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was speaking on the question of taking the duty off flour, and I, in my innocence, asked him a question, and the dialogue was as follows :—

"Mr. CAMERON. Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question?

"Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; twenty of them.

"Mr. CAMERON. There is a duty of $1 a barrel on flour imported into the United States. Does that increase the price of flour in the United States?

"Mr. MITCHELL. We are not exporters of flour to the United States.

"Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman knows there is a duty of $1 on the flour going into that country. Does that increase its price?

"Mr. MITCHELL. They do not import flour from Canada, and I will tell my hon. friend that the value of the flour in the United States is regulated by the markets in Liverpool.

"Mr. CAMERON. He cannot answer the question.

"Mr. MITCHELL. I have answered it.

"Mr. CAMERON. Does it increase the price of flour?

"Mr. MITCHELL. I will tell you what it does. If we exported Canadian flour into the United States——

"Mr. CAMERON. Say yes or no.

"Mr. MITCHELL. If we exported flour to the United Sates——

"Mr. CAMERON. That is no answer——"

My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was a little wrathy, and he invited my humble self to go outside and he would discuss the matter with me there. I was not in the mood to go out just then, but I intimated that possibly when we would be leaving for home we might stay out a little while to cool ourselves off. But finding that the question was not sufficiently explained, the hon. member for Halifax—not any of the present members for Halifax—was determined to give the member for Inverness a cowhiding which he would not forget for the balance of the term, and here is what occurred; it is rather spicy :

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was not surprised at the enquiry of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) relating to the importation of flour by the United States, because that gentleman has not that familiarity with business which would enable him to deal with that question.

"Mr. CAMERON. I have not had so much to do with sugar as you.

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). If he had he would know that if the duty in the United States was $5 a barrel on flour, it would not raise the price of Canadian flour if it went there.

"Mr. CAMERON. Would it increase the price of American flour?

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). Not one cent.

"Mr. CAMERON. That gives up the whole case.

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). If a son of mine six years old were to ask me a question of that kind, I would give him a spanking and send him to school, and tell him to learn the principles that govern commerce."

That was high-fallutin. The discussion continued:

"Mr. CAMERON. And when he had learnt them you would not understand them from him.

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman asked whether the price of American flour would be raised. He put us in the position of the United States. But we do not raise any breadstuffs in Nova Scotia at all, and, therefore, the cases are not parallel."

He had to shift himself from the position of a representative of the Dominion, to the position of a representative from Nova Scotia, but I did not like to be pinned even then and the remarks continued:

"Mr. CAMERON. Why not?

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). Simply for the reason that we do not raise any breadstuffs in Nova Scotia at all.

"Mr. CAMERON. Do they raise breadstuffs in the city of New York? Does a school boy know that."

The point I desire to make is this: that it is a singular fact that my hon. friend the then member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and my hon. friend the then member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), who were then unquestionably appealing to the prejudices of the people of this Dominion, and who appealed to their prejudices in vain, because they are much more intelligent down by the sea than they expected they were; those two hon. gentlemen who were taking advantage, as they supposed, of the ignorance of the people were elected to stay at home. I believe seriously that those who have come down to the duty on binding twine will find themselves in the same place. Why, we only import binding twine to the value of about $5,000 a year and we collect a revenue on it of about $1,200, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite appeal to the prejudices of the farmers of the whole Dominion, not excluding Prince Edward Island, where they do not use much binding twine, in order to convince them that they will be ruined unless the Government will take the duty off binding twine. Now, I desire my hon. friend opposite to take a leaf from the argument of the former member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and the former member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and to observe the fact that as five dollars a barrel on flour imported into the United States from Canada could not possibly increase the price of flour in the United States to the extent of one cent, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) stated, simply because they produced more flour in the United States than is required in that country for their home consumption. Why not apply the same argument, the same reasoning and the same amount of common sense on this side of the line? As in Canada we produce more flour than is required for home consumption, the duty of fifty cents or seventy-five cents will not increase the price of flour in Canada to the extent of one cent. The intelligent farmers, who require a good deal of flour besides the coarser grains which they produce in Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, know that this is a fact; the fishermen by the seas and the miners also know that this is a fact. As long as Canada produces more of any commodity than is required for home consumption, so long will the price of that commodity be as low as possible, consistent with a living profit to the producer or the manufacturer. Now, the very fact that twine is manufactured in Canada to an extent equal or nearly equal to the requirements of the country convinces me, at least, that the price of twine cannot be materially increased on account of the duty imposed upon it; and if twine should be manufactured in Canada to a greater extent than is required for home consumption, it would not increase the price of twine in Canada to the extent of one cent a pound or a ton. My hon. friends opposite ought to consider carefully every line of goods on which they propose to reduce the duty, and ascertain first whether the imposition of a duty is calculated to foster the manufacture of such goods in the Dominion to such an extent that the product will be in excess of the demand in the Dominion. If that is the case, the invariable result must be that the prices of articles will fall, sometimes, often, I may say, even below the cost of production. The sugar interests of this Dominion more than once have suffered. Refiners more than once since the adoption of the National Policy have had to sell sugar below the cost of production, and they therefore failed. At the present time they are in a prosperous condition and they will continue to be in as prosperous a condition as long as that interest of the Dominion is so regulated by a wise National Policy that the result will be ample revenue for the requirements of the Dominion and the placing of goods in the hands of the consumers, the farmers, the fishermen, the miners, the artisans, the lumbermen, the labourers and all the poorer classes of the people, at the lowest possible figure consistent with living prices for those who produce these articles and manufacture them. I did not intend to speak at such length; but I have much pleasure in supporting the Government in refusing to take the duty off twine or any other article which is at present embraced in the National Policy.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to make a personal explanation. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) read from Hansard some remarks made by me; and I wish to say, by way of explanation, that so far as I understand, it is not the custom of the reporters to record the observations of a member of the Government when a member on this side of the House is about to move a motion, if any member of the Government says "stand"; the motion stands as a matter of course, and the Hansard reporters take no note of the remark. With regard to the quotation, what occurred on that day was just what occurred before and has occurred since until to-night. The hon. Minister of Finance said "stand," and I am sure he will remember it, and my remark which followed the request that it should stand. That request did not originate with me, but I did not wish to have the motion stand de die in diem; I wanted something more definite. In further proof that I was not the cause of the delay, I may say that even up to this day the hon. Minister of Finance asked that the motion should stand. I know that there is no desire, now that the discussion is over, to misrepresent me any further.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me just one word in personal explanation, and I will state my impression. My impression was that at the first the hon. gentleman asked if the motion could stand. His impression is different. After that, whenever the motion came up, I think the hon. gentleman is right in saying that I said "stand," and I did it with the impression that the hon. gentleman was not pressing his motion.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman will admit that I had no conversation with him except what took place across the floor of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, only what took place across the floor of the House.

Mr. BOWELL. A statement was made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) which I desire should not go in Hansard without the most explicit contradiction on my part. He said he had a recollection—which he could not have had because the circumstance to which he alluded never did take place—of an Orange deputation coming here to insist on my being taken into the Cabinet. I pronounce that to be incorrect. There was no more truth in that statement than there was in the affidavit the hon. gentleman made in reference to the ex-member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey).

GRAVING DOCK PAPERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I beg to lay on the Table the papers connected with the graving dock at Kingston.

Sir RICHARDCARTWRIGHT. Dothey include the contract signed by the parties Bancroft & Connolly?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. All the papers are there.

Mr. AMYOT. Are they the originals?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The papers I promised on Friday are there. They are all the papers we have.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 7th July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that Bill (No. 125) respecting the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company be read the second time to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

LOCAL JUDGES OF ADMIRALTY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The assent of the Crown having been given to this resolution, I move that on Thursday the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to provide that the salaries of Local Judges in Admiralty, as such judges, shall be as follows :—

The local judge of the District of Quebec, $2,000 per annum ;

The local judge of the District of Nova Scotia, $1,000 per annum ;

The local judge of the District of New Brunswick, $1,000 per annum ;

The local judge of the District of Prince Edward Island, $800 per annum ;

The local judge of the District of British Columbia, $600 per annum ;

The local judge of the Toronto District, $600 per annum ;

And that each such judge shall be paid such travelling allowance as the Governor in Council from time to time determines.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—CONTRACTS.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. LAURIER. I rise to a question of privilege. I have to make a complaint to the House that the Order of the House given some days ago, which was accepted by the Minister of Public Works, to bring before the House all the papers connected with the graving dock contract, has not been fulfilled. The hon. Minister on Thursday last promised to the House that he would bring down all the papers, without any restriction, connected with that work. In order to show how complete that promise was, let me read what took place on that day. Mr. Mulock spoke as follows :—

"I would suggest, so as to prevent any misunderstanding, that all the papers in the department, from the very commencement to this present moment, should be produced. I mean all the specifications and conditions that were referred to in the original advertisement for tenders, the tenders themselves, all the correspondence, and all other papers of any matter and kind connected with the contracts, whether let by tender under that advertisement or otherwise, and also a statement showing the changes in the contracts.

"Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before six o'clock I answered the hon. gentleman, and a couple of other hon. gentlemen, that I would bring down the papers, and I meant by that all the papers."

So there could not be any possible misunderstanding as to what was meant by the promise made by the hon. Minister when he stated to the House that he would bring all the papers without any reservation, connected with this contract. My hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) had asked, among other things, for all the tenders in connection with this graving dock, but, while I find among the papers the tender of the successful tenderer, Mr. Andrew C. Bancroft, I do not find the tender of the Messrs. Connolly who also tendered for this work. This is an omission which is very important under the circumstances, for I have no hesitation in asserting, in the full view of my responsibility as a member of Parliament, that the tender signed by Andrew C. Bancroft is in the handwriting of Michael Connolly. I have good reason to be aware of the handwriting of Michael Connolly, because, when I was acting on behalf of Mr. Tarte when an accusation for libel was brought against him, I had about twenty letters of Michael Connolly in my possession, and I have no hesitation in saying that this tender upon which the contract was awarded is in the handwriting of Michael Connolly. That was signed on the 28th March, 1888, and there is another letter dated the 4th April, 1889, as follows :—

"A. GOBEIL, Esq., Secretary, Public Works Department.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform you that since tendering for the construction of the Graving Dock at Kingston, Ont., I have entered into an agreement with Messrs. N. K. and M. Connolly, of Quebec, to join with me—should my tender be accepted—in the construction of the same. As the Messrs. Connolly are well known to the department, and have all the necessary plant and implements for an immediate commencement of the work, I trust my tender will receive the favourable consideration of the department.

"I have the honour to be,
"Your obedient servant,
"ANDREW C. BANCROFT."

I have no hesitation whatever in stating that that also is in the handwriting of Michael Connolly. The tender is signed Andrew C. Bancroft, but in a handwriting which is unknown to me. Under these circumstances, it was all the more important that the pledge which was made to the House the other day, and which was tantamount to an Order of the House, that all the papers, and especially all the tenders, should be brought forth, should have been attended to, and certainly the House has not been treated as it should have been when this tender has not been produced. At this moment I make no charge against anyone, but it is evident a gross fraud has been perpetrated on the Department of Public Works. It is evident that the Messrs. Connolly have tendered under two names —in the name of Connolly, and in the name of Bancroft. If this tender has not been brought forward, I insist, and I am sure the House will bear me out, that it should be brought forward at once.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I remember perfectly well, as the hon. gentleman has said, that I promised all the papers. I thought, when the papers were brought down, they were all here, but I see that the memorandum is only a list of the tenders with the prices. I am now writing to my deputy to tell him to send at once all the original tenders if that has not been already done.

Mr. TARTE. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough also to bring down the cheque given by Bancroft. I think the cheque is still in his department, and it may be a very important paper to have. While I am on my feet, I may also call the attention of the hon. Minister to this fact : that, on the very same date, the 4th April, on which the letter was written by the so-called Bancroft, but written and signed by Michael Connolly, another letter was written by the two Connollys and signed by Mr. Connolly himself. These two letters show that on the same day the very same man tendered twice—once under a false name, and once under the true name of their firm.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman knew how the cheques are treated, he would understand that what he asks cannot be given. When a tender is received from anyone, with his tender there is a cheque accepted by a bank, no matter what bank. When the tenders are open and the list is made, if it is a lump sum, the amount is put in the list and the amount of the cheque is put in another column. If the amount is not a lump sum but is on schedule prices, then the tenders are put in the hands of the proper officer in order to extend the schedule and obtain the exact amount of each item. Then, when that is done, the list, having been made and signed by the deputy and the chief of the branch, is laid before the Minister so that the Minister may see what is the result. On that being submitted to the Minister, the lowest tenderer, as a rule, is accepted; if it is a small amount the Minister need not go to Council. If it is a large amount, it goes to Council and an Order in Council is passed, and when the Order in Council is passed and received in the department, all the cheques of the tenderers are sent back except the cheque of the tenderer whose offer has been accepted. That cheque, which is to the order of the Minister, is endorsed by the Minister and sent to the Department of Finance, and there, as soon as the contract is signed, as I understand, the cheque is sent to the bank and cashed. Therefore the cheque cannot be given in this case any more than in any other case.

Mr. TARTE. I also called the attention of the Minister to the fact that a letter of the 4th April was sent in by the Messrs. Connolly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot help that, if it is so.

Mr. TARTE. That may be, though I am sorry that it cannot be helped.

Mr. AMYOT. We have been asked to vote $60,000 for the amount paid under the special warrant. The original contract was for $260,680. I have seen the report, which values the whole work, not at that sum, but at $450,944. We would like to have the details of all these expenses. How is it that besides the price of the contract, there are $50,000 for widening? Surely that was not decided upon after the work was nearly completed, upon a subsequent report of the engineer. There must be some details for that. There is also an estimate for valves, $3,000; for caissons, $20,000; hauling gear, $5,000; pump plant, $25,000; engine house, $15,000; shop tools, $2,500; coal shed, $1,000; store house, $2,000; residence for dock master, engineer and offices, $5,000; fence and gates, $2,500; bilge blocks and shores, $2,500; electric plant, $2,500; refund of expenses to the 30th June, 1889, $33,763.87; superintendence, $30,000. We want details about that. We see that the total cost of the contract is $260,000; but there are $200,000 more, and we want to know something about that. We want to know why these expenses have been incurred; therefore, I hope the Minister will understand the necessity of bringing these items before the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I hardly think this is the proper time to go into these items; but I may say to the hon. gentleman that what he wants to get is the estimate the chief engineer made after the contract was given for the different items that will be required to complete the works of the dock. For example, we have put down for widening, $50,000, but that work will not cost $50,000, as I stated, it will cost $31,000 or $32,000. Then you have valves, then you have caissons; we have put down $20,000 for caissons, but the caissons, by the contract, will cost only $18,000, and so on. Therefore, it is impossible to get the details the hon. gentleman wants now. Then other items have not been given; these are things that will come later on. For example, you have here shop tools, $2,500; that comes later on. Then, coal shed—that will be in order later on when the dock is about completed. Then, you have the fencing and gates, $2,500; then, you have shores, and these bilge blocks, $2,500. Then, you have store house, etc.,—that is another thing that is not given there. Then, residence for the dockmaster, electric plant, and so on—tenders have not been called for any of these things; all this work has not yet been done. They will come later on as the wants of the dock will require. That was the estimate made by the chief engineer, of what all the works would probably cost.

Mr. TARTE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question? Did he ever see that man Bancroft? I believe this is a fair question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will not refuse to answer the question, but the hon. gentleman must remember that the leader of the Opposition asked for the papers yesterday. I sent at once to have them produced, and most likely I will have them in an hour or two, as soon as the deputy has collected them in the department.

Mr. AMYOT. I understand the position to be this: It is said in the report to which the Minister of Public Works referred a moment ago, that the amount voted by Parliament will be spent in a few days, and that he requires $60,000 on special warrant. We want the details on which he bases his estimates; we want the details of what has already been spent under the contract. I suppose his report is not altogether made to mislead the House, but to give us an estimate about one-third or one-half more than the real cost of the work. These estimates must be of some use, I presume, for somebody. We want to know where we are in respect to that dock. I do not want to discuss the details, but the hon. gentleman will see that we are fairly entitled to the fullest information possible under the circumstances.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Though it is not quite in order, nevertheless I will give an answer to the hon. gentleman in a very few words. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to look at the report of Mr. Perley, Chief Engineer, recommending the above Governor General's warrant for $60,000, he will see there what that money is required for.

SHAREHOLDERS OF THE WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Government Orders of the Day are called—I observe that Bill (No. 119), the agreement with the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, is not yet printed. The Government, I presume, have got a list of shareholders of that company, and I think we ought to be put in possession of the names of the parties with whom we are treating, to whom we are presenting the subsidies. I desire to know if the Government are prepared now, or will be prepared in a day or so, to lay on the Table a list of the shareholders of that railway, with the details of the amounts paid up, &c.?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will give what information I have with reference to the promoters of the railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is to be an incorporated company, and I want to know if the Government have a list of the stockholders.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will enquire.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They know with whom they are dealing, I suppose, in plain English.

WAYS AND MEANS.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER moved:

1. Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending the 30th of June, 1891, the sum of $2,594,597.64 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

2. Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for certain expenses of the public service of the financial year ending the 30th of June, 1892, the sum of $2,389,854.26 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

3. Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of public service for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1892, the sum of $2,398,845.81 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the second reading of the resolutions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance, with respect to that item to which I specially directed his attention, the Governor General's warrant for $302,000 in the unprovided items, whether he has any further information to offer.

Mr. FOSTER. No further information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to raise a discussion, as it might delay business, but I would suggest this: I desire that either he or the Minister of Customs, who is acting Minister of Railways, will order Mr. Schrieber to attend the next meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, and we can investigate that matter at our leisure.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it is the function of the Committee to order a witness to attend, but I will have the motion passed in the morning at the Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Railways can order his official to attend without any inconvenience or detriment to the public service.

Mr. BOWELL. I will see that he attends.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When will the Committee meet?

Mr. FOSTER. To-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Resolutions concurred in.

SUPPLY BILL.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) to grant to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for paying certain expenses of the public service for the financial years ending respectively 30th June, 1891, and 30th June, 1892, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first, second and third times, and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 13) to provide for the exercise of Admiralty jurisdiction within Canada in accordance with the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act of 1890.—(Sir John Thompson.)

WAYS AND MEANS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That the resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means on Tuesday last, the 23rd instant, be read a second time;" and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, when I had the pleasure of moving the adjournment of the Budget debate, the House had just listened to an admirably delivered speech by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), an hon. gentleman who, I need not say, is listened to on this side of the House with a pleasure scarcely less than that which greets him among those to whom he is bound by ties of party association and party friendship. I am not unaware, Sir, that it must ever be a task, particularly to those who, like myself, are quite unused to taking part in the debates of this House, to make a satisfactory answer to one of that hon. gentleman's very forcible and rather seductive speeches. But, to-day, and under these circumstances, the task is somewhat lessened to me, because the hon. gentleman consumed the greater portion of his time in criticizing the arguments of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), —arguments which, I submit, were very little disturbed by the very keen criticism to which they were exposed, and hence need very little defence at my hands this afternoon; and, in the second place, lessened, too, by the fact, and the hon. gentleman will excuse me if I say it, because I thought the hon. gentleman was attempting an attack upon a Budget speech, with a greater portion of which it did seem to me that the hon. gentleman was in more or less hearty accord. Indeed I did think as he proceeded on his way so eloquently and so ably, that he was to a much greater extent in accord with it, than he was in accord with many of the statements, with many of the expressions, and with many of the arguments that had at an earlier stage of the debate fallen from the hon. gentleman who had preceded him upon that side of the House. Sir, we have now had two speeches from the benches to your left in reply to the hon. Minister of Finance who made his financial statement the other afternoon, and after listening to those speeches, one by the hon. member who has preceded me, who has always occupied a very prominent place in his party in this House, a gentleman who has not only occupied a prominent place in his party, but who at one time occupied the responsible post of financial critic upon that side of the House; and the second speech, not from an ordinary member in the ranks of the Liberal party, but from an hon. gentleman who at present occupies the important position of financial critic to the party in this House, whose ability we very well recognize, and who has had a very long experience both in office and out of office, upon matters of trade, of commerce, and of finance,—Sir, I say, after listening to those two speeches, I think we upon this side of the House may well be excused for the compliments which we are disposed to pay without stint to the Minister of Finance, not only for his admirable statement upon the finances of the country, but also upon the success and the ability which has characterized his discharge of the duties which have devolved upon him during the last three or four years in connection with the Government of this country. I speak for myself, Sir, but at the same time I believe I am speaking for those who are around me, when I say that, notwithstanding a taunt here, or a sneer there, that may have been hurled against the hon. gentleman and have fallen harmless at his feet, we, on this side of the House at least, are proud of his ability and proud of his success, and regard him as no unfitting successor, and as no unfitting associate of these brilliant Canadians, whether in the past or in the present, who have come to us from the "shreds and patches by the sea." Mr. Speaker, I believe that we might well feel on this side of the House, I believe that the Government have every reason to feel, after the speeches by the two prominent gentlemen to whom I have referred, that they might well allow the speech of the Finance Minister, unsupported by anything further which may be said by this side of the House, and accompanied by what has been said, or what may be said by hon. gentlemen to your left—I believe that they might feel well satisfied to allow that speech to go to this House and to this country, and be assured that they would suffer nothing by the act of omitting its defence in this House. Sir, I should certainly have made no remarks in this debate had it not been for the statement very frequently hurled against members from Ontario upon this side of the House, that we are unwilling, and quite unwilling, to come to the defence of the Government upon the various question of the day. I speak my own mind, and I believe I speak the mind as well of those around me, when I say that some who will take part in this debate are taking part in it simply for the reason which I have just assigned. For that reason, and for the reason that I do not often ask your attention, Sir, and that I do not often ask the attention of this House, I hope that the members of this House will pardon me if I transgress for a time upon their attention this afternoon, while I deal in my own humble way with those subjects which have been touched upon in the Budget speech, and while I deal as well with the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), leading as he does the financial and commercial forces upon the other side of the House. I have said, Sir, that we have listened to the Budget speech in its criticism with a great deal of pleasure; and why not? What are the facts? After all the denunciation, after all the declamation that we have heard from press and from platform during the past year, here, face to face with the public records, face to face with the deliberate judgment and intelligence of this House; my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), able as he is—and I wish to detract none from his ability,—my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), able as he is, and no man here wishes to detract from his ability—these two gentlemen, by far the ablest in the ranks of their party in this House, meet the financial statement of the Minister of Finance, I submit, more in compliment than in criticism, and passing by the changes which were made in the tariff, though unreadily and unwillingly, they are forced to admit that this Government has had its finger upon the pulse of this country, and that this Government is anxious to look well to the interests of those with a management of whose affairs they are charged. Now, Sir, after passing by these points, and I submit I have not drawn too strong a picture, we have had both hon. gentlemen, and particularly the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), following the strain of former years, and indulging in that old song, that song of despair, and of wreck, and of ruin, with which the ears of hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House have been pleased and tickled in days gone by, and by which hon. gentlemen opposite have been endeavouring to win the affections, and to win the confidence of the people of this country, and the people of the country across the border as well. Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the remarks which have fallen from my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), I desire to say just a few words upon one or two of the points upon which he makes contention, and to leave the other points upon which he spoke until I come to deal with them as they were spoken of by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who preceded him. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) is a practical tradesman, and, I believe, a very good tradesman, and a credit to the trade to which he belongs. He is intelligent upon the subject which he discussed in this House; there is, perhaps, no man in Parliament who knows better than he does the subject of sugar, with which he dealt for a long space of time when he spoke to the House upon that question; and, Sir, I shall not attempt to follow him in the somewhat intricate arguments and minute details which he gave in connection with that business; I will leave that to my hon. friends upon this side of the House who are engaged in the same trade, and who are equally, I presume, able with himself, and who will answer him upon the minute details which that gentleman has brought forward. But looking at the question as one outside the trade, I did conclude, after the three-quarters of an hour nearly which the hon. gentleman spent upon the sugar question,—I did conclude that he was forced to come to this conclusion: that after all, the Minister of Finance had brought down a Budget speech and announced changes in the tariff which had given a great portion of the sugar of this country absolutely free to the consumers, and with regard to the balance of it, he had brought down such a tariff that the people of this country—according to the Liberal organs, according to the organs of commercial associations, and according to the hon. gentleman's own arguments—were to-day receiving sugar at from between $1\frac{1}{8}$ cents and 2 cents less per pound than they could purchase it for before the tariff came down. And that, Sir, after all his maze of argument, after all his able dealing with that subject, was the hon. gentlemen's admission—that sugars of a certain grade were free, and sugars above that grade had been reduced from $1\frac{1}{8}$ to 2 cents a pound. Coming from the hon. gentleman,

I think that is a compliment which the hon. Minister of Finance may very well take to himself. Now, Sir, my hon. friend from South Brant declared that the breakfast table of the people of this country was not free. Well, I suppose that, like wealth, freedom is largely a comparative term; and I suppose that when we compare the freedom of the breakfast table to-day with the freedom of the breakfast table in other days, we are not making an unfair comparison. Hon. gentlemen opposite pose as those who would reduce the duties and give the people of this country cheap living and free breakfast tables. I think someone has said that we must read the future by the past of men; and certainly, if we read the future of hon. gentlemen opposite by their past we are justified in saying that they have no right to claim to be the party of low taxation or the party of free breakfast tables. I need not state the fact, for it is well known in this House, that under hon. gentlemen opposite tea was taxed by that abominable specific duty, to which my hon. friend from South Oxford so frequently refers as being the most iniquitous tax that could be placed upon the people of any country. I need not say how coffee was taxed by another of those abominable specific duties, or how molasses was taxed twice or three times as much as it is at the present time, or how sugar bore the very heavy tax which has been so frequently the subject of criticism in this House. And yet my hon. friend from South Brant, remembering these facts very well, but attempting to damage the position of the Government, and in face of the fact that we have by the action of this Government tea free, coffee free, sugar almost absolutely free, molasses almost free, still contends the Government has not given this country a free breakfast table after all. Sir, I do not require to deal with that subject any longer. I think the hon. gentleman's contention is sufficiently answered by the facts of the case. Let me say that if the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite on tea, coffee and sugar had been in vogue, and were in vogue to-day, there would have been a taxation upon the people of this country higher than the present taxation by no less than $4,000,000 upon the breakfast tables of the country. Now, Sir, I want to deal for a moment with my hon. friend's statement, which contradicted, to a large extent, the statement of the hon. member for Albert with regard to the importance of the sugar-refining industry in this country. I may say at once that I am not acquainted with that industry; I may say that I know nothing practically about it; and I may say that I have not consulted any of my hon. friends around me who do know about it, for fear that their evidence might be considered biassed and, therefore, unacceptable to this House. But, when the hon. gentleman stated—and he took a great deal of pains to figure it out from the census—that only some 800 people were employed in the sugar refineries of the country, he evidently forgot that, when his friends were on this side of the House, their blundering tariff compelled the refiners of this country to close their doors. We know that that subject was brought up in the House of Commons of Canada, not by men who supported the party in power at the present moment, but by men who supported the hon. member for South Oxford and his friends, and that on that occasion Mr. Jones, a good Liberal, made the very same statement that the hon. member for Albert made the other night, that thousands were employed in the sugar-refining industry of this country; and the very same statement was made by Mr. Workman, who then represented the city of Montreal and supported hon. gentlemen opposite. He declared, not that hundreds, but that from 15,000 to 30,000 people were either directly or indirectly engaged in the work of sugar refining in this country. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition smiles one of those seductive smiles which we on this side of the House are always glad to recognize on his handsome face; but when the hon. gentleman smiles, though it may be a smile of ridicule, it will not be directed at me for if he turns to the Hansard of 1876 there he will find the statements of his good friend Mr. Jones and his good friend Mr. Workman; and I think I can leave the question of the correctness of those statements to be settled between those Liberals of the past and the Liberals of to-day. Now, my hon. friend from South Brant contended that there was an enormous protection to the sugar-refining industry of this country; and after all, when you come to figure it out, I think there is, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman as to the price of sugar, a duty of something like 17 or 18 per cent. in favour of the refiners of this country. My hon. friend shed a tear in the interest of the poor people of this country who were taxed so enormously for the advantage of the refiners. Now, Sir, my hon. friend is a manufacturer himself; he is a good manufacturer; and I do not complain of the protection he is getting. I am glad to know that his industry is prospering as it is; I am glad to see him not only extending his home factory, but planting factories in other towns in Ontario under the fostering influence of this National Policy; but when the hon. gentleman wept, as he did metaphorically, for the poor consumers of this country, he ought to have wept, too, for the consumers of sweetened biscuits, who are taxed 35 per cent., the consumers of non-sweetened biscuits, who are taxed 25 per cent., the consumers of candy, who are taxed 1¼ cents a pound by that horrible specific tax and 35 per cent. ad valorem, the consumers of jellies and jams, who are taxed 5 cents a pound, and the consumers of pickles—the hon. gentlemen must take the sour with the sweet—who are taxed 35 cents a gallon. I do not for a moment find fault with this, though I think there is a little inequality, the hon. gentleman's raw material, sugar, being somewhat reduced in price, according to his own contention. But the hon. gentleman will, no doubt, this session or next session go with me to the hon. Finance Minister and ask him to lower a little the duty on sweetened biscuits, and pickles, and jellies and jams, in order to make this tariff a thoroughly consistent tariff. Now, Sir, I admired and enjoyed very much the pleasant banter which the hon. gentleman gave to us on this side of the House. He asserted in his pleasant way that we are ready to applaud anything—that we applauded the imposition of taxes and applauded the reduction of taxes; and my hon. friend, with that ability which he always displays in this House, drew a magnificent picture of the members on this side rising and tossing up their hats in very glee when the Government reduced the taxes, and added that on the imposition of the duty we had risen and tossed up our hats in very glee a few years ago. Well, Sir, I do not think there is anything inconsistent in our cheering the reduction of a tax upon a necessary of life, more particularly when that reduction, enormous as it is, is made in the taxes of the people without disturbing those great national industries which it is the business of this Government to foster, and of which this country is justly proud. I wonder if my hon. friend used to rise in his seat and cheer when the hon. member for South Oxford was the Finance Minister of this country, and when my hon. friend, who then sat very close to where I am now, was offering a hearty support to the hon. member for South Oxford's policy upon many of the questions in that hon. gentleman's tariff. I do not think he used then to feel very happy. I do not think that he then was very well satisfied, or that his satisfaction ever rose to the height of a cheer. Sir, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was then the Finance Minister of this country, and my hon. friend—an intelligent man, a conscientious man, and perhaps few more conscientious men sit in this House—sat behind him; and my hon. friend then took the opportunity, upon every possible occasion, to rise in his place, and, as the defender of the industries of this country, beg for God's sake that the life-blood should cease to be crushed out of this country by competition with the country to the south of us. I do not quote these opinions of the hon. gentleman to show his inconsistency, because I believe that is a position which no hon. gentleman should take in this House. If I may be permitted to refer to a previous debate, I may say that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), last night, expressed my sentiments exactly when he said that a man may change his opinion and still be regarded as thoroughly consistent; but when I look back into the pages of Hansard I find my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) giving utterance to arguments in this House which he has never yet answered. I find the hon. gentleman then used language of which he has never used the equal since he has been compelled to change his opinions, and I am free to take the better arguments of the hon. gentleman and present them to this House for consideration as against the weaker arguments which he makes to-day. Why, Sir, he objects that we should have a tariff of 17 per cent. or 18 per cent. on sugar. But we had a protection of 17½ per cent. in 1876 upon manufactured imports, and then the hon. gentleman, standing up here in his place as an adviser and supporter of the Minister of Finance, said:

"At the present time we have a protective tariff of 17 per cent. on some articles, and the question which should engage the attention of the Minister of Finance is, whether an additional duty, no matter how much it may be"——

Specific or ad valorem, be it 20 or 25, or, for that matter, 100 per cent.—

—"no matter how much it may be on certain articles, will not promote the interest of this Dominion."

My hon. friend will find, by the Hansard, that he expressed those opinions in 1876. Once more, he said:

"The Finance Minister should ascertain, if possible, what articles are being slaughtered in our markets, what industries are being crushed out in our midst, what enterprises could be successfully fostered in this country, and then should frame a tariff that would be defensive in its nature. He being a champion of our interests should use, not offensively but defensively, that weapon which has been placed in his hands in order to prevent the life-blood of this country being drawn from it."

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Sir, I could quote page after page, column after column, directed in very much the same way to this House. And they are arguments the hon. gentleman has never answered since he has been compelled or chosen—I do not care which—to contend upon the other side of this question. Now, I want to show the House what a magnanimous man my hon. friend from South Brant is. He has not the least bit of resentment in his good nature, and he has a very good nature. Why, what is the picture? The hon. gentleman came to the rescue of his hon. friend from South Oxford, and he came to it manfully and heartily. Does the hon. gentleman admit that he was a manufacturer, and that, as a manufacturer, he was asking for an increase of the tariff in 1876? He will not deny it. Then, admitting that, does he remember that the hon. member for South Oxford went through the Province of Ontario and declared to the farmers, during the recent campaign, that when the manufacturers came to him and asked him for protection he said to them (I say it under my breath, Sir): "I told them to go to the father of lies." I allow my hon. friend from South Brant to draw his own inference. I shall not suggest to this House the treatment he received, but, putting things together, I say that he, the hon. member for South Brant, is as gallant as he is kind, is as chivalrous as he is able in this House. I do not need to say that the hon. gentleman was among those who advocated a very strong tariff as affording a very good protection to the farmers of this country; and I do not think that the hon. gentleman to-day will rise in his place in the House, and I do not think any other hon. gentleman on the other side will rise and say that he would ask the farmers of this country to return to the relative position, as compared with the people of the United States, which they held from 1873 to 1878. Why, what did he say? He said, on the 21st February, 1876, that the agitation was general for protection among the farmers. He said:

"There is no doubt that throughout the length and breadth of the country, at the present time, this question agitates all classes of our community."

And I can well understand the fervour with which the hon. gentleman spoke those words. Again, he said:

"I am cognizant of the fact that this subject is agitating them to their very depths. At my last election, when my opponent told them they need not expect any protection from the Reform Government, I had to assure them that whenever this subject came up in the House I would raise my voice in their behalf."

I am afraid his opponent was right. I am afraid my hon. friend from South Brant trusted too confidently in the good judgment and intelligence of his leaders, when they came to deal with the interests of Canadian agriculturists. In order, Sir, to alarm the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches once more he said:

"There will be a petition here of 100,000 grangers asking for protection to the agricultural industries of this country."

I shall not refer further to that hon. gentleman's contentions. They are contentions which at that time were meeting, and afterwards did meet, the approval of the people of this country, and I am bound to say, I giving the hon. gentleman full credit for his convictions, that if to-day he were asked in his own county: Will you take off the duty on your agricultural produce and allow the Americans to slaughter in our markets again without our securing their market in return? he would not reply that he would, and if he did, he would not find five men in the county he represents, or in the county I represent—and I may make that statement deliberately—who would say: Let us return to the jug-handled policy followed when these gentlemen were in power. My hon. friend asks us to suggest a scheme for the relief of the terrible distress which the hon. gentleman from South Oxford has declared exists among our tillers of the soil. Suggest a scheme! the hon. gentleman never, in the light of the record of his friends, should have used any such term in this House. Suggest a scheme, Sir!! Does the hon. gentleman remember the scheme that his hon. friend from South Oxford suggested, in 1878, when, confronted with tumbling interests and bankrupt manufacturers and impoverished farmers on every side, he said to the farmers, upon the platform at Fergus, in the Province of Ontario: You must be more frugal; you must be more industrious; you must work harder and eat less. Sir, I hope whatever scheme the Minister of Finance may bring down to this House, that for Heaven's sake he will not be compelled to say to the people of this country: Work longer hours and with a steadier will, and eat less when you go in to that free breakfast table in the morning, in order that you may better your condition. Now the hon. member for South Brant complains that we were in this House given very much to attacking the hon. member for South Oxford. I disclaim any such intention so far as I am concerned, and I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will disclaim it as well. But the hon. gentleman must remember that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the mouthpiece of his party on questions of trade and commerce. He lays down to this House the policy which his party are supposed—I say supposed, because I do not think they really have any policy in reference to this question—are supposed to have adopted. Therefore it is our duty to show, as we believe we can show, the falsity of his premises and the illogical nature of his arguments, as well as the deductions which he makes from those arguments in his speeches. The hon. gentleman admitted he attempted to create prosperity by the system which he adopted when he was in office, and he failed. I disclaim any intention to attack the hon. gentleman personally when I deal with him in regard to this matter and with his contentions in this House. I shall not use a word in regard to his personal character. In dealing with public subjects I trust I shall not take from the speeches which he delivered in Ontario even a single selection from that vocabulary of abuse, that vocabulary of vilification, speeches, Sir, which contain more abusive terms, more terms of vilification of his opponents than all the speeches of all the public men who through all the years have discussed Canadian public questions before the citizens of this country. My hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) expected the hon. gentleman to feel happy when he was listening to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I do not think the hon. gentleman had a single reason to feel happy. Sir, what are the facts? I do not say that it has come from the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite, but in the press representing those hon. gentlemen we have seen for the last twelve years the statement that when one event came to the Conservative party, success would perch on the banners of those hon. gentlemen opposite. That event has happened, Sir, and, within a few weeks we have been told that under the shadow of that great bereavement the Liberal Conservative party would go to atoms. And yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman was compelled to look across the floor at a new Government formed under a new and able leader still controlling the destinies of the country—with ranks behind them no less solid—if slightly smaller—than in days gone by. He had, Sir, no reason to be happy, for once more—and for the hundredth time—the ships he had sailed for sunny isles "had never come to shore." He saw himself face to face with no bright prospects in the present. Nor was the past any better. I fancy, as he sat there, Sir, listening to his successful opponent, that he was tracing the pictures which hung in memory's hall. No doubt he was comparing the position of the present Finance Minister with the position which he occupied as Finance Minister in this country. No doubt he was making points of difference between his record during those five years and the record of my hon. friend who now occupies the position. My hon. friend the Finance Minister was able to come down to the House with a surplus of revenue over expenditure. The hon. gentleman scarcely knows what that pleasure is. The present Minister of Finance was able to announce a reduction of $3,500,000 of taxation, and, as the magical words fell from his lips, the hon. gentleman opposite must have remembered his statements in this House when he piled up millions of taxes on the people of this country. He must remember that he never was able to reduce a dollar of the burdens on the people. Then the hon. gentleman remembered that he was never able to say anything in the House when he was a member of the Ministry of that day in reference to the prosperity of this country. In 1875 he came to this House and prophesied that there was likely to be an era of hard times, that a storm would probably arise on the political horizon. In 1876 he said that we were undoubtedly in the storm. In 1877 he said that we were drawing moderately close to clear water, and in 1878 he said that the storm was nearly over, but that the country was still suffering from the ground swell. There are those on this side, Sir, who are uncharitable enough to believe that the hon. gentleman was, instead of suffering from the ground swell, feeling the premonitory effects of the cyclone which struck him later in the year, and from the effects of which neither he nor his friends have yet recovered. The hon. gentleman was not only not able to congratulate the House on the prosperity of the country, but he made predictions which were not fulfilled, while the present Minister of Finance was able to come here and show that every prediction that he had made was fulfilled and that every prophecy had been justified by the subsequent results. Let the hon. gentleman go back and trace the results of what he will find recorded in the walls of his memory, and see how he panned out as a prophet. In 1876 he said we would have a reasonable surplus, but it resulted in a deficit of $1,900,788. In 1877 he said the reason for the deficit was abnormal, and that it would not occur again, but the next year he came down with his usual smiling face and showed the usual result of a deficit of $1,460,027. In 1877 he said it was very likely that we should have a surplus in the next year, but in 1878 he had to report a deficit of $1,128,147. Once more he ventured to prophesy for the next year, but he was not here; his successor, however, was compelled to come down with a deficit of $1,937,999. My hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) was unkind and unfair when he expected that, under those distressing circumstances, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) should have listened with a smiling countenance to the speech delivered the other day by the Minister of Finance. Beginning his speech, the hon. gentleman opposite attacked the public works of this country, and his argument was that the public works did not pay. My hon. friend behind me said that was the argument of a demagogue. I shall not use that term, because I think it may be unparliamentary, but I can only say that if in any township council a councillor used the argument against the construction of a macadamized road that it would not pay he would be laughed out of the council and out of the community. We did not expect, when we commenced to build our harbours and our lighthouses to provide for the safety of lives and property, when we undertook to construct the finest system of canals the world has ever seen, that we were going in that way to bring dollars into the public treasury, and no one knows that better than the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman went once to the money markets of the old world, unfortunately for this country, and he issued a prospectus in which he said, speaking of the expenditure upon public works in Canada:

"The whole of the debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility. The indirect advantage from these public works has already been found in the remarkable rapidity with which the commerce and the material prosperity of the Dominion have been developed; while a substantial increase in the direct returns may fairly be expected from the improvements now in progress, and to follow the steady progress of population and trade."

Once more, I do not want to put the hon. gentleman of the past beside the hon. gentleman of the present, and say that he is inconsistent; but I think my legal friends around me will say that they would rather go to a judge who is in a good temper and a pleasant frame of mind than to one who is in a bad temper. I will take the hon. gentleman when he was in the pleasing position of a seat in the Government of this country, when his mind was supposed to be at ease, and his spirit was supposed to be happy, and I ask this House to accept his judgment in that happy mood, rather than the wild declamations which he makes in this House after long-continued disappointment in the political arena of this country. Now, then, the hon. gentleman was quite right when he said that we were to secure indirect returns. Sir, does he know that by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the town of Pembroke, in which you live, to the sea, 300 towns have sprung up under the fostering influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that the assessment of those towns, far below their actual value, is to-day, by actual returns, no less than $125,000,000? This does not include any of the farming land opened up or increased in value along the route. Does the hon. gentleman know, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance stated last night, that we are to-day getting our freight carried—which is a direct advantage to the people of this country—on account of the competition, for a little more than one-third what it was some years ago? Does he know that by the returns brought down to this House, we have six times as much mileage, we have carried five times as much freight, we have five times as many passengers, as the railways did in 1867, and the income of those roads is only four times as much as it was in 1867? This, Sir, tells it, it appears to me, better than words can tell, the story of reduced freight rates in the country, due to competition, and that competition due largely to the aid we have given railway construction in Canada. But let us deal with this in a broader sense. I quote the words of the hon. gentleman in 1875, when he said:

"We have chosen to take upon ourselves a truly imperial task, a greater task than that which was ever undertaken by any nation of our age and our resources, that of colonizing and of developing an enormous extent of territory, not so much for our own benefit, but for the benefit of the generations yet to come. This is a task, Sir, for the performance of which we may well ask our people for any reasonable sacrifice."

Sir, that was the task to the performance of which the Conservative party set themselves in 1879; that was the task that was the life-dream, aye, more than the life-dream, the life-work of the statesman who has gone; and I tell you in the light of the facts that it might well be said that over his bier shone the light of more than the dawn of the completion of that great work which was outlined in the speech of my hon. friend in 1874. What have we done? We have built our harbours, we have dredged our rivers, we have constructed our public works, we have made this great system of canals, we have kept our bond with the provinces to the east by constructing the Intercolonial Railway, we have kept our bond with the Province of British Columbia to the west by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in doing that we have opened up those provinces which must yet, Sir, be the hope of the future of this Dominion; because it must be well known to every hon. gentleman in this House that it is upon those plains of the North-West, that it is in those mining camps, in those coal fields, and in those cities of the future that must be employed the millions whose presence within our shores can alone work out the destiny which God and nature intended should be the destiny of this country. Now, Sir, after all these things have been done during the past 12 years, my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, comes down to this House and is able to declare to us that we are only bearing an interest burthen of 6 cents per head by the public debt more than we did in 1879. Now, Sir, I do not desire to speak lengthily upon the subject of the hon. gentleman's contention as to the "shreds and patches" of the Dominion. My hon. friends behind me somewhat resent that. Well, we do not mind this kind of attacks much from the hon. gentleman in Ontario. We have heard the hon. gentleman before. He has called us corrupt, he has called us selfish, he has called us mad, and more than that, he has said, in his own aristocratic way, that we were lazy—in other words, he has said we had "too great an aversion to manual labour." However, I may say that some of my hon. friends take this matter too much to heart. He does not mean it; it is only one of those ebullitions of temper that the hon. gentleman experiences when he speaks against the people, and when the people continue to vote want of confidence in him. However, I just desire to refer to this matter for a moment, because I was somewhat impressed—I may confess to my hon. friends from Nova Scotia that I was somewhat impressed by the charge that has been thrown across the House, that these men from the east were getting too much, that we had purchased Nova Scotia: and perhaps after all some of my friends—metaphorically speaking, of course—might have a few dollars jingling in the "pockets of their constituencies" "for political considerations." However, I looked up the records on this question of the time when the hon. gentleman was in power, when he had his friend, Mr. Jones, here as his chief lieutenant from Nova Scotia, and the hon. gentleman went back to Nova Scotia, and what was his plea? Was it that this good Liberal Government had taken care of the finances of this country? Was it that he had diminished the expenditure? No, Sir! He issued a manifesto which I have here, and which hon. gentlemen can see, claiming support for the Government of the hon. member for South Oxford, and why? Because, they had spent in the province of Nova Scotia nearly $500,000 in five years more than the Conservative Government had spent in seven years, the figures being as given in this bragging manifesto of Mr. Jones: Liberal Rule, $1,127,794 in five years; Conservative Rule, $650,228 in seven years. Now, Mr. Speaker, I thought after that the hon. gentleman should not bother this House with a discussion as to what may or may not be spent in the province by the sea. I was glad when my hon. friend—I only interject the remark here—I was glad when the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) rejoiced for us over the completion of the great Canadian Pacific Railway. It is true his rejoicing comes a little late, but better late than never. The hon. gentleman will rejoice still more when I read him a few figures which have been published in Bradstreet, and which will tell the tale that the wild-cat scheme of only a few years ago, that railroad which would not pay—I do not care to use the word he used—the lubricating oil upon its wheels, that road has in the past year, from May, 1890, to May, 1891, increased its income by $285,000, and in that increase stands $161,000 more than the decrease of receipts of any trunk line that exists upon the continent to-day. Those are the figures with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, I desire, for a few moments, to deal with the question of the agricultural ruin which my hon. friend said prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the Province of Ontario. I am here to admit that in Canada, as in other portions of the Empire, and the other portions of the civilized world, there is, to a certain extent, a depression hanging over the occupation of agriculture. This must be very generally admitted, and I need not discuss the reasons; they are evident to every gentleman who sits in this House this afternoon. Go, if you will, to the continent of Europe, and you will see what prevails there; you will find that in Belgium Government commission after Government commission has failed to suggest a help for the need that exists; you will find that in Germany the little farms of the peasants are being taken from them by mortgages; you will find that in France 3,000,000 of the 8,000,000 landowners have actually become subjects of public and of private charity; you will find, too, that under the sunny skies of Italy, with, perhaps, the most fertile soil to be found upon the continent of Europe, no less than 150,000 of its agricultural labourers are leaving that country every year to seek homes in other portions of the world. Now I come to the United States of America. What, Sir, is in the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite? If there is anything in that policy at all—I do not deal now with anything except dry, hard facts—if there is anything at all in that policy it must be because the farmers of the United States are richer than the farmers of the Province of Ontario, and of the Dominion of Canada. Sir, my hon. friends upon that side of the House, when you come to discuss this policy, do not want any matter of sentiment mixed up with it. They say it is time to do away with sentiment. Sir, I am not one of those who believe that in discussing a question of this kind, a question upon which may depend the future life of the country, you can entirely discard sentiment. I take it for granted that every hon. gentleman admits that in the upbuilding of a nation one of the most potent factors of its progress and advancement is a healthy and strong and individual national sentiment. I take it for granted that is the truth in respect to this people, or any other people. But I am willing for the moment to completely sever this question from a question of sentiment, and, if I do so, I ask hon. gentlemen to get down to the same hard matter of fact basis and to separate their contentions from the wild mass of speculation and assertion—wild, I say—which they so frequently produce in this House. Now, Sir, last year I took one of the best means that was open to me to discover the state of affairs in the United States. I opened up correspondence with every bureau of agriculture, with every statistical office in the United States of which I could obtain the address, and I am here to state for a few moments the information I gained and the conclusion at which I arrived. Let me say once more on the question of sentiment, that if we are to entirely disconnect the question from sentiment, then it becomes a mere business proposition, and it must be dealt with on a sound and hard business basis. It then becomes a question simply of partnership between the farmers of this country and the farmers across the line, and as the very first action taken by a business man would be to make enquiries as to the condition of the other party with whom he might be endeavouring to secure a partnership, so in this matter—a matter, I say, of trade partnership—let us inquire what is the condition of those with whom we are asked to go into partnership. The House, I hope, will not weary for a moment if I read briefly, and I will only read briefly, some extracts; and I ask hon. gentlemen who speak on this question not to depend on declamation and assertion, but to produce evidence as to the condition of affairs in the Province of Ontario or any other portion of Canada. I am here to state that I believe there are no farmers on the face of the earth to-day who are more prosperous than the farmers of Ontario at the present time. I have not here the actual figures that I can employ to establish that fact, but if hon. gentlemen have statements of agricultural papers, if they have reports of agricultural associations, if they have statistics collected by the officers of the people of Ontario which show anything else, I will very quickly recede from the position I have taken. Let me speak for a moment with respect to the State of Maine, a great State, of which Mr. Blaine is the statesman. There is a statement in the report for 1890 by Mr. Z. A. Gilbert, Secretary, on page 3, as follows :—

"There is undoubtedly much discouragement amongst our farmers: depreciation in farm values has gone on very rapidly for some time and has now reached a stage which is truly alarming, reaching in many cases 25, 35, and even 50 per cent., and the end is not yet. So much is this depreciation the case that farms have scarcely a selling value, and if by any uncontrollable circumstances any considerable number of farms were to be placed upon the markets, it is doubtful whether purchasers could be found."

I need not refer to New Hampshire. The description of the same condition in that State, on page 7 of the report, will be found by hon. gentlemen if they will read it. I need not refer to Vermont, where 161,000 acres are abandoned, and where the report which is in my possession says :

"Our lands are not worn out, but are abandoned because there is no good market for the products of this State."

I have the statement for the State of New York, which I will not read, but place in the hands of the reporters, because I desire to have it in the Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then I will read it. The Bureau of Agriculture in 1888 says :

"On the whole, New York farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago. There are a large number of farms which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged, which now would not sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which, on an average, is fully 33 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of the buildings and other improvements, owing to the shrinkage."

The State Assessors in 1890 say :

"We find a general depreciation in the value of farm lands. We have visited fourteen counties, and in all saw the same condition of affairs. Farming property is growing less and less valuable. No one wants to buy lands. The reasons for this are many. In the first place, the farmer here cannot compete with the western farmer. There is for this cause very little grain now raised within our borders. Potatoes bring no price. Butter is selling in the dairy districts at 14 cents and other products are equally low. In a few years you will see most of our present owners tenants. Everywhere we are confronted with the statement that farm lands are depreciating, that sales are infrequent and the industry continually growing less profitable. In many instances mortgage liens upon farms represent their full value, and unencumbered farms are unusual and exceptional. In one of the first agricultural counties we noted forty-six mortgages resting upon farms in five of its principal farming towns. The assessed value of the farms was 75 per cent. of their full value, and the encumbrance aggregated nearly their assessments for purposes of taxation."

Do the hon. gentlemen want more?

Mr. CHARLTON. From what report is that quoted?

Mr. MONTAGUE. From the report of the State Assessors, Messrs. Wood, Ellis and Williams. I will now give the statement of Governor Hill, published a short time ago and made in his inaugural address. He said :

"It seems to be conceded that farming lands during recent years have largely decreased in value, and that the occupation of farming is gradually becoming less profitable than formerly; that the prices for farm products have been greatly and ruinously reduced; that wider and better markets, although much needed, are not forthcoming; that taxes are numerous and oppressive as well as unequally distributed, and that a general depression seems to pervade nearly every agricultural interest."

Mr. FOSTER. That was in his inaugural address?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. In regard to Connecticut, I do not need to adduce evidence here. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made this statement, when he appeared before the electors of Ontario :

"That the average annual reward of the farm proprietor of that State for his expenditure of muscle and brain was $181.31, while the annual wages of the ordinary hired man is $386.35."

The hon. gentleman will remember he used that statement, and it is contained in the Globe's report of the hon. gentleman's speech. And speaking to the farmers to whom he is offering riches by partnership with American farmers, he with astounding consistency said at Chatham as follows :—

"A pleasant state of things, is it not, for the farmers of Ontario to look forward to? How do you like the prospect, any of you, of making about half as much out of your farms as the average wages of your own hired man? How do you like the possibility, as stated by Mr. Colby, President of the Council, of seeing your farms selling for $3, for $5 and for $10 per acre."

In regard to New Jersey, at pages 326 and 330, it is stated in the official report :

"No one will lend money upon the farms of New Jersey, so poor have they become."

In Illinois there are farm mortgages to the amount of $416,000,000, on which there is overdue interest to the amount of $14,242,754. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) talked about chattel mortgages the other night, and declared that we had 6,000 chattel mortgages in twenty-eight counties of Ontario. Those were the figures given to the country by Mr. John Dryden, Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, and he stated that in the twenty-eight counties the number of mortgages to which reference was made amounted to $2,046,345. Upon the same basis you would have for forty-five counties $3,288,773. This would be 12 mills on the dollar upon the property in Ontario liable to chattel mortgage, or about $1.50 per capita of the population. Let the hon. gentleman take the official reports on what is known as the Imperial State of Illinois, the statistics collected by the Labour and Statistical Bureau in 1887, and he will find the following statement :—74,740 chattel mortgages, representing an indebtedness of $20,354,000, with interest unpaid amounting to $2,000,000, or equal to $5.50 per capita as the amount of chattel mortgage indebtedness in that State. I desire to speak for a moment of the State of Ohio, which, it is very well understood, is one of the best agricultural States throughout the Union. In 1888 the mortgages on the farms of that State amounted to $330,990,000, and the interest to $26,000,000 per annum, or only $1,000,000 less than the value of the total wheat crop of the State. I have here the correspondence of Washington Gladen, and at page 316 of the November Forum of 1890 he says :

"In Ohio farms are offered for beggarly rents, and even on these favourable terms farming does not pay. Tenant farmers are throwing up their leases and moving into the city, well content to receive as common labourers $1.25 a day, and to pay such rents and to run such risks of enforced idleness as the change involves."

That is correspondence based on reports from the State of Ohio. In regard to the State of Indiana, I have had personal correspondence with the State Librarian, Mr. Dunn, and I may here state that I and under personal obligation to almost every one of the statistical and agricultural officers of the various States for the prompt manner in which they responded to my call. Mr. Dunn declares in his article in the Political Science Monthly, which he has prepared from official documents, as follows :—

"The increase in farm mortages from 1872 to 1879 was $60,000,000: from 1882 to 1888, $46,000,000, or an increase in thirteen years of $106,000,000."

I need not speak of Michigan, because its report is in the library, and every hon. gentleman can consult it if he wishes. The burden of debt is $129,000,000 in that State, and the interest required annually is $9,000,000, or the value of the product of about 20 acres of each farm in the State. One of my friends who went there, unfortunately from the County of Haldimand, states that the condition of affairs there is as an instance : That to-day they are receiving only $15 or $18 for a first-class animal which in the Province of Ontario, in his old home, would bring from $25 to $30 in the market. I do not give the official figures for Missouri : I give the statement made by Mr. Mansur in the House of Representatives. He says that in his county real estate is worth $1,850,000, that the mortgages are $1,012,000, and that this does not include city, town or village property, and the cause he gives in his speech in the House of Representatives to be as follows :—

"Fat beef, 1½ cents per pound : fat hogs, 3 1-10 cents per pound ; fat shipping cattle, 3 cents ; wheat, 62 cents per bushel, and oats, 14 cents per bushel."

And he asks the House of Representatives if, under these conditions, they can expect anything less than the mortgages and the despair which is coming up from the farmers of Missouri. Now, Sir, I wish for a moment to refer to one State in concluding this part of my subject, and I wish first to refer to one particular county in that State. My hon. friends will remember very well that Mr. McKinley was Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and that committee investigated the condition of agriculture, and of every other industry in every State of the Union. They will find upon page 862 of that report the evidence of the representative of the farmers of York County, Penn. He states there that that county is a splendid county, that its climate is good, that its soil is good, but he states that notwithstanding they are an industrious and practical people, the following is the condition of affairs there to-day :—

"They (the farmers) are not prospering. They are slipping backward year after year instead of gaining. Our wheat sells at a price below the cost of production. It is now 74 to 76 cents, corn 36 to 40 cents. Fattening cattle has declined wonderfully. It is rare for feeders to get market price for corn fed to the stock. Dairying is not remunerative, even when conducted with the most approved machinery and appliances and under the best known system."

What are the facts here, within fifty miles of the capital of the State of Pennsylvania, within a hundred miles of Washington, New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia, those great centres of wealth and commerce and population of that great American Republic? We have here the farmers of the County of York, Pennsylvania, saying that they are slipping backward, that they are going behind ; and yet my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) holds up the flag of hope to the farmers of Ontario, and tells them : You will grow rich by securing partnership in that great sixty million market which lies across the border. Now, Sir, let me say to my hon. friend that the answer I get for all this is : Oh, these people are under protection ; these people are suffering from the same curse as our farmers are suffering from——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And my hon. friend opposite says "hear, hear." That appeals to his intelligence, and to him it is satisfactory. Now, Sir, the hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House might use that argument if to-day they were free traders, the hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House might use that argument if they were Cobdenites, but instead they are Wimanites. What does the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) say in reply to this condition of affairs in the United States. He says : We are going to make our farmers rich by having the sixty million market across the border. I say to him : Yes, but these farmers in the United States are poorer than our Canadian farmers are ; and his answer is : Yes, of course, because they are suffering from higher protection than we are. That may be a reasonable position, but I am bound to say that if there is no other reason than that for the contention the hon. gentleman ought never to have made it in this House. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) smiles ; he smiles because we are being ruined by the McKinley Bill, he smiles because we have not got a market across the border, and because there is a duty upon Canadian produce going in there ; he smiles because our farmers are kept out of that market and their prices reduced, because, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright says : We have got to pay the duty upon every bushel of grain and upon every article we send to the United States. The same hon. gentleman took a very wonderful quantity of pains in 1878 to prove conclusively that it was the Americans who paid that duty, as his farmer pic-nic speeches will prove ; that it was not us ; that we had nothing to do with it ; that it did not lower our prices here, but that it was the poor Americans across the border who paid these duties in order to secure the products which the Canadian farmer had to spare. It was not the inconsistency of any argument that I was making at which the hon. gentleman was smiling ; it was a smile when he thought of the occasion when he used those arguments in the sweet gone by. Now, Sir, let me say that it is a pleasure to turn to the condition of the farmers of Canada. There is no doubt about it that they have had some bad crops, and that they are in some places suffering from the effect of these bad crops ; but, Sir, what evidence has the hon. gentleman offered as to any serious condition among the farmers of Ontario? When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pictured the farmers as ruined and decayed, the hon. gentleman who sits in front of me asked : Where does it exist? And, in his usual style, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) answered : Everywhere. Now, Sir, I have followed the hon. gentleman, in mind, of course, and through the newspapers, in his tour in the Province of Ontario, and I am bound to say that the hon. gentleman was just as cautious then as he is now. Speaking at Renfrew, he said to the farmers there, when he talked about stagnation and ruin :

"I do not mean to say it is in this part of the country."

I quote the exact words, and I have the speeches here, although it is not necessary to read them, and I will not. In Guelph, he said to the farmers:

"I do not say you are so affected here, but you are very exceptionally situated."

In Oxford, the county which he himself represents, and he will remember it very well, he said:

"You are so situated as to feel it less than almost any other part of our people."

At Oakwood, in the constituency of my hon. friend from South Victoria (Mr. Fairbairn), one of the most prosperous places on the face of God's earth to-day, a place where magnificent farm mansions are rising up on every hand—and I venture to say that the hon. gentleman, when he looked upon the prosperity that was existing among the farmers there, had not the heart to tell them that they were impoverished and going to ruin—he said:

"He would not presume to speak of the condition of the farmers there, but pointed elsewhere."

Mr. Speaker, there is some author who says: "He is a wise prophet who places the date of the fulfilment of his prophecy at a time sufficiently distant that he may not live to see his own confusion;" and so, Sir, he is a wise preacher of despair who places the situation, the locality of that despair and of that ruin, at a distance sufficiently great that the evidence may not be confronting him in the audience, or in the newspapers of the section, of the falsity of these statements which he makes. Now, Sir, in reference to what the hon. gentleman said as to decrease of population, I might point to statements made by my friends here that the population was decreasing in the various States of the Union, not only in the old States, but in some of the newer and some of the more recently populated States. Once more I turn, however, to a time when the hon. gentleman was smiling in power, and I see from what he stated about the depopulation of the older districts in Ontario that what is occurring is just exactly what the hon. gentleman, in the cooler moments of office, said would occur, without any degree of want of prosperity existing in this country. This is the Budget speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—a very handy document—delivered in 1874, when the hon. gentleman was Minister of Finance. He said:

"I find, Sir, on looking over the returns for the Province of Ontario, the largest and most populous province of the Dominion, that out of the 88 electoral districts into which it is divided there were only 35 in which the increase was 10 per cent. during the ten years. Precisely the same thing has occurred, under the same conditions, in the great State of New York and other States of the Union, which are in the most highly prosperous condition. I am, therefore, justified in warning the House that, so far as regards the older provinces of the Dominion, we ought not to look for any very large increase of population."

That, Sir, is on page 18 of the Budget speech of 1874, delivered by the hon. knight from South Oxford. With regard to the hon. gentleman's exodus, I shall not say very much. The hon. gentleman referred to it, and re-referred to it; he opened his speech with it and closed with it; he made several divisions in his speech, and in each he had a little interlude on that subject. So lovingly did he dwell upon it and so often did he return to it that I was strongly reminded of the words of Oliver Goldsmith—I must apologize for entering the domain of poetry, which belongs to my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)—when, in the "Deserted Village," he said:

"I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return, and die at home at last."

Mr. Speaker, when the day comes for my hon. friend to depart from the scene—which I trust may be long hence, because our great public men are going too fast—the enterprising anatomist who examines his vital parts will find on the innermost walls of the innermost chamber of the hon. gentleman's heart a picture of some poor National Policy-burdened Canadian fleeing from a 30 per cent. tariff here to enrich himself under a 60 per cent. tariff in the hon. gentleman's Beulah land across the border. My hon. friend, referring to the hon. gentlemen who come from the Province of Manitoba and from the North-West Territories, says: "I do not blame these people in the western provinces of our Dominion, for they are fellow-sufferers with ourselves." Looking at the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), at my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Ross), as well as at my good-natured and able friend who sits on the other side, and who, unfortunately, is too strong in his constituency, I say that these hon. gentlemen are not here to admit that they are fellow-sufferers with anybody in this Dominion. There is not a man of them who will rise up in this House and say that the people of Manitoba will trade positions with the people of any other part of the American continent. There is not a man of them who will stand up and say that he has anything to tell but a story of ever-widening acres, of multiplying towns and villages, of increasing numbers of homes dotting the prairies from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains. When the hon. gentleman talks about suffering in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West he cannot produce a single agricultural paper, or any paper published between Winnipeg and the sea, he cannot point to a single petition brought down to this House, which will show the people of Manitoba and the North-West to be anything but a happy, prosperous and contented people, satisfied with the present and ever hopeful for the future. Now, Sir, my hon. friend from South Brant said that he hoped that the people who had gone away in the exodus had gone to the end of the earth and were now returning. Well, Sir, I do not know whether or not they went to the end of the earth, but they went very near to it, to a place called Dakota; and I am happy to be able to inform the hon. gentleman, that having got very near to the end of the earth, they are returning, and that already this year one thousand of them—people originally from the counties of Kent, and Elgin, and Lambton, and Middlesex, drawn from the country by the wail and cry of the press of hon. gentlemen opposite—have left the despair and ruin in Dakota, and have come to be "fellow-sufferers" in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Now, Sir, I want for a moment to correct some of the figures which the hon. member for South Oxford has given to this House. I do not pretend to have a special knowledge of trade or finance. I look to hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for South Oxford to give us this information; and when that hon. gentleman rose in his place and told us that the foreign trade of this country was decreasing I accepted the statement without any question whatever. I was, it is true, too credulous; but at the same time, Sir, I did actually accept that statement as correct, as many through the length and breadth of the Province of Ontario will accept it. Sir, what is the statement? The hon. gentleman took from the Trade and Navigation Returns seven out of some fourteen or fifteen countries with which we trade: he took five countries with which our trade had actually decreased: whether by mistake or with pretended fairness, he took two countries with which our trade had slightly increased: but he omitted to take the others with which our trade had increased during the years of which he spoke from 50 to 1,000 per cent. He spoke of France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Holland, Newfoundland and the West Indies: but he forgot to mention South America, where our trade has increased $300,000: Belgium, where it has increased 150 per cent.: China and Japan, where it has increased 50 per cent.: Germany, where it has increased 700 per cent.: and Australia, where it has increased 1,000 per cent. during the same period of time: and, Mr. Speaker, it is due to this House that the hon. gentleman should tell us why he did that. It is due to the junior members of the House, it is due to the members behind him, that he should say whether it was in error or intentionally that he quoted those figures which showed a decrease and did not quote those which showed an increase. Then, Sir, he left out another increase, the greatest increase of all—the increase of our trade with Great Britain, which, from 1878 to 1890, increased from $33,743,000 to $48,353,000. And he did all this, Sir, without regard to the fact that at the same time our trade with the United States had decreased from $42,000,000 to something like $40,000,000. The following table from the Trade and Navigation Returns shows our exports in 1873 and 1890:—

EXPORTS FROM CANADA.

Great Britain.....	$33,743,000	$48,353,000
United States.....	42,072,000	40,522,000
Germany.....	76,000	507,000
Belgium.....	17,000	41,000
South America.....	1,285,000	1,551,000
China and Japan....	46,000	61,000
Australia.....	41,000	471,000
Other countries.....	277,000	695,000

Now, let me say the condition of Ontario is not such as the hon. gentleman would have us believe it to be. Mr. Davidson, the President of the Board of Trade of Toronto, in his annual address, says:

"We rejoice in the fact that during the last year the agricultural interest in Ontario was sensibly improved. * * * The crops reached an all-round good average, and demand for them was active at fair prices."

Mr. Davidson goes on to speak further, and I will hand his remarks to the Hansard——

Mr. LAURIER. I object. That is contrary to the rules of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will read a portion of his remarks. I know I am wearying the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LAURIER. I simply rise to remind the hon. gentleman that it has always been understood that nothing should go into the Hansard but what has been spoken on the floor of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am sure that my pleasant friend, the hon. leader of the Opposition, rises, not with the object of interfering——

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, no: we like your speech better than your figures.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend looks very wise: he endeavours to convey the impression that he has an idea. I may apply to him the language of another poet:

"His wit invites you by his looks to come,
But when you knock you find there's no one home."

Mr. Davidson goes on to say that the Ontario farmer makes a much larger profit than does his American neighbour, and he proves this statement by a table which gives the average yield per acre for the last eight years, and which shows that upon the articles he mentions the farmers of Ontario have had over a million dollars of advantage over the farmers of the United States. I shall not read the table, because it would take too long. Mr. Cox, the President of the Bank of Commerce, and not a supporter of the Government, but a gentleman who ran as a candidate under the auspices of the hon. member for South Oxford, speaking at the annual meeting of the Bank of Commerce, said:

"There are unmistakable evidences of prosperity which anyone can understand."

Once more, Mr. Walker, the General Manager of the Bank of Commerce, says:

"During the past year the farmers of Ontario paid their implement notes and interests on mortgages and instalments quite as promptly as in former years, and in some districts they paid much more promptly than before."

Again, Mr. Hague, the Manager of the Merchants Bank—and no one can be better posted on the condition of the country than a bank manager—says——

Mr. MULOCK. Give us the farmers' opinion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is a lawyer farmer who sits in his law office in Toronto and weeps over the condition of the farmers. I say there can be no better authority on the condition of the country than the bank managers, because the banks come not only in direct contact with the farmers in the payment of those notes, but also in direct contact daily with the people who depend on the farmers for their sustenance and support. Mr. Hague says:

"I cannot share in the opinion held by some that the farmers of Canada, as a whole, are suffering. They are undoubtedly having a trying experience in some districts, but in many others they have done well and are prospering. Bank deposits are a plain proof of that. The manner in which farmers live is another proof of it. The continuous increase in cattle, horses, sheep and all the appliances of prosperous farming is apparent in many parts of the country."

Mr. Gooderham, President of the Bank of Toronto, says:

"The crops were only fair, but enhanced prices were obtained. The cheese industry was, I am happy to say, prosperous. The production and export was the largest in the history of the trade. The prices were good, and the farmers, factory men and dealers all made money. The export of cattle was very active, and the number exported far in excess of any previous year. Prices were good. Farmers and feeders both did well."

Professor Shaw, of the Agricultural College, a Liberal, who comes from the constituency of my hon. friend from South Wentworth (Mr. Carpenter), and who to-day is Mr. Mowat's right-hand man in the Agricultural College of Ontario, shows by a table, which I will not read, as it will take too long, that, on the article of pork alone, the farmers of Ontario are gaining $1,000,000 a year more than they would have gained had they secured the prices which rule in the corresponding parts of the United States. My hon. friend smiles, but he knows very well that Mr. Shaw is not a partisan of this Government.

Mr. LAURIER. I am smiling at the idea of your sending a Commissioner to the United States to obtain a treaty of reciprocity in natural products.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If my hon. friend will permit me, I will deal with that point a little later on. The Globe of 6th June has the following article:—

"Thursday was the 4th of June and the crucial day in the dry goods trade. But to many it proved the most satisfactory experienced for years. It is generally thought that if 75 per cent. of the dry goods paper is taken up at this date it is satisfactory, but this year 95 per cent. was the experience of one leading house of this city—the best 4th of June they ever had."

Then, Sir, the business of banks themselves offer the same criterion. We learn from Mr. Cox that during the year the Bank of Commerce had its interest-bearing deposits increased by $5,000,000. The Bank of Montreal has had its interest-bearing deposits increased, and its shareholders, with $18,000,000 invested in the country, are satisfied with the present and hopeful of the future. The profits of all the banks have been, I notice, no less than $3,500,000. What is another test? Another test is the amount of life insurance effected in the country; because the people who are impoverished do not increase their life insurance policies. In 1877 the hon. gentleman said, during the Budget debate, that the amount of life insurance was a fair test—or words to that effect—of the prosperity of the people. Well, in 1879 the amount of life insurance in force in this country was about $86,000,000, and in 1890 the people had become so poor that they were only able to insure to the extent of $218,000,000; and while the life insurance effected during the year 1879 was $11,000,000, in 1888 our people had become so poor that they were only able to insure during that year to the extent of $40,000,000. Let me for a moment read the condition of the country, as presented in the different board of trade reports. The President of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg says:

"I am fully satisfied the trade of the country is in a very healthy state."

The Toronto and Hamilton Boards of Trade say the same thing. The hon. member for South Brant did not deal very much with this blue ruin cry. I looked through his speech carefully and listened to it carefully, and could not find that he said much about it. Why, if the hon. gentleman had told us his sentiments, he would have told us that he represents a constituency in which is situated a city, than which there is no more prosperous city on the continent of America to-day. I am proud to be his neighbour in that respect, and I am proud to see that the Board of Trade of Brantford says:

"The statistics of the city show an increase of over half a million dollars in the assessed value of property, arising chiefly from the fact that there has been a general advance made in the value of real estate for assessment purposes. Nowhere do merchants enjoy a more general prosperity."

And I ask the hon. gentleman if the merchants of the city of Brantford are enjoying greater prosperity than those of anywhere else; and if they do, I am fair in drawing the inference that the artizans, farmers and others who trade with the merchants have not become those serfs and slaves, and have not been reduced to that wretched condition in which the hon. member for South Oxford represents them to be. Let me, Sir, in the light of the facts I have cited, and after listening to the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, read a few words, and only a few, from the columns of the Globe, in what I venture to believe is a fitting comment thereon, written a few years ago:

"Mistrust all figures professing to show that Canada has retrograded instead of advancing. Avoid association with the teachers of despair; old men who, with worn-out powers, assert that national suicide is the only course of national salvation, may be excused by consideration of their senility, but young men who echo their doleful refrain can never seem otherwise than contemptible."

That is the opinion of the Toronto Globe about those who preach of retrogression, and despair, and ruin in the Province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada. Could comment be more fitting? Now, the hon. gentleman from South Oxford did not, in this House, state his causes for the ruin which he depicted as existing among the farmers of Ontario. He did, however, condescend to be more specific in the constituencies where he addressed meetings on this question. I have his speeches here; and at Pembroke, I think it was, he told the people they were suffering from this ruin because of two causes: First, because of high taxation; next, because of excessive competition. I shall not deal with the question of high taxation, because the hon. gentleman, a few moments later on, said that our taxation is very nearly that of the United States, and consequently I do not see any relief to be gained by joining hands with a people who, according to the hon. member for South Oxford, are taxed as highly as we are, and who, according to the records of the past few years, are taxed a great deal more than we are. But I will refer to the question of excessive competition. The hon. gentleman put a problem. It appears to me, he said, that the problem is: Given five millions of people in half a continent, how shall they make a living? And he solved it in this way, according to his policy: "Multiply the sphere of their operations by two and their competition by twelve." The hon. gentleman had a much more serious problem which was troubling his spirit at the time, and that was: Given a few disgruntled and disjointed politicians and a million farmers, how are the gentlemen to get into power? The hon. gentleman has not solved this last problem yet. He says we are suffering from intense competition, and yet the relief he offers us is to join hands with a people who raise $150,000,000 worth of breadstuffs more than they require for their own use, who raise provisions and meat to the extent of $135,000,000 more than they consume, who have annually live stock to the value of $32,240,000 worth more than they require. In other words, he says we are suffering from intense competition, and then asks us to get rid of it by joining hands with a people who raise enough for themselves and $400,000,000 worth to spare—$400,000,000 worth which they are compelled to send to the lands beyond the sea. I am bound to say that, if the hon. gentleman considers that the only solution of the difficulty, he had better return to the proposition he made in Fergus in 1878. I want to refer for a moment to a calculation which the hon. gentleman made. I do not refer to it seriously, because it does not need serious consideration from this House; and I say that with due respect to the hon. gentleman. The calculation was something like this : Give us this policy, and from one million horses we should receive $37 each additional, or $37,000,000 in all, as an addition to the wealth of our farmers. Given twenty-two million acres of land and the increased value would give us, at $10 per acre, he says, $220,000,000 of an increase in the value of land in the Province of Ontario under his policy of Unrestricted Reciprocity. This is a statement which should not have been made by the hon. gentleman, but which might fittingly have been made by Colonel Sellers in the celebrated "Gilded Age." If the hon. gentleman has a magic wand by which he can produce wealth in that way he should use his power for those poor distressed farmers in the various portions of the United States of America, and should tell them how, with a market of 60,000,000 people, he is going to increase their land in value, which, as we know, is gradually lessening in price. The hon. gentleman referred to the question of a market, and he said that dealing with all the foreign markets except the United States was an utter fallacy ; and speaking of the trade which was likely to be interfered with between Canada and Great Britain, he called it "a paltry fraction of insignificant trade." These smaller markets may be more or less valuable, but we know at all events that the great and prosperous nation with which he asks us to join hands is stretching out its hands in endeavouring to secure those markets of which the hon. gentleman speaks so contemptuously. Let me tell him that nothing but a feeling of hostility to everything British, even to a British market, could induce him to say that our trade with Great Britain which is likely to be interfered with is "a paltry fraction of insignificant trade." In 1890 Great Britain took $48,353,690 of our products, while the United States only took $40,522,810, and, while the trade with the United States has been greatly lessened, the market of Great Britain has been increasing in its demands for our products. That market is almost unlimited in its requirements. In Great Britain they require annually 110,000,000 lbs. of fresh beef, 55,000,000 lbs. of canned meats, which we can produce, 6,500,000 lbs. of other meats, 106,000,000 lbs. of lard, 117,000,000 lbs. of tallow, 189,000,000 lbs. of butter, 203,000,000 lbs. of cheese, 427,000,000 lbs. of ham and bacon, 26,000,000 lbs. of salted beef, and 140,000,000 cwt. of breadstuffs, as well as $16,000,000 worth of eggs, all of which classes of goods we can supply, and supply well. The hon. gentleman says this is all prospective. A few years ago gentlemen spoke of the cattle trade in the same terms, but we find that the export of cattle, which twelve years ago amounted to only $500,000, in 1890 amounted to $7,000,000. A few years ago men like the hon. gentleman sneered at the cheese trade with Great Britain, but to-day we are exporting cheese to the value of $9,349,731 per annum. Then, of the great butter trade with the British islands Canada can be relied upon to supply a great portion, and that with great advantage to the farmers of Canada. While the hon. gentleman is preaching blue ruin in this House to the farmers of Ontario, his friends in the Provincial Government are doing the opposite. They are doing their best to induce the farmers, to instruct the farmers, to produce an article of butter of a quality which will find acceptability in the markets of Great Britain. They have appointed their dairy commissioner, who is instructing the people everywhere throughout the province how to manufacture an article which is best appreciated in those markets. While the hon. gentleman is minimizing the value of this trade here his friend the Hon. Mr. Mowat—and it is to his credit—is instructing the farmers how to open up the market for butter in Great Britain. The hon. gentleman wails about the McKinley Bill, but the agricultural college which is run by his Ontario friends, in Guelph is progressing, and Mr. Shaw, the professor in that college, has recently written an article for the press in which he shows that there is room for an export of $9,000,000 worth of lambs from Canada to Great Britain. In that he says there is a prospect of wealth for the farmers of Ontario. He has recently written an article for the press referring to trial shipments and to their success—an article in which he says the farmers of this country may sell to British consumers, if they will raise them, 1,000,000 lambs annually, that will bring $9 per head. This trade with Great Britain is that to which my hon. friend refers as "a paltry fraction of insignificant trade." If he will read the American reports, if he would attend the meetings of American stock associations or agricultural societies, he would find that the great point of discussion is how they shall be prepared to send to the British isles the great classes of products which that country requires. He asks how that trade will be interfered with? In the first place, we are likely to endanger the whole of the great cattle trade we have with that country. The hon. gentleman may say that we can keep up the quarantine regulations between this country and the United States in the same way as those regulations are kept up between the different States. That may be true ; but the hon. gentleman knows that there is a great jealousy on the part of the British stock-raiser in regard to the cattle imports. He knows that it is only with great care and great management that we have been able to keep up that trade with Great Britain ; but, if we were to turn our back on the mother country, and to discriminate in favour of the United States, the result would undoubtedly be that an embargo would be placed on Canadian cattle as upon the cattle of the United States and according to Mr. Dodge, the eminent statistician of the American Government, that would involve a loss to Canadian cattle-producers of from $10 to $15 per head upon all the cattle sold by them in the British markets. The hon. gentleman has admitted in this House, as he did in the country, that he would discriminate against the mother land, and his reason was that the discrimination could not be avoided. Why could it not be avoided? Surely matters of revenue would not bother him. He sweeps away by the motion in your hand, Sir, almost every vestige of the revenue of this country, and yet he says we have to discriminate against Great Britain because we cannot avoid it. What is the reason? It can only be because that policy will be dictated by the American Union, and we would have to come to the American terms. The same reason, I think I shall be able to show, would render it unavoidable that we should have a union of tariffs between these two countries. I shall not deal with the question of discrimination at length, but I say that the hon. gentleman has no voice in favour of discrimination from the Province of Ontario, except from a very few constituencies. In few constituencies indeed did the people vote directly upon their policy as defined by the hon. gentleman. Here it was announced as free trade, there it was unrestricted reciprocity, and elsewhere it was commercial union; and up in the constituency of Algoma his public speakers there called it partially unrestricted reciprocity. I also find that the Globe, just before the election, said that unrestricted reciprocity meant unrestricted reciprocity restricted only by the views of those who framed the measure. I also find that on 13th February the Globe stated that full and sufficient notice would be given of every change the Liberals might make in this respect, and that they and the Republican leaders would no doubt arrive at unrestricted reciprocity "only by steps and stages." In other words, unrestricted reciprocity, that is, unrestricted reciprocity restricted by the opinion of those who are making the negotiations, immediate unrestricted reciprocity that is to be introduced by steps and stages. Sir, surely there is nothing indefinite about that. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. gentleman that he has not voiced the opinion of the farmers of Ontario in favour of discrimination against Great Britain. Let him turn to the reports of the Central Farmers' Institute, and he will find that it was impossible to carry a resolution in that Institute which in any way looked towards discrimination against Great Britain in our trade. The hon. gentleman turned to gentlemen on this side of the House and said: "When you object to discrimination against Great Britain you are bastard loyalists,"—it is not a very nice term, but it was the term the hon. gentleman used. Sir, we are not the first to refuse to discriminate against Great Britain. When the hon. gentleman was in power he sent his ambassador to Washington, and he must have agreed to the policy of the Cabinet of which his friend Mr. Mackenzie was Premier, who, when he spoke on this question, declared that it was one of the conditions that no advantage should be given to the Government of the United States that was not given to Great Britain. And when he applies the term "bastard loyalists" to men who say they will not discriminate against Great Britain, it recoils upon his own head and upon the head of a much abler man than himself, who once took a prominent part in the affairs of this country, and who occupies still a prominent place in the hearts of its people, and who now sits enfeebled by his side. Now, I want for one moment to refer to another subject, partly in defence of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon). There was a discussion between the hon. member for South Brant and my hon. friend from Albert. When my hon. friend was discussing Imperial trade, the hon. member for Brant exclaimed: "Oh, you are Imperial Federationists; the policy of the Government is Imperial federation." Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, I believe, is a member of the Imperial Federation League, and I have no hesitation in saying that I am a humble member of the league myself. I am a member of the league, not because I believe in the probable early fulfilment of the fonder hopes of those who are its more enthusiastic members, but I am a member because the wide principle on which that league is based, the principle which guided its formation and dictates its policy, is the principle of drawing closer and stronger the bonds which bind together the various portions of this great Empire—or better, let me say drawing closer the sisterhood of nations that nestle now in the shelter of British greatness and British power. But my hon. friend did not discuss Imperial federation; he discussed Imperial trade; and I venture to say there is no man in this House who will declare that a trade league with the United Empire would not be advantageous to the people of this country. What would it do? Sir, it would do this: with the minimum of disadvantage to our national industries, it would give our farmers the very greatest advantage that they could hope to enjoy in any market. Unlike commercial union with the United States, instead of giving us a market that is already crowded it would give us a market which demands a great deal more than we can supply; and unlike commercial union, too, instead of making less strong the ties which bind us to the Empire it would increase and strengthen those bonds which unite the Britain across the sea with what we hope will be the greater Britain on this side of the Atlantic. Well, when my hon. friend discussed that question he discussed the question simply of Imperial trade, the advantage of which any one can see in this House or in this country. It must, Sir, be evident to all, that this House could perform no better service than promoting such a league with the mother country. My hon. friend said to the Minister of Finance: You have been indefinite in stating your policy. Well, Sir, I do not think there is any very grave indefiniteness in the policy of this Government. As I understand it, we believe that there is a wild extravagance in the claims of so great advantage to be gained by this country under the unrestricted reciprocity—I mean the claims made by hon. gentlemen opposite; at the same time, we are not bound to any particular name or to any particular designation. We know that there are matters of great concern between these two countries. There are matters in question which should be settled, matters of long standing dispute. We know also there are advantages which we could secure, and for which we in return would give them advantages in our market. We know this, and hence we are pleased that the matter is likely to be referred to a commission to settle certain questions in dispute and to arrange if possible a mutual trade between the two countries. Let me say that we on this side of the House are not hostile to the people of the United States; we are perfectly aware that concessions must be made, and we are willing that the Government shall make the concessions, as long as they do not make concessions for which we get no corresponding concessions in return. That is the policy of this Government, I believe, and it should be the policy of any Government that hopes to hold the confidence of this House and the confidence of the people of this country. Mr. Rusk, the Secretary of Agriculture in the American Government, said in a recent speech:

"So far as reciprocity means 'never give something for nothing' I favour it; whenever it is evident that a treaty of reciprocity means the benefit of the large part of the American people I agree to it, and whenever it is evident that reciprocity with this or that country, or in this or that product, would injure any industry of that larger part of our people, I am against it. I am for America first, last and all the time."

That, Sir, I claim should be the policy, substituting the word Canada for America, to a large extent, of the people of this country. First, the hon. gentleman says we on this side of the House do not want a reciprocity treaty. Now, I say that the history of the past shows that we have never been opposed to an honourable arrangement between these two Governments of the questions in dispute, and of the questions in regard to trade. He says, again: We cannot get it; and he uses that word in a manner that is born almost of actual knowledge. Now, why can we not get it? This is a matter of international agreement. Has the hon. gentleman offered, like another individual (Mr. Farrer), advice at Washington which he knows has been accepted as to how to drive Canada to her knees? Has the hon. gentleman positive knowledge upon that question? What is his reason? How does he know that the people on the other side of the line are not willing to trade with this country? If they are willing to negotiate with hon. gentlemen opposite and not willing to negotiate with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House they are interfering with the domestic affairs of this country in a manner which any gentleman upon either side of this House will resent. On the other hand, what is their reason for refusing, if they have any? Their reason is, that they believe that hon. gentlemen opposite will give them very much better terms than hon. gentlemen upon this side, and that is the very reason why the people of this country should not trust hon. gentlemen opposite to carry on the negotiations. He says his party can do it. Well, I think the hon. gentleman was in power between 1873 and 1879. He sent a negotiator to Washington. That gentleman proposed a fair and honourable treaty, so fair that some of his own friends objected to it most strongly. Does the hon. gentleman intend to go still further? Does he intend to give them more advantages and more money—because he offered them then to give up the result of the arbitration upon our fisheries, which yielded us $5,000,000—does the hon. gentleman intend to give them more advantages than he did under the offer made by Mr. Brown, the plenipotentiary of this Dominion to Washngton? Now, let me say that the reason given in the country why we could not get a more extended trade arrangement was a very unfair reason; the reason given by the hon. gentleman was, that we, upon this side of the House, were hostile to the people of the United States. The hon. gentleman from South Oxford said that we had pursued an "insolent and a hostile policy." Let me tell the hon. gentleman that we have pursued no such policy. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), down in Port Perry, grew, according to the Globe, wonderfully eloquent and vehement when he denounced the policy of this Government, which had estranged from us the people of the United States. I need not say to him, in the light of the facts, that we, as a party, and particularly this Government, have never done one single thing which should disturb the cordial relations that exist between this country and the people of the United States. We have endeavoured to trade with them, we have endeavoured to be friends with them, we have endeavoured to live alongside of them in neighbourly relations, as becomes the two great daughters of a still greater mother, and if the people on the other side of the line refuse to trade with us upon the ground that we have shown hostility, it is only because other gentlemen on the other side of the line have, by their speeches, sown the seeds of incorrect knowledge and information regarding this country among the people of the United States. If the policy of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is indefinite, what is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? The hon. member for South Oxford, in his amendment, proposes:

"That the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artizans, miners, fishermen and farmers; and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next, should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured as well as natural products."

What is that policy? Is it unrestricted reciprocity, or is it commercial union, or is it what the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) called a fair and honourable treaty. It looks to me like a resolution on which the hon. gentleman could go to the people of Ontario and say, as he did say, he did intend to discriminate. It looks to me like a resolution with which the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) could go to the people of his county and say he did not intend to discriminate. It looks like a resolution with which the leader of the Opposition could go to the country and declare he intended to take down the Custom-houses; and with which the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) could say he did not intend to take down the Custom-houses. It looks to me like a resolution on which one man might declare it meant one thing, and another man might declare it meant another thing, and a third man, hard pressed, might say it meant nothing at all. We have been challenged by the great organ of hon. gentlemen opposite to look at the unity prevailing in their ranks. Let me read a description of that party from the Toronto Globe:

"The party of to-day, the party of the future, is that which moves with hope high and head erect and banner flung behind Laurier and Cartwright, and Mills, and Charlton, and Davies, and Paterson, and Mulock, and Mowat, and Hardy, and Ross, and Fraser, and Mercier, and Langelier, and Joly, and Scriver, and Blair, and Fielding, and Greenway"——

And, Mr. Speaker, what breath I have after repeating all those conjunctions is taken away by the announcement which follows—

"and under the sympathetic eye of Edward Blake."

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair before dinner I had detained the House much longer than I had expected to detain it. I ask the pardon of hon. members for having done so, and I promise that, in offering a few remarks at the close of my speech, I will not occupy very long the attention of hon. gentlemen, who have been kind enough to return, notwithstanding the long speech to which they listened before dinner. I wish at the outset to say that in dealing with the question of the volume of trade in the country I did not refer to one point to which I desired to refer, and which I believe should be referred to in this House, in consequence of a statement made, not only in this House, but in the country, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). When that hon. gentleman referred, in this House, to the volume of trade between 1888 and, 1890 making the remark that it has decreased up to 1889, he qualified that statement by saying that he would not charge the Government with having caused that decrease. Although the hon. gentleman made that qualification in this House, I speak with a certain knowledge of his speeches made throughout the Province of Ontario when I say he did not make that qualifying statement when he made his statement before the electors, who did not understand, like hon. members of this House do, all the intricacies of that question. The hon. gentleman, dealing with the trade question during the election campaign, said this: that in 1873 we had $217,000,000 as the volume of trade, and that in 1889 it has actually decreased from the amount in 1873. The hon. gentleman made no qualifying statement; the hon. gentleman did not state in his election speeches that we could not exactly measure the prosperity of the country upon that principle or basis, as he said in this House. He left it to be inferred by the people that under the National Policy, and under the rule of this country by hon. members on this side of the House, our industries had so declined that the volume of trade had decreased. He forgot to say to the people that the whole decrease had occurred under his own administration. Not only did he do that, but when speaking at one place in Ontario he referred to the fact that we had stated that our policy was somewhat of a British policy, and he referred to that circumstance in these terms:

"Such men's loyalty I rate at its true value. It is exactly on a par with the 35 per cent. over-proof loyalty of that ring of manufacturers whose loyalty has resulted in a tariff which in 16 years has cut down our importations from Great Britain from $68,000,000 on a population of 3,757,000 to $42,000,000 on an alleged population of 5,000,000—a loyalty that is yet so fervent that it will not permit you to trade with the United States, lest you should discriminate against British goods."

Let me say to the hon. gentleman and his followers that this is a most unfair statement to make in the country before the people, who do not understand practically the details and intricacies of this question. It is true that up to this time there had been a decrease, but that decrease had occurred between 1873-79, when hon. gentlemen were themselves in power. The increase had taken place, as the increase in the whole volume had taken place, during the time when hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were controlling the destinies of the country. Let me state the figures:

TOTAL TRADE.

1873	217,801,203
1879	153,456,682
1890	217,697,390

BRITISH TRADE.

1879	30,903,130

Showing that the decrease is under the rule of the hon. member for South Oxford—the great increase has been made since his defeat. So much was this made of in Ontario that I met on the platform in South Victoria a gentleman who declared that the imports of a country were a test of its civilization, that under the National Policy the imports must naturally decrease, and consequently the civilization of the country would go backward. If that be so, under the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, the imports having decreased 25 per cent., and if the imports of a country constitute the test of its civilization, we have only to have 20 years rule of hon. gentlemen opposite when the trade of this country would not only be ruined, but we would become aborigines instead of civilized beings. I desire to refer again to a question which I touched upon before recess, and I will only touch upon it very briefly. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech in this House, declared that it was the first principle of the National Policy to discriminate against Great Britain. The hon. gentleman forgot to mention one single article on which we have imposed duties against Great Britain greater than those against the United States. As a matter of fact, we make no discrimination whatever, and the hon. gentleman knew that very well. Upon this question of discrimination I wish to read two or three extracts, and I do not wish to make any comments whatever. I am not here to challenge the loyalty of any man. I am here to say that his loyalty is a matter that a man must reconcile as between himself, his conscience and his God. But I am here to present facts to this House, to read to hon. gentlemen their speeches and the speeches of those with whom they are associated, and leave it to the House and the country to draw their own inferences and conclusions. On the question of discrimination I find the following despatch from Lord Knutsford to the Governor General, dated 25th November, 1890:

"Any reciprocity would, as previously, be framed so as not to place imports from this country at a disadvantage, and it is presumed, of course, that Canada would wish to retain control of her own tariff, with a view to possible extension of her trade with the colonies and England."

That is the voice of England. Here is an extract from the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in this House:

"I am here as a Canadian representative to advise the Queen of Canada what is best for the interests of the people of Canada, and if it is best in the interests of Canada, it will be her duty to take that advice. Let us understand this question and thresh it out. For my part, I would rather see an ounce of loyalty in the people of Canada than a ton of this windy, worthless, spurious, bastard loyalty of these 35 per cent. loyalists."

That is extract No. 2. Extract No. 3 is one from the Toronto Globe of 4th February, 1891, published in the face of the general elections in this country. Speaking of discriminations it says:

"This policy will be persisted in, whatever the ultimate consequences may be."

Extract No. 4 is from the speech of Mr. Erastus Wiman, the erstwhile leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, who declared:

"It is said England would not agree to this scheme, even if Canadians desired it. If so, then England might have on hand another Boston Tea Party."

I think, Sir, that these extracts should go together upon the pages of Hansard, in order that hon. gentlemen, as well as the people of the country, may understand exactly how these gentlemen stand upon the question. Now, Sir, I think that hon. gentlemen opposite stated for the pleasure of the House—I think that my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated—that it was with them not at all a question of coming into power, that it was not a question of being anxious to secure place and patronage in this Dominion, but it was simply a question of principle, and a question of the advancement of the best interests of the large majority of the people of this country. I should like to be able to thoroughly appreciate that largeness of soul, and that disinterestedness of nature, which makes hon. gentlemen opposite so chivalrous in this particular. When these gentlemen speak about a matter of principle, I ask them if there ever was in this country a party who were more willing to change their principles upon a moment's notice for the purpose of getting into power than the party composed of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, Sir, in 1887 they were Protectionists. The Hon. Mr. Blake, who was then their leader, declared that the manufacturers need not be afraid of him; and in order to show that the financial head of this Cabinet that was about to be formed in his own imagination had the same feeling, Mr. Blake declared that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and himself had a general agreement upon that question. In the fall of 1887 the hon. gentlemen opposite were commercial unionists, their candidates were commercial union candidates, their newspaper was a commercial union newspaper, and column after column of the Toronto Globe was occupied in advocating commercial union between this country and the United States. And then, Sir, after failing with commercial union we find then adopting unrestricted reciprocity, or rather, they changed the name of their policy to unrestricted reciprocity. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who I am sorry to see is not in his seat just now, is very fond of quoting extracts from Lowell's Bigelow papers to this House, and I trust that I may be permitted to quote an extract from Bigelow which may apply to hon. gentlemen opposite:

"As for principles; I ain't got nothing of the sort;
I ain't a Whig, I ain't a Tory,
I'm just an office seeker in short."

And I may further refer to the language of John Randolph, who once said to his opponents in the American Senate:

"Principles—the hon. gentlemen have seven principles: five loaves and two fishes."

I may say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that just before recess I had dealt with the amendment which the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had moved to the resolution which had been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, by the Minister of Finance. I wish to speak a few moments further upon that amendment and upon other matters which bear upon it. I have read an extract to the House which I fear some gentlemen did not hear, and which I hope I may have the privilege of reading again, because it deals particularly with what follows in this same argument:

"The party of to-day, the party of the future, is that which moves with hope high and head erect and banners flying behind Laurier, and Cartwright, and Mills, and Charlton, and Davies, and Paterson, and Mulock, and Mowat, and Hardy, and Ross, and Fraser, and Mercier, and Langelier, and Joly, and Scriver, and Blair, and Fielding, and Greenway, and under the sympathetic eye of Edward Blake."

Well, Mr. Speaker, there are two or three omissions; my friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and my friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) are not included. However, Sir, speaking of the matter of union among the hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask why this amendment was not moved as a direct amendment for unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union? I ask any hon. gentleman to take the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and to tell me what it means? I ask him whether it is commercial union; I ask him whether it is unrestricted reciprocity, or whether it is a fair and honourable treaty to which my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) referred. I say that any one adopting lines of policy such as the hon. gentlemen opposite have been so much divided upon might adopt that resolution, and say that it is a resolution which expresses their opinion upon their policy which they are advocating. As we are said to be so divided on this side of the House, I should like to say a few words as to the unity which prevails among the benches to your left, Mr. Speaker, particularly upon this great trade question. Let me say that if hon. gentlemen opposite are in harmony, then, Sir, the definition of harmony must be changed to mean a union of discords; for I take it, Sir, that there never was in the history of this country a party advocating a policy in whose ranks there were more misgivings, there were more misunderstanding, and in which there were more contradictions, than in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite upon the particular policy which they are supposed to support in this country. Let me point out for a moment that my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) made some speeches during the campaign which I read in the newspapers. He declared that this policy was a thoroughly practical policy, which could be carried out; and then in complete union and harmony with him is my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), who declared that it never could be carried out unless the Americans were fools. There is my hon. friend, the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who in giving an interview to a Chicago newspaper, declared: "Let us have commercial union, and let the consequences be what they will."

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I never had anything to do with a Chicago newspaper, and the statement made by my hon. friend is entirely without foundation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then my hon. friend made the statement during the election campaign, and declared: "Let the consequences be what they will." I have not his speech under my hand just now, but I can produce it for the pleasure of the hon. gentleman afterwards. Then we have my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who declared that he will not adopt any policy which will destroy our union with Great Britain. Then we have my hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), who moved a commercial union resolution in this House; and we have the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who declares that commercial union is not the policy of the party opposite. We have my friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who inveighs against the duty upon coal oil; and we have my able and smiling friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister), who rises in his place to defend the duty upon coal oil. We have my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who remonstrates in this House against the combines; and we have my smiling and able friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), who has grown up beneath the shadow of a friendly biscuit combine. We have my friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who declares that he will discriminate against Great Britain; and in perfect harmony with that hon. gentleman is the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), who in the face of his conscience and his constituents was afraid to advocate discrimination against Great Britain; and in still more striking harmony with him is the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who declared that he would have nothing to do with any policy that gave advantages to the people of the United States which were not given to the people of the old land as well. Sir, they are a harmonious lot on the other side of the House. Sir, they are united upon their trade policy. Harmony! Unrestricted reciprocity here, commercial union there, and a fair and honourable treaty somewhere else, while behind them in the shadow, ever speaking and never welcome, is that single voice that during the election campaign declared these men all wore masks. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. gentlemen themselves why this resolution is not a definite resolution? I ask the hon. member for South Oxford how he can find fault with what he calls the indefinite manner in which the policy of this Administration is explained by the Finance Minister, and then in the face of that accusation move such an amendment as this? Now, Sir, let us examine for a moment the contents of this resolution. The first proposition in it is to reduce all the taxes upon the prime necessaries of life. What are the prime necessaries of life? Surely they include what we eat and wear, the tools we use in the various industries in this country—in short, if you carry out the terms of the first portion of that resolution you take down the tariff wall from almost every article in this country, with the exception of a few luxuries that are consumed by the wealthy classes; and after proposing that, the hon. gentleman looks up as smiling as you please, and says: Then go to Washington and endeavour to get a fair reciprocity treaty.' Now, I do not know that I can do better than read to the hon. member for South Oxford one of those excellent speeches of the hon. member for South Brant. In 1876, when the hon. member for South Brant was advocating a duty on agricultural products, he said:

"We do not know whether negotiations tending in that direction may soon be opened or not; at least, members of this House are not in possession of that information. The question, is whether in the event of further negotiations the imposition of a tax on grain would operate in our favour. Fancy a commissioner, delegated by this Government and sanctioned by the British Government, sent to Washington to negotiate such a treaty. The question might be asked what he desired? He replies: 'I wish to have a free market in the United States for the products of our forests, fields and mines.' Then the United States commissioner might ask: 'And what will you give us in return.' Our representative replies: 'The free use of our markets for similar products of your country.' The astute American would naturally say: 'We have that already: I do not see that you offer us anything.' We must remember we should have something to offer when we attempt to open up a new reciprocity question. I need not remind this House that the great lever we had before in negotiating a reciprocity treaty is ours no longer."

I think, Sir, my hon. friend from South Brant has completely answered that portion of the resolution which commands this Government to take off the duties upon the necessaries of life, and then says: Go to Washington and try and negotiate a fair and advantageous treaty with the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, though we have not the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite laid down in this resolution—because I claim that it is a resolution which may mean anything or nothing on the trade question—we have that policy laid down in the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford. He declared that that policy was unrestricted reciprocity with the people of the United States. And just here let me call attention to the fact that my hon. friend from South Brant severely let that question alone. He did not for a moment discuss it. My hon. friend from Albert declared that you never can have unrestricted reciprocity without commercial union. The hon. member for South Oxford said that nobody but a child would say that; he said anybody but a child could understand it. And yet my hon. friend from Albert, who is no child, did not understand it, and my hon. friend from South Brant, able and eloquent as he is, did not undertake to enlighten him. It is not difficult to teach a child, especially an apt child like my hon. friend, and I think the hon. member for South Brant should have undertaken that task and have said a word in explanation, as only a word would have been required, if, as declared, the matter is so simple. Now, the whole matter, it seems to me, is boiled down to this: Are we to abolish the Custom-houses along the borders or not? If that is to be done there is no necessity to offer any argument as to whether we can have unrestricted reciprocity without a union of tariffs. The hon. leader of the Opposition has given the keynote of that policy in his speeches in the Province of Quebec; and what is that keynote? The hon. leader of that party, as reported in the Globe newspaper, declares: We will have freedom of trade; we will sweep away these restrictions; we will sweep away the Custom-houses between these two countries. My hon. friend says this is not so. Well, his speech, as reported in the Globe newspaper, says this:

"This policy involves full and absolute reciprocity, not only in natural products, but also in manufactured articles, without any restrictions whatever. When the Liberal party comes into power it will send commissioners to Washington, according to the principles affirmed by the Cartwright resolution of 1888, to propose a mutual agreement by which there will be free trade along the whole line, doing away with restrictions vexatious and detrimental to both countries alike, and removing the Custom-houses that go so far to cause friction between two countries designed by nature to exist side by side in friendly relations."

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him that the speech to which he refers was delivered in French, and that there was not a French reporter present.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. I am quite willing to say that the report in substance gives the sense of my remarks, but is not verbatim.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Sir, this extract has been printed in newspaper after newspaper; it has been before the country for months; and my hon. friend has never until now made a public declaration that the report may be incorrect. It shows that hon. gentlemen opposite are in a very bad condition when they have to rise in this House and repudiate the reports of their speeches as printed in their own organs. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman whether or not he delivered any such speech as that?

Mr. LAURIER. I have just told you.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You said nothing just now about the Custom-houses?

Mr. LAURIER. I have told the hon. gentleman that the speech was delivered impromptu, and that there is no verbatim report of it. The hon. gentleman does not expect me to say that I said this word or that word. I have just said that the report gives the substance of my remarks, but not my verbatim remarks.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman does not remember it. I do not ask him to remember it; but the reporter was there and took it down.

Mr. LAURIER. I say that I spoke in French, and that there was not a French reporter there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, will my hon. friend say that this is not his policy? Sir, I have waited for the leader's answer, but none has come. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's position is very much like this resolution. He is, I am afraid, very like a certain little animal which it is very hard to catch: when you hit him he is not here, when you hit him again he is somewhere else, and when you hit him the third time he is nowhere at all. The hon. gentleman is the leader of a great party. I have very great respect for him; I am proud of him as a Canadian, and as a Canadian orator. I look upon him, however, as the leader of a great party, as a man who in this House should not be afraid to answer a question as to the policy which he and his party are supposed to be advocating; and I ask the House to look at the spectacle of the great leader of a great party in this country, who, when asked a simple, fair, practical question as to the policy of his party, says: "I am not obliged to answer," or something to that effect. I leave that matter with the House; and I believe the hon. gentleman will not say that such a policy would not be necessary under a system of unrestricted reciprocity. But if the hon. gentleman does not say so, it has been said by other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. I need not refer to-night to the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), who declared, quite a time ago, when discussing this question of unrestricted reciprocity, that it is impossible; but, if my hon. friend now goes back upon his speech—my hon. friend is denying before I say what I was going to say. I was going to say that the hon. gentleman made a speech in which he said:

"As for unrestricted reciprocity we could not get that unless the Americans were arrant fools."

Now my hon. friend retorted the other night that that was somewhat of a chestnut. It would have been a chestnut if the hon. gentleman had ever answered it. But he never made on the other side of the question an argument so logical and sound as that which he gave the people, when he said we could not get this policy unless the Americans were arrant fools. If the hon. gentleman denies that statement, and I have never heard him deny it——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You could not have been in the House then last session or the session before, for it has been brought up every session, and each time I gave the explanation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But not a denial, and the difficulty is that your explanation always requires an explanation. I may say to the hon. gentleman that if he did not say so, then his great newspaper, the Toronto Globe, did; and there is absolute proof of that, because the files of that paper are in the library, and any hon. gentleman may refer to them. The Globe said in 1877:

"Obviously the Washington Government will not enter into the unrestricted reciprocity which Canadians wish for unless Canadians will consent to apply to themselves the same commercial conditions as apply to the American states that have unrestricted reciprocity with one another. That is to say, Canadians must recognize that they cannot hope to enjoy continental free trade unless they shall agree to make a Customs union with the continent."

That is the opinion of the Toronto Globe; and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who will speak on this question, said, in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, in the same year:

"The application of the principle between Canada and the United States would require that the two countries should have the same Excise rates and the same tariff on imports from all other countries."

How are hon. gentlemen going to get over the difficulty? I just name one small difficulty for them to get over, and if the hon. member for North Norfolk or the hon. member for Prince Edward Island will explain how he is going to meet the difficulty I may say that the whole question is practically solved. I ask these hon. gentlemen to take one article. Take, for instance, the question of free trade between these countries as applied to articles manufactured from tin-plate. In the United States there is a heavy duty on tin-plate; in Canada there is no duty. Under unrestricted reciprocity between this country and the United States, without a Customs union, you would have the American manufacturers, who have put millions of dollars into tin-plate plant and factories, competing with a line of goods brought free of duty from a country where the people get their raw material—tin plate in this instance—duty free. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to explain how they are going to get over that difficulty, as well as innumerable others which would arise under unrestricted trade between this country and the United States without a Customs union? There would be difficulties constantly arising, and these difficulties would have in some way to be settled. They would have to be settled by the weaker giving way to the stronger; and I would prefer, though I want none of it, if we entered into any such arrangement as that, under which we would constantly have to give way, that we should go the whole way at once, than take any such course as that. Well, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite went before this country with a policy. They declared that policy to be such-and-such a policy, and that they knew they could put it into operation if given the chance. Now, they were either humbugging the people—I use the word, I hope, in a parliamentary sense—or they had some understanding with our neighbours, under which that policy could be operated. If they were not humbugging the people they had some understanding with some great party, or with some section of some great party, or with some moulder of public opinion in the great Republic. Now, if they had not that understanding they stand here in the position of men who went to the people without a policy which they could not practically put into effect. In other words, they were humbugging the people. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will take the latter position; but if they had some understanding with some party or some section of some party or some great leaders on the other side of the line then these hon. gentlemen are bound, by all reason of justice and fair-play, by the opinions and interpretation of that policy as given by those public men on the other side of the line. I say they must be bound by the opinions of their allies, by the definitions of their associates, by the definitions of those men through whose aid they hope to carry that policy into effect should hon. gentlemen opposite get into power, which Heaven prevent. Will any hon. gentleman in this House point to a single great leader, or to a single section of any great party, or to a single section of the press of the United States, which refers to this policy as anything other than a commercial union policy between the United States and the Dominion of Canada? In other words, the men that hon. gentlemen opposite have dealt with, the men who were their allies and colleagues on the other side of the line, say that what they contemplate is commercial union and nothing else. Now, I shall not say what commercial union is. It appears to me, though I do not wish for a moment to impute motives to hon. gentlemen—as I have said, it is not my business, or the business of any member of this House, to attack the loyalty of other members,—that is a question between themselves and their conscience and their God—but I say it is my duty, as it is the duty of every gentleman on this side of the House, to point out what we believe to be the inevitable and legitimate consequence of the policy these hon. gentlemen have been advocating in this House and country. Sir, they may disclaim as much as they like a union of tariffs, but everybody can understand that that policy can never be carried out without a union of tariffs. The Toronto Globe, speaking of the New York Tribune, says:

"That paper is probably nearer to the Administration at Washington than any other American journal."

What does the New York Tribune say? That newspaper, speaking for the Administration on the other side of the line, nearer to it than any other journal, according to the Globe, says this:

"Allowance must be made for the anxiety of Canadians of opposite parties to represent their wishes in the most popular form. But the Halifax Chronicle——"

Which, I understand, is a Liberal paper—

—"makes statements which appear to need prompt correction. It argues in favour of absolute and unrestricted reciprocity between the United States, with each country at liberty to adopt whatever tariff it may prefer, and represents this, and no more than this, as the deliberate purpose of one party in the Canadian contest."

Then it goes on to say:

"If this is the fact, one party of Canadians closely resembles the baby which cried for the moon, and got into a rage because the moon would not consent to be grasped. This nation has not the slightest notion of allowing Canada to open a back door as wide as it may please, while tariff enactments by the United States are closing the front door against sundry importations at New York and Boston. If anybody is really silly enough to propose that such a plan is entertained by Americans he does not live in this country."

That is the opinion of the great journal which stands next to the Administration on the other side of the line, and I think, Sir, that great journal is talking in a sensible manner. Then, Mr. Wiman, who was associated with these gentlemen more or less during the campaign, made a speech upon February the 4th, on the eve of an election down in the State of Kentucky. I have not heard any contradiction of the statement he then made. I have not heard any gentleman disclaim by letter or voice that Mr. Wiman had authority to make that statement. This is what he said:

"In the meantime it proposes [that is the Liberal party] that duties shall be maintained against foreign goods including those from Great Britain, as high as those that now prevail in the United States. This action of Canada would indicate a freedom from European domination in fiscal affairs of vast interest to the American people."

That is the opinion of Mr. Wiman during the election campaign. I do not think it needs any argument in this House to show that unrestricted reciprocity cannot be carried out between the two countries. We can quite understand that commercial union is a workable scheme, if it could be adopted by the two countries; but the objection we have, and which every true Canadian has, to that policy is this, that under it the Americans must control our tariff, and controlling our tariff they will control our revenue, and controlling our revenue they will have the future of this country in their hands. To that policy, or to any policy which disturbs our relations with the old land—under whose protection our young nationality has been fostered and kept from harm—gentlemen on this side of the House, Sir, can never agree. I thank you, Sir, and hon. gentlemen, for the kind manner in which you have listened to my remarks.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have listened to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) for well nigh three hours, and I must congratulate that hon. gentleman upon the improved tone of his speech as compared with the last one I recollect hearing him make in this House, which was a bitter attack on another hon. member. The speech of to-night is unexceptionable in its tone, though I shall be unable to agree with many of the conclusions to which my hon. friend has arrived. The speech of course will sound strangely familiar to those audiences throughout the country that were addressed by the hon. gentleman during the canvass, but it is new here, and I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly review some of the points made by the hon. gentleman. At the outset, I want to impress upon my hon. friend the fact that, notwithstanding all he has said upon the policy of reciprocity, the great farming communities of the Province of Ontario, the richest of the farming counties, have pronounced in favour of reciprocity. The farmers of that great province have clearly indicated that their views are the reverse of those which have been expressed by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague).

The hon. member sets out with the assertion that the Liberal party, when in power, had nothing in its record by which it could claim that it had ever removed a burden from the people, but that, on the contrary, it had increased taxation and had added to the burdens on the shoulders of the people; and in illustration of this he instanced the fact that the articles of tea and coffee and molasses were taxed. The truth is that the Liberal party, when they were in power, reduced the revenue collected from the people by a very large sum. The revenue of this country in 1874–75 derived from Customs exceeded $15,000,000, while in 1878–79 it fell short of $13,000,000. The Government, so far from increasing the taxation, reduced the revenue derived from Customs by a fraction less than $2,500,000. I shall go into that question more fully later on, but I now present that plain statement in answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman that the Liberal party had not reduced the burdens on the people. As to the taxation upon tea, coffee and molasses, I may say that I consider that form of taxation infinitely preferable to taxes which are levied on articles which can be produced in this country. Political economists are agreed upon that point, because the taxation imposed on articles which cannot be produced in the country does not raise the price of any article which is produced by the people of the country. The taxation is taken directly from the people and goes into the treasury, and does not raise the price of an article produced in this country for the benefit of the producer. That is what is called incidental taxation, and upon the articles upon which duties are now imposed in Canada this amounts to from two to two and a-half times as much as the taxation which goes into the coffers of the Government. The imposition of a duty on articles which are produced in a country enables the producer of the domestic article to put up the price to almost the same amount as the cost of the imported article with the duty added.

The hon. gentleman refers to the sugar question and reviews the speech made by my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson). It will be noticed that he sails very cautiously along the borders of that speech and wisely refrains from assailing any of the positions taken by my hon. friend. He says he will not enter into any of the elaborate calculations of my hon. friend, and he is very right in not doing so, but he endeavours to throw discredit upon the statement that not more than 800 people were employed in this country in refining sugar. He tells us that the Hon. Mr. Jones took the position that from 30,000 to 50,000 people were employed in refining sugar.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; I said that Mr. Jones stated that thousands were employed, and that Mr. Workman said 30,000 were employed. The hon. gentleman will find that in the Hansard of 1876.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member will find that Mr. Jones and Mr. Workman were referring to the employment of people in importing, carting, handling and refining sugar, but that those who were employed in refining the sugar were very small in number. In Great Britain the number employed in refining sugar is placed at 3,000, in a population of 36,000,000, and it must be remembered that they refine sugar not only for themselves but also for the export trade and that they supply millions of people outside of Great Britain.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that at the present time?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; and I venture to say that the calculation of my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) in estimating the number of people employed in refining sugar in Canada at 800 is probably over the mark and is a very liberal estimate. On this question, I would ask my hon. friend the Finance Minister why, when he was imitating the American policy, he went so much further than the American Government has gone in the direction of protecting the refiners. He has adopted their policy as to raw sugar and their policy as to the protection of the refiners, and he has gone three-tenths of a cent further. They give a protection of five-tenths of a cent, which gives the refiner one-half cent more than he is entitled to, but that amount of duty is not sufficient to satisfy my hon. friend, or rather his friends the refiners, so he gives a protection of eight-tenths of a cent per pound, the result of which will be that the refiners will fleece the people of Canada by an amount of one million to one million and a half of dollars a year by the operation of this Bill. Granulated sugar is sold by Drummond of Montreal at 4½ cents a pound, and by other Canadian refiners at 4⅝ cents, while in the United States it is sold at 4¼ cents. The result is that the refiners in Canada get from ¼ to ⅜ of a cent per pound more than the American refiners. The yellow sugar that is sold in this country for 3⅞ cents per pound is sold in the United States for 3$\frac{5}{16}$ cents per pound, or $\frac{3}{16}$ of a cent per pound higher in this country than in the United States, by virtue of this provision of my hon. friend's tariff, and the refiner, not satisfied with the rate that he put upon yellow sugar when the tariff change was made, has advanced the price ⅜ of a cent per pound since this tariff went into operation; and I venture to say that when this House adjourns the refiners of this country will advance the price of granulated sugar, as they are easily able to do if they can combine among themselves, by virtue of this protection that enables them to put the price up $\frac{5}{16}$ of a cent before the competition of foreign refiners can disturb the monopoly which the tariff gives them. Now, the refiner under the new order of things has a better position, and can make more money than he could before. In the first place, he requires a very much smaller amount of capital to prosecute his business. Before, his sugar cost him perhaps 35, 40 and even 50 per cent. more than it does to-day, and the tariff change reduces his capital by nearly that amount. Before, he gave a discount of 2½ per cent. on sugar sold at 6½ cents and paid for within 14 days; he now gives the same discount of 2½ per cent. on the sugar sold, and 4½ cents a pound, and the difference in this discount between 6½ cents and 4½ cents pays the freight on the sugar between Montreal and Ottawa, or Montreal and Toronto. The position of the matter is simply this: that the Government have made a slavish imitation of the American policy, with the exception that they have given the refiners of this country still greater advantages than those unjust advantages they enjoy in the United States by virtue of their protective duty of ½ a cent a pound on their sugar.

Now, the hon. gentleman has made some remarks with regard to the position occupied by my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and myself, with regard to the protection question many years ago. I do not know that it is worth while alluding to that, but there was one remark made by that hon. gentleman with regard to the industries of the country at that time, that I do wish to allude to. He tells us that in 1878 we were confronted in Canada by "tumbling industries." Now, the fact of it is that we had in 1878, before the adoption of protection, the most prosperous and healthy manufacturing system upon this continent, and it had grown up under a revenue tariff of 15 per cent. up to 1876, which was increased to 17½ in that year. In 1871, under the operation of a revenue tariff of 15 per cent. we had a development of manufacturing interests in the Dominion of Canada which reached the production of $220,000,000 worth of goods, and employed 189,000 operatives, and this was eight years before the protective policy was put into force by the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches. In 1881 the production of goods in Canada was $309,000,000, and the number of operatives employed was some 230,000 or 240,000. At that time the country had scarcely begun to feel the effects of the protective policy adopted in 1879; so it is folly to talk about the "tumbling industries" that confronted us in 1878. I venture the assertion that on the whole, and in the main, the manufacturing industries in Canada were in a healthier and stronger and better position in 1878 than they are in 1891.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman next proceeds to tell us that my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) never knew the pleasure of a surplus. But we have one, he says, and we have been enabled to take off $3,000,000 of taxes. Now, Sir, they have taken off taxes to a large amount and transferred a portion of that sum from the Government coffers to the pockets of the refiners. They have remitted the taxes upon raw sugar, but they have increased the taxes upon refined sugar, and they have adjusted their tariff in such a way as to enable the refiners of this country to take out of the pockets of the consumers of sugar something less than $2,000,000 a year. It is not a very brilliant stroke of statesmanship when we come to consider it in all its bearings. The hon. gentleman asserts that my hon. friend, who was Minister of Finance from 1873 to 1878, never knew a surplus; the assertion may be true, but it is necessary to bear in mind the condition of things that existed during the period that the Liberal party held office in this country. I suppose my hon. friend from Haldimand is not ignorant of the fact that there was a world-wide depression existing at that time. It was existing in Canada, in the United States, in Great Britain, and in every other civilized country, and the Government of that day had great difficulties to wrestle with. It was inevitable that the revenue should fall off, because the ability of the people to pay, the ability of the merchants to import and sell, were curtailed by the operation of that depression. But I shall show later on that the management of the finances of this country by my hon. friend during that period was a triumphant example of sagacity, forethought, care, shrewdness and economy.

Then we are told by the hon. gentleman that all the predictions that my hon. friend the then Minister of Finance made were falsified, and that all the predictions that have been made by his successors have been verified. Well, what about that prediction made some time ago that about this time we should have received $69,000,000 from the sale of Government lands in the North-West? How is it about that? I might, if I chose to trouble the House, name other instances in which the predictions indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite have not been realized.

I wish to devote a few moments to the position taken by the member for Haldimand in reference to reciprocity. It surprises me that the Government of which he is a supporter should have taken so much trouble in this matter, if the position he himself takes is a correct one. Why, he tells us that this partnership that we are seeking to enter into with the American farmers, is a matter that we need not bestow so much trouble about, because they are worse off than we are, they are so poor that we do not want to have anything to do with them, and it is all folly to talk about partnership with the American farmers. He says the price of land is declining in the United States, the farmers are in a condition of poverty, every farm in the country is mortgaged, the interest is not paid, the price of butter is low, the price of corn is low, and on the whole the condition of the farmers in that great country is so melancholy that we want to steer as wide of them as possible, and we ought not to dream of ever entering into partnership with the farmers of the United States. Now, let me ask, what induced my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and his colleagues to dissolve the House in February last for the purpose of appealing to the people of this country upon that very question? Why did they make that an issue of the contest? Why did they assign as a reason for dissolving the House, that they wished to consult the people of this country as to the propriety of embarking upon negotiations upon a certain line laid down by them, to obtain reciprocity with the people of the United States? Were they not practising grave deception upon the people of this country? In dissolving the House upon the pretext that they wished to consult the people of Canada about entering into partnership with these poverty-stricken farmers on the other side of the line, were they not mocking the people of this country? Why has my hon. friend gone down to Washington? Why did Sir Charles Tupper go down there twice, and why has he made an arrangement to go back in October? If this thing is not desirable, if it is not in the interest of the people of this country to get reciprocity, why is all this fuss made over it? It is a very singular condition of things, indeed. The truth is that we are not asking for a partnership with the farmers of the United States; we are asking for the chance of becoming their rivals and their competitors; we are asking for liberty to attempt to sell our wares, not to the farmers of the United States, but to the urban population of that country, to the people of the great cities of that country. There are within 400 miles of us 6,000,000 of people in the cities of the United States, and it is these markets we want to reach, and not markets in which our people would have to compete unfavourably. It is true, I presume, that there is a certain degree of depression existing among the farmers of the United States. They have had the blessings of protection longer than we have had them. They have had them since 1861, and we have had them since 1879, and during that period the American farmers have contributed their quota to the enormous revenue the country has collected from Customs duties, and two and a-half times as much in incidental taxes, enhancing the cost of domestic goods. It is calculated that American consumers have paid on an average every year since 1861 from $600,000,000 to $800,000,000 as incidental taxes in the increased cost of domestic goods, that increased cost being due to the duties imposed on corresponding classes of goods imported. That will account for a considerable degree of depression existing among the farmers of the United States.

Then the hon. gentleman asks us: What evidence have you to offer as to depression existing among the farmers of Ontario? Has the hon.

gentleman travelled through this province and this country with his eyes closed? Is he incapable of seeing a thing when placed before him? No observant man can go through the Province of Ontario or through this Dominion without being impressed with the fact that depression does exist, and every person conversant with the value of farm property, and with the condition of the farmers of Ontario notably, is aware that farm values have declined at least one-third within the last 12 years, that the mortgage debt has increased, and the farmers are in a less favourable financial position than they occupied 10 or 12 years ago. The hon. gentleman in alluding to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that when my hon. friend came to end his earthly career, and the inner anatomy of the hon. gentleman was examined—I was rather horrified at the proposal to have a post-mortem examination at this stage of my hon. friend's life—it would be found that there was impressed on the interior of that anatomy a gloomy image of Canadians fleeing from a country with a 20 per cent. tariff to a country having a 60 per cent. tariff. Whatever may be the occasion of Canadians leaving this country, whether they are leaving a country with a low tariff to go to a country with a high tariff or not, whatever may be the truth in regard to this matter, the indisputable fact stares us in the face that hundreds of thousands of Canadians have gone, and there are at this moment 1,000,000 Canadians in the United States. For some reason they have gone there, and it is evident if we could have retained that number, with their posterity, in this country, we would have been infinitely better off, we would have had a larger population and greater resources; and if we can do anything by the readjustment of our policy in the future that will put an end to, or diminish the exodus of the people of Canada that has characterized the history of this country during the last eight or ten years, it is the duty of every patriotic man to desire that it should be done.

Then the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) dwelt upon the extension of our trade with Great Britain, and he drew a comparison between the trade of the last fiscal year and that of 1878. But he neglected to go a little further back. If he had gone back to 1873 he would have been able to make a comparison between our trade with Great Britain in that year amounting to $107,000,000 and our trade with the same country last year amounting to $91,000,000, and he would have been able to impress on the House the fact that the trade with Great Britain had fallen off.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was under your regime.

Mr. CHARLTON. It was a little before our regime. I admit we had come into power just at that time.

I was struck with, I will not say an unfair statement, for no doubt the hon. gentleman made a mistake, but with an unintentional misrepresentation of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his position, based upon a statement which it was represented my hon. friend had made in the debate some time ago. The hon. gentleman represented that my hon. friend had said that the trade with Great Britain was a paltry and insignificant fraction of our trade.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not say that.

Mr. CHARLTON. The truth is that my hon. friend made no such assertion with respect to Canada.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. What I said was that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when speaking of the trade likely to be interfered with between this country and Great Britain by unrestricted reciprocity, said it was a paltry fragment of trade. The hon. member for South Oxford will not deny it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. I will tell him what I did say. I pointed out what is the fact, and which everybody who knows anything about the matter ought to know, that the trade which Great Britain has with Canada is an insignificant fraction of Great Britain's whole trade.

Mr. CHARLTON. The impression made by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) with respect to the matter was the reverse of that. He conveyed the impression that the hon. member for South Oxford had said that the trade of Canada with Great Britain was an insignificant fraction of the trade of Canada.

We have had something said about discriminating against Great Britain. I should like to enquire what the National Policy does? Does it not discriminate against Great Britain? Do we not attempt by the operation of that policy to shut out entirely British manufacturers from this country? While we are enjoying British markets for our cheese, live animals, the products of the soil, and are doing an export trade amounting last year to $48,000,000, are we not attempting to cut Great Britain out of our markets by the operation of the National Policy? We are discriminating against Great Britain by the operation of that policy, and we have been doing so since the policy was inaugurated. Those hon. gentlemen who talk about discriminating against Great Britain are the slavish imitators of the American fiscal policy. There never is a change made in the American tariff but they are ready to imitate it.

Then the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague)—and it is astonishing what a breadth of territory the hon. gentleman covered—made some reference to Imperial Federation. He told us that he and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) are Imperial Federationists in the near future. They expect to realize something out of it some time. I do not know how soon. It is a simple fact, so far as my observation goes at least, that no man who advocates Imperial Federation gets down to anything definite. There is something hazy about their theory. Do they tell us on what basis they propose to establish this federation? Do they tell us what is to be the tariff arrangements between the countries? Do they tell us how the different portions of the federation are to be taxed for the navy and army? Do they tell us on what basis the representation is to be fixed? Are the colonies to be represented on the same basis of population as in the United Kingdom, and is India to swamp the whole concern with its 250,000,000 of Hindoos against 40,000,000 of Saxons in the rest of the Federation? What is the principle on which they propose to base the federation?

Do they expect that England will again adopt differential duties, re-enact the Corn Laws and give preferential duties to the colonies? The whole scheme is a piece of moonshine. It sounds well. It might be a very good scheme if realized and carried into operation; but the difficulties are insurmountable, and it cannot be done.

The hon. member for Haldimand tells us that his party has always been willing and anxious for an honourable arrangement regarding reciprocity with the United States. What is an honourable arrangement in his estimation? Is the proposal made by the hon. member for Oxford an honourable proposal? I think it is. I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us whether it is a dishonourable proposal. We are all in favour of an honourable arrangement, but the difference between us is, that we are in favour of a practical arrangement and hon. gentlemen opposite are in favour of an impracticable arrangement. We honestly want reciprocity; we mean business and mean to obtain it. Hon. gentlemen opposite will take it if they can get it on their own terms. That is the difference between their position and ours on this matter. We believe it is a good thing; they believe exactly the reverse. We are told by hon. gentlemen that their party have never pursued a hostile policy towards the United States, that the United States have no reason whatever to cherish any feelings other than those of a friendly character towards them. Not three years ago the present High Commissioner of Canada in his place in this House declared that he went to Washington and found that, in consequence of the indiscreet action of the Canadian Government in regard to the fisheries and other matters, the two countries were on the verge of war, and he denounced the action of this Government for its folly in this matter in imperilling the interests of Canada, and leading us to the brink of a rupture of the friendly relations between the two countries. In the face of these declarations by Sir Charles Tupper, my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) who is not a very old politician or statesman, tells us with the greatest gravity to-night that there is no existing reason for the United States entertaining any feeling other than that of the most friendly character towards the hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches. We have had the character of the amendment of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) called into question by the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). He says it does not mean anything, and that we cannot tell what it does mean; but, let us look at the amendment for a moment, and we will see that it conveys its meaning clearly. It says:

"That the negotiations for reciprocity should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States in manufactures as well as natural products."

What do the words "most extended" mean? Why, no definition will fill that bill but unrestricted reciprocity; anything short of unrestricted reciprocity is not the "most extended" kind of reciprocity in natural products and in manufactures. The resolution of my hon. friend from South Oxford states exactly what it means; its language is definite; its language contains a definite statement as to the position of the Liberal party in this country with regard to this matter. We are going in for the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States in manufactured as well as in natural products. We understand that. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) does understand it or not, but if he cannot understand it I should think it hardly worth while to try to explain it to him. However, I think the hon. gentleman does understand it, for he wants to know in the next breath what we mean by unrestricted reciprocity. He professes to know possibly what commercial union means, he thinks he can comprehend that, but he says he is at a loss to understand what unrestricted reciprocity is. Suppose we talk about that for a moment. The hon. gentleman raises a difficulty in the matter, he says: "Mr. Speaker, what are we going to do about the matter of tin-plate? Tin-plate would be manufactured into wares in the United States and it would be manufactured into wares in Canada; tin-plate is a foreign product, and are you going to allow it to be sent back and forth between the two countries?" I say: Certainly not. What we mean by unrestricted reciprocity in natural and manufactured products include the productions of the two countries. Tin-plate is not a production of Canada or of the United States, and it is a very easy matter to define what is the production of a country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is totally wrong.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Tin-plate is manufactured in the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. The manufacture of tin-plate in the United States is like Imperial Federation: it is in the future.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is one factory in Pittsburgh which has $5,000,000 capital invested in it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman's information is like a good deal of the information which he has given to the House to-night: it is not reliable. The McKinley Bill was put into operation last October for the purpose, among other things, of fostering the business of manufacturing tin-plate in the United States, and, as I said awhile ago, the manufacture of that article in the United States is like Imperial Federation, it is in the future. There is talk of bringing some Welsh tin-plate makers to the United States, and starting the business, but as I understand the matter it has not commenced yet. But if it is started, if the time ever comes in the United States when the tin is mined in that country, when the plate is made in that country, and when it is a product of American labour, then under unrestricted reciprocity it would be entitled to admission to Canada, but if the tin-plate was an imported article it would not. It would simply be a question to decide what were the products of the labour of each country, and to decide what should pass between the two countries free of duty. Of course, we would have to have a line of Custom houses.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, certainly; we have the right to impose upon articles coming from the United States which were exported from abroad exactly the same duties and restrictions which we would impose on these same articles coming to our own ports, and the United States has the same right with regard to ourselves. Unrestricted reciprocity simply covers the natural products, or the manufactured articles which are the product of the labour of the other country, and if in the case of any article which comes into one country an attempt is made to import it to the other, it is not a product of the labour of that country, and it will not be entitled to free admission. That is unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. FOSTER. How about woollen goods?

Mr. CHARLTON. The same thing. If we import woollen goods we cannot send them to the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose we import the wool and make them?

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps we might make some arrangement about our woollen tariff that would be satisfactory. We do not expect to go to Washington to arrange this matter and not attempt to smooth away the difficulties that may lie in the road. We expect to remove these difficulties; we are not so helpless as these hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in this matter, and if we cannot remove that difficulty we are not obliged to make the treaty. That is all there is about that.

An hon. MEMBER. Tell us what you are going to do in Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell you in October next.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is my hon. friend going to do about wool and tin-plate when he goes to Washington; what is he going to do about the various difficulties which will arise in making a tariff? My hon. friend has had a good deal to say about commercial union, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to go in for commercial union, it is a very plain and simple arrangement; it will remove certain difficulties possibly, it might make the revenue difficulty that would confront the country a less serious one, it may be easier to arrange the tariff, and make it more simple in its work, it would dispense with a Custom-house line; and if my hon. friend the Finance Minister wants commercial union we will consider the policy which he will propose in that matter. But just now I am speaking about unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. DENISON. Tell us whether you are in favour of commercial union or not?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am talking about unrestricted reciprocity. I am talking about the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) which is now before the House, and of which I am a supporter. That is what I am talking about, and the hon. gentleman might as well ask me whether I was a Universalist or a Baptist, or whether I believed in evolution. He has no right to interrupt me with such questions. I believe in unrestricted reciprocity. That is what I am talking about, and that is what I am advocating at the present time.

My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) asked the leader of the Opposition a question: he proposed to catechise that hon. gentleman, and he felt somewhat indignant that the leader of the Opposition would not submit to a catechism by the authority from Haldimand. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition stood upon his rights when he refused to be categorically examined by the hon. member for Haldimand. Now, Sir, I do not know that I have much more to say with regard to the speech of the hon. member for Haldimand. I will say that I listened to it with a good deal of pleasure. It was delivered in very good style, indeed, I think the hon. gentleman is a great acquisition to his side of the House, and I am sure his own friends will be glad to hear him, whether or not we have the same feeling with regard to him on this side of the House.

I now propose to go a little more extensively into the consideration of the financial history of this country: the financial history of the Administration which preceded the present one, the financial history of the present Administration, and I propose to analyse briefly the financial record of these two Governments. It is a notable fact, that whenever an attempt is made to justify the financial history of the present Administration that attempt is always accompanied by an attack upon the financial record of my hon. friend to my right. I wish to-night to spend a few moments in placing before this House and before the country the actual condition of our finances, and in making a criticism of the financial management of the two Governments. Now, Sir, a marked feature of the financial history of this country under the Mackenzie Administration was, as I said a few moments ago, the world-wide depression that existed. All countries were in financial difficulties. Canada was not alone in this respect. Canada, in fact, escaped with less damage than almost any other country, and the financial affairs of Canada were managed in this crisis with singular prudence, as I shall be able to prove to this House beyond controversy. It is true, the Government was subjected to the necessity of meeting deficits. It is true, moreover, that my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) had under consideration the propriety of effecting a change in the tariff that would obliterate those deficits and yield a larger revenue. That proposition, however, was overruled by the members of the Maritime Provinces, who set up the claim, a very proper claim, that they had entered this Confederation with the understanding that the duties should not be increased. They protested against the increase, and my hon. friend and his colleagues in office accepted that protest and declined to go further than to advance the duties to 17½ per cent. and sought to tide over the difficulties of the country by the strictest economy and the utmost possible retrenchment. Now, let us see how they succeeded. My hon. friend always took the position that as soon as the depression had passed away, the revenue afforded by the then existing tariff would be sufficient for the years to come. He was not permitted to remain in office long enough to demonstrate whether that should come true or not, because he went out of power before the depression had ceased, and a change in the tariff was made, so radical in its character, that we are unable to say definitely and positively whether his predictions would have been realized or not. But we have in the financial history of the United States during the same period the data which will enable us to arrive at a conclusion, which I believe will be perfectly satisfacfactory and reliable. The United States were similarly situated with ourselves ; they were suffering from the same depression; the consequence of that depression was a diminution in their revenue ; and if in the United States after the depression passed away there was a rapid increase of Customs revenue without a change in the tariff, then I say that the prediction made by the hon. member for South Oxford with regard to the finances of this country if he had remained in power would have been realized. Now, Sir, let us see what the financial experience of the United States during that period was. In 1874 the Customs duties of the United States were as follows :—

1875	157,167,000
1876	148,071,000
1877	130,956,000
1878	130,170,000

Up to the year 1878 there had been a continuous decrease. Then the tide turned, not very markedly at first, but without any change in the tariff, the revenue in the following years was :

1879	$137,250,000
1881	220,410,000

From 1878 to 1881 the revenue from Customs duties increased $90,240,000, or 68 per cent., without the change of a single item in the tariff list of duties. If that was the result in the United States, who, in the name of common sense, would dispute the correctness of the forecast made by the hon. member for South Oxford that when the depression passed away the revenue of the country would increase sufficiently to meet the necessities of the Government ? There can be no question about it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to go into the question, not very extensively ; but I propose to make a few points with regard to the financial administration of my hon. friends.

First, with regard to an assertion made by my hon. friend the Finance Minister that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie had never done anything for the country in the way of reducing the burden of taxation, and with regard to a remark made by my hon. friend from Haldimand that that Government had nothing in its financial record to commend it to the people of this country by virtue of its economy or prudence or reduction of public burdens. Let us see what the cold facts are. In 1874-75 we may say the Government was firmly in its seat, and had arranged what its policy should be. It had come into power in 1873 ; but its fiscal policy may fairly be said to have been set on foot by the end of the fiscal year 1874. So I take the year 1874-75 as the first year for comparison and 1878-79 as the last year, though this is an unfavourable year for that Government, because our extravagant friends opposite were in office nearly nine months of 1878-79. Now, the Customs taxes for the year 1874-75 amounted to $15,351,000, and for the year 1878-79 they amounted to $12,900,000, a reduction in that time of $2,450,000. How does that fact compare with the assertion made by the hon. Minister of Finance and by his lieutenant to-night that the Mackenzie Government had never reduced taxation, had pursued a course of extravagance, and had done nothing in the interest of the country ? Now, let us see what the revenue from Excise amounted to. The total Excise taxes in the year 1874-75 amounted to $5,069,000, and in 1878-79 to $5,390,000, or an increase of $321,000, which would leave a net reduction in both Customs and Excise taxes between 1874-75 and 1878-79 of $2,129,000. Now, there was a deficit in that first year of $1,937,000 ; but if you add the deficit, there still was a reduction of taxation of about $200,000 above the deficit and above the expenditure of the country in that first year.

Now, let us make another comparison. We will take the taxes of 1874-75, and the average taxes of the succeeding years, and we will see what the average reduction was, if there was an average reduction. The taxes from Customs and Excise for 1874-75 amounted to $20,664,000, and the average taxation from Customs and Excise from 1875-76 to 1878-79 was $18,157,000 ; so that the average reduction of taxation from Customs and Excise in the years 1875-76, 1876-77, 1877-78, and 1878-79 was $2,507,000, the average deficit $1,625,000, and the average saving to the people from the reduction of taxation was annually $881,000 more than the expenditure and the deficit combined.

Now, Sir, suppose we compare the taxes from Customs and Excise for the periods extending from 1874-75 to 1878-79 and the period extending from 1878-79 to 1889-90, and let us see what the result will be. Let us then see how the financial record of the present Government will compare with the much abused record of my hon. friend at my right. In 1874-75, our Customs taxes and Excise amounted to $20,664,871 ; in 1878-79, they amounted to $18,476,613, showing a reduction of $2,188,258 between 1874-75 and 1878-79, or a reduction of 10 per cent. Compare that with the financial record of the present Administration, starting with 1878-79, the last year of the Mackenzie Government. Take this Customs and Excise taxation in 1878-79 of $18,476,613, and compare it with the same taxation of the last financial year, and what do we find ? We find that in 1889-90 the taxation from Customs and Excise amounted to $31,587,071, or $13,110,438 more than it was in 1878-79, while in 1878-79, it was $2,180,000 less than it was in 1874-75 the first year of the Mackenzie Administration. Or the taxation increased 70 per cent. during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite against a reduction of 10 per cent. during the period of office of my hon. friend from South Oxford ; or, again, an increase of 70 per cent. under this Administration in taxes against an increase of 22 per cent. in population, showing that our taxes from Customs and Excise, under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, increased more than three times as rapidly as the increase of population.

Let us make the comparison on the basis of Customs alone, because Customs is an involuntary tax, whereas Excise is a voluntary tax. No man is obliged to pay one cent of an Excise tax. In fact, that tax might be entirely destroyed by the individual action of every man in the country, and the country would be better off if there was not a pound of tobacco or a mouthful of beer or whiskey consumed in it, and if there were consequently no Excise revenue. But the Customs revenue is an involuntary tax. In 1878-79, the Customs revenue amounted to $12,900,659, and in 1890 it amounted to $23,968,953, showing an increase under hon. gentlemen opposite of $11,000,000, or 85 per cent.

against a decrease of over 10 per cent. during the period of my hon. friend's incumbency in office. In 1878-79, the Customs tax was $3.11 per head, and that was the last year my hon. friend from South Oxford had anything to do with the finances of this country, and I base that on a population of 4,150,000 souls, whereas the Customs tax last year was $4.80 per head, so that the increase in the per capita tax between 1878-79 and 1889-90 was $1.69, or an increase in the Customs tax between the last year my hon. friend from South Oxford was in office and the present year of 54 per cent. I heard it asserted to-night that the Customs tax is as low now as it was in 1878-79. Nothing of the kind; on the contrary it is 54 per cent. higher, or $1.69 per head higher.

I come next to the consideration of the question of the net debt of this country. It has been stated that the Mackenzie Government were more extravagant than the present Government in the matter of incurring debt, and the record shows they did increase the debt largely. The net debt in 1875, on the 30th June, was $116,008,378; on the 30th June, 1879, it was $142,990,197, showing an increase under the Mackenzie Government of $26,902,809, or 22 per cent. Now, if we could get an exact statement, if we could take it from the time the present Government came into office to the end of October, 1878, perhaps the statement would be a little more favourable; but this is as near as we can arrive at it, on the basis of the fiscal year, showing an increase of $27,000,000 in round numbers in the debt under the Mackenzie Administration. Now, this is not in consonance with their record in respect of taxes and expenditure, because they reduced the taxes and the controllable expenditure of the country; and the question is, how did they come to increase the debt of the country by $27,000,000? They did it by carrying out the obligations incurred by their predecessors—simply that, nothing less and nothing more. There was, perhaps, about $100,000 increase of debt for which the Mackenzie Government were responsible, being an expenditure on the St. Peter's Canal; but outside of that, every dollar incurred was in consequence of the binding necessity on the Mackenzie Government to carry out in good faith the stipulations and contracts made by their predecessors. They were obliged to go on and complete the Intercolonial Railway; they were obliged to proceed with the enlargement of the canals and with the expenditure on public buildings; and they were obliged to do something with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I repeat that, with the exception of less than $100,000, the Mackenzie Government was not, in any sense whatever, responsible for the increase of the debt, and you may charge the increase, every dollar of it, except the small sum I have mentioned, to the Administration that preceded them in office. But how does this increase in debt compare with that which took place under the Government that succeeded. The Mackenzie Government left office with a debt of $142,990,187 on the 30th June, 1879; and on the 30th June, 1890, our debt amounted to $237,533,211, showing an increase of $94,543,434 under the present Administration, or 66 per cent. of an increase in our debt between 1879 and 1890, as compared with an increase of 22 per cent. of population in same period. I think those connected with the Government of Mr. Mackenzie have nothing to feel ashamed of with regard to their financial management, so far as I have presented it.

Let us take another feature of their management; and it is always satisfactory to me to dwell upon the financial record of the Mackenzie Government. There is not a flaw in that management. If the present Finance Minister would copy the careful economy and thrifty management which my hon. friend from South Oxford displayed when in office, the country would be a great deal the gainer. Let us look at the expenditures; and if the hon. Finance Minister will give his attention to the figures, I am sure he will find something worthy of his emulation. We had in 1874-75 an expenditure of $23,713,071 chargeable to the Consolidated Fund. I propose to make a comparison of expenditure, after deducting the interest charge and the sinking fund, as the balance will show the expenditure which the Government may be said to control to some extent. Our interest charge, in 1874-75, was $6,500,790, and our sinking fund was $555,773, and our expenditure, less sinking fund and interest, $16,657,508. That was the state of affairs in 1874-75. In 1877-78, which was the year when the Mackenzie Government had full control, as during the following year they were nearly nine months out of office, the expenditure was $23,503,158; the interest charge, $7,048,883; and the sinking fund, $945,746. The expenditure that year, less the sinking fund and interest, was $15,508,529, showing a decrease in expenditure, as compared with 1874-75, of $1,048,979, or 15 per cent., leaving out of the question the interest and sinking fund. Now, that is a pretty good record—a decrease of $1,048,000 in the controllable expenditure of the Government. If my hon. friend would emulate that example and give us some instances of that kind in the future, we would be able to reduce our debt and get to a sounder financial basis; and I commend to him the example set by my hon. friend from South Oxford. In 1878-79, the expenditure was $24,455,381; the interest charge, $7,194,734; and the sinking fund, $1,037,-219; and the expenditure, less sinking fund and interest, was $16,223,348, showing a decrease between 1874-75 and 1878-79 of $434,000, and two-thirds of the year 1878-79 was under control of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us compare that with the records of those who have succeeded the Mackenzie Government and have managed the country since. In 1889-90, we expended $35,994,031. The interest that year was $9,656,841, and the sinking fund $1,887,237, the expenditure, less interest and sinking fund, amounting to $24,449,953, or an increase since 1878-79 amounting to $8,226,607, or 51 per cent. in the expenditure, leaving out the interest on public debt and the sinking fund, against an increase in population of less than 22 per cent. In view of these facts, the statement made by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, and the statement made by my hon. friend the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie was a reckless Government, that it increased the taxes, that it did nothing for the good of the people, and that it left an unsavoury record in regard to the finances, is a sheer piece of effrontery. I venture to say that there has not been so good a financial record made by any government, since Canada had a government, as the record of the management of our affairs by the Mackenzie Administration.

An hon. MEMBER. Tell us about the deficits.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is my hon. friend so stupid that he did not listen to the statement that, during the depression which existed from 1874 to 1878, the Mackenzie Government refused to increase the burdens upon the people, that they waited for the tide to turn and that, instead of adding to the taxation, they waited until the change of affairs would come; but, even adding the deficit to the expenditure there was a large balance to their credit every year.

Then, comparing the expenditures between this country and the United States, which I would not do but that I know hon. gentlemen opposite think a great deal of their friends on the other side of the line, having adopted their policy in reference to the sugar duty and other portions of their policy, we find that the revenue derived from Customs in the United States in 1889-90 was $229,668,584, on a population of 63,000,000, or $3.65 a head, while in Canada we collected from Customs $23,968,953 on a population of 5,000,000, or $4.80 per head, leaving a difference against Canada of $1.14 per head compared with the Customs taxation in the United States. Then we must consider that the surplus of the United States amounted to $105,344,000 or $1.70 per head, while our surplus amounted to only $3,885,000 or 78 cents per head, and that the Americans incurred enormous expenditures from which we are almost entirely exempt, and yet they got along with a Customs revenue of $1.14 less per head than we did. They expended on pensions $106,936,000; on the army $44,582,000, and on the navy $22,006,000, or a total of $173,524,000, making a per capita expenditure on those items of $2.75. We spent in Canada for items which nearly correspond to these, that is, for Mounted Police, pensions, militia, ocean and river service, $2,351,553, or 47 cents per head. The Americans spend five and a-half times as much as we do on these items, and if we were to reduce the United States surplus, pensions and army and navy expenditure, which amounts to $4.45 per capita, to the Canadian limit of $1.25 per capita, the United States Customs could thus be reduced $3.20 per head, that would allow them to get on at 45 cents a head, while we find it necessary to expend $4.80 a head, allowing the expenditure of the two countries for these purposes to be the same per capita.

If we come to the debt comparison we find that is not satisfactory either. On the 31st May, 1891, our net debt amounted to $234,142,372, while the American net debt was $849,138,508. According to the United States Treasury Balance Sheet, of the 31st May last, which leaves out the Pacific Railway Bonds from the net debt statement, on the 31st May we owed in Canada on the basis of a population of 5,000,000, $46.82 a head, while the United States owed $13.07 a head, or, in other words, our debt was three times and a-half greater per capita than theirs.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that simply the federal debt?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there no difference between our federal debt and theirs?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, there is this difference: that we assume certain expenditures for the provinces which they do not for the states; but if the hon. gentleman were to include the state debts and our provincial debts, I think he would find that their debts, in proportion to their population, would bear about the same ratio as I have stated, because the debts of the Province of Quebec, and some of the other provinces are greater in proportion to our population than the debts of the individual states. There is one feature of this debt to which I want to call attention. We commenced in 1867 with a debt of $75,757,134. To-day the debt is three times as great as it was then. The United States in 1867 had a debt of $2,678,126,000, and it is now less than one-third of that amount. Their debt was incurred in order to preserve the life of the nation. Our debt has been incurred by extravagance, folly and corruption. We have so debauched the public conscience that apathy or corruption reigns in every department of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. That is rot.

Mr. CHARLTON. You may laugh, but it is true. The country has been damaged by the debt contracted for the money which has been squandered as it has been and as it is being to-day. These railway subsidies which have been granted in order to bribe provinces, this squandering of money in every direction has so debauched the public conscience that you can scarcely arouse it to recognize even the gravest political crimes. I am willing to give the Finance Minister credit for desiring to exercise economy. There is great room for it, and I hope he will exercise it. We are deeply in debt. If we take our interest charges amounting to $9,656,000 and deduct the receipts on investments amounting to $1,082,000, we find the net interest we pay is $8,574,000, or $1.75 per capita. The United States interest amounts to $36,099,000, or about 56 cents a head. The public debt in Canada amounts, as I have stated, to $46.82 a head, while in the United States it only amounts to $13.07 a head. There is certainly room for serious reflection as to the respective financial positions of these two countries.

Now, that brings me to the consideration—and I shall not detain the House long in reference to this matter—of the great question that is before the people of this country to-day. As I have said, we are in a position that is not an enviable one. We have a very high scale of expenditure, and we require to strain our exertions to the utmost even to provide the revenue necessary to pay the interest and to meet the expenditures which hon. gentlemen opposite wish to inflict upon the country, and we feel, upon this side of the House, that it is incumbent upon the patriotic people of this country to try to secure a condition of things which will put this great Dominion into a better position. In looking over the field we think we have found a solution for the difficulties under which we are labouring, provided we adopt that solution in connection with an economical administration of public affairs. Now, my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, in the course of his speech in presenting his Budget statement, said that the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty in 1866 proved a real good to this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, if that is the honest sentiment of that hon. gentleman, what have we to hope for from him? If he has no more sense than to say to this country that the abrogation of that treaty, which for twelve years conferred such great benefits upon Canada, which increased the exports of this country to the United States from $10,000,000 in round numbers to $40,000,000 in round numbers—when he gets up and gravely tells us that the abrogation of that treaty proved a real good to the country, certainly I am unable to give him credit for possessing much common sense.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is what your own friends said.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, they did not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. George Brown said so.

Mr. CHARLTON. He did not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CHARLTON. If George Brown ever said that it would lower him in my estimation. Now, Sir, I would ask my hon. friend if he considers a diminished trade a blessing to this country. Did not my hon. friend from Haldimand point with great satisfaction to the fact that our trade was increasing with various countries, that our trade had increased with Great Britain, that our trade had increased with the South American countries and with Germany? And in face of that assertion my hon. friend the Finance Minister takes a position which is tantamount to saying, that it is a blessing to this country that its commerce with our great neighbours to the south of us should diminish and decrease. Now, how much has that trade decreased? Let us look for a few moments at that question. In 1866, we had an export trade from the colonies, now comprising the Dominion of Canada, to the United States, of $39,950,000; in 1868, only two years having intervened after the repeal of that reciprocity treaty, that trade had fallen from $40,000,000 in round numbers, to $27,500,000, excluding from the account bullion and articles not the produce of Canada. Since 1866 there have been 16 years in the history of this Dominion during which the export trade of this country to the United States has fallen below the figure of the last year of that reciprocity. Why, Sir, no longer ago than 1886 our trade was more than $3,000,000 less with the United States than it was in 1866, and last year our trade was barely $575,000 more than it was in that year. The trade that had risen from $10,000,000 to $40,000,000 in twelve years, has a beggarly increase in the last year of about $575,000 over the trade of twenty-three years before. Why, under the impetus given to trade by that reciprocity treaty, if the same condition of things had continued, the exports of Canada to the United States, beyond a peradventure in the year 1890, would have been $100,000,000 in place of the $40,452,000 of last year, yet my hon. friend the Minister of Finance says the abrogation of that treaty proved a real good. I suppose that he and his friend the Minister of Customs would look upon the total obliteration of trade with the United States as a benefit—I presume they would. I think it would be in keeping with the views that they express from time to time with regard to this matter.

Now, Sir, this great continent, with its fifty-one commonwealths, speaking the English tongue, offers an almost illimitable field for intercommunication in trade, and wherever the shackles on trade are stricken off, the increase in the volume of that trade is almost fabulous. I shall not trouble the House with any statistics with regard to the volume of that trade among the various American states where no restrictions exist, but it is a trade fabulous in its volume, and one condition of Canada's prosperity is that the barriers that separate this country from its great natural markets to the south, should be removed, and that we should be allowed to participate in that great sweep of energy and business that characterizes those 44 states comprising the American union. We say that all the records of the past, all the facts that we can gather with regard to the business of this country, and the wants of these two countries, prove beyond a peradventure the assertion we make with regard to this matter, that we languish by reason of our not being permitted to participate in the benefits of intercontinental trade. That fact is beyond controversy and indisputable. Why, as I said awhile ago, we have great centres of population and business almost at our doors, and to a large share of this business the Province of Ontario, by virtue of its geographical position, is entitled. It has a geographical position which is superior to that of any one of the Western States, superior to that of any of the American States except the States of New York and Pennsylvania. We are living at the very door of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Albany, Boston, and those great cities require the articles that we raise in abundance, require the articles the product of which we can extend to almost any extent we choose. It is not the poor farmers of the United States the hon. gentleman speaks of that we want to form a partnership with, but we want to reach the markets that those farmers enjoy, and reach those markets unobstructed and unimpeded by tariff exactions and restrictions. Our egg trade is a large one, and we may form some conception of the real demand for our articles when I tell you that the city of New York in seven days would consume the whole of the eggs exported from Canada last year, and this fact shows that the market that would be open to us in that country is practically without limit.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, in the course of his remarks, made some rather flattering allusions—and I thank him for them—to the Mining Commission of the Ontario Government, and to the recommendations of that commission. I was pleased to learn from the hon. gentleman that he had given attention to those recommendations, that they had been influential in procuring from him some modifications in the Customs regulations with regard to the duties upon mining machinery. Now I would like to call that hon. gentleman's attention to some other recommendations made by that commission. The commission visited various portions of Ontario between Ottawa and Rat Portage, and examined a great number of men with regard to the mining business, and they found, I may say universally—there was, I believe, but two exceptions, one who was engaged in the petroleum business, and one who was a salt manufacturer—but with these two exceptions, out of 200 witnesses examined, every witness stated, either voluntarily or when asked the question, that the great need of the mineral interests of Canada was free access to the markets of the United States. I wish to trouble the House with just one extract from the recommendation and arguments presented by this commission. In the third section, which relates to commerce and economic conditions, the report says, on page 219:

"The fact that Canada and the United States are geographically one great country—with a conterminous boundary line from ocean to ocean, naturally drawn to each other by the provisions and requirements of nature, having common interests that compel intercourse except in case of actual war, having populations of the same race and language, each country finding it impossible to ignore the existence of the other, and each enforcing restrictions upon trade with the other at the cost of great inconvenience and loss—is a fact that stands out in as bold relief as does the opposite fact that the two countries in their political autonomy are separate and distinct. The natural intimacy of association and connection existing between some portions of the American Union is not as great as that existing between Ontario and Quebec and the Eastern, Middle and Western States, or between the Marine Provinces and the states upon the Atlantic seaboard, or between Manitoba and the North-West and the states of the Upper Mississippi Valley, or between British Columbia and the states of the Pacific Slope. A considerable portion of the boundary which separates the two countries, is a grand waterway, comprising great stretches of mighty rivers and four great inland seas. These lakes and rivers invite commercial inter-communication, and serve to link together, in the bonds of common interest, the two countries, rather than to separate them. Upon their waters the commercial marine of both countries is actively employed in transporting the products of each country to the markets of the other, or in conveying the productions of the fruitful west to the seaboard states and provinces. For the improvement of this great natural highway, each country has spent enormous sums, and the vessels of either country may pass from Duluth or Chicago to the sea without hindrance, but indebted to the public works, constructed by both, for the ability to do so. Great as is the magnitude of the commerce that floats upon this imperial highway of rivers and seas, it is but the advance wave of the mighty tide that shall come when the agricultural and mineral resources of the great countries naturally tributary to these waters are fully developed and the shackles upon trade between kindred states and provinces are removed.

"The energetic zone of North America may be said to lie between the 38th and the 48th parallels of latitude. In the galaxy of Anglo-Saxon commonwealths within this zone not one occupies a more commanding commercial position than does the great Province of Ontario. With reference to commercial interchanges between the east and west, neither hostile tariffs, separate nationality, nor commercial belligerency have been found sufficient to deprive this province of the commercial advantages to which nature has declared it to be the heir. The Ontario Peninsula is projected back like a wedge into the territory of the United States, and across it lies the short cut of travel and traffic between Michigan and the east, between Chicago and New York, and between the North-Western and Eastern States. By the lines south of Lake Superior and eastward from Sault Ste. Marie through the territory of Ontario, northern Michigan, northern Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota and Montana will find their shortest and cheapest route to the seaboard. The agricultural portion of Ontario is nearer to the great centres of population and manufactures in the Middle and Eastern States than are Michigan and Indiana, or any portion of the vast region to the westward of these states, while the mineral district of Ontario, extending along the north shores of Lakes Huron and Superior, command as its servant in reaching the great centres of production with its ores and minerals the navigation of the great lakes and the entire network of railways and canals radiating from them, reaching to the seaboard and penetrating the continent in every direction. Quebec, commanding the St. Lawrence and the natural outlet of the great lakes to the sea, is great in the commercial possibilities of the future, and but for the checks placed upon the natural currents of commerce would not have witnessed the diversion of its flow to other channels and the dwarfed growth of the cities that nature designed to number among the leading commercial centres of the world."

* * * "To both Canada and the United States nature has been a prodigal mother. In the resources she has given, each is possessed of boundless wealth. What Canada especially needs is population and capital to develop this wealth. Her economic condition is one of comparative poverty in the midst of fabulous stores of undeveloped riches. Without doubt she is in this respect largely governed by forces beyond her control, and under the circumstances of her environment perhaps the results attained ought to be considered fairly satisfactory; and, except perhaps in the matter of the exercise of greater care in the increase of expenditure, taxation and public debt, very little more could have been done under existing conditions. But existing conditions require to be changed. The demand is an imperative one. A careful survey of the field shows that the country is in a false economic position. We are prevented from proving to the world our splendid capabilities. It is not for the lack of energy, intelligence or courage that the Canadian falls short of the most wonderful achievements of any English-speaking people. It is not the fault of our political institutions that our economic condition is not more favourable; for our laws are good, and the structure of our Government an admirable one, that requires only honest and prudent administration to demonstrate its excellence. That Canada does not exhibit as high a ratio of increase in population and wealth for the last two decades or more as the United States have done, and that our economic condition is as unsatisfactory as it is, may be clearly traced in a large degree to commercial belligerency between this country and the United States, mutually discouraging and repelling the convenient, extensive and profitable exchange of productions natural to our immediate neighbourhood and geographical affinity."

This is a matter of advice that I think my hon. friend would confer a great benefit on the country by adopting, as he did when he adoped the advice of the commission in respect to the duty on mining products. It is of vital importance that we should have access to this market of 65,000,000 of people who are at our very elbow, and until the present restrictions are abolished we will not be able to realize the destiny that is marked out for this country.

But the Minister of Finance tells us that Canada may find unlimited markets in other directions without reciprocity. These are, I believe, his exact words. We have to turn from 65,000,000 of people, and turn to what? Go to the Spanish American population of South America, to the Mexicans, to the mixed races of the West Indians. We must send frozen smelts to the negroes of the Congo, and build up trade, every dollar of which will cost us a dollar and a half to develop. This is the remedy which the hon. gentleman proposes for non-access to that great natural market which lies at our very door, and which will afford us ample chance of growth and prosperity if we can enter it. The hon. gentleman says the West Indies are well disposed to us. I propose, and I hope I will not weary the House by presenting some very striking collections of statistics of exports to the various countries, to contrast our exports to the United States with our exports to all the countries of the world except Great Britain, and to do this in the products of the mine, the forest, animals and their products, agricultural products, manufactures and miscellaneous. The products of the mine we sent to the United States to the value of $3,963,257. To the rest of the world except Great Britain, $261,685, or fifteen times as much to the United States as to all the rest of the world except Great Britain. The products of the forest we exported to the United States to the value of $10,247,640, to the rest of the world, except Great Britain, $1,832,631, or five and a-half times as much to the United States as to all the rest of the world except Great Britain. Of animals and their products we exported to the United States to the value of $5,966,474, to the rest of the world except Great Britain $1,633,941, or four times as much to the United States as to all the world except Great Britain. Of agricultural produce we exported to the United States to the value of $7,519,253. To the rest of the world except Great Britain $716,961, or 10 times as much to the United States as to all the world but Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid that if the tariff walls were thrown down our manufactures would be ruined, yet we exported to the United States to the value of $2,667,282, and to the rest of the world except Great Britain, $1,857,755. Our miscellaneous export to the United States amounted to $76,773, to the rest of the world, excepting Great Britain $381, or two hundred times as much to the United States as to the rest of the world. If we summarize these figures we find that the total exports of the products of the mine and the forest, animals and their products, agricultural produce, manufactures and miscellaneous to the United States amount to $30,440,679, as against $6,304,343 to the rest of the world, except Great Britain, or five times as much to the United States. Yet the Minister of Finance tells us we can provide ourselves with other markets which will compensate for the lack of reciprocity with the United States; that we can dispense with the American market which takes five times as much from us as the rest of the world, except Great Britain, even under the present restrictions.

I will now make a comparison between our exports to Great Britain and our exports to the United States. Now, the exports of animals and their products and the exports of the products of the forests, are larger to Great Britain than to any other country; but of the exports of the mine we send to Great Britain to the value of $630,815, and to the United States $3,963,257; of fisheries, we export to Great Britain to the value of $2,707,422, and to the United States $2,850,528; of agricultural produce we export to Great Britain $3,661,826, and to the United States $7,915,293; of manufactures we export to Great Britain $1,816,147, and to the United States $2,667,282; of miscellaneous exports, we send to Great Britain $5,352 and to the United States $76,773. If we sum all these up, we find that in the exports of the mine, fisheries, agricultural produce, manufactures, and miscellaneous exports, we send to Great Britain to the value of $8,821,062, and to the United States we export to the value of $17,473,133, or we sent almost $2 to the United States for every dollar we send to England, except in animals and their products and the exports of the forest.

As my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has spoken about the West Indies being so well disposed about our trade, I propose to draw a comparison between our exports to the United States on the one hand, and our exports to the West Indies, Mexico, Central America, and South America on the other hand. Let us see how that comparison will pan out. Of animals and their products we exported to the United States to the value of $5,966,474 and to all South America and the West Indies we exported to the value of $24,255, or we sent to the United States $250 worth of animals and their products, for every dollar we sent to the West Indies, including Mexico, Central America and South America.

M. FOSTER. Are those our export figures?

Mr. CHARLTON. They are taken from our Trade and Navigation Returns for 1889-90. We sent of agricultural products to the United States $7,519,253 worth and to all the other countries I have mentioned $357,155 or we sent $21 worth to the United States for every dollar's worth we sent to all these countries; and yet we are told that the West Indies are well disposed to us, and are going to offer us a market that will compensate us for the market which we lose for all these articles in the United States. What nonsense that is? Of manufactures we exported to the United States to the value of $2,667,282, and to the West Indies, Mexico and the South American States, $99,011, or we sent $27 worth of manufactured goods to the United States for every dollar's worth we sent to these new countries, where there are no manufacturing industries. I am sure my hon. friend the Finance Minister is surprised at this. We sent of the various articles I have named a total of $16,153,009 worth to the United States and to the West Indies, Mexico and South America, we sent a total of $480,421 worth, or in other words we sent of all these articles to the United States, $33.50, for every dollar's worth we sent to all these countries which I have mentioned. Yet my hon. friend the Minister of Finance proposes to abandon that market in the United States, to leave it aside as not worth looking after, and to compensate us for the loss of that great market by sending to the creoles, the negroes, and the half-breeds of these countries, and trying to get a substitute for this great market in the United States which is not a quarter as much benefit to us to-day as it would be but for the absurd restrictions that both countries impose upon trade. Of articles, the export of which would be greatly increased if the duty were removed, we export to the United States: products of the mine to the value of $3,963,257, products of the forest to the value of $10,247,640, animals to the value of $5,966,474, agriculture to the value of $7,519,253, manufactures to the value of $2,667,282, or a total of $33,214,434. We export these goods to the United States and the trade in every one of these articles is diminished, cribbed, cabined and confined by absurd commercial restrictions and by heavy duties which prevent the expansion of that trade to the limits it would inevitably reach if these restrictions were removed. Notwithstanding all these restrictions and barriers, as I have shown you, the comparative volume of the trade with the United States as compared with all these other countries, is 33½ times greater, and it is five times greater than our trade with all the world outside of Great Britain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we export to the United States a certain line of articles for which we are almost exclusively depending upon that country for a market. We export larger to England than to the United States, of cheese, animals and forest products, but for horses, sheep, poultry, eggs, hides, wool, rye, barley, beans, malt, potatoes and hay, our market is almost exclusively with the United States, and we are largely dependent on that market, for the sale of lumber, fish, pease, &c. We sell very little of these articles anywhere else, and we must to a large extent, simply cease producing these articles if the United States market is debarred us, because it is impossible to find a substitute market for these articles anywhere else.

Now, Sir, the idea that my hon. friend entertains, if he does entertain the idea, that the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 with the United State, was a benefit to us, is an idea that strikes me with astonishment. The reciprocity treaty increased our trade with the United States fourfold in twelve years, and after that treaty was abrogated it has left the increase of our exports to the United States, after twenty-three years have elapsed, only $575,000 more than that trade was in 1866. These bald facts placed before my hon. friend the Minister of Finance ought to convince him that reciprocity is a matter of vast moment to this country. I repeat that the growth of our export trade to the United States, if it continued at the same ratio of increase as the increase from 1854 to 1866, would have given us an export trade to the United States, to-day, of more than $100,000,000 in place of about $40,000,000 which we now have. We are losing the opportunity to fill this country with a large population, to increase the prosperity of this country, and to keep our people at home for the lack of that great market to which our people go for the purpose of supplying the wants of that market from a source of supply from which they can fill their orders without being met by Custom-house officials

There are some other features in this question which are not often dwelt upon, and which were brought very prominently under my notice in connection with investigations of the Ontario Mining Commission, of which I was chairman. I could not but be struck with the great possibilities which opened for this country for trade with the United States, if the restrictions upon the importation of minerals into that country were removed. I will trouble the House for a few moments with some statistics with regard to the possibilities in this branch of trade with the United States, which is a somewhat novel point in this discussion. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) confined his remarks exclusively to the agricultural features of the problem, but we have something else besides the farming industry of this country. We have the lumber industry, which is the second greatest industry in Canada, and which would be greatly benefited by free trade; we have got the fishing industry which would receive vast benefits from free trade, and we have the mining industry—and I propose now to direct my attention for a few moments to what might be the benefits accruing to this country through the free admission of our ores and minerals into the markets of the United States. The production of minerals in the United States last year was estimated at $584,000,000, and that was about five times greater per capita than the production of minerals in the Dominion of Canada, although we know that the Dominion is prominently a mineral country, and that Ontario is one of the richest mineral countries in the world. Now, last year the United States made use of $25,000,000 worth of building stone, and we are shut out of that market by heavy duties. The duty on marble going into the United States is 65 cents per cubic foot, and on ordinary building stone, 11 cents per cubic foot, and the operation of that duty destroys our trade. The export from Ontario to the United States last year was $147 worth of stone, and the export from the whole Dominion was $54,823, while the consumption in the United States was $25,000,000. Now, it happens that our quarries are situated in the most favourable locations for supplying the demand for structural material. We have in Canada almost all the valuable quarries to be found in the basin of the great lakes. Marble, freestone, granite and sandstone are abundant in the country extending from Kingston to Port Arthur, north of Lake Ontario, Lake Huron and Lake Superior; and many of these quarries are situated on the margin of the water, conveniently accessible to lake vessels. The Ontario Mining Commission examined a marble quarry on Garden River, which was 500 feet high, a mile wide and extended back into the country for a distance of 50 miles. The Nepigon sandstone quarries produce the best sandstone for building material on this continent, according to both fire test and frost test. This material could be shipped by water through the canals connecting the lakes, and could be laid down in Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Erie and Toledo; or it could be transhipped and sent by way of the Erie Canal to New York or Brooklyn. The products of the quarries of the Maritime Provinces could also be shipped by water to the ocean ports of the Eastern States. It was the estimate of the Mining Commission that of the $25,000,000 worth of building stone used in the United States, Canada would supply at least $5,000,000 if the American duties were removed. That would mean the employment of at least 10,000 people, and it would mean the payment of almost the entire amount of that money for labour and transportation.

Then, there was exported from Canada to the United States under the list of unenumerated articles, which comprise brick, tile, lime and cement, $15,503 worth; and the production of brick and tile in the United States is $47,000,000, of lime $23,375,000, and of cement $5,186,000, or a total production of those articles amounting to $75,561,000. The American duty on brick and tile is 25 per cent., on lime 6 cents per cwt. including weight of package, and on cement 8 cents per cwt. including package. After careful investigation the Mining Commission arrived at the conclusion that Canada's natural advantages for engaging in the trade of supplying brick, tile, lime and cement to the United States would swell the export trade in these articles from less than $12,000 to over $4,000,000, because our sources of production are within easy reach of the localities where most of these products are chiefly used in the great cities of the north. And here would be 8,000 or 10,000 people employed in industries that now employ literally none. Then, we have boundless quantities of iron ore. In Ontario we have immense quantities most favourably situated, easily worked and close to navigation, so that the ore could be shipped with great facility to the furnaces of Ohio, Illinois, Western Pennsylvania and Western New York, while in Nova Scotia we have vast deposits close to deep water on the sea that can be shipped cheaply to any of the Atlantic ports of the United States. Last year a trade was done in iron ore from the mines of the Lake Superior district of 6,000,000 long tons, and we in Canada are just as favourably situated for supplying the demand, but are debarred from participation in that enormous trade by the duties imposed on iron ore. If these were removed, the Mining Commission, after careful investigation, arrived at the conclusion that not more than five years would elapse before Canada would export to the United States from the mines west of Port Arthur and north of Lake Ontario, and from the mines of Nova Scotia at least 4,000,000 long tons of iron ore per year, putting into circulation for labour and transportation $10,000,000 per year. Now, we have in these three items $19,000,000, which, according to the estimate of the Mining Commission, would almost immediately be added to the business of Canada, mainly in payment for labour, if the American tariff wall were taken down. Why, Sir, almost as great benefits would be derived by Canada from the expansion of its mining business as from the whole agricultural expansion that would result from taking down the tariff wall.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Whose estimate was that?

Mr. CHARLTON. That was the estimate of the Royal Commission of Ontario, composed of the Chairman, A. Blue, Secretary, Mr. Coe, practical iron miner, William Hamilton Merritt, mining engineer, and Dr. Bell, geologist.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I meant, who made that particular estimate?

Mr. CHARLTON. These matters were taken into consideration by the commission. Perhaps I had as much to do with many of the estimates as anybody else—Mr. Blue and myself—but these estimates are probably far within the mark. Now, Sir, if we had the tariff wall taken down, in addition to the expansion that would take place from the export of our iron ore, our excellent building stones, our brick, lime, and cement, we would greatly increase our exports of coal, copper, nickel, gypsum, mica, asbestos, phosphates, plumbago and salt; and we would very greatly stimulate the production of silver and gold, of both of which we have enormous quantities in Western Ontario. The silver district in Port Arthur is probably the richest in America, and there are large deposits of gold as well; and the removal of the duty and the influx of American capital into that region which would follow would give an immense stimulus to the production of these metals. There is no question that within three or four years there would be added to the business of the country in all these lines annually at least $25,000,000, which would be expended mainly for labour. Now, I ask the hon. Finance Minister if that is not a matter of more importance than the fostering of a few sickly manufactures in some city or town that cannot exist without the pabulum of the Government to sustain them. The fact is, the importance of reciprocity cannot be over-estimated. We fail to realize the great possibilities to this country in obtaining access to the markets of the 65,000,000 people to the south of us—a people with a rush of business, possessed of ample capital, and with a spirit of enterprise which would immensely develop the resources of this country and add to the business of our people.

Now, my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, tells us that it is through no fault of Canada that the McKinley Bill was passed. It was asserted by some of his colleagues in St. John that it was the fault of my hon. friend from South Oxford and myself; but I suppose the hon. gentleman does not endorse that assertion, and I have great pleasure in saying that I believe the hon. gentleman is right, and that it was not in consequence of the action of Canada, and not for the purpose of punishing Canada, that the McKinley Bill was passed. The McKinley Bill was the outcome of a political necessity. The Republican party of that country, the high protectionist party, had to deal with the farming population. The farmer began to realize, dimly in some cases and pretty vividly in others, that the tariff had been robbing him for a great many years, that he had been made the prey of monopolists, and had contributed by his hard earnings to build up the colossal fortunes of such men as Andrew Carnegie and other manufacturing nabobs; and he was getting rebellious. Under these circumstances the Republican party found it necessary to placate the farmers, and, like our friends opposite, some years ago, they persuaded the farmers that they were going to give them protection. I say the agricultural schedule of the McKinley Bill was passed, not through any fault of ours and not through any desire to injure us, but to conciliate the farmers of the United States, and these high duties of 30 cents a bushel on barley and $30 on horses, and others in proportion were for the purpose of deluding the American farmer into the belief that he was going to get higher prices for these products through the imposition of those duties. He has not got higher prices, because our production is so small compared with his, that it takes simply so much out of our pockets and puts nothing into his, and I hope he will eventually realize this fact and secure the abolition of the Bill. But whatever influence caused the passage of the Bill, there is one feature of the case unfortunately we cannot lose sight of, and that is that it is a very bad Bill for us; and the question is how are we to get rid of it. The question is not how was it passed, or whose fault was it that it passed, but what are the influences we can bring to bear which will rid us of this measure so detrimental to the interests of our agricultural population? My hon. friend says that Canada has made, time and again, offers of reciprocity to the United States on a fair basis. On what basis have we offered them reciprocity? On a basis they told us from the commencement they would not accept. What is the use of making offers to a man year after year, which he spurns, and which he says it is no use making. Why, it is a piece of mockery, and the offer has been made, not because our hon. friends had any idea that they could obtain reciprocity, but to amuse the Canadian public and deceive them with the belief that the Government were doing something in the direction of getting reciprocity. So, last February, our friends opposite, fearing that if they waited until the proper time to hold an election they would be turned out of office, concluded to dissolve the House; and that they might have a pretext for dissolution, they declared that they wished to appeal to the country for a sanction to enter into negotiations to secure a reciprocity treaty on the basis of the treaty of 1854. This was a false pretence; this was trifling with the public. They had no reason to suppose they could get a treaty on that basis, because they knew they could not; and yet they solemnly dissolved the House and appealed to the country, assigning that as a reason, deceiving the country with a proposition to obtain a treaty on a basis on which they knew it was impossible to obtain it. Well, the course the Government has hitherto pursued on this question is a disingenuous course; it is a course of false pretences from beginning to end. They had no desire to secure reciprocity, and I doubt if they would accept it on any basis. I repeat that the whole course of the Government has been a course of false pretences with regard to this policy. Now we stand face to face with the question. Our hon. friends have to go to Washington in October. They say they are going down on the invitation of Mr. Blaine. I would like to enquire of the hon. Finance Minister who procured the invitation from Mr. Blaine? Did my hon. friend write for it himself, or did the British Minister go and beg it? I suppose there was a kind of invitation to go down, no doubt an intimation that they would be received, but the assertion which has been made that the invitation came primarily from Mr. Blane, that Mr. Blaine expressed his desire that hon. gentlemen should go down to Washington to talk reciprocity, and that he invited them to go, without being in any way prompted to issue that invitation, I gravely doubt. And we know that during the progress of the election contest last February, Mr. Blaine placed himself upon record as substantially denying the assertion of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches that they had opened negotiations and had a fair prospect of obtaining reciprocity on the basis of the treaty of 1854. They dissolved Parliament for the purpose of appealing to the country and to get the sanction of the people with regard to these negotiations, which they professed to have had in progress at Washington; and in the midst of the electoral contest which they precipitated on the people under this pretence, a letter was published addressed by a member of Congress to Mr. Blaine, asking if it were true, and we had Mr. Blaine's letter in reply asserting it was false, asserting that there was no such proposition before the Government at Washington, and that the Government would entertain no proposition for reciprocity except unrestricted reciprocity, so that hon. gentlemen opposite have been trifling with the people since last February. They have been placing before the people false pretences in regard to this matter, and their game was partially spoiled by the fact that the American Secretary of State would not lie under the imputation placed upon him, but stated that the assertions made were entirely outside of the truth. These gentlemen went to Washington some time ago. Their stay there was rather short. I do not suppose they got so far as to talk about unrestricted reciprocity in natural products or anything else. But my hon. friend the Finance Minister is again going to Washington. What is he going to do? Is he going to continue this game of hoodwinking and deceiving the people by holding out the assertion that he is honestly working for reciprocity, that he is engaged in negotiations to that end, and that he has reasonable hope to expect success? Is that what he is going for? Probably it is. Is he prepared to go and treat on a basis on which we can obtain reciprocity, or does he intend saying to Mr. Blaine: if we can get reciprocity in natural products we will take it; but if we cannot, we will have nothing to do with you. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman is prepared to go further than was stated in the reasons given by the Government for dissolving the House. If he is not, he may as well stay at home and bring this little comedy to an abrupt conclusion. But if he is prepared to go further, what is the length he is prepared to go? If he is prepared to obtain reciprocity on the basis we propose, why denounce us as disloyal and say that we advocate a policy detrimental to the country. He must do one thing or the other. Either close this thing down or get reciprocity and cease traducing the party which is favourable to getting reciprocity on the only terms on which we can get it.

Our hon. friends have a great deal to say about discriminating against England. Now, whose interests are we in charge of here? Are we in charge of the interests of England or of the interests of Canada? Are we to guard against discriminating against England's interests, primarily and exclusively, or have we something to say about Canadian interests? Suppose we turn our attention to the question of discrimination against Canadian interests. If this country is languishing for a certain trade policy, if it is languishing for access to certain markets, and if access to these markets can be obtained, and if we refuse to obtain them through some sentimental feeling with regard to a country over which we have no control, are we not discriminating against our own interests? What troubles me is the question of discrimination against Canada. England will take care of herself. It is not essential to England's prosperity that we should adopt a policy that will impoverish us. It will ultimately be to the benefit of England if we adopt a policy that will benefit ourselves; if we see clearly before us that this policy will benefit Canada, we may rely on it it will ultimately benefit England. But we have been discriminating against England since 1879 to the utmost of our ability. We have been seeking to shut her out of our markets as much as we possibly can, although we have been all the while depending on England for a market for a large quantity of the products of our soil; and the men who inaugurated that policy and who defend it to-day are the men who stand up here and talk about discriminating against the mother country. Now, the object of that policy I suppose my hon. friend will tell me is to build up the home market here. I do not know if he will deny that. I assume that is the object of that policy. Suppose, if that is the case, that we get access to the markets of a country where they have had the same policy in force for thirty years and where they have gone as far as we can hope to go in twenty-five years more, if we can get access to the markets of that country free and can get all the advantages which we can hope to obtain here in another quarter of a century, would not that be a good thing, even from the hon. gentleman's own point of view? If protection is good and if we can get free access to the markets of that country which has had the policy of protection in force for so long, it will make the attainment of the object of the hon. gentleman 25 or 30 years nearer than if we had to depend upon that policy in our own country. Of course, my hon. friend sees that plainly, being a protectionist and being engaged in the task of building up a home market. It is said that, if we adopt this policy, we shall lose our standing in the English market, and that England will retaliate. England does not give us free access to her markets on our account. She opens her markets to the whole world, and it is on her own account and in her own interest that she does so, in order that she may obtain raw material for her manufactures and food for her artizans at the lowest cost. She will continue to do that, no matter what policy we may adopt. England's policy is a free trade policy, and the trade policy of one of her colonies in America will have no influence whatever on the historic policy of England in opening her markets to the productions of the whole world.

It is said that we will have very serious revenue difficulties to meet, and that if we adopt unrestricted reciprocity we cannot possibly meet the revenue difficulties which will occur. I pointed out to my hon. friend that when we had a population of 4,200,000 we were able to get along with an expenditure of $24,000,000 a year, or about $12,000,000 less than we are expending to-day. Was any public interest sacrificed because our expenditure was $12,000,000 less than it is, and is it not possible for us to go back to the basis of expenditure even of the year 1881-82, or nearly so, and then we would save the whole amount which would be lost on the duties on American imports, which is about $8,000,000? We had a surplus of nearly $4,000,000 last year, and we certainly could economize, if it were necessary to do so, so as to get our expenditure back to about the point at which it stood in 1881-82. If we do that, we dispose at once of the revenue difficulty.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the only revenue difficulty? Is that the only revenue you would lose?

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend might claim that the importations from the United States would be larger, and that those from England would be smaller.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly they would if you discriminate.

Mr. CHARLTON. But my hon. friend forgets that this policy is calculated to increase the resources of Canada, to increase the wealth of Canada, to bring back the million Canadians who are now in the United States, to stop the exodus of nearly 100,000 people who are going every year to the United States, that it is calculated to open our mines, our fisheries, our lumber interests, calculated to give a better market to our farmers, and to add enormously to the material wealth, the population, and the tax-paying resources of this country. It is possible that it may take a year or two to readjust matters, and it is possible that a deficit may have to be met for two or three years, but let it be met. The country will be glad to meet a deficit on that account, rather than to see its money squandered in useless railway subsidies. This is a policy which will make the country prosperous, and populous and great, and the country will be glad to meet the slight difficulties which may arise.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has not met the difficulty as to how he is going to raise the revenue?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you have wealth and population, I think the difficulty will solve itself.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it will.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do.

Mr. FOSTER. Actually, I cannot get it through my head.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some assertions were made during the late campaign which were very unfair to me. The Minister of Justice stated in Toronto, and I think the Minister of Finance himself stated, that I had accepted as true the proposition that direct taxation must be resorted to if we adopted this policy. I did nothing of the sort. I had pointed out, as a matter of theory, that direct taxation had its advantages and that it would be better to have direct taxation than not to have this system adopted with all its advantages; but I did not admit that direct taxation would be necessary, and I do not admit it now. I am going back a little over the ground I have taken. We have now in the United States about 1,000,000 Canadians. In 1880 we find that there were 712,368 Canadians in the United States, and that 930,000 children had been born in that country of Canadian parents. On the same proportion, taking the population at 1,000,000 Canadians in the United States in 1890, there would have been 1,259,000 children of Canadian parents born in that country. That represents a loss to this country of the best blood of Canada. Between 1871 and 1881 we had nearly 400,000 immigrants coming into Canada, and in 1881 we had only 15,000 persons of foreign birth in the country more than we had in 1871, so that we lost almost the whole of the foreign immigrants. I calculate that between the emigration of native Canadians and immigrants coming to Canada and then going to the United States, and the children of these people born in the United States, we have lost 3,600,000 people. That appears to be a large estimate, but say 3,000,000. If Canada to-day had 8,000,000 instead of 5,000,000, and had profitable employment for them and markets for the products of their labour, could not my hon. friend get more revenue out of 8,000,000 than he could out of 5,000,000? We propose the adoption of a policy that would put an end to the condition of things that has led to the loss of 3,000,000 people to this country. We propose to adopt a policy which will put an end to a condition of things under which our population has increased only 18 per cent. in the decade between 1871 and 1881, while that of the United States has increased 30 per cent. We propose to adopt a policy which will increase our population at least 12 per cent. more than it now increases in a decade, a policy which will make Canada a prosperous country, a policy that will give her better markets and better prices than she now has for the products of the soil, of the forest, of the fisheries and of the mines, and which will give to the labour of the country a net return double what it is now. That policy, increasing the population, increasing the wealth, increasing the net returns of labour, must, in the end, adjust any revenue difficulty and leave this country in a position where it can pay its necessary expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. How?

Mr. CHARLTON. By increasing the population, by increasing the wealth, by increasing the productive capacity of this country, by increasing our exports, by increasing the returns from labour, by increasing the money that goes into the pockets of the people as a result of their labour.

Mr. FOSTER. How does it increase your revenue from import taxes?

Mr. CHARLTON. If we have unrestricted reciprocity and command of our own tariff, can we not adjust our tariff in such a way as to provide means for raising a revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. But you are going to have free trade.

Mr. CHARLTON. If we take the burdens off the people in one direction will they not be satisfied to allow a like burden to be put on in another direction? If the country has a wealthy population, and a population earning more money, will the people not be willing to run their Government out of their increased earnings as a return for the blessings they will enjoy under unrestricted reciprocity instead of the depression, the debt and the interest charges that you are piling up upon them, and this eternal howling about loyalty, and about the difficulties of the position, and the impossibility of adopting a plan that will give prosperity to the people because you refuse to remit some of that tax under which the nation is staggering.

Mr. FOSTER. You will not meet the question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have met it, and overlapped it, and demolished it, and my antagonist has not sense enough to see it.

Mr. FOSTER. You have not told us yet how to raise a revenue.

Mr. CHARLTON. If you will put us on that side of the House we will tell you, and we will let you learn by actual demonstration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal said about loyalty, and on this point I would like to know what is the difference between my hon. friend and myself. If he goes down to Washington prepared to secure reciprocity on the basis of natural products, while I am in favour of a broader system of reciprocity, what is the difference? The difference is in kind, is it? Not at all; the difference is in degree simply. He is disloyal as well as myself; I may be a little more disloyal than he is because I go further. But if reciprocity in any sense is disloyalty, then reciprocity in any degree or shape is disloyal.

Now, Sir, there are unquestionable forces at work towards the consummation, at some future day, of a political union between this country and the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. They are forces that we cannot reach, and my hon. friends here cannot reach, by legislation. They are natural forces, and what are they? Why, the exodus of our people to the United States is one of them. A million of our people are in the United States with all their descendants, and you have communication between this million of people and their friends in Canada, the people in Canada learning of the United States, learning of its institutions, hearing their sons and their daughters praising its institutions and speaking of that country in terms of the highest commendation, and prejudices gradually breaking down. This exodus is a powerful force, working towards ultimate political union. You cannot help it, you cannot control it; but you can lessen it by adopting a policy that will keep these people at home, as we propose to do. Then proximity itself is a force working for it. These two people, side by side, with their business relations and their social relations, becoming better and better acquainted with each other, learning how little difference exists between the two—this itself is a force working in that direction. Then similarity is another force. The two people are of the same race, they speak the same language, they have the same institutions, the same laws, they have the same form of Government, and this of itself, when it becomes apparent to the people in each country, is a force that works in the direction I speak of. Then the injury done to both people from the existence of the Customs line is another great force. No man having paid a Customs duty on an article that he has bought for his own use and has imported into either country but has felt that if he could demolish that system he would demolish it, he would trample upon it, he would spit upon it—that is his feeling with regard to a Customs tariff. That system existing between these two countries and the injury resulting from it is a force working powerfully towards political union.

Mr. FOSTER. But you intend to retain it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all; I intend to mitigate it, to diminish it. I do not intend to retain the monstrosity that my hon. friend is defending, which is a beast of a very different colour. Then the question of future peace between the two countries is another force working for political union. Here is a possibility of future war. The people see it; they see in the future that great disasters may befall them because they are living under separate Governments. And that itself is a force beyond our control, and working in the same direction. Then the idea that by political union the cost of great armaments could be saved in the future is another powerful reason for union. The attraction the greater has for the less is another force, and these forces, I repeat, are all working in this direction, and they are forces that are beyond our control, that we can do nothing with. When my hon. friend talks of reciprocal relations between the two countries as being likely to precipitate this result, it is sheer nonsense. On the contrary, they would be as likely possibly to postpone this result as to hasten it. Political union has, in my opinion, little or no bearing upon the cry of disloyalty which my hon. friend raises against an agitation of this kind. Now, I repeat, none of these forces are within the reach of legislation, so we may leave them on one side. We will have to let nature take its course, we will have to submit to the result, whatever nature decrees it shall be; but in the meantime let us promote our own well-being, our own prosperity, by diminishing the burden that rest upon us, by securing better markets, by keeping our people at home, by striving to make Canada a great people. That is our duty. Why, Sir, the condition of things that exists now, I will say to my hon. friend the Finance Minister, promotes rather than retards the approach of this consummation. In making the preservation of our autonomy so costly, in retarding our progress, in denying to our country its natural markets, all these things have a tendency in the direction my hon. friend deprecates. I repeat that political union is not an issue in this question, that it has little to do with this question. We have no business to consider it in connection with this question. The question we are considering is quite a different one, and we contend that our policy, if adopted, will give to this country more men, will give it more money, will give it better and more markets, will give it greater material progress, will give it a greater development of its latent resources. We are talking about the policy of my hon. friend, and we claim that it will secure all these blessings to this country. It is for that reason that I support this policy, not that I believe it has any immediate bearing upon the question of annexation one way or the other, but because I believe it is a policy that would benefit Canada, promote the material interests of Canada, and prove a blessing to our people in every respect.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—PRODUCTION OF PAPERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In accordance with the promise I made this afternoon, I lay on the Table of the House the original tenders that the leader of the Opposition wished to have. I thought of bringing down also the papers about the smaller contracts for the pumping plant and the caisson, as I thought they might be required, and I think I will have them probably in two or three days.

Mr. LAURIER. What contract do these papers refer to?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They are in connection with the contract for the machine shops. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 8th July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. WALLACE moved:

That the Order of the House of the 25th June last, to the effect that it is desirable that any witnesses called before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be examined under oath or affirmation touching any matters coming before them, be rescinded, as in the opinion of the Committee such an order should not be asked for from the House except upon the recommendation of the Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. I think such a motion as this requires notice.

Mr. WALLACE. This motion is made by the instruction of the Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no notice, and my opinion is that the motion will require the usual notice.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I will leave it as a notice. I may state that the motion was unanimously passed by the Committee, and is to be followed by another motion which was also passed by the Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. If the Committee adopted such a resolution and made a report to that effect it would come up for discussion, but such a motion requires notice.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I understand that is to be followed by another motion giving power to the Committee to examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You have that power already.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. In the Committee to-day it was stated by one of the members of the Government that that power ought not to have been given to the Committee without the Committee asking for it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is nonsense.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The motion which was carried in this House was mandatory. The proposed motion is simply that the Committee shall have power to do this. It is left optional with the Committee.

Mr. MULOCK. The other resolution was optional.

Mr. SPROULE. The point taken was that this power was given without the Committee having recommended it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This House can give the Committee such instructions as it sees proper. It does not require a report from the Committee.

Mr. WALLACE. The previous resolution had no notice given of it, and, as most of the members of the House did not understand the purport of it, it was smuggled through.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What possible objection can the Chairman have, or can the Committee have to a resolution enabling them to swear witnesses. It is said that now an investigation is going on which is being conducted by one of the members of the Committee, and it was said that he desired that witnesses should be examined under oath, as the matter was one of grave public importance. Some of the witnesses have been examined under oath, and it seems a very extraordinary thing that the Chairman of the Committee should now propose that this order of the House should be rescinded. What reasons can there be for that?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I wish to correct one statement of the member for West York (Mr. Wallace). He says that motion was practically smuggled through this House. I was the seconder of that motion, and I emphatically deny that there was any smuggling about it. It was moved by Mr. Mulock and seconded by myself, and put by the Speaker and carried by the House. There was no desire on the part of either the mover or the seconder to smuggle it through. We thought we had a right to ask for the power to swear witnesses, and we asked for that power in an open manner. I think it is entirely out of place for the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to say that we tried to smuggle this motion through the House.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) knows very well what the practice is, and that the motion should have been brought before the Committee before it was submitted to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing now before the House. I have ruled that this motion requires notice.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 133) for the relief of Thomas Bristow.—(Mr. O'Brien.)

DEEPENING THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER CANALS.

Mr. COATSWORTH asked, Has the Government taken into consideration the advisability of deepening and enlarging the canals along the St. Lawrence River, to allow of sea-going vessels coming up to the ports on Lake Ontario? 2. If the question has been considered, what steps have been taken in the matter? 3. To what extent is it proposed to deepen and widen the canals? 4. Has the work been commenced, and how far has it progressed? 5. What is the estimate of the probable cost of the work? 6. What is the largest draught of vessel for which the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario is navigable at present? 7. Could not the St. Lawrence River and canals between Montreal and Lake Ontario be made navigable for sea-going vessels of the largest size that come up to the port of Montreal? If so, what would be the probable expense?

Mr. BOWELL. 1. No. 2. No. 3. So that vessels drawing 14 feet can pass from Montreal to Lake Ontario. 4. Work was begun in 1873, and about half of it is completed. 5. $22,250,000 for a 14 feet channel, that is to complete. 6. Nine feet at ordinary stages of the water in the river. 7. This subject has not been investigated by the engineers of the department, and no estimate has, therefore, been made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Say a hundred million.

Mr. BOWELL. I think it would take a couple of hundred millions, as near as I can ascertain.

DISMISSAL OF EUGÈNE SOUCY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Has a person named Eugène Soucy, who, in 1888, was, for drunkenness, dismissed from his position as conductor on the Intercolonial Railway, been appointed to another position on the same railway? If he has been so appointed, to what position and on whose recommendation?

Mr. BOWELL. Eugène Soucy, who was dismissed for drunkenness in 1888, was re-employed by a party whose name I forget, but I hope I will find it in a minute. As soon as the superintendent, Mr. Pottinger, heard of his re-employment, he discharged him.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Can you tell me when?

Mr. BOWELL. No; I cannot. If it is on my memorandum, as soon as I get it I will let you know.

MR. JAMES ALLEN.

Mr. McNEILL asked, 1. Is it known in the Department of Indian Affairs that Mr. James Allen, referred to in questions put by the member for South Grey, was for about a quarter of a century one of the most respected members of the county council at Bruce? 2. How long has Mr. Allen been employed as Indian agent by the department? 3. Since he has been acting as Indian agent, has Mr. Allen's conduct been such as to cause this department to give any credence to these charges? 4. Are all of these charges, of which the department has any cognizance, preferred by Indians? 5. Are baseless charges frequently preferred against Indian agents by Indians? 6. Is it within the knowledge of this department that the last of these charges preferred against Mr. Allen is untrue? 7. Has any enquiry been held as to those charges? If so, what is the result of the enquiry? 8. Has the department received any communication as to these charges from the Rev. Wm. Savage, Methodist missionary of Saugeen Reserve? 9. If so, what is the purport of it?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. The department has reason to believe that Mr. James Allen filled an important position for some time in the county council of Bruce. 2. Mr. Allan was appointed Indian agent on 7th November, 1887. He has, therefore, been employed by the Indian Department $3\frac{7}{12}$ years. 3. Mr. Allen's conduct since his appointment has not been such as to lay him open to the suspicion that such charges could be true of him. 4. All of the charges referred to by Mr. Landerkin on the first occasion were laid by Indians; those referred to by Mr. Landerkin more recently were made by Mr. John Creighton, of Southampton, County of Bruce. 5. Charges which are found upon investigation to rest upon very slight, if any, foundation, are sometimes made by Indians against agents. 6. The last charge against Agent Allen referred to by Mr. Landerkin, namely, that he was so illiterate as to scarcely be able to sign his name, is not borne out by the evidence which the reports received from that officer furnish as to his intelligence and capability. 7. An investigation has been held into the charges. The report of the Inspector of Indian Agencies and Reserves has been only recently received, and it is at present under consideration. 8 and 9. A communication has been received from Rev. Wm. Savage, Methodist missionary on Saugeen Reserve, as to the charges made against Allen, and Mr. Savage speaks in the highest terms of Agent Allen.

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY SUPPLIES.

Mr. FORBES asked, What are the names of the several persons or firms who tendered to supply Dorchester Penitentiary for the current year with supplies as required? What was the amount of the tender accepted, and what were the amounts of the several tenders, and was the lowest tender accepted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Most of the matter enquired about would be more suitable for a return; but I will send the papers containing the information to the hon. gentleman, so that he may afterwards move for a return if he desires to do so. The lowest tender has been accepted, except in one case, for dry goods. What was actually the lowest tender, a few dollars lower than any of the others, was received a few days too late, and I thought I could not accept it.

STEAMER STANLEY.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to lay before Parliament during the present session a return to an Order of the House of Commons made 12th May, 1891, having reference to the steamer Stanley, the number of trips made to and from the mainland and Prince Edward Island, cost, &c., during the winter of 1891?

Mr. TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to lay these papers before the House during the present session. I may take this opportunity of explaining to the hon. gentleman briefly the reason of the rather long delay that has occurred in preparing these papers. It would have been no trouble to have promptly laid on the Table the papers covered by the motion moved by the hon. gentleman on this question. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) moved an amendment, however, to the motion of the hon. gentleman asking for these papers, to the effect that the correspondence between the agent at Charlottetown and the department should also be brought down. That is very voluminous, indeed. It has all been prepared, however. It was ready a short time ago, and would have been brought down then, but I discovered that the papers did not fully comply with the terms of the motion, since they referred also to correspondence with the Post Office Department. I immediately communicated with that department, and in a short time the papers from that department will be ready, and it will be possible to complete the return and bring it down.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF HOLSTEIN.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Who is the postmaster at Holstein? When was he appointed?

Mr. HAGGART. There has been no postmaster appointed in the place of the postmaster who has resigned at Holstein.

BIG BAY WHARF, NORTH GREY.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, What was the nature and extent of the work done at Big Bay wharf, in the township of Keppel, North Grey, during the summer of 1890, the total amount expended being $2,065? What are the details of this expenditure?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work done at Big Bay consisted in taking down to the low water level nine cribs and the outer block, rebuilding the same to the original height of 10 feet above low water, and filling them with ballast, renewing the springers across the opening, and replanting the whole of the roadway, the total length of the work being 400 feet. The cost was $2,000 for the work and $65 for the clerk of works.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL WORKS.

Mr. BARRON asked, What has been the total cost of erecting and constructing the locks and canals at Fenelon Falls, Buckhorn, Lovesick and Burleigh, respectively, on the route of the Trent Valley Canal? What has been the total revenue from the Fenelon Falls lock and canal since its construction?

Mr. BOWELL. The total expenditure was as follows:—Fenelon Falls, $125,529.81; Buckhorn, $123,954; Burleigh and Lovesick, $260,209.92; total, $509,693.73. The late Mr. John Page, Chief Engineer of Canals, made an award, dated 29th January, 1890, of $31,332 (not detailed), which covered claims on Buckhorn, Burleigh and Lovesick lock gates and Burleigh and Lovesick locks. In the total of $509,693.73 is included an amount of $2,056, balance due on final estimate for lock gates at Buckhorn, Burleigh and Lovesick, which is also included in the award of $31,332. Fenelon Falls lock was opened for traffic on 1st July, 1889. The amount of revenue for 1889-90 was $41.17; for 1890-91, $84.96; total amount of revenue, $126.13.

TARTE-McGREEVY ENQUIRY—COUNSEL.

Mr. McMULLEN. Some days ago I asked for the name or names of counsel retained by the Government in connection with the enquiry in regard to the charges made by Mr. Tarte now being conducted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and what is the rate of remuneration to be paid to each of such counsel. The Minister of Justice replied that the names of the counsel retained were Messrs. Osler from Toronto and Henry of Halifax, and he added:

"I am not quite prepared to give the hon. member this afternoon the other details which he asks for, and it may be better that the question should stand, in order that I may be able to inform him, besides the particulars, of the instructions which these gentlemen have received."

I should like to know if the Minister is now prepared to answer the balance of the question?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot, for the same reason that prevented me the other day. Those gentlemen, I am sorry to say, have not been paid, and I have not fixed the rate of remuneration yet. I will give the information to the hon. gentleman, and the instructions also, if he would like to have them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to ask the hon. Minister a question before we get away from this subject. I understand that, practically, the counsel to which the Minister of Justice refers are counsel that are for the defence of Mr. Perley and the Department of Public Works. It is certainly impossible to distinguish between Mr. Henry and Mr. Osler in the matter, and if the investigation is carried on in that way I would ask whether the Government contemplate paying all the counsel who are before the committee—that is, other than the counsel for the witnesses.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The two counsel referred to are employed by the Public Works Department, under these circumstances: When I told the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Mc Mullen) that I would give him the instructions to counsel I wished to be more specific on that point than I could be in stating them from memory. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to state from memory, subject to correction by the writing, I will state from my recollection that the instructions are these: The enquiry relates to the expenditure of a very large sum of public money, as to which, indefinitely, certain charges have been made against the Public Works Department, as well as certain definite charges against particular officials of that department. Inasmuch as this enquiry is proceeding under the instructions of this House, the Government thought it proper that counsel should be employed, not only to watch the investigation from day to day, but to aid in the investigation, for the purpose of eliciting all the facts surrounding that matter; with a view, not to the defence of any particular officer merely, but with the view of eliciting all the facts in every possible way. So far from these instructions confining counsel to the defence of any particular person or department, the instructions require that if any person should be implicated in any impropriety whatever the matter should be followed up to the fullest extent, and then counsel would assume the position of counsel for the prosecution, instead of being for the defence.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

On the Order being called for:

The House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—That it is expedient that sugar be placed upon the free list.

Mr. MULOCK. With regard to this motion, I understand that, according to parliamentary practice, inasmuch as the subject-matter of this motion is not under consideration in the discussion of the motion of the Minister of Finance, that it would not be in order for me to move this motion now. If that is the parliamentary practice, I would have no other course to pursue now than to allow my motion to be absorbed in that of the Minister of Finance. I intimate now that my object in letting the motion drop is in deference to what is the parliamentary practice, and of course, Mr. Speaker, you are the one to rule on that.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is quite correct as to the practice. This motion would anticipate a discussion on an Order set down for consideration on the Orders of the Day, and therefore, according to the rules of parliamentary practice, it could not be taken up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a point of some importance to settle. I am not going to object to my hon. friend letting his motion stand, as it may be more for public convenience; but permit me to call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that it appears to me that the motion discussed on Monday, as to binding twine, stood in the same category as this motion, so far as I can see.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will try to indicate to the House why I think not. The question as to the second reading of the report of Committee of Ways and Means has direct reference to the question of sugar. There was no reference to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on binding twine at all, and it was because there was direct reference to the motion in reference to sugar that I ruled that the two motions did not stand upon the same footing.

Mr. MULOCK. It will be quite in order for this motion to be made on the motion of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. SPEAKER. Certainly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

ALLOWING MOTIONS TO STAND.

On the Order being called for the three motions on the Order paper in the name of Mr. Davin: the first with reference to the policy of the Government on immigration to the North-West Territories; the second with reference to the conduct of Lawrence W. Herchmer, Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police, and the third with reference to prairie fires in Manitoba and the North-West Territories.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Stand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask what the object is in asking these motions to stand. It is well understood that it is an abuse of power given under the rule to ask a motion to stand, unless the Government proposes to deal in some way with the subject, or unless they require, for some reason or other, further consideration. A motion should be dropped from the paper unless the member is prepared to proceed with it, and except, of course, there is a reason on the part of the Government, such as I have indicated, that it should be allowed to stand.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With regard to the motions in the name of the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I think there is a very fair reason why they should stand, unless the hon. gentleman asks that they should be dropped. For instance, the policy of the Government with regard to immigration will come up when the Estimates are before the House for supplies for immigration, and the discussion will come up better in that connection.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a reason why the motion should be dropped, because you do not propose to take the discussion in connection with another matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It very often happens that a member is willing to defer his motion until he acertains from the discussion on the Estimates what the policy of the Government will be, and failing to get satisfactory assurance or explanation then, he may desire to go on with his motion. For that reason, I did not think it was wise to press the hon. gentleman to drop the motion, although I think it would be better that it should not be pressed. As regards the second motion, the facts are these: The hon. gentleman asked for a report on Mr. Herchmer's conduct; and that report has not yet been delivered to the Government, but I promised it will be brought down as soon as it is ready. I presume the hon. gentleman desires the motion to stand until the report is brought down. With reference to the third motion, dealing with prairie fires: inasmuch as the hon. gentleman has a Bill on the subject, I presume he will allow it to drop.

Mr. DAVIN. That motion can be dropped.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. TARTE (translation) moved for:

Copies of all advertisements calling for tenders for the construction of a caisson in the Graving Dock at Esquimalt; the names of the tenderers, and of that one or those who obtained the contract; the amount paid for this caisson; and all correspondence respecting its construction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since circumstances have led me to study the working of the Department of Public Works, I have found that most contradictory decisions are constantly rendered, it seems, according to the times or according to the manner of the persons who are in any way connected with them. If you go back four or five years, you see that one day such or such a tender is declared too low, although made by responsible parties. If you go one or two years further back, you find decisions just the opposite. The motion I now make is based upon facts which I can have no doubt of, but about which I would like to be further enlightened. If I am not mistaken, when the question came of building a caisson at Esquimalt four or five tenders were received, some higher, some lower. The lowest was that of Carrier, Lainé & Co., certainly one of the best established firms of the country, one of the most responsible firms of the country. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, if I am well informed, the then Chief Engineer of the Department declared that the contract should not be given to the firm of Carrier, Lainé & Co. because its tender was too low. I repeat it, this firm is one of the most responsible firms of the country; it must be worth at least a quarter of a million. And what do I see, Mr. Speaker? On the 23rd June, 1885, the Engineer of the Department, without even asking them if they were ready to do the work, declares that their tender is too low. What further do I see? I find that on the 19th of the same month, without any communication having taken place, the firm of Carrier, Lainé & Co. declare that they desire to withdraw their tender, and why? For reasons which they say they do not wish to give. So, Mr. Speaker, on the 3rd of June the Chief Engineer of the Department of Public Works had declared that this firm, which was worth a quarter of a million, could not do a work for which it had tendered for forty thousand dollars. On the 19th that firm, having doubtless concerted with the highest tenderer, declare that it is not ready to do the work. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this fact, although it bears on no very considerable sum of money, is one of the straws which shows which way the wind was blowing then, and which way the wind is blowing now. I call to this fact, as many others have done before me to other facts, the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works, who is listening to me now. In his Department, for the last ten years, as I have just said, the most singular things and the most scandalous decisions are met with. It should be time that the Province of Quebec, if not the whole country, know how matters stand. It should be time to know when responsible houses, responsible firms, honourable men, business men, tender to this Department, they are to be treated according to the rule of right, and, I will add, according to the rule of honour. I will ask, further, if it is not time that the House open its eyes. I wish to anticipate nothing, but neither do I wish to leave in the shade facts which deserve the attention of my colleagues; and if I am speaking French at this moment, it is from the wish to be better understood by the hon. Minister of Public Works, who is still at this moment the chief of his race in the Government. So, Mr. Speaker, I offer the motion of which I gave notice a few days ago.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I have to say that there will be no objection to the papers requested being brought down, especially as these papers are already before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I could not examine them to answer the hon. member; but, as far as I know, the firm of Carrier, Lainé & Co. had, on 17th June, 1885, I believe, sent a letter asking to withdraw their tender, and it is on the 24th or 25th of the same month that the Order in Council was passed granting the contract to the Dominion Bridge Company. I cannot answer the hon. member beyond this, but I like to believe that his information is not altogether correct. However, the papers will be brought before the House.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (translation) moved for:

Copies of all petitions, correspondence and documents whatsoever respecting the grant of a subsidy to the Quebec Eastern Railway.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before presenting the motion of which I have given notice, I hope that the House will permit me a few remarks to explain the object of this motion, and to draw the attention of this House to a scheme of public interest in which the Province of Quebec, and particularly the counties on the southern shore of the St. Lawrence, is concerned, and which will certainly interest the whole Dominion before long. In 1868 there was formed in Quebec a company which was incorporated by a statute of the Province of Quebec, under the name of the "Quebec Eastern Railway Company," and given power to build a railway from a point on the Quebec Central Railway, in the Parish of St. Anselme, across the Counties of Dorchester, Bellechase and Montmagny to the Maine frontier. This company, Mr. Speaker, had another object in asking for incorporation, that of developing the immense lumber, farming and mining resources of the whole valley of the St. John River. On this vast tract of land, lying between the Alleghaney Mountains and the Maine boundary, are immense forests which only require the woodman's axe to open to agriculture from 75 to 80 parishes, which would, later on, rank amongst the most bountiful parishes of Quebec. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, rich mines are to be found in the parishes already established which are to be crossed by this railroad; among others, mines of asbestos, pronounced by experts as very rich, have, a couple of yeary ago, been discovered at St. Léon de Standon, in the County of Dorchester. These mines, however, cannot now be worked to profit, owing to the difficulty of communication, they being at least thirty miles from any railway. Another advantage to be derived from the construction of this railway, should it be extended as far as Moose Head Lake or Herron Lake, to join the Canadian Pacific, would be that this road would furnish the short route so much needed and so long desired by the people of Quebec. The building of a bridge at Quebec would make this line a very important one, and give to the Canadian Pacific access to the Atlantic ports. The Quebec Legislature has already granted to this company a subsidy of 100,000 acres of land, and I am informed that the company has also applied to this Government for subsidies. These are the reasons why I move, seconded by Mr. Amyot, the resolution now in your hands.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I fully concur in the remarks just made by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Vaillancourt). I am happy to see this important question brought before Parliament. This railway scheme is not to be neglected, because it is in the interest of an old province, for we are not, I hope, to mind only the needs of the new provinces. We have spent, without murmur, without grumbling, millions, I would almost say hundreds of millions, to open a new country. Among others, the Province of Quebec has generously subscribed her share. It now comes before Parliament and declares that in the old Province of Quebec—this cradle of the British power in North America—there is an immense tract that can be colonized, through which we may build a railroad, which shall be the true Short Line, and which will considerably shorten the way between the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, on Canadian territory exclusively. I need not say that behind the chain of the Alleghanies there is an immense territory of most fertile land, interspersed with lakes, where numerous parishes can be established. One will admit with me, that when the short route between Montreal and the Maritime Provinces was built a road was built passing partly over American territory, the practical usefulness of which might cease at any time. Let us suppose that a day should come when the United States would refuse our goods the right of passage in bond over their territory, the usefulness of that road would become very problematical. The railway in question, from the County of Dorchester to the Maritime Provinces, would be built entirely on Canadian territory. Secondly, it must be kept in mind that sooner or later the city of Quebec must have an easier means of communication with Lévis, to connect its railway system with that of the south shore. If the Government keep their promise—and we shall soon know whether they do—we shall have a bridge. If, on the contrary, they entrench themselves behind the railway companies, and say: we will give such a sum, provided the Canadian Pacific or the Grand Trunk, or the Saguenay Railway, or, in short, the other railways converging at that point, subscribe such other amount. If the Government do this, it will be as a means of eluding their promise; but then it shall be the duty of all the members for the Province of Quebec, and of Parliament, to insure the earliest possible construction of large steamers to carry cars from one shore to the other. Now, the road that we are asking for will be a short route, that will materially contribute towards bringing a new trade to the city of Quebec, that will also add to the trade of the present railways on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and that will greatly contribute to the development of that part of the country. The Local Government has already made considerable sacrifices for this railway; it has caused it to be explored at different points, in order to get information on the probable cost of construction and on the return it might bring. Under these circumstances, I have been happy to second this motion for the papers in connection with the matter. It is now a question of putting the facts before the country, in order that our efforts may take a practical turn before long.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate my hon. friend for Dorchester (Mr. Vaillancourt) for having brought this question before the House, and I congratulate also my hon. friend for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) for having given his support to that measure. I have only a word to add to what was said by my neighbours. I entirely corroborate the opinions they have expressed, and I may add that if the Government is not already pledged to give subsidies to that railway, the Government candidate, during the last election in my county, pledged himself in the name of the Government to obtain subsidies in favour of that road. The question was debated in a prominent way. It was to be seen which was the candidate the better able to force the Government to grant such subsidies, and my opponent, who is a railroad man, who is the promoter of the Labrador railroad, claimed himself to be the stronger. He argued that he had promises from the Government, and added that when the question should come before the House he would only have to say the word and the promises that the Government had made to him would be fulfilled. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the present Government is a just Government, and when they make promises, be they to an opponent or to a supporter, they keep them, they always fulfil them. I arise now to ask the Government, in the name of my county and in the name of my opponent in the last election, to fulfil the promise that they made of giving subsidies to this road, if such promise was made. And I do not doubt that the promise was made, for I am convinced that a good Conservative never brings forth such a fact without being authorized. I, therefore, ask if the promise was made—and it was a very justifiable promise—that it be fulfilled, and that the Government give a subsidy to this line, which is to be of the highest importance to this country, and which is to be, as was said by the hon. member for Dorchester and for Bellechasse, a genuine short route, especially when we have a bridge between Quebec and Lévis. When the Federal Government has given such a subsidy this line, with the help of the Local Government, will soon be an accomplished fact, and the Government who authorize the candidates to make promises to the electors will have redeemed those they have made. So, Mr. Speaker, I hope that before long this railway will be put on the same footing as the others. I do not ask that it be given as much as the Canadian Pacific was given, but I ask for our share of the public moneys, and I hope that when the subsidies are brought before the House the same justice will be done this road that was done the Bonaventure Railway, with which the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) declared himself satisfied. I hope that when the subsidies are brought before the House justice will be done to this road, as well as to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, which the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Fauvel) has especially taken under his protecting influence.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection to bringing down all the papers. They simply consist of one petition from Mr. Faucher de St. Maurice, asking for a subsidy. If the hon. gentleman desires that petition to be brought down I will lay it on the Table as soon as possible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I will now translate into French, a little freely, the words of my colleague, now acting as Minister of Railways, as to the remarks made by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette).

I may tell him, with regard to the expressions used by his opponent during the last campaign, that the desire of this candidate was evidently that the road should be built, and that there should be granted it a subsidy. If in the heat of debate with the hon. member he said that there existed promises on this subject, I am sure that the hon. member will not hold rancor against him for having gone a little far in his speeches. As to the justice of the Government, the hon. member may be certain that the Government means always to be just, and if until now we have not been able, and if we are not able now, to do what the hon. members wish us to do for this road, I am convinced that these gentlemen will remember that London was not built in a day, and that sometimes a little time is required to discuss a question, to put it before the public, to put it before the Government and before the House. I congratulate the hon. member who has made this motion on his début in this House. He will not fail to see that the question, which is the subject-matter of this motion, has not as yet much occupied the deliberations of the House; consequently it will be an occasion for him to utilize his talent and his time, and I am convinced that he will not fail to give it all the earnestness which a new member always devotes to a matter of this kind. Mr. Speaker, there are not many papers to bring before the House, but should there be but one it shall be brought.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I understand that the declaration of the Government is this: This road will receive the help of the present Government at the same time as the Quebec bridge—that is, when two Sundays come together. Such is practically the resumé of the declarations that are made to-day. I also understand that we shall have to wait till the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific, the Quebec Central and all the railways, past, present and future, have come to an understanding, for the construction of the Quebec bridge and of this road.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved for:

Copies of all paper writings, documents, depositions, &c., respecting or in connection with the enquiry held at St. Flavie, on the line of the Intercolonial Railway, into the conduct of Mr. Hormidas Ouillet, superintendent of the workshops of the said Intercolonial Railway, as well as in relation to any other employés.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down all the papers in reference to the special case mentioned in the motion; but it asks also for all papers in connection with investigations in relation to any other employés on the railway. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would confine these to some date.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The investigations were all on the same day.

Mr. BOWELL. With that understanding, I am willing that the motion should pass.

Motion agreed to.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

On the Order being called for:

Copies of the tenders received and accepted for the construction of a caisson in connection with the Esquimalt Graving Dock; the report of Mr. H. F. Perley in this connection; and all other correspondence referring to this contract.—Mr. Tarte.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sure that if the hon. gentleman were here he would ask for these papers, and perhaps the House will allow it to form part of the other motion which was passed a few moments ago on the same subject, so that all the papers may be brought down together.

Mr. LAURIER. I will move the motion.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN ORDERED.

Copies of all Orders in Council granting aid toward the building of the Souris Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and all correspondence between the Minister of the Interior and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in reference to the same.—(Mr. Daly.)

CANAL CONTRACTS.

Mr. TROW moved for:

Copies of all tenders for the enlargement or construction of the undermentioned canals, and of all works chargeable to capital account connected therewith, as removal of shoals, forming of basins, aqueducts, weirs, raceways and dams, since Confederation; as well those completed as those in progress:—

1st. Enlargement of Welland Canal;
2nd. do St. Lawrence Canals from Prescott to Lachine;
3rd. do Lachine Canal;
4th. do Ottawa Canals from Grenville to St. Anne, both inclusive;
5th. Construction of Culbute Canal;
6th. do Trent Canal from Fenelon Falls to Burleigh Rapids, both inclusive;
7th. do Tay Canal;
8th. do Murray Canal;
9th. do Yamaska Canal;
10th. do Aux Lièvres Canal, progress up to date of last estimate;
11th. do Sault Ste. Marie Canal, progress up to date.

The return to contain the following information about each section or contract, as the case may be:—

A. Information concerning tenders:

(a.) The date on which the tenders were received;
(b.) The date on which the tenders were opened;
(c.) The date when the tenders were finally computed;
(d.) The date on which the abstract of amount of tenders was submitted to Minister;
(e.) The names and addresses of bidders;
(f.) The total aggregate amount of each tender, beginning with the lowest;
(g.) The amount of the cheque accompanying each tender;
(h.) The date of the return of the cheques to the successful bidders;
(i.) Whether interest was allowed on each cheque while on deposit;
(j.) If so, how much;
(k.) The reason why cheques of unsuccessful bidders were detained after their position was known;
(l.) Whether the invitation for tenders was by advertisement open to public competition, by private circular to a select few, or by special arrangement with some fortunate individual; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council referring thereto;
(m.) Whether the contract was awarded to the lowest bidder; and if not, why; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to the same;
(n.) If the lowest bidder declined accepting the work when awarded, why; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative thereto;
(o.) In case of declension by the lowest bidder, whether the contract was offered to the next in order, and if he declined, to the next, and so on until an acceptance was obtained; the reasons assigned by each for declining, with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to the same;
(p.) Whether the department was aware that bidders declining to accept their bids were partners of the successful contractor or got compensation?
(q.) Whether the cheques accompanying the tenders of parties declining to accept the award were forfeited; and if any, which?

(r.) The date when such forfeited cheques were returned; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative thereto;

(s.) Whether interest was allowed on any such forfeited cheques for the time detained, and if so, how much;

(t.) After publicly calling for tenders for any of these works and receiving them, when all were rejected, and why: with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative thereto;

(u.) When second or third tenders were called for the same job, side by side the aggregate of the respective bids by the same party, showing the increase or reduction, as the case may be, over the first bid, and the percentage reduced or increased.

B. Information concerning contracts:

(a.) The date of contract;

(b.) The date fixed by the contractors for the completion of the work;

(c.) The date when the contract was actually finished and accepted by the Government, and the cause of its delay or expedition; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative thereto;

(d.) The contractor's name and address;

(e.) The following information in one table, which shall contain all the items of the contract schedule, as well as any new items added to the schedule after the contract was signed, the latter to be designated as new. The said table to contain in the 1st column, the number of the item in contract schedule;

2nd. The designation of the class of work or material of such item;

3rd. The estimated quantity of such item;

4th. The completed quantity of such item or the quantity used to date;

5th. The contractor's price per unit or lump sum of such item;

6th. The engineer's estimate of the price per unit or bulk sum for such item, and the engineer's name (if more than one estimate, the price set by each);

7th. The price actually paid per unit or bulk sum for such item;

8th. The aggregate cost of such item, as per contractor's price;

9th. The aggregate cost of such item, as per engineer's estimate;

10th. The amount actually paid for such item:

11th. The difference, whether increase or diminution, between the contractor's aggregate price and the amount paid for such item;

12th. The difference between the engineer's estimate and the price paid for such item:

(f.) All correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to the addition of any new item to the contract schedule, after the contract was signed, and relative to the price allowed per unit or lump sum for such new item;

(g.) All changes, whether in location or dimensions of the prism of the canal, or in the site or dimensions of structures, after the contract was signed; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to such changes;

(h.) Whether such changes caused any such deviations from the contract prices, and if so, how the prices were determined; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to the fixing of such prices;

(i.) All claims made for extras by the contractor, giving each extra claim, both as to quantity and prices, in detail; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to such extras, and price per unit or bulk sum;

(j.) The date of each such claim for extras;

(k.) How much has been paid on each claim for extras; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to such extra payments;

(l.) What claims for extras were submitted to adjudication, the nature of the tribunal, whether official or special, before which such claims were heard, the names and callings of the individual or individuals forming such tribunal, the mode of selection and constitution; with all correspondence, reports of engineers, reports to Council and Orders in Council relative to such tribunal and appointment;

(m.) The date of the appointment of such tribunal;

(n.) The date of the first assembling of such tribunal, and where;

(o.) The number of days such tribunal was in session, and where;

(p.) The award of such tribunal, with date and amount;

(q.) The names of the counsel and engineers employed in conducting the enquiry on behalf of the Crown, and the amount paid for compensation to each, including all expenses in connection therewith;

(r.) Whether the amount of the award was paid without appeal, and date;

(s.) Whether the case was appealed, and the amount of final payment;

(t.) The total costs paid by Government, whether on account of original tribunal, or after appeal;

(u.) What claims for damages were made by the contractor; with all similar information relative to damages as is contained about extras from (i) to (t) preceding, both inclusive.

He said: I desire to get these papers, or summaries of them, in such form that we can inspect them at any time. If it is inconvenient at this late period of this session to bring all the papers down. I would accept as many as can be prepared conveniently in the meantime, and the rest can be brought next session.

Mr. BOWELL. I scarcely think my hon. friend from Perth is serious in asking for a return of the character mentioned in his motion. He has little conception, I fancy, of the amount of work that it would entail upon the department. I have in my hand two returns of almost similar character. One covers contracts let by the Department of Public Works from 1st July, 1867, to 27th March, 1878, giving most of the information he asks for, and containing 200 pages. There is a blue book also of similar character, containing similar information for the period from 27th March, 1878, to 10th March, 1879. I have taken some little trouble to ascertain what amount of labour would be entailed upon the department in the preparation of this return, and the cost; and for the information of the House I will state a few of the facts. I find this motion embraces 177 contracts, each of which contain about 15 pages of printed matter or about 45 pages of handwriting, which alone would make 7,965 pages. It comprises also 177 tenders of about 2 pages each of printed matter or 6 pages of handwriting, which would make 1,062 pages. In connection with these 177 contracts there are 177 forms of specifications, averaging about 20 pages of printed matter or 60 pages of handwriting each, being 10,620 pages, or a total of 19,647 pages for these 177 contracts alone. Then there are no less than 49,000 letters received, averaging, say, a page of writing to each letter, which would make 49,000 pages, and there are 30,000 letters sent from the department, averaging a page each—though I may state, for the information of the committee, that the clerk who compiled this statement makes it 3 pages to each letter, but I have reduced it to one page. That would make 30,000 pages more, making a total number of 98,647 pages of handwriting. Then there is the copying of 177 extensions of tenders, which would necessitate the work of one man for months, and would make nearly 100,000 pages of foolscap, making a total of about 198,647 pages, requiring about 412 reams of paper. I am not taking into calculation at all the printing after these returns are laid on the Table. The cost would be about $30,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much?

Mr. BOWELL. The total cost given me of preparing this return would be from $29,000 to $34,600. If the House thinks it is advisable to incur this expense, I certainly can have no personal objection. I was going to say, did I not know the industry of my hon. friend, that I was afraid he had been imposed upon by some person, perhaps clerks, who would like employment during the summer.

Mr. MULOCK. During the rest of their lives.

Mr. BOWELL. No doubt. With these facts before the House, and in view of the fact that 328 pages of this matter have been printed already, does the House think the country should incur the expense. If so, let it pass the motion. I do really think there are motions made sometimes of this character, sometimes of another, for some particular object, without the slightest regard to the expense entailed on the country in preparing them, and in nineteen cases out of twenty they are valueless when prepared. If there is any particular contract or any number of contracts or specifications that the hon. gentleman desires, and if they are in the Department of Railways and Canals, I can assure the hon. gentleman I will order their preparation and bring them down at the earliest possible day; but in view of the statement I have made, the hon. gentleman should withdraw his motion.

Mr. TROW. In my motion I do not ask for one-tenth of what the hon. gentleman speaks. In the first place, I ask for no correspondence. I ask for tenders, and whether the lowest tenders have been accepted, or whether they have been accepted in rotation, and various other questions of vital importance. There is a very great expense going on now for want of this information, in the Committee of Privileges and Elections. If these papers can be put in some shape, so that the members could examine and criticise them, that might relieve the Government, if there be a little expense in bringing them down. I have placed a number of them together, and the expense will surely be much cheaper when they are put in bulk than if called for in eleven separate motions. The hon. Minister states the greater portion of them are in the blue book; if so, there is no necessity to copy that portion, as I can get the blue book. If the hon. Minister will allow me the privilege of examining these papers as they are brought down—I mean those the Minister can conveniently put his hands upon—that is all I desire.

Mr. BOWELL. Surely the hon. gentleman could not have read his motion, or he would not make the statement he has just made. He asks for a good deal more than the tenders. In the first place he asks for the tenders. Then he asks for all correspondence, reports of engineers, changes in location, claims for extras, and so forth.

Mr. MULOCK. Supposing the correspondence was left out, what would the return cost?

Mr. BOWELL. The correspondence would be about 49,000 pages of letters sent from the department; then there is the copying of the 177 extensions. Do you want that left out?

Mr. MULOCK. What are extensions?

Mr. BOWELL. Carrying out tables, schedules, &c.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would suggest that the matter should stand over for further consideration by the hon. gentleman. He will see he asks for copies of all tenders. If this information could be condensed and tabulated he might get in that way all he wants.

Mr. BOWELL. Would it not be well to let the matter drop, and put a new motion on the paper, stating exactly what the hon. gentleman wants. It is trifling with the House to ask for a return of this kind.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

SAWDUST ON LA HAVE RIVER, N.S.

Mr. KAULBACH moved for:

Return of all letters, correspondence, petitions and papers between all persons and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, relating to sawdust on the LaHave River, Lunenburg County, N.S., with the object of having the river relieved from the operation of the said Act.

He said: I regret having to bring this subject to the notice of this House, but its importance demands it. This is a matter of no small moment to the interest of the people residing on and near the banks of the La Have River, particularly to the merchants and traders doing business—in fact, all in the enterprising and thriving town of Bridgewater and the County of Lunenburg generally. The importance of this subject is my only apology for craving the indulgence of this House for a few moments. The object of my remarks is mainly relative to the operation of the statute respecting the disposal of sawdust on said La Have River, and to show how the rigid enforcement of the Act relating thereto is greatly tending to destroy the trade and business of that place. The La Have is a river of very considerable importance, taking its rises in Queen's, Annapolis, and King's Counties, and running through the entire width of the County of Lunenburg till it reaches the sea. On this river a great number of mills are erected, and so constructed, many of them, as to render it impossible to save the sawdust. In fact, I may say, the owners of the small mills, in most instances, are so poor as to be unable to bear the expenses to place in their mills the dust-saving apparatus necessary. But independent of the expense of the dust-saving machinery referred to, I contend that the small mills up stream are so far removed from the navigable waters that the small quantity of dust made by them, the river being tortuous, is caught up in the lakes, eddies and winds before it reached the tidal or navigable waters. I am sorry I cannot speak so definitely regarding the three gang mills at the head of the tide, as I have an idea that some of the sawdust from these mills deposits itself in the coves and shallow portions or flats of that river, and doubtless a portion in the channel, but still, I believe, not to lessen the depth of water in the ship channel, as the displacement of water by the sawdust would naturally raise the waters of the entire river, and the force of the water by the current in the channel in its course to the sea would, as a natural consequence, allow the water of said river to continue its normal depth. This is not alone my own opinion, but that of many who have been living in the valley of the La Have for many years. Some parties have been indulging in the luxury, if such it may be called, of charging me with using my influence to retard or obstruct the industry of Lunenburg on the La Have, to injure the Messrs. Davisons, doing business on that river, which many might believe was perfectly true, not knowing me better, but which I disclaim in every sense of the term as calumnious, unjust, uncharitable, and wholly untrue. My object and aim has been, is at present, and I hope ever shall be, to assist in every legitimate way possible the promotion of the lumbering, or any other laudable industry on the La Have, as far as is consistent with the interest of the people of the La Have and my duty to my constituents. As the representative of the county I am virtually the mouthpiece of the people, and as such I feel I am bound to state the sentiments of the people, particularly when expressed so forcibly, as appears by the petitions so numerously signed, and presented to this House this session, one of which was presented by myself, although not forwarded to me direct. As such representative or mouthpiece I feel myself bound to advocate the claim of the La Have to have exemption from the operation of the law, the same as many other rivers similarly placed, notably the Ottawa, opposite these buildings. This should not be viewed from a political standpoint, although the Bill relating to sawdust was promoted by the Liberal party in 1873, and became law, but considered and acted upon with a view to the best interests of the particular locality which is injuriously affected by the carrying out of the law, as in the case of the La Have. The industry of lumbering is one of the most important in the County of Lunenburg, and many hundreds are dependent upon it for a livelihood, and to curtail it would very seriously affect the general prosperity of the place, which was practically shown last year when the lumbering industry on the La Have was suspended. This does not affect the mill-owners alone, but all lumbermen on that river having logs to saw, as will appear by a telegram received by me a few days ago, which reads as follows :—

"SPRINGFIELD, ANNAPOLIS, N.S.

"To C. EDWIN KAULBACH, M.P., Ottawa.

"My logs in Bridgewater will be ruined if river not exempted at once. Answer."

Now, this is only one of a number of cases, and it is not the lumberman alone, but the poor man who had performed the earnest toil in the woods all the winter as well, together with the raftsmen, merchants supplying goods, and a number of others. I contend this is a hard case, and again I ask, in consequence of such sacrifices, that this river be exempt. Now, with regard to fish. The facilities afforded for the ascent of fish on this river are said to be good. Sceptics would say, only fairly so. Some fish-ways, in my opinion, might be improved, but with the lately-invented "Hockin" fish-pass, which has recently been patented, and met with the approval of Mr. Wilmot, Superintendent of Fish Culture in Canada, and of Colonel McDonald, Fish Commissioner of the United States, at Washington, and which for simplicity of construction and apparent utility bids fair to supersede all other fish-passes ever invented—I feel we need not be alarmed, but that we will be able to have through this new invention—just praises to Mr. Hockin, the patentee—all artificial barriers in the shape of mill dams, &c., overcome, and the finny tribe passing to the head waters and spawning beds of our various rivers—La Have not excepted. The Government have, no doubt, been considerably embarrassed by the arguments used on both sides from day to day regarding the effect of sawdust in rivers, but in this case, it appears to me, they need have no hesitancy or doubt, as the petitions that have been presented the present session, so numerously signed, prove most conclusively that the trade of the country, to the people of Bridgewater and the La Have, is pre-eminently above all interests, and it is what the people of the La Have desires. I, therefore, feel bound as the representative of the people to press their claim, which under the circumstances appears to me so just. I have endeavoured to present this case to the House in as clear a manner as possible, and to show the serious results that have ensued, and the still more serious consequences that will naturally follow to the mill-owners, and the trade and commerce of the whole country, if the enforcement of the Act is continued. I would, therefore, ask that the Government take this matter into their serious consideration, and recommend to His Excellency the Governor General in Council the exemption of the La Have from the operation of the Act, claiming that the La Have has as great a right to the privileges of exemption as the Ottawa, already referred to, and other rivers of this Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I am somewhat interested in the motion that has been made by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), inasmuch as the operations upon the River La Have affect quite largely my constituents. It is a fact that the lumbering operations on the River La Have, more particularly those operations that have been under the control of Messrs. Davisons, for the last three or four years, have been almost entirely stopped, and this has retarded business very considerably in the town of Bridgewater and all along the valley of the La Have, up to Springfield, in Annapolis County. We have a law upon the Statute-book that was passed in 1873—in fact, with reference to this matter of sawdust, we have two laws, one having reference to the protection of navigable waters, and the second referring to the subject of sawdust, which reads as follows :—

"No owner or tenant of any sawmill, or any workman therein, or other person, shall throw or cause to be thrown, or suffer or permit to be thrown, any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water; and every person who violates the provision of this section shall, on summary conviction, be liable, for a first offence, to a penalty of not less than $20, and for each subsequent offence to a penalty of not less than $50.

"The several fishery officers shall, from time to time, examine and report on the condition of such rivers, streams and waters, and prosecute all persons violating the provisions of this section; and for enforcing the said provisions such officers shall have and exercise all the powers conferred upon them for like purposes by the Fisheries Act.

"The Governor in Council, when it is shown to his satisfaction that the public interest would not be injuriously affected thereby, may, from time to time, by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, declare any such river, stream or water, or part or parts thereof, exempted from the operations of this section in whole or in part, and may, from time to time, revoke such proclamation."

Now, then, as far as the protection of navigable waters is concerned, it is largely under the control of the Governor in Council to decide whether the throwing of sawdust, edgings or slabs into navigable streams is an injury to those waters. With reference to this particular River La Have, although I am aware that there have been official reports from the officers sent to make such reports upon this river, I have not read them thoroughly. No doubt they are in the department, and I have no doubt that the Minister of Marine will give us every information with reference to these reports. But there is one thing that I am well aware of, and that is that the people who are largely interested themselves have made a most decided report with reference to this matter, which report was contained in a very largely-signed petition, circulated both in the County of Lunenburg and in the County of Annapolis, asking that this River La Have be exempted from the operations of the Sawdust Act that I have just read, and also from the operations of the Fishery Act as well. This House is supposed to make laws for the benefit of the people, and the people of the County of Lunenburg say that they are willing to risk that the River La Have be injured in its navigation provided that they be allowed to go on with their lumbering operations. They look upon the lumbering operations of the Messrs. Davisons and others up and down the La Have River as something of extreme importance, and they are, it is true, of the utmost importance to those people, not so much, however, to the Messrs. Davisons as to the people and the country at large. It is of greater importance to the poorer people, in my opinion, than it is to the Messrs. Davisons, for I rather think that it is money in the pockets of the Messrs. Davisons at the present time, at all events, that they do not go on with their lumbering operations. Their timber lands are growing, and lumber is at a discount at the present time. But while the Messrs. Davisons can stand it, can the people stand it, who are asking the Governor in Council to relieve them of the operations of this Sawdust Act? They say: No; we are willing to risk whatever injury may be done to the navigation of the La Have for the sake of the benefit that we know will accrue to us by reason of the commercial operations of the Messrs. Davisons in carrying on their lumbering. They have some three mills, I think, that have entirely ceased running for, I believe, the last two years—although I am liable to correction on that point; but I think they have not been in operation for the last two years, on account of the enforcement of this sawdust law, and it is causing a great deal of inconvenience and a great deal of loss to the people throughout that valley. Now, there is another Act with reference to this sawdust, which reads as follows:—

"And every one who throws, or allows to drift into any stream frequented by fish, sawdust or mill rubbish, shall incur a penalty not exceeding $100: provided always, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may exempt from the operation of this sub-section, wholly or partially, any stream or streams in respect of which he considers that its enforcement is not requisite in the public interest."

This provision in that regard is left exclusively to the discretion of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now, it is a fact, I presume, that fish do frequent the River La Have, but, as I said before, the people do not consider the injury to the fishing business as sufficient to counterbalance the injury that is done to the people themselves by the cessation of lumbering operations. Some arguments may be raised with reference to the question whether the sawdust in itself is an injury to the fishing business. However, it has been decided that it is, inasmuch as we find this Act upon the Statute-book; therefore it is not competent for us to enter an argument as to whether the casting of sawdust into the river is an injury to the fishing business. With respect to this particular river, the people by their petitions largely signed—the hon. member for Lunenburg presented two or three petitions, and I presented about the same number—have given a decided expression of opinion as to their desire that this river should be relieved from the operation of the Act. The Governor General in Council has seen fit to relieve some rivers, and rightly, too. The Ottawa has been relieved from the operation of the Act, and that action has caused some discussion, and some adverse opinions have been expressed as to whether or not it was proper that this should have been done. However, it has been done; and if the Ottawa River, for instance, is relieved from the operation of this Act, the people of Lunenburg and the people of Annapolis who are interested in lumbering operations on the La Have River hold that their river should be relieved from the operation of the Act. I am forced by the circumstances and the pressure of my constituents to impress this firmly on the mind of the Minister of Marine, and I have much pleasure in having this opportunity of doing so.

Mr. FLINT. I agree very heartily with the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) and the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) in regard to the desirability, in the interest of the people connected with lumbering operations on La Have River, of the Government, if possible, exempting that river from the operation of the law relating to the passage of sawdust into that river. Before I sit down I will move an amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Lunenburg, in order to bring the whole subject before the House and the country for fair, impartial and candid consideration. The amendment is to add to the motion the following words:—

Also a list of the rivers and streams exempted from the operation of the Act; and a return of all correspondence, documents and papers between all persons and the Department of Marine and Fisheries relating to such exemptions.

The object of the amendment is to bring the whole subject before the House and the country. While I am perfectly aware that the Government and the officers are between the fires of two parties on this subject, I quite agree with the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) that much can be said on both sides. To a large number of hon. members it may possibly appear to be a question of not very great importance, but to those who are engaged in lumbering, as well as those interested in the river fisheries, this subject is one of almost overwhelming importance, and merits patient consideration at the hands of Parliament. There is, I believe, in the reports and documents of the Marine and Fisheries Department, a large mass of testimony from experts and others in connection with the subject. This subject pertains not only to the fisheries, but to the navigation of the rivers. It has been contended that sawdust fills up the rivers, that it creates poisonous gases in the waters, destroying fish life, and has a tendency to impede navigation also. I think it is wise for the House, in considering this matter, to look upon a feature of it which has not been dwelt upon as largely as it might have been in the correspondence I have had the pleasure of perusing. There is a distinction between the effects of sawdust and the effects of other materials and rubbish emptied into a river. I believe that it is capable of proof that the evil effects of sawdust are very slight indeed, while it is proved that the effect of emptying slabs and deal ends and rubbish of that kind in connection with sawdust is very damaging, in reference not only to the passage of vessels but as causing obstruction by sawdust, of which so much complaint is made. I do not intend to discuss the matter at length to-day, because it may possibly come up at another time, and I can then go into the evidence which I have in my possession from experts and from persons well acquainted with this matter to show that the effects of sawdust are not damaging to fish life. While I would not go so far as some persons have intimated in the documents, and say that sawdust is beneficial to fisheries, yet we have an immense mass of testimony from persons competent to give a fair opinion that the effect of sawdust alone is not to diminish or destroy fish life. I will not occupy the time of this House by reading these opinions, because it would be unfair to do so at this stage of this discussion; but I presume the returns when brought down will be placed in the hands of hon. members who are interested in the large mass of evidence given, and which otherwise might properly be read to the House. I ask for the exemption of the La Have River from the operation of the Act, as I understand that as powerful arguments in all particulars have been given against the exemption of the Ottawa and some other rivers as can be given against the exemption of the La Have. The La Have, and the Medway, which is very near it, are very ancient lumbering rivers. For over 100 years on the Medway, and for almost the same length of time on the La Have, lumbering operations have been going on, and for the last 50 or 60 years to a very great extent. Yet the rivers have been prolific of fish and are so to-day, and they are by no means in that condition which would appear from the reports made to the department. In asking, then, for a complete statement of the case to be laid on the Table of the House, I think I am serving the public interest; and on some future occasion, if the Government is not inclined to recede from the very strong position it has taken, there may be brought before this House the arguments in favour of the exemption of such rivers as the La Have. I think there should be no exemption, or that the law should be modified in some way as to apply impartially to all rivers and streams on which lumbering operations are conducted. The very fact that there is exception allowed leads to suspicion, and attempts may be made to mislead the Government as to the injurious effects of sawdust by competing and rival mill-owners. It has often been contended that it is a very trifling matter for mill-owners to arrange their machinery so as to obviate the necessity of emptying sawdust into rivers; but, in the case of the La Have, that is practically impossible, and the enforcement of the present Act, in connection with the great competition prevailing in the lumbering business, will practically put these men out of the business for all fair competition. When one river is exempt and another is not exempt it is easy to see that the mill-owners and those interested in a river not exempt from the operation of the Act are placed in an embarrassing position in regard to competing in the lumbering markets of the world, because they have to incur the expense of disposing of their sawdust and refuse in some other way. In my opinion the great difficulty, as in the case of the Ottawa River, as far as my information leads me to believe, arises from the dumping of boards, and slabs, and broken pieces of lumber of that kind into the river, which gives the sawdust an opportunity of lodging in firm banks, and so creates the difficulty which has been complained of. I agree with the substance of the concluding remarks of both the hon. gentlemen who preceded me, in pressing upon the attention of the Government the importance of the lumbering industries on these rivers, not the owners of the mills alone, but those who are engaged in procuring the lumber and those who are engaged in operating the mills, to the number of a great many hundreds of persons, who are practically out of employment owing to the fact that the owners of the mills are unable to run the mills, in consequence of the expense that would be occasioned if they were compelled to carry out the law as it is at present interpreted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I agree with the member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) that if a conflict does come between the fishery interest and the lumber interest that the fishery interest must give way. I am not prepared to say that that conflict has arisen or is likely to arise, but there is no comparison between the value to the people, and the value to the country generally of the lumbering interests, as compared with the value of the fishing interests. If that circumstance does arise, then I say that to promote the welfare of the people generally the fishing interests must give way. At the same time, I do not believe that there is any occasion whatever for the fishery interests in this particular being compelled to give way. The evidence in my possession leads me to believe that the quantity of sawdust in the river does not in the least degree injure the fishery, and that if you keep the slabs and edgings from the river the spring currents and the heavy freshets will effectually clear the river. Sawdust does not become packed solid like mud, at the bottom of a river, and it is easily dislodged, and in the spring of the year when the currents are heavy the sawdust is invariably moved seaward. Sawdust has been pouring into the River La Have for nearly a hundred years, and I believe that the navigation of that river, as far as ships go up to load, is as good to-day as it has been the last fifty or sixty years. I have evidence in my possession which tends to prove this, and, consequently, I think both in regard to the navigation of the river, in regard to the effect on the fish, and in regard to the vast importance of the lumber industries to the operatives, and to the owners of these large mills, the Government should take seriously into consideration whether they cannot, in answer to the large number of petitions they have received, exempt the La Have River from the operation of this law as well as they have exempted other rivers in other portions of this country. I beg to move as an amendment in addition to the main motion:

And also a list of the rivers and streams exempted from the operation of this Act; a return of letters, correspondence, petitions and papers between all persons and the Department of Marine and Fisheries relating to any such exemptions.

Mr. DEVLIN. I had occasion some time ago, at all events in conversation, if not in the House, to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to this important question. The law passed regarding the throwing of sawdust, and slabs, and edgings, and other material, into the rivers, is a very wise one, if we take into consideration the experience which we have with regard to the Ottawa River. We know as a matter of fact that it might prove a great inconvenience to the mill-owners if they were prevented from throwing sawdust into the Ottawa River; their interests certainly must not be passed over slightly, because their interests are very great; they have done much, no doubt, to build up the trade of the Ottawa valley, and to develop the towns and villages in that valley. They have built up a wonderful industry, the greatest, perhaps, in the Dominion of Canada, and their interests must be seriously considered; but there are other interests which we have no right to pass over altogether, and it is to those interests that I call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. As far as the throwing of slabs and edgings and other material into the Ottawa River is concerned, I do not think that as much damage is done as would result if these slabs were not picked out of the river, because they are regularly and continually gathered up. But, on the other hand, what is the result of throwing sawdust into the river? It cannot be disputed that up to a few years ago the fishing in the Ottawa River from this city downwards was excellent, but to-day constant complaints are received that at various points along the Ottawa River where at one time the fishing was good no fish can now be obtained. So much is this the case, that numbers of those who formerly obtained a livelihood by fishing in the Ottawa are now obliged to turn in some other direction in order to obtain that livelihood. It may be said, perhaps, that these people can work as well as anybody else at other occupations, and that this should be no reason why mill-owners should be prevented throwing sawdust into the river. That may be so, but nevertheless this is a case in which the interests of a portion of the community suffer from the fact that sawdust is thrown into the river. If you look at the Ottawa River to-day you will see large beds of sawdust floating down the stream, and these beds of sawdust go forty and fifty and sixty miles down, and with what result? It is well known that many lands along the Ottawa River are low lands; in the spring these lands are flooded, but nevertheless, as soon as the water disappears, these same lands are again prepared for cultivation, and when the harvest comes excellent crops are taken from them. I would particularly call the attention of the House to a fact in connection with this. A farmer residing near Papineauville has a very good farm, a farm which he values highly and from which he has for a number of years taken an excellent living. This spring the water was very high in the Ottawa River, and the sawdust which floated down actually floated over this land, and when the water receded the sawdust remained, forming a coating of several inches in depth, with the result that this very fine farm was virtually, and, in truth, destroyed. That is another consequence of allowing sawdust to be thrown into the Ottawa River. It was, I believe, observed last winter that the sawdust has the effect of poisoning the water in some places. How true this may be I do not know; but this fact has been brought to the notice of the public through the press, and these are matters which should not be neglected. Of course, the lumber industry is a wonderful industry; the mill-owners have gone to great expense in building these fine mills; we are proud of what they are doing for the country, but these other interests to which I called the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are deserving, I think, of some consideration, and, so far as I am concerned, I think that the law passed in reference to throwing sawdust into rivers, and to which reference has been made by some hon. gentlemen, was a good and a wise law, and that it should not be slightly cast aside; and when it is asked that the operation of the Act should be suspended, a great deal of prudence should be exercised.

Mr. FORBES. Before the resolution is passed, I should like to say a few words, only by way of congratulating the Counties of Lunenburg and Annapolis on at last having members in this House forced to take this matter in hand on behalf of the people of those counties, and I trust that their efforts will be successful. This is the first time that members representing those counties on that side of the House have made fair and reasonable efforts to accomplish the desired object. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that under the law he has the right to direct the proceedings and operations of people on rivers with regard to sawdust, and it has been pointed out to him on several occasions by members representing the Counties of Lunenburg and Annapolis that the action of the sawdust does not affect the navigation of the River La Have, nor is at all injurious to the fish in that river. The hon. Minister has had before him for a number of years the report of Mr. Rogers, an official of the Government, who therein stated:

"I yesterday took two men and a boat and carefully examined the river at low water with a pole, and found it as free from sawdust in the channel (and it is nearly all channel for a mile below the bridge) as it was a century ago, and it will always be so, no matter how much sawdust is thrown into it. Below the point, just where the ship Scotia grounded four years ago, of which I then informed you, there is still considerable sawdust, but no more than there was then. I found by testing with a pole at every ten feet or so across the channel (which I did at five or six different points where the sawdust is found, and at two-thirds ebb tide and in the shallowest water) that there was from twelve to fifteen feet, and this is where the most sawdust is found.

"The captain of the tug, who is continually towing vessels up and down the river, still assures me (and in politics he is a friend of Mr. Kaulbach's) that the harbour is not filling up, nor does he believe it ever will. He says the channel is something narrower at the point referred to, but no shallower."

I could give a number of selections from Mr. Rogers' report to the same effect, but it is not at all necessary for me to do so. The hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) speaks of the disastrous effects of sawdust in the Ottawa River, but he is not positive upon any particular point except that the sawdust flows upon shallow land. I say to him that I believe the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has power to exempt certain rivers from the operation of the Act, for the simple reason that if a stream flows between high banks there is no danger of land being flooded, and therefore there can be no danger from sawdust in that river. Such is the case with the La Have River. The banks are high, and there has never been any complaint from the owners of any lands along the banks of that river. As regards the action of sawdust on fish, it is well known that it has no injurious effect. Sawdust has flowed down the La Have River continuously ever since it has been used as a basis of lumber operations, except during the last three or four years, and the fishing qualities of that river are just as good as ever. As regards the Medway River, in Queen's County, the sawdust is carried out by the current, and has never settled on the bottom to any injurious extent. The great danger of throwing stuff from the mills into rivers is not from sawdust, but from slabs and cuttings from logs. These, if from pine logs, sink readily to the bottom, and thus form an impediment against which the sawdust collects. If the Government takes in hand this matter it would be reasonable for them to cause these slabs and cuttings to be burned or otherwise destroyed. The objection which mill-owners have to destroying sawdust is the serious cost it entails upon them for machinery for the purpose. The production of lumber on the Ottawa River is 800,000,000 feet a year, so that the cuttings going into that river must be enormous; but in the La Have River the product of lumber does not much exceed ten or eleven million feet a year. On this river the cuttings and sawdust flow out to the sea, so that they become of no consequence. If the Ottawa River has been improperly used by the mill-owners there, that is no reason why the La Have River should be subjected to the same restriction. I trust, therefore, that the efforts of the hon. member for Lunenburg and the hon. member for Annapolis will prevail, and if my services are of any use to them at any time in this respect they can command them. I do not think, however, that it is so important to get the ear of this House as to get the ear of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to whom the law has given the power to exempt rivers from the operation of the law. If they could get both of his ears it would be still better, but one of them may be sufficient to accomplish the desired object. I trust that the hon. members will endeavour to secure his attention to this matter; and when they, with the mill-owners on the river, come to represent the facts to the Minister in his office, I think their efforts will be efficacious.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has expressed the desire that we might be able to get the ear of the Minister rather than the ear of the House. I may tell him that he may have very little hope of getting the ear of the Minister if the hon. member for Lunenburg and the hon. member for Annapolis have not been able to get his ear. The hon. gentleman began by congratulating those two counties on having in this House at present two representatives who could look after the interests of their constituents; but I would remind my hon. friend that, so far as Lunenburg is concerned, it had in the last Parliament a representative who endeavoured, to the best of his ability, to look after the interests of the people of the county. We all remember that Mr. Eisenhauer, the late member for Lunenburg, brought up this question more than once, and gave it a most important place in the discussions of the House last session, by making a motion upon it in amendment to going into Committee of Supply. So far as the present hon. member for Lunenburg is concerned, if I have read aright the reports of Mr. Rogers, formerly fishery overseer in Nova Scotia, that hon. gentleman is largely responsible for the action that has been taken by the department with reference to the River La Have, because Mr. Rogers stated in his reports that Mr. Kaulbach had represented to him and the department that the navigation of the mouth of the La Have River was interfered with by the sawdust which came down from the sawmills on that river. I am glad to find now that the hon. gentleman, under a sense of his responsibility as a member of this House, has changed his mind in that respect, and is now anxious to undo the mischief which he appears to have been largely instrumental, if it be mischief, in bringing about. Now, it seems to me, without going into a discussion as to whether sawdust is injurious to fish or not, the special point with reference to the river in question is, has it been treated in an exceptional manner? I do not say that it has; but we have to face this fact, that the large and important river which flows past this building does not come under the operation of the Act, while, as I have already pointed out, the Act was applied to the La Have River, in the first instance, not because of the destruction of fish, but because of the interference to navigation—and the La Have River is precisely on the same footing as the Ottawa. I contend it is not fair that the hon. Minister should discriminate against any particular river. The charge has been made, and made in this House, by Mr. Eisenhauer, that the discrimination was made, in the instance of the La Have River, because the gentleman engaged most largely in milling operations on that river belongs to the Liberal side of politics. I do not say that, but it is only right that this question should be understood, and the great point I see in it is that a charge is made against the department of unfair discrimination against the millers on this river because they are found to be politically opposed to the Administration. Now, having seen that the County of Lunenburg, represented here by a Conservative, and the county of Annapolis, represented by a Conservative—who, however, during the last Parliament, did not consider it important for him to interfere in this matter, as he has done to-day—have declared in favour of removing the restriction as regards this river, I hope the hon. Minister, seeing that both sides of politics, so far as Lunenburg is concerned, are in accord on this point, will give the matter his most careful attention, and, if there be any wrong, see that it is rectified.

Mr. FRASER. I trust the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) will be incorporated in this motion. With us the matter does not create any difficulty, as the Act is a dead letter. There has not been a single prosecution in the County of Pictou or Guysborough, so far as I know, since the Act passed. I blame no one for that. I do not say that is the fault of the Government or of their officers, but I think everybody admits that the sawdust does no harm. Of course, there are not so many mills on the streams in the Counties of Pictou and Guysborough, as in this large river La Have, but still there are mills there. I only mention this to point out the construction which should be put upon the Act in all cases, and that is, to enquire into each individual case, and apply the Act or not according to circumstances. It may be that the sawdust is detrimental to fish and perhaps to navigation. If an immense quantity of sawdust were put into a river like the La Have, that might interfere with navigation, though I very much doubt it, but in the small streams, particularly of eastern Nova Scotia, you can hardly see any trace at all of sawdust. The Government should enquire into the individual cases. Perhaps that has been done in this case on the present occasion. I know there has been a good deal written by ex-officers of the Government about the La Have River, and that gives me all the greater pleasure to know that the hon. member for Lunenburg is moving in the matter to-day. I am glad, because it indicates that he, at least, has come to the conclusion that a large number of gentlemen have sent a petition here asking that the Act, so far as this river is concerned, should not be put into operation, are well founded in their demand. There are times, I suppose, when it is well to put the Act into operation, but I think it should only be operated when the interests of both fish and navigation are larger than the other interests, and I am satisfied, from what I know of the La Have River, that such is not the case there. I know something about the Messrs. Davisons, to whom reference has been made, and I think a great deal of injustice has been done them. I think a great many men have been kept from work, and their business interfered with, perhaps from the best of reasons, as otherwise the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would not have interfered; but, I think, in view of the petitions and stand taken by the hon. members for Lunenburg and Yarmouth, both of whom are interested in this matter more than any other gentlemen, the Government should accede to their request.

Mr. TUPPER. The subject brought before the House on this motion is one of very great importance, not merely to the locality mentioned, but to the fishing industry in Canada, in every province; and I know of no province in which that question assumes such great importance, bearing in mind the many investigations which have been made into the question itself and the result of those enquiries, than the Province of Nova Scotia. If time permitted, I could satisfactorily demonstrate, even to those gentlemen who have given some attention to the subject and are interested chiefly, it appears, in the particular localities of Bridgewater and the La Have River, that, so far as the pollution of that river is concerned, this question is one not merely affecting the people along the river. There is, it is true, a local interest, but I could produce the most satisfactory evidence to establish that the keeping of these rivers free from pollution of all kinds and the keeping of them open, is a matter of tremendous importance to one of the greatest interests, if not the greatest, possessed by Nova Scotia.—I mean its fishing interests. Everyone acquainted with the shore fisheries of Nova Scotia is aware that one of the chief reasons, if not the chief reason, why those fisheries have so long supplied such valuable employment to the inhabitants of that province and produced such an enormous amount of wealth annually, is the fact that the rivers have been, the most of them, kept in such a condition as to attract the anadromous fish, which bring after them the larger and more valuable fish; and on the other hand, it will be found from the reports of the Commissioners of the American and New England States that their coast fisheries have been well-nigh ruined simply because the interest that has been supported to-day in this House so earnestly and ably, has succeeded in putting out of sight the fishing interests in those localities where the two came into collision. It is because of the polluted and deplorable condition of the rivers going to the sea in the New England States, and the consequent absence of anadromous fish, that the shore fisheries there, which at one time were so plentiful, are now nearly extinguished, and the fishermen have to come to our coast for their catch year after year. I am very glad indeed that this subject has been brought before the House and that hon. gentlemen have not concealed statements made outside of the House, and which reflected upon myself to no inconsiderable degree. In the administration of the Act, which offends to be a most unpopular Act and which I admit a very powerful interest, I have been charged with partiality, or to put it in plainer language, with having been dishonest. It has been stated that on this river, because the politics of some mill-owner whose name has been mentioned were of the Liberal stripe, I have used the Act as a means of persecution against that gentleman. In any case I would scorn to do such a thing, but the best and quickest answer to that statement is that I never met the man and knew nothing about him until he complained of the operation of the Act. The hon. gentleman complains of the operation of the Act on the La Have River, but the Act was not in force on the Medway River, and I believe the same gentleman owns and operates a mill there, where the law is not enforced. This gentleman went into the County of Annapolis, which is represented in this Parliament and was in the last by a political friend of mine, a supporter of the trade and general policy of the Government, and there, notwithstanding urgent appeals, Mr. Davison found that this law was enforced and he complied with its provisions. After stating that it was impossible to comply with the law on the La Have, he went into Annapolis and complied with it, and the circumstances were the same in both counties. The hon. member who spoke to-day from Queen's, N. S., may not be aware that friends of mine and political opponents of his have persistently urged me from the time I took office not to enforce the law, but he will bear me out in the statement that I gave no instructions contrary to those which I had previously given, and these were that, where the Act had not been suspended in the proper way, it should be rigorously enforced. I have never acted except on that principle. It is true that, as the hon. member for Queen's said, the Act was not enforced on the Medway because the officers in my department reported that there was no object in enforcing the law, as the sawdust complained of was carried out to sea, and the hon. member for Queen's corroborates the statements made in these reports. There was therefore no object, according to these reports, in enforcing the law, and it was suspended until it was shown to be incorrect that the sawdust did not interfere with that river. I am in a position, and I suppose it is necessary, to give a most satisfactory statement as to this question of dealing with the sawdust question generally, and the manner in which it has been dealt with by me since I have been Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Before doing that, however, I will refer the hon. gentlemen to some facts which are apparently not known to them to-day. I found on record in my department a petition sent in in 1880 and signed by a large number of influential persons, complaining of the pollution of the River La Have and the injury which was being done to navigation and to the fisheries by what they called the sawdust nuisance. I find that, in 1876, when Sir Albert Smith was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, instructions were given which were evidently due to reports he had before him, to rigorously enforce the Act upon that river and to see that the law was carried out. Our same friend who has been mentioned to-day, and who evidently must be a man of great influence in Queen's, Lunenburg and Annapolis counties, came to the front then and pleaded for time to arrange his mode of disposing of the sawdust. It was stated to-day that no arrangements could be made to save the sawdust, and that the enforcement of the Act meant closing down the mills; but in 1876, this gentleman pressed upon Sir Albert Smith that, if he was given time, he would arrange his mills in accordance with the law. He was given time, but the arrangements were not made. He continually pressed for time. When the papers are brought down, the House will see that this gentleman, who has been operating for many years on the La Have, has induced the department many times to suspend the operation of the Act on his own pledge that, if time were given to him, he would make the necessary arrangements. He has failed to carry out his pledge, and he now pretends that I am endeavouring to vent political spleen against him because his political opinions do not agree with mine. In 1877, after the non-performance of his promise, the fishery officer reported to the department that the navigation and the fishing interests were being destroyed by the deposit of sawdust in the La Have, and asked for instructions. Then came a petition from the same gentleman, after he had been fined for not complying with the law, for a refund, and petitions for investigation, as similar petitions have come and do come from every quarter of Canada when you attempt to enforce the law. The hon. member for Guysborough has truly said that the law has been a dead letter in certain districts, and, when it is enforced, there is at once a demand for investigation. As a matter of fact, there have been three or four careful investigations made in regard to this river by officers who are supposed to be capable of judging, and who are certainly more competent than I am, or than any member who has spoken to-day is, to judge of that matter. Those officers unite in the opinion that the reason for enforcing the Act on the La Have River, is the same reason which induced Parliament to pass this legislation at first, and that should induce Parliament to enforce it. One gentleman has been referred to who is supposed to hold different views on that subject. That is Mr. Rogers. It is not necessary to call attention to some peculiar characteristics of this man, who was an officer of the department until a short time ago, but, after he had become enamoured of the fish-way, and thought it was the most wonderful of all that this country had ever seen, he changed his views in regard to the sawdust question. By that change of a base he naturally hoped, I infer from what the papers seem to show, that he would make immense profits from the Rogers fish-way, and there was apparently a compromise by which he changed his views in reference to sawdust. I find that in 1879 this officer, who is quoted to-day by the member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes), to the effect that sawdust was innocuous to the fisheries, and that the River La Have has not been injured in its navigation or fisheries by the deposit of that stuff, that he reported that several feet of sawdust had accumulated in the bed of this very river, that vessels had been stopped by it and the Messrs. Davisons admit this, and offered to prepare to dispose of the sawdust. On this point, I call the attention of the House to the few remarks made by the hon. gentlemen, who, no doubt in good faith, are reproducing the sentiments now entertained and expressed to them by the Messrs. Davisons in later years. But the Messrs. Davisons were reported to have admitted that the sawdust was interfering with navigation to such an extent that vessels were stopped by it, and they offered to prepare for their own sakes to dispose of the sawdust, but asked for time again, they got time; but, as it is evident to the House, they did not carry out their part of the bargain. An enquiry was made by Lieutenant Gordon, an educated man who has given his time to the fisheries, during the last fishing season, on the coast of Nova Scotia, and has studied the subject in all its bearings, regardless of party strife or party advice in that province, and I think there will be a general testimony with reference to his success in the administration of his duties as a fishery officer. In the last annual report there will be found a very full and interesting report that he has given of the soundings that he made. He has shown just how much sawdust there is there, and how much the admiralty charts have been changed by this deposit in the bed of that river, showing that the charts were wholly unreliable so far as the La Have River is concerned, from the changes made in the soundings by the deposit of this sawdust. Mr. Wilmot, superintendent of the fishery culture, has made, I think, two separate and full reports after two separate and full enquiries. Although I profess to have no particular knowledge upon the subject other than the conclusions drawn from the reports of men who are supposed to be familiar with the subject in this country and in other countries, so anxious was I, however, to see that no injustice was done to the people of that locality, that at the urgent suggestion of the member for Lunenburg, I again asked for a report; I may say that the report of Mr. Kinney, inspector of the district, drew the conclusion that it would be consistent with the principle of the general Act to suspend the operation of the law in the River La Have, although the report seemed to me not at all a strong report; it made no very strong arguments. I again had reference to Lieutenant Gordon, he having dealt with all these subjects in a report in which he gives full reasons for maintaining the law, and as long as that law, which he considers is a most wise and beneficial one in the interest of the fisheries, is upon the Statute-book of this country, he is in favour of maintaining it in the La Have River. That report is so full, as I said before, that it was not necessary for me to go so fully into certain phases of this question as I would otherwise have felt it necessary to do. I consider this subject as an exceedingly important one, and I am very glad to seize this opportunity to go fully into the question and into the policy that I have been acting upon in the administration of this department. As it is now six o'clock I shall have to conclude my remarks, but I shall have something more to say when this subject comes up again.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 77) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

Mr. CURRAN moved third reading of Bill (No. 82) respecting the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company.

Mr. COCKBURN moved:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House in order to amend the first part of the proviso added to section 5, by striking out the words "and the company shall also be subject" and substituting therefor the words "and the company and the railway shall also be subject to all the liens and."

He said: What I propose to do is simply to put in the word "liens" in addition, and also the words "and the railway." The Bill is giving Dominion powers to a company that has hitherto been acting under a charter from the Quebec Government, and I believe the company that built this road has transferred all its rights and powers to another company. In the name of the contractor I desire that these words shall be added so that under the new company he may be in precisely the same position as he was under the company which ceased to exist. I am told that paragraph 5 is large and comprehensive enough to meet the case, but I am also told by competent legal authorities that owing to some peculiarity in the law in the Province of Quebec, it is desirable to remove all doubts by inserting the words I have mentioned.

Mr. CURRAN. This Bill has been placed in my hands by the gentlemen who are about to undertake the work which, I believe, had ceased under the old company. The fifth clause of the Bill reads as follows:—

"Nothing herein contained shall alter, diminish, or prejudice any matter, or claim, rights, powers, or privileges of any creditor of the company, or of any person or corporation having any claim of any nature or sort against the company."

That section is as comprehensive as it is possible to make any section in the English language, and is so general in its nature that it is in the most desirable form for the protection of all rights and privileges of any kind or description. When the Bill was brought before the Railway Committee, my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) suggested that in addition to the general clause, the following words be added:—

"The company shall also be subject to all the liabilities and obligations of the company existing at the time of the passing of the Act, and any suit, action or procedure pending, or judgment existing at the time of passing this Act may be continued, completed or enforced against the company in the same manner as if this Act had not been passed."

The legal advisers of the company now asking for this legislation were present. They took cognizance of the addition which was thought to be added to this section. That was agreed to then and there without further trouble. Other amendments were also made. New obligations were assumed by this company. Under the old Act they were privileged to build to Gaspé Basin. Under the present Bill they assume the obligation of going there, and the privileges, rights and claims of all parties were further secured to the extent of the mileage under the new Bill. We did everything we could to satisfy their demands. Now, after having acceded to all that was required, my hon. friend comes here and asks for an alteration in the legislation. For my part I must confess that I do not see that there is anything but surplusage in what is asked. I have received a telegram stating that the new company, although assuming the operation of the road, are opposed to the introduction into this Bill of the four words proposed. The hon. gentleman has not shown any way in which the addition which he desires to make is necessary, that it will affect any particular lien, that the word "lien" is at all necessary, or that it is necessary to introduce the word "railway" in this connection. The hon. gentleman should show that some particular rights will be jeopardized by this legislation, and when he has done so, it will be time enough to ask the House to introduce the words he has suggested. But up to the present time there is nothing to justify the departure from that which was agreed upon by the Railway Committee, and I suggest that the motion of my hon. friend be rejected.

Mr. IVES. I received a telegraphic message this afternoon from the General Manager of the Eastern Townships Bank, asking me to support the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn.) From the explanations I obtained from the telegram, I gathered that the bank is interested in a large claim; I think it is probably Mr. Macfarlane's claim, he having been the sub-contractor who did the chief work on the railway. I am aware, in a general way, that Mr. Macfarlane did this work, that he had some trouble with the principal contractor, and the result was, that Mr. Macfarlane brought a suit against the contractor or the company upon a lien on some bonds or on the road itself. I am aware that the bank is largely interested in the collection and enforcement of this claim, and it seems to me that the objection of the new company is not one that should be entertained, unless it can be shown that this amendment would impose on the company some obligation which they should not be asked to assume. As I understand from the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), who opposes the Bill, he claims that the general terms of the section, as originally suggested to the committee, were, that the company should assume and pay all debts and stand in precisely the position of the old company. That is all we ask. That being the position, the promoter of the Bill should leave it to the House to judge as to the propriety of adding the words which the creditors desire to have added.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman state what these words are?

Mr. IVES. The chief word is "lien," and it is also proposed that the company "and the railway" shall be subjected to all liabilities and obligations.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The object of the amendment is to retain to a sub-contractor an alleged lien he possesses against the company, he not having of necessity a claim against the company itself.

Mr. IVES. That is the position. He has brought the suit and recovered judgment I understand for $180,000. That is the amount of damages he has established in the court. Now he claims that he has the right to retain the road, or something connected with the road, until he is paid by the company, or before the property is taken out of his hands. There is a large public interest at stake here, and so long as the hon. gentleman promoting the Bill does not object to assuming precisely the position of the old company, it can do him no harm; if it does him no good it will do him no harm. If he has preserved to these parties all the claims they can properly exercise there can be no harm done by adding this word "lien." I am sure the House, in a case of this kind, will insert a word in the Bill which one of our leading financial institutions seems to think necessary to preserve the claim of the late sub-contractor with reference to this road. I trust my hon. friend will withdraw his objection and allow these words to be added.

Mr. JONCAS. The Bill now before the Committee has passed through a good deal of discussion already both before this House and before the Railway Committee. I had myself some objections to the Bill at first, as this enterprise is pregnant with vital importance to the County of Gaspé, and I had some doubt about the judiciousness of accepting this Bill, but the new directors of the company having come here and given guarantees to the satisfaction of all parties interested, that they were men of high financial standing, that they were men of business, and able to carry out the work; then I ceased my objections. At that time my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) who is representing here the interest of the Ontario Bank, had also some objection to the Bill, as he wanted some provision that the bank he represented would also be guaranteed. I had an inverview on the subject with my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) and it was agreed in the Railway Committee that he would amend that clause of the Bill which was not satisfactory to him. This clause in the Bill which has already been read, and which I will read again, did not satisfy my hon. friend from Toronto. The clause was as follows :—

"Nothing herein contained shall alter, diminish, or prejudice, in any manner or form the rights, power or privileges of any creditor of the company; or by any person or corporation having any claim of any nature or sort against the company."

I told my hon. friend from Toronto to draft an amendment stating what he wanted, and he drafted the following amendment which was added to clause 5 :—

"And the company shall also be subject to all the liabilities and obligations of the company existing at the time of the passing of this Act, and any suit, action or proceeding upon, or judgment existing at the time of the passing of this Act may be continued and enforced against the company in the same manner as if this Act had not been passed."

This amendment which my hon. friend from Toronto drafted himself was discussed in the Railway Committee, and agreed to by all parties interested. My hon. friend from Toronto now comes here this afternoon and says that he is not satisfied. What does he want more? My hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) has said that Mr. Macfarlane had obtained a judgment against the company, but I am not aware that that is the case. If my information is correct Mr. Macfarlane has not obtained a judgment, nor even established the amount of his claim yet. Mr. Macfarlane has sued the company, and the case is still pending I admit, but he has not at all proved the amount of his claim. This company has no objection whatever to pay Mr. Macfarlane's claims to-morrow, if it is established by a court of justice that the company owes Mr. Macfarlane eighty thousand, or one hundred thousand, or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or whatever the amount may be. The company has no objection to pay him, but the company says this: We cannot admit Mr. Macfarlane's claim, we want his claim to be proved before a court of justice before we pay. I take it that the amendment added to clause 5 by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) covers everything, but the hon. gentleman is putting useless obstructions in the way. The company was asking for an extension of time for three years to Paspebiac and five years to Gaspé, and I got the Bill amended so as to give them only two years to Paspebiac and four years to Gaspé Basin. We have also put the company under the obligation of building this railway as far as Gaspé Basin. Under the obligation of this Bill they have to go as far as Gaspé Basin, and if we go on amending the Bill and putting obstructions in their way, the result will be, perhaps, that the company will withdraw their Bill and the County of Gaspé which is so deeply interested in this road will be longer deprived of its benefits. I hope my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) will not insist on this motion. I might further add that the company has obtained from a court of justice in Montreal the possession of sixty miles already built, and they intend erecting bridges for this sixty miles of road, and putting it in operation. As all the privileges of the creditors are guaranteed by clause 5 and the amendment suggested by my hon. friend from Toronto, they have nothing now to fear, they have nothing to lose, their claims are protected, and I do not see why they come here to offer obstructions to the Bill.

Mr. DENISON. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) finds fault with the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) because when he suggested an amendment in the Railway Committee, he did not make his amendment sufficiently full and clear. One of the objects of coming to this House, I take it, is that after the Railway Committee passes a Bill which is not sufficiently satisfactory, this House can amend that Bill in any particular in which it choses. Now it seems to me that from the admission of the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Curran) that the object of this clause was to render safe, and as they were before, any claims that might be held against the company, I cannot see why he should object to having one small word, "lien," inserted in the Bill so as to make the intention still more clear. If the object of the promoters of the Bill is not to interfere with any present rights, I cannot for the life of me see why they should object to having the Bill altered in the manner proposed by the hon. member for Centre Toronto. If there is anything vital in the objection of the hon. member for Centre Montreal, it must be that the Bill in its present shape would put the company in a better position than they would occupy if the word "lien" were added. If that is the case, the Bill may wipe out some claim which exists against the present company, and if the House once admits a principle of that kind, there is nothing to prevent any other company coming here and, by getting legislation of this kind, wiping out old claims against it. I do not say that such is the case now; but if there is no other real objection to the word "lien" being inserted, it would look as if there might be something of that kind.

Mr. TROW. It strikes me forcibly that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Centre Toronto is just and reasonable. It is a protection of vested rights. I am well acquainted with the contractor, Mr. Macfarlane, and I know from his own statement that this company is indebted to him to the amount of $170,000 or $180,000. He has done his work and is entitled to his pay. The matter has been in litigation for some years. His property was mortgaged in consequence, and about three-fourths of it was taken from him in consequence of his not having been paid for the construction of this road. I understood that the creditors were intended to be provided for by section 5. If so, it would surely be no injury to the company to make the rights of the creditors still more secure by inserting the words proposed by the hon. member for Centre Toronto.

Mr. McALLISTER. This Bill was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals some four or five weeks ago, and the hon. member for Centre Toronto, who is a member of that Committee, had ample opportunity during that time to ascertain what the laws of Quebec were and to have his amendment framed in such a way as to meet the case it is intended to meet. He did offer one amendment in the Committee which was readily acceded to. But it seems that he is not satisfied with that now, and therefore proposes another. Now, I think that section 5 of the Bill fully protects the creditors by retaining to them the same rights that they possessed under the old Act; but the hon. member for Centre Toronto, being doubtful of it, had an amendment added to that section to make sure of it. If any persons were satisfied to make advances to the company or to the contractors on the strength of the security they had under the old Act, or on the strength of the credit of the company, I think it unreasonable that they should now come and ask Parliament to place them in a better position than they were in before. If they had any lien before, this Act does not take it away from them. This one word might be very harmful to the company in the event of their endeavouring to float bonds abroad. We know how cautious capitalists are, and the word "lien" might mean a great deal in a country where the lien does not exist. I think it would be unfair to grant to creditors of the old company any rights or privileges which they did not possess before.

Mr. LANGELIER. I am in a position to give some explanations on this subject, because I had a good deal to do with the litigation which has been mentioned; and when the facts are understood, I think no member of this House will oppose the amendment of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. I will not go into the history of this railroad. It was incorporated several years ago by the Legislature of Quebec. After its incorporation the company entered into a contract with Mr. Armstrong for the construction of certain portions of the line. Mr. Armstrong had to give up his contract, as he could not carry it out, and then he entered into another contract with Mr. Macfarlane, a well known railway contractor, to go on with the work. It was not an ordinary sub-contract, because the company joined with Mr. Armstrong, and they themselves became parties to the contract with Mr. Macfarlane. That contract provides most explicitly that Mr. Macfarlane shall be entitled to hold possession of the road until he is fully paid the amount of his contract. Under that clause Mr. Macfarlane acquired a lien on the railway, outside of the general lien allowed to him by the laws of the Province of Quebec—a lien, not on the company, but on the railway. Mr. Macfarlane has a very large claim, which has been the subject of litigation. It is contended, on behalf of the company, that they are going to contradict the evidence; but up to this moment the evidence in court establishes a claim of over $180,000 in favour of Mr. Macfarlane; though, as the case is still pending, we cannot say absolutely whether Mr. Macfarlane's claim is well founded or not. But even supposing it were not well founded and would be set aside by the court, that does not affect the present Bill. The company comes here and asks for a federal charter. I think we are all agreed that we are not to legislate away by a federal charter rights conferred on parties by a local charter; and the promoters of the Bill understand that very well, for they make provision to that effect in clause 5 of this Bill. That was the Bill as originally drafted and as referred to the Railway Committee. When it came up before the Committee, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Centre Toronto and agreed to by the Committee. The amendment was to this effect:

"And the company shall also be subject to all the liabilities and obligations of the company, existing at the time of the passing of this Act, and any additional proceeding pending or judgment existing at the time of the passing of the Act will be continued and enforced against the company in the same manner as if the Act had not been passed."

Then another sub-section was added, and it is this sub-section it is now proposed to amend by a mere verbal amendment, which will not alter at all the clause:

"The right, powers and privileges and obligations of the company respecting the construction of its line shall apply in the extension of mileage from the junction with the Intercolonial Railway."

The mistake committed in the Railway Committee, a mere verbal mistake, consisted in this: They reserved a lien on the company—a lien which cannot exist and which does not exist on the company, but on the railway. By the way the amendment was drafted, it would reserve simply a lien on the company, which lien cannot exist, and the amendment now proposed is to alter that wording and reserve a lien on the railway. It does not give any right to parties which they had not before, but is simply intended to preserve the rights, if any, which they had. If nobody had a lien on the railway before, he will not have it under this Act; and if anybody had a lien before, he will continue to have it. I do not think any one is prepared to take away from any creditor any lien he may have had under the local Act, and I cannot see how the amendment proposed can be objected to. The hon. member for Montreal Centre says the company are opposed to that amendment. I do not think so. I saw this afternoon the gentleman who represented them here, and he told me of another amendment to which the company objected, and objected very rightly. He heard that it was to be proposed to refer back the Bill to the Railway Committee, in order to introduce an amendment to prevent the company from issuing any debentures before all its debts and liabilities were paid. That would be absurd, as no company could issue debentures to construct its road, if it could not do so before the road was finished and all its debts paid. But that is not the amendment proposed. The hon. member for Montreal says it is a mere surplusage; well, if it is, it will do no harm, and, if it is not, it is absolutely necessary that it should be in the Bill. If it is not a surplusage, the result of leaving it out will be to legislate away rights which belong to the creditors of the company; and if it is a surplusage, it will do no harm to the company. Were this amendment intended to give creditors rights which they have not now, I would oppose it, as I am in favour of the Bill, but no one contends that it would give to anybody rights he has not at present. The majority of those who have the interest of the company at heart will be in favour of the amendment. To reject it would do more harm to the credit of the company than good, because if it was reported in the public press that an attempt had been made to legislate away in this House the rights which creditors had, the impression would prevail that what was undone by an Act this year could be equally undone by another Act in another session.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When this Bill was before the Railway Committee the other day, the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Centre Toronto was accepted, and the intention of the Committee certainly was not to create new liens or to suppress existing liens. Their intention was that the rights and privileges existing should be preserved, and I have no doubt that if the word "lien" had been suggested at the time, the Bill would have been amended in such a way as to preserve it. Under these circumstances, it would be better that we should send back the Bill to the Committee with instructions to consider this amendment, and thus be able to arrange the Bill in such a way as to meet any just claim. I would therefore move, in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after "that" in the amendment be struck out, and that the Order for the third reading of the Bill be discharged, and the Bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, with instructions to consider the matter of said amendment.

Amendment to amendment agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—ORANGE INFLUENCE.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the day are called I wish to refer to a matter that took place the night before last, and to give an authority for a statement made by myself at that time, and contradicted by the Minister of Customs. I do this in justification of myself, and to show why I made the statement I did with regard to the influences brought to bear in favour of the Minister of Customs by members of an order to which he belonged when he received the appointment to the office he now occupies. It is a matter of no very great importance. I do not suppose it is anything derogatory to the character of the Minister of Customs, that he had influences brought to bear in his favour, but as he chose to deny the assertion, I wish to read, in justice to myself, one of the authorities that might be quoted in support of the statement I made. I find that a report is contained in the Toronto Globe of the 12th of October, of a meeting of a lodge of Orangemen upon Yonge Street of that city, and after the meeting and the transaction of the ordinary business of initiating members, &c., the members of the lodge adjourned to a hotel and partook of a dinner, and speeches were made upon the occasion. Mr. James Beatty, formerly a member of this House, was one of the guests, and spoke. Mr. William Morton spoke, and the Grand Master of the New Orange Lodge, Mr. Richard Reynolds, made a speech in the course of which he used the following language.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the date of the paper?

Mr. CHARLTON. The paper is dated the 12th of October, 1883:

"He was suspended for interfering with their little scheme to squeeze money out of the members of the Ottawa Government and put it in their own pockets. That was their little game. The new brotherhood was being persecuted by these men, whose anger and malice were aroused. If there was nothing in the organization, it is strange that they should bring their iron-clad rules to bear to expel members of the order for joining an institution. He did not blame Clarke, Marshall & Co., for they were making their living by what they did. Marshall, collector at Portage la Prairie, found it necessary to come east. Clarke took a trip west and kept a tug to take him like a prince from place to place. He had the political cure which would heal all diseases. Clarke Wallace was also necessary to teach the people of Algoma how to vote. Bennett had a Government position and should have stayed at home and attended to Inland Revenue matters. Then, there was Mr. Mackenzie Bowell with a salary of $7,000 to $8,000 a year, who could not have been elected for any constitutency except by the Orangemen. When on a deputation from the Grand Lodge to Ottawa a few years ago, to present a memorial to the Governor General, he (Mr. Reynolds) and the other members were requested by Mr. Bowell to bring him as an Orangemen before Sir John Macdonald so that he should not be left out if Sir John should succeed in carrying the approaching election. As Orangemen they discharged their duty in that respect, and the result was that Mr. Bowell was taken into the Government. Look at the gratitude he displayed. When the Orange Incorporation Bill came before the House of Commons, he sat in his seat as if he had taken a heavy dose of morphine which had caused him to lose his senses; and when Mr. Curran, of Montreal, levelled his sneers at the Orange body, there was no one to defend it. Brother White, in many ways, deserved respect, but he had not sufficient backbone, and the old lot had again got hold of him. The brotherhood would let those men know that their villainy, trickery, debauchery and fraud could no longer be practised with impunity on the rank and file of the Orange body. They could carry the country before them, and make such men quake at their influence."

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is an old member of Parliament, and he knows that he is transgressing the rules.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have finished what I wanted to read. I will freely acknowledge that, perhaps, I was hardly justified in asking the attention of the House to this matter, but I felt, from the very explicit denial made by hon. friend, who cast a reflection upon my own veracity, that I was at least justified in giving the authority for the assertion I made.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not desire to enter into a discussion as to the statements made by Mr. Reynolds. If the members of the House knew that man as well as I do, they would place just as much confidence in him as they have in the member for North Norfolk. Neither is it my intention to enter into what is done inside of an Orange lodge, or out of it. It is upon my public acts that I desire to be judged exclusively, by my acts as a politician and as a member of the Government. I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Reynolds, when he made that statement, stated what was absolutely false, and what, if I were out doors, I should characterise by one little word of three letters—or, perhaps, I might add another letter to it. My hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) will understand very well what I mean. I do not wish to enter into the whole history of this man. I would be justified in telling this House, as his name has been brought before its notice, that he was expelled from the order. I would be justified in telling this House why he endeavoured to organize another society, with which the order of which I am a member has nothing to do, and I thank God I know none who occupy any positions who are of that character for bigotry and intolerance which always characterised Mr. Reynolds and those by whom he is admired. I must repeat most emphatically, in as strong language as I used the other night in regard to the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that the statement made by Mr. Reynolds in regard to myself, that I either asked him or any other man living to intercede on my behalf to obtain a position in the Government is as false as hell. I can tell the hon. gentleman more. I have letters in my possession to-day from prominent men belonging to the Conservative party who were asked to interview the late Premier on my behalf, and I told them distinctly that that would be contrary to all British precedent, and if a man had no merits other than that urged by others he was not entitled to a position in any Cabinet. I received a letter from a late Minister, who has gone to his long home, thanking me for the course I had taken, and stating that he believed that it was strictly in accordance with British practice and precedent that any statesman called upon to form a Government should be left to deal with the matter exclusively by himself without any interference. That is the position I occupy in this House, it is the position I occupy in this country. As to my standing with those with whom I have been associated in the Orange Order since I was 18 years of age, I will not attempt to defend, more particularly against the insinuations of the gentleman who represents the north riding of the County of Norfolk. I am quite content to leave my private reputation, my political standing, my consistency as a politician, my standing with my constituency, and place it on a par with his in these or any other capacity. The statements, I repeat again, made by him and the sneers he threw out are only worthy of just such a man as he, who did deliberately make an affidavit against his fellow member, while he had the evidence in his hands showing the same to be false.

Some hon. MEMBERS. "Order."

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order, and I call on the Minister of Customs to withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. Minister must withdraw the statement, that any statement made by any member in his seat in Parliament is false.

Mr. BOWELL. I bow to the decision of Mr. Speaker, and if I used the expression to any hon. member, that any statement made by him here is false, of course I withdraw it. The other expression with respect to acts outside the House has nothing to do with it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish any further discussion, and I hope the House will proceed with the Orders.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think it would be very unfair, after the charges made by the Minister of Customs, if the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should not be allowed an opportunity to reply. I, therefore, move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this motion to adjourn I wish to say but a few words. In the course of a debate that took place here, and which resulted in this discussion to-night, the Minister of Customs, quite without provocation, quite gratuitously, used most insulting language towards me, language he was not justified in using. I felt called upon at that time to reply to the hon. gentleman, and, in the reply I made, I simply gave utterance to a statement which was supposed to be a matter of common notoriety. The charge had been made that influences had been used in the hon. gentleman's behalf by an order to which he belongs. I do not think the circumstances of the case called for the towering passion that the hon. gentleman got into, or called for the unjustifiable and unparliamentary language he used, and I feel that, whether he has lowered the dignity of this House or not, he has lowered his own dignity by the course he has taken. I felt called upon to-night to read an article that formed part of the basis for the opinion that I had formed with respect to this matter. I read that article, and the hon. gentleman rose and put in a disclaimer, and I am quite willing to accept his disclaimer; but I hold that I had the right to read it, and to place before this House the reason that actuated me in making the statement I did make. I believe the Minister of Customs in getting into a towering passion has not acted in a manner very creditable to himself. I certainly have done nothing more than to defend myself from the accusation, the unjustifiable accusation, he made. I have done nothing more than to read to this House the report of a meeting, in which report we have the assertion of a gentleman—I do not know what his character may be, but I always understood he was a gentleman of truth and veracity—the explicit statement of a gentleman as to the influence that had been used by him and by his brother Orangemen for the appointment of the Minister of Customs; and it is simply a question of veracity between the Minister of Customs and Mr. Reynolds.

Mr. BOWELL. I am willing to leave it there.

Mr. CHARLTON. He was a member of the Orange Order in good standing.

Mr. BOWELL. He was not.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have not asserted, after the Minister of Customs made his disclaimer, that I was not willing to receive it. It was improper for him to rise in his place and to use the language and evince the spirit he has done. With respect to the affidavit: will he be kind enough to produce the affidavit? He has made an assertion based upon a current rumour, upon nothing as tangible as the assertion I made. I call on the Minister of Customs to produce that affidavit before he makes any further remarks. He is attacking a gentleman in this House in that matter without any justification, and without any knowledge of the circumstances; and in this whole matter the Minister has evinced bad spirit and bad taste. He has evinced that spirit, which perhaps he has acquired by the imperious manner in which he has carried out the Customs laws in dealing with importers and by allowing his minions go up and down the country trapping men, it is asserted, to violate the law, half of the fines going into their own pockets. He has become an imperious despot towards those beneath him.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to say as regards the Orange Order that I have had a pretty active acquaintance with that order for a large number of years, and that so far as I know there had been no petition, no letter, no memorial, no request from that body, either individually or as a body, that Hon. Mr. Bowell should be taken into the Cabinet at that time. Mr. Bowell was taken into the Cabinet on his merits as a member of the Conservative party. So far as the authority of Mr. Reynolds is concerned, he was, as the Minister has stated, an expelled member of the Orange Association, and one who attempted, but unsuccessfully, to get up a rival association under the auspices of members of the Reform party. I do not think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is justified in designating the Orange Order as he has done before this House, more particularly as not many months since he expressed a very ardent desire to become a member of that association.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think I need say anything more to the very charitable and courteous member for North Norfolk. If he will remember, and it is very unfortunate for this House that his memory is not always good, he will know that I said nothing in my remarks which called for the attack made by him, nor justified him in making any personal reference to me. My remarks were simply a criticism upon his public acts. I said nothing whatever about the member for North Norfolk in his private capacity. He asked me to define his policy. I said it was of such a chameleon character it was impossible to do so, and I gave my reasons. His reply to that was, that members of the Orange Association had waited upon the late Premier in order to secure for me a position in the Cabinet, and that then I had basely, I think it was much stronger language he used, betrayed those who had befriended me. That was a personal reference to myself which I denounced as untrue, and I again repeat that it is untrue. I did use strong language, I admit, and would use it again under similar circumstances, because his remarks had no reference whatever to the subject under discussion. Neither do I think that he was justified in dragging in either the Orange Order, or my connection with it, under the circumstances. So much for his statement as to my unwarrantable attack, as he calls it, upon himself. He is one of these goody-goody men who think he has a right, not only to insinuate charges against his fellow members, but to accuse them of all kinds of rascality. I do not think that the adjectives in the English language are sufficiently numerous to enable the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to describe the opinion he has of those who differ from him. Now, while he is so gentle in all he does, whether it be in this House, or upon the stump, or whether he pursues the same course in church synods—I think they would resent it—I believe it would be just as well, perhaps, if the same were done with the hon. gentleman here. He must not expect that a gentleman whom he attacks in this House, in the most unjustifiable way, should turn the other cheek, in order to enable him to slap there also. It may be a Christian feeling I admit, but as the hon. gentleman is not in the habit of practising it himself, for he rather indulges in the principles of the Old Dispensation rather than the New, let him not growl if he gets a little of it himself. In reference to the affidavit to which I referred, if the hon. gentleman looks at the Hansard he will find it. He must not fancy that because there are a large number of new members in this House, that the members who were here when the late member for Dundas (Dr. Hickey) read the whole correspondence and read the affidavit, forget that the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) got up and apologized for it, and said he regretted having made it if he was wrong. I have no more to say on this subject, for it is an unprofitable one. I am quite willing to receive any attacks which the hon. gentleman may make on me in reference to the administration of the affairs of my department. I am quite willing to defend myself on all political matters, but if he indulges in the future in personal attacks he may take it for granted that he will get a Roland for his Oliver. I leave it to the merchants and importers of this country, and to those with whom I have come in contact, to judge of me and of my imperious character or attempts to lord it over all creation, as suggested by the unveracious member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and take their opinion rather than the truthful, Christian-like statement of that hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no doubt that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is both by practice and precept admirably qualified to instruct my hon. friend beside me in the duties of a Christian; and those who listened to him to-night, will I think agree with me in recognizing his eminent fitness for the position of a moral instructor to this House. But, Mr. Speaker, I rose rather to corroborate the Minister of Customs. I do not know myself what took place in the inner recesses of the Orange Order, I do not know whether or not they applied to the late Sir John Macdonald to balance some of his proclivities or supposed proclivities in the other direction, by the introduction of a real live Grand Master into the Cabinet. It was not removed at all events from the late Sir John Macdonald's custom in balancing different sections and parties, but I am bound to say that I have always understood, for my part, that the Minister of Customs holds his present position, largely to the fact that he was instrumental in obtaining a grand parade of the Orange Order in the city of Montreal in the year 1878, under circumstances which very nearly brought about bloodshed in that city. And, Sir, after the hon. gentleman got into the Cabinet, from that day to this, for twelve years, we have never heard the first breath of his approving of an Orange parade in Montreal, or any other place where it would injure the present Government.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will allow me, and I must ask the indulgence of this House, even in this matter, because the statement made by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is for a purpose. Now, I will tell that hon. gentleman that he is just as wrong and as incorrect——

Mr. MULOCK. Be careful.

Mr. BOWELL. I know to whom I am talking. I tell the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that he is just as wrong and as incorrect as was the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in reference to myself and the Orange Order. I can tell the hon. gentleman that so far from that being the case, that if he refers to the Montreal Witness and the Grit organs of that day, he will find the vilest condemnations of myself because I refused to justify the procession or to go to Montreal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But you instructed other people to parade.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Were you afraid to go?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think, so far as my courage is concerned, that the hon. gentleman will put it to the test. More than that, so far from the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) being true, I opposed the action of the Montreal brethern from the beginning, in the lodges and among the brethern in the County of Hastings. It was that action which brought down the condemnation of those who are now supporting the hon. gentleman, and who have been from that time to this trying to stir up sectional animosities and hatreds, which I have been trying to assuage and keep down during the whole of my life. It is unworthy of a gentleman occupying his position to make a statement here to-day, that he has no warrant for making, a statement in which there is not one scintilla of truth.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. After the hon. gentleman got into office I know he tried to assuage animosity.

Mr. BOWELL. And before I got into office too. He may be very facetious, but the whole character of the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, and of which he is such a weak leader and instructor, is made up and is kept together just by such means as he is making use of to-day. The hon. gentleman says that the late Sir John A. Macdonald desired to bring a live Grand Master into the Cabinet. That is about as truthful as all the rest of the statements he has made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you not a live Grand Master?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not happen to be a Grand Master at the time, nor have I since, but I could have been had I desired. The whole statements of both gentlemen are of the same character, incorrect.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to have the same indulgence as the Minister of Customs had for a personal explanation. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said—I am told he said it, but I did not catch his words—that I had made application to join the Orange Order and had been rejected.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No; he did not say that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe, Sir, from what I have heard of the rules of the Orange Order, that if the hon. gentleman had made that statement, and had made that statement out of the lodge, that he would be guilty of the violations of the rules of his own order. I wish to say that the statement is utterly false. I wish to say that I did not apply to join the Orange Order, that I never dreamt of doing such a thing, and probably never will; and from what I know of some of the chief officers of that order I do not think I want to.

Mr. BOWELL. What were you doing the last 5th of November and 12th of July?

Mr. WALLACE. I think it will be in the memory of the hon. members of this House that the remarks I made a few moments ago were not what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated them to be.

Mr. CHARLTON. I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. I did not hear his remarks, but I was informed by some of my friends that he did say so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman did say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no. He did not say so.

Mr. WALLACE. What I did say was this: that I did not think that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is justified in continually bringing the action of the Orange Order before this House, more particularly as not many months ago, he expressed an ardent desire to become a member of the Orange Order. I repeat that statement and I can give my authority if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman repeat what he has just said? I was occupied and did not hear it.

Mr. WALLACE. I repeated it twice before, and I will repeat it again for the hon. gentleman. I said that the hon. gentleman had not many months ago expressed an ardent desire to become a member of the Orange Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WALLACE. I have good authority for the statement, and I can give it to the hon. gentleman and the House if he chooses; and I am sure that if I give the name of the gentleman it will be accepted by this House and by the people outside of this House as a good authority.

Mr. CHARLTON. Give it.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. James L. Hughes, of Toronto. He states that Mr. Charlton expressed his intention of asking for admission into the Orange Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have to state, Sir, that that information is incorrect. The last time that I met Mr. Hughes, he informed me that he never met me without feeling like swearing. I told him he had better swear, then, to relieve his feelings.

Mr. BOWELL. That was after the hon. gentleman had deserted the Equal Righters.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister of Customs has given to my hon. friend from South Oxford rather a hard reputation, and he says it is a perfectly appropriate one, because it is a characteristic of the whole party to which the hon. gentleman belongs—the whole Liberal party, not merely as represented in this House, but the party in the country.

Mr. BOWELL. Not in that respect. If I was understood to apply to the whole party a characteristic of the hon. gentleman to whom I was referring, I certainly withdraw the remark and apologize.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to call the attention of the House to what has just occurred on a motion to adjourn the House, and to state that whilst I have no desire to restrict the privileges of hon. members in any way, yet I think the business of the House would be greatly facilitated if such motions were not made for the purpose of precipitating a discussion.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). But, Mr. Speaker, just see what we would have lost.

PREVENTION OF FRAUDS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 42) to prevent frauds in the sale of certain articles.—(Mr. Burdett.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. SPEAKER. Though it is somewhat unusual for the Speaker to say anything with reference to a Bill, I must say that this Bill is of such a character that I am obliged to enter my protest against some of its provisions. The proposition is that:

"Whosoever, either for his own benefit, or as the agent of any person, obtains from any other person any property or anything of value, or procures the signature of any such other person as maker, endorser, guarantor or surety thereon to any order, bond, bill, receipt, promissory note, draft, cheque, or any other evidence of indebtedness, as the whole or part consideration of the sale or transfer to such other person of any grain, seed, cereal, musical instrument, or farming implement, which sale or transfer is at a fictitious price, or a price equal to double or more than double the market price of such grain, seed, cereal, musical instrument or farming implement * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to both such fine and imprisonment, with or without costs, in the discretion of the court."

Let me point out to this House what will be the position of affairs under this Bill, It must be known to everybody, to the farming community at all events, that there are farmers who retain their seed—a good quality of grain—during the whole of the winter for the purpose of selling it for seed in the spring, and, in many instances, people are quite willing to pay double the market value of oats, wheat or any other kind of grain for the sake of obtaining a good article of seed. But under the provisions of this Bill, the person who sells, say, oats, which are worth twenty-five cents a bushel on the market, at fifty cents per bushel for seed, obtaining the higher price on account of their extra good quality, will be guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to the penalty of a fine not exceeding $500. I quite appreciate and approve of the motive my hon. friend had in view when he proposed this Bill to Parliament, that is the prevention of frauds, if they can be prevented, which have been perpetrated by selling seed grain or other articles to farmers at enormous and fictitious prices and upon improper representations; but it seems to me this Bill goes altogether too far, because it provides that a man will render himself liable to imprisonment for five years or a fine of $500, if he happens to sell a bushel of oats at 50 cents when the market price is only 25 cents. I cannot allow the Bill to pass the Committee without entering my protest against that kind of legislation.

Mr. BURDETT. This Bill was brought before the House last session and there was then no serious objection made. It was under consideration of the hon. Minister of Justice, but did not become law owing to my absence. I again introduced the Bill this session, and I did so with a knowledge of the law, and a knowledge of the evil, and a knowledge of the remedy required. The Bill is a transcript of the law of the State of Ohio, with changes made enlarging its scope so as to reach other articles besides those mentioned in that law, and these changes were made at the suggestions of hon. members of this House, in the sub-committee to which the Bill was referred. I think the Hon. Mr. Speaker is mistaken in his reading of the Act. If a man has a special kind of seed, which he has saved over winter, that seed grain, by reason of its quality and by reason of many of the farmers having sold nearly all their crop in the fall, through necessity or otherwise, becomes more valuable on the market, it cannot be said that the farmer who buys it is paying double the market value. No man is going to pay double the market value of grain, when he can go on the market and get it for half the price he is asked for it elsewhere. Therefore, the objection on that score has entirely failed. A number of cases were cited in the Court of Appeal, in a case between parties who had entered into a transaction of the kind this Bill is intended to prevent; and in one of the last numbers of the Ontario Law Reports this whole question is fully discussed. In the case to which I refer, the laws of the different states of the union on this point were brought under the notice of the judges, the decisions upon those laws were brought to their attention, and they held that the notes were void between the original parties who had knowledge of the nature of the transaction. They came to this conclusion on the ground of public policy; and I am informed by the counsel who argued the case on behalf of the maker of the note, that some of the judges suggested it was time some law was passed to meet cases of this kind. I, therefore, speak with some degree of knowledge and assurance that I am on safe ground in advocating the present measure, and in stating that no judge in this land will convict a man, when it is found that he has sold his neighbour honest seed grain for an honest purpose and at an honest price, whether that price be a little more or less than the market value. I am quite willing to reduce the punishment to meet the views of any hon. gentleman. I have put it in larger than I care to have it. I may say that the men engaged in these transactions in the County of Hastings and many other counties, were the same rascals who were engaged in similar transactions in the United States, and were driven out of that country by this very law. They migrated to this country, and like locusts eat up every green thing they could find in the land. I argued when I introduced this Bill last year, and I argue now, that though there may not be very much sympathy felt for a man who goes into a transaction of this kind with his eyes open, and who was criticized by the court as being either a knave, a dupe; or a fool, still I say now, as I did then, that, when a farmer's necessities compel him, or he is in trouble, or is induced by the deception exercised by these agents, he is induced to sign notes and take grain of this character in order to help him out of his difficulties, and though very little or no sympathy be given to him, there are others who are entitled to sympathy and those are the members of his family, his wife and his children, who have probably done more than he has to get together what little property they possess, and which it is desirable they should retain rather than that it should be dissipated and go into the hands of men of this description. Another reason why this Bill should pass is, that there seemed to be a perfect consensus of opinion in this House that this Bill should include other articles and should be made to apply to such dealers as lightning-rod vendors and patent right men and others of that class, and as we all know that the Minister of Justice will, next session, introduce a Bill which he intended to introduce this session, to amend and consolidate the criminal law of the Dominion, therefore, if this measure becomes law now, and it is found to be not workable, or if any hardship should arise from it, it can be amended next session so as to meet the views of hon. gentlemen. I am satisfied that the Bill will work no injustice. It has not done so in the United States in those states where it has been tried, and when this Bill passes we will hear no more of this class of criminals. For these reasons I submit that the Bill should be passed. If it is wrong, any gentleman can go before the Senate and have it emasculated as much as he likes if he has the strength to do so. I think the Speaker, when he apprehends the full scope and object and the true intention of the Bill, will see that it will not operate against any honest farmer who desires to save his seed grain in order to get a better price for it in the spring time, to which no one objects.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When this Bill was read a second time, it struck me that its provisions were exceedingly objectionable, but the Bill was referred to a special committee, and as far as I can understand the special committee have returned the Bill to the House in the same state as it was sent to them, excepting that they have extended its provisions to all articles in addition to those mentioned in the section as originally introduced. The Bill, therefore, now provides for all kinds of articles, including grains, seeds, musical instruments and articles of every kind and description. No one doubts for a moment that the motives of my hon. friend (Mr. Burdett) who is promoting this Bill are unexceptional. He is endeavouring to strike at a grievous wrong which he has found to exist in Ontario and also in the other provinces, but the question is if he is really remedying the evil or intensifying it. This Bill does not strike, and does not purport to strike at the fraudulent sale of an article. If it did, I will not say that I would not be inclined to support it. But the word "fraudulent" is left out of the Bill. I think the Bill has been fairly summarized by his Honour the Speaker. If a man sells any article whatever and charges double the market price for it, and takes the note of the buyer, he is liable to go to the penitentiary for five years. Of course, Parliament may say that, no matter what the conditions of sale may be, the vendor shall be liable to be sent to the penitentiary for five years if he charges more than the market price, but my opinion is that this is very injudicious and very objectionable legislation, and that with regard to a certain class of people in this country it may be made to operate very harshly indeed. Take the poorer class of farmer who may not be able to carry over his grain till spring, while the thrifty farmer is able to carry over his, have a surplus for sale and charges 50 cents for it. The market price may be only 30 cents. The poor farmer says: "I cannot carry over my grain," and perhaps 60 cents may be charged him for seed grain, but, if you adopt this principle and pass this Bill, the farmer who charges more than the market price will have to consider first of all, whether he is prepared to go to the penitentiary or not. My hon. friend says he does not intend to deal with that class of cases. Then, why does he not put some phraseology in the Bill expressing the view which he has in his eye? I think this legislation strikes at some very important branches of industry, and I join in the protest which the Speaker has made against it.

Mr. TISDALE. I must say that this is a most extraordinary Bill, and it was so as it was first drawn, but the Special Committee seem to have considered that their duty was to intensify the evil because they have made it apply to every kind of sale. Take the case of an auction sale. A man buys an implement for $10 that may have cost $100, and sells it for over $20, and by this Bill he will be liable to go to the penitentiary. The idea that any legislature could even contemplate legislation of this kind is very extraordinary, but to add to it that any bargain or sale of any article for a fictitious value, or double its market price, is to be punished, is still more extraordinary. There is no market price for many articles, and there is no tribunal of law, or equity, or common sense, to establish the market value of many articles. The result must be that any transaction which is unsatisfactory to the party who bought may drag the vendor or the purchaser before some court. Looking at the amendments which have been made, I must say that they somewhat startled me. The proposition that in this age of legislation we should be asked to solemnly adopt any such proposition as this surprises me. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) that the hon. member who has introduced this Bill (Mr. Burdett) is actuated by good motives, knowing probably the sufferings that have been inflicted on certain families by some frauds that have been committed, but if anything would induce me to vote against the Bill, the three arguments which the hon. gentleman used to-night in favour of it would have that effect. First, he says there is no trouble about a man proving himself innocent before the court. I always understood that the first principle of criminal law was just the other way, that you must be careful to take no man before the court unless you have an offence for which he ought to be punished. Secondly, he puts before this House a new proposition, that if we are dissatisfied we can go to the Senate and get the Bill rectified. If I understand our duty here, it is to see that we send nothing there to be rectified. Let us decide these things for ourselves. Third, he says that next year the Minister of Justice will consolidate the criminal law, and if this Act does not work we can repeal it. I think those propositions would rather bring me to the conclusion that we had better stop the Bill here. No one could put the real point better than my hon. friend from Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), when he said that we should be very careful how we make any precedent for anything criminal unless it is fraud. But this is a matter of bargain and sale, that any man buying or selling any article, whatever it may be, shall be put to the peril of a criminal trial, on what terms? A fictitious value, or double the market price, when, as I have already said, there is no market for many of those articles we buy, or no tribunal to which, or by which, you can judge of what that term means. I think we should not only pause in dealing with this Bill, but we should reject it promptly. I move that the Committee rise.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not agree with all the observations that have been made against the Bill. I thought when the Bill was up before that it was probably rather severe, and had been offered to the House without a very strong case in support of it, and at any rate, that it was desirable that it should stand over until next year, when we propose to enact extensive criminal legislation. But I sat in the House for a couple of hours, and I heard on both sides, members, lay and professional, presenting a very strong case indeed in support of the Bill, and I was perfectly willing, for my part, that it should pass that night, or that it should go to the investigation of a Select Committee to consider the whole subject. The Bill has had the benefit of that consideration, and whatever can be said against the Bill, I have yet to hear arguments to convince me that it is open to the criticisms that have been made against it to-night. My hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), for instance, referred to the fact that many times an article is bought at far less than its value, or half its value. He said that an individual who goes to an auction and buys for $10 an article which is worth $20, under this Bill may go to the penitentiary for five years. There is not a word in the Bill that would lead to any such conclusion. There is no penalty whatever on the purchaser, it is on the vendor who sells at double the value. My hon. friend says another strong objection to the Bill is that there is no means of fixing the market price; then there is no means of convicting under the Bill. It has to be shown that the article has been sold at twice the market price before there can be a conviction under the Bill. My hon. friend from Queen's (P.E.I.) says that in the spring the poor farmer is out of grain, and his neighbour, who is better off near by, sells it on credit at a price perhaps double the price for which the article could be bought for cash. There is nothing in the Bill to show that he can be punished for selling for twice the market value for cash.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not at all. Before you can fix the crime upon anybody, and before you can ascertain the market value, you have to consider the market value at the place and under the circumstances under which the sale takes place. You are not to consider the price at the next market town, as the hon. gentleman seems to think, you are not to consider what a man would be charged for the goods anywhere else. The fact of credit, the fact of distance from the market town, the fact of scarcity in the neighbourhood—all go to fix the market price. I do not think the Bill is open to these objections, but I should be sorry even to assist in forcing it upon the Committee. The other night when the Bill was up for the second reading, it was warmly supported on both sides, and if my hon. friends who were not here then will read the Hansard of that day, they will find urgent reasons given in support of the Bill. But as this evening it seems to me there is a strong current of opinion against the Bill, I think the better plan would be not to reject it hastily, any more than to press it hastily, but to allow the debate of the previous evening to be examined by my hon. friends who were not here then, and in the meantime to rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Then we can come to the subject better informed, and possibly with suggestions that will make it less likely to be abused. I would, therefore, feel disposed to move that the Committee now rise and report progress.

Mr. TISDALE. Possibly I did not make myself understood. I did not so much object to what would be necessary to convict, as I did to the chance that it would render any one liable under these circumstances to be dragged before the tribunals. That was the danger I particularly pointed out. In my experience of a somewhat extended nature, I have seen these broad provisions that are put upon the Statute-book, lead to very dangerous, annoying and burdensome prosecutions when people did not pay the obligations that they had made, or were objecting to pay them. That was the great point of my argument, though I may not have made it plain. In my experience these circumstances that the Minister of Justice points out do not always arise before the tribunals. It is affording a dangerous instrument for designing parties to use, and there is no case that I have ever heard of where they do not go the length of fraud. I think to use an old adage, that to pass this Bill would be jumping from the frying pan into the fire. Undoubtedly we will be putting instruments into the hands of parties to use to the detriment of trade, and affording unscrupulous people an opportunity of causing honest men a great deal of trouble. I beg to withdraw the motion, that the committee rise, with the consent of the seconder.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was very glad to hear the Minister of Justice speak on this Bill. I remember when the Bill was before the House some weeks ago, that it was received with a good deal of commendation by gentlemen on both sides. If I remember rightly, there was very little objection to the Bill at that time. Now, I myself am disposed to sanction the Bill, because I believe it is making an attempt to repress the frauds that have been committed too frequently upon the farmers of this country. We all know that such frauds have been committed over and over again, that unscrupulous persons go through the country and perpetrate frauds upon the farmers on various pretexts. This Bill is making an attempt to prevent such frauds as that. It may be, as some gentlemen contend, that the provisions of the Bill are too severe—there may be an objection on that ground. I would be inclined to modify the penalty clause somewhat. But I do think it is hardly fair, because there are one or two clauses of the Bill that may be open to objection, that hon. gentlemen should at once get up and say that we should stop the Bill now and make no attempt at all to prevent the gross frauds that are being committed all over the country. I think my hon. friend deserves great credit for bringing the Bill forward, and if we can by any means punish those men who travel through the country perpetrating frauds, it is the bounden duty of Parliament to do so. It may be said that if a man signs a note for some specious article at a large price, he must suffer the consequences. But we know the men who perpetrate those frauds are specially skilled for the purpose and bring all kinds of arguments to bear upon the farmer, inducing him in a weak moment to sign a paper which he should not sign. Not only does he, but his family, and those who are innocent suffer. It is the duty of the House to remedy this evil if possible. I do not think the objection raised by his Honour the Speaker of this House was a very forcible one. He pointed out that in the spring farmers sold seed grain at twice the price for which ordinary grain was selling. We know that if men save their best grain and clean it, it is worth probably twice as much in the market as ordinary grain. It does not, however, appear that such cases will come under the provisions of this Bill, simply because the farmer obtained twice the price for seed grain as compared with the price of ordinary grain. The Bill should become law, and while some of the provisions may be too severe, they could be amended in committee, but the House should not strangle a Bill of this character in its first stage.

Mr. BERGIN. I disagree entirely with the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) as to the effect of the provisions of the Bill. I also strongly dissent from the opinion expressed by the hon. Speaker of this House. His Honour argued that if seed grain were sold at double the ordinary price, the seller would come within the provisions of this Bill. I think he is entirely mistaken. Seed grain is very often sold by farmers to his neighbours who have no seed. We all know that in every township in Ontario and throughout the Dominion, the strong-handed farmer keeps his grain during the winter in the best possible condition and cleans it, and subsequently sells it to his neighbour for even more than double the market price of grain for other purposes. The market price for seed grain is thus fixed at which the farmers sell, and every farmer throughout the country knows the market price of seed grain at that time in his section of the country, and it would be impossible to convict under this law before any magistrate a man who sold seed grain at those prices and at those times. If the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) seriously desires this Bill to become law, if he believes that the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett) deserves credit for bringing this Bill before Parliament, and if he seeks to prevent frauds being perpetrated upon farmers, why does he not devote his great mind to amending the Bill? The introduction of a single word would meet his objection, so that the farmers may escape from the clutches of those vampires who go about robbing them, telling them that they will get an extraordinary quality of grain, a new variety, something that will produce three or four-fold more than ordinary grain, thereby obtaining, under the pretence of giving him credit and time to reap a crop, notes or securities which are afterwards transferred to a third party, so that these parties can escape conviction for fraud. This Bill is not confined to grain, and it is one that should meet with the support of every member of this House. We know that people go about selling lightning rods and different kinds of machines, we have apple tree peddlers, and sewing machine, and organ peddlers, many of whom make such representations to innocent farmers as to induce them to give their notes and written obligations for an article that is hardly worth the paper on which that obligation is written, and by transferring these securities to a third party they evade the law and rob the men to whom they have sold their useless and worthless property. For these reasons I think this Bill should commend itself to the House. I know it is one that is called for, and if the hon. gentlemen who would ruthlessly strangle it would give a little assistance towards perfecting it, and removing the objections to it, they would be doing much more service to the country than by endeavouring to throw it out.

Mr. MASSON. I thought when the Minister of Justice moved that the Committee rise and report progress, the discussion for to-night would be ended. It appears, however, that such is not the case. I think that suggestion should be acted upon. I would, however, take this opportunity of expressing my view as being favourable to the Bill and its object. The objections taken by hon. members could be removed by the introduction, not of one word, but of four small words. The great objection is, that it makes the doing of the act, without fraudulent intent being distinctly alleged, a misdemeanour. If in the operative part of the Bill the words "with intent to defraud" were inserted, every objection I have heard to the Bill would be removed.

Mr. BURDETT. I am quite willing to add the words "with intent to defraud."

Mr. TISDALE. I am quite willing, as far as I am concerned, to accept that.

Mr. BURDETT. If you put the words "intent to defraud" in the first line, I think according to the Interpretation Act it will apply to the whole Act and not to a particular clause.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may point out to my hon. friend that if the Committee rises now, the Bill will be reached on Monday night as it will stand at the head of the Paper.

Mr. BURDETT. It is possible I may not be here on Monday night, but if I am not here, and if the Minister of Justice will facilitate me in reaching it at an early date, I do not object.

Mr. SKINNER. As one of the Committee to whom that Bill was referred, I wish to say in the first place, that the Committee thought they got the opinion of the House that they wished the Bill to be preserved in its entirety, but they wished it to be amended in such a way as to embrace other articles than those included in the Bill when it was first before the House. Therefore the Committee proceeded along these lines and made the Bill perfect with this object in view. I think if the mover of this Bill allows the words to go in "with intent to defraud" that the Bill will be so emasculated in regard to the principle involved in it, that it would not be worth the paper it is printed on; unless he goes further and says that selling at double the price will be evidence of fraudulent intention. Hon. gentlemen should remember with reference to this class of legislation that there is a continual development of fraud along the debatable line of honesty and dishonesty, and, therefore, any legislation that seems to punish the wrong will at all times seem on one side to be aimed too much against honest transactions. Therefore, under the intrepretation made to-night by the Minister of Justice, I think, having read and considered this Bill, that it is nearly as good as it can be for the purpose of meeting that class of wrong-doing which the hon. promoter of the Bill had in view when he submitted it to this House. It should, therefore, be very carefully considered if these words are to be inserted with reference to these fraudulent intentions.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not wish it to be understood, as it might be from the remarks of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), that I am opposed to the principle of this Bill. I am not opposed to the principle of the Bill. I am in favour of any law which is a safe law, and which is consistent with the general form of our criminal or penal legislation, that can protect farmers from these frauds. I am just as anxious to have such a law passed as any gentleman in this House, or in this country. It was only because I thought, and that I still think that the Bill went beyond that, and become dangerous, that I opposed the Bill on the same lines that the hon. the Speaker did. I wish to make that correction, and I was very glad of the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Masson), because I understood when I spoke that no other amendment to the Bill was to be considered, and that it must pass in that form; as I gathered from the remarks of the promoter of the Bill that the House had bound the Committee to that proposition or none. I am glad to be able to assist if I can in amending the Bill in such a way as to make it possible to reach this class of frauds, without following much broader principles which I think are dangerous.

Mr. DICKEY. I would like to ask the promoter of the Bill what amendment was made by the Committee to which the Bill was referred?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPROULE). The words "or in other chattels" were added. It broadened the scope of the Bill.

Mr. REID. I am fully in accord with the provisions of this Bill. I know for a fact that there are men travelling around my county at different times, selling grain at exorbitant prices, taking notes from the farmers, and selling these notes to the bank, or to some moneyed man at a large discount, and I think that some action should be taken to prevent this practice. These men also have blank forms filled in and signed by the farmers, or they go to widows, or to some persons who do not understand business very well, and take these notes with them. I think this Bill should pass just as it is. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) says that the Bill does not strike at fraudulent persons, but the Bill reads:

"Any person who sells, barters, disposes of, or offers to sell, barter, or dispose of for any fictitious price, or at a price equal to double or more than double the market price of such grain, &c."

That shows fraud at once, and I do not think that any judge would decide against any person who would sell at a little advance over the market price. I hope, therefore, that this Bill will become law.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUB-COLLECTOR, PELEE ISLAND.

House resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Allan:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, letters and telegrams relating to the removal of F. B. McCormick from the office of Sub-Collector, Pelee Island; and copies of all letters, telegrams and telephone messages relating to the appointment of J. H. C. Atkinson, to take charge of said office; also all copies of correspondence relating to the dismissal of Atkinson, and the reinstatement of McCormick.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, at the time that you left the Chair when this subject was previously under discussion I was about to reply to remarks made by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell). With regard to the matter of the motion itself, I think it has been already placed before the the House in pretty strong terms; and as for the answer of the hon. Minister of Customs, I will not go into it at any length. But I will take issue with him in the statement he made with regard to the interference of employés in the elections. In order that I may not be misunderstood, I will quote some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Algoma. That hon. gentleman said:

"During my recent election I found that I had not only to fight a whole army of Ontario Government officials, but also had to fight an army of officials appointed by the present Administration. I found some of the postmasters appointed under the present Administration were adverse to the interests of the Government, and I found that to the extent that where notices of meetings were sent out in my district to be distributed to the people, they were held back by the postmasters until after the date of the meeting had expired."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I happened to be up in the district of Algoma during the election there, and I had occasion to see a little of what was going on. With regard to the statement that employés of the Ontario Government had interfered actively against the hon. member for Algoma, I am not prepared to dispute it. I did not meet any employés of the Ontario Government working against him or taking part in that election. But when I arrived there I saw a notice posted in a most prominent place—a notice which had been circulated in almost every part of the town of Sudbury—announcing that "Un de nos grands orateurs de la province de Québec va adresser la parole demain." I looked for a moment to find who this great orator of the Province of Quebec was, and when I saw the name upon the poster, I remembered that I had seen that name elsewhere; it was in the report of the Auditor General for the past year. I find in that report: Louis H. Tache, 12 months, $1,250; also, as private secretary, $600; in all, $1,850. This gentleman, who is the private secretary of a more powerful secretary, was up in the district of Algoma. He made no secret of it, because his name was set out on this poster as that of "Un de nos grands orateurs de la province de Québec." He was the only Dominion official whom I met during that campaign, and I attended three meetings. This gentleman did not conceal his mission. He spoke at a public meeting in the town of Sudbury on Friday evening; he spoke again at a public meeting in the town of Sudbury on Saturday evening; on Sunday morning he spoke at another public meeting at Fraser's Siding; on Sunday afternoon he spoke at another public meeting at Chelmsford; so that we find this gentleman, an employé of the Dominion Government, actively interfering in the election then going on in the district of Algoma. More than that, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the statement that postmasters had interfered in this election, during my trip I met but one, and that gentleman spoke and worked on behalf of the candidate who to-day represents the district of Algoma in this House. Let us see, too, the first gentleman's mode of proceeding, which will show that he received instructions from headquarters to act as he did. When I went to Fraser's Siding I was informed that he had made the statement that it was better for the people to support the Government, inasmuch as they would get their due share of the spoils. At that meeting he was told that the people of Fraser's Siding had petitioned regularly and constantly during the entire year for a post office, and he there and then told them that he had received instructions from the Postmaster General to tell them that they would have that post office at once. He went even further than that. He appealed to a gentleman at the meeting, asking him: "Is it not a fact that you already hold your commission?" and the gentleman was obliged to stand up and say that not only had he not received a commission, but he did not know anything about it. More than that, he must have received instructions for this interference from more powerful agents, because I found that he was accustomed to travel in a most luxurious manner. Bear in mind that it was on a Sunday that two or three of the principal meetings of the campaign of which I speak were held. The regular trains on that day were not running. The distance from Sudbury to Chelmsford, where the second meeting was to be held, was some 12 miles on the Canadian Pacific Railway. What happened? Did he go and hire a carriage? Not at all; but he had a special train to convey him from Sudbury to Chelmsford and to Fraser's Siding. Whether the special train was placed at his disposal by the Canadian Pacific Railway, or whether it was placed at his disposal by the order of the Government, I cannot say; but certainly he never got that Canadian Pacific Railway special train at his own expense. However, he had it to convey him to the meeting at ten o'clock in the morning, and he retained it to a late hour in the afternoon. So that we have here evidence that the interference in the district of Algoma was certainly not against the member representing that district, but very strongly in his favour; because the man who worked hardest in that district, who spoke most eloquently at the meetings—for he is an eloquent speaker—who worked with such energy, was no less a person than an employé of the Government, and, added to that, the secretary of the hon. Secretary of State. He made no secret of his action. He did not claim that it was wrong for him to take part in elections. I had the Auditor General's Report with me, and when I asked him before the meeting if he was not the same person whose name appeared there as receiving a salary, he said he was. He even said more than that. He admitted before the meeting that he was in the habit of attending and addressing public meetings throughout the Province of Quebec, and that he was in the habit of doing so with the full knowledge of his superiors. He stated, further, that he intended shortly to leave the service, and was about to enter the Parliament of Canada. He has not done so yet. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman returned, and nothing was said on the subject; but we find the hon. member for Algoma telling us here that the employés of the Ontario Government worked bitterly against him. If the gentleman who had opposed him had obtained the seat, would he not have had reason to charge the hon. gentleman with having received the strong support of the employés of this Government, and especially the strong support of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was supposed to act in a spirit of impartiality in the election? Many other officials of the Dominion Government may have taken part in this contest of whom I know nothing, because the district of Algoma is a very large one, and it is quite possible that numbers of them were sent into it. At any rate, at the third meeting which I attended, I have given you, Sir, evidence that the Dominion Government were represented by an employé. Some weeks ago I brought to the attention of the House the fact that Dominion employés were in the habit of actively interfering in elections. I do not personally complain, I am not dissatisfied with the course they took, I am content even with the result of their labours; but next door to the Capital here, what did we behold during the last election? We beheld there not one or two or three, but numbers of employés of the Dominion Government—whether sent I cannot say—actively engaged, for days and even weeks, in the County of Ottawa, in the contest on behalf of the Government. Sir, one hundred miles from here and beyond that, when members of the Civil Service were supposed to be in their departments, they were found at the top of the Gatineau, lauding to the skies the Government of which they were the officials. No doubt they felt disposed to laud the Government because they were drawing their pay at the time, and probably while engaged in this warfare, were also drawing further pay from other sources. More than that, these gentlemen claimed when we disputed their right to stand on the public platform and denounce men in the manner they did, that they were no longer employés of the Government because, said they, they had resigned previously to the election. We heard that story a few months before in the local elections in Quebec, when these same gentlemen went into the County of Ottawa, in large numbers, to work against the present representative of that county in the Local Legislature. They then stated upon the platform that they had resigned; but, strange to say, a week after the campaign was over and after these gentlemen had sufficiently rested from their terrible labours, they were found again in their offices drawing their pay. I asked the Government at the beginning of the session to produce the resignations which these gentlemen were supposed to have handed in. What was the answer I got? The papers were brought down, but no resignation was produced, so that these gentlemen, employés of the Government, made a statement on the platform which was entirely false, when they said they had handed in their resignations and their resignations had been accepted. Their resignations were not handed in. The Government may smile at this course, but the Government must have known perfectly well that these men were away, because they were absent for two and three weeks at a time, and engaged in an active political campaign. They attended public meetings, their speeches were heard by large audiences and reported, and not a word was said against their course; yet, no doubt, we will hear to-night, as we were told the other night, that they did not take a prominent part in the elections. I thought it my duty to bring these facts before the House. As I have said, I do not care, so far as I am personally concerned, that I had not this large army to stand by and defend me in the fight in the County of Ottawa. We had at our door a powerful Government, determined to hold the constituency which had been theirs for twenty-nine or thirty years, and determined to hold it at any cost, and perhaps that accounted for the presence of these gentlemen in such large numbers. But if we had this powerful Government against us, we had an intelligent people there to help us and defend us, and with their aid we secured the victory.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken, and can only speak again with the consent of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The matter to which the hon. member for Ottawa has referred is directed mainly against a gentleman who met him on the platform, but who has not the honour of a seat in this House, and cannot, therefore, defend himself; and, in order that my hon. friend from Algoma may, in part, make a personal explanation and explain as well the matters to which the hon. member for Ottawa has referred, I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). During the course of the debate the other evening, the discussion turned on the influence exerted in the different constituencies by officials of the different Governments; and in the course of a few remarks that I made I stated, and I repeat the statement now, that the Dominion Government officials in the district of Algoma, instead of supporting me, as they naturally ought to support the Government in power, worked against me. More than that, I have letters in my desk now to prove the truth of my assertion. Throughout the district of Algoma—and it is, undoubtedly, a very large one—the candidate who is running his election cannot have his eye on every part of that vast district. The matter mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa County I have no knowledge of whatever. I understood that a gentleman was there in my interest who spoke in French. As I was not sufficiently familiar with French to conduct a campaign in that language, a gentleman came there to represent me, and he must have been a very good speaker, because, in spite of the eloquence of the silver-tongued orator from the County of Ottawa, that polling sub-division, and in fact every sub-division in which he spoke, gave me a majority. That gentleman has not a seat in this House and is not able to defend himself, and when the hon. member for Ottawa County singles him out as the one who went to the district of Algoma, and proceeds to discuss his conduct, he is, I think, taking a very unfair advantage of the position he occupies in this House. With regard to the post office to which the hon. gentleman refers, and concerning which he said the gentleman in question declared that the Postmaster General had instructed him to say it would be opened or that it was opened, let me say that there is not one word of truth in that statement, because, before the election took place at all, the hon. Postmaster General had given instructions to open the post office, not where the hon. member speaks of, because there is no post office at that place, but at another place called St. Ossilia, and these orders had been given long ago. I do not know now whether the post office has been opened or not, but I presume it has, so that there can be no reflection on the hon. Postmaster General or on the gentleman in question, if he did make that statement, for which we have only the hon. gentleman's word, and from my experience in this House I have heard such strong statements made, many of them lacking foundation in truth, that I begin to doubt almost everything I hear. I begin to think we are in one of those old-fashioned debating schools, where license is given to every man to say just whatever comes into his mind, whether it is the truth or not. Now, with regard to the complaint of the hon. gentleman about the special train which was run up to a meeting, I can only say that I am informed on good authority that the roads being very bad, and any gentleman who has travelled over that country knows perfectly well what kind of roads the Ontario Government build there, roads which at some times are practically impassable—the gentleman who spoke in my interest required to get along the Canadian Pacific Railway for about twelve miles. I understand that he asked, not the Government, for the Government had nothing to do with it, but the superintendent of the railway at North Bay to give him an engine and not a train, but a box car, a caboose, in which I am told the hon. gentleman from Ottawa county (Mr. Devlin) took the opportunity to ride up there and address a meeting at the same time. If I am wrong in that I am open to correction. When I spoke of officials of the Ontario Government interfering in the elections, I stated the truth, and I state now that throughout the district of Algoma there is a hungry horde of Ontario Government officials whose principal duty it appears to be to attend to election matters. Further, I am credibly informed that in the Province of Quebec a similar state of affairs exists. I am credibly informed that at the last election in every district in the County of Ottawa there was a Provincial Government official told off to do duty. Let me enumerate the number of officials we have in Algoma and the purposes for which they are kept. In the first place, we have Crown Lands agents, who are very plausible, meek-looking gentlemen all of them. They do not appear at public meetings, but they are still-hunters every one of them. Then we have the Crown Timber agents, and the bushrangers, but the worst of all are the road builders. The road builders are always let loose on that unfortunate district on the eve of an election. They are not at all times residents of the district of Algoma. They are sometimes strangers, and it seems to me that strangers are sometimes necessary to do the most effective work at election times. An amount of money is appropriated by the Government to do certain work in that district, ostensibly to repair the roads. I am credibly informed that one of these gentlemen said: "Unless I get what I expect, there will be a row; there is $500 voted, and $250 of that has to go into my pocket." There is no district or constituency in Canada that is so afflicted in this way as the poor district of Algoma, a district where the people are struggling to make a living, a district where new settlers come in and find schools built, and sometimes a certain kind of roads, but where you would expect that every available dollar it was possible to expend would be expended and not gobbled up by the officials. Our district is the one that suffers. In reference to the statement I made about the Dominion Government officials, I can only say that from all parts of that district, I have had letters from my constituents complaining of the actions of postmasters, not only in not voting for me—I do not complain of that, because I consider that the franchise is sacred, and that every man should vote as his conscience dictates, but I do object to a Dominion Government official going out and working among the people he knows and taking advantage of his opportunities through keeping a post office and using his influence against myself or any other candidate. The principle is wrong, and what relief do we get? When I make a complaint, the Postmaster General tells me that no man can be discharged because of his political views. That may be so, but it does not appear to me to be practical politics. That is not the system adopted by the Provincial Government of Ontario which sits in Toronto. Let a man be recreant, not to his trust, but to what they believe should be his political faith and he will soon find his head cut off.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I think the position which I took remains solid. I do not think the gentleman who has spoken (Mr. Macdonell) has disestablished any of the points made. With reference to the majorities he obtained at the different places which have been named, I think he rather weakened than strengthened his case. He admitted that the special train was placed at their disposal. He did not deny that, or that the civil servant who spoke obtained this special train. The three places to which reference has been made are Sudbury, Fraser's Siding and Chelmsford. He did have a small majority at Sudbury, which was due not on account of Dominion issues, but to the proposed policy of the Ontario Government in regard to the mines. At Chelmsford I do not think he had a majority, and it would be interesting to read the returns from that place. Regarding the establishment of a post office at Fraser's Siding, what I said cannot be disputed. Nothing was said about a post office at Chelmsford. I believe a post office existed there. The meeting at which reference was made to this question was held at Fraser's Siding, and there Mr. Taché, who is an employé of the Government, said he had received instructions to state that a post office would be established there, and he even went so far as to ask a gentleman who was present if he had not received his commission. The member from Algoma travelled to the county which I have the honour to represent, and said that a Quebec Government official represented me at every polling sub-division.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I did not say that you were represented at every polling sub-division by a Quebec Government official. I said that the employés of the Quebec Government had charge of every polling sub-division in the county.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman may not be aware of the fact that there are 76 polling divisions in the County of Ottawa, and thus we would have required to have 76 officials of the Quebec Government there. I am credibly informed that there were not 76 officials of the Quebec Government there. I do not believe even that there was one Quebec official representing me at the poll. As far as I am personally concerned, I deprecate the interference of officials of any Government in these elections. I will be perfectly candid in the matter. I think they have duties to attend to, and that they would be better occupied in attending to those duties. Still the fact remains that we have not to deal with the employés of the Local Governments. I have noticed that hon. gentlemen opposite take pleasure in constantly dragging the Local Governments into discussions. Perhaps with them it is a case of sour grapes. They are not satisfied in having their hands in the treasury of the Dominion, they would also like to get into the local treasuries. To conclude, I affirm that every point I made in the remarks which I addressed to the House a few moments ago, was perfectly correct. I say that in the portion of the county which I visited, I found employés of the Dominion Government actively interfering in behalf of the hon. gentleman. I found the postmaster, and I found the secretary of the Secretary of State; furthermore I found that a special train, composed of a locomotive and this box car of which the hon. gentleman speaks, was placed at the disposal of the private secretary, and that he had it there during the entire day, at least from an early hour in the morning till a late hour in the evening; so that my position remains correct, that he, at all events, has little reason to complain, because he had the powerful support of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the powerful support of the employés of the Dominion Government.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn, and main motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 9th July, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS REPORTS.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved that that portion of the 49th Rule which limits the time for the presentation of Private Bills, be suspended in so far as it relates to the Bills respecting the London Life Insurance Company and the Inverness Railway and Mining Company, and that the time for posting these Bills be reduced from one week to three days, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

Mr. GIROUARD moved that the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections have leave to sit during the time the House is in session, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the second report of the said Committee. He said: I may mention in reference to this application, that unless this permission is granted, I do not know when the Committee will be in a position to make a report. We have had already twenty-four sittings of the general Committee, and during twenty-one of those sittings we had evidence taken; three were without a quorum. The sub-Committee had eight meetings, making a total of thirty-two meetings. It is very hard to judge how much longer the Committee will have to sit, but I am afraid that unless we have permission from this House to sit in the afternoon while the House is in session, whenever it may be convenient so to sit, it is almost impossible to tell when the Committee will be able to make a report.

Mr. LAURIER. I think it would be better to reduce the number of the Committee, because if forty-two members of the House were to sit on that Committee during the session of the House, the business of the House might be interfered with.

Mr. GIROUARD. The fact of the matter is that if all the members of the Committee sat upstairs, there might be sometimes no quorum of the House. It will be better to limit the quorum of the Committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. The meetings of the special committee are of more importance than the meetings of the House. If I understand it, the House is practically waiting for a report of the Committee. We are waiting, probably, for the result of the investigation by that Committee on Privileges and Elections in order to finish the work of the House, and we can finish the work of the House soon after that Committee has finished its work.

Mr. BOWELL. It seems to me this is rather an extraordinary procedure, and something that never occurred in this country before. I do not know what the precedents in the Imperial Parliament may be, but it has always been laid down as a rule that no committee should sit during the time the House was in session, and if this Committee is to sit during the time the House is in session, we had better adjourn the House altogether.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not understand that there is any arbitrary rule preventing a Committee sitting at the same time the House sits; it is altogether a matter of convenience to be determined by the House itself. Of course, it is within the province of the House not to grant the request of the Committee, but it must be within the knowledge of every hon. member of the House that the prolongation of the sittings of this Committee means the prolongation of the session of the House itself—there is no doubt about that. Now, as a matter of fact, we find we have six or eight counsel at that Committee, and a very large number of witnesses, and it is essential to the public interests that that Committee be allowed to sit longer than it has been able to sit heretofore. We meet at ten o'clock, and sit up to one; the sub-Committee frequently meets at two, and has frequently sat until four, and it is impossible for us to get along at all unless the hours are lengthened during which the Committee may sit. It does seem to me not essential that forty-two members of the Committee should be present all the time. The evidence is taken in shorthand, and is printed nearly every day, and quite a number of the Committee, finding their engagements do not permit them to attend continuously, do not think it necessary to continue their daily attendance. There are certain hon. members who have attended continuously, or very nearly so, the sittings, and I suppose they will continue to do so. Like all other Committees, it amounts in the long run to this: that a certain portion of the Committee, having other engagements, do not attend regularly, and, therefore, I do not suppose if the Committee had permission granted to sit in the afternoon, the whole forty-two members would feel it incumbent to be there all the time, because the evidence is written down and they have the opportunity of reading it afterwards. I think it possible to have the Committee and the House meet concurrently, without detriment to the public business. If it is not so, the House will not grant the request.

Mr. TROW. Would it not be better for the House not to hold afternoon sessions but to meet at eight o'clock in the evening, because many members of the House are on the Committee. The best plan to adopt, in my opinion, would be for the Committee to sit till six o'clock and the House meet at eight o'clock, and to try this plan for a few days.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The effect of that will be that there will be no Committee and no House. It is a mistake to suppose that the business of the House is so far advanced. There is a vast amount of business on the paper, more than I remember at any previous stage during the session, and it is quite necessary that the House go on with its business as well as the Committee. It is desirable to give the Committee this power, although the Committee may not, perhaps, find it convenient to exercise it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Justice will meet the case fully. There is very good reason for this power being granted, and if it is found to be practically inconvenient, it is in the power of the House at once to cancel the order. I entirely concur with the Minister of Justice in hoping that the House will see fit to grant the request of the Committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see how the Committee are going to discharge their duties and the House is going to conduct its business at the same time. Supposing some important question comes up in the House on which a difference of opinion prevails, there would be forty-two members who would not have an opportunity of voting. Then the same thing might occur in the Committee. An appeal might be made from a ruling of the Chair on some point regarding some question of importance, and a large number of the Committee might find it absolutely necessary to be here rather than in the Committee. That might mean that the work both of this House and the Committee might be very inefficiently done.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER communicated to the House the following letter, which he had received from the Governor General's acting Secretary :—

"OFFICE OF THE
"GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY,
"OTTAWA, 9th July, 1891.

"SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Sir William Ritchie, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Friday afternoon, the 10th instant, at 3.30 o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,
"C. J. JONES,
"For the Governor General's Secretary.

"The Honourable

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: This Bill contains three features. The object of one is to make provision in the statute for the principle that was adopted in this House last session. The Bill reproduces in almost exact words the terms of the resolution, and I propose that the judges of the Supreme Court shall have power to make rules from time to time for the purpose of facilitating the taking of evidence on questions of fact arising in cases referred for an opinion on constitutional points. Another provision of the Bill is to make the autumn term of the Supreme Court three weeks earlier than now. At present the vacation lasts during the months of July and August, and generally speaking there is a cessation of business after vacation, inasmuch as there is no term of the Supreme Court until October, and no opportunity for the judges to deliver judgments. A wish has been expressed by the bar that the term should be held earlier, and on consultation with the members of the bench, it has been thought best that the time for opening the autumn term should be three weeks earlier than at present. It is also necessary to make a provision on a matter on which there are conflicting decisions, namely, the question as to judgments on writs of prohibition and certiorari, and as to whether there is an appeal on these to the Supreme Court of Canada. I understand that conflicting decisions exist as to both those points, and the object of the Bill is to make it plain that an appeal will lie to the Supreme Court.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Sir, I desire to make a personal explanation. It has relation to the report of my remarks made upon the Budget on Tuesday last; as contained in the Hansard distributed to hon. members. When speaking upon the point of discrimination against Great Britain, I read a brief extract, some two lines, from the columns of the Toronto Globe. I did not take the extract from the Globe itself, but from the columns of a Conservative paper, and with the extract itself were clipped some comments of that paper upon the remarks of the Globe. My sheet of notes went as is usual, I understand, to the Hansard room. In the Hansard report the complete extract as taken from the Conservative paper is attributed to the Toronto Globe, which is, of course, quite incorrect. Also I desire to say, Sir, that the figures quoted by me in relation to several matters: the increased value of horses, as when dealing with the contentions of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); the amount of farm mortgages in several of the States, upon the probable increase in the value of farm lands in Ontario, as contended by the hon. gentleman opposite, and upon several other matters, are not given as I gave them. In some cases the errors in the reporting of such figures are quite apparent. In others the errors are not so apparent. I have made the corrections in the proof, but regarded it as my duty not only to the paper referred to, but to myself, to make the explanation. Although there are some other errors in the report, which I presume are always unavoidable, I desire to find no fault with the reporters, whose powers I presume I taxed as sorely as I did the patience of the House.

RETURNS.

Mr. GERMAN. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to the fact that an Order of this House was made early in the session, for a return of the number of extra men employed on the Welland Canal during the elections. I would like that this report should be brought down shortly.

Mr. BOWELL. I will make enquiry in the department and see that whatever information I have is brought down at once. It escaped my memory and has not been brought to my notice since.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have to acknowledge from the Minister of Interior the receipt of the list of shareholders in the Hudson Bay Railroad, for which I am much obliged. He has given me the sums total paid, and the sums total subscribed, and I would be glad if he would add to that the amounts subscribed by each person in each case.

Mr. DEWDNEY. If you will kindly return the statement to me, I will try to give the information.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not got the information I asked for with reference to the subsidies for the contract for the West Indian service for the present year.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I will have the information for the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. TUPPER moved concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 95) further to amend the Act 36 Victoria, chapter 61, respecting the Trinity House and Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was the amendment made by the Senate?

Mr. TUPPER. There was a clause added authorizing the Commissioners to borrow a sum of $1,000,000 for the harbour improvements there, and that is the only change in the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It does not in any way make us guarantee?

Mr. TUPPER. It simply authorizes the Commissioners to borrow that sum, and to pay the interest at 4 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What security?

Mr. TUPPER. Out of the revenue from the harbour.

Amendment concurred in.

CARLETON BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Government to sell to the city of St. John, for the sum of $40,000, the Carleton Branch Railway.

He said: This resolution explains itself, and when the Bill is brought down upon it I will be prepared to give all information that will be asked by the House. I may say briefly that the Government asks for authority to sell to the city of St. John the Carleton Branch Railway. The history of that line will probably be known to the older members of the House. It will be remembered that the old European and North American Railway ended formerly at the town of Fairville, which was on the opposite side of the River St. John, from the city of St. John. At that time there was simply a suspension bridge, not for railway traffic, connecting Fairville with St. John. Fairville was some three miles and a fraction from the floats, where the ferry plied between the city of St. John and Carleton on the west side of the harbour. It was very awkward, transferring passengers and freight from Fairville to the city of St. John, and so a company was organized to build a railway from Fairville, at that time the terminus of the road, down to the deep water in Carleton, opposite the city of St. John, a distance of three miles and a little more. In this company the town of Carleton took a certain amount of stock. In the year 1882, I think, a bridge was built crossing the river from Fairville, and making railway connection with the city of St. John, so that the traffic which had formerly been transferred via Carleton and this line of 3½ miles, and then conveyed by ferry, now came by railway into the city of St. John itself. That made that portion of the line extending from Fairville down to the Carleton floats of very little value, and in 1882 or thereabouts, an Act was passed in this Parliament by which the Government relieved the shareholders, the town of Carleton being one of the principal shareholders; and took the road over, with all its appurtenances and franchises, paying therefor the sum of $85,000 or $86,000; I am not quite certain as to the figure. Since that time the road has belonged to the Dominion Government; but later it was leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which came into possession of the main line, at a nominal rental of $1 a year. The road, however, needed improvements in order to be made available for the transfer of outside freight to the deep water terminus; but the Government did not see its way to make those improvements. From that time it has been an unprofitable road to us. An application was made on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a perpetual lease, or a very long lease of the road, at a nominal rate. The Government thought it better not to accept that proposal. Then the city of St. John made a proposal to buy the road outright from the Government; and after certain communications had passed, the papers in regard to which have been laid on the Table, the Government decided to ask Parliament for authority to sell this road out and out to the city of St. John, under certain conditions, for $40,000.

Mr. LAURIER. What are the conditions?

Mr. FOSTER. The conditions are, broadly, that the payment shall be in cash and that the road shall be used for railway purposes, the understanding being that the city of St. John will transfer it to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company under conditions to be approved by the Government, that company binding itself to the city of St. John to execute certain improvements.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no criticisms of this project to offer at this moment. It seems to me rather involved. It is to be a transfer from the Government to the city of St. John, and from the city of St. John to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It will be interesting, before any further stage is taken on this measure, to have the whole correspondence on the subject laid on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been.

Mr. LAURIER. I have not seen it.

Mr. FOSTER. I laid it on the Table a fortnight ago.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. Finance Minister can tell us off hand how much this railroad has cost the Government first and last?

Mr. FOSTER. It has cost the Government first and last $85,000 or $86,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the length of the road?

Mr. FOSTER. About 3½ miles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman that there is to be an actual sum of $40,000 paid to the Government for this railway?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not expenditure to be made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but actual cash?

Mr. FOSTER. Actual cash. It is a good bargain for us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you could sell a little more for cash.

Mr. FOSTER. We might.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Fifty cents on the dollar.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the interest of $40,000 per year, instead of a dollar per year which we were receiving on the lease.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 119) respecting a certain agreement therein mentioned with the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to lay on the Table a list of the shareholders of this company, but it does not contain the number of shares held by each. I think the Bill had better wait until that information is down.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have seen one of the principal promoters of this enterprise since the hon. gentleman brought that matter up, and I find that it will take a week or ten days to get the information, as the books are in Winnipeg. I think it would be a pity to delay the Bill for that reason. I have no doubt, however, that we shall have the information before the third reading. I do not think that was asked for in the case of other companies which were dealt with in the same manner as this one.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is very important that we should have this information before this Bill is read the third time, as there are many stories floating about as to how the stock of this company was disposed of. It cannot possibly take ten days to get the information. The hon. gentleman has control of the telegraph, and could communicate with Winnipeg to-night. We have a right to that information, and I trust that the hon. gentleman will give it to us.

Mr. LAURIER. This Bill is not printed.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not marked printed on the paper, and we thought, therefore, you were not going on with it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I know that an hon. gentleman who takes a very active interest in this measure is not in the House, because he concluded that as the Bill was not marked printed, it was not coming up to-day.

Mr. LAURIER moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That the resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means on Tuesday last, the 23rd instant, be read a second time;" and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). If the hon. gentleman who last spoke on the motion now before the Chair did not succeed, in his somewhat laboured and despondent effort, to throw light on the question before the House, he has at least given us a clearer insight into the aspirations of his political leaders. Since this very important debate was opened, we have had the pleasure, not altogether unmitigated, of listening to the utterances of three hon. gentlemen who occupy prominent positions in the ranks of our hon. friends opposite. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was, of course, the first to make a desperate charge against the impregnable position taken by the hon. Finance Minister in his annual financial statement. I am sorry to say the hon. gentleman was more prejudiced, more doctrinarian, more passionate, and, I regret to add, more illogical than ever. But he was gallantly met in his onslaught by the manly and eloquent speech of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon); and the gallant knight from Oxford had to retreat with broken armour. His friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) valiantly came to his rescue, in an eloquent, it is true, but thundering effort which must have tried his physical strength to the utmost; but unfortunately for the vanquished knight, even that effort could not give new life to his shattered arguments. Then my hon. friend behind me, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), so well trained in many hard-fought and noble battles to face the enemy, took up the cudgels on Tuesday in a brilliant reply which, it was not surprising, completely demoralized the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when called upon to continue the debate, doomed to end sadly for his party. The discussion so far by hon. gentlemen opposite of the statement of the Finance Minister calls upon us to consider three great questions: the financial question, the trade question and the political question. I do not intend to worry the House by quoting long arrays of figures. I would like really to be very short in that respect, but still I have to go somewhat fully into statistics to answer the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk. In reply to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) who, with great reason, called attention once more to the splendid results of the financial administration of the present and past Governments, since 1878, in consequence of which we have had large surpluses on the one hand and a large reduction of taxation on the other, the hon. member for North Norfolk asked how the hon. member for Haldimand could reproach the Mackenzie Government for not having also reduced taxation? And in support of that contention he quoted the Public Accounts, to show what? To show that the Customs receipts of the Government, which indicate more exactly the amount of taxation paid by the people, had produced in the year 1874-75 a revenue of $15,351,000; and then he quoted the year following, to show that the revenue had decreased in 1875-76 to $12,823,000, and he showed that for the next three years the amount averaged about $12,700,000. I do not mention the hundred dollars in order to shorten the quotations of figures. There, he said, we have a proof of reduction of taxation to the extent of more than $2,000,000 per year. Well, during the course of my short political life I have heard many extraordinary statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have not had the pleasure of often listening to my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), though I have heard him now and again in the House when I had the honour to occupy a seat in the reporters' gallery, but it is, perhaps, the first time that I have heard an hon. gentleman, holding in this House an honourable and a responsible position, making an argument that whatever may be the cause, a reduction of revenue is a reduction of taxation. I join issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. I say that it is very true that in the year 1874-75 the amount of revenue from Customs was $15,351,000, and that there was a reduction of revenue in the three or four years following, but the facts are there to show that, in the year following the advent of hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially of the heaven-born financier, as he is called, to the Treasury benches, there was an increase of $3,000,000 of taxes, as it was calculated by the hon. gentleman himself. In 1874, the legislation was passed to produce that amount and the revenue increased to $15,351,000. The following year, the fiscal laws of the country remained the same, they were just exactly what the hon. gentleman had made them in 1874, but we had the spectacle of a falling revenue, of a reduced revenue, and why? Because the policy of the Government was having its effect in the country and was creating dismay and apprehension, and thus the revenue was decreased though there was no decrease in taxation. If the House allows me, I will carry on the argument a little further, and see the result. In 1879-80, after the hon. gentleman had been driven from power somewhat suddenly, and when a new policy was inaugurated, we had the fiscal laws then existing producing a revenue of $14,071,000. I call the attention of the House to this point that, in the year following, in 1880-81, without any increase whatever in the fiscal laws of the country or in the tariff, the revenue was brought up to over $18,400,000, an increase of over $4,000,000. In that case there was no increase of taxation, but there was an increase of revenue, the result of the prosperity of the country which had followed the policy adopted by the new Government. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has given to the House a comparative statement of the expenditure under the Liberal Government between 1874 and 1878, and that under the present Government. I wonder how it is that, having all the figures before him, being acquainted with all the facts as he must be, such a comparison could have been made. The criticism by hon. gentlemen opposite of the financial administration of the Conservative Government is inspired by party prejudices and fanaticism, I regret to say, and these prejudices and fanaticism often blind hon. gentlemen to a correct view of the facts and lead them to most erroneous and egregious conclusions and figuring. The expenditure of the country as a whole has increased, but we are well acquainted with this most important fact, that the increase of expenditure has been caused almost entirely by the policy under which large public works have been constructed in the country, under which we have built the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and under which we have deepened and enlarged the canals, and also by the help which was extended to the Governments of the provinces to enable them to carry on their business in the administration of their local affairs. I lay down this proposition: that to make a fair and just and, I may say, a reasonable comparison between the expenditure of the two Governments, we must first take into consideration the amounts which were disbursed on these charges. For instance, last year we had a total expenditure of nearly $36,000,000. Of that amount the debt charges and interest and the cost of administration amounted to $9,887,000; we had the sinking fund, $1,887,000; subsidies to provinces, $3,904,000; making an amount of $15,678,000, so that the balance of the expenditure was $20,314,000. Now, of this balance, we have expended for the collection of revenue under the title of railways and canals, $4,362,000; postal service, $3,074,000. For Dominion lands in the North-West, $173,000, making a total amount of $7,610,000. There is an increase of expenditure, but we must look at the other side and see what the receipts of the Government have been from railways and canals, from the post office, and from the sale of Dominion lands, and how those receipts have increased in order to make a fair comparison. If we deduct that amount from the $20,314,000 we have a balance of $12,731,000, which includes the expenditure of nearly $2,000,000 for local public works all over the country. Comparing the figures of 1889-90 with those of 1877-78, which was the last year for which the Liberal Government was fully responsible, we find that, out of a total expenditure of $23,503,000, deducting, as I have just done in the previous case, the expenditure for charges of debt and management, railways and canals, post office and Dominion lands, and local public works, we have an increase from $6,561,000 to $10,731,000, or an increase for what I must call the really administrative service of the country, of about $4,000,000. I think the Government and the friends of the Government in this House and in the country can challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to say what is their criticism of the increase of expenditures under the different heads I am just going to mention. I remember that during the last election campaign we heard none of those hon. gentlemen denouncing the Government for having increased the expenditure for agricultural purposes. The criticism, of course, was with regard to the block sum of the increased expenditure, but they would not go into details, because they knew very well that these new expenditures were just as necessary as it was in the case of the $61,000 for agricultural purposes. Now, let those hon. gentlemen take the responsibility in this House of making a motion to call for a reduction in the expenditure for agricultural purposes, and to do away with the $160,000 paid in bounties to the fishermen. Since those hon. gentlemen left power there has been a pretty large increase for the Indians in the North-West. The policy of the Canadian Government has been to treat the Indians in a humane way. We have settled those great difficulties, and we have prevented other difficulties which we might have expected if we had followed a different policy. It is costing us some money, but it is better to pay it in order to secure peace and order in the North-West and all over the country. I am somewhat surprised to hear hon. gentlemen criticize this expenditure. For instance, we have one item of an increase of $286,000 for subsidies to steamers, and many of those hon. gentlemen in this House have clamoured day after day, and month after month, and year after year, for an increase of subsidies to steamers. What have they not said with regard to the militia expenditure? They say we have not given enough for militia purposes. We have expended for that purpose during 1889-90 $668,000 more than in 1877-78, and there has also been an increase in the Mounted Police service. But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat we can challenge the hon. gentlemen to point out in any particular where there has been an extravagant expenditure, and to define their reasons for criticizing the Government for having increased the expenditure of the country. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), on Tuesday last, made what he considers a very striking comparison between the expenditure of Canada and that of the United States, in order to show that our financial situation is much more serious than that of the United States. Well, I cannot agree with the figures given by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I do not know where he got them, but I have looked up the statistics of the American expenditure, and I have come to quite a different conclusion. For instance, last year I find that in the United States, comprising an amount of $48,000,000 for a sinking fund, there was a total expenditure of $406,000,000. Calculating upon a total population of 65,000,000 of people, I find that the expenditure per head in the United States was $6.25. In Canada, in calculating the expenditure, we must deduct the amounts which we have to pay in subsidies to the provinces, and which the United States Government does not have to pay to the States; and also the charges for collection of the revenue, for Government railways, because the American Government has no Government railways. They have to meet only the current expenses for carrying on the Government. In Canada we have, in round numbers, a total expenditure of $28,000,000 for a total population of 5,250,000, so that we have a total expenditure per head of $5.33, or a difference in favour of Canada of 92 cents per head, or very nearly one dollar. The hon. member for North Norfolk tried to show that a reduction of revenue was under all circumstances a reduction of taxation, and by contradicting himself squarely, he tried to show that the increased revenue collected by the present Government meant an increased taxation all round. He was apparently ignorant of the fact that he was squarely contradicting himself on that point. Mr. Speaker, I shall be able to show that from 1878 up to the present time, there has been no real increase of taxation upon our population. When the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power in 1873, and after the increase of taxation that was adopted in 1874, as I mentioned a while ago, they had a total revenue in 1874-75 of $15,351,000. Now, calculating with as much precision as possible, I find that the total population of the Dominion of Canada, which was in 1871, 3,635,000, had increased in 1874-75, in round numbers, to 3,800,000. Calculating upon the amount of revenue received under the tariff of 1874, $15,351,000, I find there was a taxation of $4.04 per head of the population for Customs duties alone. Now, we know that the tariff in 1879 was adopted by this House in accordance with the will of the people, in order to carry out the National Policy of the Government, and I find that this tariff, in the year 1879-80, only produced a revenue of $14,071,000. I estimate the population of the whole Dominion in that year at 4,200,000 souls, that being the most precise calculation that can be made, because in the census of 1881 the population was 4,324,810, so I allow for an increase of 124,000 during the interval between 1879-80 and the year 1881 when the census was taken. Then, basing a calculation upon the total receipts, I find that the amount paid in Customs into the Treasury by the people of Canada in 1879-80, was only $3.35 per head, or a decrease per head of the population of 69 cents, compared with the amount paid into the Treasury by the people in the year 1874-75. Now, Sir, if it would not take too much of the time of the House, I could give figures for all the succeeding years. The next year we find that the Customs revenue, as I mentioned a while ago, increased to a little over $18,400,000; in 1881-82, to $21,581,000; in the following year, 1882-83, to $23,009,000. These, Mr. Speaker, were the results produced by what our friends are pleased to call the atrocious protective policy of 1879, when there was year after year a large increase in the revenue and, as in 1882, a reduction of taxation by the abolition of the duties on tea and coffee. But twelve years having elapsed since the advent into power of a protectionist Government, what will be the result for next year? With the abolition of the duties on raw sugar I estimate, and I think the Minister of Finance will support me in the contention, that the Customs revenue for the next year will be $21,500,000, in round figures, and taking our population at 5,350,000, the amount of revenue collected by Customs which will be paid into the Treasury will not exceed $4.02 per head, or 2 cents less than was paid under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1874-75. The comparison does not end there. There is this great difference, that while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, under their free trade policy they collected in Customs duties from the people a larger proportionate amount per head than we are collecting under the present protective tariff; and there was, moreover, this great difference, that we were brought face to face with large deficits, while we have now under this protective policy the most pleasant results in the shape of large surpluses. I will pass by many matters connected with this subject in order to draw to a close my calculations on the financial question. As usual, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), always ready to disparage his own country and to make a point in favor of the United States, hurried to the support of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), to show that Canada was overwhelmingly in debt, while the United States had almost no debt whatever and they were paying off the balance of that debt very rapidly. On this point, also, I join issue with the hon. member for North Norfolk. I have taken the trouble to examine the American statistics, and I have come to a very different conclusion from that at which he arrived. The very basis of the calculation of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the financial position of the United States is an unfair and unjust one, because the financial systems of the two countries are different from one another, and of course if you want to arrive at a fair conclusion you must take into account the different financial systems of the two countries. We know very well, and the hon. member for North Norfolk and the hon. member for South Oxford know very well, that the Washington Government does not pay one dollar a year to support the different States in the Union. I ask the House if it is fair not to take this into account. Hon. gentlemen have the Public Accounts before them, and they will ascertain that from July 1st, 1867, until June 30th, 1891, the Dominion Government have paid as much as $84,000,000 in subsidies to the provinces. Moreover, in looking into the Public Accounts, I find that, by legislation passed by this House, $31,000,000 of debt were allowed to the different provinces since 1867, and a large amount of interest allowed thereon. I have calculated as closely as possible that if the Dominion Government had not paid to the provinces those $84,000,000 of subsidies since 1867, we would have paid $50,000,000 less for interest during the last twenty-four years. That represents a total expenditure of $165,000,000 for subsidies to provinces, for debts allowed to provinces, and for interest paid as a consequence of the large amount allowed to the provinces in subsidies and debts. On examining the Public Accounts I was surprised to find—what? That the total amount we have paid for the last twenty-four years, for the building and enlargement of the canals, for the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the Intercolonial Railway, foot up in round figures to $138,000,000; that is to say, $27,000,000 less than the amount paid in subsidies to provinces, for debts allowed to provinces, and for interest subsequent thereon. The consequence is this, that if we had not paid those amounts to support the Government of the provinces, if we had not allowed the debts and interest consequent thereon, we should have had since 1867 all the resources necessary to meet a capital expenditure equal to the total amount required for canals, Canadian Pacific Railway, Intercolonial Railway, for the purpose of acquiring the North-West Territories, and all the other capital expenses, which amount in round figures to $150,000,000; that is, as is suggested to me by the Minister of Finance, if we had had here in Canada the same system as in the United States and the same sources of revenue they possessed. Let us take the other side of the account. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and all his friends, together with his leader the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), always try to make a great point on these two facts: the great decrease of the public debt of the United States, and the increase in the public debt of Canada. I have shown that if we had in Canada the system prevailing in the United States we would not have increased the debt of Canada one dollar since 1867. But let us look at what has taken place in the United States and see if the facts sustain the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite. It is true that at the close of the late civil war in the United States they had a large public debt, amounting to about $2,800,000,000. It is true that since then, during the last twenty-four years, they have paid on account of this large liability about $1,900,000,000, or nearly two-thirds the amount, as the hon. member for North Norfolk said the other day. The hon. gentleman omitted, however, to mention this fact, which is necessary in order to make a true comparison, that while we in Canada have not paid one cent of direct taxation for the maintenance of our Local Governments, the people of the United States have paid $1,500,000,000 for their support. Another point, and it is the stronger of the two, is this: We know very well, and all readers of modern history know, that when the United States were engaged in the fratricidal war between the North and South, the Northern States had to impose on themselves very heavy sacrifices to maintain the Union. At first they expected to be able to meet all the expenditure of the war out of revenue, and they passed fiscal laws, and laws respecting internal revenue, which were perhaps the most burdensome ever enacted in any country of the world. During the period of the war and for the following years we ascertain this: for instance, that in 1866, the year the war closed, the people of the Northern States, amounting to not more than 20,000,000 people, if we exclude the population of the Southern States, actually paid into the Treasury of the United States so much as $519,000,000. This question was discussed in the United States, in the debates that took place in Congress, and all over the country, with regard to the gradual diminution of war taxes; but the people of the United States, after peace was restored, rising in their might, made up their mind to pay off their public debt as fast as they could. I am not here to say that they did wrong in resolving to take this course. They had the resources, they had the impulse of a great people occupying a fertile and rich territory after the war was over, and they did not do as our friends on the other side of the House do in this country; they did not despair of the future of their country. They went to work, and the sacrifices to which they had assented during the war they carried out for many years after peace had been restored. I will take the five years of peace following the war, and what do I find? I find that during these five years the people of the United States consented to pay into the treasury, the enormous and extraordinary sum of $1,900,000,000 in order to redeem a large part of their debt; and if you divide this amount by five years you have got an expenditure of $380,000,000 a year. I calculate that on an average, during the five years from 1867 to 1871, inclusive, the population of the United States which amounted to about 35,000,000 people, paid, to govern their country and reduce their national debt, $11 a head of taxation to the Washington Government, or exactly double the amount paid by the people of Canada during the same five years. I have carried out the calculation a little further, and I have found that during these five years, when the people of the United States were consenting to pay such a large amount into their treasury to reduce their debt, and to start afresh for the future, that if the Canadian people had agreed to do the same, and to pay an equal amount of taxation, we could have paid the whole debt which we assumed at the union of the provinces in 1867, and if we had applied to our public works the amount paid for subsidies to the provinces, there would not be to-day one dollar of public debt left in Canada. The hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) may smile, and I will remember his smile in a moment. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will take another of the arguments of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). When my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), in his eloquent style, charged that the Liberal Government of 1874-78 was also responsible for the increase of the public debt of the country, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said it was nothing of the kind, and that the Liberal Government had been obliged to create the debt on account of the obligations undertaken by their predecessors. Once more I join issue with the hon. gentleman, and I will lay down this proposition to the House; a proposition which is sustained by facts, and by the history of the country. I say that both political parties are equally responsible for the capital expenditure of the country, and the difference is not in the responsibility, but it is in the merit which is deserved by one party or the other. The Conservative party accept their full share of the responsibility for the policy which has been carried out, and for capital expenditures since 1867, and the Liberal party do not accept the responsibility: they shirk the responsibility, and consequently they lose whatever merit they would have, if they assumed their share of the responsibility. But, Mr. Speaker, let us go into the details a little, because the details are very important. The causes of our public debt may be set down under four heads. First, there were the debts of the provinces taken over by the Dominion Government at Confederation. It is not the first time I have had the pleasure of seeing the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I was very young when I first knew him, and I am sorry to say that he has not improved since. I ask that hon. gentleman if he had not a seat in the Legislative Assembly of the old Province of Canada in Quebec in 1865, and if he did not vote for the resolutions to carry that Confederation scheme, under which the debts of the provinces, to the amount of over $65,000,000, were to be charged to the Dominion Government? Did he not vote for the resolutions to carry out Confederation, which also declared that the Intercolonial Railway was to be built to unite the Lower Provinces to Canada? He did vote for these resolutions, and many of his friends around him also approved of the resolutions, and upon these resolutions the British North America Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament; the Intercolonial Railway was built, and the debts of the provinces were assumed by the Dominion Government; and I ask the House, if hon. gentlemen opposite are not as much responsible as the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches, and as we ourselves are for the public debt incurred in this way. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us go into the details of the very large expenditure for the deepening and enlargening of the canals. I have followed pretty closely what has taken place in this Parliament of Canada for the last twenty four years, and I know that from year to year large amounts of money have been voted to deepen and enlarge the canals of the Dominion, and I have never heard nor read one word from the hon. gentlemen opposite, declaring that it was their policy not to deepen or enlarge the canals, or that they were against that policy. They have voted the amounts; these public works have been carried through with the unanimous assent of Parliament, and also with the unanimous assent of the country at large. Yet these hon. gentlemen charge this Government and its predecessors with extravagance for the money they have expended on such important public works. Now, a large expenditure has taken place on the Canadian Pacific Railway. And be good enough to remember that when the hon. gentleman and his friends were sitting on the Treasury benches they asked the Parliament of Canada to pass a law authorizing them to pay more than $25,000,000 and to grant more than 50,000,000 acres of land, and also to guarantee 4 per cent. for twenty-five years on a further amount, to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had been built under that law, it would have cost a larger amount than has since been paid for the construction of that road. I ask you whether, in view of these facts, hon. gentlemen opposite have any show of reason, I may say any show of decency, to charge extravagance against this Government and their supporters in piling up the debt of the Dominion by capital expenditure. But, Mr. Speaker, as I said awhile ago, both parties are responsible for this expenditure. We accept before the country our full share of responsibility, and we glory in it. Sir, when the union of the provinces took place, there were two alternatives opened to the choice of the Parliament and the people of Canada. True, Sir, we could have dispensed with deepening and enlarging the canals; true, we could have dispensed with building the Intercolonial Railway; true, we could have dispensed with building the Pacific Railway; true, we could have dispensed with subsidizing the provinces; true, we could have dispensed with acquiring the North-West Territories; true, we could have dispensed with subsidizing by millions of dollars local and colonization lines of railway. We might have done all this; but, on the other hand, we would not to-day have had a united Canada from ocean to ocean. We would not to-day have had the best system of waterways in the world; we would not to-day have had the great iron band uniting together all the provinces from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia; we would not to-day have so extended and developed our free institutions as to merit the admiration of all true friends of civil, political and religious liberty; we would not to-day have been a people conscious of their strength, hopeful of the future, and determined to deserve the destiny which will be the reward of their patriotism, their enterprise, their perseverance and their courage. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say what they may. The more I consider the question, the more I am convinced that if to-day we were called upon in this House to make the choice of one or the other of these alternatives, we would select the alternative which has brought about these great results, and we would leave hon. gentlemen opposite to their despondency and despair. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need add any further figures on the financial question. I think the figures I have given suffice to show how false, how erroneous, how unfair, how unjust and how illogical were the comparisons made the other day by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I will say only a few words with regard to what hon. gentlemen opposite call the situation of the country. They are very despondent, and we know that they have reason to be so, if we look at the question from the standpoint of their own failures. My hon. friend from Haldimand has given to them on that question, as on all others, such a crushing reply that I need not go exhaustively into it. But I was somewhat amazed the other night to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk mustering up courage to try to say seriously what I suppose must have given him internally a hearty laugh—that a comparison of the present condition of the affairs of the country with their condition in 1877-78 is altogether in favour of the time when his friends were on the Treasury benches.

Mr. CURRAN. That was a joke.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). Really, as the hon. member for Montreal Centre says, it must have been a joke. The hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk were not so despondent during the gloomy years when they occupied the Treasury benches; although anyone who knows the history of this country knows very well that that was its darkest period. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask where is the man with eyes to see, with a memory to remember, with an intelligence to think, to recollect and to judge,—where is the man with a responsible head on his shoulders, and with brains not softened by partisan fanaticism, who will not agree that, compared with the situation of the country when the hon. member for South Oxford was playing the inglorious part of a slumbering fly on the halted wheel, then stuck in the thick mud of free trade despondency and ruin, the state of Canadian affairs for the last twelve years has been more advantageous, more prosperous, more satisfactory, more reassuring and more promising for the future. And yet, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite, who have only cheerful recollections of the years when they were sitting on the Treasury benches, when despondency, discouragement, I may say despair, had crossed the threshold of so many Canadian homes, have only words of disparagement, words of reproach, words of desperation when they speak of the happy years which followed their downfall. It was only when they received their dismissal from the people that they at last rose to a sense of the dangers ahead. I heard the other day the hon. member for South Oxford say, in plaintive tones, how sorry he was that such a great country as Canada was not given the prosperity to which it is entitled, and, he added we have a territory which can support at least a hundred millions of people. I think the hon. gentleman was right in that statement, or rather he underestimated the amount. I here repeat that, considering the varied and great resources of the Dominion, from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia, this extent of fertile territory can support a population even greater than one hundred millions. But let us suppose that is the full number which the country can in reality support, is it not our bounden duty to join hands together in order to work out the splendid future before us? And when I look at what we have accomplished since 1867, when I consider the present state of affairs, and when I think of the possibilities of the future, I cannot help feeling that the despondency exhibited by hon. gentlemen opposite is unworthy of men, unworthy of members of this House, unworthy of politicians, unworthy of statesmen, and unworthy of true Canadians with blood in their veins, brains in their heads, and good Canadian hearts in their breasts. With the permission of the House I will say a few words about the trade question. It is not a new one. It has been so exhaustively discussed in this House for the last sixteen or seventeen years that I really do not see that I can add very much to what has been said. I have, however, been somewhat of a student of political economy, I will not say in my leisure hours, because I have given many hours to it. The hon. member for South Oxford and his friends have raised again in this House and country the question of free trade and protection. I might quote many authorities, giving on the one side the views of the free traders and on the other the views of the protectionists, but they have been read before in this House many times over for the last sixteen or seventeen years, and I need not refer to them now. But one thing I know. I know that political economy is not an abstract science; it is an experimental science; and the tariff maker who would go to work according to absolute principles of free trade would soon run into absurdities for which the people would have to pay very dearly. To settle that point, if the House will bear with me, I would like to read a few lines written by a very clever man, Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State of the United States. Last year, there was a discussion between the Hon. Mr. Gladstone and the Hon. Mr. Blaine on this question of free trade and protection. They wrote very interesting articles, which were published in the North American Review. I would like to sum up the exposition of protectionist principles, as laid down by Mr. Blaine, the more so as we are to have shortly negotiations opened at Washington with regard to our trade relations with the United States, in which Mr. Blaine will have a great deal to say, and it is important to know what he thinks of the free trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Blaine says:

"The free trader cannot offset the force of the argument by claiming that the laws regulating revenue and trade are, like municipal laws, silent during the shock of arms, because the five closing years—indeed almost six years—of the decade in which the rebellion occurred were passed in peace, and during those years the ravages of war were in large degree repaired and new wealth rapidly acquired. But I shall not give to Mr. Gladstone or to the American free trader the advantage of seeming to rest the defence of protection upon its marvellous value during the exhaustive period of war. Viewing the country from 1861 to 1889—full twenty-eight years—the longest undisturbed period in which either protection or free trade has been tried in this country—I ask Mr. Gladstone if a parallel can be found to the material advancement of the United States."

Then read what he says about the free trader:

"Perhaps the most remarkable feature in the argument of Mr. Gladstone, as, indeed, of every English free trader, except John Stuart Mill, is the universality of application which he demands for his theory. In urging its adoption he makes no distinction between countries; he takes no account of geographical position—whether a nation be in the eastern or the western hemisphere, whether it be north or south of the equator: he pays no heed to climate, or product, or degree of advancement: none to topography—whether the country be as level as the delta of the Nile, or as mountainous as the Republic of Bolivia; none to pursuits and employments, whether in the agricultural, manufacturing or commercial field; none to the wealth or poverty of a people; none to population, whether it be crowded or sparse; none to area, whether it be as limited as a German principality or as extended as a continental empire. Free trade he believes advantageous for England; therefore, without the allowance of any modifying condition, great or small, the English economist declares it to be advantageous for the United States, for Brazil, for Australia, in short, for all countries with which England can establish trade relations. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for Mr. Gladstone to find any principle of administration or any measure of finance so exactly fitted to the varying needs of all countries as he assumes the policy of free trade to be. Surely it is not unfair to maintain that, deducing his results from observation and experience in his own country, he may fall into error and fail to appreciate the financial workings of other countries geographically remote and of vastly greater area.

"The American protectionist, let it not be discourteous to urge, is broader in his views than the English free trader."

Or, I may say, the Liberal Canadian free trader,—

"No intelligent protectionist in the United States pretends that every country would alike realize advantages from the adoption of the protective system. Human government is not a machine, and even machines cannot be so perfectly adjusted as to work with equal effectiveness at all times and under all conditions. Great Britain and the United States certainly resemble one another in more ways than either can be said to resemble any other nation in the world; yet, when we compare the two on the question at issue, the differences are so marked, that we almost lose sight of the resemblance. One is an insular monarchy, with class government: the other a continental republic, with popular government. One has a large population to the square mile; the other a small population to the square mile. One was old in a rich and complex civilization before the establishment of the other was even foreseen. One had become the wealthiest nation of the world, while the other was yet in the toils and doubts of a frontier life and a primitive civilization. One had extensive manufactures for almost every field of the human need, with the civilized world for its market, while the population of the other was still forced to divide its energies between the hard calling of the sea and the still harder calling of a rude and scantily-remunerative agriculture."

Now a few lines of what Mr. Blaine says as to the result of protection in Great Britain itself:

"During the last thirty years of her protective system, and especially during the twenty years from 1826 to 1846, Great Britain increased her material wealth beyond all precedent in the commercial history of the world. Her development of steam power gave to every British workman the arms of Briareus, and the inventive power of her mechanicians increased the amount, the variety and the value of her fabrics beyond all anticipation. Every year of that period witnessed the addition of millions upon millions of sterling to the revenue capital of the Kingdom; every year witnessed a great addition to the effective machinery whose aggregate power was already the wonder of the world. The onward march of her manufacturing industries, the steady and rapid development of her mercantile marine, absorbed the matchless enterprise and energy of the kingdom. Finally, with a vast capital accumulated, with a low rate of interest established, and with a manufacturing power unequalled, the British merchants were ready to underbid all rivals in seeking for the trade of the world."

And then, a few lines further on—and these are the last I shall quote—he says:

"The traffic of the world seemed prospectively in her control. Could this condition of trade have continued, no estimate of the growth of England's wealth would be possible. Practically it would have had no limit."

Now, I think Mr. Blaine, the hon. gentleman with whom our Canadian free traders expect to negotiate an unrestricted reciprocity treaty, has given very fully his views as to free trade and protection. The question of free trade pure and simple was discussed in this House and in the country from 1876 to 1878. It was discussed all over the country, in the public press and on all the hustings, in every city, town, village and hamlet, and in 1878 the people of Canada in their might decided that henceforward Canada should enjoy the advantages of the protective system, and should no longer be subjected to the danger of free trade and the slaughtering of American goods in our markets. This decision the people of Canada have maintained ever since 1878. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite with their financial leader, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), once more raise the question of free trade and protection. It is no use taking up the time of the House to discuss the theoretical question. I have only this to say, that I challenge the hon. member for South Oxford, I challenge the hon. the leader of the Opposition himself and all his friends to bring before this House a square proposition declaring that it is the opinion of the House and the country that free trade pure and simple should be adopted as the financial or tariff policy of Canada. If they were to bring down such a motion, the leader of the Opposition would find that a good third of his supporters would vote against it, because, as we know by their utterances which have been reported in the debates of this House, they are really protectionists and supporters of the National Policy. Now, not having the courage, I might say the manlihood, of proposing a motion which would be the real and sincere exposition of their free trade principles, they fall back on this capital absurdity, as I may call it, of unrestricted reciprocity. I have followed with interest the debates that have taken place in this House and the discussion in the public press on the question of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. I do not wish to add to what has been said on this subject. I do not think I could add very much to the reasons which have been given and which must induce this House and the people to deal with this wild proposition. But what I never could understand was this. With regard to the relations of Canada with the United States, Canada having always been ready since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 to enter into larger trade relations with the United States, Canada having made on several occasions whatever advances could be made consistently with her dignity and independence, I have always wondered how it came to the mind of my hon. friends that they could settle the difficult question of our trade relations with the United States by making the humiliating surrender they have proposed. It is a very simple way to settle a difficulty when you propose to give up all you have. Of course all that the hon. gentlemen have said in this House, all their propositions on the question, all they have said on the hustings, only tend to prove to the United States, unfortunately, that Canada is at their mercy and that they can do what they like with us. I ask you now, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and his good-hearted friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) were to go to Washington as the representatives of the Crown of England to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, in what position they would stand as to maintaining the rights of Canada, when beforehand they have proclaimed to the whole world that Canada can do nothing but bow to the United States dictation. As a member of this House representing one of the finest constituencies in the Province of Quebec and in the Dominion—and I do not say this in disparagement of others—as a citizen of Canada, I have tried to study as fully as I could the question of unrestricted reciprocity, and I have come to this conclusion, that hon. gentlemen have not been able to bring to the support of their own policy one argument which is worth serious consideration from this House. I have heard the hon. member for South Oxford, and the hon. member for North Norfolk, on Tuesday, say the same thing, that Canada could not go alone, that it is impossible to expect her to prosper because she is living as a neighbour to the United States. Well, if I look over the world I find the same circumstances existing everywhere, that countries are neighbours to each other. Spain is a neighbour to France; there is only a range of mountains dividing them. Germany is a neighbour to Austria; Belgium is a neighbour to France and to other countries also. The same may be said of Russia. The German Empire is a neighbour to the Russian Empire; the Austrian Empire is a neighbour to the Russian Empire and to the German Empire also; and have you ever heard any statesman in those wealthy and prosperous countries proclaiming to the world that they could not get on without having unrestricted reciprocity with each other? Have you ever heard France say: We must give to Spain the control of our tariff because they are our neighbours? Have you ever heard Prince Bismarck—who had something to do with political affairs in Europe—or any other German statesman, say: We must have unrestricted reciprocity with Austria, or with Russia, because, forsooth, they are our neighbours?—we must have unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, we must give them control of our own tariff because we are neighbours? Really, if hon. gentlemen could unshackle their minds of party prejudices and fanaticism, they would soon realize the depth of ridicule there is in their position. If I look over the situation of Europe I find all these countries I have mentioned having each their own tariff system; and if you will allow me, I will give you a few more figures, taking, for instance, Austria, Belgium, Germany, France, Great Britain, Portugal and Spain. Great Britain, of course, is separated from the continent by the sea, but all the other countries I have mentioned are neighbours to each other. They have all got their independence, they regulate their own tariff laws, they make and have made commercial treaties with each other, and the Government of each nation has taken care to arrange the duties for their own advantage first, and if they were to the advantage of their neighbours, well and good. The other party to the treaty also took the same care to secure its own advantage. But what is the fact of the case? Those several European countries that I have mentioned, have about one-third of the territory, in extent, of the Dominion of Canada, or, in round numbers, about one million of square miles altogether. Now, those several countries of Europe have every confidence in themselves, they are self-reliant, they are working out their own destinies, and, as I have just mentioned, with a territorial extent only one-third that of the Dominion of Canada, they support a population of two hundred millions, and they have, moreover, been able to develop an external trade of about eight milliards of dollars, and yet they have not sacrificed their own independence, they have not sacrificed the right to control their own tariff. They have discussed trade relations with their neighbours, and they have agreed when they could agree, and when they could not agree they have remained self-supporting enough, self-reliant enough, to work out their own destinies. Now, I do not see why we Canadians cannot follow their example. We must strive, as far as possible, to extend our external trade relations, we must try to develop our trade with all the countries of the world, if possible, and with the United States as well as with the others. But wherever we meet with pretensions with which we cannot agree, whenever we meet with the assertion that in order to trade without any restriction, we must sacrifice the independence of Canada and the right to control our own tariff, then is the time to stand on our own ground and to assert our determination to work out our own destinies alone. There are three great objections which we have to make to the scheme of unrestricted reciprocity—first, discrimination against Great Britain; second, we would have to resign control of our own tariff; and third, we would have to provide for the necessary revenue to carry on our Government by the only resource that would be left to us, direct taxation. If hon. gentlemen opposite can get over these three difficulties we might, perhaps, take their scheme into consideration. But so far, whenever they have been asked to tell us how they were going to raise a revenue, we have found, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) so well said the other night, that they are not able to answer. One of them is ready to discriminate against Great Britain, and another is not. One of them will resign control of our tariff, and another will not. When the hon. member for North Norfolk was asked the plain question the other day by the Finance Minister, how he would provide for the loss of revenue, he at once found himself in the deep sea, and he could not answer. Mr. Speaker, the question about the revenue is a very simple one. We have said that unrestricted reciprocity, if it was ever attempted, would result in a loss of Customs revenue of about $15,000,000 to start with, which would gradually go on increasing if the country was at all able to prosper under such a system. Now, the hon. gentlemen have got to explain to this House how they will provide for this $15,000,000 of revenue, if not by direct taxation. But there is more to be considered. I was sorry that the hon. leader of the Opposition was not in his seat the other day when the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) desired to ask him a very fair question; and as the hon. leader of the Opposition is present to-day, of course he will be only too glad to answer the question. Under unrestricted reciprocity we would have to provide for $15,000,000 of revenue, if the present Government were in power, and if their policy were carried out. But if hon. gentlemen opposite were to cross over to the Treasury benches and carry out their policy, we would have to provide for a very much larger amount. I had to discuss this subject very often in the Local House in Quebec, and frequently during the last election campaign and previously, and as during the last year I have passed through three elections during ten months, I know something of the question. During the late electoral campaign word was received that Mr. Mercier was to make a grand speech in Montreal in support of Mr. Laurier, the leader of the Opposition in this House. The gentleman went there and made a speech. His whole speech was confined to a justification of his interference in the federal elections as Prime Minister in Quebec, and the interference of his colleagues in several elections, and he gave as an explanation of the fact, that Sir John Macdonald would not carry out the resolutions of the interprovincial conference, and that Mr. Laurier was pledged to do so if he attained power. The leader of the Opposition in this House has, so far, been cautious not to say a word about this scheme, but I hold that this House and this country have the right to obtain a fair and square answer from the leader of the Opposition as to whether the assertion made by Mr. Mercier was true or not. On February 9th last Mr. Mercier said:

"Hon. Mr. Laurier has accepted the resolutions of the Interprovincial Conference of 1887, and promised to give them effect if he comes into power."

The same report appeared in the Toronto Globe, La Patrie, the Liberal organ in Montreal, and L'Electeur, in Quebec. I have a right to ask the leader of the Opposition if it is true that he pledged himself to Mr. Mercier to increase the subsidies to the provinces, and to carry out the resolutions of the Interprovincial Conference if called to power?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman want an answer?

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman, who is so versatile in speech and in everything else, has not done me the honour to read my speeches during the last three or four years. I have spoken on that question in Toronto and in the city of Quebec, and I have always asserted that in consequence of the majority of the people of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I was in favour of the Quebec Conference resolutions.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). I am glad to have received the answer. Now we know where hon. gentlemen stand and where we stand. At all events, I will say to the leader of the Opposition that I have calculated the results that would follow by carrying into effect the interprovincial conference resolutions. If these resolutions were adopted by the Parliament of Canada, with the population as shown by the last census, the subsidies of the provinces would be increased by $2,000,000 a year or 50 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about extravagance and increased expenditure, and I ask them how they would be able, under a policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which would destroy our Customs revenue, to provide for these $2,000,000 additional. I desire to offer a few words in regard to a remark by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), to which the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has given a complete answer, and that is, that if we had unrestricted reciprocity, all at once the value of the 1,200,000 horses in Canada would be raised by $37,000,000, and the same with respect to the land. The hon. member for Haldimand said that such a proposition should not have been propounded in this House, and he was perfectly correct. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in answer to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), used rather harsh words when he said that one of his statements was a piece of effrontery. I will not indulge in such language, because, if I were to do so, I would call the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford a piece of nonsense. I will not do so, because it is my duty to use in this House as elsewhere only gentlemanly and parliamentary language. I will explain my view by saying that the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford was really the false proposition of a fanatical mind. In endeavouring to explain how he would supply the loss of revenue the hon. member for North Norfolk was somewhat timid, and he said—these are not his words but they embody his statement—there is one thing we will do, and that is, to reduce the expenditure of the country to what it was several years ago, when it was only $24,000,000. I have the Public Accounts at my hand and I challenge the hon. member for North Norfolk, the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Oxford, the financial authority on that side of the House, to show how they could reduce the public expenditure to $24,000,000 and carry on the Government of the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will run over the figures for two or three minutes. For instance, a large item of our expenditure is the interest on the public debt. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to tell me: are they going to run the country into bankruptcy, are they going to repudiate the public debt? Surely they will not do that. Another large item of our expenditure is the subsidies to the provinces, which amounts to $4,000,000, and hon. gentlemen opposite are pledged to increase that expenditure by 50 per cent. Another large item of our expenditure is the sinking fund, which requires nearly $2,000,000 a year, and of course it gradually increases every year according to the proportionate increase of the deposits for that fund. Can they reduce that item of expenditure? Surely no sane man on the other side of the House will say that they can. It is a part of a contract between us and those who lent us their money, and that contract has to be carried out for the credit of the country. Another large item of our expenditure is the collection of revenue. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like hon. gentlemen opposite to show to this House what reduction they can make on this item. I heard during the last election campaign one of the speakers of the party opposite say: We will decrease the cost of collecting the revenue by abolishing the Custom-houses between the two countries. I replied to this: Well and good, my good friend, but if in the future you have to collect $15,000,000 of direct taxation, do you think the angels will come down from Heaven and collect that for you free of cost? I stated then, and I think I was right, that for every dollar of reduction in the cost of collection they would make by the abolition of the Custom-houses on the frontier, they would have to pay at least $3 for the collection of direct taxation. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are limited to this field of operation—outside of the charges for the public debt, outside of the sinking fund, outside of subsidies to provinces, and outside of the collection of revenue—we are limited to the expenditure of about $10,000,000 a year, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wants to reduce the total expenditure by $12,000,000. How will he do it? He will not have a cent left for the expenses of legislation, for the expenses of civil government, for the administration of justice, for penitentiaries, for the Indians, for the Mounted Police, and for all the other services of the country. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that they will be able to carry on the Government without any money whatever? Really, when we go into this calculation a little exhaustively, we find that the hon. gentlemen who advocate that policy on the other side of the House have not one inch of ground to stand upon. Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this trade question, there is a point which I think it is important to consider. We hear hon. gentlemen opposite saying in support of their unrestricted reciprocity scheme, that being free traders, and believing in the impossibility of having free trade with all the world, they will feel satisfied if they have free trade with the United States, and they call it by the glorious name of continental free trade. But we have only to look across the line to find out another state of things over there. The Canadian free trader has a twin brother on the other side of the line, but also on the other side there are some protectionists; and whilst the hon. gentlemen opposite are fighting their best for continental free trade, the American protectionists, the statesmen of the United States, are fighting for continental protection. I would like hon. gentlemen opposite, when they get to Washington, to try and reconcile their aspirations with these facts. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has truly answered to what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said with regard to the depreciation of the value of land in the Province of Ontario. Speaking for the Province of Quebec generally, I will say that in that province we have not had this pretented depreciation of the value of land, and I think it is only proper, if we want to have a fair comparison, not to do as these hon. gentlemen opposite very cautiously do when calculating the value of land in Ontario and elsewhere, namely, compare the value for the last two or three years with the values in 1881, 1882, and 1883. If you want to make a fair comparison of the result of the protection of the National Policy, compared with their free trade policy, you must compare the value of land now with the value of land during the time the Liberal party were in power from 1874 to 1878. I have enquired around the Province of Quebec from several persons who are by their professional occupation able to know the value of land, and they all agree in telling me that the value of land is now at least, in many districts, twenty-five per cent. greater than it was in the years from 1874 to 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite ruled the destinies of Canada. It is not to be wondered at that during the very prosperous years from 1880 to 1888 the value of land should have increased largely, as it may have had in some instances somewhat of a boom; but if for the last two or three years crops have been insufficient, and have not been so good as we would have liked them to be, is it the fault of the National Policy? In addition to this we know, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) mentioned on Tuesday last, what is the rule all over the world. Land in a general way is like any other commodity, the price will tend to decrease according to the extent of land brought under cultivation, and when you see all over the world railways opening up large areas where there was no civilization before—for instance, whilst in Canada we have opened up millions of land in the North-West, brought that into the market, and opened them for cultivation, it is no wonder at all that for a certain time there must be depreciation in the value of land, but the equilibrium will come again. We extend the area of our cultivated land, and as in Canada, so in every other country in the world, the consequence will be that by giving to the farmers of Canada a large and important market here within our borders, the market of our great cities, the market of our increased industries and manufactures, we will help the farmers along and ensure their prosperity in the future as we have ensured it for the last twelve years.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair I had concluded the remarks I intended to make on the two first questions which called for discussion in that debate, the financial question and the trade question. I said in commencing those remarks that there was a third question which it was our duty seriously to take into consideration: I mean the political, or more properly the national question. Now, I will speak my mind frankly and openly. I have given to this question of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, all the consideration which as a public man and as a citizen of Canada it was my duty to give to it; and I may say that I have been brought face to face with this conclusion, that either of these schemes —either commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity—is only a stepping stone to political union with the United States. I am fully convinced that there can be no other result. The hon. gentlemen opposite will say what they please on the subject; they will try to dissimulate as much as possible the inevitable consequence of their policy; but there is the fact staring them in the face, and staring in the face of all loyal Canadians. For the last three years we have seen the spectacle of the friends and partisans of unrestricted reciprocity in Canada doing their best to explain to this House and to the people of Canada how the country will grow prosperous under their policy; and, in passing, I may mention how I, for one, wondered how it was that during the five years these hon. gentlemen were in power, and during all the years that they have been in public life—responsible public men since the union of the provinces—this project never occurred to them; but that it took them twenty-one years, from 1867 to 1888, to find out that by the very reason of Canada being the neighbour of the United States we could not go on without unrestricted reciprocity. Surely they have not been very far-sighted in that respect; but at all events—and this is their answer to the argument of those loyal Canadians who believe that the ultimate result of this policy will be annexation to the United States—they pretend to say, no; what we want is to make Canada prosperous. As the hon. member for North Norfolk said, the more population we shall have, the more prosperous we shall be; the more wealth we shall have in Canada, the surer we shall be to avoid annexation. But, Mr. Speaker, if we look on the other side of the line, we find just the contrary said there. All those who support the scheme in the United States —the public men, the press, and the men engaged in business pursuits—have all the one idea, that they want unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union precisely to bring about political union. Allow me to quote once more the words of President Lane, in introducing the gallant knight of South Oxford to the Boston banquet some months ago. He said:

"Our Liberal friends—not only Fielding and Longley of Nova Scotia, Davies of Prince Edward Island, Mercier and Laurier of Quebec, Cartwright of Ontario, and a host besides—look to us, the people of the United States, for the sign by which they shall conquer."

Mr. Speaker, amongst the supporters of unrestricted reciprocity in Canada are two men who have, I will not say the courage—for one has not had the courage to speak publicly—but at all events, who say what they really expect for the future. We have Mr. Farrer and the disclosures which were made public with regard to his somewhat notorious correspondence with United States people; and we have another gentleman occupying a more prominent position in Canada, who has been the most eloquent and most clever exponent of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, but who, unlike them, has spoken openly. I mean Mr. Goldwin Smith. Now, that gentleman does not disguise his way of thinking. He says plainly what he is—an annexationist; he wants political union between the United States and Canada to be brought about, and he says so frankly. He says that he wants a union of all the English-speaking people on the continent of North America. He has published a very well written book entitled "Canada and the Canadian question," in which we shall find his views on the subject. Then we have another gentleman who was for many years the talented leader of hon. gentlemen opposite. His words have been quoted before, but I do not want to close my speech without quoting a few lines from his remarkable letter. Here is what the Hon. Mr. Blake says in the letter which hon. gentlemen opposite were so anxious should not see the light of day before the 5th of March last:

"Assuming that absolute free trade with the States, best described as commercial union, may and ought to come, I believe that it can only come as an incident, or at any rate as a well understood precursor of political union, for which, indeed, we should be able to get more better terms before than after the surrender of our commercial independence."

These are sensible words, Mr. Speaker. Then Mr. Blake goes on:

"Then, so believing—believing that the decision of the trade question involves that of the constitutional issue, for which you are unprepared and with which you do not even conceive yourselves to be dealing, how can I properly recommend you now to decide on commercial union? Do not suppose that these are with me questions of yesterday. Long ago, while leader of the Liberal party, it became my duty to examine into a similar design, submitted by a political architect of some reputation."

I wonder if it was the hon. member for South Oxford—

"I thought the foundation insecure, the lines defective and the estimate of cost inadequate. It seemed to me that the proposed structure could be erected only on that different foundation, those other lines, and that larger cost which has been described. For this it was conceded that the people were not then prepared. And I was unable to propose the design for adoption as a party plan. My views remain unchanged to-day."

Now, by this letter—and it is very important that it should be on public record—we see that one of the most important reasons which decided the Hon. Mr. Blake to abandon the leadership of his party and retire from political life was that this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity could not be accepted by him, as a loyal Canadian and a member of the Legislature of Canada. The House will bear with me, I hope, when I return, for a moment only, to this book written by Mr. Goldwin Smith. I will quote but a few lines, which read as follows:—

"The reasoning of Lord Durham with regard to French Canadians holds good in some measure with regard to Canada altogether in its relation to the Anglo-Saxon continent. He thought it best to make the country at once that which, after the lapse of no long time, it must be. And this reminds us of another reason for not putting off the unification of the English-speaking race, since it is perfectly clear that the forces of Canada alone are not sufficient to assimilate the French element or even to prevent the indefinite consolidation and growth of a French nation. Either the conquest of Quebec was utterly fatuous, or it is to be desired that the American continent should belong to the English tongue and to Anglo-Saxon civilization."

I wish to make a few words of comment on this point. I know I am here treading on very delicate ground, but, in one sense, French Canadians are thankful to Mr. Goldwin Smith. We are thankful to him for having spoken openly and said what he wants. It is an advantage to know with whom we have to deal. I would like to know from the leader of the Opposition and his friends if they support the views of Mr. Goldwin Smith on this point. I would like to say—and my hon. colleagues will allow me these few remarks, I have no doubt—that I am one of the members of Parliament representing here a French constituency; I am one of the members representing the French-speaking element, not that I mean to say I represent absolutely that element, for, in common with all other members, I represent Canada and Canadian interests before all. But, despite what hon. gentlemen opposite and Mr. Goldwin Smith may say, there is one thing certain and history is there to prove it. Providence has decided that on this free soil of Canada, the different nationalities which have sprung up from the European nations, are to mingle together and to live side by side in a brotherly way. The French element is here on the soil of Canada, and all we ask is that, like the English-speaking population of the Dominion, we should be allowed to be loyal to the Crown, that we should be allowed to help in developing the resources of the Dominion and in defending the rights of this Parliament and the independence of Canada. We ask that we should be allowed to develop and work out the free institutions we have received from the British Empire; and when I see that Mr. Smith has written that he favours political union with the United States, purposely for the annihilation of the French element, I think it is my duty as a representative of the French element to resent any such opinion. And I will say publicly, in answer to Mr. Goldwin Smith, that the French Canadians in Canada have done their share in developing the resources of Canada. Have our people not been a loyal people? Has not our French element been a law-abiding element? Have we created any difficulties here in Canada? And whilst we are working hand in hand with you for the development of this Canada of ours and to ensure the glorious destiny which shall be our share in the future, why deny us the privilege of cherishing the names of our ancestors and the glories of our mother nation on the other side of the Atlantic? Once more I would like to know if the leader of the Opposition approves of what Mr. Smith has written upon this point. Now I desire to say a few words about the issues that we fought at the last election, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for North Norfolk, who asked Tuesday why the dissolution had taken place. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a somewhat despondent recollection of that dissolution and its consequences; and we can see that they would have much preferred there had been no dissolution at all. But the political question is very plain, and as one of the citizens of Canada, as one of the public men of Canada, I must say that I entirely approve of the advice given by the advisers of the Governor General to dissolve Parliament. The reason given was one of the best that could be found. A great public question had been discussed for three years all over the length and breadth of the Dominion, and had been the subject of prolonged debates in this House. It had been discussed by the press throughout the country, and when the responsible advisers of the Crown in Canada said that the time had come when the question was to be fairly submitted to the people, whether we should have unrestricted reciprocity and surrender our rights to legislate on fiscal matters and discriminate against the mother country, or whether we should try and negotiate with the United States, in a fair way, a reasonable and just treaty of reciprocity, they did their duty to the people of Canada in advising a dissolution, and the people of Canada responded nobly to the appeal. On the side of the Government of Canada and its supporters the late campaign was fought on the issue put squarely before the people, whilst on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite it was not. I challenged this afternoon the hon. member for South Oxford to bring down a single resolution in favour of absolute free trade, pure and simple. If they had done so before the elections, there would not perhaps have been returned of them to this House even a corporal's guard. But all over the country side issues were introduced in order to deceive public opinion, and in the Province of Quebec, of which I can speak more particularly, —for I fought the battle there, and I am glad to say to-night, that in eight months time I redeemed two constituencies from those gentlemen—all kinds of side issues were introduced in the fight. We have constantly heard in this House hon. gentlemen charging the Government, and on Tuesday we heard this charge from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), with having granted money for railway subsidies to bribe the constituencies. Strange to say, in the last campaign in the Province of Quebec—and no doubt it was the same in the rest of the Dominion—there was not a county or a township or a parish in the Province of Quebec that could have any interest in the building of a railway where these gentlemen did not try to arouse public feeling because the Government had not subsidized such railways. As the members of this House are well aware, if the great Liberal-Conservative party in the Province of Quebec during the last few years have suffered somewhat and have been reduced in numbers in their representation in this House, it is due to the side issues which were raised against the Government in the two last general elections. I remember very well what I have heard from the leader of the Opposition and his friends, and I remember that when the leader of the Opposition went around the Province of Quebec, he did not visit the constituencies as a free trader par excellence. No, Sir, he appealed, I may say, to the national or rather the racial feelings of our French Canadian people, holding in one hand that Saskatchewan rifle ready to charge against the loyal defenders of the sovereign authority of our gracious Queen, and in the other hand the "blood-rusted key to attempt the future's portals." Before resuming my seat, I think it is my duty to ask the House to express its views on a sub-amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford. I will read the amendment which I intend to propose clause by clause, with a few words of comment on each clause. I will move, seconded by my friend the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that all after the word "That" in the amendment be struck out, and the following be added to the main motion :

"And in concurring in these resolutions this House desires to express its approval of the efficient policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government, which, by permitting the free importation of raw materials, and by judicious protection of her natural and manufactured products, has resulted in the marked development of Canadian industries——"

I will place this question fairly and squarely before this House to ascertain whether this House is in favour of a National Policy or of absolute free trade. Secondly, I shall ask the House to express its approval——"of the liberal aid which has been granted to important and necessary public works, notably railways, canals and steamship lines, which have proved such important factors in developing our resources and facilitating our commerce——"

I will do this for the very important reason that, since the beginning of the session, as often as the occasion has occurred, we have heard that it was almost criminal, according to the hon. member for North Norfolk particularly, for the Government of Canada to have granted railway subsidies, and yet we have seen in this House not later than yesterday, and we have seen almost every day since the opening of the session, hon. gentlemen opposite rising from their seats one after the other and begging the Government to grant subsidies to this and that railway. Yesterday three hon. gentlemen rose, and I intended to say a few words on the subject then, but I thought I could wait until I had the present occasion. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Vaillancourt) proposed that assistance should be given to a proposed railway, the Quebec Oriental, which is to start from a few miles on the south shore of the St. Lawrence and to run between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his having supported the claim of this railway to a subsidy. He did so in very good and appropriate terms. If this railway is built, as I hope it will be, it will pass through my constituency, the County of L'Islet, and I shall be very glad if the Government can see its way to subsidize this road. Afterwards we heard from the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), asking the Government to subsidize the railway, and the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Amyot) spoke in the same strain. I know that this railway is a very important one and will develop a large section of our country, but I know that if the Government see their way to subsidize this railway, it will require the expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars. These hon. gentlemen will find it difficult to agree with the hon. member for North Norfolk when he objected to the granting of railway subsidies. I have taken the trouble to hunt up in a hurry the amount of subsidies that would be required if the Government acceded to the requests of hon. gentlemen on the other side, and I find it would be at least $10,000,000. Yet these hon. gentlemen are charging the Government with extravagance in the policy they have adopted in the past, and which I hope they will continue in the future, of subsidizing railways within the limits of the financial resources of the country. If these hon. gentlemen are sincere in their requests to the Government for this and that subsidy, I hope they will vote for this second clause of my amendment. The third clause to which I will ask the House to give its approval is :

—"of the wise and prudent management of the finances which, while adequately providing for the public service, has maintained and advanced the credit of the country, and while producing substantial surpluses for capital expenditure, has made no appreciable addition to the public debt during the last two years."

I will ask my hon. friends to record their votes in favour of a policy which has produced surpluses and reduced taxation, and, when the hon. member for South Oxford seemed so anxious that we shall declare that we want the taxes on all the necessaries of life abolished, I ask hon. gentlemen to express their approval of the policy which has abolished the duty on sugar. Fourth, the hon. gentlemen opposite are always making a big cry against the extravagance in expenditure. They want to see the public expenditure reduced. Well, I am also in favour of the reduction of the expenditure, but within the limits required and fixed for a good public service. I say it would be a wrong policy, a very bad and stupid policy, in the interest of Canada, if we were to reduce the expenditure at the expense of the public service of Canada, and of the progress and development of the resources of Canada. A few days ago we had the pleasure of hearing from the Minister of Finance, speaking in the name of the Government, this most important declaration, that whilst they are asking the Parliament of Canada to reduce the taxation by $3,500,000, they only want to recoup the loss of revenue by $1,500,000, and they want to make up the difference by economy in the public service. Well, when a Government is courageous enough and understands so well its duty to the people of Canada as to undertake the very difficult task of reducing the expenditure by $2,000,000 out of a total, I will say, of $20,000,000, outside the interest on the public debt, the sinking fund and the subsidies to the provinces, I think such a Government deserves commendation, and I will ask our friends opposite to give us a proof of their sincerity in asking for a reduction in the expenditure, by declaring their satisfaction that the Government is to effect an economy of $2,000,000. Now, the last paragraph is this :

"That this House, while approving of the special efforts made by the Government to increase Canadian trade with the far East, with the West Indies, with Great Britain and with the United States, desires to express its confidence that any negotiations for the extension of commercial relations with the United States will be so conducted that their result will be consistent with that proper control of our own tariff and revenue which every self-respecting people must maintain, and with the continuance of those profitable business and political relations with the mother country which are earnestly desired by all intelligent and loyal Canadians."

I will ask the House to say that the policy of this Parliament of Canada must be expressed in the terms I have just laid down in this amendment ; and if hon. gentlemen are sincere in their expression of opinion that they do not want to discriminate against Great Britain, that they do not want to sacrifice the right of this country to regulate our own fiscal laws, then I ask them to join with us in voting for this amendment in order to strengthen the Government in the negotiations which are soon to be opened at Washington. Now, in placing this amendment in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and in submitting it to the calm consideration and to the sound judgment of this House, I hope that the representatives of the people will be found equal to their duty. We are passing through a crisis in our history. The discussions of the last three years have disturbed the public mind. They have created in the mind of a large majority of our people a fear that the patriotic efforts of the last twenty-four years to lay deep in the free soil of Canada the foundations of the magnificent structure of a great Canadian nation may yet be of no avail, on account of the disloyal designs and deeds of wild and traitorous schemers. On the other hand, they have created in the mind of the minority extravagant hopes of unlimited prosperity, which can never be realized, and which are doomed to disappointment. I say it is adverse to the public interest that such anxiety on the one hand, and such fond delusions, impossible of realization, on the other, should exist, and, as responsible representatives of the people, we must join together to restore confidence, quiet, security, and self-reliance from one end of the Dominion to the other. Important negotiations will shortly be opened in Washington with our neighbours, with a view to settle all pending difficulties between the two countries. I am one of those who are confident that the statesmen who govern the great republic to the south of us, will receive the accredited representatives of the sovereign authority of the Queen of England and Canada, with an earnest desire to come to a fair, to a just and to an honourable agreement, which will be mutually advantageous, and which will ensure peace, good feelings and harmony between the two nations. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of this great event, I am sure I will voice the unanimous sentiment of the people of Canada when I say that the duty of this Parliament is to support the Government in the diplomatic task they have undertaken. Again I appeal to the leader of the Opposition and his supporters in this House to join with us in this patriotic action. I still hope that they will not allow the history of our times to record against them that in a moment of national emergency they were found unequal to their duty towards their country, towards the British Empire and towards their Sovereign. I hope that they will not be found completely lost to a proper sense of their responsibility as public men, as politicians, and as citizens of Canada. But if my appeal does not meet from those hon. gentlemen with a hearty response, then I will look around me and I will address myself to that patriotic phalanx of men who for years past have fought the noble battles of Canada. I will say to them that for the very reason that we are left single-handed in this national contest we must still more unite together, we must close our ranks and stand shoulder to shoulder. To our appeal I believe that the people of Canada will give a hearty and an enthusiastic response. Throughout the length and breadth of this wide Dominion the rallying cry will be heard and re-echoed over the waves to the foot of the Throne: Loyal to the Crown we have been; loyal to the Crown we shall be. At all times true to Canada we were; true to Canada we shall be. And like the great and loyal statesman, the chivalrous chieftain, the good-hearted friend now forever departed —may God permit that my closing sentence reaches him in the better land—"British subjects we were born, British subjects we will die." I, therefore, move the following amendment to the amendment:—

That all the words after the word "That" in the amendment be struck out and the following be added to the main motion:—"And in concurring in these Resolutions this House desires to express its approval (1) of the fiscal policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government, which, by permitting the free importation of raw materials, and by a judicious protection of our natural and manufactured products, has resulted in the marked development of Canadian industries; (2) of the liberal aid which has been granted to important and necessary public works, notably, railways, canals and steamship lines, which have proved such important factors in developing our resources and facilitating our commerce; (3) of the wise and prudent management of the finances, which, while adequately providing for the public service, has maintained and advanced the credit of the country, and while producing substantial surpluses for capital expenditure, has made no appreciable addition to the public debt during the last two years; (4) of the policy of relieving from duty articles of universal use, such as tea, coffee and sugar (in respect of the latter the consumer being freed from taxation to the extent of three and one-half millions during the present session), and of the mode of meeting the larger portion of the loss of revenue thereby caused by the exercise of economy in expenditure.

"That this House while approving of the special efforts made by the Government to increase Canadian trade with the far East, with the West Indies, with Great Britain and the United States, desires to express its confidence that any negotiations for the extension of commercial relations with the United States will be so conducted that their result will be consistent with that proper control of our own tariff and revenues which every self-respecting people must maintain, and with a continuance of those profitable business and political relations with the mother country which are earnestly desired by all intelligent and loyal Canadians."

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, with the merits of the resolution as moved by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) I have no fault to find; it may be a proper subject for discussion by this House. But the moving of this amendment at this present moment and under present circumstances is a direct breach of faith by the Government of a solemn covenant entered into with the Opposition. The hon. gentleman is aware that once before I had occasion to complain before this House that hon. gentlemen had not kept their word pledged to the Opposition. On that occasion the hon. gentlemen told me that if there was anything to find fault with by the Opposition it was not the result of any intention on their part, but it was simply the result of a misunderstanding. I had no hesitation on that occasion in accepting the explanation which they offered. But I call upon the hon. gentleman now to say what explanation he has to give of moving this amendment under present circumstances. The hon. gentleman is aware that when on a late occasion he moved the House into Ways and Means, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in answer to his motion for the House to go into Ways and Means, moved an amendment, to which, as he knows, by the rules of this House, no amendment could be moved. These rules of the House are the result of the wisdom of Parliament. They have been established for the proper carrying out of the business of Parliament, and they are rules so wise in themselves that no party on either side of the House, in power or in Opposition, ever took an exception to them. When the Minister of Finance had moved his resolution to go into Ways and Means, and my hon. friend the member for South Oxford had moved his amendment, to which no amendment could be moved, the Minister of Finance asked him, for convenience sake and in order to enable the Government to carry on the business of the country, to withdraw his amendment, at the same time pledging himself that at a later stage he should move his amendment, and the matter should stand just in the position it occupied at that time. This is the result of the condescension which was shown by my hon. friend. I will put it in this way to the Minister of Finance: Suppose that upon that occasion the hon. member for South Oxford had refused to accede to the desire of the hon. gentleman; suppose he had said: "No, I will not grant your demand; we will go on with the discussion; I insist on moving my amendment on the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means," where would the hon. Minister be to-day? He knows, as I know, that this sub-amendment could not have been moved; and because my hon. friend on that occasion thought proper, through the courteous exchange of opinions from one side of the House to the other, to accede to the demand which was made upon him, and to withdraw his motion under the direct pledge and understanding that he could move it at another stage with the same privileges, and the same advantages, and the same restrictions as well, as he could have moved it then, when this amendment could not have been moved, therefore, I now ask the hon. gentleman, I ask it in consequence of an arrangement which was agreed to on that side of the House, I ask it as a right, I ask it not as a matter of favour, or as a matter of privilege, but I ask it as a right, that the hon. gentleman keep his own word, stand by the pledge which he gave to the House, stand by the understanding which was arrived at, and see that this sub-amendment be withdrawn. I ask him to keep his word, and, Mr. Speaker, there are certain courtesies to be extended from one side to the other. I hope the hon. gentleman will not refuse those courtesies.

An hon. MEMBER. It is not a courtesy.

Mr. LAURIER. It is not, perhaps, courtesy; it may be said to be our right, but there are certain courtesies to be extended from one side to the other, and when the hon. gentleman asked my hon. friend to withdraw his motion he asked for the exercise of these courtesies which are extended from one side to the other. If on the present occasion we are not put in the position exactly as we should have been put, on a motion being made on the motion of the hon. gentleman to go into Committee of Ways and Means, then, Sir, we will understand there is no reliance to be placed on their words, and we will act accordingly.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably no one in the House is more surprised than myself at the tone of my hon. friend, at the matter of his remarks, and at the extraordinary conclusions to which he has come. Whatever passed between myself and him, or between myself and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), passed across the floor of this House, and is a matter of record, and a matter of hearing and of memory to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. That there was any private agreement between myself and the leader of the Opposftion, or between myself and the hon. member for South Oxford, I deny, and I do not think either of these gentlemen will say that there was.

An hon. MEMBER. They do not say so.

Mr. FOSTER. What took place was simply this: When the resolutions which I introduced in the course of my Budget speech, on the motion to go into the Committee of Ways and Means, when that motion came before the House, after I had finished my remarks and after they had been replied to by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he moved his amendment. I immediately stated, and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs bore me out in that, that it had always been the custom in the House that the resolutions should be read in Committee and should be passed by the Committee in order that they might become operative at once, and that if the hon. gentleman persisted in his motion it would be impossible that this should be done. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition protested that my hon. friend from South Oxford should not withdraw his motion, but my hon. friend from South Oxford pointed out to him, in a very few words, what perhaps he did not know before, what would be the business result of such a proceeding as that, and I stated from my place here—I stated nothing else publicly and nothing else privately—that if the hon. gentleman would withdraw his motion in amendment at that time, that he could move it upon going into concurrence, or upon the second reading, and that there would be the very same privileges of discussion, just as wide and just as broad, as there would have been if it had been in Committee. That was all that passed. If the record states anything else, or if any gentleman from his memory can state anything else, and have it substantiated, let it be done. But what is my hon. friend trying to do to-night? He, without any warrant whatever, rises in his place in this House and tries to fasten upon me and upon this side of the House a breach of contract with himself. He cannot establish it, and he knows that he cannot establish it, and when he attempts to fasten that upon me before the House, he is engaged in an operation in which he will be unsuccessful, just as much so as he was when he tried to persuade the House upon a former occasion that I broke faith with him—holding up his boyish threat that if such a thing as that shall be done they will teach us manners and they will have no dealings with us. We can get along on the Rules of the House if necessary, but we propose to be just as courteous, and just as honourable in carrying out our contracts across the House as we have ever been. What is the gravamen of the charge? What has my hon. friend, and the members on that side of the House, lost; have they lost any freedom of discussion or any freedom of vote? No; they can discuss their own resolution for hours, for days, for weeks, and with all the freedom that they could have had in any other stage of proceedings. It is freedom of discussion that they ask, but they are afraid that perhaps a new light will be thrown upon this resolution of theirs by the amendments which have been moved, not by me, but by my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), and they think that they will be placed in the position of disadvantage in conducting the discussion and having a vote upon these two parallel amendments. But they will have the same freedom of discussion, they will have the same chance to make their ideas felt, they will have the same opportunity to present the truth to the people, as well as to this House, as they would have had under any other circumstances. What does my hon. friend want? Does he want to snatch a verdict in any way, as by the moving of the previous question, so as to shut out amendments? He surely is not afraid of any amendment that may emanate from this side of the House. My hon. friend is showing the weakness of his position in two ways: first as to alleging there was a violation of a contract which never took place; and second by objecting to an amendment to his resolution which he thinks would put his resolution in a bad light.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I extremely regret that we should find the sharp practice of a pettifogging attorney introduced into the proceedings of this House. The hon. the Minister of Finance is literally correct in saying, that as we thought we were dealing with gentlemen, we did not deem it necessary to draw up a formal legal bond to compel him to observe what he knew perfectly well, and what every man in this House knew perfectly well, was the implied contract between us, which was, that for the convenience of the public service, and as a matter of courtesy from this side of the House to the other, we agreed to withdraw the amendment—which it was utterly out of his power, be it remembered, to amend at the time that I moved it—and we agreed to withdraw it on the understanding that we should be left in precisely the same position we were then in. Sir, I do not pretend to say that we thought at that time so poorly and so meanly of the hon. Minister and his associates as to suppose that they would condescend to so petty and so trifling a trick as this. Let them do it if they please. If, after what my hon. friend has stated, they choose to go on, I would not advise any of my hon. friends to waste any more time upon them. But, Sir, from this time out, as my hon. friend has stated, they may depend upon it, no warning will be given of any motions on going into Supply, or anything of that kind, and I will venture to tell them that they will find the result will be decidedly more unpleasant than it would be to adhere to the understanding which did most undoubtedly exist on this side of the House, and without which, most assuredly, I would not have consented, nor would any man on this side of the House have consented, to the withdrawal of my motion in amendment, when the discussion took place.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the House allow me to read exactly what did occur?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no. We know all about it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. When the House is told that a petty trick is being resorted to, that the members on this side of the House are acting as pettifogging attorneys, that they are not acting as gentlemen, and that hon. gentlemen on the other side are wasting their time in negotiating with them, one would have expected at least that in reply to the hon. Minister of Finance some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would have at least alleged that some understanding had taken place other than that which is shown on the records of the House; because if no other understanding can be alleged—and none has been alleged—these aspersions are doubly disgraceful to the men who have made them. What does the record show, Sir? It shows that on the 23rd June, 1891, and on page 1252 of Hansard, an understanding was arrived at with which the motion made to-day by my hon. friend from L'Islet is perfectly consistent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. Oh; yes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I shall not only make that assertion, but I shall prove it to the House and to the satisfaction of the gentlemen who are disposed to interrupt me at this moment; and I shall show that the complaint they make this evening in such disgraceful language is a complaint that we are following out very carefully and fully the ample discussion which they pledged us should be had. The complaint now is, not that we are limiting discussion, but that we are widening it; not that we are attempting to catch any particular vote of the House, but that we are attempting to prevent hon. gentlemen opposite taking a catch vote of the House. On page 1252 is set forth the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford; and in reading to the House what took place immediately afterwards I will ask the House to remember that it is not pretended now, after the challenge given to the Minister of Finance, that anything else was whispered across the floor except what appears here upon the record. Now, what appears upon the record is this: that when that resolution was read, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance said:

"I propose that we should follow the same course that we have done on other occasions, and go into Committee and pass them with what debate will be necessary, which I hope will not be very much at this time. Then we can concur in the resolutions in some future time.

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And then we can proceed with the debate afterwards?

"Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course it is well understood that the fullest possible discussion will go on in future stages in the Committee."

Hon. gentlemen opposite did not seek to reserve any right, any privilege, any technical advantage which they may have had in moving the resolution at that time. All they asked was to have it distinctly understood that the discussion should be as full at the subsequent stage as it could have been then. But the matter did not rest there. They were still more explicit as to what they wanted reserved—

"Mr. FOSTER. Your motion will have to be withdrawn for the moment to allow us to go into Committee.

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, this discussion cannot be possibly closed to-night, and, as my hon. friend suggests, it is of importance to the public service that these resolutions should be passed, so that under these circumstances I do not object to withdraw the motion for the present.

"Mr. FOSTER. Very well; the resolution can be withdrawn for the moment, and we can go into Committee."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Hon. gentlemen may not only cheer that, but they may cheer when the rest of the record is read, and when they find that it gives an absolute falsification to the insinuations of breach of faith which have been made—

"Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw the amendment?

"Amendment withdrawn.

"House resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

"(In the Committee.)

"On resolution 1,

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Probably as these resolutions are long, it had better be understood that their adoption now is purely pro formâ on our part, and is intended not in the slightest degree to imply our concurrence in them, but is merely for the purpose of giving the Government an opportunity of putting them in force at once and preventing any fraud on the revenue.

"Mr. FOSTER. That is the understanding."

And in order that there might be no possible mistake about it, the hon. member for South Brant got the House to understand distinctly that the agreement arrived at was precisely what the hon. Minister of Finance has stated to-night.

"Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And that there will be perfect liberty to discuss or to object to any item hereafter?

"Mr. FOSTER. Certainly."

If anything else transpired between the hon. Minister of Finance and the other side of the House, we will carry it out not only in the letter but in the spirit. But when it is not pretended that anything else took place and that we are committing a breach of faith, I say that the insinuation recoils upon the men who make it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, Sir, that even the scanty record of what took place that is given here, if carefully examined will be found to sustain what my hon. friend has contended for. I beg to say that the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford would never have been withdrawn upon any other understanding than this, that when the debate was to be resumed it should be exactly in the position in which it had been. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that. The hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches know the understanding just as well as hon. gentlemen on this side, and the hon. Minister of Finance knows that what is here recorded is not a full account of what transpired at the time. The hon. Minister has referred to the fact that the hon. leader of the Opposition objected to the withdrawal of the resolution. Is that recorded here? Is there any allusion to it? Is there a single word of it? He knows that the discussion went on informally for some time, and when he refers to this as a full record of what transpired he is referring to a record which he himself, by his allusion to that debate, shows is not a full record of what actually took place. Then, Sir, what did my hon. friend from South Oxford say when the hon. Minister of Finance asked him to withdraw the resolution? It was:

"We can proceed with the debate afterwards."

What debate? What was the subject of debate? Was it the resolution moved this evening by the hon. member for L'Islet? Not at all. The subject of debate was the resolutions of Ways and Means which the hon. Minister of Finance proposed to the House, and the amendment thereto proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford. These were the subjects for discussion, and nothing else; and it was well understood that when this amendment which had been withdrawn was moved again the original resolution and the amendment should be open for discussion, and that the parties on that side of the House and on this would stand exactly in the position in which they had stood before. Is that the position in which the hon. gentleman has placed us this evening? Is that what the hon. gentleman calls keeping faith with the Opposition? Sir, on one occasion there was a distinguished general who, when he accepted the surrender of the army of his opponent, was told that the arrangement made at the Caudine Forks could not be carried out. Well, said the hon. gentleman——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; he was an hon. gentleman. It may be that he was a pagan, but he was nevertheless an hon. gentleman; and when he was told that the arrangement could not be carried out he said: Place your army back in the position in which it stood before. And we say to the hon. gentleman, place us in the position in which we were when you asked us that that resolution be withdrawn, and then we will be prepared to consider any addition the Rules of Parliament will permit you to make to that resolution. That you have not done; and it is trifling with the understanding and with the judgment of this House when the hon. Minister of Justice gets up here and tells us that allowing us to move the resolution and then proposing any sort of amendment the hon. gentleman may choose to propose, and which, if he has a majority in the House, he will carry, and thus prevent us ever reaching the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford, is putting us in the position in which we stood before. We were in the position to take the opinion of the House and to submit it to the judgment of the country upon the subject of unrestricted reciprocity or a large measure of reciprocity with the people of the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Which?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do we stand in that position now? Why, the hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches have put into the hands of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) an amendment to our amendment which they hope to carry, and which will supersede our resolution; and I say that until we are given the opportunity of voting for our resolution, and until hon. gentlemen opposite are given the opportunity of taking the responsibility of voting against it, if they dare, they are not keeping faith with us and are paltering with their word. The hon. Minister of Finance will learn that that sort of trick is one which cannot be played a second time on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman may consider that a proper parliamentary proceeding——

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Speaker, to the word "trick" being used.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before you rule, Sir, I would like to say this, that the hon. gentleman has not charge of my vocabulary. The hon. gentleman thinks the expression is improper——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me the hon. gentleman used the word in quite an unparliamentary sense.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If you say, Sir, that the word is out of order, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Substitute "trickster."

Mr. SPEAKER. In the sense in which the hon. gentleman used the word, it is out of order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then I will withdraw it, and say that the hon. gentleman, in another moment of weakness, has failed to keep faith with us. The hon. gentleman may think that we are outside the pale on this side of the House, but, nevertheless, he will find that it is a matter of very great convenience to the Administration to keep faith with us. We have not violated our word or our promise in spirit, any more than in fact; and I tell the hon. Finance Minister that everybody in this House will understand that that moral cowardice which prevented him from voting according to his convictions on the subject of prohibition has prevented him and his colleagues now from keeping faith with us and from voting in accordance with what he dare not say are his convictions on the subject of reciprocity.

Mr. BOWELL. This is certainly a tempest in a teapot. The language of the leader and of the lieutenant of the Opposition seems to have taken root in the minds and actions of his followers, because the latter certainly do not betray that gentlemanly conduct which the hon. leader of the Opposition desires should characterize members on this side of the House. Their conduct, if not of pettifogging lawyers, certainly savours of the ordinary barroom. Now, it is clear to me, and it must be clear to every member of this House, who has any recollection of what took place between the leader of the Opposition, or rather the hon. member for South Oxford and the Finance Minister, that the only agreement made and the only deduction that can be drawn from the language then used is, that there should be the fullest possible discussion, with the Speaker in the Chair, of every item embraced in those resolutions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BOWELL. Hon. gentlemen may say "Oh, oh," but let them read the report, and then say what it means. The fact is simply this: either the hon. member for South Oxford has forgotten the Rules of the House, or he never knew them. No one was more astonished than I when I heard him rise and move an amendment to the motion of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, to concur in the resolution, because, every one who has paid any attention to the Rules of the House knows that on a motion of that kind any amendment can be made to the amendment proposed; and if the hon. gentleman had looked up the authorities—either May, or Todd, or Bourinot—he would have learned that an amendment on a motion to go into Supply or an amendment on a motion to go into a Committee of Ways and Means could not be amended by another amendment; but he ought to have known, as the veriest tyro in the House knows, that on an amendment to a motion to concur anyone could move an amendment to the amendment. The fact is, that having made a blunder with regard to the time of moving the amendment he now assumes an air of superiority over all the rest of the world. Really, anyone, looking at him when he uttered the language which he addressed to the House, when he said he was not treating with gentlemen, anyone who saw the angelic smile which characterized his face, as it always does when he gives utterance to the sentiments of the nature he then expressed, and which added glory to that imperial moustache so carefully and so well waxed in order to add effect to his bearing, would fail to recognize that superiority he claims. He is, I am sorry to say, not a very good specimen of the aristocracy of England to which he belongs, for he scarcely ever rises in this House without giving utterance to sentiments that are insulting to others who think proper to differ from him on any subject that may be under discussion. Had he on this occasion used different language, had he and his friends adopted a different tone, I do not know but that my hon. friend and colleague might have taken a different course, could he have been convinced that there had been any misunderstanding. I will say this, however, for the hon. member for South Oxford, that in my long experience in the House, particularly in discussing the Estimates—and I desire to do him every credit—in the Committees of the Whole, he has never been obstructive, when it was necessary to carry resolutions of this House, or in the passage of certain items after an explanation has been given. I have said that before, and I repeat it now; but I say that the language he used to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is unworthy of him as a man, more particularly from the position he occupies, not only in this House, but in the country at large. I repeat distinctly that no such understanding as that to which the leader of the Opposition refers was arrived at. I will not say that the hon. gentleman does not believe the truth of every word he utters; I would be very sorry even to insinuate such a thing; but I say that, when the arrangement was made that the motion should be withdrawn, it was to my mind with the distinct understanding that the hon. gentleman would take the first opportunity on going into Committee of Supply or Committee of Ways and Means to present that motion or any other motion he thought proper to present to the House. With his long parliamentary experience, the hon. gentleman should know the proper time at which to make a motion of that kind, and if he seized an improper time, upon his shoulders alone must rest the responsibility. I have read this discussion as it is recorded in the Hansard once or twice, and I repeat again what I stated when I commenced my remarks, that there is not a word in it that can lead to any other conclusion than that there was to be every possible freedom of discussion allowed, even with the Speaker in the Chair as well as in Committee. If you want any evidence of that fact you have only to read the question put by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), when he said it was to be distinctly understood that there should be no limitation of the discussion and that every item should be considered. Certainly that could not refer to the proposition containing a great principle which had been moved by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), so that the present objection is nothing but an attempt to create a feeling based upon false premises, because the Opposition have found themselves in a position where they are called upon to vote against a resolution containing principles which many of their followers would not like to vote against. Thus, being caught—I was going to say—being placed in that position, they now raise this question in order to mislead the people. Having been caught in their own trap they are now trying to wriggle out of it. I for one care very little for the threats of the leader of the Opposition or of his lieutenant. This side of the House has never, as far as I know, received any consideration from those hon. gentlemen in the past, neither do we expect it in the future. We expect to fight our battles fairly and squarely, not only in this House but before the people, and when the people record their votes against the principles advocated for twelve or thirteen years past by the late Government and proposed to be carried out by the present Government, and I hope by the future Government, whatever it may be, it will be time enough for us to succumb; but I assure the hon. gentlemen that it will not be under any threats which they may throw out. We are prepared to accept their threats, we are prepared to accept their courtesies, and to extend as much courtesy from this side of the House as they extend or as they are capable of extending from that side of the House. If they fancy that by making threats they will keep the House sitting till the fall, they will obstruct public business, upon them rests the responsibility. We are quite prepared to accept it in the future as we have in the past.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The speeches of the three hon. gentlemen who have attempted to defend the action of the Government in this matter have shown that they are painfully aware of the untenable ground on which they stand. The last hon. gentlemen who spoke (Mr. Bowell) rose evidently in a passion, and attempted to turn this debate into a personal scolding matter, and though he attempted to argue somewhat afterwards, he did not succeed very well. Let us see where we are in this matter, and I believe there are some fair-minded men on the other side of the House who are open to argument and willing to give fair play. When the hon. gentleman from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved his amendment, he did so in the exercise of the undoubted right which the Opposition possess to formulate their policy in a resolution which must be voted upon by the House. That is the inherent right of the Opposition on a motion to go into Committee of Supply or a Committee of Ways and Means. We exercised that right, and submitted the policy on which we appealed to the country and upon which we were desirous of testing the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. But we have been—I will not say tricked, because that has been ruled out of order—but we have been deluded, we have been dragged away from the attempt to obtain the views of hon. gentlemen opposite on the subject of unrestricted reciprocity, and we have been deprived of the right to challenge the opinion of the House upon the fiscal policy upon which we went to the country and upon which we now desire to challenge the opinions of hon. members of the House. The Minister of Justice attempted to defend this breach of faith on the ground that the letter of the contract justified it. I am quite prepared to argue it out on the letter of the contract, meagre as is the report in the Hansard. The first proposition is that, at the suggestion and for the convenience of the Finance Minister, this course was taken. The suggestion did not emanate from us. We did not require any change in procedure, but, as a matter of favour, the hon. gentleman asked and received that courtesy which the Opposition are always willing to give, with a view to the proper management of the public business, and without which, notwithstanding the high-sounding terms which the Minister of Finance has ventured to use to-night, I assert that the business of the country cannot be satisfactorily carried on. What does the Finance Minister say? He said that he proposed that we should follow the same course we had followed on similar occasions before. I appeal to the hon. gentleman and ask him to carry his memory back one or two years, to the time when Sir Charles Tupper first introduced this new plan, and I ask him whether, on either of the two occcasions I refer to, an amendment to the amendment was moved. The hon. member knows that, taking the letter of his contract, he has violated it. I am not now arguing whether the spirit of the contract has been broken or not. That has been argued so well by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mills), that it is not necessary for me to enter into it; but the whining appeal of the hon. gentleman was to the effect that he was prepared to rely on the letter of the contract, though the spirit of the contract might have been violated. Has the hon. gentleman kept his pledge, that if the amendment was withdrawn the same conditions should be followed as were followed on previous occasions? We find that Mr. Foster said:

"Very well; the resolution can be withdrawn for the moment, and we can go into Committee."

And now the Minister of Customs says that the Minister of Finance did not mean the withdrawal of the motion for a moment, but the withdrawal for some future day when the House was asked again to go into Committee. Was there ever such an absurd construction, or forced construction, attempted to be put upon an act? Further than that, my hon. friend from South Oxford, who moved the resolution, followed up the matter immediately and said:

"Probably, as these resolutions are long, it had better be understood that their adoption now is purely pro formâ on our part, and is intended not in the slightest degree to imply our concurrence in them, but is merely for the purpose of giving the Government an opportunity of putting them in force at once, and preventing any fraud on the revenue."

Sir, there was no other object in view, there was no object in the mind of the Minister of Finance at that time, or in the mind of any member of the House, of taking away from the Opposition the rights or the privileges which they possessed of forcing a vote upon the policy they formulated in the amendment. There was only one object—to allow the resolutions then to be passed pro formâ, and the debate was to be resumed, each side reserving to itself the rights it had before, one of those rights being our right to challenge a decision upon the amendment as we tendered it. The moment we yielded and the hon. gentleman attained what he asked for, then the House was to be relegated, and the different parties in the House were to be relegated, to the exact position and to the relative rights that they held before. Sir, look where the hon. gentleman is placed. The hon. gentleman knows well that on the second reading of a resolution reported from Committee of Ways and Means, such a resolution as was then before the House cannot be put at all. The hon. gentleman knows that on the second reading of a resolution from Committee on Ways and Means no amendment can be proposed except one which is relevant to the main motion; therefore, this motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford cannot be put from the Chair except in pursuance and in consequence of the solemn compact come to across the House, and that being the case, this amendment only being put from the Chair pursuant to the contract agreed to by both parties, the hon. gentleman now comes in and says: We will carry out the compact so far as to enable you to put the resolution, and we will break the compact and propose an amendment to it. Sir, if the hon. gentleman turns to Bourinot, page 491, he will find the law laid down clearly that:

"In putting the question for concurrence on each resolution, both the amendment and the debate must be relevant to the same, in accordance with English practice, and nothing can be introduced which is irrelevant by way of amendment or by way of discussion."

What have we been doing for the past week? Have we been discussing a matter relevant to the resolution, the second reading of which is proposed? Not at all. We have been travelling all over the record, all over the history of Canada, discussing—what? Discussing the amendment which my hon. friend from South Oxford moved in pursuance of the solemn compact come to across the House. And, Sir, that being true, and the House occupying this position, we find these gentlemen—these gentlemen across the House—who say they are prepared to keep their word, keeping it to the extent of allowing an irrelevant debate to go on and an irrelevant amendment to be moved, and saying: We will stop you from taking the opinion of the House upon your amendment. Sir, we cannot characterize this conduct in the House as disgraceful, but if it was outside the House, or in a nisi prius court, hon. gentlemen would be told by the judge pretty much as they were told by my hon. friend from South Oxford, that it was a contemptible trick.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that there are gentlemen on both sides of this House who will be most anxious and desirous to act in good faith, as they understand it, in the matters before the House. Now, I would like to ask any hon. gentleman here, who in this House could understand what were the intentions and the wishes and the consent of the hon. member for South Oxford when he withdrew that resolution? There is no person in this House but the member for South Oxford himself who can stand up and tell the House as a gentleman, as an hon. member of this House, what was his understanding when he withdrew that resolution. The hon. member for South Oxford has declared to this House what was his understanding when, at the request of the Minister of Finance, he withdrew the resolution. Sir, I consider that all the members of this House should in that matter accept the statement of the hon. member who withdrew that resolution. It was absolutely and entirely in his own hands whether he went on with that resolution or whether he withdrew it, and therefore his statement should be accepted. Then, let us look at it in another light. Supposing that the Minister of Finance had given warning to the member for South Oxford when he asked him to withdraw that amendment, intimating to him that he proposed to put up some member following to move an amendment to his amendment—does anybody in this House believe for a moment that the member for South Oxford would have given his consent as he did on that occasion? Now, Sir, we have two tests which hon. gentlemen, either on the Treasury benches or off the Treasury benches, must regard as tests of the proper way to consider this question. Sir, I should be very sorry indeed if the good sense of some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House does not cause them to protest against the proceedings that it is proposed to be taken to-day, yet sanctioned by the Minister of Finance, and, I am sorry to say, by the Minister of Justice also. It was agreed, as we find by the Hansard, that the debate was to proceed afterwards. What debate? Could the hon. member for South Oxford have meant a debate on some other resolution which he never heard of, and which was only proposed to the House to-day? Could he, on the 23rd of June, talk of proceeding with a debate on the resolution of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) which he never heard of, which was not drawn and which nobody knew anything about then? No, Sir, he meant that we should be called upon to proceed with the debate, of course, which he had begun upon the resolution, which had to be voted upon by this House, under the orders of this House. Now, Sir, under the circumstances, I do sincerely hope that the good sense of the House will not allow this matter to go any further.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. member who has just addressed the House has taken the wind completely out of the sails of all his friends who have spoken. He opened his remarks by saying that nobody but the member for South Oxford could know what was in his own mind at the time he gave his consent.

Mr. EDGAR. At the time he withdrew his motion.

Mr. CURRAN. Therefore all this indignation, all this abuse, all this insinuation that no gentlemen were to be found anywhere in this House except on the other side of it, is entirely unjustifiable, and certainly is the very worst possible means that could be adopted of inducing the withdrawal of this or any other motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRAN. Well, I am satisfied that these gentlemen who are now interrupting me are not giving any very great evidence of their gentlemanly conduct.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRAN. Hon. gentlemen opposite are gentlemen in their own estimation, but they are not acting like gentlemen when they apparently object to my saying a few words, although we have listened to members of the Government being called pettifoggers and declared unfit to enter into any compact, and while declarations have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite that for the future no compact will be entered into with us. No one could misunderstand what was understood here the other night; no one could misunderstand what was agreed to on a former occasion. It was said then, as was said on a former occasion when an agreement had been arrived at by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright):

"Of course that has been the practice, and no objection will be taken to it on this side. The hon. gentleman knows, however, that we do not in the least waive our right to the fullest possible discussion in the most conversational manner, of the various items, when the discussion takes place in Committee."

So this arrangement has been arrived at, a distinct, positive and emphatic arrangement, that there should be a most full and ample discussion, that the fullest opportunity should be given to discuss the resolution, and for that matter no objection was to be thrown in the way of the most ample discussion of the whole history of Canada, if necessary. What has taken place here? Has there been any interruption to the discussion? Has not every man who desired to address the House had the most ample opportunity of taking part in the discussion; and certainly when this evening an amendment to the amendment was proposed, and the leader of the Opposition rose and accused the Government and their followers of a breach of faith, when members of the Government were subsequently told by the member for South Oxford that they were pettifoggers, and when he hurled at them every epithet he could call to mind, I think it is high time for this House to show, if they are men, their determination to stand by the Government. We are not to be bullied. We are not afraid to meet hon. gentlemen opposite, either here, or out of the House, on the platforms of the country. We have met them before and we will meet them again, and I trust the Government will stand by the decision at which they arrived to-night.

Mr. MULOCK. I am sure we are all disposed on certain occasions to stand by our respective parties, but there are occasions when we are bound to stand by the honour of the Crown it may be, and I hope on this occasion we will be able to arrive at a sound conclusion, even if it may involve some members supporting a party which they do not generally support. Looking at the situation when the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford was moved, what was it? If we look at the Hansard report on that occasion we find on page 1252-3 the gist of the bargain arrived at. The Government motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means had just been moved, and the hon. member for South Oxford moved an amendment at that stage, to which no possible amendment could have been proposed. The Minister of Finance, in his desire to promote public business, asked that that motion might be withdrawn. Withdrawn substantially? No. What was the reason for the withdrawal that took place, for it all turns on that? Was the withdrawal merely a formal withdrawal? If it was a merely formal withdrawal, then, when the amendment was restored, it was entitled to the same position, and the parties entitled to the same right, and no greater, than if the motion had never been withdrawn. The report in Hansard is as follows:—

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course it is well understood that the fullest possible discussion will go on in future stages in the Committee.

"Mr. FOSTER. Your motion will have to be withdrawn for the moment to allow us to go into Committee.

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course this discussion cannot be possibly closed to-night, and, as my hon. friend suggests, it is of importance to the public service that these resolutions should be passed, so that under these circumstances I do not object to withdraw the motion for the present.

"Mr. FOSTER. Very well; the resolution can be withdrawn for the moment and we can go into Committee.

"Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw the amendment?

"Amendment withdrawn.

I appeal to the Minister of Finance and to every member on each side of the House whether in view of that temporary arrangement, that formal withdrawal in the interests of the public, for that must at all times prevail and should at all times govern our conduct, even in the course of our party warfare—I appeal to hon. members whether the true spirit of that compact was not this, that there was to be no change in the rights of parties. That commends itself to my mind as the only conclusion to draw from what took place. If there was to have been another arrangement it would have been the subject of discussion; but as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said, the precedents which are to govern us are all in one way. Under these circumstances—I did not happen to hear the animated discussion that took place at the commencement of this debate—as the Minister of Finance will not give me his ear at this moment, I appeal to other hon. members, and I ask whether in view of the statements made by this side it may not be that the withdrawal of the amendment was but a formal withdrawal for the promotion of the public business, and not a real withdrawal, and whether it is not the duty of the Minister of Finance, as temporary custodian of the honour of the Government and the Crown on this occasion and in this matter, whatever his own views may be, to err on the right side and accept the statements made by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford as to the course that was adopted, for the hon. gentleman is bound to take them at their word, and restore them to the position which they occupied before the amendment was withdrawn. No other course will redeem the honour of the Government. Let them do what they are bound to do now, and it will not be a sacrifice. Hon. gentlemen will simply be doing their duty, and it is never too late to do their duty. If a mistake has been made, it should be remedied as early as possible. The proper despatch of public business and the interests of the country demand that there should be such relations between both sides of the House that hon. members can trust each other, that there should be some confidence between parties, even if opponents. I, therefore, hold it would be discreditable to this House as a tribunal, it would be discreditable, I say it in no offensive terms, and it would reflect on the Administration if they allow strained relations like the present to exist for a moment between the two parties, and I appeal to the Government, and I cast the responsibility on them if they are deaf to the appeal, to take the right course even at this late hour, and withdraw the amendment, and let the proceedings go on as they did before the amendment to the amendment was moved.

Mr. TISDALE. As a member of Parliament unskilled to a great extent in the Rules of the House, I must say I feel that this whole occurrence, and especially the spirit in which it has been conducted, is very regrettable. There will be disagreements on different questions between the two parties, particulary between two parties which are so strong as we are in this country. But surely when serious disagreements arise members who take part in the discussion should be listened to, and, being somewhat warm in temperament myself, I think every allowance should be made for hon. members on both sides who, in the early part of it, certainly discussed the subject in somewhat warm terms. It is regrettable that a misunderstanding should arise, and as I understand it, and I wish to get to understand it, when this motion was first made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) no amendment could then have been moved. On the other hand, I did not understand it entirely as a matter of favour that he withdrew it at the time to allow public business to proceed, because while he need not do it, he would have taken the responsibility from the Government and put it on the Opposition if these resolutions should not have come into force ; and therefore such action would have seriously affected the business of the country. He had the undoubted right if he saw fit to take that responsibility. The first proposition which comes to my mind is, as to whether there is any breach of faith, because I am one of those who think that if there has been any unintentional breach of faith it should not be taken advantage of. The question here seems to me, if I am correctly informed, as open to two or three interpretations. Now, having that position, is it not fair to consider that when the hon. gentleman was asked under these circumstances to withdraw his amendment—he being a gentleman of great experience, and understanding fully from his great experience in these matters the position he would be placed in—he would have protected himself by such safeguards as he thought necessary. Certainly, as it strikes my mind from the discussion, the desire, and the very proper desire, and the only desire that was prevalent then, was for the fullest discussion, and that was all that was asked to be reserved. Surely, from what is in the Hansard there can be no dispute that that was the reservation that was spoken of, whether anything more was implied or not. What was the next step? And here comes the position which I think is fairly and properly discussable without charging any of these extreme things that I regret have been charged across the House to-night. The hon. member for South Oxford took the next step, and as I understand it he moved his resolution at a time when he need not have moved it, and at a time which put him in the position that according to parliamentary practice, as I am informed, this amendment could have been moved. The hon. gentleman need not have moved his amendment then ; he might have moved it on going into Supply, and then he could maintain his position. Now, as the reservation was entirely one for the fullest discussion, the hon. gentleman taking the responsibility of making his motion when he was not called upon, and he might have made it when there would have been no chance of his being in any different position, is it not arguable, even from the standpoint of the other side, and is it not allowable from our side, to think that we considered it a challenge for that fullest discussion which has followed, and which has been enlarged undoubtedly. It seems to me that is a full statement of the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No ; no.

Mr. TISDALE. Allow me ; I do not often address the House, and I must say this, and I wish to say it to both sides of the House : there can be nothing more deplorable—and I say it individually and I wish other members would act on their individuality—there can be nothing more deplorable than this system of objecting by hon. gentlemen on either side of the House. I may say here to-night, and I hope it will not be considered that I am lecturing the House, for I do not wish to, but what has occurred in the chamber of this House to-night is such that we ought to consider on both sides whether we cannot get a better state of things, and conduct the fights which we must have in a party sense, more in the lines of argument and discussion, than to exhibit so much feeling about it. Do let us get down to business and get through. The hon. gentleman who interrupted me somewhat put me out, but I do not believe he intended it. I say then, that in this way the remarks of the hon. gentleman looked like a challenge for discussion. Now, there is the dilemma. Ought we on our side of the House to be fairly blamed for an advantage, if you call it such? Is it not a legitimate and proper one, when in the inception of the arrangement the only reservation was for the broadest and fullest discussion? It is true, as it seems to me, that by the motion of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) the discussion has been enlarged. Now, a gentleman of the well known knowledge of parliamentary practice of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—and on both sides of the House it is conceded there is none better skilled, so far as I heard, in this Parliament or in few other Parliaments—when that hon. gentleman deliberately takes his choice of the time of moving his motion, ought he be so harsh in considering it a breach of faith. But is it a breach of faith? Could it, and ought it not be fairly treated, as if he of his own choice took the position to challenge the discussion, and to leave it open fairly for us to accept the challenge. It seems to me that is the difficulty of the position. If he had not done so, if he had not voluntarily and of his own will done so, then, undoubtedly, I should say that we should not have taken any advantage, if it is an advantage. Now, is it an advantage after all? Are the Opposition prepared to say that they will not allow us to move any amendment we please that will broaden the discussion? This, it seems to me, is a fair statement of the difficulties. How are we to solve them? Let me say once more, and lastly, for I do not wish to detain the House, that it was very unfortunate indeed that the hon. gentlemen upon that side of the House should have used these threats which they did. It made a bad impresssion upon my temper and upon my feelings as a man. I want to say that I do not like to hear such threats. The Government side of the House control it, and they have the majority and they must take the responsibility. It is commendable that we should be patient, but it is beyond human nature to be patient if all the time threats of this kind are to be made. I will mention a notable instance of this. The other day the majority declined to adjourn over Dominion Day, and I see in a large portion of the Liberal press, especially in my part of the Province of Ontario, where we are accused of being ultra-loyal, that we are held responsible for it, although it was a majority of the other side of the House which voted that we should sit on Dominion Day. Now, here in the same way, when this unfortunate occurrence arose, some one immediately got angry about it, and they dared us on this side of the House, and we are forced into such a position by the temper of the discussion in the House that we cannot very well back down, even if we felt like it. We have to appeal to the Rules of the House now, and I see that according to the Rules of the House the fault is on the part of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Some hon. MEMBERS. No ; no.

Mr. TISDALE. It so appears to our side of the House, because he took the wrong time to move his motion. Is it driving the argument too far to say that, when the hon. gentleman had his own choice, and of his own volition took the position which caused this discussion to arise? He moved his amendment in the manner in which he did, of his own choice, and if he choose to make his motion at that time, the Rules of the House say that this amendment is in order.

Mr. CASEY. I think the hon. Minister o Finance might properly say: "Save me from some of my apologists." The hon. gentleman who has just sat down began with the apparent intention of pouring oil upon the troubled waters; he had no doubt an honest intention to do so, but he has said more unkind things about his own friends than were said even on this side of the House. He has put them in a very much worse position than they were in before. Even my excitable friend, the worthy Boanerges from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), with his loud challenges inside and outside of the House and his violent muscular exercise, though he might have appeared a more disturbing element in the debate than my smooth-voiced friend from Norfolk, did not contribute so much to the unpleasantness of the debate as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He says that my hon. friend from South Oxford, though an old parliamentarian, withdrew his motion at a time when he was assured by the hon. Minister of Finance that to go on with it would be injurious to the public interest. My hon. friend from South Norfolk says that as old a parliamentarian as my hon. friend from South Oxford ought to have known better than that; he ought to have known better than to withdraw his motion without getting something positively binding upon the hon. Minister of Finance from which he could not subsequently back out. That is a very rough thing for him to say about his own leader, the hon. Minister of Finance—a very unkind thing. I hope his having said it will not cause any breach of the pleasant relations which I suppose have heretofore existed between the two hon. gentlemen. But I am sure nothing so unkind has been said on this side of the House as that an old parliamentarian like my hon. friend from South Oxford should have known the hon. Minister of Finance better than to make any such loose arrangement with him. I think he will know better than to make any such loose arrangement with him. in future. But the hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend from South Oxford had his choice of making his motion now or on some other occasion when it could not be amended, and he asks why he choose this occasion. According to the Rules of the House, he says, my hon. friend from South Oxford is to blame for the unpleasantness which has arisen, because he chose a time to put his motion when that motion could be amended. Why did he choose that time, Mr. Speaker? Because he had the word, the positive undertaking of the hon. Minister of Finance, that if he chose to postpone that motion to this time he should be put back just in the same position he would have been in if he had gone on with it at the time it was first proposed. It is absurd to say, as my hon. friend from Montreal Centre did, as the hon. member for South Norfolk did, and as the hon. Minister of Finance himself did, that the only question was one of free discussion. Why, Sir, without any promise on their part at all we could have had as free discussion as is necessary on this motion, whether it were moved now or on going into Committee on Ways and Means. The essence of the thing promised was, that my hon. friend from South Oxford should be in the same position in every respect as he would be in if the House were going into Committee on Ways and Means, and that his amendment should not be amended, even if it were put at a stage of the proceedings when, according to the Rules of the House, an amendment was possible. My hon. friend from South Oxford is undoubtedly an old parliamentarian, and he is such an old parliamentarian that the hon. Minister of Finance cannot for one moment believe, whatever he may profess to believe, that my hon. friend would have withdrawn his motion on that occasion if he had suspected that it would be amended upon his moving it at a subsequent stage. That was one of the vital conditions on which the motion was withdrawn. That vital condition has been violated. My. hon. friend from South Norfolk states that it was not known to that side of the House that my hon. friend from South Oxford would move his amendment at this stage—that he had his choice to move it now or some other time, and had to take his chances. But, Sir, the elaborate motion in amendment to the amendment which has been laid before the House bears signs of deliberate and long preparation, of boiling down, of careful construction to frame the most plausible motion that could possibly be put from that side of the House. It was known that the amendment of my hon. friend from South Oxford was going to be moved, and it was known that my hon. friend did not expect any amendment to his motion. But the mine was laid, and in due course it has been sprung; and it was evidently intended for some time to be sprung, because the motion bears evident traces of having been prepared for the hon. gentleman who moved it. Now, the hon. member for South Norfolk asks if it is an advantage to us not to have an amendment to the amendment? He cannot doubt it being an advantage. Of course it is an advantage to the Opposition to be able to take a vote upon an issue put in their own words. That is the reason why the privilege of moving an amendment, which cannot be amended, on going into Ways and Means or Supply, has been given. That is the advantage which was intended to be given to the Opposition, but which, by a subterfuge, has been taken from them. The hon. gentleman says this amendment to the amendment may be an advantage. If so, is it a legitimate advantage? Of course it would be a legitimate advantage if my hon. friend had now moved his amendment for the first time. But, after that amendment has been withdrawn—or rather, virtually postponed, for it was never withdrawn, except as a matter of form—on a distinct understanding between the two sides of the House, I say it is not a legitimate advantage. It is an advantage obtained by means which cannot be characterised in parliamentary language. I do not like to use unnecessarily strong language in Parliament; but, unfortunately, some things are done in Parliament which cannot be characterised in parliamentary language, and I think this is one of them. But perhaps we may be unduly blaming the hon. Minister of Finance in this respect after all. There is a disease which affects the memory—I forget its medical name, but it is called loss, or slipperiness, or laxity, or feebleness of the memory—and I am afraid, from our long experience of the hon. Finance Minister in this House, that he must be afflicted with that disease, for this is not by any means the first time that we have found his recollection of what has passed within a few days previous different from that of some other members—different even from the records in Hansard. I have had occasion, more than once, to correct this defect of his memory from the pages of Hansard, and it may be that it is a constitutional disease which affects the hon. Minister, and that we should not blame him for that which he cannot help. It may be that his memory has its moments of weakness, as well as his volition. It may have hours of weakness, for all we can tell, and we may not be right in blaming the poor man for a constitutional defect which it is beyond his power to cure. There is a gentleman under examination before a certain tribunal in this city at the present time who seems to be afflicted with the same disease. It is not quite parliamentary, I suppose, to refer to proceedings in Committee before they are reported to this House, although the proceedings in that Committee are fully reported in the press, and for that reason I will not further carry out the comparison between the memory of the hon. Minister of Finance and that of Nick Connolly, which I would like otherwise to institute. I hope, however, that by a judicious course of treatment the hon. Minister of Finance may be enabled to recall his memory, and those sentiments in matters of agreement and honour between gentlemen which generally accompany a good memory. My hon. friend from Centre Montreal has tried to raise the ire of members who do not form part of the Cabinet by endeavouring to make them believe that we said there were no gentlemen on that side of the House. That was never said, by word or implication. We have attaked the conduct of the Government and its mouthpiece, on this occasion the Minister of Finance, but we have made no attack on hon. members on that side who do not belong to the Cabinet, for the simple reason that we do not believe they were privy to this thing. We believe that this was done solely by the Minister of Finance and his associates, who did not take the members on the back benches into their confidence. Probably if they had done so they would not have taken the course they have.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not think that the hon. gentleman who spoke last mended matters very much, and I think that in the beginning of his remarks he entirely misrepresented what was said by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). However, that is a matter of comparativly little importance. I was not present at the beginning of the discussion, and did not hear the angry language which, I am told, was used on both sides, and therefere, perhaps, I am in a better position to offer an opinion as to what should be done than if I had had my feelings aroused by a discussion, which I think I am justified in saying those who took part in it will, to a great extent, or at least to some extent, on cooler consideration, regret. I was not present either when the discussion took place upon the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, out of which all this trouble has arisen. Now, I must say, for my part, I should be very sorry if, by the course now taken, the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford is not to be voted upon, because I, for one, am very anxious to record my vote against it. It is just the one motion against which I desire to record my opinion. But apart from that, viewing the matter calmly and coolly as I can, not having had my feelings aroused by any angry words used in the course of the discussion, I do think, if there is a practicable way by which the hon. member for South Oxford can be replaced as nearly as possible in the same position as that in which he stood when he agreed to withdraw his resolution, that course should be adopted. I think that that can be done by a withdrawal of both resolutions, so that on a future occasion the hon. member for South Oxford will not be precluded putting the motion, against which I am anxious to have an opportunity of recording my vote. This discussion is one we must regret. It is one which certainly will not give the young members of this House any very exalted idea of the dignity of our proceedings. I do not remember in my experience of ever having heard a discussion, so far as I did hear it, in which so violent accusations, couched in so virulent language, were hurled across the House. Hitherto we have carried on our debates, I must say, in a manner creditable to us as a deliberative body, and in a manner which I have always regarded with great satisfaction. I am as firmly convinced as ever in my opinion with regard to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite on this trade question, but that does not prevent me saying on this occasion this much, that it is but fair to the hon. member for South Oxford that, under a fair carrying out of the arrangement arrived at, he should not be precluded from putting his motion to the House in the way he proposed.

Mr. STAIRS. I agree to a very considerable extent with what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, but I wish to point out to the House that, even if there were anything in the contention urged by hon. gentlemen opposite this evening, which I do not admit, they have put it altogether out of the power of the Government to make any concession whatever.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They have a string around your neck.

Mr. STAIRS. I am entited to my opinion, and I hold that hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted such a tone in bringing this matter to the attention of the House that it is utterly impossible for hon. members on this side, even if there were anything in the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, to allow themselves to be bullied by those hon. gentlemen. As it does not seem likely that to continue the discussion of this question will result in any good, I propose to continue the debate on the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford and the sub-amendment thereto.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There has been a point of order taken, and the hon. gentleman cannot proceed until that point is decided.

Mr. BOWELL. What is the point of order?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). It is that the amendment proposed is proposed in breach of the agreement which had been come to across the House.

Mr. STAIRS. As I understand, there was no formal point of order raised on this question by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BOWELL. Nor informal either.

Mr. STAIRS. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, say I am not out of order, I propose to go on with my remarks.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not understand that there was any point of order raised. The only question raised was that raised by the leader of the Opposition as to the understanding arrived at; and there being no point of order raised, the debate can go on.

Mr. STAIRS. I was saying when I was interrupted, that I proposed to continue the discussion and refer to one or two important subjects that have already been referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite in this debate. Some remarks were made by the hon. member for South Oxford respecting the Intercolonial Railway which require consideration, and I will also refer to a question which will, I hope, have a good effect on the debate, as it deals with that sweet subject, sugar. I also propose to make some remarks on the subject of unrestricted reciprocity. With the permission of the House, I will deal first with the question of sugar. I have to refer to some of the assertions which have been made, not only by hon. gentlemen opposite during the course of the debate, but also respecting the encouragement of the sugar refining industry in this country since 1879. It has been asserted by many speakers on the Opposition side that the refiners of the Dominion have made very large sums of money in consequence of the policy introduced by hon. gentlemen on this side in 1879, and I desire to point out that the way in which this question has been treated by hon. gentlemen opposite and their newspapers is very much exaggerated and is devoid of truth. A paper published in the city of Halifax and supporting hon. gentlemen opposite states that the shareholders in a certain sugar refinery there, which commenced with a share capital of $350,000, paid only one dividend, and that the whole of that capital was lost, and as, since that work was reorganized and put on a sound basis, it has not been remarkably profitable, it proves refining has not been the bonanza hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to make out. The late tariff was introduced in 1886, when the polariscopic test was adopted, in order that the duty on sugar might be arranged in the most satisfactory way, not only to the country generally but to the importers who were engaged in bringing sugar into this country, and as far as I have heard there has not been any complaint as to the working of this tariff since it was introduced and was put in operation by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. I was very much interested in the introduction of the polariscopic test, as it affected the grading of the sugar duties. There was considerable difficulty before on the ad valorem basis, which it was plain was injurious to the importers in Halifax and the Maritime Provinces generally, and had a tendency to injure the West Indian trade. That difficulty has passed away, and the business has been worked satisfactorily to all concerned since the polariscopic test was introduced. It is not correct to state that the duty on raw sugar under the late tariff was of advantage to the refiners. It was not of the slightest benefit to the sugar refining industry, and I am very much pleased that the duty has been taken off this session. A charge has been made by some of the newspapers supporting some of the hon. gentlemen opposite that the Conservatives have changed their base and the policy they adopted in 1879 by taking off the duty on sugar, which is a raw material. It is not so; the change is entirely in accord with the policy which was adopted in 1879. It has been said that the Conservatives are weakening on their protective policy. This I deny, and I say that taking off the duty on raw sugar no more shows a tendency to let-up on that policy than taking off the duty on tea and coffee, or any other article which is not produced in this country, and on which the duty was levied for revenue purposes altogether. I shall have to refer to some statements made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and afterwards to some of the statements made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and I think, when doing so, I shall reply to almost everything said by hon. gentlemen on the other side about sugar. I am certain that I shall be able to put the case of the Government and of the Liberal Conservative party in such a position that hon. gentlemen opposite will not dare to attack the figures I will put before the House or the conclusions I draw from them. Before going into my argument, it is right to explain that, when I use the words "the late tariff" I apply that to the polariscopic tariff which was in force from 1886 to the 23rd June last, and when I speak of "the new tariff" I mean the resolutions introduced by the Minister of Finance on the 23rd June. As I have already hinted, the Liberal Conservative party have to complain of the unfair and unjust criticisms which have been made upon the late tariff since it has been in operation. Two questions have been invariably mixed up. The public have been led to believe that the increased price of sugar under the late tariff, which was due to the tax which was placed upon sugar for revenue purposes only, was due to the protective policy of the Government. That is not the case. Anyone who is at all conversant with the sugar interest knows that the cost of granulated sugar was advanced under the late tariff, by the revenue collected from the raw sugar, about 2 cents a pound. Was that of any benefit to the refiners, or were they to blame for it? Suppose a duty were to be placed for revenue purposes on raw cotton, if the finances of the country were in such a condition as to require it, of 3 cents a pound, and possibly the duty on manufactured cotton increased in proportion, would the manufacturers of cotton be blamable for the increased price? It would be just as fair, in that case, for the Opposition newspapers to charge the manufacturers of cotton with being responsible for the increased price, because a revenue tax had been put on the raw material, as for them to charge, as they have done, the sugar refiners for the increase in the price of sugar in the past. When the duty was taken off raw sugar it would have been imagined that the Opposition speakers would not have attempted these tricks again. Perhaps I must withdraw that expression, and I will say that they would not have attempted this criticism again. I was astonished, however, to find that the hon. member for South Oxford, in his speech a few nights ago, made a most astounding statement, and, that there may be no doubt about it, I will read it to the House. Perhaps I should explain first that the Minister of Finance claimed that the reduction in the duties on raw sugar would amount to $3,500,000—in other words, this sum which had been previously taken from the consumers of sugar in Canada was, under the resolution which he proposed, to be left in the pockets of those consumers. Now, with reference to that, the member for South Oxford said:

I am sorry the member for South Oxford is not present, because he made in this instance such an astounding statement that I really do not know whether to believe that he was mistaken or not. I cannot understand that a gentleman of his knowledge of finance and of political economy, could have had the assurance to make such a statement to an intelligent body like the House of Commons of Canada. The hon. gentleman admits that the people of Canada are going to save $3,500,000 in the duty on raw sugar. I am not considering the duties which are being substituted, to a certain extent, to make this up. I am considering at the present time the question of the saving of the duty on sugar. He admits that the people of Canada are going to save $3,500,000, owing to the duties having been taken off raw sugar, and I want every hon. gentleman present to notice that of that $3,500,000 he says that the Government propose to present $2,000,000 to their friends, Drummond & Co. Sir, I repeat such a statement is not worthy of that hon. gentleman. His intimate knowledge of political economy and of finance obliges me to feel that he could not have been mistaken, and as every statement of his will naturally be accepted by his party organs and supporters without hesitation, it should make him especially careful not to make such statements to the House and to the country, and it is my duty this evening to contradict him most emphatically. Now, I want the House to understand that I am not referring now, as the member for South Oxford was not referring when he made that statement, to the increased price owing to the $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per pound of protection which the Minister of Finance proposed to make in his resolution, but to the $2,000,000 out of $3,500,000 which he distinctly stated were to be presented to Drummond & Co. I think I would be justified, and this House would be justified, in taking an expression of opinion upon such an important question from that hon. gentleman, as being the opinion of his party. He speaks as the authorised exponent of his party on an important question and in a debate like this on the Budget, and I shall consider it so, unless any of his supporters in the course of this debate disclaims it as being the statement and the opinion of his party. I point out now that protection existed under the old tariff; as great a protection, in fact a greater, existed under the old tariff than exists under the new tariff, as I will show more clearly later on. But not to complicate the argument upon the direct point that I am now trying to explain to the House, I want the statement of the member for South Oxford about the $2,000,000 to be so clear that there can be no question on the subject, and I want it to be shown in its proper light before the country. I am not going to complicate this particular argument with the argument as to whether the relative protection that exists under the new tariff is greater than under the late tariff, or whether the protection that does exist under the present tariff increases the cost of sugar to the consumer, as I propose dealing with these two points later on. Let us see now just how the question stands in relation to this $2,000,000 out of the $3,500,000. Now, then, under the late tariff it cannot be disputed that the $3,500,000 which was paid into the public treasury by the consumers of sugar will not be paid into it under the tariff proposed a few nights ago; in other words, that $3,500,000 remains in the pockets of the consumers of sugar in Canada. Under the late tariff neither the consumers of sugar nor the refiners had that $3,500,000, but the public treasury had it; under the new tariff neither the refiners nor the public treasury have it, but the consumers have it, and no power on earth under the new tariff can take one cent of it from them. The consumers have it and they will keep it. To illustrate the absurdity of the hon. gentleman's contention in another way: I may say, it is in effect now said, that a certain $2,000,000 out of the $3,500,000, which it is admitted the refiners could not take when collected for the public treasury under a heavy revenue tax on sugar, is going to be grabbed by them, when the entire tax under which it was collected has been removed and every cent of it remains in the pockets of the consumers. If we are to understand the hon. member for South Oxford according to what his language clearly implies, he means that somehow or other that $2,000,000 is going to be stolen out of the pockets of the consumers of sugar in Canada by Drummond & Co. I would like to ask how that can be. No matter what opinion hon. members opposite may entertain of the refiners of Canada, I am confident they will not claim they are either robbers or pickpockets. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he knows—not to mention the Hon. Mr. Drummond, who is a wicked Tory—that among his political friends in Halifax is the Hon. Robert Boak, President of the Legislative Council in Nova Scotia, a life-long Liberal, both in Dominion and local politics, who is president of the Nova Scotia refinery, and does he consider that this gentleman is going about in the future to pick the pockets of the consumers of sugar in Canada? Such a statement is so absurd that it hardly needs refutation. And just at this point it is not amiss to ask the hon. gentleman—I only wish he were here—whether he will say that the hon. gentleman whom I have referred to is a very heavy contributor to the election fund of the Conservative party. Surely, the hon member did not mean this; and if he did not mean that the money was positively to be taken out of the pockets of the people, and as there is no other way these desperate refiners could get hold of this $2,000,000, the hon. member must admit now that he was mistaken in the way he made his charge, and in the way in which the country understood it, and if he does not so admit it he stands convicted of intentionally misleading the House and the public. The statement of the hon. gentleman is so absurd that it hardly needed refutation, but it runs parallel with so many other statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends on the platform that I thought it better to make a distinct contradiction of it, so that there could be no question about it in the future; and I declare now that not one cent of this duty which has been remitted by the resolution of the Minister of Finance on the 23rd of June can be taken from the consumers of sugar in Canada. Now, Sir, I shall have something to say of the charge which the hon. gentleman made very distinctly, if my recollection serves me aright, that the refiners of Canada were going to take the whole of the $\frac{5}{100}$ of a cent per pound of the duty on refined sugar away from the consumers of sugar in Canada, a little later on in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). Now, the hon. member for Brant had a good deal to say upon the question of sugar. He knows a good deal about it. I remember that in previous years I had the pleasure of discussing this subject in the House. I am only sorry the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) is not in his seat to-night, because the statements he made were so absurd, and the conclusions at which he arrived so monstrous, that I am confident when he gets the real facts of the case—and he will do it if he takes the trouble to read what I say—he will freely admit that in discussing this question he came to the House without any knowledge of the subject he was going to discuss. The hon. member for Brant criticised pretty freely the statement of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) respecting sugar under No. 14 Dutch standard. He overlooked the fact—it is a little matter, but I will mention it in passing—that under this tariff, and under the late tariff, that it is not sugar under No. 14 that is coming in free, but No. 14 and under, which makes a little difference. The hon. gentleman had a good deal to say about the statement that had been made by the hon. member for Albert in connection with the possibility of sugars of 14 Dutch standard being used in ordinary consumption, and he criticised very closely his argument, and stated that the hon. member for Albert had claimed that the great proportion of sugar to be used by the people is sugar of this class, under No. 14 Dutch standard. I desire to point out that I am convinced that sugars of No. 14 Dutch standard and under can be had at very reasonable prices, and that these pure and wholesome sugars may come into Canada and enter into consumption without paying any duty whatever. I am speaking now of what I know. But the hon. member for Albert did not say the people of Canada would use a very large proportion of this sugar. What that hon. gentleman said was, that the price at which these sugars could be imported, and the possibility of bringing them in duty free, would prevent the refiners ever advancing the prices of refined sugar beyond a fair rate. Or, in other words, that if the refiners ever became extortionate in asking high prices for refined sugars, sugars of the class referred to would come in and prices would have to come down. That was the argument, and that alone, which the hon. member for Albert based on these facts in connection with sugars of No. 14 Dutch standard and under. The hon. member for Brant also said that the Minister of Finance cannot claim much credit if he is going to force the people to use sugar under No. 14. The hon. member must know that the Minister of Finance never said, and never claimed, anything of the kind. It never entered into his head, I dare say. The only argument the Minister could have thought of on the subject, and I do not remember whether he said anything at all, would simply be the argument presented to the House by the hon. member for Albert, namely, that the possibility of the sugars referred to coming in free would prevent the price of refined sugar being put up too high. The next statement made by the hon. member for Brant to which I wish to refer is one that proved most clearly that he had no knowledge whatever of the subject on which he spoke. He not only did not know the facts, but he did not know where to go for his knowledge, which I dare say is just as bad. He entered into a very elaborate calculation to show what was the difference in the price of raw sugar and refined sugar for the twelve months from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1890. He told the House where he got his figures. He told the House, if I remember rightly, that he got the prices of refined sugar from the price-list published in the Montreal Journal of Commerce, and that he got his prices of raw sugar from the tables presented to this House by the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman did not go to the right place to get his facts. I can show that his facts were wrong, and will point out some of the things the hon. member for Brant left out of the calculation altogether, when he gave the figures of the Minister of Finance as the cost of the raw sugar used by the refiners during that period. I want the House to bear in mind the hon. gentleman presumed to give the cost of raw sugar, and yet he gave figures which he must have known did not take into consideration at all the freight paid on sugar landed in Canada, and the insurance which was paid on the sugar as well—two very important items. I can hardly understand how an hon. gentleman with the commercial knowledge which the hon. member for South Brant possesses should have made such a slip when he came down to the House and omitted these items. Some hon. gentleman may say that the freights are not very high. If the House will bear in mind that a considerable quantity of the sugar brought into Canada comes from the East, from the Phillipine Islands, on which very high freight is paid, from $6 to $8 a ton, and the insurance often runs as high as 5 per cent., hon. members will find that these are very important elements in the calculation when added together; but no matter whether the amounts for freight or insurance are small or great, they should be added to the cost of sugar to the refiner. Then the hon. gentleman—and this is a point with which the hon. member might not be expected to be so intimate—was mistaken in his view of making up the average selling price of refined sugar in Canada at that time, and in the proportion he took of granulated and yellow sugars. My recollection is, that he said the consumption of sugar in Canada was half granulated and half yellow. The proportion is more like one-third granulated and two-thirds yellow, and even that, if anything, overestimates the quantity of granulated sugar. The selling price he arrived at was absurd. To show its fallacy, I will first give the figures of the hon. gentleman, and next I will give figures, not estimated, but the real results of my own knowledge. The hon. gentleman estimated that the refiners received, in the twelve months to which I have referred, an average price of $6.64 per 100 lbs. for their sugars, and the hon. gentleman took the average cost of raw sugars to the refiners during that period as $4.40 per 100 lbs., a difference of $2.24, which he said went into the pockets of the refiners of Canada. I have said I will give the exact figures. I have not the figures for one year, but I have them for a period of two years which include the twelve months to which the hon. gentleman referred, and as the average is spread over a longer time it will be a more correct one. The absolute cost of the raw sugars which were used in a certain refinery of Canada, in the two years from 1st January, 1889, to 1st January, 1891, was $5.14 per 100 lbs., and the average net price which the refiners received in that time for these sugars was $5.74 per 100 lbs., being a difference of 60 cents per 100 lbs., instead of a difference of $2.24, as was asserted by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) a few nights ago. That 60 cents per 100 lbs. covered all the expenses of refining, the loss in weight, all the interest on the plant, and included the profit which was made by the refiners; and if it is looked at by any reasonable man, even without any knowledge of refining, he can see there could not have been any such large profit in refining during the two years commencing the 1st January, 1889, and ending 1st January, 1891. Let us see how this difference works out, as applied to the quantity of sugar consumed in Canada. The hon. gentleman took the cost of the sugar in the time specified as $4.40 per 100 lbs., but it should have been $5.14 per 100 lbs., a difference of 74 cents per 100 lbs. by which he under-estimated the cost of the raw sugar, or upon the quantity which was consumed in Canada that year of 200,000,000 lbs., a sum of $1,484,000. In that calculation of raw sugar he was only out $1,484,000, therefore. Now let us see how much he is out in the returns the refiners got. He estimated that the refiners received, and that the people had to pay $6.64 per 100 lbs., but the real price was $5.74 per 100 lbs., or a difference of 90 cents; so that he only over-estimated the price that the refiners got by 90 cents per 100 lbs.; or upon the 200,000,000 lbs. consumed in Canada he over-estimated to the extent of $1,800,000; or to put it in another way, the hon. gentleman claimed that the difference between the cost of the raw sugar and the price of the refined sugar was $2.24, instead of 60 cents per 100 lbs., which is the correct figure. The hon. gentleman was $1.64 per 100 lbs. out, only 350 per cent. in that calculation, and on the weight of sugar consumed in Canada, alluded to before, he was only $3,280,000 out, which he said the refiners of Canada took more than really they did. A little later on I will show the effects these figures which I have given have upon the argument, whether the refiners of Canada during the past two years took any advantage of the protective tariff, as far as advancing the price of sugar is concerned—in other words, whether the price of refined sugar in Canada during the past few years had been increased by the protective tariff. Not only was the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) out in these figures which he gave, but he was also very much out when he came to discuss the relative protection under the late and under the new tariff. The Minister of Finance stated that he estimated the protection given by the old tariff at 1 cent per pound —meaning the protection that existed under the tariff in force down to the afternoon the resolutions were moved in this House—and that the new tariff gave a duty of $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per pound, or a protection of 80 cents per 100 lbs. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated that in comparing the relative protection which existed in these tariffs he took the ad valorem protection, and not the specific. I think his basis of calculation was wrong. I consider that in calculating the rate of protection which the tariff gives, as far as it affects the interest of the refiner, the specific protection is more fair than the ad valorem. The hon. gentleman repeats the Minister of Finance's statement, that the protection under the old tariff was $1 per 100 lbs., but he cannot see how a dollar per 100 lbs. is more than 80 cents per 100 lbs. Now, whether you take this specific protection, or whether you take the ad valorem protection, I claim that a dollar must be more than 80 cents. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said that the hon. Minister of Finance stated that the protection under the old tariff was 1 cent per pound. He then went on and told that the prices in the United States have fallen from 6 cents to 4 cents for granulated sugar, and the refiner therefore had a protection of 1 cent as against 6 cents. I can show that the hon. gentleman's premises are wrong here. When the hon. Minister of Finance said the protection was 1 cent per pound he spoke of the protection which existed from the date the United States duties were taken off, namely, from 1st April, 1891, to the afternoon the resolutions were proposed. He did not speak of the protection on American granulated sugar that existed before the United States duty was taken off. This cannot be disputed, and the figures he gave were as nearly correct as possible. He put it at 1 cent per pound, or a dollar per 100 lbs., and the calculations of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) made it 96 cents per 100 lbs. The House will see that these figures are practically the same. As I said before, I believe the specific duty is the more correct way, but whichever be the correct way, the hon. member for Brant, and any other hon. member in this House to-night, must admit that the premises must be correct or the calculations will be worthless. The figures upon which the calculations are based must be correct or the conclusions arrived at are worthless; and the premises of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) were altogether incorrect. I will now take the ad valorem basis to see how the figures work out. That is the basis which the hon. gentleman took himself. I will prove the hon. gentleman is all wrong, and that his calculations are misleading and his premises absurd. To find the ad valorem protection, a specific or combined specific and ad valorem duty would give the protection calculated on the cost of the sugar to the purchaser, and the correct duty taken. That is an axiom that cannot be denied. The hon. member for Brant was out in his calculation in two ways. He was out first in regard to the cost of sugar to the Canadian buyer at the time the United States tariff was in force. He said it was 6 cents per pound, and he based his ad valorem calculation of the protection on that. He forgot altogether to tell the House that when the home price of sugar in the United States was 6 cents per pound the Canadian buyer would only pay a fraction under $3\frac{6}{10}$ cents per pound, owing to the American drawback. The difference is $2\frac{4}{10}$ cents per pound, the Canadian buyer only paying $3\frac{6}{10}$ cents per pound, and not 6 cents. The hon. member should have calculated the percentage on $3\frac{6}{10}$ cents per pound, and not 6 cents, as he did. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was also astray in assuming that the protection would have been 1 cent per pound when the home price of granulated was 6 cents in the United States. I trust I am making myself clear to the House. The question is a little involved, I am afraid, and is not interesting; but I crave the indulgence of the House, because I believe that the change which has been made in the duties on sugar by these resolutions is very important to the country, and it is well that the facts should be clearly and definitely stated to the House and the country. I will just say, then, that the hon. member for South Brant was astray in arguing as if the protection would have been 1 cent a pound when the home price of granulated sugar in the United States was 6 cents a pound under the late American tariff. He knew that at that price the Canadian duty would have been $3\frac{6}{10}$ cents a pound on granulated, and that the protection, instead of being 1 cent a pound, was about $1\frac{6}{10}$ cents a pound. And that when he calculated the ad valorem protection which the late tariff gave on the price of 6 cents a pound, he should have taken the specific protection at $1\frac{6}{10}$ cents and not at 1 cent a pound, which was given by the hon. Minister of Finance as applying to the time when the American duties on sugar had been repealed. I repeat, then, that he is mistaken on two things: first, on the price of the sugar which he took to calculate the ad valorem protection, and second, on the protection which existed under the circumstances he mentioned. Now, I want to make myself quite clear on this point. The hon. gentleman was wrong to have reduced the protection to an ad valorem basis; but if this was to be done when he showed the comparative rates of ad valorem protection, given specific and ad valorem duties would give, he should have done so on prices of sugar ruling at the same time. Either the protection under the late tariff must be brought down to the present time and calculated on the price of sugar ruling now, or the protection under the new tariff must be put back to the previous time and calculated on the price of sugar then prevailing. Can anyone deny that this is the case? To make it clearer, I wish to point out that the issue between the hon. member for South Brant and myself is not the ad valorem protection which existed some months ago under the conditions then prevailing compared with the ad valorem protection now existing; that has no bearing on the question whatever; but the question now is what the ad valorem protection to the refiners would be to-day if the tariff had not been changed, compared with that existing under the new tariff. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Brant did not proceed on this principle, and therefore the figures he gave to the House are absurd. He must acknowledge this. There is no other basis on which you can make a comparison, and the hon. gentleman's basis was calculated to deceive the House and the country. I assert, and I defy contradiction, that on this principle of comparison which I lay down, and it is the only correct one, $\frac{6}{10}$ of a cent cannot be more than 1 cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will. Just take your seat and I will prove it.

Mr. STAIRS. The hon. gentleman, in making the assertion, is equally absurd, and he can no more prove it than he can prove that white is black. I have now laid down the principles upon which the hon. member for South Brant should draw these comparisons. I will work out the details of the comparisons to show how much the hon. gentleman was out in his percentages. He took the protection under the new tariff as $\frac{6}{10}$ of a cent a pound on sugar costing 4 cents as being equal to 20 per cent., and that is right enough: but under the late tariff he took the protection to be $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. on 6 cents a pound. On the principle I lay down, his argument was all wrong, because the sugar did not cost 6 cents a pound; it only costs $3\frac{6}{10}$ cents a pound; and the protection, instead of being $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. on 6 cents a pound, should be $27\frac{7}{11}$ per cent. on $3\frac{6}{10}$ cents a pound. Therefore, the hon. gentleman was out only to the extent of $7\frac{7}{11}$ per cent. If any hon. member chooses to work out the calculation to find out what the percentage would be upon granulated sugar costing 6 cents a pound, he will find that the protection would be 44 per cent. instead of $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. But I do not give these comparisons as having a great deal of bearing on the case. I only put them out to show that the hon. member for South Brant was entirely mistaken in the calculations he presented to this House a few nights ago. From what I have said every hon. gentleman can see that the ad valorem protection under the new tariff is not as great as it was under the old tariff, and, of course, all can see that the specific protection under the new tariff is not as great as it was under the old, because $\frac{6}{10}$ of a cent cannot be as much as one cent. But hon. members may say that this is not a practical question; the practical question they will say is, to what extent have the refiners taken advantage of the late tariff to add to the price of sugar? Now, this is a practical proposition; and if hon. gentlemen opposite can prove that under the protective policy manufactured sugar is increased in price by the duty, it is an argument against the policy; but if I can show in this case that it is not so, I shall be able to prove that the protective policy is advantageous: that the country had the cheap sugar and the benefit of manufacturing it in the country. In starting out, I may say I am going to prove beyond question from the prices of sugar existing in Canada to-day that the refiners are not taking advantage to the extent of 1 cent per 100 lbs. of that protection of 80 cents per 100 lbs. But before I go into the question of how the present tariff applies, I think it may not be amiss that I should show what was the state of affairs previous to the introduction of these resolutions. Now, I have stated as a fact, and it is well known, that the difference between the price of raw and refined sugar, in the period of two years to which I have referred, is only 60 cents per 100 lbs., and I point out that if the refiners took advantage of all the protection which existed under the late tariff, they must have sold refined sugar at least 1 cent per pound more than the raw cost. I repeat that if the refiners did take advantage of the whole protection which existed under the late tariff of 1 cent per pound, they must have sold refined sugar 1 cent per pound more than the raw cost. The hon. member for South Oxford claims that, under the new tariff, they would take advantage of the whole $\frac{6}{10}$ of a cent, and I presume it would be said on the other side that they would have taken advantage of the whole of the cent that then existed. To have taken advantage of the protection of 1 cent per pound, they must have sold the sugar at an advance of at least 1 cent per pound on the cost of the raw, if they were not to have had any profit.

The actual figures prove that the difference between the cost of raw and refined sugar during the two years of 1889-91 is only 60 cents per 100 lbs., proving clearly that at least they did not take advantage of any of the 1 cent per pound, for if it be claimed the $\frac{6}{10}$ advance was due to the protection, they made and sold the sugar for nothing. When I come to deal with the question of the tax that exists at present, I will show they did not take advantage of the protection existing under the new tariff at all. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in the course of his remarks, said that the calculations of the hon. member for Albert, with respect to the protection which exists under the new tariff, were very much involved. I deny that most emphatically, and am quite willing to leave to the House, if the calculations of the hon. member for Albert were involved, what must be said of the calculations of the hon. member for Brant. Now, the hon. member for Brant set out to prove that the refiners of Canada to-day were charging a great deal more for the sugar they refined than was being charged by the New York refiners at the same time. He stated that the New York and Boston prices about the date he spoke of, which is near enough for our calculation——

Mr. LANDERKIN. How much did they charge for rope?

Mr. STAIRS. I am not talking about rope, but no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite will be given rope enough to hang themselves. In the New York and Boston markets the price was $4.19 against the price in Canada of $4.50 per 100 lbs., or, in other words, our prices are, under the new tariff, 31 cents per 100 lbs. higher than they are in the markets of the United States. The hon. member for Brant admits they have not taken the whole 80 cents per 100 lbs., but he declared that what the hon. member for South Oxford stated was that the Minister of Finance has given them the power, if they agree among themselves, to take the whole of the 80 cents. I am a little in doubt whether the hon. member for Oxford qualified it in that way, he may have; but I will show that they have not taken anything, and the only way to prove that is to take the facts. In the first place, the net price of Canadian granulated sugar, at the time the hon. gentleman mentioned, was not $4.50. In the second place he took the prices of articles of different qualities in different places. Granulated sugar in the United States is not exactly the same thing as granulated sugar in Canada; and in making his calculations he made no allowance whatever for the difference. The price of granulated sugar was 4·50 cents in Montreal, less 2½ discount. That discount, it may be said, is not a great deal, but on a leading article like refined sugar it is a very large item, amounting to ⅛ of a cent per pound, and reduces the prices of Canadian granulated, about the date he mentioned, to 4⅜ cents net instead of 4½; and at that time the price on American granulated was 4¼, less the discount of 1 per cent., or 4·20 per 100 lbs. The hon. gentleman also compared sugars in different markets, and if he had taken that into account, he would have added 20 cents per 100 lbs. to the price of sugar in Montreal for the difference of carriage from New York to Montreal; and there was also a difference in quality, which he did not take into account, but for that I do not blame him, as he was not likely aware of the fact. The relative difference in values of granulated sugars made in New York and Montreal is 12½ cents per 100 lbs. If these items be taken into the calculation, it will be found that, instead of comparing 4·19 per 100 lbs. in New York with 4·50 per 100 lbs. in Montreal, as he said, 4·38 in Montreal compares with 4·52½ in New York, showing a difference in favour of Montreal of 14½ cents per 100 lbs. The hon. member for Brant stated that the increased prices which the refiners in Montreal were taking, as compared with the refiners in New York, was 30 cents per 100 lbs., which on 200,000,000 lbs. would make a difference of $600,000 more charged in Canada than in the United States for granulated sugar. Instead of that being the case, the real facts are that the difference in Montreal at that time was 14½ cents per 100 lbs. less than in New York, which, on 200,000,000 lbs., makes a saving of $290,000 by refining the sugar in Canada, besides which the people of Canada have the value of these industries. With reference to the great importance of these industries, I would refer hon. gentlemen opposite to the speech made by Hon. Mr. Jones in the session of 1876, referred to a few nights ago by the hon. member for Haldimand. I might give the House a comparison of the prices in Halifax and New York, and the comparison is a perfectly legitimate one. Take the New York price of 4·20 per 100 lbs. net and the difference in quality of 12½ cents per 100 lbs., and you have 4·32 as what New York sugar would be worth, if the quality were the same as the Canadian sugar, against a net price in Halifax of 4·25 at the date the hon. gentleman spoke of; a difference of 7½ cents per 100 lbs. in favour of Halifax, and in this calculation I have not taken into account the freight. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said the other night that yellow sugar was selling in Canada at 3⅝ per pound and 3$\frac{7}{16}$ in the United States. On June 26th, the price of yellow sugar in Halifax was 3⅜ to 3½ cents, as compared with 3$\frac{7}{16}$ in the United States. I do not propose to use the price of yellow sugars because they are an indefinite quantity, and you cannot say exactly what they are. There is another interesting calculation which might be made as to the relative cost of sugar to the Canadian consumer previous to 1879, and that which exists at present, and I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made some slight comparison of this kind. Granulated sugar is selling in Halifax now at 20 lbs. for one dollar, and I am sure it will be admitted that that is a very low price, and I am told that in Hamilton it is selling at 22 lbs. for a dollar. In 1878, I am advised that the wholesale price of granulated sugar in Montreal was about 10 cents a pound, while on June 26th, 1891, it was only 4⅜ cents. The hon. member for North Norfolk stated that Cuba crystals in New York were worth 5 cents a pound, and compared that with the price in New York to-day of 3⅜ cents a pound. It would be dishonest for me to say that the figures I have given would be an entirely fair comparison, because I must deduct the duty on the granulated which was paid in 1878. The price of granulated sugar in Montreal, in 1878, was about 10 cents, and the duty, as near as I can estimate it, would be about 2½ cents, so that, if there were no duty on granulated sugar in 1878, it could have sold at about 7½ cents a pound. To-day, without any duty on the raw, it is selling at 4⅞ cents. But I will be told that the raw sugar was a good deal higher. According to the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) Cuba crystals were worth about 5 cents a pound, in 1878, in New York, and that left a difference between Cuba crystals, which are a standard article, and the refined sugar of 2½ cents a pound, so that the granulated sugar could have been sold in Canada, if there had been no duty at that time, at an advance of 2½ cents on the price of Cuba crystals in New York. To-day Cuba crystals in New York are quoted at 3⅜ cents, while the granulated sugar is being sold in Montreal for 4⅝ cents, or only an advance of 1 cent a pound, as compared with 2½ cents in 1878, which I contend is a very favourable showing for the National Policy. There is another comparison which it may be interesting to give to the House. When the United States' duty was removed on the 1st April last, the Cuba crystals were worth in New York 3 cents a pound, and the price of granulated sugar was fixed by the New York refiners at 4¼ cents, and millions of pounds were sold at that price, making a difference of 1¼ cents a pound. When the duty was removed in Canada a few days ago, Cuba crystals were worth in Halifax 3¼ cents a pound, and granulated sugar was fixed by the refiners at 4¼ cents, or only a difference of ¾ cent per pound, so that there is a difference of ½ of a cent in favour of the Canadian refiners. I think I have taken up sufficient time in wearying the House on this sugar question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. STAIRS. I dare say it is a little wearisome to hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have always found that in any question facts are the best things to present to influence people, whether it be the public or the House, and I am sure that the facts I have given to the House to-night will have considerable influence with hon. members in enabling them to form a proper judgment on this question. I will now turn to another important question, and that is in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. In the remarks made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) he referred to the deficit in the working of the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway of $640,000 a year, and he claimed that this deficit was altogether a loss to the country. I wish to point out that a loss of this nature to the public treasury may not be a loss to the country. Before I go into that argument, it is but right for me to claim that I consider the whole of the Dominion is equally interested in the maintenance of the Intercolonial Railway. In the Maritime Provinces we sometimes hear that our friends in the west claim that the Intercolonial Railway was constructed and is run entirely in the interest of the Maritime Provinces. That is not the case. I claim that Ontario and Quebec derive as much benefit, and probably more, than the Maritime Provinces from the Intercolonial Railway. I was struck by some of the language used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He said, speaking of the deficit :

"I do not believe this dead loss we sustain is the cost of the maintenance of public works properly administered, but I believe it is the cost of maintaining a radically corrupt Government in power."

Now, this is pretty strong language, and I want to point out to the House the position in which the hon. member places himself when you take into account what he himself has said on this subject when he was in power. But before going into this I must say that to whatever extent the deficit in this road is caused by extravagance or corruption, to such an extent and to that extent only is such a deficit a loss to the country. On this side of the House we deny that the deficit in the receipts of the Intercolonial Railway is due to these causes. I hold that the experience of the hon. member for South Oxford when in power proves this to be the case. I wish to remind the House that the Mackenzie Government, of which the hon. member for South Oxford was a member, made every possible effort to make both ends meet in the management of the Intercolonial Railway. I need not go into the history of it. The very attempt which the Government then made to make both ends meet really resulted in the loss being greater than it was before. They drove business away from the road and it was years before it was got back again. Now, I desire to make quotations from the speeches of the hon. member for South Oxford in the years 1877 and 1878, as recorded in the Hansard of those years. In 1877, on page 139, I find the following remarks made by Mr. Tupper, now Sir Chas. Tupper, and the answers of Mr. Cartwright, the then Finance Minister when the Budget speech was being delivered :—

"Mr. TUPPER. What do you estimate the cost of working the railways above receipts?

"Mr. CARTWRIGHT. The present dead loss to us is, as near as I can recollect, about $550,000, including the cost of running the Prince Edward Island Railway, which will amount to above $100,000.

"Mr. TUPPER. You expect to reduce that by $250,000?

"Mr. CARTWRIGHT. By about that."

Then again, in 1878, the Minister of Finance, in the course of his Budget speech, said:

"For the purpose of working our Railway Department a sum of $750,000 will be required.

"Mr. MITCHELL. For railways?

"Mr. CARTWRIGHT. The probable loss on the working of railways is, as near as can be ascertained, $600,000 a year."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read the context very carefully and I am convinced that when the member for South Oxford stated that the probable loss of working the railroad, as near as could be ascertained, would be $600,000 a year, he meant that would be the probable cost for many years to come. Now, we may be told that we had at that time a smaller railway system existing than at present. Let us admit that and let us see where that would lead the hon. gentleman. The only argument we can draw from the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford a few nights ago, is that this present deficit is caused by corruption and nothing else. It means that or nothing at all. Now, I repeat that this deficit is not caused by corruption, but if it is caused by corruption, we may naturally conclude that it was also caused by corruption during the time the hon. member himself was in power. If it is not caused by corruption it is caused probably by other reasons, partly, say, by low rates, and, if so, the deficit is not in any sense a loss to the country, that is in the broadest sense. I desire to submit to the House that if we were to put the rates up, it would entail a very much heavier loss to the country. The hon. gentlemen opposite put the rates up and it made things worse than they were before. Take the hon. gentleman's own experience. The business then carried on over the Intercolonial Railway was of such a nature that the raising of the rates had the effect of driving a large amount of the business from the road. I desire to submit to the House that not only has the loss which is incurred by maintenance to be taken into account, but the interest which the country has to bear on the capital employed in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway has also to be taken into account. You might adopt a policy which would be very detrimental to the interests of the country, you might drive traffic from the Intercolonial Railway and therefore not get the indirect advantages which now accrue to the country, and at the same time you would have to bear the whole cost of the interest. These are things which are worthy of consideration by hon. members on both sides of the House. Nova Scotia is able to claim that she was the first of the provinces now constituting the Dominion, to commence the construction of Government railways, and at that time it was never expected that these railways would pay fully the cost of maintenance. It was expected, though, that the indirect advantages would more than make up to the country any little loss that was sustained, and I believe this principle applies to the Intercolonial Railway as it is worked to-day. Now, I put this another way, and I will just ask, who is it that pays at present the deficit that is incurred in working the Intercolonial Railway? Is it not the people of Ontario, of Quebec, of Nova Scotia, of New Brunswick and of Prince Edward Island? Now suppose you adopt a policy of putting up the rates, to make matters square. Who would pay the deficit then? Exactly the same people. I am sure I am willing to consider any effort that will wipe out this deficit and make both ends meet; I would encourage to the fullest extent in the management anything that would tend to improve the condition of the Intercolonial Railway, while not affecting the business interest of the whole Dominion. If the contention of the hon. member for South Oxford is right, that corruption is at the bottom of this deficit, I claim that it was at the bottom of the deficit that occurred when his friends controlled the road; and if corruption is the cause, it must have been worse in his time than it is now, because the deficit on the road was as great then as it is to-day. But the language he employed the other night in reference to this deficit, I am sorry to say, approaches very nearly to other language which he is in the habit of employing, and is not worthy the position of the hon. gentleman in this House and in the country; it approaches very nearly to other language of the same character which has been heard in this House lately, language which is quoted throughout the length and breadth of the country—it approaches so nearly to it that it will not have any weight whatever, either with his own supporters or with the members on this side of the House. I would be quite as well justified in applying the same language to the deficits he referred to in the speeches of 1877 and 1878 from which I have quoted, and of charging against the Government of which he was a member that the loss then sustained was not caused by the maintenance of public works properly administered, but was caused by maintaining a radically corrupt Government in power, as he had of making such a charge against the present Government. We will give hon. gentlemen opposite the same treatment which they give us. I had intended to go into the question of unrestricted reciprocity, but I think the hour is so late I should defer my remarks to another opportunity.

Mr. STAIRS. I was a little amused to hear the hon. member for Brant, in replying to the hon. member for Albert, dwell so fully and so strongly on the statement which he said the hon. member for Albert had made, that if we had reciprocity with the United States the Americans would take possession of our markets and destroy our manufactures, for from the beginning to the end of the speech of the hon. member for Albert there is not a reference to that matter. I was very much struck, indeed, also with a remark that fell from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) during his speech, and it is well worth hearing coming from that hon. gentleman. An humble hon. member on the Government side of the House like myself might have fallen into that mistake, but it is surprising that the hon. member for South Oxford should have done so. The hon. member said: "I have never denied, and I do not deny it now, that the American consumer pays the duty likewise; but what the American consumer pays the Canadian producer loses." I think that opinion should go down for all time in some work on political economy. The hon. gentleman, in his speech, referred to the three leading objections which have been taken on this side of the House against the policy of the Opposition in regard to reciprocity. The first was discrimination against England; the second was that we would give up control of our own tariff; and the third was that under such a policy we never could produce sufficient revenue. It has been asserted on the other side of the House that the National Policy is a policy of discrimination against England. If it be a policy of discrimination against England, the present fiscal policy against England is one discriminating against Canada and her colonies. The position I take is, that Canada treats England as she does other countries, and we do it because England treats Canada in exactly the same way as she treats other countries. England cannot expect to be treated in any other way. My opinion is that it is in the interests of Canada, whenever it is possible, to give English manufacturers an advantage in our markets, it is only my own opinion as a manufacturer. This is a question which is a very broad question, and it is one on which a great deal may be said on both sides, but we totally deny the contention put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite that the National Policy discriminates against England. The policy that is propounded on the other side of the House, a policy of unrestricted reciprocity, no matter what form it may take, must discriminate most decidedly and unjustly against English manufactures. What is proposed? Take it in its mildest form, that each country is to control its own tariff, if unrestricted reciprocity is entered upon Canada is to make its tariff and the United States is to make its tariff, and just so long as we impose any duty, even 5 per cent., against English goods, and allow American goods to come in free, to that extent do we discriminate against England. Hon. gentlemen cannot get over it, and they have never tried to get over it. They may be willing to take the bull by the horns, and be willing to discriminate and do it. We are perfectly willing to meet them on that issue. We hold that this would not only be unfair to England, but not in the interests of Canada. I am not going fully into these objections, but am only going to mention them very briefly. The second objection was that to-day it is claimed by the Liberal-Conservative party that the policy of the Opposition would give up control of our own tariff. If you follow out what unrestricted reciprocity means you can come to no other conclusion than that, and hon. gentlemen opposite have never attempted to show that we can obtain unrestricted reciprocity and still retain control of our own tariff. It is utterly impossible. There are two ways at which we can arrive at this conclusion. First, we have a perfect right to take the opinions of friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in the United States, to whom they will have to go when they endeavour to arrange unrestricted reciprocity, for two parties are required to enter into such an agreement. If hon. gentlemen opposite get into power, which I do not believe they will do, they will have to go to their friends on the other side, and they will have to take what the others are willing to give, and it must be remembered that their friends in the United States have stated most emphatically that they would not accept unrestricted reciprocity which would allow Canada to control its own tariff. We do not need, however, to go to the opinions of gentlemen on the other side of the line. Every hon. gentleman, and every intelligent man throughout Canada, who uses his own common sense, can tell the proposition of hon. gentlemen opposite that a policy of unrestricted reciprocity under which we will control our own tariff can never be worked out. The moment it is attempted they will find themselves getting into such difficulties that the details can never be worked out, and they will have to go a little further, to what is called commercial union. There is no other conclusion to be arrived at. Then we come to the revenue question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have never attempted to answer the questions of Conservative speakers on the platform or in this House, or the arguments in the newspapers on this question. The only answer they have made here in this House is: Let us over to your side of the House. That may be all right enough if they had to argue the question out with us here: but, unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately, we on this side are not the arbiters to say whether they are to come over here or not, but it is the people of Canada who have to decide that issue. Hon. gentlemen opposite must go to the people when they want to have that question settled. I maintain that when they go to the people and say: We propose a certain policy which we believe to be in your interest, the reply will come: "How are you going to meet the deficit which must arise in the revenue?" The Opposition leaders will have to answer that question. The people will demand an answer to that question although hon. gentlemen will not give it to us here, but can throw our inquiry back and say: Let us over to the Treasury benches and we will show. The people settled this question on 5th March last, and before they let hon. gentlemen opposite cross to this side of the House they will have another reckoning with them. The revenue question is therefore one which they must meet. They cannot get to the Government benches on that policy until they clearly and distinctly explain to the people what they are going to do on the question respecting the revenue, on the question of retaining control of our tariff, and on the question regarding discrimination against England. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no question about it but that the unrestricted reciprocity policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was the main cause, I believe, in the Maritime Provinces, why they sustained such an overwhelming defeat. The people of the Maritime Provinces got it thoroughly into their head that unrestricted reciprocity was not in the interest of the country. They voted upon that question and the decided to allow the very large number of candidates supporting the party opposite to stay at home. I do not suppose there was anything that had more weight and more effect on the people of the Maritime Provinces than some of the speeches made at that celebrated banquet at Boston, which has been referred to from time to time in this House. When we heard what the leaders of the party opposite said their policy meant we could not be surprised that the men who were engaged in carrying on the business and trade of this country were very jealous about the way in which they earn their living, and about how their business was going to be affected. The people of the Maritime Provinces, taking the speeches which were made in Boston, clearly understood that the policy which these gentlemen announced would remove all the business of the cities of the Maritime Provinces to the city of Boston. It was their reading upon that question which, to a greater extent than any other, secured the overwhelming defeat of the friends of the gentlemen opposite. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that on this side of the House we are afraid to vote on the unrestricted reciprocity question. I may say that my colleague and myself, and every member who supports the Conservative party from the Maritime Provinces, were elected to oppose unrestricted reciprocity tooth and nail. It is absurd for the hon. gentlemen opposite to attempt to make out to the country that any Conservative member of this House is afraid to face this vote. Let us see further how did the friends in the United States, of hon. gentlemen opposite take these speeches made in Boston. They took what was said there, in the only sense it could be taken in, namely, that it would lead to the transfer of a large amount of the wholesale business in the Maritime Provinces to the city of Boston. So clearly did they understand that, so clearly did they understand that the Liberal leaders who were present at that dinner in great force, were willing to give everything of value in connection with Canadian trade and manufactures into the hands of the Americans, that it was distinctly stated there that these hon. gentlemen looked to the American people for the sign by which they were to conquer. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me recapitulate very briefly, indeed, some of the points which I have discussed. I have shown, Mr. Speaker, that the deficit in the maintenance and the management of the Intercolonial Railway may not after all be lost to the country. I have shown that the Government lead by Mr. Alexander Mackenzie were unable to prevent that loss. I have shown that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself, looked forward for many years to a loss in working this railway, of about $800,000 a year. I have shown, Sir, that in view of that, these hon. gentlemen at that time were open to the very charge which they are now making against the Government. Then, in regard to sugar, I have shown that the refiners, since the National Policy went into force, have not made any excessive profits. I have pointed out that it is not against the protective policy to remove the duties on raw material. I have pointed out that the Opposition criticism as respects the duty on sugar, is, and always has been, unfair and misleading, and I have shown clearly that the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford that of the $3,500,000 saved to the people of this country by the new sugar tariff, $2,000,000 would be taken by the sugar refiners, is untrue and absurd. I have proved clearly and distinctly that not one cent of the $1,800,000 which he said would be taken by the refiners owing to the duty on refined sugar of eight-tenths of a cent per pound, would be taken, and that it is impossible for the refiners under the new tariff to overcharge, as there are incidents in that tariff which would compel them to keep their price within reasonable figures. I have shown I think to hon. gentlemen opposite, that their whole position on the sugar question is absurd. I see the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) in his place now, and I regret that he was not present while I was speaking. I say, Sir, that I have shown that the position of that hon. gentleman on the sugar question was absurd, and that it was based on false premises, and wrong calculations arrived at. I would repeat to the hon. gentleman what I said were it not that it would detain the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Spare us.

Mr. STAIRS. I have very often listened to my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) with a great deal of pleasure, and I am quite confident that he will listen to me for a little time without interruption.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. STAIRS. I have shown that the statement of the hon. member for Brant, that a difference of $2.24 existed in a certain twelve months, between the cost of raw sugar and the price at which the refined sugar sold, was absurd, and that figures taken from the books of one of the refineries in Canada show that instead of it being $2.24 per 100 lbs., it was only 60 cents per 100 lbs. for an average of two years. I have shown that the percentages of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) were all wrong, that the cost on which he based the calculations were wrong, and that the premises which he took in some cases were incorrect.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is reading his speech, and has been reading it.

Mr. STAIRS. I am quite willing to submit to the hon. gentleman if I am reading. The hon. member's point of order——

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member is reading his speech, of course he knows that is not allowed.

Mr. STAIRS. It is just a recapitulation of the points I have brought before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I rise to another point of order. He read that before.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must suggest to hon. gentlemen that this debate ought not to be made a farce of.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. STAIRS. I judge from some remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite a minute ago that they wish to get through. I can assure them that the easiest way to get through is to allow me to recapitulate the points I made in my speech. I am quite confident that the hon. member for South Brant wishes to hear me, and I am going to give him the pleasure. Now, I have shown that the ad valorem protection of sugar under the new tariff is not as much as it was under the old tariff, and that the specific protection is not as much as it was under the old tariff. In answer to the practical question, is refined sugar in Canada——

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I insist on my point of order. The hon. member is reading his speech, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule if he is allowed to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already ruled. A member cannot read his speech; but I believe that according to the practices and rules of Parliament notes may be used.

Mr. STAIRS. In answer to the hon. gentleman I beg to say that I am not reading my speech. I am simply referring to my notes in order to recapitulate the points I made in my speech. I have shown that the prices of all the sugars taken into consideration instead of being 31 cents per 100 lbs. higher in Montreal than in New York, as stated by the hon. member for Brant, are 14¼ cents lower; and instead of the people of Canada paying $600,000 a year more for their sugar they really have, under the present tariff, an advantage of $290,000. I assert, and I defy contradiction, that the duty on refined sugar has not increased, and does not at the present time increase the price of refined sugar to the Canadian consumer; and in view of all this, I submit that the tariff as it now exists is eminently in the interest of the people of Canada. I thank the hon. members on both sides of the House for listening to me through these rather tedious remarks. I cannot claim that a speech which goes so much into facts and figures is a very pleasant one to listen to; but it had to be given, and hon. gentlemen opposite have to thank themselves for it. I will not, however, take my seat, without referring to the very courteous and good-natured manner in which the hon. member for South Brant addressed the House the other night. I assure hon. gentlemen opposite that we all on this side of the House had pleasure in listening to him; I know that I did; and I joined with a great deal of pleasure in the meed of applause which the hon. gentleman got from this side of the House when he took his seat.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have something to say on this question of the adjournment of the debate. I would be sorry to contribute in any way to a heated discussion. Complaint seems to have been made on the other side of the House that on this side there has been animosity shown, at the same time it is complained, and the hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) complained and regretted that animosity is shown on both sides. The position is not the same. On this side we complain that a formal agreement, that a contract has been openly violated. There was made an agreement in this House—and I was present when the thing happened. And what was this agreement? It was that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) should have all the benefit of his motion at a later phase of the debate. The question of discussion was not made a special point, but it was understood that he would have all the advantages resulting to him from his motion. Would any of the hon. members on the other side of the House arise here and say that if it had been proposed to the hon. member for South Oxford to abandon his undeniable right of having requested a direct vote taken on his motion, in amendment, would anyone dare say—and I appeal to the hon. French Ministers in this House—would any one of them dare say that the hon. member for South Oxford would have consented? Is there a member in this House who would dare say so? And now, Mr. Speaker, by a roundabout way, by contrivance which I need not qualify, but the effect of which I only wish to consider, it is wanted to deprive the hon. member for South Oxford of the direct vote which it is his right as well as his interest to ask from this House. And now, what would be the position? The hon. member for South Oxford could not have a direct vote on his motion, not only now but at no time during the rest of the session. Such is the subterfuge—I can use the term in parliamentary language—such is the subterfuge which the Government have, perhaps not premeditated, but which they are now resorting to. After having given many days and many nights to discussion, what do they come with now, what strength of argument do they offer the country? They come and say: We are going to use the rules of the House to prevent a vote, to stifle an expression of opinion. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this position is not to be countenanced, and I expect from you a ruling that the amendment is out of order. Mr. Speaker, the Orders of the House are invoked. I ask this House and I ask the country, which has more force, which is most binding? Is it not a solemn contract made before the House and unanimously agreed to, a contract saying that at any time the hon. member shall have all the advantages attaching to his motion? Shall such a solemn contract be defeated by a Standing Order of the House? Which can have more force? If the Orders of the House are written and printed on paper, the order so recently adopted by the House must be written on the soul of the hon. members, and must dictate their course from honour's standpoint. I think that they should not entrench themselves behind pure technicalities and formalities to deprive the hon. member for South Oxford of the advantages of his motion by a subterfuge. The Government will perhaps——

Mr. OUIMET. Interrupting the hon. gentleman, I would like to say that I think good understanding, tolerance, and even good-will should exist between the two parties in this House, in the interest of the prompt dispatch of business; and I am convinced that all this difficulty has arisen from a misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member for South Oxford of his right of moving an amendment without that amendment being subject to a sub-amendment on the second reading of the resolutions. I understand that, strictly speaking, the Government are right in asserting that the sub-amendment is in order; but they may be insisting too strictly on their right. Although it may be said that they have been a little put to defiance by some of the members of the Opposition, I think it would be in the interest of public business and of that good understanding that ought to exist in the House between the two parties, that this should cease, and that a mode should be found to put the hon. member for South Oxford in the same position that he was in when he waived his right to move the amendment. My experience as Speaker of this House has led me to feel that anything that may prevent a good understanding between the two parties is injurious to the prompt and efficient expedition of business; and though I am sure that the amendment of the hon. member for L'Islet was moved in good faith, yet I would ask him to withdraw it, and I would call upon the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. leader of the Government to give way and put an end to this discussion which has, after all, no practical effect except to prevent for the future that good understanding between the parties to which I have referred. I know that this matter has created already a good deal of bad blood and bad temper on both sides, and I do not think it is in the interest of this House to foster or encourage anything of that kind. Therefore, I would beg the Government to withdraw the amendment and leave the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford in the same position it would have been in if it had been moved at the time he had a right to move it, when the motion was made that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means. I would add this, that while I am sure everyone in the House would be pleased to see an understanding of that kind arrived at, I was sorry to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition threaten that in future no pairing and no understanding of any kind would be entertained by him. I see no reason, Mr. Speaker, why the two parties should not understand each other, and why we should be carrying the war to the knife in this House. The great questions now before this House and before the country should be discussed fairly, without any undue advantage being taken by one party of the other, by some practice which the other party might call sharp practice. In this case I do not think there was any intention of resorting to any unfair tactics to gain any undue advantage. After all, I may say this, that those who are in favour of the policy of the Government will vote against the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and those who are against it will vote the other way, so that the result will be the same, and the country will judge what the vote really means. It is, in fact, a vote for or against the policy of the Government. There is nothing to be gained by either side, by pressing that strict right which the Government have now of insisting on their sub-amendment being voted upon, but it will result in a bad understanding in the future, and prove detrimental to carrying on the business of the House. I would, therefore, ask the Government to recede from their position, and the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) to withdraw his amendment and allow us to go on with the discussion as before.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may be allowed to say a few words by way of intervening in the discussion, as the hon. gentleman has just done. I may do so all the more appropriately, because I was not in the House at the beginning of the discussion, and therefore did not hear the opening remarks. There can be no two opinions in the House as to the advantage that must result to public business from a cordial understanding between the two parties. That is not only in the interests of our convenience as gentlemen, but will be very much to the advantage of the public; and I am sure we recognized the other night, when the hon. member for South Oxford withdrew his resolution, that he was acting in the public interest, and that he was assisting us in expediting public business by allowing us to carry the Ways and Means resolutions without amendment. My own belief as to the way in which this difficulty has arisen is this: that there has been a misunderstanding or a want of explicit understanding, which resulted in very different impressions altogether being formed in the minds of the parties who undertook to enter into the agreement which was arrived at when the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford was withdrawn. It seems, from the observations that have been made in the debate to-night, that he had in his mind the impression that he was to reserve all his rights when he withdrew his resolution; that he believed he was not only reserving to himself and party the right to discuss in detail the resolutions, as he has the right to discuss them in committee at this stage, but that he also reserved to himself further the right which he had waived in withdrawing his resolution of having his amendment put to the House, on concurrence, without its being subject to a sub-amendment. But there is not the slightest doubt, on the other hand, that my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, received no such impression from the conversation which took place. I am sure he had in his mind the idea that the hon. member for South Oxford simply desired that the matter should stand over for full and minute discussion on concurrence on these resolutions, as we frequently agree that there should be the most ample discussion in concurring upon any vote taken in Supply. And I am sure that when the resolution was brought forward this evening, the way in which it was received by hon. gentlemen opposite must have struck every one on this side with surprise. My object in intervening now is not only to express our concurrence in the desire that harmony should be maintained between the two sides in the transaction of public business, but to call attention, at this stage of the discussion, to the manner in which the sub-amendment was received by hon. gentlemen on the other side. Assuming, and I think a little reflection will surely convince them, that what I have said is correct as regards the good faith of both the gentlemen connected with the understanding, I think hon. gentlemen will admit that the way in which that resolution was received, the expressions used conveying the charge that there were no gentlemen on this side, and the suggestion that there were no gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, that they ought not to be called gentlemen, that they were acting like pettifogging attorneys, and that this amendment was a piece of sharp practice, were reflections out of place altogether as applied to what was a pure misunderstanding and to a proceeding which was proposed in good faith. If, instead of the subject being discussed in this manner, the simple statement was made that the resolution was not in accordance with the agreement arrived at by hon. gentlemen opposite, I am convinced there would have been every desire on this side to carry out the agreement, not as we, but as hon. gentlemen opposite, understood it. That is the way in which we desire to carry on business. We desire that the good understanding which has hitherto existed shall still be respected, feeling, as I do, the certainty that there was good faith on both sides, though a misunderstanding evidently existed; and while the discussion to-night was unusually spirited, as it might well have been, on account of the surprise with which I must believe the amendment was received, still I am of opinion that many of the remarks made were not made in the spirit in which we all desire the discussion on this subject should proceed now.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has not said anything with regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have suggested to my hon. friends opposite whether they do not agree with me that the language used on this subject should not under all the circumstances, be withdrawn.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman, it seems to me, ought not to be at all surprised if there was warmth of feeling expressed on this side, when the amendment of the hon. member for L'Islet was moved. It would strike anybody, and strike the hon. gentleman I am sure, that if he asks a favour from this side of the House, in order to accommodate public business, this side would expect that, on returning to the subject, they would be placed exactly where they were; and, certainly, when we found we were not placed in that position, our surprise must not have been a cause of surprise to the other side. Of course expressions showing warmth of feeling, if at all avoidable, should always be avoided. If we could always control our temper everything would be pleasant, and though the circumstances may not have altogether justified, they certainly excused the warmth of feeling displayed; and I submit to the hon. gentleman himself, if, under such circumstances, when we were met by an amendment we had no reason to expect, and which, when adhered to, we persisted was not a fair carrying out of the understanding arrived at the other day, whether the hon. gentleman himself will not agree that, under such circumstances, our feeling was not at all without cause.

Mr. OUIMET. If I may be allowed to say another word, I would ask the hon. member for L'Islet to withdraw his sub-amendment. I have consulted all the precedents, and I find that every time we have gone into Ways and Means the resolutions have passed through Committee without amendment, with the understanding that the amendment should be moved on the second reading of these resolutions when reported. I have consulted the Journals of the House during those years when changes were made to the tariff, and I find that on every occasion an amendment was moved on concurrence, as on the present occasion, without sub-amendment. That is another reason why I think the hon. member for South Oxford never dreamed his amendment would be met by a sub-amendment, and, under the circumstances, I would, of course with all due respect and regard, insist on my suggestion that the sub-amendment should be withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER. We have to take cognizance of the circumstances as they are; we have to take into consideration that a certain set of circumstances have surrounded us, that this has come to a point to-night and that certain things have been asserted and said. The Minister of Justice has, to my mind, made a very fair statement of the circumstances, and has suggested, as plainly as language could suggest, how we might get over the difficulty. I stated in reply to the somewhat warm attack of the leader of the Opposition that there was not on my part, and certainly not on the part of the Government, any attempt to violate any understanding, expressed or implied. I believe that on the part of the Government, I know it on my own part, and I state it again. Under these circumstances, feeling as I do, and as the Government does on this side of the House, I think there ought to be some consideration for our position. The leader of the Opposition and the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had an entirely different idea in their minds when this amendment was put before the House. They thought that their idea of the understanding had not been carried out, and they made certain assertions, not as to their idea but as to the spirit and motive of myself and other members of the Government. Now, I think the circumstances of the case and the position of affairs are plain to every member of this House, and I do not see why any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House should in plain words say that a man had violated his faith, had violated his pledge, had done it designedly, that he was no gentleman, that he was a pettifogger, that he was a trickster, and the like of that; and yet, when informed on the word of a man—and I gave it myself to-night—that the idea of the Government was not to take any advantage of them or to violate any agreement at all, the plain way to a reconciliation, if any reconciliation is desirable, as it most certainly is, that the business of the House may go on with cordiality and evenness, is open and it should not be asked for one side of the House to do all the giving way. That is plain English, and I do not, for one, propose to do it. I will go as far as any other gentleman or any other man, and I think the way is plain to arrive at an arrangement.

Mr. AMYOT. If this discussion is exhausted, I will resume the few remarks I have to make. I am very sorry that we cannot come to an understanding. I think it would be very easy to declare that, under the circumstances, the amendment be withdrawn, and then the words which have been uttered would no further apply.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They have not been withdrawn.

Mr. AMYOT. The amendment has not been withdrawn.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I might urge again upon the leader of the Opposition whether he ought not to accept the assurance of the Minister of Finance that he was free from the motives which have been attributed to him. I think he ought to accept that statement that he did not understand that any agreement with gentlemen opposite precluded some amendment being moved. If it is put in that form, we are perfectly willing to adopt that solution of the difficulty.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not object to the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Justice, and, in order to carry out the harmony that should prevail in this House, I have simply this to say, and it is my last word on this subject: we complain of a certain act of the Government, and they complain of certain language of ours. Let them withdraw the act and we will withdraw the language.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has hardly done what he would ordinarily consider generous. We have been asked to withdraw the amendment, but we have been asked in terms—and he will pardon me for saying so—that are insulting, inasmuch as they imputed dishonourable, ungentlemanly and unworthy motives to the gentlemen on this side of the House. All we ask is that request shall be expressed in a different form, and that the hon. gentleman shall accept as a justification for expressing it in different form, our assurance that there was no such motive actuating any member of the Government. I think, inasmuch as the discussion arose in the way in which the request was made to us to withdraw, that the hon. gentleman has a clear way of accepting our assurance on this subject, and saying that he accepts our assurance, if he asks for the withdrawal, we will grant it.

Mr. LAURIER, If the hon. gentleman thinks that in the language which I used there was anything insulting, I am ready to withdraw any expression of that kind. I had no intention of using insulting language.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was referring to the remarks in which the discussion began after the amendment was moved.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not prepared to admit that I said anything insulting to hon. gentlemen. If the hon. gentleman will point out to me one word of mine which was insulting I am quite willing to withdraw it, but I am not prepared to admit that I did use such words.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not referring to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAURIER. I thought the hon. gentleman said a moment ago that he was not in the House when I addressed it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was not referring to the hon. gentleman in particular. The discussion was taken up by his friends, and remarks were made that I thought very strongly offensive. I am not referring to the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not conscious that I used any expressions which were derogatory to the honour and dignity of this Parliament, and if I did I will withdraw them. But if I understand the hon. gentleman to say that they intended nothing offensive, and that the whole thing was a misunderstanding, that there was no deliberate intention of breaking faith with us, I am willing to accept his disclaimer with the understanding that the sub-amendment be withdrawn.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In referring a moment ago to insulting language, I am sorry the hon. gentleman supposed that I applied that observation to him, because I did not; I was referring to the general course of the debate, from which I will not select the expressions now, because they were offensive; but I think the hon. gentleman, in accepting my disclaimer, ought to say that the gentlemen on his side of the House will withdraw their offensive expressions towards the Minister of Finance, and will accept his statement that the matter arose out of a pure misunderstanding.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think I used the words "a trick," but you ruled it was scarcely parliamentary and I withdrew it at the time. If that is the word to which the Minister of Justice refers, it has been withdrawn. I did not use the word "trickster." I will put this to the Minister of Justice: Let him assume for one moment our standpoint, let him suppose for one moment that the Opposition were sincere in the position we took, does he think our language too strong from that point of view?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If you will allow me to say so, I do. I do, because you were not only taken by surprise, which justified the warmth of the discussion, but the discussion imputed, from beginning to end, very improper motives to this side, and a desire to commit a breach of faith. I think the good feeling that has prevailed throughout the session might have justified hon. gentlemen on that side in assuming that there was no such desire.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). All I can say in reply to the hon. Minister is, that assuming that the understanding was such as we believed it to be, and as we still believe it to be, we could not think otherwise at the time than that there was a breach of faith. I think that a breach of faith in the House between parties on opposite sides is an act that cannot, within the rules of parliamentary discussion, be too strongly characterised. But the statement of the Minister of Justice just now offering to withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and that of the Minister of Finance, satisfy me, at all events, that those hon. gentlemen did not understand the matter from our standpoint, and under those circumstances I have no doubt whatever that my language, although perfectly sincere, was not such as was warranted by the position of the hon. gentlemen as explained and stated by themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly the point to which I wished this matter to come. If matters had been as my hon. friend thought they were, this language was none too strong; but when I rose, and when the Minister of Justice rose, and stated that these were not the motives impelling us, then I thought that we might have expected from my hon. friend just exactly what he has now stated. As he has now made this statement I think we may all smile and be pleasant, and we will withdraw this amendment if my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) is of the same opinion as myself.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Under the circumstances I will ask permission to withdraw the motion I made to adjourn the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate withdrawn.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). I do not want any misunderstanding about this point. I have got my word to say about it, too. I will give the answer which the House expects from me under the circumstances.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). If you want conciliation, you must show it towards me also. Now, I want it to be well understood that while I thought it was my duty, under the circumstances, to move the sub-amendment, of course I knew that it would meet with opposition, and at the same time I was satisfied that the opinions expressed in the amendment would meet with the assent of the Government and their supporters. Now, I was present in the House some days ago when the resolutions amending the tariff were submitted to the Committee of the Whole; I do not exactly remember if I was here all the time——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Don't make a two-hours speech.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, as mover of the sub-amendment, certainly has a right to a respectful and patient hearing.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). I was saying that I do not remember if I was present all the time when this pretended agreement that is now mentioned was made. The hon. gentlemen opposite say that such an agreement was made some days ago. At all events, I have read over the report of this debate, and I never came to the conclusion that under the circumstances the supporters of the Government had abdicated whatever rights they have here as members of this Parliament to move a sub-amendment. At all events, I see that my sub-amendment has somewhat ruffled the waters and has raised angry passions. For my part I am willing to meet my hon. friends opposite in an effort towards conciliation. But I want this to be well understood—it happens that I know something of parliamentary procedure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). I shall say what I like, Mr. Speaker. Hon. gentlemen have had their own way, they have stated what they pleased, and I have a right to make an explanation. I think I am speaking very politely towards every one. I say this, that I know something about parliamentary procedure.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. The amendment to the amendment is the question now before this House.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). I wish to say that I have an undoubted right to move a sub-amendment. Any member of this House has an undoubted right, according to parliamentary procedure, to move, at this stage of the proceedings, a sub-amendment, and if the question were raised, I have no doubt what the decision of the Speaker would be, and I have no doubt of the teaching of parliamentary authorities on the point. The right is undisputed. Now, it seems to me we have to face this little difficulty of an agreement that hon. gentlemen opposite say was made some days ago, by which it was understood that on the second reading of the resolutions, the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford was to be exactly in the same position as it was when he moved it. So far as I understand it myself, his amendment remains in that position. A motion has been made by the Minister of Finance for the second reading of the resolutions, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford is exactly in the same position as it was then, with the right of this House to debate the amendment and the main motion as long as they please. Then, exercising my undoubted right as a member of this House, I moved a sub-amendment. Under the circumstances, in order to conciliate the House and to smooth over the difficulties that have arisen, hon. gentlemen opposite having taken back what was said awhile ago——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh ; order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to say that the practice of interrupting speakers is entirely contrary to the Rules and ought, in my opinion, to be abandoned.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). I will remind the House of this, that when an amendment is before the Chair, it cannot be withdrawn except upon the unanimous consent of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I see that hon. gentlemen opposite are not very anxious to vote upon the principle enunciated in my amendment, although we on our side of the House are ready to vote squarely on the amendment of the member for South Oxford. I am ready to withdraw the sub-amendment if the House unanimously consents ; but I declare that I will take the next opportunity that occurs of asking the House to vote upon my sub-amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Desjardins, L'Islet) to amendment withdrawn.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 1.1 a.m. (Friday).
