Mr. DEVLIN asked, How much money has the Government expended in constructing, during the past year, a wharf at Gatineau Point? Who have filled during the past year the positions of Superintendent and of Inspector of Government works at Gatineau Point, in the County of Ottawa, and what sums of money have been paid to them?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The answer I have from the department shows that there is no wharf built at Gatineau Point during the past year, and therefore no expenditure was made, and no expenditure was made on the existing wharf, nor was any inspector employed.

FORT DU COTEAU DU LAC.

Mr. MOUSSEAU asked, 1. Has the Government leased the property known by the name of "Fort du Côteau du Lac"; if so, to whom, and for what rental? 2. Since the year 1872, what are the names of the parties who have been, successively, the lessees of this fort; and what sum of money has the Government received from the said lessees? 3. If this fort is not now under lease, is it permissible to any person to enclose this property, and to make use of it by keeping it as a pasture ground?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This property was leased for two successive terms of five years, commencing the 1st of June, 1871, to Mr. G. A. Beaudet, the rental for the first term being $500 per annum, and for the second term, $150 per annum. In 1886, Mr. Beaudet was permitted to occupy a portion of the property for a period of two years at a rental of $30 per annum. The total amount received from Mr. Beaudet by way of rent was $3,260. The land is for the present withdrawn from sale and lease in the expectation that it will be required for public purposes, and Mr. Beaudet has been charged with the guardianship of it, in consideration of which he is permitted to occupy it temporarily, but upon condition that he will vacate it whenever he may be called upon by the department to do so, and that he shall have no claim to any compensation or consideration whatsoever for any improvement he may make upon it.

QUARANTINE FOR SHEEP.

Mr. SPROULE asked, Whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the fact that the United States, authorities have ordered the establishment of a quarantine for sheep and lambs going from Canada to Buffalo and other points? If so, have any steps been taken to get the order rescinded, or to convince them of the fact that no contagious disease exists among sheep in Canada?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government has received no official information, neither has it any correspondence on this subject, consequently no action has been taken.

MAJOR'S HILL PARK.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Were tenders asked for for the care and improvements of Major's Hill Park for the current year? 2. Who was the lowest tenderer? Who received the contract? What is the contract sum? 3. What was the amount of the lowest tender?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 1. Yes, by public advertisement on the 29th May, 1890. 2. Lowest, Charles Scrim, Ottawa, $3,700 per year. L. Garello received the contract for $3,700 per year. 3. $3,700 per year. Charles Scrim was the lowest tenderer. The last clause of the specifications on which the tenders were called and based, was as follows:

"The contractor must devote the whole of his time to the service, and will not be allowed to engage in any other work, and he will be required to remain on the premises during all working hours, both winter and summer."

On the 25th June, 1890, the chief architect reported that he had an interview with Mr. Scrim, the lowest tenderer, who declined to enter into a contract on those terms, and that Mr. Garello, the next lowest tenderer, agreed to do the work on the price of the lowest. The Minister was authorized by Order in Council of the 30th June, 1890, to enter into a contract with Mr. Garello on the price of the lowest tenderer, $3,700. Garello's tender price was $4,500 per year.

TEMPERANCE COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. COATSWORTH) asked, Whether the Government have made a settlement with the Temperance Colonization Society? If so, has the settlement been consummated? If a settlement has been made, how many acres of land is the Society to receive? How much money has the Society paid to the Government? Is the Society now indebted to the Government? And if so, in what amount? Has the Government received communications from any persons, protesting against any settlement being made with the Society until the Society has recompensed equitably all parties who invested money in the Society? Have the Society disposed, or attempted to dispose, of lands to contemplating purchasers on terms and conditions which the Government refused to sanction?

Mr. DEWDNEY. 1. Yes; by authority of an Order in Council, dated the 21st April last. 2. Practically the settlement is consummated, although all the lands to be patented to the company have not yet been selected. Mr. Pierce, an officer of the department, is at the present time examining the land with a view to the selection of the balance. 3. 100,000 acres. 4. $100,000. 5. The Society is not now indebted to the Government. 6. Yes; several. A careful examination of the correspondence, however, shows that most of the complaints were embraced in the return already submitted to Parliament. 7. The department has no information on the subject of the terms on which the Society has disposed of its lands.

SECOND HOMESTEADS, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That, whereas in 1883 an Act was passed granting second homesteads to those settlers who had completed the conditions of the first homestead entry; and whereas in 1886 an Act was passed abolishing the policy of second homesteads; and whereas in 1887 an Act was passed which acknowledged the principle and right of those second homesteads, it should now be enacted that all those settlers who came in between 1st June, 1883, and 2nd June, 1886, should, on completing their improvements, be granted a second homestead.

He said: There are two reasons why it is desirable to proceed with this motion at once. Last session I was reproved by the Government for not bringing on my motions earlier. My hon. friend the Minister of Interior said:

"The second grievance I have with the hon. gentleman is this: During the first portion of the session he placed on the Order paper a large number of very important motions, all referring to the North-West Territories. He really took advantage of his own colleagues, who, I know, felt very strongly on the subject; and yet, although the hon. gentleman had placed those motions on the Order paper, he was not in his seat when, day after day, they were called, and he was obliged to answer them or to take the action which it was his duty to take."

Well, I was very unparliamentary at the time, and I said, "That is not true," and as I was reproved for not bringing them on in time, why, of course, I ought now to bring them on as soon as possible. But, as a fact, five weeks of the session had passed before I placed these notices on the paper, so that I could not have placed them on the paper in the first part of the session. It so happens that I can prove a negative, because on every private day, as you may see from the Hansard, I was in my place, because on every private day I spoke, as is evidenced by the Hansard; therefore, the statement that I was not in my place cannot be correct. But there is a double proof. I have the Order paper here, and I find that there were 47 motions before mine, and on examining the Hansard I find that these motions were called, one after another, and discussed on each private day, and the very first day that my motion was called, I went on with it. Although I was unparliamentary, I was correct, and if the statement is challenged I have all the figures here to prove it. Not only that, but it so happened that on every Government day I was in my place and spoke. The hon. gentleman stated that I placed these motions on the paper early in the session to take advantage of my colleagues. That statement is not correct, because, as I have said, five weeks had passed: therefore, the statement that I put them there to take advantage of my colleagues falls to the ground. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the reason I delayed putting them on the paper so long was this: I wanted to see what the Government was going to do in regard to the subjects dealt with in these important motions. Now, with regard to the motion I am about to bring before the House. We have some seventy new members in this House: something like one-third is new blood. Last session, my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, in dealing with this matter, said, after he had declared that he could not yield to my motion:

"I do not intend to retreat from the position I have taken on this subject. I will bring the matter before my colleagues again, and, if they feel inclined to change the policy and to extend the provisions of this amended Act for another year, I will not stand in the way; although, at the same time, I may express my opinion in a diametrically opposite sense."

I do not know whether my hon. friend brought this important question of second homesteading before his colleagues, but we shall be very glad indeed to hear of his having brought it before his colleagues and taken the side of justice and not the side of injustice. Mr. Blake spoke on this matter, but, I must say, not with his usual acumen; I suppose his mind had not been directed to the subject, and certainly he hardly understood it. He said:

"The principle of a second homestead having been very much pressed upon the House, it was conceded; but according to the views of those who have the best knowledge of the subject, it proved unsuccessful and was discontinued. I must say that I think the balance of the evidence indicated that it was discontinued too peremptorily."

That was the opinion of Mr. Blake, as a great lawyer, looking at this matter. He continued:

"That a longer day of grace ought to have been given than was given. Although the Minister of the Interior thinks it was a mistake to extend that day, my view was that it was a just and reasonable thing to make that extension—having regard to the position of the existing interests, undefined as they might be—of those who went in on the expectation raised by the adoption of that principle; but I must say, since the House, having decided that the experiment was a failure, and having determined to discontinue it, gave that extension out of regard to certain so-called vested interests, I think the extension was a liberal one and ought to be a final one. I was glad to hear the earlier part of the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior when he announced such a firm conviction as to what the policy of the Government and the House ought to be, but I was sorry when he declared in the end that he would waive and relinquish his policy if the rest of his colleagues differed from him."

So that we hoped, because the Minister's mind was in a state of balance, that if on going back to his colleagues he found his colleagues took the view that the provisions of the Act of 1883 were embodied in pamphlets issued by the Department of Agriculture in 1885, pamphlets scattered broadcast throughout Europe, pamphlets read on the banks of the Rhine, on the banks of the Tweed, pamphlets read all over England and Ireland, on the faith of which men came out here—we hoped under these circumstances the men who signed the petition would be placed in the position that justice suggests they should occupy. When I was interrupted in reading that petition, those petitioners, poor farmers as they are, were going on to say that they had read that pamphlet, and that they had come out in consequence of the representations it contained. In what condition do they find themselves? They look around and see men who came into the country in 1882 getting second homesteads, men who came in during 1882, before the Act giving second homesteads came into existence, those men, such is the farce in consequence of that impulsive repeal of 1886, who came into the country without any motive as to securing a second homestead being before their minds, obtaining second homesteads, while men who came here with the lure and hope of obtaining a second homestead before them cannot get the second homestead. The plea in regard to this matter is, it is a bad policy. That is the first point taken. I told the hon. gentlemen opposite it was a bad policy in 1883. The moment the Act came into my hands—I was out in the North-West at the time, and I think Hon. Mr. Macpherson was either Minister or acting Minister of Interior—I at once sat down and denounced the principle. I said it was a bad principle, that it would give a perambulating settlement. In the name of all that is reasonable then, why did not the Deputy Minister, who is now so strong against second homesteading, go to the Minister and say: There are strong points made against the second homesteading system we are adopting, we must not go on with it, but had better have the measure repealed next year. If that had been done, the extension I obtained in 1887 would have covered all those who came in. But no, although I hammered away for three years, the Act was not repealed until Hon. Thos. White came into office in 1886, and then he repealed it. When he was with me in Regina, I said to him: It is a bad principle, it gives us unsettled settlers, so to speak, men who are looking for another homestead and who are not satisfied with one. But it never occurred to me that when he proceeded to repeal the clause in the Act of 1883 he would not only sweep away utterly the bad principle that had been hatched in the Department of the Interior, but also all the rights that had accrued under that principle. I may tell this House that it will do great harm, in my opinion, if the call of justice, for it is the call of justice, is regarded with deaf ears. And I will tell hon. members why. Some of those who signed that petition are men in whom a prominent member of Parliament in England takes great interest. They are, as I know, in communication with him, and as sure as this House refuses the prayer of their petition now upon the Table, which sets forth that they came out with the promises before them embodied in the pamphlet, pointing out the advantages of Canada as compared with the United States, and setting forth that in Canada they can have two homesteads, that after a man had got his first homestead he could secure a second, an advantage which the United States did not offer; as surely as Parliament denies the justice I demand in the name of these poor men, so surely will the fact be brought before the Imperial Parliament, and so surely will the fact be advertised throughout England and the whole world, that in regard to her obligations to settlers Canada is capable of breaking faith. These are poor men, poor settlers, some of them living in shacks, some living in good cement houses they have raised themselves; but is it because they are poor men, forsooth, their claims of justice are not to be listened to? Are they to be put aside with a wave of the ministerial hand and with a wave of the hand of the Deputy Minister, telling us it is a bad principle, but saying not one word about justice? Not one word is said as to whether they have a just claim or not, only that it is a bad policy, and the department must have revenue. The department must, indeed, have revenue; but I will show before I conclude my motion how the revenue may be made more consonant with the expenditure, and how the expenditure may be cut down; and if we are going to save money, do not let us save it by trying to squeeze a few dollars out of the poor settlers, but by cutting down unnecessary expenses and bringing the department into a state of efficiency. Many men have made mistakes in taking up settlements. We have magnificent lands. We have hundreds of millions of the finest wheat-growing lands in the world. But we have some bad land, and some of those very men who came in after the Act of 1883 was passed made mistakes; and how must they feel when men who came in before the Act was passed, and before the right to a second homestead existed, have taken up second homesteads, which they themselves would have liked to take up, but their hands were tied, and non possumus is the heartless response of the Canadian Government to their demands. Now, these people feel very badly, because my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, as they state in their petition, when he was up there a year or so ago, had a meeting at which he met the people, and at which he stated he would do his best for them. He asked me, as they recite, whether it could be done by Order in Council, and I said: "I am afraid not;" however, the Minister said he would do his best, but, as the people now state in that petition, they fear he has done his very worst for them. In fact I must say that the present Minister of the Interior has shown no sympathy whatever with the settlers in the North-West since he became Minister. One of his great deeds in the management of the department is this: There used to be a means by which a man who left his homestead, either through it being cancelled or by reason of the strenuous pressure of angusta res, had to go to town to earn his livelihood, and by which, if this man left his house behind, the incoming settler would have to pay its value, and the Government would pursue a just and right policy in handing this value over to the outgoing settler. The Government would send an inspector to value the improvements and then they would pay to the outgoing settler, less the cost of inspection, the value of these improvements as received from the incoming settler. That was a just and fair policy. But now we have an heroic policy, we have a policy before which men will bend the knee and lift up eyes of admiration on the magnificent statesmanship that belongs to Canada. That policy now is, that the Government of Canada takes the value of the improvements made by the outgoing settler and puts it in its avaricious pocket. It is a great policy, indeed; but, Sir, the very last man who should be guilty of stooping to such a piece of petty—shall I call it "green-grocery" statesmanship—is the hon. Minister of Interior himself, and I will tell you why. There was a poor man named John Cowan, who was leaving his homestead, and who had erected thereon a fine house. The present Minister of Interior was then Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, and as Lieutenant Governor he was bound, if he should have anything at all to do with them, to be the protector of these settlers. That was the bounden duty his office demanded from him. Cowan's house was worth about $1,200, and the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories bought it for $300. In 1887, J. J. Grant was coming into the Territories, and he fixed on Cowan's section and wanted to go right in there, but there was a block in the way. The Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, a future Minister of the Interior, a wealthy man, would not give the house to Grant unless Grant planked down $600, or 100 per cent. on the purchase. It is not surprising, I think, that we are getting this kind of policy now from the department; and I should mention that I intend to move for the papers in the case of Grant, because I think that Grant is entitled to compensation. Grant came to me and I said to him: "Don't pay a cent more than $300." I at once communicated with Mr. White, and I told him how the matter was, and how the whole Department of the Interior had been made a donkey-engine to the avarice of the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories. I will read later on a letter written by Mr. Smith trying to wring the $600 out of Grant for the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories. I never could get the grasp of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior from the neck of Grant until he was on the eve of entering the Cabinet, and then Mr. Smith came to me flurried and anxious to at once have the thing settled for $300. I wrote to Grant and told him he could pay the $300 if he wanted the place, and he paid that sum. It is a fine house and is worth $1,200. When the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories took that sort of interest in the settlers, I am not at all surpised that he refuses justice in this matter of the second homestead, and that when he proceeds to make great reforms and to swell the income of the Department of the Interior, he swells it by saying: "I will take the value of the improvements of the settler—the poor wretched settler who has had to abandon his place and go to the town, I will confiscate the value of the improvements which was given to the settler in a generous and honest way under previous Administrations." Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want that spirit to prevail in dealing with the settlers of the North-West Territories, and I hope the House will not think me too arrogant when I say that I will not allow it to prevail. Hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches may laugh, but I say to them I will not allow it to prevail, and I will tell these gentlemen who laugh there that there is not power enough in them nor power enough behind them to prevent my crushing down such a policy as that.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is transgressing somewhat the Rules of Order. He is threatening hon. members of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh well, Mr. Speaker, I did not know I was threatening anyone. I thought I was speaking with great suavity. Well, Sir, I entreat the attention of the Government, I entreat the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and I entreat the attention especially of the Minister of Justice, who is a great lawyer, to the case I put. You passed an Act in 1883 in which you declare that any man coming into these territories and taking up a homestead and completing his duties and having obtained a patent, can acquire a second homestead at the end of three years, just the time it was absolutely necessary to spend in fulfilling the conditions to get the patent, and then you sweep the whole thing away. Do not you see that by doing that you made it utterly impossible for any man who came in within the time of the passing of the Act of 1883, and the passing of the Repeal Act of 1886, the only men that in justice appear to be entitled to it, could possibly get a second homestead, whereas men who came in 1881 get a second homestead, because they can fulfil their patent duties before the Repeal Act of 1886 was passed. Now, Sir, when that Act was passed a strict construction was put upon it by Mr. H. H. Smith and Mr. Burgess, and that construction was, that no man could get a second homestead unless he had actually got his patent before the 2nd June, 1886. I looked at the Act and I declared that my interpretation of the Act was that it meant that any man who had fulfilled the duties that entitled him to a second homestead, and had a certificate that he was entitled to a second homestead, could get it, even without a patent. After correspondence with Mr. Smith and Mr. Burgess, a month elapsed and I got a letter from Mr. Burgess saying that the department had come to the conclusion that my view of the Act was the correct one and that the department intended to adopt it. Now, if my view in that case was the correct one, may not my view be the correct one now, and I may say that Mr. Blake was under a mistake in supposing that the House had to do with the extension of time. What happened, as I explained before, and as I explain now for the sake of those hon. gentlemen who have since come into the House, was this: I spoke from my place before dinner, making an argument on the second homestead question. Mr. White got up, and said: "I do not agree with you." After dinner I went over to him, and asked him: "Have you considered my argument?" He answered: "I have, and I see the full force of it." I said: "Then you are going to act on it?" He replied: "How can I? All my colleagues have decided against you." I then said: "It is a curious thing if you cannot carry it out, and you the Minister of the Interior," and I added some humorous remark, and was probably a little harsh. I returned to my seat, where I sat somewhat moody for awhile, and then went over again to Mr. White, and said: "If you will extend it for a year, it will satisfy me." He said to me: "You are not going to give me any bother in the Committee, but will let my Bill go through?" I said: "I will give you all the bother I can if you do not do justice to these people," and I added: "Extend it to 1887, and I will be satisfied." Then he changed the six to seven, making it 1887. That is the way it was done; and I would to Heaven the House to-day would consider the situation. The situation is this: That we put our name to a bond, and when the bond comes due we cancel it. We can do it, because we are a powerful Parliament: but what should be thought of a private individual who would do it? And when you say it is a bad policy, whose bad policy is it? Not the settlers'. It is our bad policy; it is the bad policy of the department itself; and if it will not listen to advice and at once repeal the Act, it is responsible to the country for any additional inconvenience that may occur. The sage manner in which the department first regulated this second homestead matter was by providing that any man, to get it, must take it up within forty miles of where he was settled, which made it necessary that a man would have to leave the other homestead and go forty miles away. We got that changed from forty miles to six miles, and after that from six miles to any land lying near the homestead of the settler; so that at the present time in the settled parts of the North-West, there are not a great many persons who will avail themselves of this privilege if it be given to them. It is a great mistake to suppose that a large amount of land will be taken up. On the contrary, a very small amount will be taken up; but no matter whether it be great or small, it is in the interest of the people of Canada, in the interest of this Parliament, in the interest of the North-West, and in the interest of settlement, that no small considerations of policy should tempt the department or the Government to turn a deaf ear to the claims of justice, and follow the trail of a particularly unjust, severe and ignoble policy.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is the annual motion of the hon. gentleman which he has thought proper, in the interests of his friends in the North-West, to bring before the House. The resolution which he moved last year I do not think was quite so objectionable as the one which he has moved to-day, and before I sit down I will give the reason. The hon. gentleman prefaced his remarks with a reference to the debate which took place in the last session of the last Parliament, and he again made an apology—or, perhaps, it would be better to say an explanation—to the House in reference to the delay of which I accused him last year in bringing his resolution before the House. I presume he makes these remarks to-day because this resolution has been standing on the Orders of the Day for the last three weeks, and in order that his constituents——

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. I was requested each time by the Government not to press my resolutions.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is exactly what I was going to say. He wished, at any rate, that the electors in the North-West should know that the fault was not on his shoulders this year, but was because of a combination of circumstances which occurred, and that the delay took place with the consent of the Government. I acknowledge that that was the reason; but if there is any hon. gentleman in this House to whom it should be a cause of great gratification that that delay took place, it is the hon. gentleman himself. I do not know that I should say why I state that: not only has it been palpable to the members of this House, but it will be palpable to the hon. gentleman's constituents. I shall not refer more particularly to that. It is a painful subject to myself; I am sure it is painful to the hon. gentleman, and I am equally sure it is painful to every hon. member of this House. Now, the hon. gentleman has made a very unfair attack upon me to-day. A most unfair attack has been made upon me; and before I am through, it may be an excuse for me to lay before the country and the hon. gentleman's constituents what we have had to contend with in this House, the first month of this session, so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned. I happen to know, having been in the North-West Territories during the last election, what occurred there during that election, and what did occur is what makes it more painful to myself and more painful to the hon. gentleman and his friends that he should have made such an exhibition of himself as he has during this session. With reference to the personal matter which the hon. gentleman has made the basis of an accusation against me, I shall give the House the whole history of that transaction. During several seasons in the North-West, the hon. gentleman knows the weather was dry and unfortunate for the settlers, and for two or three years in succession the district to the north-west of Regina, along the borders of Long Lake, had been exceptionally dry; and the gentleman referred to, Mr. John Cowan, a most respectable man, a man with one of the largest families in the North-West Territories, and who brought into the country capital which he invested in stock, commenced to build this grand house of which the hon. gentleman speaks, and it was a very good house for the time and the locality. He had built a frame house on substantial sills and had not completed it when he came to the conclusion that he had made a mistake in settling in that part of the country, because he found it unfit for agricultural pursuits. Therefore he and some other friends and relatives, numbering forty or fifty people, made up their minds to remove their location to a point west of Calgary. Mr. Cowan had arranged with his neighbours to transport the whole of their goods and cattle, and they had started and were on the road some three weeks, when he came to me and said: Governor, I have a house partly finished on my homestead with which I cannot do anything. It is all that is keeping me here and I am anxious to overtake my people on the road. Will you give me something for it and let me go. I asked him what it was worth. He said: It cost me $1,000, but I will take anything for it. Well, I said: I have not seen it and know nothing about it, but will give you $300. I bought the house because on the banks of Long Lake there are beautiful places where many of us proposed to build houses for summer residences. I bought the house intending to move it down to the banks of the lake, thinking the Long Lake Railway would be built and a steamer put on the lake. When I found, however, that the railway was not going to be constructed, I made up my mind not to build on the lake. In the meantime a gentleman, Mr. Grant by name, came to my office and asked me to sell him the house, as he could get an entry for the homestead on which it was. He offered me $500 for it, and I told him I would take $600. The bargain was not struck, and he went away for some weeks. When he came back he said he had found out that I could not move the house, as it was a homestead, without the permission of the Government, and that he would not give me $500, but only the money I had paid for it. That is the whole story. I tried to get the $500, but could not get more than $300. I found that, under the land regulations, I could not enter for the homestead myself, nor could I get any friend to enter for it, and the only way I could obtain a refund was to allow this man to make an entry for it, the Government protecting me to the extent of the amount I had paid. Had the hon. gentleman spoken to Mr. Cowan on the subject he would not have undertaken this case, because he would have been told that I had done Mr. Cowan a charitable action. He would have been informed that I had assisted Mr. Cowan, after repeated requests, as he wanted to get off with his cattle and take up a new home, which he has done, and I am happy to say, successfully. With reference to the statement as to money expended for improvements on lands by homesteaders having been at one time returned to the settler, as far as my knowledge goes, it was never given to the settler. The improvements have been valued, and the money has always been paid to the Receiver General for the benefit of the Government: and since I have had the honour of administering the affairs of this department no change has been made in that respect. With respect to the second homestead, the hon. gentleman last year asked that these homestead regulations, which had already been extended twice, might again be extended. After I objected, as I had done in the previous session, the hon. gentleman, feeling that the House would not support him in his contention, withdrew his resolution. The resolution of the hon. gentleman to-day asks that all settlers who have come into the country between the 1st June, 1883, and the 2nd June, 1886, should, on completing their improvements, be granted the second homesteads. That would be re-opening the whole question, and be far more objectionable than the gentleman's resolution of last year. The simple history of the homestead question is this: that in the early days it was thought that, by adopting this system, a number of people who had carried out their homestead conditions, might be kept in the country. At the time this was first recommended to the department, some of the officials expressed their views against it. They were uncertain as to its success, but it was pressed so strongly by gentlemen living in the east that the Government were convinced there might be something in it, and allowed the second homestead privilege. It was shown, after very few years, to my predecessor, the late Mr. White, when he was travelling through the country, that it was most objectionable, as it had depopulated certain sections, and the boards of trade in the settlements which these parties had left expressed themselves against the second homestead system, and were asking that some means should be taken to re-settle the abandoned districts. I hold in my hand a paper dated no later than the 22nd of this month, in which it is stated:

"Mr. Davin is going to move that settlers located in the Territories between June, 1883, and June, 1886, be granted second homesteads. These second homesteads occasionally, but not always, benefit the men who get them, but the experience of the districts where they have been most freely granted is that they are an unmitigated curse to the counties they lie in, the deserted farms standing in the way of local improvements, because the number of farms abandoned on this account is far in excess of the demand for them."

Mr. LAURIER. What paper is that from?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Saskatchewan Herald of 22nd May. I do not propose, as I stated before, to give way on this matter, and certainly not in the direction the hon. gentleman has asked the House to accept in this resolution of his. If we were to allow the further extension the hon. gentleman has asked, we should be precluded from making any amendments to our Land Act at all. Every man who felt aggrieved would come to us and would want to be placed in the position of the original holder, and we would be precluded from making any amendments whatever to the Land Act. I think the Land Act has been tinkered with more than it should have been, I think it is more complex than it should be, and I think it should be made as plain and simple as possible, so that every settler may understand it. Complications have arisen under the different regulations which have been made, and difficulties have been caused thereby. I hope to simplify the Land Act, and to some extent I hope to do that before we separate. I suggest that it would be better for the hon. gentleman, if he sees fit, to move an amendment, when I introduce my amendments to the Land Act, and take the sense of the House on that question. In the meantime I shall oppose his motion, and I hope that my friends will do the same.

Mr. DAVIN. I doubt very much if the hon. gentleman's memory is accurate in regard to this transaction. I have letters here which will show exactly how the thing stood, and I shall subsequently move for the papers so that they may be made official, though I have them all here. This is strictly germane to the question before the House, and I will tell you why. The reason that the Minister of the Interior now seizes on the improvements on the homesteads is because they are escheats to the Crown—they belong to the Crown. But it makes all the difference whose ox is gored. The point I want to make is this: that, when he was interested, because he had bought the improvements of an outgoing settler, the department conveniently took the view, Mr. Smith conveniently took the view that they were not escheats to the Crown at all, but that a man buying an improvement on a cancelled homestead, although it was the land of the Government, was the proprietor of that improvement. Here is a letter, dated 10th November, 1887, written by Mr. Commissioner Smith to myself in regard to this matter, because I had correspondence with Mr. White and Mr. Smith about it. This man, when he found he could not get the land for $300, went to the office at Regina and said: "I want to leave the country, give me back my deposit;" and they would not give him back his deposit. At last he came back here, having lost the best year we have ever had in the North-West, in consequence of the action as told in a plain unvarnished tale, told with so much dignity and truthfulness, by the Minister of the Interior. Mr. Smith wrote:

"I have no objection to his retaining it for the $300 he has already paid."

Everything was accepted. The $300 was paid in to Mr. Stevenson. It was a matter of course that he had to pay the amount that Cowan had sold it for, and he had to go on. If anyone else in the North-West Territories had been in it, Grant would have had his entry in 1887, but there was a special person in it over whom a Divine Providence was spreading his wings—a child of fortune. My Lord Bacon tells us that "some men are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." To which class the hon. gentleman belongs the House can infer. The letter of Mr. Smith says:

"I have no objection to his retaining it for the $3 0 he has already paid, provided Mr. Dewdney—"

Mark you this——"provided Mr. Dewdney is agreeable to that arrangement, of course the house being the property of Mr. Dewdney and not of the department."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask whether, on the question raised by this motion, it is proper to discuss private transactions as between Mr. Dewdney on one side and Mr. Grant and Mr. Stevenson on the other? The hon. member has discussed this subject, he has received the answer of the Minister of the Interior, and I submit that he should not discuss this particular question any further when it cannot have any possible relation to the subject-matter of this resolution.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course, any suggestion from the hon. and learned gentleman the Minister of Justice, I would be very unwilling to controvert for a minute, but may I point out to him that the Minister of the Interior has made a statement about this matter. The time to raise the point of order was when I first raised this question, and the Minister of the Interior has made a statement in regard to it which, I submit, shows a defective memory on his part.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman says I might have interfered sooner, but, if it has no relevancy to his resolution, it is out of order now as well as at any other time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was about to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he was not keeping very closely to the question. I thought that at the outset when he dealt with this matter, but I thought that perhaps it would turn out to have some bearing on the motion. So far as I can see, I do not think it has any bearing on the question at issue which the hon. gentleman has raised by his motion.

Mr. DAVIN. I submit, with all due respect to the hon. and learned gentleman, whether it is not admissible to address the argumentum ad hominem to a Minister of the Crown. I am speaking to the point of order. I thought this was relevant for this reason——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will see—

Mr. DAVIN. I am arguing the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is too late. My own opinion is that there is no relevancy as to the transaction between the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories and Mr. Grant in connection with the question of a second homestead.

Mr. DAVIN. Then I will go on with the reply to the other part of the speech, but I may say that I will bring up this whole transaction and move for the papers at a future time. Now, I had pointed out that the Minister of the Interior, on a previous occasion, was incorrect. I have all the dates here He made a statement there that was wholly incorrect. It so happens that from the moment I put those motions on the paper the last time, there was not a day that I did not speak in the House, as can be shown by the Hansard, and some times I spoke at great length. Now, the same malice, the same petty malice, the same small-minded malice, that inspired the remarks of last year, has exuded—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, am I out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will agree with me that he is going a little too far, that he is straining the point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. Really, Mr. Speaker, I have had a good deal of experience in a great Parliament, as great a Parliament as this, and I did not know that an hon. gentleman can be called to order for using the verb exude.

Mr. SPEAKER. My hon. friend ought not to make use of that expression in an accusation that the Minister of Interior was actuated by malice.

Mr. DAVIN. Then I would say that the hon. Minister of the Interior was actuated by Christian charity; I say that the Minister of the Interior palpably showed himself, in the early part of that speech, to be a gentleman, a thorough gentleman, a truthful gentleman, a gentleman so truthful that his remarks created astonishment in the minds, and led to exclamations on the part of everybody around me here. He knows well that the words he has uttered will be taken by a little clique that belongs to himself up there, that they will be misconstrued, and that conclusions will be based upon them wholly false, as everybody round me here knows. I say that the implications and the suggestions of the early part of that speech were—What shall I say? Well, they were the implications and the suggestions of a perfect gentleman, of a man of the most truthful character, of a man to whom malice is a stranger, of a man who could not possibly take advantage of a poor settler. Now, if the hon. gentleman wishes any further eulogy, he can have it. In regard to this question, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman sees a difference between my motion of last year and the present motion. Well, Sir, I may not understand my own language, and I may not be able to understand a proposition when stated, although it has been my business to use the English language, and to criticize the English language for twenty-five years. I suppose the hon. gentleman will be surprised to hear that my motion of last year means precisely the same as my motion this year, although the reading is not exactly the same. The motion this year calls for the rights of those who came in between 1883 and 1886, under the Act of 1883; the motion last year called for no more and no less. But the acute mind of the hon. Minister of the Interior, that piercing glance that belongs to him, sees at once a great difference. Of course, I am only a poor humble member of this House, not a great statesman, and I cannot see any such difference in the language that a statesman can see; but I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I tell the House, that these motions mean precisely one and the same thing. Now I address an appeal once more to this House. There are 70 new members here. I appeal to the members of the Conservative party, who have been appealed to, in a sense, by the Minister of the Interior. He said he would ask his friends to vote with him. Well, let me say to the Conservative members of this House: On considering this matter, if you feel that there is justice on the side of these settlers, will you think that the mere call and beck of the Minister of the Interior is enough to turn you away from the demands of justice on the part of those settlers? I say to the Reformers around me: You have heard the argument, and I hope you will stand by the people of the North-West Territories and their just demands.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We always do.

Mr. DAVIN. I address now especially the members of the same party as myself. I address the Conservative party. There is no confidence or non-confidence implied in this motion. If you affirm that those persons are entitled to what they were promised under the Act of 1883, then the Government will have to embody it in a small Bill; or even if there is a strong expression of opinion in this House, though this motion may not be carried, the Government will have to embody this in a Bill. I do hope, therefore, that when it comes to be voted on hon. gentlemen will vote on the side of justice.

Mr. LAURIER. The House, in my opinion, should remember that the principle which is involved in this motion is not the principle of a general policy. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) does not propose that the House should at all depart from the policy which now obtains in the North-West Territories with regard to the settlement of land; but he points out very forcibly, in my opinion, that certain men may be suffering injustice if they are not granted what he now claims for them. What he now claims for them is that the provisions of the law, such as they existed when these men settled in the North-West Territories, should be carried out in their entirety. By the Act of 1883 the settlers in the Territories were allowed a second homestead. The object of Parliament, I suppose, in granting a second homestead was to induce settlers to go in there. So far as my knowledge goes, on the other side of the line settlers are only entitled to one homestead and nothing more. This Parliament granted a second homestead obviously for the purpose of inducing settlers to go in there, and it is to be presumed that when they came in and settled, they expected they would have a second homestead instead of having only one, as on the other side of the line. Now, for some reason or other, which I do not question here, the law was altered in 1886, and we came back to the provisions which obtained before, that settlers should be entitled only to one homestead; and the hon. gentleman now asks, not for any departure from the law as it now exists, but he submits that it would be only fair, just and equitable that these settlers, who settled under the law of 1883, and from that year up to 1886, when the law was altered, should be treated exactly as they expected to be treated when they went into the territory. Now, this can apply only to a dozen or two dozen cases, and not more. What reason can there be why this should not be granted? There is certainly a measure of justice and of equity, which must strike every man in this House, in the plea that every settler who went into those territories on the faith of the Canadian Parliament, expecting that he would receive certain privileges on certain conditions, should not be deceived, but that the promises made to him by the Canadian Parliament should be kept. This is simply what is now asked by my hon. friend. What is asked is, not that this law should apply to sales which occurred in 1886, but simply within the years 1883, 1884, 1885 and up to 1886, when the law was altered. In the name of justice, equity and common sense what reason is there why this should not be granted? Certainly land is not scarce in the North-West, for we have an abundance of it, and we know certainly, after the speech of the hon. gentleman, there were many reasons why settlers would not go into our North-West if what is said is true, for settlers have suffered many seasons of drought and met with other difficulties. Under these circumstances it seems to me that Parliament would do only what is just and fair by granting the motion of my hon. friend. After all, the motion affects only a few men, and it is better in point of policy that no man should be able to complain that the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian Government have not dealt with them fairly and justly and granted all to which they are entitled. Such a measure of equity and justice is embodied in the motion of the hon. gentleman. I feel bound to support it. I was sorry to hear the Minister of the Interior appeal to his friends to reject the motion. I could understand such action if this were a matter affecting the policy of the Government, or suggesting that the policy be altered. But nothing of the kind is proposed. It simply sets forth, that a few hundreds of acres should be granted to men who came to the country in the belief that they would obtain it, and certainly they should obtain it.

Mr. WATSON. As this is a matter regarding past legislation, I desire to say a few words in regard to it. In 1883, when the Land Act was introduced, I strongly supported second homesteads, as did all the members from Manitoba, the North-West Territories not having representation in the House. We must all admit and regret that the Act proved a failure, inasmuch as people did not come into the country as we expected. It was thought at that time that settlers who had fulfilled the conditions of their original homesteads would sell out to other people, proceed further west, take up second homesteads, and thus act as pioneers in the North-West. Unfortunately, from several causes, this did not occur, one of the causes being the vacillating land policy of the Government, under which the land regulations were frequently changed, and, indeed, I believe one of the greatest causes of the discontent in the North-West during the past ten years has been this vacillating land policy. To my mind, the best land regulation was that by which 160 acres of homestead were granted on three years' settlement. But the Government changed that. Not only have people who expected to obtain a second homestead grievances, but those who have only 80 acres have grievances likewise. Other people who came out later were able to take up 160 acres of homestead and 160 acres of pre-emption. These changes have been very annoying. As has been stated by hon. members, it would be well to carry out the conditions and pledges made to settlers and give them all the privileges promised by the Government in pamphlets and circulars distributed in the old country. There are not many people in Manitoba who would avail themselves of the second homestead privilege, comparatively few of them having settled during the years mentioned in the resolution. These men mainly settled in the neighbourhood of Regina. I was very sorry to hear the reference made by the Minister of the Interior to the very inhospitable region where a man built a house costing $1,200 and sold it for $300. I did not think there were such places in the North-West. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says Mr. Grant has found it one of the best homesteads in the country. I hope he has found a good house also. The policy pursued in regard to large land corporations has proved a failure in the North-West. The Government apparently wish to get all they can from the sale of the lands. I have always thought it would be much better to throw the odd sections open to actual settlers than to sell them for the paltry sum of $2 or $2.50 per acre. It can be clearly demonstrated that it would be much better to dispose of them to actual settlers on colonizing conditions than to speculators. We have at present a very bad state of affairs prevailing in Manitoba in consequence of a large quantity of the land granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company having been sold to the North-West Land Company. Those lands cannot be taxed because the title has not been vested in the present owners. Very great hardship has been inflicted on Manitoba by the disallowance of an Act whereby the Local Legislature were to take authority to compel the land corporations to pay taxes on unoccupied lands held for speculative purposes. I believe the land would be very much better in the hands of the settlers, even second homesteaders, than in the hands of the speculators to-day. Sympathizing with the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and feeling that injustice has been done to those people who were promised second homesteads, while not agreeing with the principle as a rule, I support the motion that the people who came to the North-West in consequence of pledges given by the Government should obtain a second homestead.

Mr. TISDALE. While I have a good deal of sympathy with the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) I think it would stand a much better chance of being favourably dealt with if the mover adopted the suggestion of the Minister and allowed it to stand over to come up as an amendment to the Bill. I must confess that while I am opposed, and always was opposed to the principle of second homesteads, there seems to be a great deal of justice in the cases presented to-day. As to the number of them, as to the particular effect they may have on subsequent legislation, how far they may open the door to other special cases under special circumstances, I am not sufficiently informed to express an opinion. While sincerely desirous of promoting an honest investigation of the subject, I think the motion will stand a much better chance of being fully and properly discussed if it is postponed until such time as there might be a full debate on it, with full information, and if this is done I promise to give it my most earnest and serious consideration.

Mr. MACDOWALL, So far as the North-West is concerned in regard to this question, I am of the opinion that the large majority of the people are opposed to the principle of second homesteads. I recollect when the question came up in 1887, at a meeting held at which the Minister of the Interior and the North-West members were present——

Mr. DAVIN. We are all opposed to the principle. I am opposed to the principle of second homesteads.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I am glad to hear the hon. member say he is opposed to the principle, because it is thus so much easier to settle the question of which he is speaking. During the debate which took place on 11th June, 1887, when this question was raised, I made the following remarks :—

"I believe this clause as it stands would satisfy most of the people of the North-West, and I trust that if there should be any case of hardship, every member of this House, on whatever side he sits, will support the hon. Minister of the Interior in meeting such a case. I know that in introducing a new system we cannot expect to benefit the general public without doing some injury to a few; and if a few are injured in this case, I have no doubt that their cases could be provided for by means of an Order in Council. But we ought to oppose the creation of a second class of speculators by means of second homesteads, which would be totally inconsistent with the principle of the Dominion Lands Act. The principle of that Act as I take it, is that the Dominion Government offer lands to actual settlers who will come into the country and make it their home, and by doing that contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the country. But if in this way you bonus speculators, as it were, by locking up the most valuable lands in the country, I believe you will be committing a great mistake."

When I said that, Mr. White nodded his head across the House in assent that the question could be settled in this manner. The consequence was, that this, if it were done, would have got over the whole difficulty which the hon. gentleman has raised. To show that the people of the North-West are not in sympathy with this resolution of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) I will quote a paragraph from a recent copy of the Saskatchewan Herald. That paper says :

"Mr. Davin is going to move that settlers located in the Territories between June, 1883, and June, 1886, be granted second homesteads. These second homesteads occasionally, but not always, benefit the men who get them, but the experience of the districts where they have been most freely granted is that they are an unmitigated curse to the counties they lie in, the deserted farms standing in way of local improvements, because the number of farms abandoned on this account is far in excess of the demand for them."

There is also a further objection to the resolution of the hon. member to be found in the fact that the whole spirit of the sentiment of the people of the North-West is against the land of that country being locked up in the hands of speculators. It is natural for us to speculate and we cannot help having speculators, but at the same time ought we to go out of our way to create a new class of speculators ; a class that possibly may be a pauper class of speculators, and not a class with wealth to develop the country in any way. Though an injury may appear to be done some settlers, yet in carrying out a broad policy for the benefit of the whole country there are generally instances where individuals suffer. And though there may be some sufferers, yet the hon. gentleman should never, in the interest of the North-West Territories, advocate the principle of granting second homesteads.

Mr. DALY. In regard to the wording of the resolution before the House, I would point out to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that he must admit that if the final portion of his motion were carried into effect it would, I believe, be the cause of a great deal of injustice to a large class of persons. The resolution reads :

"That, whereas in 1883 an Act was passed granting second homesteads to those settlers who had completed the conditions of the first homestead entry; and whereas in 1886 an Act was passed abolishing the policy of second homesteads; and whereas in 1887 an Act was passed which acknowledged the principle and right of those second homesteads, it should now be enacted that all those settlers who came in between 1st June, 1883, and 2nd June, 1886, should, on completing their improvements, be granted a second homestead."

That explicitly states that any person might go into the North-West in 1884, and never having taken up a homestead, nor never having made a homestead entry, yet, after the passing of that resolution and the legislation which will be founded upon it, he could now make a homestead entry and he would be entitled to a second homestead upon the completion of his duty. I would much desire that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) should comply with the wishes of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) and allow this resolution to stand until such time as the Bill which the Minister of the Interior is about to introduce to amend the Act, is brought before the House. A provision could then be made in the Bill dealing with peculiar cases such as the hon. gentleman refers to, by giving the Minister of the Interior power to arrange them under an Order in Council. I do not know that in the large district which I represent there are many settlers in the same position in which the hon. gentleman states settlers in his district are in. I would be sorry to see any injustice done to any settler in Manitoba or the North-West Territories. I would like to see the settlers whom the hon. gentleman represents get justice in the matter ; but when he has further considered the matter, I think he will come to the conclusion that what he desires can be better obtained by an amendment to the Dominion Lands Act than by this resolution. The hon. gentleman has had the benefit of a discussion on the subject this afternoon, he has heard the views of different members from the North-West, and I think it would be better in the interest of himself and in the interest of the settlers whom he represents, that he should allow the matter to stand until the Minister of the Interior brings down the Bill to amend the Dominion Lands Act. Now, Sir, clause 5 of the Dominion Lands Act of 1887, says :

"5. Clause forty-three of the said Act is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor :—

"43. No person who has obtained a homestead patent or a certificate countersigned by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands or a member of the Dominion Lands Board, as in the next preceding clause mentioned, shall be entitled to obtain another homestead entry; provided, however, that any person who, on the 2nd June in the year 1887, had obtained a homestead patent, or a certificate of recommendation for a patent, countersigned by the Commissioner of the Dominion Lands, or who had complied with the homestead provisions of the Acts then in force relating to the Dominion Lands, entitling him to such a certificate, or any person who has been permitted, under the terms of section 38, 'Dominion Lands Act, 1883,' to create a charge upon his homestead, and had completed his homestead duties on the said second day of June, 1887, shall be permitted to make a second homestead entry."

By that clause the hon. gentleman will see that any person who, before the 2nd of June, 1887, had obtained a homestead patent, or a certificate of recommendation, could get a second homestead.

Whatever sympathy I might have with the hon. gentleman and his resolution, I cannot vote for it as it is now worded. It says:

"And whereas in 1887 an Act was passed which acknowledged the principle and right of those second homesteads, it should now be enacted that all those settlers who came in between 1st June, 1883, and 2nd June, 1886, should, on completing their improvements, be granted a second homestead."

By this provision he would include a class which I am sure he does not desire to protect. If his resolution read according to the Act I think that justice will be done to these people. I again express the hope that the hon. gentleman will allow the question to stand until the Bill is introduced.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) is a very practical one indeed. The hon. member who has the resolution in hand will notice that it amounts to nothing more than the affirmation of a principle which would require a statute subsequently to carry it out. The hon. gentleman has laid upon the Table of the House to-day a petition which he has drawn my attention to in the course of the remarks which he made, and it seems to me that he was under the impression, if I correctly understood his remarks, that this petition would disclose cases of real hardship and cases which appeal to our sense of equity with regard to the administration of the old law as to second homesteads. It is impossible we can give consideration to that subject to-day. It is impossible we can give consideration to claims which, the hon. gentleman says, are advanced for the first time in a petition presented to-day. As the hon. the leader of the Opposition said a few moments ago, we are not asked to legislate with respect to the general principle of second homesteads, but we are asked to provide redress for particular cases. I think the hon. gentleman, therefore, will see that by pressing his resolution this afternoon he could expect to make no practical progress, because the matter would have to be made a subject of legislation. The hon. gentleman, even if his motion met with defeat this afternoon, would no doubt renew the discussion when the North-West Territories Land Act comes under the consideration of this House. In endorsing the suggestion which came from my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), and which was supported by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), I do not wish to be so uncandid as to lead the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to suppose that we are urging that proposal upon him with any promise that the policy of the Government in this regard will be changed. That must depend, of course, on the proof which he is able to show, or the proof which the document he has presented will be able to show, as regards the merits of each particular case. As regards the principle of this resolution I may say, that for the present, I am entirely unconvinced that it is a sound one for this House to adopt. The hon. leader of the Opposition has based his remarks solely on the ground that we ought to be gracious and generous in regard to the large territory which is at our disposal, and in relation to which persons may have claims that they have suffered considerable hardship. That may be all very true. There is nothing so easy as to make a case for an individual against the Government in relation either to grants of money or grants of land when anything like hardship can be shown to have existed; but it is the bounden duty of those who sit here charged with the duties of administration, unpopular and ungracious as it may seem, to take the side of the Crown and insist that unless a a claim comes within the terms of the law, it shall not be recognized. When I say within the terms of the law, I admit that in administering the public domain, as in administering the public revenue, we ought not to bind ourselves by strict technicalities of the law, but we ought to give a claimant the benefit of any consideration which in a court of equity would entitle him to relief. But what is the position these claimants occupy? I am speaking not of any individual case that may be made out, because I do not know the merits of any individual case; and I do not wish to prejudice any claim that any individual may show himself to have possessed under the Act before it was repealed; but what is involved in this resolution is the position of these claimants as a class. As I understand it, their position is this: In 1883 this Parliament enacted that a settler who went on lands in the North-West, made a homestead entry, and performed all his homestead duties, extending over three years, would have the right, upon the completion of all these homestead duties, to apply for a second homestead. That remained the law for three years, and during that period Parliament became fully convinced that it was an unsound system and an unwise policy, and must be put an end to. The policy, therefore, is admittedly a bad one, as the hon. gentleman admits, and as I understand he was of opinion at the outset. Now, who had any vested interest to entitle him to complain that that policy was not continued? Not a single man who had not completed his homestead entry when the Act was repealed; because such a man not only had no right to a second homestead, but he had no right to apply for one; not only had he no vested interest to apply for a second homestead, but his right to apply for one had never accrued. But subsequently, and in order that no claims and no outstanding rights could possibly be prejudiced, the time was extended for a whole year, and those who had completed their homestead duties in 1886 were given a year in which to apply for a second homestead, and the hon. gentleman admits that he was satisfied with that concession in 1887 when he asked the Minister of the Interior of that time to make it. But what is the principle on which his resolution of to-day is founded? It is that every one who had made his homestead entry between 1883 and 1886, although he had not performed his homestead duties when the Act was repealed, and although no right had accrued to him to apply for a second homestead at all, should now for the first time, out of bountiful sentiments and charitable considerations, be considered to have acquired that right by the mere circumstance that he came to the country, made a settlement there, and possibly had hopes that the existing law with regard to second homesteads would not be repealed. I submit that those who come to this country and who settle here undoubtedly have a right to expect permanence and security as regards the right to property which they may acquire from time to time; but they have no right to expect that the laws of the country will not be changed—that the Customs laws, or the Excise laws, or the provincial laws will not be changed. It might as well be claimed on behalf of these settlers that inasmuch as it was shown to them before they came here that the provincial and municipal taxes were very light, they had a right to expect that they would not be increased. They came to the country, I admit, entitled to security as regards the vested rights they should acquire from time to time; but when no rights had accrued to them, they had no just reason to demand that the laws of the country ought not to be changed with regard to the mode of acquiring property in the future. We have also to consider another circumstance—that this policy was well considered in 1886, and also in 1887 under the hon. gentleman's own supervision. I think the subject has been brought up almost every year since. Last year it was well discussed by the hon. gentleman himself, Mr. Blake, and by the present Minister of the Interior; and the House came to the determination that this resolution—because the hon. gentleman says it is practically the same—ought not to be adopted by the House; and the most forcible statement made, I think—with all deference to the forcible way in which the hon. gentleman presented the case of those with whom he sympathizes—was presented by Mr. Blake when he found fault with us for indicating that any proposal to change the policy would even be considered. He called the attention of the House to the fact that the North-West Council had petitioned to have the law changed in the way that the hon. gentleman now proposes; my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior intimated that he would take the opinion of his colleagues on the question again, upon which Mr. Blake remarked that it would be better for the Minister of the Interior to have answered the Council thus: "That thing shall stand in its present place, or I shall not remain in my place;" and Mr. Blake said, with great force, that we perhaps had been hasty in repealing the law, that perhaps it would have been better to have given a little longer time, but that having fixed the day for repeal, it would be most unwise to adopt a vacillating policy and give those encouragement to think that rights which were not possessed in 1883 would be granted to them, based on the new principle that the right to a second homestead would accrue not only to those who had completed the settlement duties of the first homestead, but to those who had begun them. I see serious grounds for doubting the propriety of reversing the policy adopted in 1886, 1887, 1888 and 1890; and, subject to any claims for which the hon. gentleman may be able to give good reasons with regard to individual cases, I submit that the proposal made by my hon. friend is a more reasonable one, and one of a more practical business character, than the one contained in the hon. gentleman's motion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that no better opportunity can occur than this for the House to say what are its views on the subject before us, and if the hon. Minister of the Interior proposes to introduce legislation on the subject at a later period of the session, he will have the opinion of the House to guide him in preparing the Bill. I see no such objections to the resolution which the hon. gentleman has submitted as those presented by the hon. Minister of Justice. What are the demands of this resolution? The fact is that a number of settlers went into Manitoba and the North-West Territories between 1883 and 1886, and took up homesteads, with the assurance that upon completing their improvements and being entitled to their patent, they acquired a right, if they saw proper, to take up a second homestead. It seems to me that the moment these parties entered their names in the Dominion Lands office for the first homesteads, they obtained the pledge of this House that upon the completion of the improvements and residence on the first homestead for a certain length of time, they should be entitled to a second homestead. The Parliament thought proper to repeal the law; but Parliament has no right to take away the right it promised these people they should enjoy upon the completion of the first homestead. If Parliament acted unwisely in the adoption of that rule, that was a very good reason for repealing the law, but so far as these parties are concerned, who went there under this assurance, founded on the statute, they have a vested right. Supposing a party was there two years, nine months and twenty-nine days and had made his improvements, he could not apply for his patent and could not apply for admission to enter a second homestead, because a statute is passed repealing the right of a second homestead, and the Minister said there is no vested right. I think there is a moral right on the part of the party to claim that this House, acting for the community at large, shall keep its promises and fulfil its obligations, and cannot relieve itself of those obligations by repealing the statute. The general principle laid down is sound that Parliament ought to keep its promises, and that those parties who acquired their first homestead while the statute was in force, are entitled, on the completion of their improvements, to the second homestead, whether any other party coming in subsequently be so entitled or not. That being the case, the House ought to support the resolution of the hon. member, and then it will be for the Minister of the Interior to give effect to his views when he proposes the measure to which he refers. I might be disposed, personally, to go further than the hon. gentleman has gone. I never saw any good reason for adopting the policy of giving the settler two homesteads at the same time; but I have never been able to understand why a man who has acquired a homestead and obtained his patent should not, after disposing of it, be at liberty to acquire a second homestead and remain a settler if he sees proper. At an early period I adopted that view, and I see no reason to change it. It is not a question of repealing a statute which gave a party the right to acquire two homesteads without having parted with the first; but it is a question as to whether we are to keep faith with those who came into the country while such statute was in force. The hon. gentleman, by his resolution, asks us to keep faith with those parties, and I think that is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. TROW. If there are a few isolated cases, as mentioned by the leader of the Government, in the North-West and Manitoba, of parties who are entitled to a second homestead, I see no reason why this resolution should be objected to by the Government. If we are to have sympathy with anybody, it is with the honest and poor settlers. We have an abundance of land, and have, under the statute, given them a vested right to a second homestead if they have performed the duties on the first. I approved of the second homestead law at the time, and still approve of it for various reasons. In the first place, the pioneer in any country—not merely the North-West and Manitoba, but Ontario—generally becomes exhausted of all surplus funds after clearing a few acres and putting up some temporary buildings for shelter to themselves and family. Another settler comes along with a few hundred dollars cash, who is anxious to procure a homestead for himself where he can place his family immediately under shelter without delay, and who is willing to buy the other man's improvements. You have, therefore, a settler placed on the first homestead, and by your pernicious act, in refusing a second homestead, the original settler is driven from the country. I know that there are scores of our settlers who have taken up lands in Dakota where they could procure a homestead, and who would have remained in Manitoba and the North-West had they been able to secure a second homestead. I believe the grievance stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia is worthy of the consideration of the Government. We have nothing to lose and everything to gain by allowing our people every advantage to which they are entitled under the law.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have had some little experience in a matter analogous to this in the free grant district of Ontario, and have more than once had occasion to denounce what I thought was the unjust conduct of the Provincial Government in departing by subsequent legislation from the conditions upon which settlers had occupied their lands, and under which they had acquired rights equivalent to those acquired in the case under our consideration; and I am not at all prepared, by my vote in this House or elsewhere, to say that a different rule ought to be applied to provincial legislation of a similar character to what ought to be applied to Dominion legislation in the North-West, unless I am clearly convinced, which I am not so far by the remarks of the Minister of Justice, that these people, who entered on certain conditions, have forfeited their right to the fulfilment of these conditions. I cannot avoid, therefore, voting for the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia. At the same time I think that the suggestion made by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) is a good one, and that there may be difficulties which we do not at present fully realize in the discussion so far. I would very much prefer that the suggestion should be adopted, but am not prepared to say that a man who entered the North-West or elsewhere upon the faith that one system would be applied to him should lose his right so acquired, simply because the Government thought proper, for very good reasons, to alter that system.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that when travelling through the North-West, from information I received throughout the country, I can fully agree in what has been said by the hon. member for Saskatchewan, that one of the great evils which had to be contended with out there was this moving about of settlers from place to place after they had made a few improvements on their lots. I came to the conclusion that the privilege of a second homestead was a very bad one and should never have been adopted. It resulted in settlers leaving lots after a little ploughing had been done, and some crops taken off, and then selling out their claims to some people from Ontario, or other parts of the country, and going elsewhere to get a second homestead. The result of it was that the country was thinned of its population, that these places grew up with weeds, and that the country was disfigured. In many cases it left the people without the settlement they had expected would continue when they went into the locality, and deprived them of the assistance they anticipated in organizing and building their schools. It was claimed that this second homestead policy was a mistake, and I think it was. Possibly some one might settle in a locality which was not suitable for a farm, but I do not think there are many people, especially those coming from the older settlements, who would not know the nature of the soil and would make such a mistake. I believe that the Government ought to deal with each case on its merits, and I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) should allow his motion to remain until the Land Act is under consideration. Then, if he cannot get the redress to which the parties for whom he is working are entitled, it will be right for him to take such action as he thinks necessary to accomplish the objects he has in view. I do not think any object can be accomplished by this resolution now, and I believe this would open the door to a great number of claims for second homesteads from all parts of the country, many of which we know nothing about to-day, and it would be a very troublesome thing and not at all for the benefit of the country. If the hon. member were to take the course suggested, I believe he would receive a larger support than he will to-night.

Mr. GERMAN. I would probably not occupy the time of the House on this subject were it not for the fact that I have friends who have interests in the North-West which may be affected by this resolution. It has been stated that, if this resolution were carried, it would have no effect. I believe that, if this resolution is carried by a majority of the representatives of the people, they will force the Government to pass such legislation as will give it effect. It has been said that we will have bogus claims put in from parties who have no just rights to second homesteads. There is no force in that, from the fact that the date of the homesteading of every piece of land in the North-West Territories is, I presume, known to the Government, so that they can easily tell whether the claim is bogus or not. It is stated that no vested rights are interfered with, but I contend that vested rights are interfered with, and that the Government, by their legislation in 1887, acknowledged that vested rights were interfered with when they extended the period for second homesteads for one year, giving the settlers who had come in a year after the passage of the Repeal Act, that is, those who came in in 1884, the right to a second homestead. If those who came in in 1884 had a right to a second homestead, why have not those who came in in 1885 or in 1886 a similar right, and that is all this resolution asks. We have ample territory to give to these people second homesteads without any injury to this country or detriment to its welfare. The hon. the Minister of Justice says that the people have no right to suppose that the law will not be changed. Perhaps they have not, but I contend that they have a right to suppose that the law shall not be changed to their detriment. A few years ago the Government passed a law respecting the extradition of criminals who came here from the United States. When they passed that law, telling these criminals that they had no right to remain here, they were very careful not to ask for legislation which was retroactive, but I say that the legislation passed by them in regard to this matter has been retroactive, seeing that people who came in since 1883 in the expectation of getting a second homestead have been deprived of that privilege. I contend that the Government should be at least as fair to settlers in the North-West as to criminals coming from the United States. I think it is only fair that this resolution should be adopted.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I spoke to the leader of the Opposition at the beginning of this sitting, and, though the news we had then was not so serious as that we have now, I said we would probably ask for an adjournment at 6 o'clock, and the hon. gentleman agreed with me. I will now move the adjournment of the debate, and we will take care that the hon. member for Assiniboia will not lose his place on the paper.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand the leader of the Government to say that my question will stay at the head of the paper?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will give the hon. gentleman a chance of having his motion discussed.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the leader of the Government fix a place on the paper for it? I ask this question because I am pledged to divide the House on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Divide it now.

Mr. LAURIER. I must say to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that, according to the Rules of the House, if a motion for the adjournment of the debate is carried his motion goes to the bottom of the paper. I should myself object to the adjournment, because I think a vote ought to be taken, and I believe he has a grievance. It is true that the hon. gentleman opposite told me at the beginning of this sitting of the condition of Sir John Macdonald, and that I said I would be ready at any time to adjourn the House, but I am not ready to agree to the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DAVIN. For the reason I have stated, I cannot consent to the adjournment of the debate. I have carried my constituency with the whole weight of authority against me, and I am pledged to my constituents to divide the House on this very question.

House divided on motion of Sir Hector Langevin to adjourn debate:

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. TAYLOR. I notice by the pair book that the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris) has paired with the hon. member for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers); the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) has paired with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Dyer); and the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) has paired with the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier).

Mr. LAVERGNE. That is not correct as far as I am concerned.

Mr. LANGELIER. I refuse to pair with any one.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will read the pair book.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have nothing to do with any pairs. I must declare the motion as carried or lost according to the vote in the House, and I declare this motion carried.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I paired with the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas).

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Cleveland) has not voted.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I paired with the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll).

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) has not voted.

Mr. SCRIVER. I paired with the hon. member for the West Riding of Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson).

Mr. OUIMET. Although, Mr. Speaker, your ruling is quite right, when you say that you have nothing to do with the pairs, still, I think it is well that the House should know how this pairing business works. When an hon. member has paired with another he ought to be sure, when he leaves the House, that his vote will not be lost to his party by the member with whom he has paired voting in favour of his own party.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). Let the pairs go on record.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand the hon. gentleman moves the adjournment in view of the critical condition of the Premier?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To-morrow is a Government day; do the Government propose to go on with their business, and if so, what business?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is impossible for us to say now what business will be taken to-morrow. We have a report that Sir John is very low, and we cannot say what may take place before the House meets to-morrow. If we proceed, we will go on with Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is what we have a right to know. The hon. gentleman is aware that there is a motion on the paper censuring Sir Charles Tupper. That, I presume, will proceed at once, if the hon. gentlemen go on with any business at all. That ought to be understood?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If we go into Supply, of course that motion will come up first. But we may take a Bill or two before we go into Supply.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 2nd June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE moved:

That the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House be now concurred in.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the manner in which the French version of the Debates is published and distributed in this House. The House has been sitting for over a month, and although the French version of the Debates is supposed to be published at the same time as the English version, or very soon after, such is not the case. The English Debates have been distributed up to 29th May, and form a volume of 638 pages, while the French version is only up to 13th May, and gives us only 191 pages of translation. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the French version becomes utterly useless: and unless measures are immediately taken for having the French of the Debates not only translated and printed, but also distributed in this House as promptly as circumstances will allow, that is to say, three or four days after the English version, the French members will find themselves in a position of intolerable inferiority. Indeed, the Debates are, in that way, becoming completely useless to them in the House and for distribution in the constituencies for the information of the electors. I do not know where the fault lies. The translators hold that they follow the English version closely, and the printers hold that they print the French copy as soon as it comes. But one thing is certain, the members get the French version only two or three weeks after the English version has been distributed. This is a matter which, to a large extent, depends on the Department of the hon. Secretary of State, and I particularly draw his attention to these facts, in order that he may take steps to bring about an efficient and immediate remedy to the grievance.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If it were a matter dependent on my own diligence, I must say that the request of the hon. gentleman, that the French translation of the Debates should be distributed not later than a couple of days after the English publication, would be immediately attended to. Hon. gentlemen, perhaps, do not realize exactly the difficulty of publishing the French version. We all know that more than nine-tenths of the business of the House is done in English, and consequently the translating staff is constantly employed translating the Debates. That translation, to be correct, must be read over and revised, so as to obtain uniformity in the translation; for, while several translations might all be correct, yet there might be difference in style, which would lessen the character of the work as a whole. I believe it was understood that the chief of the translating staff should perform the duty of first reading the copy and revising at least one proof; but, as I stated last year, it was found utterly impossible, physically, for the chief translator to read even the first copy of the work of eight translators and do the work correctly. There is not a man who has been editor of a paper who will not understand that it is impossible for one man to read properly the copy of eight translators day by day. I understand that Mr. Beaulieu, who is a hard-working, painstaking man, has had to work at times sixteen hours a day in the endeavour to read over the copy so as to send it to the printing office the next day. Last year I was told that the Printing Bureau should have good proof-readers to revise the copy; but that is not their business; they correct errors of printing, but not the style of the writer. The revise must be read again in order to correct errors which might, by inadvertence, have been committed in the translation—not by the printer or the proof-reader, but by the translator. Last year there was a request for further assistance to Mr. Beaulieu. That request has been repeated this year. Mr. Beaulieu has done his best, and I challenge any hon. gentleman to do that work of reading over the copy of eight translators and then checking the revise. There is a report of the committee, I understand, recommending that an assistant be appointed, which recommendation I hope will meet with the approval of the House, and the grievance complained of by the hon. member for Berthier remedied.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I can corroborate in every particular the remarks of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil). Three or four times during last session I have complained of the time it required for the French translation. There may be differences of opinion on the usefulness of the official publication of the Debates; but whatever opinion one may have in this respect, there is one point on which every one must agree: that is, that if it is expected that the Debates shall have any usefulness at all, they must be published as soon as possible after they have taken place. I need not ask the hon. members of this House what they think of a debate published in French a month and a month and a half—last year the delay was six weeks—after it has taken place. As well give mustard after dinner, as the French saying goes. The thing is absolutely useless. Nobody minds them. They are kept as a kind of ammunition which may come handy in the case of elections, and if no elections come they serve no purpose. It is money utterly lost, to publish the French version of the Debates so long after the English. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not gainsay what the hon. Secretary of State says of the work entailed by the revision of the translation. I admit, with him, that it is impossible for a chief translator alone to revise all the translation which may be done in a day by four or five translators—

Mr. CHAPLEAU. By eight translators.

Mr. LANGELIER. By eight official translators. I know that such a thing is absolutely impossible, and I believe it should not be undertaken. I speak without very much experience in the matter, but I believe we cannot expect that from the chief translator. I think that his work should not consist of the constant revision of all the translation done by the different translators, but that he should simply, from time to time, revise the work of each of the translators to see if they are competent. I have not the slightest doubt but that some of the translators are altogether incompetent, or are very negligent, if I judge from their work. Every one knows the Italian proverb: Traduttore, traditore, "A translator, a traitor." This proverb has found its application in the case of the translation of the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) on the Address. I call the attention of my hon. friends who know French, to this masterpiece of bad translation. It is such a translation as one reads in patent medicine advertisements. I will quote only one word of it, to give an idea of the manner in which it was done. The hon. leader of the Opposition, referring, if I remember well, to the fact that European mails were now sent by way of the United States, said: "Treason is rampant on the other side of the House." Now, does any one wish to know how this was rendered? This is the way the translator puts it: "La trahison est rampante de l'autre côté de la chambre." "Treason is crawling on the other side of the House." It is an absurdity. It is absolutely the reverse of what my hon. friend said. I lay no blame on the chief translator. But he must be in a position to put an end to this state of things, for really it is no benefit to the French-speaking members to have such a French translation. If, perchance, this speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition was to be read on the other side of the ocean by persons knowing French, they would surely say: "In the name of heaven, who is the Iroquois speaking such a language? It is not French which is spoken in Canada, but a kind of English badly turned into French." And they would surely form a poor opinion of us. Mr. Speaker, I hold that if we pay such large sums to secure the rights of the French language, these rights should be secured effectually. A translation as badly done as that which I have spoken of, not only is of no advantage to the French race, but is altogether to its disadvantage. I draw the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Official Report of the Debates to the manner in which the translation is made. I repeat it: it is not French that we are given. Sometimes and often enough we are given a mixture of French and English, English with French terms. It would be better, in my mind, to be content with the English text alone than to have such a translation made.

Motion agreed to.

SCRIP FOR MILITIA ENGAGED IN NORTH-WEST OUTBREAK.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved that on Friday next the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That, whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned and described, being "members of the enrolled Militia force actively engaged and bearing arms in the suppression of the Indian and Half-breed outbreak," within the meaning of the Act passed in the session held in the 48th and 49th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 73, as amended by the Act passed in the session held in the 49th year of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 29, have not as yet received the land or scrip by the said amended Act authorized to be granted, and the time within which, under the provisions of the said amended Act, they might have received the same has elapsed; and there may be other persons in the like case; it is desirable that authority should be given for the granting to such persons, notwithstanding anything in the said amended Act contained, of the bounties thereby contemplated.

2. Resolved, That notwithstanding any limits of time in the said amended Act prescribed, the Minister of the Interior be authorized to grant free homesteads or scrip to the persons hereinafter mentioned or described, upon warrants, in favour of such persons respectively, issued by the Minister of Militia and Defence, as provided in the said amended Act: provided that any person in whose favour such warrant is issued, or his duly constituted substitute, shall, within six months after the date of the issue of such warrant, select and make entry for the two quarter-sections to which he is entitled thereunder, and shall thereafter perfect such entry and reside upon and cultivate the lands so entered for in accordance with the terms and conditions prescribed by the Homestead provisions of The Dominion Lands Act.

3. Resolved, That any person may, in lieu of such land, take scrip, as provided by the said amended Act, but that any person choosing to take scrip must notify the Minister of the Interior of his choice within six months from the issue of the warrant in his favour.

4. Resolved, That all the provisions of the said amended Act shall, so far as the same are applicable, extend and apply to grants of land and scrip issued under the foregoing provisions.

5. Resolved, That the foregoing provisions shall apply to:

(a) Members of the corps known during the outbreak as the Regina Volunteer Company;

(b) Members of the corps known during the outbreak as the Battleford Home Guards;

(c) Walter William Phelan, of Regina, a scout actively engaged during the outbreak, whose services have been certified to by competent authority;

(d) The following members of the troop of scouts known as the Steele Scouts, that is to say:—James Rolland, Frederick Rolland, William Rolland, John Whiteford, R. E. Steele, G. M. Steele, W. Chamberlayne, Peter Nelson, George Beatty and John Calder;

(e) Such other persons as hereafter establish to the satisfaction of the Minister of Militia and Defence that they were respectively, within the meaning of the said amended Act, members of the enrolled Militia force actively engaged in bearing arms in the Indian and Half-breed outbreak, and that they have not received the land or scrip by the said amended Act authorized to be granted.

Motion agreed to.

KINGSTON GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to a motion which was made on my behalf by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) on the 5th of May last. My hon. friend moved in my name for all papers and correspondence in connection with the awarding of the contract of the Kingston Graving Dock. It is a month since those papers were asked for, and I have not yet heard anything about them. I wish to warn the hon. Minister of Public Works that I have been informed—accurately informed, I believe—that the same fraudulent practices, which have taken place during the last eight or ten years in connection with other contracts in his department, have taken place in connection with this contract. I wish to tell him before the House and before the country that I believe I have the complete proof of money having been paid to men in connection with his department to obtain information on which Messrs. Michael and Nicholas Connolly, witnesses heard this morning before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, based their calculations to obtain that contract, although they were not the lowest tenderers. I hope that the hon. Minister will see that these papers are brought down as soon as possible, because the experience we have had to-day before the Committee on Privileges and Elections proves that, if we have delay, witnesses and papers may disappear.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order in referring to anything which took place before a committee.

Mr. TARTE. I am perfectly willing to bow to your decision, but I am through.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The papers the hon. gentleman has mentioned are being prepared in the department. I am writing now to the deputy of my department to ask if they will be ready to-morrow, or when they will be ready.

CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole on resolution respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company be received.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood that the hon. gentleman intended, before the report was received, to have laid before the House a list of the shareholders in that undertaking. It was strenuously pressed by my hon. friend from Queen's, and I understood that the list would be forthcoming before the report would be received.

Mr. FOSTER. I said there was no objection to laying the list before the House. I have had it cabled for, and it will be here probably in ten days, which will be in ample time before the Bill passes through the House. What I desire now is to have the resolution passed and the Bill introduced, so that it may be printed and considered by members of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will not proceed with the Bill until this list is produced?

Mr. FOSTER. I think we will have it within ten days.

Report received, resolutions read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 97) to amend the Acts respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply," and the motion of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). When the House adjourned on Friday night, we were discussing the attitude of Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner of this Dominion to England, and the attitude of Sir Charles Tupper as a political bulldozer during the last Dominion election and since the last Dominion election. The charges preferred by the leader of the Opposition against Sir Charles Tupper, are three, clear, distinct, concise. He is charged with having interfered in the elections while he occupied the high and distinguished position of High Commissioner to England: he is charged with having characterized the Liberal party with being actuated by treasonable and disloyal motives; he is charged, thirdly, with having improperly and unnecessarily interfered with the Grand Trunk Railway, and with having used his position in England since the election, to interfere with the Grand Trunk Railway. He was defended by the Minister of Justice, not, in my judgment, in the broad and generous spirit that one statesman ought to defend another statesman, but rather in the character of an attorney defending a criminal accused of petty larceny, first declaring that the evidence did not satisfy the charge, that the evidence was not strong enough, and then he made a strong appeal to the jury, the gentlemen behind him practically cracking over their heads the ministerial whip and begging of them to vote down the motion of the leader of the Opposition, to vote it down whether the evidence established the guilt of the implicated individual, or whether it did not. The Minister of Justice denied the charges, but he submitted no proof that Sir Charles Tupper denied them. He knew, everybody knew throughout the length and breadth of this wide Dominion, that Sir Charles Tupper had been so charged in the press, at least two months before the charges were levelled against him upon the floor of Parliament. The Minister of Justice knew it. The Minister of Justice is in daily communication, I apprehend, or at all events, may be, with the High Commissioner in England, and yet, although the Minister of Justice denies that Sir Charles Tupper made use of the language that is charged against him, he does not produce before Parliament and the people of Canada a tittle of evidence that Sir Charles Tupper himself denied it. We have the denial of the Minister of Justice, we have no denial from Sir Charles Tupper, and it is not a violent assumption that Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner to England, has known for the last two months, at all events, that those charges were bandied about, both in the English press and in the Canadian press, scattered broadcast all over the world, and yet, so far as we know, the mouth of Sir Charles Tupper is closed, and his lips have been sealed upon this question. The Minister of Justice denied the charges, with the hon. gentleman's usual ability; and perhaps it was to be expected that he would defend his old patron, and the one that warmed him into political life. But altogether I submit to this Parliament, confidently, and to the people of this country, that the defence made by the Minister of Justice was an exceedingly lame defence. The Minister of Justice denied that Sir Charles Tupper had ever called the Liberal party or the leaders of the Liberal party, "ruined gamesters." But Sir Charles Tupper has never made a denial, that I am aware of, either through the Canadian press or through the English press, or by communications to the Minister of Justice. We are asked in this Parliament to take the statement of the Minister of Justice that Sir Charles Tupper made use of no such language. However much confidence I may have in the Minister of Justice, I prefer having the denial from the individual implicated, that he made use of no such language. The Minister of Justice says that Sir Charles Tupper made use of no such language. I believe the testimony is beyond all reasonable doubt, that Sir Charles Tupper, after the elections were over, if not pending the elections, described the leaders of the great Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada, as "ruined gamesters." How dare Sir Charles Tupper or anybody else stigmatize men that are infinitely better than he is, men whose shoe latchets he never was worthy to unloose, as "ruined gamesters?" If the charge is established, as I believe I will be able to establish it—at all events submit evidence in corroboration of the evidence submitted by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that Sir Charles Tupper stigmatized the leaders of the Liberal party as "ruined gamesters"—that it is true is manifest from the echo upon the other side of the House.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I proved that Sir Charles Tupper did not use such language towards the leaders of the Liberal party.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I heard nothing in the hon. gentleman's speech except some stale extracts from stale speeches of the member for South Oxford, that did not appear to me to have any application to, or any bearing whatever upon, the guilt or the innocence of Sir Charles Tupper. Has Sir Charles Tupper himself denied the charge that has been levelled against him? Sir, we are able to produce proof from Conservative papers—and I hope hon. gentlemen will take the utterances of their own organs and of the English papers—that he made use of such language: again I say, how dare Sir Charles Tupper make use of such language? —a gentleman that is known in Parliament and known from one end of the country to the other, throughout his long political life, as having a record of boodle and plunder, from the hour when he first touched the Spring Hill Coal Mine until the hour when the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed, and he became an English Baronet and a Canadian millionaire. And yet we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that Sir Charles Tupper used no such language. Let us see what the Montreal Star, which I do not think is at all favourable to the Liberal party but whose sympathies are with the Conservative party, said regarding the use of this language by Sir Charles Tupper. The Star said:

"Sir Charles Tupper gives the parting shot in a letter in the Times to-day in the Tyler discussion. He says in this letter that Sir Henry Tyler, like a cuttle-fish, endeavours to escape under the cover of an inky cloud. Sir Charles asserts that it is now proved that the Grand Trunk went to shameful extremes to aid 'ruined gamesters' in attempting to subvert British institutions in Canada. Sir Charles hopes, he says, that the Grand Trunk may yet be redeemed from its miserable, ruinous mismanagement."

Does the Minister of Justice still declare that Sir Charles Tupper never made use of the language? If so, the Minister can obtain abundant proof from the papers published in the locality where the language was uttered. I never heard Sir Charles Tupper make use of this language, but that he did make use of it appears to be reasonably clear from the evidence submitted. Whether Sir Charles Tupper is really a ruined gamester or not, I know not; but this I know, that his political career for twenty-five years shows him to be anything but a ruined gamester. For a quarter of a century he was a member of Parliament, a member of the Government, or ruling the Government of the country. He was not a millionaire a quarter of a century ago when he came to this Parliament. He left Canada a year or two ago, as I have already intimated, an English baronet and a reputed Canadian millionaire. Everybody knows that a member of Parliament cannot become a millionaire on his sessional allowance, and that a member of the Government cannot become a millionaire within a few years out of his official salary, if he discharges his duty as a member of the Government and an occupant of the Treasury benches. If a gigantic fortune cannot be acquired in that way, how can it be acquired?—echo answers, how? Canada will be startled some day to know the means whereby Canadian statesmen acquire English baronetcies, and even English peerages, and at the same time become Canadian millionaires. I do not care how Sir Charles Tupper acquired his fortune or his baronetcy. All I say is, that it is exceedingly improper, injudicious and unwise for a man occupying the position Sir Charles Tupper occupies, to interfere, directly or indirectly, with Dominion elections: exceedingly injudicious, occupying the position he occupies as a sort of ambassador from the court at Ottawa to the Imperial Court at St. James, to dabble in anything outside of his office. He is sent there, not by the Conservative party, but as the representative of the whole people of Canada, one-half of whom, if not more, are Liberals: his office salary is not taken out of the pockets of the Conservative party, but it is paid by Canadian taxpayers, and Sir Charles Tupper, or anyone else occupying a position of that kind, ought to remain quiescent, and, if he does not do so, it is the duty of this Parliament, if the Government will not muzzle him, to muzzle him. One is curious, when such language is made use of, to know exactly the political record of the utterer of the language while he was a member of Parliament: one is curious to know the opinions which his political adversaries, as well as his political friends, held regarding him: one is curious to know the record of a gentleman who ventures on a public platform to denounce his political adversaries as "ruined gamesters," and to know what his own friends think about him. I will venture to read from the Debates of Parliament some years ago an opinion given of the High Commissioner to England by a gentleman who sat beside him in the councils of the Dominion, who was one of his old adversaries in the old Province of Nova Scotia, when Sir Charles Tupper was Provincial Secretary of that colony, and one of his colleagues here. What this Minister said of Sir Charles Tupper is in the following words:—

"But the picture, dark as it is, has something blacker still. I see there standing in the background, the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia privately handing over to this same engineer a contract for the whole work. I see him shroud it in darkness and bury it for months in the grave of secrecy. And now the Provincial Secretary comes forward and tells us it was so hidden to serve the public interest; to enable Sandford Fleming, after he had taken the contract, to make better terms with the old contractors: to grind a few more dollars out of them. Public interest indeed! Mr. Sandford Fleming's interest alone. Sir, I know not what term to apply to such conduct in a Government. I know not what to call it—I shall not venture an opinion; but in private life it is called extorting money under false pretences, and our laws make it indictable knavery."

That is pretty strong language, but it was uttered by a Nova Scotian, in regard to a Nova Scotian who was formerly Provincial Secretary. He is not satisfied with that, but he goes on to say:

"They have heard of men riding in public conveyances with a loose mantle about them and a pair of false hands folded in front to lull suspicion, while the real hands were finding their way into their fellow travellers' pockets, and they now think that when the hon. gentleman put on the mantle of Herbert Huntingdon and the old Reformers, the hands he put to the plough were not real—that the real hands were hidden that they might better get to the arm-pits in the public chest, and they wait, they long for the opportunity to sweep him from his position. Therefore, Sir, there was no necessity to bring this case here to excite public opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, if having brought it for investigation, in the discharge of a public duty, what if the people should, on an examination of it, decide that the public interests have been bartered away and betrayed—that the man whom they once believed in as the apostle of retrenchment has become the great high priest of jobbery and corruption? Who then shall restrain limits to their just indignation as they take him, loaded down as he may be with the share of the offerings that fall to the priest, and impale him on the horns of the altar at which he ministers."

Those were the words made use of by a one time colleague of Sir Charles Tupper; and yet this man has the brazen impertinence to charge the Liberal party with being a set of ruined gamesters. The Minister of Justice desired to convince this House that Sir Charles Tupper made use of no improper or undue influence respecting the Grand Trunk Railway. Sir Charles Tupper, as the Minister of Justice desires us to believe, approached the Grand Trunk Railway in the innocence and simplicity of his nature. He informed the General Manager, in the innocence and simplicity of his character, of his innocent mission. He interviewed some of the prominent employés of the Grand Trunk Railway, simply as an individual, and not as Sir Charles Tupper, seeking the assistance of the Grand Trunk Railway: he simply asked them to stay their hand and not to take violent action against the Government of Canada; he simply asked them to allow their employés to do, and act, and vote just as they liked. Now, does any man believe that, who has known Sir Charles Tupper for twenty-five years as a politician, who now knows Sir Charles Tupper as a political partisan, and who knows the ways and methods of Sir Charles Tupper upon the public platform and during an election campaign? I do not think the Minister of Justice will get many people to believe that story, even assuming that there was no evidence to the contrary. Does any man who knows Sir Charles Tupper and who has known him for ten or fifteen years, believe that he went to the General Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway and that all that he asked him to do was to stay his hand. Does any one believe that, in face of the absolute declaration of that General Manager that Sir Charles Tupper wanted him to interfere actively on behalf of the Government? Does any man who knows Sir Charles Tupper for the last fifteen or twenty years believe any such thing? Ah! Mr. Speaker, we do not forget in the olden days the methods of Sir Charles Tupper: we do not forget the famous telegram to Pembroke in 1882, pending a general election, when the people of Pembroke were led to believe that if they voted for the Government candidate they would be relieved of $70,000 due the Government, and of which they were subsequently relieved. I do not think that the Minister of Justice was in Parliament at that time, but I do think that if he knew much about the methods of Sir Charles Tupper he would not, in his.

innocence and simplicity and superabundant confidence in Sir Charles Tupper, have made the statement which he did. Have we forgotten the campaign of 1887; have we forgotten the raids made by Sir Charles Tupper upon the eastern Provinces in 1887? Sir, if we have forgotten them, the Dominion treasury will not forget them for many years. We know perfectly well that upon that occasion Sir Charles Tupper pledged the credit of this country to the expenditure of enormous sums of money, and we know just as well that the Parliament of this country, controlled by hon. gentlemen opposite, implemented nearly every one of these promises. We have not forgotten that, later on, Sir Charles Tupper bullied and bulldozed through Parliament a scheme for the construction of a railway parallel to an existing line of railway, upon his assurance to Parliament that it would shorten the distance to a given point by forty when it only shortened it by five or six miles. We have not forgotten the methods of Sir Charles Tupper in the old parliamentary days when he forced through Parliament a scheme for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway upon the solemn assurances that it would not cost the people of this country a single cent, and yet the people of this country have to pay every farthing of the cost. We have not forgotten that in those days he assured us that there would be a population of half a million in the North-West Territories by this time; we have not forgotten the glowing picture which he drew of the North-West Territories, and how he pointed out that in a few years the North-West Territories would be able to produce six hundred and forty million bushels of wheat for export; we have not forgotten that he told us that the Dominion Lands in the North-West would pay every farthing of the cost of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we know now, that instead of paying every farthing of that expenditure, we are nearly a million and a half of dollars behind for the management of the North-West lands alone. We are asked, in the face of all this, to believe that this simple and innocent man went out upon this simple and innocent mission, saying to the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway in gentle tones: "Stay your hand, Mr. Seargeant; do nothing, do not interfere with the Government; your men are all in favour of the Government now, and let them vote as they wish." These are not the methods of Sir Charles Tupper. Sir Charles Tupper had a different mission, and Sir Charles Tupper attempted to carry out a different mission, and he failed in his mission because the Grand Trunk Railway Company had made up its mind to remain neutral between the contending parties and to let them fight their own battles. Herepath's Railway Journal, speaking of Sir Charles Tupper's conduct, says:

"Shame and amazement must be the predominant feelings in judging of Sir Charles Tupper's scandalous attack on Sir Henry Tyler and the Grand Trunk management generally, * * * but if anything could make us believe that the charges against the Liberal party in Canada are baseless and only made to serve the party ends of the Conservatives, it would be Tupper's abuse of the Grand Trunk for not accepting his corrupt offers."

The Shareholder of Montreal also refers to the subject. I do not think the Shareholder is a Liberal paper, but, I believe, if it has any politics at all, it has Conservative leanings. The Shareholder says:

"Canada's High Commissioner should not bring discredit on the country by exhibiting so much rancour and rashness. He is the paid servant of the country, and as such should let politics alone. His conduct in the matter has been simply indecent."——

That is the opinion of a non-partizan paper. It goes on to say:

—"and the sooner his employers silence him the better it will be for Canadian interests."

So say I, Mr. Speaker. Whatever be the politics of the man who penned this article, he says right when he says that the sooner the Government of this country muzzles Sir Charles Tupper and keeps him clear of politics and other interference with Canadian interests, the better it will be for this country. But Sir Charles Tupper has not only attempted to interfere with the management of the Grand Trunk Railway, but he charged that great corporation, as the extracts I have read show, with extravagance, jobbery and corruption. He was speedily brought to book for that, and he backed down to some extent by saying that this extravagance, jobbery and corruption was perpetrated during the construction and under the early management. Why, Sir Charles Tupper had been in Parliament for nearly twenty-five years, except when he was lording it as High Commissioner in England, and for all these long years the Grand Trunk Railway had intimate relations with Sir Charles Tupper, and Sir Charles Tupper had intimate relations with the Grand Trunk Railway managers, and yet he never said a word about that extravagance, jobbery and corruption. So long as the Grand Trunk Railway was prepared to subserve the interest of Sir Charles Tupper or the Government of which he was a prominent supporter, or member, so long as the Grand Trunk Railway did nothing more than give the Government their sympathy and indirect support, the Grand Trunk Railway was not guilty of extravagance, jobbery or corruption, but the moment the Grand Trunk Railway ceased to serve the interests of the political party to which Sir Charles Tupper belonged, then, in the eyes of Sir Charles Tupper, the Grand Trunk Railway was guilty of extravagance, jobbery and corruption. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House, does Sir Charles Tupper realize thoroughly the damage he is doing to this country by so talking of a company such as the Grand Trunk Railway—a company that this country will be forever indebted to, a company that has done more to open up and to develop the resources of this country than all the Tuppers that have ever lived, or all the Tuppers that will live until the Day of Judgment? Does Sir Charles Tupper realize the damage he is doing to Canadian interests; does he not know that in the city of London where he lives, there are thousands of investors who have their little all invested in the Grand Trunk Railway; and yet Sir Charles Tupper openly declares that the Grand Trunk Railway is managed by extravagance, jobbery and corruption. Does he realize the damage that he is doing Canadian interests by so declaring, or does he realize that by interfering in politics at all he is damaging Canadian interests. If he does not realize all this, it is high time that the Government should recall him, and if the Government does not recall him, it is high time that the Parliament of Canada should muzzle Sir Charles Tupper. Let me read what the Railway News wrote of Sir Charles Tupper. It says:

"If, by any means, they—[the Grand Trunk managers]—could have succeeded, then many of the friends of Sir Charles would not have had the opportunity of being numbered amongst the wealthiest of Canadians; and if they had failed, as they assuredly would, for lack of that support, which has been so lavishly given to the friends and supporters of the Government in Canada, the proprietors of the Grand Trunk would have had occasion to lament, even ten times more bitterly than they now do, the disastrous results of the confidence which they reposed in the promises and pledges of the Canadian Government—among others, that the line would pay 11 per cent. upon its capital, and that it should be practically free from that railway competition which has of late years been so recklessly encouraged."

I also read from Herepath's Railway Journal the following extract with regard to the charge of extravagance, corruption and jobbery:—

"We on this side have a much better opportunity of judging of the ability and honesty of the Grand Trunk management than has Sir Charles Tupper, and we can tell him that it has been characterized by sterling honesty, prudent foresight, and the best form of conservatism."

It is a pity, Mr. Speaker, that we could not introduce into Canada a little of the best form of conservatism. Now, I shall vote heartily for the resolution of my hon. friend. I believe the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper is wholly without justification; I believe his active interference at all in politics is wholly without justification; and had the motion of my hon. friend gone further than it does, I would have voted for it; I would have voted to abolish the office and to abolish Sir Charles Tupper at the same time. I never could see the utility or necessity for this office. I see it now less than I ever saw it before. Every hour, I think, gives us convincing proof that the office itself is wholly unnecessary. When that office was created we were informed by the Administration that it was created for certain purposes. The Commissioner was to act as the representative and resident agent for Canada in England, and was to exercise such powers and perform such duties as might be assigned to him by the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council was to direct him what to do. He was to supervise immigration; he was to carry out the instructions he might receive from the Governor in Council respecting the financial, commercial and general interests of Canada. Now, I would like the Government to point out to this House what Sir Charles Tupper has ever done in the general interests of Canada; I would like them to point out to me a single Order in Council that they have passed giving Sir Charles Tupper directions to do something for the general benefit of the people of this great country. Let me ask the hon. Minister of Justice, who has taken up the hopeless task of defending Sir Charles Tupper, was it by Order in Council that, in 1884, Sir Charles Tupper was induced to abandon his mission to England, to leave the charmed circle on the outskirts of aristocratic life there and come to Canada, and take his place in the Government and the House, and bully through Parliament a large additional subvention to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Let me ask the hon. Minister of Justice if it was by Order in Council that, in 1888, Sir Charles Tupper again came to Canada, and again occupied a seat on the Treasury benches, and forced another subvention to his masters the Canadian Pacific Railway Company through Parliament. Let me ask the hon. Minister of Justice, was it by Order in Council that Sir Charles Tupper lent the influence of his name and position as High Commissioner to his dear friend Mr. Isaacs in order to establish the Dead Meat Company at the charming city of Three Rivers, by which thousands of English investors were induced to put their money into this enterprise, and lost it? Was it by Order in Council that Sir Charles Tupper was brought, in 1891, from his mission to England, where he is supposed to be of such invaluable service to the people of Canada, in order to take part in the heat and turmoil of a political contest in this country? Was it by Order in Council that Sir Charles Tupper appeared on a public platform in the city of Quebec, and, for the purpose of carrying a constituency or two pledge the credit of his country to a million of money? I do not know whether he did that or not, because I was not there; but I will read an extract from the Quebec Chronicle, which I am told is a Conservative paper. Hear what it says:—

"Sir Charles spoke some hopeful words for the bridge. But he was also most emphatic on the old North Shore Railway bonds question. He stated to his enthusiastic audience, which applauded almost every sentence that he uttered, that the Canadian Pacific Railway could be relieved of that $1,000,000 worth of obligation without its costing the country at large one cent."

It is the old, old story: you can assume a liability, involving the expenditure of millions of money, and yet it will not cost the tax-payers a cent. Sir Charles Tupper is full of promises.—

"The High Commissioner painted a beautiful picture, full of roses and things. He said that elevators would be erected, that grain in enormous quantities would be shipped from here, and that the Government would do its part manfully to help forward the Quebec boom. Sir Charles then read a telegram, which came hot from the wires, from the Premier of Canada."

There you have the assurance of Sir Charles Tupper on the public platform. Were these given on the faith of an Order in Council passed by the Governor General in the presence of his advisers? Was it by Order in Council that Sir Charles Tupper went to Montreal and attempted to bulldoze the Grand Trunk Railway Company to coerce their employés to vote for the Government party? Was it by an Order in Council that Sir Charles Tupper was instructed to assume an attitude calculated to strike a fatal blow at the credit of this country in the English market? Is it by an Order in Council that Sir Charles Tupper has been acting in the way he has been doing for the last three or four years? If so, then all I can say is, that by virtue of an Order in Council Sir Charles Tupper's conduct has been offensive and insulting to a large majority of the people of Canada, and I believe, also, to a great many people in the mother country. If Sir Charles Tupper must engage in politics, let him resign his office. I have no objection to Sir Charles Tupper taking the field in the Canadian political arena, if he must dabble in politics on behalf of his political friends on the other side of the House; but if he does so, let him resign his office. Do not let him remain as the ambassador of Canada to the Imperial Court and draw a salary amounting, with those of his employés, to about $25,000 a year, and at the same time act as a political partisan or a political bully and bulldozer from one end of this country to the other. And if the Government do not wish to check him, then the Parliament of Canada ought to check him; and if Parliament does not do so, the people of this country will do so when they get an opportunity. Who ever heard of an English ambassador interfering in the politics of a foreign court? We know of one celebrated instance, when an English ambassador wrote a political letter during the heat of a political campaign in the United States, and no sooner was that letter drawn to the attention of the Imperial Government than that ambassador was recalled. Our ambassador engages in all kinds of schemes in England, in waterworks and gas manufacturing industries, and then slanders and abuses people and institutions in this country. I say it is high time the people of this country should put a stop to Sir Charles Tupper's conduct. He is not only a useless appendage to the body politic, but he is a mischief and a nuisance to Canada and in England. He serves no good purpose there; and besides all that, he is an exceedingly expensive ornamental figure-head at the Court of St. James. I find that this great man, who, if we are to believe the hon. the Minister of Justice, deserves rather the commendation of the whole people of Canada than the condemnation of the right-thinking people of this Dominion, is paid by us a salary of $10,000 a year and $2,000 allowance. We pay about $13,000 for his employés, and I suppose we pay his travelling expenses. Even when he takes up his gripsack and goes to Spain to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, in the pleasant season of the year, or when he comes to Canada to engage in a political contest, we have no doubt to foot the bill. And besides all this, we have to pay his gas bill. And we are charged a gratuity paid by him to Mrs. Wilkinson, of $68. If our High Commissioner chooses to be generous and charitable to Mrs. Wilkinson, is that any business of ours, and why should we be called on to pay for his generosity? We are also called on to pay his gratuities to postmen and others. But if Sir Charles Tupper chooses to give ten cents or twenty-five cents or a dollar to the small boy who brings his letters, I ask is it not an outrage that the tax-payers of this country should be called on to pay it? We provide him with a free house and free furniture, and yet we have to pay his income tax of $250 a year and other taxes. I suppose that every hon. member in this House pays his own taxes. I suppose that the officials pay their own taxes out of their own pockets. Why, then, should we make an exception in favour of Sir Charles Tupper, even though he be an English baronet and Lord High Commissioner to England? Why should we pay our ambassador's railway tickets, and his newspaper bill amounting to $196.04, and his parochial rates $349.47, and his porterage? If the High Commissioner cannot carry his own gripsack but chooses to employ a porter, why should we pay for that? Yet we are charged $5.47 for it. Why should we pay his subscription to Ashburnham Gardens, $10.95, and to the Colonial Institute, $9.73? One has only to read those items, in the light of the information we get from the Auditor General's Report and the Public Accounts, to be amazed that any Government, even this, should be so utterly reckless of what is due the tax-payers of this country, as to sanction the payments of these large sums. I will vote for the motion, and if my hon. friend had introduced a Bill to abolish the office of High Commissioner, it would have received my cordial support. I think it is the bounden duty of the Parliament, if the Government is, as usual, recreant to the trust reposed in it by the people of Canada, to stamp with their disapproval the conduct of the High Commissioner.

Mr. DAVIN. I have listened with interest to the remarks of my hon. friend, whom, if he will not think it impertinent on my part, I welcome back to the Parliament of Canada, though I should have preferred, of course, to see in his place my friend Mr. Porter. My hon. friend the member for Huron illustrates the principle of abstention, in which he and I believe. He had too much Porter, and he could not come up to time. The Porter was removed from his locality, and there he is, and I am very glad to see him. As we had to have a Reformer, there is nobody I should prefer seeing here than my hon. friend. Now, the speech of my hon. friend, to which we have just listened, divides itself into three parts. The first part dealt with what might be called the figurative language of Sir Charles Tupper. The next part dealt with the career of Sir Charles Tupper before he became High Commissioner, and a small portion of the close of the speech dealt with him as High Commissioner. Now, for middle-aged men and some past middle age, it seems to me very extraordinary that we should be so sensitive to a phrase—that it should irk the soul of the hon. member for Huron that he and his fellow leaders of the Reform party should be called "ruined gamesters." What did Sir Charles Tupper mean by that expression? He could not have meant that my hon. friend the member for Huron is given to playing the seductive game of poker and loses heavily. He could not have meant that any of the other leaders, take, for instance, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), were given to that interesting game and lost heavily at it. It is evidently a figurative phrase applied to them as politicians. What could it mean? It could only mean that they had bet on a certain policy and had lost—that they had bet on unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union and had lost. And what then were they but ruined gamesters? But, Sir, still more extraordinary is it that gentlemen so sensitive about a figurative phrase should, in the very breath in which they complain of that phrase, have used also figurative language; for the hon. member for Huron, in the very sentence in which he complained of the phrase "ruined gamesters," called Sir Charles Tupper a "political bulldozer." Now, really there is not much difference. If you were to take a pair of scales and weigh the two phrases—if you would put the phrase "ruined gamester" in the one scale and "political bulldozer" in the other, I venture to say they would balance each other almost as nicely as a pair of apothecary scales weighing some infinitesimal prescription. Not only that. My hon. friend left the figurative; he departed from the imaginative field and came to plain language, and he declared that for twenty-five years the career of Sir Charles Tupper had been one of plunder. Well, that is a strong phrase especially coming from gentlemen who are so sensitive about being called "ruined gamesters;" and then my hon. friend cited a quotation from a speech of Mr. Mc Lelan, made in 1876, in the Nova Scotia Parliament, in which he spoke very harshly, and also in a figurative manner, of Sir Charles Tupper. But, Sir, in this very House—I was here at the time—Mr. McLelan, who, I think, was then Finance Minister or Postmaster General, got up and repudiated all those phrases which have been read out with so much unction by the hon. member for Huron. My hon. friend complained of Sir Charles Tupper's enthusiasm over the Canadian Pacific Railway and the North-West. Sir, I doubt if I should be standing here to-day troubling the House, if it were not for what Sir Charles Tupper has done for the North-West. There is no man in Canada, not even his illustrious leader, to whom the North-West is more indebted than to Sir Charles Tupper. He always believed in the North-West; and, Mr. Speaker, indeed at that time, which was a time of doubt and despondency —and we know very well that amongst Reformers despondency is a disease more common than with Conservatives—we needed an enthusiastic man, a man of eager, burning character like Sir Charles Tupper to give enthusiasm to the people and make them believe in the future of their country. Why, the hon. the leader of the Opposition, when he was speaking of this Canadian Pacific Railway, declared—I was reading it in one of his speeches in a book with which I was presented, and very glad I am to have been presented with a volume containing his speeches—that the idea that the railway could be built in the time within which it was agreed it could be built was preposterous. He declared it would take a much longer time. But Sir Charles Tupper built it in a much shorter time. I think the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) said that all the resources of the Empire would not be sufficient to build that railway in the time it was contracted to be built, but, nevertheless, Sir Charles Tupper built that railway in four years less than the specified time. He is a man of great energy, and that is a great railway, and has made Canada something in the eyes of the world. If the Minister of Justice claims that Sir Charles Tupper has rendered great services to Canada, the building of that railway is not the least he has done in the interest of Canada. Then, it is said he spoke of the Grand Trunk Railway as being given up to jobbery, corruption and extravagance. I know nothing about the jobbery, I know nothing about the corruption, but I do know that the last contest illustrated the extravagance, and, I think, also the corruption of that company. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) complained the other night, that the Canadian Pacific Railway had given some assistance to this Government in the late contest. I do not know whether it did or not, but I do know that throughout one whole division in my constituency—though I am aware since that date that it was without the knowledge or consent of Mr. VanHorne—the whole influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway was used against me. If so, we have here again a specimen of consistency. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) complains of Sir Charles Tupper's figurative language, yet calls him a bulldozer, and these gentlemen, who hold up their hands in holy horror at the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway, had no objection to accept the assistance of the Grand Trunk. I hold in my hand L'Electeur, which, I believe, is one of the organs of the leader of the Opposition,

An hon. MEMBER. And a very good paper, too.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, it is a very good paper; I read it frequently. It says here, and I hope hon. gentlemen who speak French will excuse my accent déplorable:

"Two Grand Trunk trains, one of twenty-three, the other of twenty-seven cars, arrived yesterday from the United States with Canadian voters. It is calculated that more than 2,000 of our countrymen have come back to Canada to give their vote. The twenty-three car train which arrived at Point Lévis with voters for the Eastern Townships, was drawn by three locomotives. The Grand Trunk had even been generous enough to send locomotives and snow ploughs ahead to clear the track encumbered by the storm. All these brave fellows were unanimous in favour of Mr. Laurier and reciprocity. They were shouting "Vive Laurier!" at every station, and communicated their enthusiasm to the crowd of friends that had come to meet them."

Here is the hon. gentleman himself pictured in this paper, and here is "La couronne de Laurier." But they crowned him, they arrayed his brow with laurels in advance. And if I may be allowed to make a pun in his own beautiful language and quote a line from one of the greatest of its writers, they should have remembered that

And there was a lightning coming which they did not dream of, and a bolt they were not expecting, and, when the ballots came to be counted, my hon. friend, who, if ever the Reform party should win—which Heaven forbid—I should be more glad to see at the head of the Government of Canada than any other man, found that he was mistaken. I will not go into what might be called the ancient history of the Springhill Mine, or anything of that kind. In fact I know nothing in reference to those matters, and they have nothing to do with this question. We are dealing with Sir Charles Tupper in his acts as High Commissioner of Canada, and he must stand or fall by his acts as High Commissioner of Canada. There is a Latin maxim which says Qui hæret in literâ hæret in cortice; that is to say, that anyone who sticks merely to the letter goes only skin deep. Let us not be deceived by the phrase "civil servant." Let us ask the House if there is any strict analogy between the position of Sir Charles Tupper and that of an ordinary civil servant. Is he within the restraints and bonds that bind the ordinary civil servant? Is it not well known that, if the Government changed to-morrow he would go out from his office? It is well known that that would be the case. But let me argue the case, and I will particularly address myself to the leader of the Opposition, because I am going to appeal to him to change his motion. Suppose Sir Charles Tupper was an ordinary civil servant and had no political record at all, we must take the definition of the moral situation from Sir Charles Tupper himself, and what does he say? He declares that, in his opinion, the course the Liberal party was taking, was a disloyal course. That is his opinion, and we have to take it as his honest opinion. When the leader of the Opposition declares, as he does in this House, that he is as loyal as any man of the party to which I belong, I believe him, because I know him to be a gentleman, and I know that he would not say what was not true; I take him at his word. When Sir Charles Tupper declares that the course pursued by the Liberal party was a disloyal course, and was calculated to lead to annexation, we have to suppose that he believes it. In fact we have Mr. Blake expressing the same opinion. He is no longer sitting in this House. Why? Because he came to the conclusion, so far as I could gather from that letter of his, that somehow or other the policy of the Liberal party, to which he belonged, would lead to annexation. However, we have nothing to do with that, it is merely by the way. We have to take Sir Charles Tupper's words as to what his belief was. Now, suppose he is an ordinary civil servant without any political record. It is known that he is a man of great power on the platform, and the head of the Government he serves sends word to him: "Come over. You are a man of great political power on the platform—come over and help us. According to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), you have luxurious chambers, but still, come over here, we want you to help us. You know what these people, our opponents, are fighting for. They have raised a disloyal cry, and we want you to beat it down." What would be thought of him if he did not obey that call, even supposing he had no political record whatever, once he was told by the head of the Government that he could render his country a service? And if he were a patriotic Canadian, and were honest in his belief, what would be thought of him if he hesitated? I will go further than that, and I will say this: The man is not in that position at all; he is a man with a political record; he is an ex-Minister of the Crown. It is only the other day that he was sitting there where the Finance Minister is now sitting. There is hardly an item of expenditure that has been incurred by this Government during some 14 years, for which he is not responsible. He is responsible for the policy which is the main plank in the platform of the Government at this hour. He fought for it in 1878; he fought for it session after session. He is a Privy Councillor; he is sworn to do all he can, therefore, to secure loyalty to Her Majesty, and so far as he is able, he is bound to preserve the allegiance of this country to Her Majesty. Well, Sir, this man is told that the country is in danger, that the colleagues who sat by his side are in danger, and are fighting for their lives, that the country is in the balance and at stake, and he is asked by the Prime Minister to come over here and fight in the battle that is impending. What would be thought of him, let me ask you, if he looked round on those luxurious chambers of which the member for North Wellington speaks so eloquently and so fondly, and thought to himself: "How can I leave this? How can I leave the luxury of London? How can I leave rubbing elbows with Dukes and Duchesses, and go over to the rough-and-tumble fight of a Canadian election?" But we may even go further than that. We may fancy people near and dear to Sir Charles Tupper coming to him and saying: "You are old; you are no longer what you were; you fight with diminished force; you must feel a lessened force. Why should you go across the Atlantic and leave your duties here, which are important to the country? Why should you go over there to engage in the rough-and-tumble fight of a Canadian election?" If he had any touch of baseness in him you could fancy him hesitating; but I need hardly tell you that that is not the character of the man. I believe he has often been called the war-horse of Cumberland; he is like the war-horse in Job, he "smelleth the battle afar off." And you may be perfectly certain that when he was summoned to come over here to fight in the elections, he did not hesitate for one moment, but he put on his armour, and he took down his sword: and perhaps I may quote words that indicate a situation not at all unlike, the words Schiller puts into the mouth of Hector when he hears Achilles roaring along the walls of Troy. When the Achilles of the Reform party, the member for South Oxford, was roaring along the walls of our citadel, we can fancy Sir Charles Tupper saying, in these immortal words of Schiller:

"Theures Weib gebiete deine Thränen
Nach der Feldschlacht ist mein feurig Sehnen
Diese Arme schützen Pergamus."

Now, if there are any hon. gentlemen here who do not understand German, I will translate these words, although my translation will be feeble compared with the original:

"Dearest wife, dry your tears,
My heart burns for the battle field;
These arms protect Canada."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that if you look at the situation as described by my hon. friend from North Wellington, will you say that Sir Charles Tupper is a culprit? My hon. friend from North Wellington is an eloquent man, he is a great master of figures, and most eloquent men are great masters of figures. He is a great master of detail——

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). Of tails.

Mr. DAVIN,—and he has told us by the hour, on many and many a night, of those luxurious chambers, of the immense and ascending income of Sir Charles Tupper, of the fearful luxury in which he lives. He is a sort of Domitian, surrounded by every kind of abounding luxury. He has told us all this. Well, Mr. Speaker, if Sir Charles Tupper is a civil servant, according to the usual definition of the phrase, and if he imperils all that, for the sake of his belief in Canada, and for the sake of opposing a policy which he regarded as dangerous to the country and disloyal, why, instead of being a culprit, he is a hero.

An hon. MEMBER. Second homestead.

Mr. DAVIN. There is nothing about the second homestead in this, but when you come up to the North-West we will give you a second homestead and a shack as well. We are told that Sir Charles Tupper's action with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway has a tendency to lower the value of the property and destroy the credit of Canada. Now, I am not at all certain that it may not turn out that Sir Charles Tupper's criticism of the Grand Trunk will be a benefit to the Grand Trunk ultimately—not at all certain but that it may prove so. Well, suppose it should depress. Suppose that his assaults on the Grand Trunk Railway should, for a passing day, lower the value of shares; suppose that be the case, what are we to think of charges like that made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? He does not merely decry one railway enterprise, he decries the whole country with one fell swoop. We have seen Grip, that is edited by Mr. Bengough. I know him, and my impression is that he is a Reformer. He is the caricaturist of Grip, and the other day there was a cartoon of the member for South Oxford, who was represented as an artist painting a picture of the future of Canada. There was not much light and shadow in the picture, it was all one black daub. That, on the part of a Liberal critic, is the view taken of the future of Canada by one of the leaders of the Reform party. And yet they condemn Sir Charles Tupper because he uttered some strong language about the Grand Trunk Railway. Suppose Sir Charles Tupper talked of the Grand Trunk Railway with what might be called patriotic fervour, you have to take the position as defined by himself. He regarded the Reform party in that contest as engaged in a struggle that would lead to disloyalty and annexation. If that be so, and the Grand Trunk Railway was assisting them—and I have shown that the Grand Trunk Railway in one place alone brought in 2,000 voters, according to one of their own papers—is it a very extraordinary thing that Sir Charles Tupper, indignant at the course taken by the Grand Trunk Railway, should have used strong language against the company? At all events, it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen who decry the country, as hon. gentlemen do, to speak very harshly of Sir Charles Tupper for criticizing adversely one company, when they by one fell swoop darkened the whole horizon. One thing that has been referred to in this debate, and I think it is not without being germane to the matter, is the immense sums which it is said those Tuppers have received. I do not know what it means. Sir Charles Tupper has been a Minister of the Crown for a long time; his son has been a Minister of the Crown for some years. No one supposes a Minister of the Crown is overpaid in this country. I agree in what the hon. member for Montreal (Sir Donald Smith) said that both the judges and our Ministers are underpaid. And if men serve their country and are paid for it, is it money taken from the country? I think it is money paid for the equivalent of services received. But my hon. friends ask, what has Sir Charles Tupper done? I say, he has created the High Commissionership as we have it now; I say, just what Lord Dufferin did for the Governor Generalship of Canada, Sir Charles Tupper has done for the High Commissionership in London; I say, he has done more than any man, more than all his predecessors, in bringing Canada before England and Europe, and his conduct in the Colonial and Indian Exhibition placed this country under great obligations to him. But there was one small incident which occurred a few years ago for which we in the North-West Territories are grateful to him, and Canada should be grateful to him also: I allude to the time when our cattle were supposed to be suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. What did he do? He rolled up his sleeves; he is a dissector in more ways than one; he had an animal killed, and it was shown that the cattle were not suffering from pleuro-pneumonia: and that one act was of more value than all the money the Tuppers have ever received from Canada. Look at the live stock trade from Canada to England, and you will find that it reaches more than $30,000,000 since that. If it had not been for Sir Charles Tupper's energy and resource, and if that report had been allowed to go by the board, we would not have been allowed to send our live cattle to England, but would have been obliged to slaughter them here, and our immense trade in live cattle would have been destroyed. Talk of the services rendered by the High Commissioner. I say, that for his services as High Commissioner, for his services as a Minister of the Crown, if we gave decorations for political services, as they do in England for military services, the breast of Sir Charles Tupper would be covered with stars. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) thought it was beneath the dignity of the High Commissioner to attend to turkeys and eggs. One reason why I admire Sir Charles Tupper is that he attends to our minutest items. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) said he did not; but if the hon. member will read the High Commissioner's report, and watch the daily papers, and see his eternal wakefulness and activity, he will find there is not a single detail of our commercial interests to which Sir Charles Tupper does not attend, and the fact that he looks after our turkeys and eggs, and gives good advice about our not sending them all to Liverpool, but some to London, and thus divide the supply on the market, and furnishes information that is most useful to our farmers and farmers' wives, comes home to our business and our bosoms. I believe that most of the Reform party, in fact I believe all the Reform party, as far as I know its members, are loyal; that is to say, they are subjectively loyal. But objectively, if I may make a distinction known to German metaphysics, they are disloyal. No doubt they mean to be loyal. You can easily understand a man getting on a railroad that would lead to disloyalty and annexation, and yet deceive himself that every sleeper he travelled over was a loyal one, and on every rail there was the hall-mark of devotion to the Empire. Nevertheless the rails would lead him to a disloyal goal. That is the position our friends occupy. When Sir Charles Tupper gets angry with them for being in that position, they must put it down as zeal for his country and zeal for the Empire. I knew a Church of England clergyman, a young man, who was accustomed to get into violent fits of rage. His sisters reproached him, for they were all Christian people, and he said he did not get angry, but he felt righteous indignation. So with Sir Charles Tupper: I think it is righteous indignation. A commercial unionist may deceive himself, and he may think himself loyal, that he could not be a traitor. Natural history brings us into acquaintance with a very interesting animal, the tadpole. It is not a fish, yet it dare not venture on dry land, but the microscope will reveal rudiments of the legs—of the legs to be. It does not require a very powerful political microscopic examination of a commercial unionist to find out the rudiments of those feet that would lead him across the line. In fact, and I do not mean to be offensive, your commercial unionist is a tadpole traitor. To the leader of the Opposition I must say that he cannot possibly ask the House or his own party to vote with him in favour of this motion. The Prime Minister the other night took the whole responsibility for Sir Charles Tupper's action. What could Sir Charles Tupper do when asked to come over? How could he refuse as a chivalrous and honourable man? I do not see how he could have done otherwise, and it seems to me one of the most ungenerous things, one of the most unchivalrous things possible, to bring forward a motion like this condemning a man who was our colleague the other day. You remember that a great Englishman, writing from the Roman forum, said, "The air breathes, burns with Cicero;" and at this very hour, in this very Chamber, you almost hear the echo of Sir Charles Tupper's voice. Are you going to divert all your condemnation against an individual who was bound to take the action which he did, because, as he tells us, he believed that the enemies he had to fight were pursuing a disloyal course? He was bound in allegiance to his chief and to his colleagues to take that course, and yet you ask us to condemn him. I think I have shown the House that after all there is not much to condemn Sir Charles Tupper for. The chief charge against him, as the Opposition allege, is a figurative phrase which he used, and his remarks about a railway which took a strenuous part in the election. If some hon. gentlemen believe that it was so wrong for the Canadian Pacific Railway to take part in the election, it must be equally wrong for the Grand Trunk Railway, and it was, therefore, a proper thing to denounce it. Now, even supposing Sir Charles Tupper had committed an error, is it a proper thing for members of this Parliament to condemn, because of one error, a man who has done such great services for the country? Why, if Sir Charles Tupper were to fall to-morrow there is not a man in this House who would hesitate for one moment to vote money to build him a statue on these Parliament grounds; and yet we are asked to-day to condemn him as an individual for an action for which the Government is really responsible and for which, if it was a fault, it was a very trifling fault compared with his great services. The hon. the leader of the Opposition is a man of chivalrous character, and he should not ask the House to vote on this motion. Let him withdraw this motion and change it to one condemnatory of the Government for inviting Sir Charles Tupper out here, and then we can discuss it upon broader grounds. I maintain that no chivalrous man can condemn Sir Charles Tupper on the grounds stated, first by the leader of the Opposition, then by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and then by the member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). Their chief complaint is that Sir Charles Tupper took part in the election, although it is well known that he is as much a politician now as he ever was; and their next complaint is that he used some figurative language against them, while they at the same time use as strong, and stronger, language about him. The fact is that any man who considers the motion and the arguments which have endorsed it, will place little faith in it, when he remembers it is directed against a man who has rendered great services to Canada, and who, when the history of this young people comes to be written, will be acknowledged as one of the great forces which united and built up this young Canadian nation, stretching from the stormy Atlantic to strands swept by Pacific seas.

Mr. MULOCK. It is not my intention to follow the examples of some who have preceded me, for I shall endeavour, if possible, to confine myself to the issue before the House. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), at the commencement of his speech, pointed to himself as one of the great products of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and if I never before felt grateful to the Government and to the country for having constructed that road, I must now acknowledge my gratitude, because the hon. gentleman has told us that the Parliament of Canada was indebted to the Canadian Pacific Railway for his presence in this House, and when I learned that, I felt that we had in some measure been paid for all our trouble and expense. Now, with regard to the merits of this question. In my opinion, the defence voiced by the Minister of Justice, who gave the cue to the other speakers on the Government side of the House, is possibly the only one the case admits of. My hon. friend who spoke last (Mr. Davin) contended that, out of generosity, this House should not condemn an old colleague, but no one can admit that plea. He contended further that because the High Commissioner was a Privy Councillor that position entitled him to step into the arena of politics. Why, Sir, every day we have examples of Privy Councillors stepping out from the party lines and serving their country in other spheres.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). On the bench.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, on the bench, as my hon. friend from Bothwell says. Is it to be admitted that because a man holds a position as Privy Councillor, he can enjoy all the freedom that had attached to the office held by him at an earlier period? The hon. the Minister of Justice presented as a defence to the House, that the charges against Sir Charles Tupper were not proven. The resolution, he said, charged Sir Charles Tupper with having slandered a portion of the people of Canada and attacked a great institution, and the Minister declared that at no period during the campaign, or subsequent thereto, had the High Commissioner been guilty of this offence. The Minister of Justice stated that he had attended on the platform with Sir Charles Tupper on numerous occasions; and I presume, from his general statement, that he took the responsibility of all the utterances of Sir Charles Tupper, when he declared that at no time had he been guilty of the offences charged. The Minister of Justice, before entering into that general defence, controverted the statement advanced from this side of the House, that the High Commissioner occupied a position somewhat analogous to that of an ambassador. He controverted that proposition and illustrated his opposition to the principle by declaring that the High Commissioner should at all times be in sympathy with the political Government of the day, and to that extent must continue to enjoy and pronounce his political views. Not only that, Sir, but the Minister of Justice declared that the High Commissioner in no way occupied the position analogous to that of ambassador. I will give the House the opinion of another gentleman as to what is the true status of the High Commissioner for Canada. That opinion is as follows:—

"I hold the opinion that a person holding the high office of representative of the Dominion of Canada in England should be as nearly as possible in the position of an ambassador. You know that the British Ministers representing their country abroad do not change with the Government of the day. They remain at their posts discharging the duties allotted to them without reference to what party may be in the ascendancy for the time being."

That is the opinion of a high authority.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Who is the authority?

Mr. MULOCK. Sir Charles Tupper is the authority. I am quoting from a speech of Sir Charles Tupper which my hon. friend will find reported in the Halifax Herald of the 16th February, 1891. Sir Charles Tupper goes on to say:

"I felt anxious that the position of High Commissioner should as far as possible be the same, and from the first hour I held that office, when I was not a Cabinet Minister, I carefully abstained from taking any part whatever in party controversy."

Thus you will see that his own view of the office and its duties, for a time at all events, compelled him to conform to the opinion of his duties and responsibilities that we contend for.—

"I looked upon myself, not only as a representative of the Government of the day, but as the representative of all parties and classes in this country, and I was ever ready, as a good many persons can bear witness, to place my best services at the disposal of Canada in whatever way they were required, without reference to party consideration at all."

Sir, these are the words of Sir Charles Tupper himself, and are but echoes of the sentiment expressed by the hon. leader of the Opposition in moving this resolution, that it was the duty of the agent-general of Canada at all times to hold his services available for the various interests of Canada, whether affecting the party with which he was in sympathy, or the party opposed to him. With that admission of his, I think I can drop the argument of the hon. Minister of Justice, leaving him to settle that question with the High Commissioner. And now I come to the evidence on the point. The hon. Minister of Justice declares that there is no evidence in support of the charges contained in the resolution. Those charges are as follows:—Sir Charles Tupper is charged with interfering in the recent elections. Is there any evidence in support of that? I am not aware that there has been any evidence; but, I think, it is a matter we can take judicial notice of. Perhaps the hon. Minister will put us to the truth of it; but I will pass over that clause. The High Commissioner is charged with "imputing treasonable and disloyal motives to a large proportion of the people of this Dominion," and also with "assailing and vilifying the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and reflecting upon the position of the said company." The hon. Minister of Justice has declared that there is not a tittle of evidence in support of these charges. In regard to the accusations of treasonable conduct, against a portion of the people of Canada, I need not trouble the House with evidence, because that has been supplied by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He stated it as Sir Charles Tupper's excuse for coming to Canada, that Sir Charles Tupper declared that, in his opinion, a large proportion of the people of Canada were disloyal.

Mr. DAVIN. No; the policy proposed.

Mr. MULOCK. That was the defence offered for Sir Charles Tupper by the hon. member; I took down his words. The hon. gentleman said that Sir Charles Tupper had declared that, in his opinion, the course of the Liberal party was a disloyal one, and would lead to annexation.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear; that is it.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for West Assiniboia says that was the excuse for Sir Charles Tupper's conduct. We were told that the request of the right hon. First Minister was the excuse for his conduct. Now, in regard to the charges against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I quote from the speech of the High Commissioner as reported in the Halifax Herald of 11th March last. Speaking of the Grand Trunk, he used these words:—

"I never believed they would be base enough to go back on England and come out in favour of the union of Canada with the United States, and using the power of the road to strike down British institutions in this country. If Canada has assisted the Canadian Pacific Railroad it has received a quid pro quo. But Canada has lent an enormous sum of money to the Grand Trunk and not a dollar has been repaid. We lent the Canadian Pacific $30,000,000 and every dollar of that amount was paid before it was due. When Mr. Laurier declared that the United States would be justified in retaliating, and cutting off intercourse with Canada; and Wiman declared that the cutting off of railway communication with Canada would bankrupt our railways; when Farrar writes down to Washington to get them to stop the bonding privileges, you find these craven creatures, the Grand Trunk Railway management, who are represented as being in the power of the United States, you find them joining with the enemies of Canada in playing the game of the United States which seeks to destroy and ruin them."

If that is not a vilification of the Grand Trunk, language fails, I think, to supply what would be vilification. If that is not an accusation that a great party in Canada were seeking to destroy British institutions, I cannot conceive what language would express such an idea. It is as clear as it is false, and it is absolutely clear. He goes on:—

"And you find Sir Henry Tyler lending himself and the great corporation which, unhappily for the shareholders, he dominates, not to the support of the institutions of the country where they have prospered, but throwing their whole weight and influence against us."

Sir, is it not an assault on the Grand Trunk Railway to tell the shareholders that, unfortunately for them, Sir Henry Tyler is their president? When did Sir Charles make the discovery that Sir Henry Tyler was unfit to administer the affairs of that company? For many years he had been its administrator, and during all those years he had, I believe, enjoyed the confidence of Sir Charles Tupper. How is it that that confidence only ceased when Sir Henry Tyler declined to be clay in his hands when his services in an election were needed? He goes on to say further:—

"I will say further that the worst blow Canada ever received in England was that caused by the loss of millions of pounds to English investors because of the jobbery, extravagance and corruption of the Grand Trunk."

Could there be a graver or a more explicit charge made? If there was jobbery, extravagance and corruption, there was robbery. There can be no such transactions as these in the management of a public trust without the commission of a high crime by the trustees; and Sir Charles Tupper, in charging the Grand Trunk management with jobbery, extravagance and corruption, has charged those responsible for the company with offences of a most grave and serious character. Surely the hon. Minister of Justice cannot have read this paragraph, before uttering such an unsound defence as he makes. Then, Sir Charles Tupper goes on to say:—

"While every man who invested a dollar in the Canadian Pacific Railway is drawing interest on his money, thousands of people who invested in Grand Trunk stocks not only receive no interest, but have sunk their capital."

That failure of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to meet its liabilities is of no recent date. It happened long ago, long before people of my generation were in public life. When Sir Charles was an active politician here, then was the time for him to speak in defence of the unfortunate shareholders, if it happened that they were suffering because of jobbery, extravagance and corruption.—

"It was these investments which so damaged Canada in the eyes of the British public, and even to-day with its wild and reckless purchases of additional railways, purchased for the purpose of obstructing or heading off the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which additional millions of money are being sunk, is involving the Grand Trunk shareholders in still greater ruin."

Now, these are words fully covering the language of the resolution with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway, which language I may remind you again is as follows :—

"Assaulting and vilifying the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway and in reflecting upon the position of the said company."

As if it were not sufficient to have published that speech in the Canadian press, it was made to appear in the English press as well, in order that it might do its work, whatever that was—in order that it might injure the management of the Grand Trunk Railway and destroy the confidence of the proprietors in that management, the ultimate object probably being to overthrow the management by producing, in the meantime, a depreciation in the securities of that company. And so not satisfied with first of all publishing that speech in Canada verbatim in the Halifax Herald, the High Commissioner had it republished in the columns of the great thunderer, the Times of England ; and as if that were not sufficient, coming back to the charge again a little later, after time was had for reflection, and when, if there had been any overstatement there was the opportunity to tone it down, we find that Sir Charles Tupper followed up this accusation by a letter published in the Times and the Canadian Gazette of the 8th and 9th April, which he concluded as follows :—

"Allow me to repeat that it will give me great pleasure to meet Sir Henry Tyler in the presence of his shareholders, and not only to substantiate the accuracy of all that I have said, but show them how their best interests have been sacrificed by the miserable management of their president.

I think the Minister of Justice failed to see that report as well. We have clearly established that the statements in the resolution are statements of facts. If so, then the Minister of Justice, who seems to have adopted the principle of the resolution, must, if the facts are proved, as I contend they are, support it. The hon. the Minister of Justice did not pretend to defend the conduct of Sir Charles upon any ground whatever. He simply said that the High Commissioner did not do the things he was accused of having done. If these documents are true, if it is the case that the Halifax Herald correctly reported Sir Charles Tupper's speech, if it is true that he wrote the letter of the 9th April to the Times, the case is proven ; and the Minister of Justice will quiet his qualms of conscience, if he has any, and be satisfied the evidence is sufficient to sustain the resolution, and will support it. There are very grave interests of Canada entrusted to the High Commissioner. I, for one, think we are warranted in saying that a public servant, be he in a high position or in a humble position, should discharge the duties he is called upon to discharge. If this office be one the country demands—and I must differ from others in that regard, as I believe there are great Canadian interests which should be attended to, and that the office is one we ought to maintain—the incumbent of that office should be at all times on the spot where his services are required, instead of being free, as the present incumbent is, to come and go as he pleases. I do not say he came to Canada on his own motion, but he is constantly absent from his duties, and at critical periods. Take for example what is going on now. About a week ago there came across the wires news that the authorities at Liverpool had stopped a cargo of cattle from landing, on the charge that pleuro-pneumonia had broken out among the herd. Where was the High Commissioner on that occasion ? We are just commencing now our cattle shipments for the year, and I see by the press that Sir Charles Tupper has gone to Vienna. It is said that he has gone there to take part in some convention of a public character, having to do with the postal system ; but I maintain that the cattle interest alone, which has been referred to by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), is of such great importance to the country that the High Commissioner should not be for one moment out of reach during that shipping period. Let that trade be checked seriously for a moment, and the result will be great injury to the best interests of the people. But the unfounded and unwarrantable act to which I have referred, of stopping the landing of the cattle, depreciated the value of cattle in Canada. And yet, with the experience before us, with the possibility of that happening to-morrow, with the possibility of its happening even while we are engaged in this debate, the one trusted servant to whom we have given charge of our interests, and who, it is said, is so capable of guarding them, is away on the continent a thousand miles from the scene of danger. I say that his duties demand his attendance on the spot ; and whilst these exigencies do not exist in the winter months, yet, if he has to be at the beck and call of his party on all occasions, we may have him removed from his legitimate sphere of action at the very moment he ought to be there. But leaving that question aside and coming back to the resolution itself, whilst perhaps Sir Charles Tupper has not in his speeches, as the Minister of Justice has contended, expressly declared that the Liberal party and the electorate supporting it are disloyal, yet he has endeavoured to hold out to the people that there was a very disloyal sentiment in Canada ; and he has been pluming himself since the election on the assured fact that he and his allies succeeded in saving Canada to the British flag. His whole attitude bears out the statement in the resolution before us ; and whatever may be said with reference to the accusation brought against the Liberal party, there is no controversy as to the facts with regard to the Grand Trunk. So far as the Liberal party is concerned they can withstand such assaults ; their record is sufficient to carry them safely through any such attacks. It may serve party purposes to make these accusations ; it may serve hon. gentlemen opposite to give colour to the accusation of the High Commissioner, but I contend the Liberal party is true to the interests of Canada. And it is ungenerous and unpatriotic on the part of the High Commissioner or a Minister of the Crown, or any member of the House, to assail any portion of the community and to thus inflict an injury upon the whole country. The fact that the party opposite endeavoured to capture a victory on any such ground explains why they will not to-day admit candidly that a great mistake has been made and promise amendment for the future. Why, the hon. member for Assiniboia admitted that, when he pleaded for mercy to the High Commissioner——

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. MULOCK—on the ground that he had committed an error.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman asked us: Are you going to punish a great man like the High Commissioner, who saved the cattle trade, for one error?

Mr. DAVIN. I said, if there was an error.

Mr. MULOCK. Why speak of hypothesis at all. If there was no error, why dream of error. There was no error, according to my hon. friend's judgment, because what the High Commissioner did was not done accidentally. At the same time it was in strictness, as he says, an error, but I am not prepared, because of the services that a public man may have rendered in one capacity, to entirely free him from responsibility for errors he may have committed. Praise and blame come to all men. Men ought to receive due recognition for their services, and if they transgress they should receive censure, and that is the position in which Sir Charles has placed himself. The facts being proved, as the Minister of Justice admits, the resolution should pass, and I trust the House will pass the resolution.

Mr. TUPPER. I shall have to ask the indulgence of the House while I intervene in this debate, not so much to press any individual argument of my own home to the minds of those who have followed the motion, but, in justice to one who is absent, to produce some evidence and some statements directly in point and upon which, if anything, this motion is based, but which, strange to say, and not to their credit, hon. gentlemen who ask the censure of this House upon Sir Charles Tupper have refrained from producing. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House drew its attention to a portion of the argument of the Minister of Justice, and I think his statement of a portion of that argument was as fair as the statements made by other hon. gentlemen during this debate. The hon. gentleman, in stating the position of the Minister of Justice, forgot entirely what the Minister of Justice said. The Minister of Justice pointed out, not merely that no evidence had been produced by the leader of the Opposition in support of the very serious and very grave amendment which he presented to the House, but he stated two or three things—first, that it was significant and extraordinary that a motion of this kind should be presented to the House without any presentation of the evidence upon which it was based; secondly, that the evidence could not be produced; and, thirdly, that this evidence went to show that, if the facts were presented to the House, there would be no reason or cause for censure. Now, the hon. gentleman, in endeavouring to strengthen the position of his leader, has to resort to evidence which was never alluded to by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has been compelled to rush off to the columns of a newspaper and to give extract after extract in support of this motion, stating that that language justified the motion, that that was the proof, and yet the leader of the Opposition, wholly regardless of that evidence, without having it under his hand, asked the House to rush pell-mell, without any evidence, into a condemnation of a political opponent. I say—and I speak under some difficulty and shall be careful, as I hope not to allow myself to be carried away too much by personal feeling—that the records of this House, from the first time of its history down to the present, do not show such an indecent haste as has been exhibited here in connection with the motion now under consideration. I say that men who have held not half such important positions as that of the High Commissioner in England to-day, when charged with having committed any impropriety against the Rules of this House, or with having improperly discharged their duties, have had the charges presented to the House in a formal and decent manner. If this case is anything like as serious as hon. gentlemen pretend it is, if it were not connected with political spleen, and party spite, and party malice, you would have seen a very different resolution from this one, a resolution which embodied some spirit of fair-play. If these hon. gentlemen were sure of their case, if they were sure that a case could be made out justifying a vote of censure, they would have asked either for a special committee, where all the evidence could be marshalled and examined, or, at all events, they would have given the officer holding the high position which they say the High Commissioner holds, an opportunity of meeting them face to face, at the Bar of the House. But it will be remembered that, when the High Commissioner was inside the Bar, these charges were not made in the same tones or with the same animus as we have heard them declaimed in this debate. The hon. gentlemen who have forgotten themselves in the language they have used in this debate were then the most polite members in their references to Sir Charles Tupper. I will admit that this does not apply to the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), whose language was always as abusive, as personal, and as—I was about to use a worse expression, but perhaps the Rules of the House would not permit it—when that hon. gentleman was present, as when he is absent, and the language he now uses will, no doubt, be as effective in the House and in the country outside as the arguments which he indulged in before. But, outside of that hon. gentleman, who has never been guilty of civility to anyone in this House, whether in his own party or opposed to him, an hon. gentleman who has never been known to say a kind thing in regard to anybody—and I have sat in Parliament with him for a long time—what are we to think of the other hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), after being one of the most polite men Sir Charles Tupper had a chance of meeting in political life, either in this House or out of it, was in such haste to heap up abuse on that hon. gentleman that he even forgot the Queen's English. He spoke of him as an "unveracious calumniator."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I used the words of his leader.

Mr. TUPPER. I can stand, and the High Commissioner can stand, all the other epithets used by the other hon. gentlemen so that I need not expose them in this House, nor need I dwell on that unfortunate family history of theirs, but I insist, on behalf of the High Commissioner, that good English should be used in this House. Foul words flow across this House very frequently, but a professor of law at a great university, a distinguished philosopher, should not make such an exhibition of ill-temper as to abuse a man in such bad English as that.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. TUPPER. When the House rose for recess I was about to do what the hon. gentlemen who are promoting this resolution of censure, have largely abstained from doing, and that was to consider what the charges in that motion were, what those charges involved, what evidence there was to support them, and what the facts of the case really were. Hon. gentlemen have been listening to fierce phillipics against the character of Sir Charles Tupper, they have listened in this House to a repetition of all the stale slanders that are found in the political pit of garbage for the last thirty years, during which time the character of the hon. gentleman which is under discussion, has been so acceptable to the majority of the people of this country as to excite the intense envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness of the leaders of the party which he has damaged so materially, not merely in the last election but in all the elections in which he has been engaged more or less over that very long period in the life of a public man. The proposed motion of censure is, I submit, not supported in fact, cannot be supported in fact. Those who are promoting it have carefully abstained from the most satisfactory course that could be adopted to prove either the truth or the falsity of the charges therein contained. In several particulars the resolution proposed is extravagantly inaccurate, extravagantly false, not to say cowardly in the extreme. It reads:

"The conduct and language of Sir Charles Tupper' High Commissioner of Canada in England, in interfering in the recent elections and in imputing treasonable and disloyal motives to a large proportion of the people of this Dominion, and also in assailing and vilifying the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and in reflecting upon the position of the said Company, is a breach of the duties of the office——"

And so forth. These statements have not been supported except from the mouths of gentlemen who are smarting from the effects of a defeat at a time when they confidently counted on victory. Those gentlemen have said what they considered the words "Liberal party" to mean. It is true those hon. gentlemen said that Sir Charles Tupper did all these terrible things, but they have each and every one failed, and I believed they feared, to read to this House the extended remarks of any speech or the whole of any article written by that gentleman. But they have attempted to garble speeches, to give an extract here and there, and quickly coupled with that extract their own partisan and heated interpretation. There has been, in my humble judgment, no attempt at fair play. I admit, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am not the best judge of the mode of conducting the debate on this subject. I speak under all these difficulties, I see them face to face: but, notwithstanding that, whatever may be the motives that may be supposed to induce me to speak as I do, I am fully aware that in this House and out of it, no mere word of mine will influence the opinion of any man, woman, or child in the country. But to the record I appeal, and the record of the gentleman attacked is, I submit, strong and unimpeachable. Now, the hon. gentlemen have, I contend, not been able to show that Sir Charles Tupper imputed treasonable and disloyal motives to a large proportion of the people of this Dominion. On the contrary, the position taken by that hon. gentleman in the contest, at an important period in the history of this country, at a crisis in the history of the Dominion of Canada, is the position taken by the majority of the people of this country, is the position taken by the majority of the members of this House, is the position sustained by the overwhelming majority of the province from which that gentleman came, and in which that gentleman is best known, and is a position sustained, I am sure, by a majority of the hon. gentlemen opposite. For, mark you, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles Tupper was as careful as the leaders with whom he worked in the late campaign, clearly to distinguish the opinions of the electors of this country from the opinions of certain leaders of a certain political party in this country. I took an important part in the campaign in one of the smaller and minor provinces, as some gentlemen are pleased to call them. I was on many a hustings outside of my own county, and continuously in that county, and I never heard in any part of the Province of Nova Scotia, or in the county I have the honour to represent, any friend of mine, or any member of the Liberal-Conservative party, bring the charge alluded to against any appreciable proportion of the people of this country. We were careful not to do so. We believed that the record of the Liberal party was such as to preclude the truth of such a charge being established; we believed that the history of Canada from 1867 to the present day had been such that it was only necessary for a public man to point out the dangers of a course of the kind that was being pursued by politicians and by men anxious to obtain power by any means, in order to secure its condemnation and annihilation. I say, coming from the Province of Nova Scotia, that had it not been that the Liberals professed to be out of sympathy with such a course as the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), for instance, has laid down; if the hon. gentlemen now sitting in this House, some of whom I have heard on the platform, had not taken the earliest opportunity to insist that they would never support the policy defined by the member for South Oxford, that of discriminating against the mother country in favour of a foreign country, instead of there being three, or four, or five members from the Province of Nova Scotia supporting that hon. gentleman, not one man could have been returned from any constituency in that province. Why, so far from it being true that we waged the battle on those lines, so far from it being true that this was a general charge that was hurled against the Opposition, it has been stated over and over again by members on this side of the House, and by their friends in this country, that there was no real annexation sentiment in this country or in any province of it, but that the people were being tricked and played with. That was the charge made openly, on the hustings, before the people. And the great difficulty was to open the eyes of all the electors to the serious conspiracy that was going on, aided and abetted as it was by men in a foreign country, supported as it was by men high in position in the political arena in this country;

but the confidence of the Liberal-Conservative party was that so soon as the electors realized the designs of those designing leaders, of those reckless leaders, of those leaders who seemed for the moment to stoop to anything to deceive the people, their opinions would be declared. I have heard the expression "ruined gamesters" used. There were gamesters in the fight, and the people understood who the gamesters were. The Liberal-Conservative party and its leaders felt their only duty was to expose the game, not on the part of the Liberal Opposition of the country, not on the part of a great proportion of that party, but on the part of their leaders, and the outside allies of those leaders in a foreign country. Sir Charles Tupper, with all the faults that have been laid at his door, has been admittedly to some extent a successful and not entirely a stupid politician. So far as his experience has gone, or the experience of the country has decided, is it to be supposed that he branded the whole Liberal party, and thereby a large portion of the people, as traitors and as disloyal? To take the lowest ground of political expediency, can it be believed that Sir Charles Tupper was guilty of the first charge contained in the resolution, and, second, that it was necessary or politic to take such a position in this country. I can show by the record, by the written words, by the reported utterances of the man whose character is maligned, of the man who is attacked by men who desire to wound him, as far as they can notwithstanding all their ineffectual attempts in the past, the statements in the resolution to be false and shamefully false. For instance, take the statement of the issues involved in the late campaign. When reviewing them in an article already alluded to, what was the language of the gentleman concerned? Some references have been made to these articles and to his speeches, but they were fragmentary and incomplete, and consisted of extracts prepared to suit a purpose. In an article in the North American Review for May, 1891, published by Sir Charles Tupper, this is the statement made, and I ask the attention of those hon. members who desire, before recording their votes, to consider the material facts involved:

"Mr. Wiman boasts that he is a British subject; yet after he had propounded his scheme for commercial union in an address to the Boot and Shoe Club at Boston, in January last, when exception was taken to it by Mr. Murray on the ground that it did not insure the annexation of Canada to the United States, the Boston Herald of January 22 reports:

"'Mr. Wiman briefly replied to the arguments used by Mr. Murray. The speaker urged that, if it was desired to lessen the power of England, that end could not be accomplished better than by Canada trading with the United States and ceasing to trade with Great Britain.' * * * 'The very thing Mr. Murray wants to accomplish,' said Mr. Wiman, 'will be better accomplished by the plan I propose than by the plan he proposes.'"

I may say for the information of those hon. gentlemen who have not studied this question, or looked into it, that Mr. Murray's plan was the kind plan of starving us out, of refusing unrestricted reciprocity or reciprocity of any kind, so that the design would be accomplished, according to this patriotic citizen of the United States, of bringing our country finally and fully within the confines of the American union; and Mr. Wiman urged that his proposal of commercial union would more speedily bring about that desired end than that system of force and compulsion. Sir Charles Tupper goes on to say:

Mr. TUPPER.

"If that is not sufficient, read Mr. Wiman's sworn evidence, page 752 of testimony taken by the Senate commission:

"Suppose your commission should report in favour of unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States; then suppose at the next general election, which takes place within the next eighteen months, the Liberal party, adopting that as the sole plank in their platform, should be returned by a large majority, and Parliament should take on a commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity complexion——"

I stop merely to remind those hon. gentlemen who are following me that that was the scheme to bring about, in the opinion of Mr. Wiman, political union, and not merely the opinion of Mr. Wiman, but in the opinion of Mr. Blake also.—

—"they would be in control of the Government; they would meet your invitation by a vote; that would have to go to England to be consented to by the royal authorities."

Any schoolboy, let alone a member of this House, is aware that this allusion to 1776, and the Boston tea-party, means resistance to the wishes and desires of the mother country. Sir Charles Tupper continues:

"Suppose the English Government refused; then the Canadians would be relieved from their fealty, which would be as much a justification for a Boston tea-party as there was in 1776 or prior.

"So that nothing could contribute so much to bring about annexation, if it is thought in the end to be desirable, as to have closer commercial relations."

He concludes this article by saying:

"But the ugly fact remained that Mr. Wiman, convicted by the letters of Mr. Farrer——"

I may mention that Mr. Farrer occupied a very high and responsible position on a paper supposed to be controlled and largely owned by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) —the Toronto Globe. Mr. Farrer was the brains of that paper, and was the acknowledged editor, and the significance of this statement is proved more strongly by the fact that when the designs of that man were exposed to the electors of the country a flank movement had to be executed, and a man, his junior on the paper, a man not possessing the ability to fill it as compared with Mr. Farrer, was placed in the position, and Mr. Farrer ceased to occupy the position of the editor of the Toronto Globe. Whether that statement is correct or not, this statement is notorious. Mr. Farrer is still the ablest writer in the columns of the Globe, the organ of the Opposition party, then or now largely under the control and inspiration of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).—

—"and Mr. Hitt being engaged in a treasonable conspiracy to subvert British institutions in Canada, still implored for 'moral support' from Congress and the people of the United States for the Laurier-Cartwright party, and the Government were sustained by a larger majority than they had at the previous general elections. To complete the discomfiture of the Opposition, this was followed by the publication of a letter from the Hon. Ed. Blake, one of the most able and respected members of the party who, rather than bind himself to their policy, had ceased to be their leader——"

I take it that no one will deny the accuracy of that statement. I take it that that statement has been proved, and the only answer is the outraged feeling expressed by the hon. member for South Oxford that we obtained the evidence of treason and conspiracy in an underhand manner. Sir Charles Tupper continues:

—"and who now declares that his refusal to go into the battle with them was because he was unable to fight under false colours."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TUPPER. Some hon. members say "Oh, oh." No doubt their feelings are aggravated by the verification of that statement. I ask the House to mark these words, written in May, 1891, and which are germane to the words in the resolution of censure :—

"Mr. Blake, who I may say, represents the great body of the Opposition, who, with few exceptions, are loyal to British institutions, has rudely torn the mask which Farrer fixed, from the faces of the conspirators and the delusion of unrestricted reciprocity may be regarded as dead and buried."

Some hon. gentlemen may claim that unrestricted reciprocity is a pretty lively corpse, but that it is a corpse I do not think anyone denies, and that it has been decently buried can hardly be gainsaid with safety. I had the opportunity of taking part in an election after the general elections and it seemed to me that the hon. member who now sits for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) accepted the situation like a man, and got in very quickly behind the form of the late leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) and not behind the present leader of the Opposition. But Sir Charles Tupper is on record further in reference to what he did say, and mark you, Mr. Speaker, all that I have read and all that I propose to read from the pen or from the lips of Sir Charles Tupper is in perfect accord and on the lines of the statements made by the recognized leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party in this country, and which were endorsed and ratified by the people at the polls. The remark applies to all, with the solitary exception as to the statements made and the proofs admitted in the press, concerning the action taken by that corporation known as the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. That portion alone of the censure is to some extent, so far as we have evidence before us, separated from the policy upon which the people have already pronounced, and upon which they pronounced in so unmistakable a manner. In the Contemporary Review for May, 1891, Sir Charles Tupper further explains, for the benefit, no doubt, of hon. gentlemen who with malice for him and general ill-will towards the party on this side of the House, have stated his views to be exactly contrary to what he himself has expressed them to be. He says :

"About four years ago an Americanized Canadian who has resided in New York for the last quarter of a century, found them, like Japhet, in search of a policy——"

It is to be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the Opposition did not complain of that language, and I take it that they not having denied it, and not having cavilled about it, and not having made any great fuss over it, that they do admit they were in search of a policy, that they were on their last legs so to speak, and that Mr. Wiman or any other gentleman who was in control of considerable funds in the neighbouring country, might very well be the leader for those who had found such great difficulty in organizing within their own country and on their own resources.—

"About four years ago an Americanized Canadian who has resided in New York for the last quarter of a century, found them, like Japhet, in search of a policy, and an easy prey to his scheme of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Laurier joined hands with Mr. Wiman, and the Hon. Mr. Hitt, a member of the House of Representatives in the United States, in agitating this policy in the press, on the platform, in the House of Representatives in the United States, and in the Canadian House of Commons. Sir Richard Cartwright obtained the services of Mr. Ed. Farrer to edit the Globe newspaper, his principal organ. Mr. Wiman, in the United States, pointed out the means of 'capturing Canada,' and utilizing her 5,000,000 of consumers to promote the interests of American manufacturers, while Sir Richard Cartwright agitated Canada, both in and out of Parliament, with the pernicious doctrine of utter dependence upon the United States."

I recollect, in this connection, that until the last election, when the eyes of the people of this country were really opened as to what the conspiracy meant, that these two gentlemen—at Ingersoll, I think, one of them, and at Oakville, I think, two of them—used to refer to these gentlemen across the border as "our allies in the United States;" but in the last campaign not one of them was man enough to continue that appellation. Mr. Wiman, who wrote very mischievous articles—articles that, I freely admit, assisted us materially in the campaign, by exposing the designs and giving proof of the conspiracy that was alleged by the people and by a large number of their representatives—Mr. Wiman was utterly ignored by them. Indeed, on some platforms he was actually denounced, but, nevertheless, the people understood that at picnics where Mr. Wiman was present with a good and leal Liberal of this House, or an Attorney-General in a good Reform Cabinet in one of the provinces, or no matter where he was, his utterances were reported in the columns of the Toronto Globe; his pamphlets were distributed over this country, and all the good was taken that could be taken out of the mouth of an admitted traitor, out of the mouth of a man who was a self-confessed traitor and conspirator at public meetings in Massachusetts and before committees of Congress. This man is the man with whom it is stated Sir Richard Cartwright and the Hon. Mr. Laurier joined hands; and they also joined hands with the Hon. Mr. Hitt, a member of the House of Representatives in the United States, in agitating this policy in the press, on the platform, in the House of Representatives in the United States, and in the Canadian House of Commons. He proceeds :

"The Honourable Mr. Hitt had reported a resolution from the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives proposing commercial union with Canada. He described it in these terms :

"What is commercial union with Canada? It means, as set out in this resolution, the adoption by both countries of precisely the same tariff of duties or taxes to be levied on goods coming from abroad, abolishing altogether our line of custom houses on the north, by which we collect tariff duties on goods coming from Canada; abolishing their custom houses along the same line, by which they collect duties upon goods we send into Canada; and leaving intercourse as unrestricted between this country and Canada as it is between the States. The line of custom houses would follow the sea and include both countries.

"The internal revenue system of taxes on liquors and tobacco in the two countries would also have to be made uniform in both.

"The proceeds of taxation thus collected would be equitably divided, and the fairest way would seem to be in proportion to population."

I may call the attention of the hon. gentlemen of this House to the fact that Mr. Hitt is the man who only a short time before the general election was fondly numbered among "the allies of the great Liberal party of this country." It goes on to say :

"Mr. Hitt had invariably resisted any action in Congress for freer trade relations with Canada. The 'Congressional Record' reports him as saying on the 8th of June, 1888: 'I am in favour of unrestricted trade with Canada, and still more of commercial union, and with the hope of such a solution of all our troubles in the north."

Their chief troubles in the north are that they could not obtain any share of the fisheries which belong to us as a right, but which they desire to have, and which any State in the Union would be just as zealous of guarding from any other State as we are zealous of guarding them from the United States, or any other country in the world. It continues:

"I have thought we should not at this time touch the tariff of lumber and the other products of Canada while they are a motive for an active movement toward us from this side of Canada. At the great meeting in Toronto on the 17th of February, Sir John Macdonald charged Mr. Farrer, the leading editor of the Globe newspaper, the organ of the Opposition, with having secretly printed twelve copies of a pamphlet containing these atrocious suggestions for the destruction of Canada, and forcing it into annexation with the United States."

This is the language of one of the men now I believe, and certainly then, in the pay and in the service of hon. gentlemen opposite or their leaders, or of those acting with them and for whom their leaders are responsible:

"The imposition by the United States of a tonnage tax on all Nova Scotian vessels, laden whole or in part with fish, would speedily put an end to seizures, and, indeed, the whole controversy. Another ready way of bringing the Government and all concerned to their senses would be to suspend the bonding privilege, or to cut the connection of the Canadian Pacific with United States territory at Sault Ste. Marie. Either of these methods would rouse the full force of Eastern Canada influence against the Government.

"It would be better still to oblige Britain to withdraw her countenance and support from the Canadian contention as she did in 1871. That would secure the end desired, without leaving the United States open to the charge of being animated by hatred of Canada, on which Sir John Macdonald trades. Whatever course the United States may see fit to adopt, it is plain that Sir John's disappearance from the stage is to be the signal for a movement towards annexation. The enormous debt of the Dominion ($50 per head), the virtual bankruptcy of all the provinces, except Ontario,——"

One would imagine the hon. gentleman from South Oxford had written this, and not his editor—

—"the pressure of the American tariff upon trade and industry, the incurable issue of race, and the action of the natural forces making for the consolidation of the lesser country with the greater have already prepared the minds of most intelligent Canadians for the destiny that awaits them, and a leader will be forthcoming when the hour arrives."

"Mr. Farrer admitted the publication, but attempted to excuse himself by saying:

"'Not a single one was circulated in Washington or elsewhere. I can vouch for that. They were not intended for the eye of any person in Congress, nor had I the remotest intention of prejudicing the case of Canada in respect of the North Atlantic fisheries. I wrote freely and privately concerning what I regard as the illogical, unfair, and wholly out-of-date policy which the Government of the Dominion has pursued towards the vessels of a friendly neighbour, and, having been asked, proffered my view of the mode which I should favour, were I an American, of bringing about a more rational state of affairs for both countries.'

"The Globe supported this denial by the following statement in its issue of February 21——"

And I call the attention of this House to this important part of the statement made by a man, whether he is the High Commissioner, or whether he is a Conservative politician who has achieved a great success to the chagrin of his opponents, now savage and wild from their continued defeats, as a statement not only worthy of the notice of the two contending parties in this country, but worthy of careful consideration, which I believe it got in the main, at the hands of all people interested in the welfare and the autonomy of the Dominion of Canada.—

"The Empire alleged yesterday that the pamphlet written by Mr. Farrer was written for the information of Mr. Hitt, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Commission at Washington. Mr. Hitt telegraphed yesterday as follows:—'I never saw or heard of the pamphlet described by Sir John Macdonald. Nor have I ever heard of Canadians coming here for political consultations, although I have seen many distinguished Canadians, both Conservatives and Liberals, whom I have met socially, but nothing more.—R. R. HITT.'"

"Finding," says Sir Charles Tupper, in answer to this:

—"that we were face to face with a formidable conspiracy to subvert British institutions in Canada, and annex it to the United States, I felt it my duty to lay before the public, at a meeting at Windsor, 23rd February, the following evidence in my possession which conclusively proves that Messrs. Farrer, Wiman and Hitt were united in that conspiracy:—

"'TORONTO, 22nd April, 1889.

"'MY DEAR MR. WIMAN,—Our Ottawa man will send a good summary of your speech, so that on our account you need not go to the trouble of preparation. At present the commercial union movement is at a standstill. First of all the Jesuit agitation, which is here to stay, has to some extent supplanted it.'"

That was what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) thought when he made certain references to the leader of the Opposition with which I did not sympathize.

Mr. CHARLTON. You ought not to have stolen the letter.

Mr. TUPPER. Ah, there is the cry. The only defence to the exposure of this conspiracy is: "You ought not to have stolen the letter." But I think the main thing is to lay the traitor by the heels.—

"'Secondly, the general belief is that the Republicans would not listen to any such scheme. Thirdly, a very large number of persons are inclined to think that we had better make for annexation at once instead of making two bites on the cherry. Lastly, the old parties here are rapidly breaking up, and when Sir John goes we shall be adrift without a port in sight, save annexation. Moreover, although the Liberals have taken up commercial union they are not pushing it with any vigour.'"

No; scandal is the stock in trade of some parties.—

"'For these reasons the Mail has, in the slang of the day, given the subject a rest. There is really no use talking it up to a people whose politics are in a state of flux, and whose future is wrapped in doubt. I saw Mr. Hoar while at Washington, and told him just what he says I did, namely: That the smaller forces favour annexation, and will favour it all the more if commercial union be withheld. It seems to me, and I have talked the matter over lately with maritime members as well as with Manitobans, that commercial union would only delay the coming of the event those people most desire. Hence, in the provinces referred to commercial union does not take hold, whereas annexation will always demand a hearing. In Ontario the Jesuit campaign has brought that aspect of things home to thousands who would not look at commercial union. The littleness——'"

I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to Mr. Edward Farrer now.—

—"'The littleness and half-heartedness of the Liberals is also very disheartening.'"

I ask especial attention to this.—

—"'Then, again, the truth is that every man who preaches commercial union would prefer annexation, so that the party is virtually wearing a mask.'"

Why is not Mr. Farrer censured, I ask? Why is he not brought to the Bar of this House for slandering these hon. gentlemen? I believe he told the truth about hon. gentlemen opposite; I believe he knew of what he was talking about when he spoke of the "littleness and half-heartedness" of these hon. gentlemen who he said were wearing a mask; but I do not include in that the rank and file of the Liberal party, as I said before. The designing leaders—those are the men that Mr. Farrer and I have in view just now. Then he says :

"'Can't you come round this way and have a talk.

"'Yours very truly,

(Signed) "'E. FARRER.'"

I know that hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten these letters. They were all astray, Mr. Speaker, when they singled out Sir Charles Tupper; they had forgotten all the documentary evidence. Certainly it is charitable to say so, because they produced none. Then, this is from Washington :

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"WASHINGTON, D.C., April 25, 1889.

"ERASTUS WIMAN, Esq.,
314 Broadway, New York,

"DEAR SIR,—I am greatly obliged to you for sending to me the proof slips of the North American article, and have been much interested also in Mr. Farrer's letter, which surprised me somewhat, as I did not think from his conversation, which gave me a very favourable impression, that he would be so easily discouraged. The reasons he gives existed before the commercial union movement began, with greater force than to-day. The Republicans, as protectionists, it was apprehended would be against it. They are not. Their representatives voted for it, their newspapers have received it kindly, and often with warm approval. The Jesuit agitation, which has taken the place of commercial union, in his mind, is largely sentimental, and will probably not last long. The other commercial union is a business question that concerns each citizen, and in a way which he does not understand at first, but sees more and more clearly the more he talks intelligently about it."

No doubt of that.—

"There is some logic in what F. says of not making two bites of a cherry, but going for annexation at once, but I think he is misled on that point in a way that often occurs. Where a man is thinking much upon a point and discussing it, he is liable to narrow his horizon to those within his reach; and his own mind, and, perhaps, those he meets, having passed on by discussion to distant results, he takes it for granted that the wide world, which is so wonderfully slow, has kept up with him, and has the same results in sight. We must be very patient with the slow moving popular mind. If the Canadian public of farmers, artisans, lumbermen, miners, and fishers, can be in three years argued up to the point of voting commercial union, and giving sanction to the movement in Parliament, it will be great progress. Slow as such movements are, the comforting thing is that they never go backward. To you personally it ought to be, in your moments of reflection, a consolation that long hereafter, when this ball which you set rolling has gone on and on, and finished its work, every one may then look back and see and appreciate the service done to mankind by the hand that set it in motion. I shall look with interest for what you say in Ottawa. The North American Review article will have a powerful tendency to keep our public men from scattering away on annexation next winter, and I hope we can get the offer of commercial union formulated into law. I return the proof slips of the article, and the letter of Mr. Farrer.

"Very truly yours,

(Signed) "R. R. HITT.

"P.S.—Just received yours of yesterday, with Goldwin Smith's; it reads admirably."

And said the man now under indictment :

"These letters had been sent to me by a gentleman who received them from Mr. Wiman himself, and who did not disapprove of the use I made of them at so important a crisis. No man can read them and arrive at any other conclusion than that the object and design of Messrs. Wiman, Hitt and Farrer was the annexation of Canada to the United States. They only differed upon the best way in which to accomplish that object. Mr. Farrer was for taking off the mask and acting boldly; Messrs. Wiman and Hitt thought that would endanger success, and that a surer way of obtaining the same result would be to induce the Parliament of Canada to declare for free trade with the United States, with discrimination against England, which must inevitably lead to a quarrel between England and Canada and the severance of the tie that binds us to the Crown."

And to conclude, Sir Charles Tupper quoted the language of another gentleman, who held a distinguished position in this House, and who occupies now, and so long as he lives will continue to occupy, a distinguished position in this country. I refer to Mr. Blake; and if hon. gentlemen opposite had been fighting for a principle, if they had not been seeking merely to give vent to personal abuse and personal explanations, they would have coupled the name of the Hon. Edward Blake with that of Sir Charles Tupper in a considerable portion of the resolution of censure now under consideration. Mr. Blake, as Sir Charles Tupper said in the article from which I quote, used these words :

"The tendency in Canada of unrestricted free trade with the States, high duties being maintained against the United Kingdom, would be towards political union, and the more successful the plan, the stronger the tendency, both by reason of the community of interests, the intermingling of populations, the more intimate business and social connections, and the trade and fiscal relations, amounting to dependency, which it would create with the States and of the greater isolation and divergence from Britain which it would produce, and also, especially through inconvenience experienced in the maintenance and apprehensions entertained as to the termination of the treaty, our hopes and our fears alike would draw one way. We would then indeed be looking to Washington."

And yet because he spoke in support of that statement of the Hon. Edward Blake, they ask that Sir Charles Tupper be censured, for having imputed treasonable and disloyal motives to a large portion of the people of this Dominion. According to these hon. gentlemen, he and Mr. Blake imputed those motives to a large proportion of the people of this country. Sir, they imputed them, I impute them, to the men who advocated the scheme of unrestricted reciprocity, reciprocity in conspiracy or in conjunction with the men in the United States, whose utterances I have just read. Why, Sir, not Sir Charles Tupper alone did that. The members of this Government, whom hon. gentlemen opposite have been so anxious to separate from the High Commissioner, have done that. Why is it that throughout this debate, after the leader of the Government stated that it was at his desire the High Commissioner came to this country and spoke the utterances for which he is now called to account, there is so transparent an effort on the part of these hon. gentlemen to remove all blame from the members of the Treasury benches? How is it that they are endeavouring to stir up the feeling that there is a desire on the part of the Government to put all the blame on Sir Charles Tupper? Their opinion certainly, under the circumstances, should be infinitely worse of the late colleagues of Sir Charles Tupper than of that gentleman himself; and the gentlemen who have spoken in this debate have not attempted to conceal what their feelings are personally towards their old opponent. I can assure those hon. gentlemen—those gentlemen honourable by the position they hold, but who have stooped to the language we have heard for the past two days in this House, those gentlemen who have taken pains to rake up the old Hansards to find where men have fouled their lips by using language for which they cannot be called to account—I can assure them that, as the language they quoted fell lightly on the head of the man against whom it was uttered, and as the people have treated those statements and charges and the men who made them and now repeat them, so they fall lightly on my head and so they will again be received by the people. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) endeavoured to grow excited the other evening, and it is seldom we see him excited;

it is seldom a man of his curious temperament, who is always so judicial, surprises us all as he did, by stating that he was highly indignant at any improper or treasonable motives being imputed to him : and in an outburst of anger and resentment, he endeavoured to reach a grand period in his denial of all those charges. The man he said, who would make these charges against him face to face, he would brand as a coward. It seems to me the man who would do so might be branded by many names according to the facts ; but surely the hon. gentleman should prefer that the charges be made to his face, and in that event his charge of cowardice, it seems to me, would fall rather flat. But before Mr. Farrer took possession of the Globe—or the hon. member for South Oxford, I do not know which—at any rate, before Mr. Farrer—or Mr. Farrer and the member for South Oxford—was in charge of the Toronto Globe, there were men in control of that paper who would rather cut off their right hand than be guilty of the utterances of the hon. member for South Oxford or Mr. Farrer, to which I have referred, and which were before the people of this country. In 1880, I suppose it was the late Hon. George Brown who was in charge of the editorial columns of that paper. At any rate, I could give to the House language far stronger than that used by Sir Charles Tupper, characterizing the aspirations of the leaders of the Reform party and the significance of the policy that they put before the people, and which they endeavoured to strengthen by co-operating with Messrs. Hitt and Wiman in the United States. In 1880, this was the language used by the Toronto Globe :

"What is the main promise of those who wish to detach the Dominion from Great Britain in order to make the country a preserve for Yankee manufacturers, who are totally unable to compete with British manufacturers on fair terms."

And we know that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated in Ingersoll, and at Orillia in February last, and elsewhere, that his scheme of unrestricted reciprocity meant a discrimination against the goods of the mother country in favour of those of the United States. Indeed, in no other way, he said, could it be obtained. The Globe went on to say—was the Globe then charging disloyalty or not ?

"One little corner of the 'market of 50,000,000 people' is offered to Canadians as the price of their national extinction ! Men who advocate a base surrender of their country for money do not cease to be disgusting though they become also ridiculous when it is evident they are duped by their own sordid imagination."

There is a phrase in that under which hon. gentlemen who have so much addressed themselves to this subject to-night, might take a certain amount of comfort. The Globe speaks of them as dupes, not as out-and-out unmitigated traitors ; and perhaps the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) may take advantage of that, and may say that he does not mean what Messrs. Wiman and Hitt consider to be the result of his policy, but that he has all along been a dupe, to use the language of the Toronto Globe in 1880. The principal feature of the question under discussion has been only passingly alluded to, and that is the conduct of a public officer. When we started out, and these gentlemen's hands were not fully exposed in this debate, it seemed that it was not so much Sir Charles Tupper, that it was not so much an old opponent whose character was being assailed, but that it was a great principle that was involved, a principle of tremendous importance in the Government of this country that was at stake—that was how far a public officer could engage in a political contest with justice to the Government and to himself. The hon. gentlemen impugned the conduct of the Government, who invited and controlled the action of Sir Charles Tupper in this country, as a violation of our constitution. Some people who have not followed the action of these hon. gentlemen might be led astray by this course of debate, they might think that of all men the leaders of the Opposition were the men to denounce that course of action and to oppose any interference with the election. I have already called the late leader of the Opposition to the rescue of Sir Charles Tupper. I now call the present leader of the Opposition to the rescue of the man he has now denounced and seeks to censure. If there was any principle in the good old days of reform, as it was first preached in Canada, it was the principle that members of Local Governments should preserve the autonomy of the provinces and should sacredly observe the distinction between federal and local politics, so that it would be discreditable for any members of Local Governments to interfere in federal politics, and the hon. gentleman, who was then a follower of the hon. gentleman to whose utterances I am now alluding, no doubt subscribed to those doctrines. In 1871, Mr. Blake used these words, speaking for the Province of Ontario :

"My friends and myself thought and my Administration now thinks * * * that there should exist no other attitude on the part of the Provincial Government toward the Government of the Dominion than one of neutrality. * * * We believe that the Government of this province ought not to assume a position of either alliance or hostility towards the Government of the Dominion."

That would be consistent with the line of argument adopted on a very important part of the question now under consideration, but we have changed all that. A new leader has come to that party, and, with that new leader, there has come a new doctrine, and I ask the attention of the House to the new doctrine as laid down by the leader of the Opposition, who seeks to censure a gentleman for having to some extent adopted that principle, although, as I can show, his position is much stronger, as it is very different, from the position of a Local Government in a federal contest. Hon. gentlemen will admit that, in the last contest, while they were very confident of victory, it was a tremendous struggle, and they will also agree with me that a very large number of the people of Canada believed that we were passing through the most important crisis we have had to face since the year 1867. While some believed we were only a stage removed from civil war and civil strife, I can say, as a young student of political history, that political precedents should weigh very little in such a case with the men who have to bring the ship of state safely through the political storm. Members of the Conservative party went to the country and said they thought it was necessary to elect the Government again, no matter what side issues might be raised, because the national welfare was at stake. Of course hon. gentlemen opposite denied this, as they always deny any such statements, but it was a great crisis, and every effort was put forward by both parties to achieve success. For a moment I will give the hon. the leader of the Opposition credit for believing that his policy was to redound to the benefit of his party, and that, therefore, he was justified in resorting to a course which was not quite in the same line as that laid down by his late leader :

"Mr. Mercier, he said, would take off his coat and go to work and would be ardently supported by the members of his Cabinet. Mr. Laurier expressed the hope that the members of the Liberal Government of Ontario would do in this province what Mr. Mercier and his friends were doing in Quebec."

But I need not appeal to the utterances of the leader of the Opposition. In my own province it is notorious that the business of the Local Government was almost entirely suspended during the late federal campaign, that men who wanted to go into the mines office on important business had to be turned away with the statement that the Commissioner was in Lunenburg opposing my hon. friend (Mr. Kaulbach), who, I am happy to say, was not only able to overcome the regular opposition, but also the influence of the Local Government. The leader of the Government in that province went from one end of the province to the other, neglecting his duties, to use the language of the hon. gentleman with reference to the High Commissioner, and, while he did us great benefit, we are not so small as to ask that he should be indicted. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite say, that Sir Charles Tupper's efforts in Ontario were very ineffectual, but they have spent a great deal of time in considering how to counteract what he did in that province. Well, every member, the Attorney General, the Government of that province, all of them have taken this course, and while it could be said: What have we to do with the conduct of a Local Government? and while that answer might be urged against the argument I am now addressing to the House, I submit that there is much in it to show what the impulse is behind hon. gentlemen opposite, whether it is to uphold the constitution, whether it is to proclaim a regular and proper conduct on the part of public officers, or whether it is not to aim a blow, one out of many, to see whether it will not be more effectual in damaging the gentleman now under censure than the blows they have delivered so aimlessly before. The hon. member for South Oxford once alluded to this subject, and he said that when a public officer went into a political contest, he took his office in his hands. He went no further. That has been the principle all along, that is the principle laid down in the books, that when a public officer does that, he takes his political life in his hands. The English Parliament, this Parliament, and the Local Legislatures, have gone further on that general principle, and have legislated specifically so as to prevent certain officials leaving their offices and taking part in an electoral campaign. But the hon. member for South Oxford never, until it occurred to him in this case, took further ground, and said that the Government were bound to dismiss that officer. A distinction is now drawn ; there are officers and officers ; there is a great difference between the duties and functions of officers. Now, the House will bear with me while I attempt, with great diffidence, the defence of Sir Charles Tupper in a case of this kind. I would rather deal with a subject upon which I can freely speak. I claim, and I submit to the judgment of this House, that what he did and what he said, was in an entire accord with his leader, with his colleagues, with the men with whom he fought in that great national crisis. But I come to this other point, and I appeal to the hon. gentlemen, in considering the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper, to say whether there were not other peculiar circumstances connected with him and with his position. He was a public officer, forsooth ; he was a civil servant, supposed to be removed from all the feelings that pervade this Chamber and actuate men in political life. He was to be an impartial servant to this Government, and he was to keep aloof from all party politics. Did the hon. gentleman believe that? Did that statement come from their hearts, or was there not a smile on the face of many of them? Why, since 1884, when Sir Charles Tupper went to England, down to the present day, there has never been a session of this Parliament at which the time of this House has not been taken up by alluding to the utterances, the opinions of that gentleman upon questions of the day, and by asking this House to animadvert upon his conduct as a politician, not as an officer. They have singled out the items of the expenditure for the office of High Commissioner. They have supposed that the minds of men in this country were so small that they would resent these expenditures, which are large in ordinary life, I grant you, which are not large in the life that gentleman leads at the desire of the Government and people of this country, and they did this in order to prejudice the people, and in order to prejudice this House against him as a statesman. They have gone further, and they have endeavoured to influence—for there must have been some purpose of that kind—the electorate and the members of this House, by insisting that on the great question of the day, on the question of trade, and on the question of our relations with the United States, Sir Charles Tupper—not the High Commissioner, but Sir Charles Tupper—was diametrically opposed to his colleagues and to the Government of this country. I say that you cannot get an audience of free men together in the Dominion of Canada, and lay before them the attacks that have been levelled against that gentleman, the political allusions to him on these great questions of the day, and get them to say that it was not fair, that it was not decent, that it was not proper for him to come as he did, when that question was in the hands of the people, and explain to them, not merely that he was in sympathy with his old colleagues, but that the statements made against him by his old opponents were false, utterly false, hollow, miserable, and incapable of proof, going as he did before his old opponents upon the hustings in every part of Canada and challenging the popular verdict. You say he took his office in his hands, you ascribe all sorts of monetary considerations to him, all sorts of mean propensities. But he did this whether for good or bad reasons ; he took a step that certainly would have cost him his office under any circumstances, and he submitted, not merely his own case, he not merely answered the personal attacks that had been made upon him, but he submitted his own views as to the important crisis through which we were passing, and he has the satisfaction, after reading all that hon. gentlemen may say against him to-night, of knowing that the people of this country agreed with him, endorsed him, showed their confidence in him, and that position is, I think, a little pleasanter than the position of those gentlemen who have gone back to these old charges and have called him "bulldozer," "unveracious calumniator," "Canadian millionaire," "falsifier of facts," with "a black record of jobbery and plunder." Why, Mr. Speaker, whom have they not so attacked who has ever risen to any position of importance in the politics of this country? I ask what leading Conservative statesman of long standing in the Dominion arena, has ever been free from these calumnious charges, these miserable slanders. I regret to say, from the evidence we have now in this House, that no man can rise to a prominent position in political life in Canada without being the target of that kind of abuse, not merely in this Chamber, but from every little rag from the Globe down to the smallest two-penny-half-penny organ in the country. It is sad, but it is so. We must pass through that crisis as well, and, I hope, as happily as we have passed through the one to which I alluded. Now, if time permitted I would like to travel into another field. I would like to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of some evidence of the verdict of the people of this country, that it was not safe, considering the views expressed and the means taken to obtain a victory at the polls, to entrust hon. gentlemen opposite with the reins of power. I have already carefully stated that through the different ridings in my province, the charge of treason was not levelled at the Liberal party. I have read the statements of Sir Charles Tupper, where he guards himself carefully in this respect. But of treason to Canada, as well as to Great Britain, we had ample evidence. Since that question has been raised let me draw attention to some of the treason with which the Liberal-Conservative party has had to grapple, and in which, in most cases I think, and in all cases, it has been able to trample out in this country. For instance, I have alluded to the allies of the Liberal party in the United States. We have given—and I merely refer to the fact—tolerably good evidence of the object of certain people living in the United States in connection with their co-operation with the Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada. But has the House forgotten that allies of the Liberal leaders in this country declared their dire hatred of Canada and of their union with this country? I ask the hon. gentleman to recollect the language of their allies in the province from which I come, of the language used by men who acknowledge reform principles, so called, in Canada, who worked with them, who hoped for their success, and who have co-operated with them from the start down to the present day. I refer to the secessionists in Canada, to those men who preferred annexation and stated in the halls of the legislature they preferred annexation to the United States to union with Canada, and asserted that this was a revolt against Canada and nothing else. Those gentleman find pleasant company on the benches opposite, and the Attorney General of that province in former days, and at the present time, has not hesitated to say that the great question of the party there was Nova Scotia against Canada, and that was the issue. But I call on the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to furnish evidence of the traitorous effect of the doctrine he preaches. He asked for the proof, I have given the proof before my peers, the people have passed on it. This is the language in which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared what the doctrine he now advocates really means:

"Consider what is involved in saying that this country is dependent on the fiscal policy of a foreign power. These men who tell you that it is impossible to exist as a commercial people unless you have reciprocity, might as well tell the United States that if they want to drive you into the union, all they have to do is to refuse you reciprocity for a certain number of years longer, which is the very best way that could be adopted of inducing the American people to refuse to enter into commercial relations with us. For my part I will deny that we are dependent upon them in one way or another, and no Canadian statesman can do a worse service than to spread that idea among a great number of his fellow countrymen."

That is his own construction of the language he he has used on husting after hustings and it is language now recorded on the journals of this House. But I could go further, and give further proof. It is true I am merely telling what hon. gentlemen have read before, but we must, in order to be decent in the consideration of this question, place these matters on record and have the whole question fairly considered. This is the language used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at Boston, Massachusetts, when the hon. gentleman received his new title; and since the day he was appointed Senator of the United States for the Province of Ontario, no one, I believe, has ever seen the Order of St. Michael and St. George, or any sign that he belongs to the British aristocracy, against which the member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) sneered so vigorously. The hon. member for South Oxford said:

"Briefly, Sir, if this project can be carried out it will mean for you the addition of half a continent for commercial purposes and the creating of a complete new tier of Northern states, with an enormous area of unoccupied fertile land, with very great mineral resources, with a present population of some 5,000,000 but with the capacity of maintaining fully 50,000,000, and the certainty in such a contingency of a very rapid increase; which population, and I hold this no small matter, is essentially in character as your own, with much the same habits, customs and prejudices even."

And again he said:

"The advantages of your position for securing a very large part of our trade are great. You own, as I have said much of our mineral wealth. Many of our chief trade routes centre here. You are the natural shipping port especially in winter for very large sections of our territory. You lie within very easy distance of our chief cities, and of the most populous portions of our Dominion. In one word, given free trade with Canada, and you rise at one stride from the position in some respects of a frontier city with no great extent of territory secured to you, to that of a central entrepot, with the practical monopoly of a great region behind you whose commerce no man can take away from you."

The gentleman presiding over the meeting said:

"Our Liberal friends, Fielding and Longley, of Nova Scotia, Davies of Prince Edward Island, Mercier and Laurier of Quebec, Cartwright of Ontario, and a host beside, look to us, the people of the United States, for the sign by which they shall conquer. Can we deny them. The whole region of Canada will, when this commercial union is established, become as if she were so many vast territories added to our domain, and up and down a continent the world will see the result of an unrestricted trade in all that continent produces, natural or manufactured."

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. An hon. member says "hear, hear," and so was the hon. member for South Oxford cheered when he was announced as the Senator for Ontario. The Attorney General for Nova Scotia, not to be outdone by the hon. member for South Oxford, spoke as follows:—

"Under such a policy as that American fishermen may enter Canadian waters at will and take all the fish they can find. Under such a policy they can enter Canadian ports for bait and supply, and send all the fish they require to markets at home."

If hon. gentlemen think the Attorney General spoke with authority on that occasion they have only to look at the representation of the counties in Nova Scotia interested in those questions, and they will find how we deal with men even suspected of treason in the provinces down by the sea. I may be prejudiced in the view I take of the utterances of the Liberal party; but you will find in the United States there are men who consider those references lead in the same direction that I have submitted they lead. Mr. Hoar, Chairman of the Committee, and a gentleman whose name has been alluded to in the correspondence on 13th March, 1889, during a discussion respecting the appointment of a committee to consider the question of trade relations between Canada and the United States, said:

"It is useless for us to be blind to the fact, and no discretion requires us to be silent in regard to the fact that there is a large and growing body of men in Canada who desire annexation to this country. Political power is likely to turn and hinge upon that question in the near future in the Dominion of Canada, and upon the question whether the American people desire such annexation or not. Nobody proposes to accomplish it without the free and intelligent and instructed will of both countries. It was impossible for the Committee on Foreign Relations, it was impossible for any other general committee of this body to enter upon, and still more impossible to exhaust the field of enquiry which this committee proposes to itself."

As showing how these movements are watched in that country, I find Mr. Morrill stating:

"The senator has made his statement, but my idea is that the whole agitation of this subject is preposterous. There never was a time when the Canadians were more intensely loyal than they are to-day to the British Government, and the idea that we can, by starting any measure here, break down the Tory Government and enable the Liberals to supersede it in Canada, is entirely, in my judgment, without any foundation."

I can give this House proof after proof, not only from the Tribune, but from members of Congress and Senators, that there they regard the movement of the Liberals of this country as a movement against Great Britain and in favour of the United States, ultimately ending in annexation, just as the leaders in this fight who met them and who vanquished them in battle believed their doctrines tended. If that is so, if this is the belief not only of hon. gentlemen in this House and the electors in this country, but of people in the neighbouring republic, surely the man whether official or politician or both who says so, and in so saying agrees with Mr. Blake the late leader of the Liberal party, is hardly deserving of the censure of this House. I have attempted to deal with the general question and the real question submitted to the people and decided by them, but I cannot sit down, in justice to the man who has been attacked and who is now absent, without asking the further indulgence of the House while I ask the attention of hon. members to another phase of the question. I have dealt with the charge of treason. I have shown it was a charge levied at the leaders and not at the party or at the people, and it was not a charge made by Sir Charles Tupper alone. It was a charge endorsed, as I said, by the people of Canada; whether they meant it or not was another thing, but the language they used and the efforts they were making had but one result. Now, then, Sir Charles Tupper is not believed by the hon. gentlemen who wish to indict him. I would observe that it is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in many cases to make a charge, and they then, through their press and by one innuendo and another, ask that their suspicions be confirmed without proof. In this instance hon. gentlemen opposite say they believe Mr. Seargeant and they take Mr. Seargeant's statement as to what occurred between Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Seargeant, but they refuse to accept Sir Charles Tupper's contradiction or statement, confirmed as it is by Mr. Hector Cameron, a gentleman who once sat in this House. I believe notwithstanding this that there are hon. gentlemen in this House who, whether they sympathize politically with Sir Charles Tupper or not, are not ready to condemn him, when he has set up a denial, in the absence of any enquiry or investigation either formal or ordinary at the hands of this House. Sir Charles Tupper asked, what I take it a Canadian would have granted quickly, namely, an opportunity to meet face to face with Sir Henry Tyler whom he had impeached and to discuss the question with him before the people most interested. When hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the injury done the Grand Trunk Railway, let me remind them that there are a large number of men in England who own stock in the Grand Trunk Railway who sympathize with Sir Charles Tupper in his exposure of the management of the Grand Trunk Railway by the present board of directors. These stockholders supported Sir Charles Tupper in his attitude, and Sir Henry Tyler would not give an opportunity to Sir Charles Tupper of making good the charges he had preferred, and which, as he claims and as the full correspondence shows, were made in the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway, although they were certainly to the detriment of the men who, as he conceived, are mismanaging it so grossly. Sir Charles Tupper states in one of those letters that he was prepared to meet Sir Henry Tyler, and that he had asked for the opportunity, but that he had never got it. As to the visit which he made to Mr. Seargeant, he makes the following statement, and I claim on his behalf that it should be accepted, no matter what some hon. gentlemen may think, until they have some proper evidence before the House to contradict it. Sir Charles Tupper says:

"Sir Henry Tyler says he will be prepared to expose the inaccuracies of my speech at Amherst, of which you published a cable summary, on March 9.

"In reply, I beg to inform Sir Henry Tyler that my remarks on that occasion were deliberately made, in discharge of what I considered to be my duty to Canada and to the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and that I will be ready to maintain their accuracy in the presence of the shareholders of his company, at any time, after my return to London, when he will afford me an opportunity of meeting them.

"Sir Henry Tyler has favoured your readers with a very inaccurate account of my visit to Mr. Seargeant, which, if true, is irrelevant. I did not go 'cap in hand to Mr. Seargeant,' but visited that gentleman at his own invitation, sent to me by Mr. Hector Cameron, Q.C., for the purpose of discussing a question in which they were both deeply interested—that of a subsidy to facilitate the Grand Trunk Railway Company in reaching Halifax, and upon which Mr. Seargeant admits I refused to give any pledge, except that Sir John A. Macdonald would submit their proposal to his collegues after the elections.

"Mr. Cameron was present during the interview, and reported the substance of it in writing to Sir John A. Macdonald. Mr. Seargeant has seen that report, and confirmed its accuracy. That report shows that I made no request 'to Mr. Seargeant to issue instructions to his officers and employés to vote for the Government.' All that I asked

Mr. Seargeant to do was to recall the instructions he had given to them to do all they could against the Government, and to inform them that those who desired to support the Government were at liberty to do so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where is the evidence of these instructions?

Mr. TUPPER. Where is the evidence of Sir Charles Tupper's statement as to which the hon. gentleman asked the condemnation of this House? Which evidence should be first produced—the evidence against Sir Charles Tupper or the evidence in his favour? Is the hon. gentleman's law as bad as his philosophy or his English? I ask hon. gentlemen who have singled out Sir Charles Tupper for attack because he came here at the request of the Government and did his duty, to give attention to this. He continues:

"How that just demand from a Government to which the Grand Trunk Railway Company was so deeply indebted was responded to, may be learned from Sir John A. Macdonald's statement, in the Times, on March the 13, as follows:—'Sir Charles Tupper, in a speech at Amherst, on Monday last, referred to the attitude of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the recent contest. His observations were fully justified by facts. The Government lost several seats in Ontario by the hostile course of that company which went to shameful extremes.'

"Sir Henry Tyler's letter is rather remarkable for what it does not contain. Evasive as it is, he does not venture to say that he did not instruct the management in Canada to do all they could to support an Opposition which had put discrimination against England in favour of a foreign country upon its banner. He has not favoured you with a copy of Mr. Seargeant's manifesto supporting the Opposition or the public statement of an Englishman, Mr. Reeves, the General Traffic Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in Chicago, who said:

"It is true that we carried between 150 and 200 Canucks to Canada a day or two before the elections. We also carried several hundred from various points on the line in Indiana and Michigan. They went to Canada for the purpose of voting the Liberal ticket, which favour a closer union with the United States. I am not ashamed of it. I am an annexationist and have been for twenty years. I would like to see the Stars and Strips floating over every mile of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific systems. I wish we had been able to muster thousands more. As it was, we could not muster enough, for the elections went against us. * * I see now, however, that I made a mistake in not working harder. I ought to have organized bureaus, and induced every Canuck in the Western States to have gone and voted against Macdonald and that traitor Van Horne. As it is I don't think we persuaded over five or six hundred to go home and vote. You can say that I have done nothing that I am ashamed of, unless it was that I did not work hard enough."

Is that conduct not to be denounced? Is it to be supposed, setting aside the main question involved in that controversy, that the Government of this country will allow even the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, not merely to actively oppose it through its influence over its men, but to coerce their employés and to bring in from the United States on a crisis like this men living and residing there free of charge in order to try and oust the Government of the day. A more indecent position for a corporation to take could hardly be conceived.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but I have no doubt that people who are able to judge fairly between the two parties will be ready to believe that if the Canadian Pacific Railway undertook to act in that way, when these hon. gentlemen opposite got into power their first act would be to denounce in the most vigorous manner such improper interference by any large corporation holding the privileges which these railway companies do.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is improper only on one side.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says it is improper only on one side. I am not discussing their support either to one party or the other, but I say Sir Charles Tupper has a right to be believed, he has a right to ask credence at the hands of his opponents until they formally confute his utterances by an enquiry properly organized and conducted. He has insisted that all he denounced is the coercion exercised by that company over their employés, their exercise of an improper influence against the Government of the day, and their refusal to issue instructions that their employés could vote as they pleased. That is the position Sir Charles Tupper has taken up, and instead of these hon. gentlemen denouncing him—if they were not desperate as I believe them to be, and if they were not actuated by only political considerations—they should join Sir Charles Tupper and the Canadian Government in resisting such interference on the part of a corporation such as the Grand Trunk Railway. Another statement is as follows:—

"Mr. Corby, one of the supporters of the Government, requested Mr. Wainwright, a high official of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to allow their employés to exercise their judgment in casting their votes. He received the following reply:—

"'MONTREAL, 4th March, 1891.

"'Yours received. The company's policy not being in accord with the Government party, I am unable to assist you in the present contest. The staff, I presume, knows what the interests of the company are. It is not a personal matter in any way.

"'W. WAINWRIGHT.'"

On the face of it the answer reads fairly enough. The request was, however, based evidently on the knowledge that influence was being exerted, that coercion was attempted. Fair and manly instructions were desired, and those instructions were refused. The Government candidate at Lévis makes this statement:

"My intimate friends in Lévis have requested me to expose to you what the Grand Trunk Company did in the last election. At first I was assured that there would be no interference with the opinions of the electors. But on Tuesday afternoon, the second day preceding votation, two of their principal men came down by express train from Richmond, where they had been working for the Hon. W. Laurier, and on Wednesday, the coercion was such upon the employés of this company that according to my revisers we were at a loss of about 125 to 140 votes."

There is a statement as to coercion, and it was with this statement that the High Commissioner was dealing. With regard to extravagance, that has been alluded to. No hon. gentleman who has asked for his explanation of that part of his attack has given Sir Charles Tupper's own statement. It is this:

"Sir Henry Tyler knows that I referred to the original construction of the Grand Trunk Railway, which was so marked by 'extravagance, jobbery, and corruption' as to waste an enormous sum of money, and involve those who had furnished the capital in all but a total loss. The 188 miles of road from Quebec to Rivière du Loup, which the Government engineer estimated could be built equal to the rest of the Intercolonial Railway for about £372,000, cost the Grand Trunk shareholders no less than £944,000.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I considered it an imperative duty to Canada and the Empire to make the remarks I did at Amherst. I knew the misrepresentation and abuse to which I would be subjected, but having devoted thirty-six years of my life in untiring efforts to build up and consolidate a great and powerful British community in North America, I felt that I should fail in my duty if I did not expose this attempt of a great corporation, sustained by Englishmen, at a most important crisis, to strike down the Government who were maintaining British interests and British institutions, in support of a party whose avowed policy was free trade with a foreign country, and discrimination against England which, as Mr. Blake—the most eminent man in the Liberal party—has admitted, must inevitably lead to the annexation of Canada to the United States and the loss to Britain of one of the most important portions of her Empire. Canada has a right to know whether 23,000 shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway sustain the admitted policy of Sir Henry Tyler and Mr. Seargeant of looking to Washington."

Now, the only additional statement from the pen of the High Commissioner to which I would call attention, in conclusion, is the statement upon which hon. gentlemen opposite based the accusation that he had alluded to the Liberal party as "ruined gamesters." Well, there are opinions as to whether they are or are not. If the judgment of the House is to be passed upon him for having said that, well and good; but why was the letter not laid on the Table in which that statement was made? Why was resort made to the columns of the Toronto Globe? Would that paper be received in the smallest court in the country as furnishing evidence for the meanest case that could possibly be tried? The statement to which the hon. gentleman referred was but a cablegram. There was nothing in that paper purporting to be a full statement of the passage referred to. But here is the letter, published in the London Times; and since hon. gentlemen found the shoes to fit them, of course they put them on. But the High Commissioner did not call them "ruined gamesters;" he applied the term to allies of their leaders, to men who were engaged with them in the fight, and it is because these hon. gentlemen believe that what is applied to Messrs. Wiman and Farrer is applicable to them that they have spoken so indignantly. But this is what the High Commissioner says:

"I have shown that Sir Henry Tyler—like Artemus Ward, who was ready to sacrifice all is wife's relations to the war—having by his fatuous mismanagement reduced his company to the greatest straits, turned his back upon the Government, which according to his own letter had saved the Grand Trunk Company, and united with Messrs. Wiman and Farrer, who were suggesting to the United States the means of reducing the Grand Trunk Company to bankruptcy, in an attempt to subvert British institutions in Canada. Fortunately for Canada, and for the Empire to which it belongs, this last throw of these ruined gamesters has not been successful, and their designs now stand revealed."

How hon. gentlemen could apply that language to themselves, unless the language actually fits the case, and includes them with Messrs. Wiman and Farrer, is something I leave them to explain. But I know that in the province from which I come the few who have been able to come to this House and throw in their lot with hon. gentlemen opposite had to protest that they had no sympathy with unrestricted reciprocity as defined in the west by Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Laurier and others, in so far as it involved a common tariff against Great Britain. There is not one member from that province who will read the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in this House some time ago on what commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity mean, and who will say that he adopts that definition, and the reason is, that while in the Province of Nova Scotia there may even be found men who are disloyal to Canada, though I am glad to say that feeling is fast fading away from the minds of all, there are not as many men as you could count on your fingers, or any men whose names would be known in this House, who are disloyal to Great Britain; and it is for that reason that the statements made by Sir Charles Tupper on this question received such an endorsement at the hands of the people of the Province of Nova Scotia. I cannot resume my seat without thanking the House for the great indulgence—for it is an indulgence—which they have accorded to me in doing what was distasteful to myself, and I have no doubt to many in this Chamber in one respect,—that was, to make such frequent references to long extracts. My reasons were good. In the first place, I thought that those documents ought to be before this House, and then the verdict could be as it might; and in the second place, I felt that the language that summed up all the views of the High Commissioner as given by him would be language on which he would be content to take not only the verdict of his countrymen, as he has taken it, but the verdict of this House as well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I shall say but very little with reference to the speech which has just been made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I shall allude to some of his observations, however, before I conclude what I have to say on the resolution moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has addressed to the House a very long speech; but I think it will be very difficult for the hon. gentlemen who are sitting behind him to ascertain what relevancy that speech, or the greater portion of it, has to the amendment which my hon. friend has put into your hands. The hon. gentleman has delivered here a stump speech. He has given extracts from newspapers and from speeches, some of which are old, having been delivered in this House nearly a quarter of a century ago; but what relation they have to the charges made against the High Commissioner it will be very difficult for hon. gentlemen on either side of the House to determine. The hon. the Minister of Justice delivered a speech to the House, the manner of which I have nothing to find fault with; but I disagree with the observations he made in opposing the resolution moved by my hon. friend. He said, in effect, that there is no evidence of the accuracy of the complaint contained in that resolution. He said we have no evidence before us that Sir Charles Tupper has either denounced any of the leaders of the Opposition or the members of the Reform party, or has assailed the Grand Trunk corporation or its managers. The hon. the Minister of Customs, however, did not altogether agree with that view, for I noticed that when the hon. member for South Oxford was addressing the House, the Minister of Customs expressed, quite incidentally, his opinion that those charges were true. I can well understand the silence of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches when the Minister of Justice affirms that there is no evidence of any of the statements complained of having been made at all and the hon. Minister of Customs says that the charge is true.

Mr. BOWELL. Do not pervert what I said.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have no desire whatever to do that; and if I have misapprehended the Minister of Customs, he will, of course, at a later period, correct me. I admit I have sympathy with the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I admit that his task is a difficult one, all the more difficult because what is affirmed in the amendment is quite within the truth. I sympathize with him also because his many colleagues, able to take part in this discussion, who sit on the Treasury benches beside him, instead of coming to the defence of the High Commissioner left that task to the hon. gentleman. I do not concur in the statement made by the Minister of Justice that although the office of High Commissioner is non-political the officer is not. I do not at all agree with the contention that the High Commissioner is not a civil servant. Why, under our constitutional system we have two classes of servants of the Crown. There are the civil servants of the Crown and military servants of the Crown. I think it is perfectly clear that the High Commissioner is not a military servant of the Crown, but a civil servant and nothing more; and he is not a servant of the Crown, having behind him the support of the people as a representative. Therefore his position is non-political; and if it is intended at all that it shall be permanent, as was intimated when the appointment was made, then it is perfectly clear he has no right whatever to mingle in the ordinary political strifes of the hour. The hon. gentleman has himself again and again admitted the accuracy of this contention; he has himself admitted that his position is not unlike that of an ordinary ambassador, that his duties are of an ambassadorial character, and that as far as the representative of a dependency at the capital of the Empire can be ambassadorial, his duties are of that character. Now, it is well known that an ambassador does not take part and is not supposed to take part in the ordinary strifes between the political parties in his own country, any more than he is supposed to take part in the political contests of the state to which he is accredited. It is only a few years ago since Sir Austin Henry Layard, the British ambassador at Constantinople, took strong grounds against the policy of the Government of Mr. Gladstone, and the moment a change took place in the Imperial policy on the Eastern question Mr. Layard was removed and superseded by Mr. Elliott; so that the principle is well recognized that if there is any party who ought to abstain from political contests in order that he may be readily approached by any person, no matter to what political party he may belong, at the capital to which he is accredited, it is the party holding a position such as that now held by the High Commissioner. If parties on this side of the House should have in England grievances which they might think it necessary to bring under the attention of the High Commissioner he should be as easily approached by them as by those to whom they are politically opposed; and it is impossible he can retain that position unless he abstains from taking part in political contests. Why, the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House to-night an argument which, if it had any value at all, would be just as applicable to Sir Charles Tupper as Lieutenant Governor of Ontario as it would be to him in his position of High Commissioner. The hon. gentleman said that Sir Charles Tupper freely took part in political questions at issue in this country, that he expressed opinions upon them, that his views upon those subjects had been subjected to criticism since he left the House. That may be equally true of a Lieutenant Governor, or of a gentleman appointed to the Bench who was formerly a member of this House; and the hon. gentleman might, with as much propriety, defend the conduct of a judge or a Lieutenant Governor taking part in a political contest as that of the High Commissioner.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman's argument, but he has not seized the point I made. It was not that hon. gentlemen opposite had discussed the views formerly held by Sir Charles Tupper, but that they were continuing to discuss and misrepresent the views he held at the time of that discussion, when he was in England, holding different views from his colleagues on the trade questions that then came up.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) The hon. gentleman does not accurately state the position taken on this side. We all know what happened in this House. We know the position taken by the Minister of Justice with reference to putting certain articles on the free list, and we know what the Government said in that matter. We know also what Sir Charles Tupper said within a week after he came back and took his seat as Minister of Finance, and what took place after communication was had by telegraph with the Government at Washington. But those were subjects of discussion in this House after Sir Charles Tupper returned to England and resumed his duties of High Commissioner; and I say that he was not justified in entering the political arena, because this continued to be a live controversy between gentlemen on the Treasury benches and gentlemen on this side, because at one moment of time he happened himself to have been connected with that controversy. Now, what we complain of in this matter is that, while Sir Charles Tupper is the paid servant of the Crown, holding a non-political office, he has become the agent of one party and the vilifier of the other party. All the hon. gentleman has said shows that Sir Charles Tupper has vilified gentlemen on this side of the House, and that he is himself prepared to join him in that vilification. I say that, no matter what his views may be in regard to the conduct and policy of gentlemen on this side of the House, if Sir Charles Tupper wished to take part in the controversy or to wage war against any party in this country he ought to have tendered his resignation, to have withdrawn from the office and to have taken the responsibility of meeting those gentlemen in this House as a member of this House in discussing those charges which he brought against them. That is not his position. He has simply assumed a position, which is discreditable to the Government, which is discreditable to himself, of being the paid opponent of those who are in opposition to the Government. He has simply drawn his salary as a stump speaker on behalf of the Administration, and I say that is a position wholly unworthy of one who holds the office of High Commissioner and receives a salary of $12,000 a year for the discharge of the duties of that office. We know that, in 1887, the hon. gentleman returned to this country without resigning his office, that he became Minister of Finance, that he still held the office of High Commissioner, that he then resigned his position as Minister of Finance and returned to England and undertook again to discharge the duties of High Commissioner. It is true that during that time he only drew the salary of a Minister, but his conduct showed that the office of High Commissioner might be left in a condition of suspended animation for a considerable time without the country suffering anything. In the campaign of 1891 the hon. gentleman returned again, and the reason given for his coming out is that he was not an ordinary civil servant of the Crown. I deny that altogether. I say there is no such distinction. I say that there is only one class of civil servants of the Crown who are permitted to engage in party warfare, and that is the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches. They have that right, but Sir Charles Tupper is not a representative of the people, he is not a legislator in the other House, he has no more right to take part in the political warfare carried on in an election than the Deputy Minister who presides in any one of the departments of State in this capital. The Minister of Justice informed us that there was no evidence that Sir Charles Tupper imputed any disloyal conduct to those who sit on this side of the House, that we had nothing to complain of on this side of the House. I think we are entitled to take notice of what that hon. gentleman said when he was addressing the electors of this country. While he was at Windsor he was subjected to an interview by a representative of the Detroit Free Press. I believe that he himself prepared the report for that paper, and I have that report before me. What statement did he make in that interview in regard to one hon. member of this House, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)?

Mr. TUPPER. Is not that a comic paper?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it is not a comic paper. He is asked the question: "What effect will the Farrer article have on these elections?" The elections had not yet occurred, recollect. He replies: "It is the death-blow of Gritism." We know what he called "Gritism." It is the views entertained by the Opposition, by the party known by those who hold its views as Reformers, and designated by hon. gentlemen opposite as Grits:

"It is the death-blow of Gritism. Mr. Farrer is the guide, philosopher and friend of Sir Richard Cartwright. He has been sent to Washington time and again——"

Not that he went of his own accord, but that he was sent by the gentleman who employed him, who was his master, according to Sir Charles Tupper's representation.

—"He has been sent to Washington time and again as the agent of Mr. Cartwright——"

Where is the evidence of that? The hon. gentleman challenged the production of proof before a committee. Where is the proof?—

—"to carry out the nefarious plot, and the exposure has shown the Canadian people what these people would do."

What what people would do? Why, the Grits, of whom Sir Richard Cartwright was a leader and of whose views and desires he was a prominent exponent. It is impossible to read that extract and accept the statement of the Minister of Justice, or to limit the charge, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has tried to limit it. It is clear that Sir Charles Tupper did charge, at all events, one of the leaders of the Liberal party and those whom he designated as Grits as seeking political annexation to the United States, and he refers to Mr. Farrer in no other capacity than as a mere instrument in the hands of other parties. It is absurd, after a statement of that kind has been made, to undertake to argue that Sir Charles Tupper's charges related simply to Mr. Wiman and Mr. Farrer, because Mr. Farrer himself is spoken of as being the mere instrument here in the hands of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Then, when we look at an article contributed to the Contemporary Review by Sir Charles Tupper we find the same charges repeated. We find that the High Commissioner associates Sir Richard Cartwright and my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier) as the parties of whom Mr. Wiman and Mr. Hitt and Mr. Farrer are the mere instruments; and yet we are told that the Opposition have nothing to complain of, that these charges referred to parties outside, and that, if we do not feel we are guilty, and are associated in these nefarious enterprises with them, we are not charged at all. That is not so. It is perfectly clear that the High Commissioner did not intend to be so understood. It was not simply at Mr. Farrer, or Mr. Hitt, or Mr. Wiman, that the High Commissioner was aiming his blows; they were aimed at the hon. member for South Oxford, at my hon. friend who sits beside me (Mr. Laurier), and those hon. gentlemen in this House who entertain similar views as to the trade policy of this country. Why, the hon. gentleman has undertaken to argue that the views which we entertain on the subject of trade necessarily point in the direction of annexation. Well, Sir, we are equally strong in the conviction that the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued for the past twelve years, necessarily points to annexation. Nothing can be clearer than this. By that policy you have sent a million of people over the border; you have made them citizens of the United States; you have annexed them to the United States; and do you suppose that if you persist in that policy, which will shortly carry half the population beyond the border, you can ever keep these people politically separate? If that system is persisted in you will have at some period in the near future one-half the people of Canada arrayed against the other half. But while I have strong opinions as to the tendency of the commercial policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not say that they have entered upon that policy with the design of bringing about these results, which I think in the end are likely to follow from that policy if nothing unforeseen intervenes. But that is not their position towards us. True, some hon. gentlemen on the other side, broad in their views, charitable in their feelings, say that they think the tendency of our policy is in the direction of closer political relations with the United States, but they do not charge us with deliberately aiming at any such result. But that is not the position of Sir Charles Tupper. His position is that a great conspiracy existed, and that he has come out to this country, as Sir Don Quixote, for the purpose of preventing that conspiracy being consummated. His object and aim, his patriotic endeavour, has been to prevent the Opposition, and the leaders of the Opposition, from carrying the people of this country into political union with the United States. Well, however widely the people may differ as to the views which he entertains—as to the accuracy of his conclusions—they would attach more importance to their disinterested character if he had resigned his position and had come out here without his office and assumed all the responsibility of placing his views before the people, as an ordinary citizen of this country. But that is not what he did. Now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has undertaken to defend the conduct of the High Commissioner in his attempt to coerce the Grand Trunk Railway Company and its officials into giving the influence of that corporation to the support of the Administration. He says that Sir Charles Tupper has denied that charge, and we ought to accept that denial; but the wonder always has been what brought Sir Charles Tupper and the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company into communication with each other on the subject: what gave rise to this interview? The hon. Minister has told us to-night that Sir Charles Tupper simply asked that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should withdraw that order which they had issued against the Administration. Has that order been published? Has Sir Charles Tupper given to this House or the country any evidence of the existence of that order? It is assumed that a certain order existed, but he has given the country no evidence of any such order. On the contrary, Mr. Seargeant and Sir Henry Tyler both declare that no such order ever was issued, and yet he pretends to tell us that Sir Charles Tupper went simply to ask those gentlemen to withdraw an order that he could not have seen, that had no existence, and to place the Conservative party upon a footing of equality with their political opponents.

Mr. HAGGART. When did Mr. Seargeant say so? Where did you get any authority of his for your statement?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think I have seen it. I will read an extract in due time from Sir Henry Tyler upon the subject, and I think that upon a subject relating to the administration of the company, the declarations of Sir Henry Tyler and Mr. Seargeant are to be taken as true so long as there is no evidence produced to the contrary. When such declarations were made, if Sir Charles Tupper had seen any such order, it was easy for him to have confuted Sir Henry Tyler by the production of that order. But, Sir, I think I know something with regard to the conduct of another powerful corporation in this country; I think I have seen from the manager of that railway corporation a manifesto against anything like unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. And yet if I am to judge by the uniform conduct of that company, there is no portion of our population that have made greater efforts to secure intercourse with our neighbours than that corporation itself. I am making no complaint, but I state that that corporation has put forth extraordinary efforts for the purpose of securing a portion of the American trade. It is seeking in every possible way to secure unrestricted reciprocity, so far as its own interests are concerned, with the people of the United States; and certain advice was given, and a certain course was pursued, of which we have made no complaint, but which I think was very unfair indeed to the people of this country and to the Liberal party, and the more so because the conduct of the corporation itself was at variance with the doctrines which it preached as being good for other people. There is a complaint made by Sir Charles Tupper that the Grand Trunk Railway Company issued free tickets to those who were politically opposed to his party, in order that they might reach the polls. Sir Henry Tyler says in reference to that charge:

"Sir Charles Tupper has already been informed that though a telegram was sent by Mr. Edgar authorizing the issue of tickets previously guaranteed to be paid for, those tickets were not actually issued, and this cannot be considered more heinous than the running of special trains ordered for his (Sir Charles Tupper's) own purposes, which trains have not yet been paid for, the account of which is still waiting settlement."

It will be an interesting question to know by whom that bill is to be paid, whether it is to be paid by Sir Charles Tupper, whether it is to be paid by contributions of the hon. gentlemen who have profited by his efforts, or whether it is to be paid out of the public treasury of this country. Now, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries complains of the "indecent haste," the "spleen," the "spite," the "malice." What do all these words mean? The hon. gentleman, perhaps, will give us a lecture on synonyms, and tell us whether this is good English or not, tell us whether these are synonymous expressions or not. He will also, perhaps, tell us, with a filial regard for what is due to another, what "craven cowards" mean. Perhaps, if the hon. gentleman will take his own speech and take the letters of his distinguished parent and put them together, he will find ample material for a criticism upon the subject, if he is disposed to turn his attention in that direction. I might say to the hon. gentleman that while I have no ill-will towards him, and I admit that he has shown good ability as a member of the Government, I do not think that lectures on the Queen's English are in his line, nor do I think he is calculated to shine in that direction. The hon. gentleman complained this evening of the use of the expression an "unveracious calumniator," and he seems to think that it is not good English. I do not know on what ground the hon. gentleman's claim is based; whether he means to say that unveracious is not English, or calumniator is not English, or the combination is not English.

Mr. TUPPER. The combination.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman will remember that Shakespeare makes one of his characters say with respect to the communication from the witches that they lied like the truth.

An hon. MEMBER. You are not Shakespeare.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). While that might not be a calumnious statement it might be an unveracious one. The hon. gentleman might also remember that calumnies are often conveyed by a shrug of the shoulders, and by pretending to conceal something which, if told, might have a very different effect. While I should say an action like that might be calumnious, I would not say it was an unveracious calumny, nor the party who used it was an unveracious calumniator. But when an hon. gentleman is very specific, though not very accurate, in the use of his English, and when he undertakes to state what is not the fact, and when he is very precise in that statement, I am inclined to think he is not only a calumniator, when the statement he makes is an untrue one, but he is an unveracious calumniator. And, although I have no intention of entering into a discussion on the subject of synonyms or on the use of quotations, I think I can satisfy the hon. gentleman, if he wished to discuss the subject, that unveracious calumniator is very good English, and it does not apply to every untruthful statement, but it does apply, and apply with perfect accuracy, to untruthful statements of a certain class made in a particular way. The hon. gentleman has spoken of interference in the elections by members of the Local Governments, and he has declared that they have interfered quite as improperly as the High Commissioner. Members of the Local Governments are not our officers. They have reached their position by the votes of the people. They are responsible to the people who appointed them, not to us. If the people disapprove of their conduct they will remove them no doubt in the proper way, and if we disapprove of the conduct of the High Commissioner it seems to me we ought to adopt a similar policy. The hon. gentleman made a very extraordinary interruption in the speech made a few evenings ago by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He undertook to justify a statement made by the Minister of Justice in a memorandum in regard to the action of Newfoundland, in which the Minister pointed out that the United States had laid down a doctrine that Canada cannot avail itself of the United States markets, while our people continue their allegiance as British subjects; and the hon. gentleman, not satisfied with the statement of the Minister of Justice, that he had based that observation on a speech delivered by Mr. Blaine some three years ago, interrupted the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and read an extract from Mr. Blaine's speech, to show it was impossible we could have access to United States markets unless we became American citizens. That was the position taken by the hon. gentleman. Now the hon. gentleman will perhaps tell us how, under these circumstances the High Commissioner and two of his colleagues came to go to Washington. Did they start on a fool's errand? Did they know beforehand what Mr. Blaine had said and feel confidence that they possessed in it conclusive evidence as to the position of the United States on this question? If that be so, what did the High Commissioner, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance mean by those two trips to Washington? Did they go to seek the annexation of this country to the United States? Did they go to assure the United States Government they would lay aside their allegiance to the British Government for the purpose of securing reciprocity in trade? Were they prepared for the mere advantage of securing material prosperity to give up their allegiance to Great Britain? What mean these negotiations in the face of this extract from Mr. Blaine's speech, which the Minister of Marine considers so perfectly conclusive? I am not going to discuss the tendency of this or that particular policy. I am disposed to consider what I believe to be best for the material prosperity of this country, trusting to the future to lead us along that line which will be in the end best for us. I am not going to assist in opposing what I believe to be in the interests of our people because some hon. gentleman is afraid they may lead him where he does not want to go. I do not think a more improper course could be pursued on any question, and I am not disposed to take it on this, and I do not think the people are inclined to take that view. Hon. members will recollect that in an interview the High Commissioner declared the Liberal party would be swept out of existence, because it was impossible they could support the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and those who held to the policy of unrestricted reciprocity without at the same time supporting political union with the United States. In the face of that declaration, here is the fact that a majority of the members of old Canada sit on this side of the House. If that be true, then it is clear, according to the statements of Sir Charles Tupper, that the majority of the people of this country, or at all events of old Canada, are seeking political union with the neighbouring republic. I do not admit that conclusion, I deny it altogether. I maintain that the position taken by Sir Charles Tupper does great injustice not only to the Liberal party but to the people of this country, by the false impression it is calculated to make in the mother country. The High Commissioner has published letters attacking the Grand Trunk Railway, has published articles in the Contemporary Review and the North American Review attacking the Liberal party, intimating that that party was led by men who are seeking to bring about the political union of Canada with the United States. That is the object he is aiming at; he has laboured steadily to damage the Liberal party in the minds of the English people. It is a position that cannot be tolerated, and the Liberal party will continue to protest against this country being represented in a non-political office by a gentleman which has slandered the members on either side of the House. I am not speaking in the interests of the Liberal party in denouncing the position taken by Sir Charles Tupper, whose charges are calumnious and whose statements are altogether unfounded, but in making this statement I declare I am as ready to denounce similar charges made by any officer of the Civil Service of this country as well against hon. gentlemen opposite, as against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to deal out to us the same measure of justice they may desire to have dealt out to them if they were in our position, as they undoubtedly will be very soon.

Mr. DICKEY. The discussion upon this question has taken a somewhat wide range and I do not propose to follow it in its irrelevancy. Before proceeding to discuss the resolution I will first address myself to some remarks which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) made towards the latter part of his speech. The hon. gentleman seemed to make much ado of the fact that the Minister of Marine had read to the House a speech of Mr. Blaine's in order to prove that the United States Secretary of State would not accept reciprocity, and the hon. member for Bothwell desired to know how the Minister of Marine expected that the Commissioners of the Government could go to Washington with any hope of getting reciprocity in view of that declaration by Mr. Blaine. In my opinion it would be much better that the hon. member for Bothwell—before he made those remarks at the expense of the Minister of Justice—had read the speech of Mr. Blaine to which the Minister of Marine referred. I will again quote to the House part of the speech of Mr. Blaine which the Minister of Marine read, and I think they will see from that speech that what Mr. Blaine objects to, is the unrestricted reciprocity which members on the other side of the House advocate, and not the limited reciprocity which the Government is endeavouring to obtain. Mr. Blaine says:

"Beyond the frontier, across the river our neighbours chose another Government, another allegiance. They are subjects of Queen Victoria; they are loyal to Her Majesty. They live under a foreign flag. They do exactly as they have a right to do. I neither dispute their right nor envy their situation. It is their right to choose for themselves, as it is our right to choose for ourselves. But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes, and enjoying the actual cash remuneration of American markets. They cannot have both at the same time. If they come to us they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, who have no part or lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign to us; it is an absolute wrong for Congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have. So far as I can help it I do not mean that they shall be Canadians and Americans at the same time."

If the hon. member for Bothwell will study that speech he will find that Mr. Blaine has not said one word against the fair reciprocity treaty which the Government in Canada are anxious to obtain. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) went over a good deal of ground in his speech, and it was well that some time elapsed between the beginning and the close of his remarks, else his charge of irrelevancy against the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice might have been made against himself with a good deal of force. The hon. gentleman treated on the position which the High Commissioner occupies in reference to the Government, and he held that the High Commissioner was in the capacity of an ambassador. Now, for the last few years in this Parliament, I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite avail themselves of every occasion that offered to hold Sir Charles Tupper up as being opposed to the Government on certain important issues. The hon. member from Bothwell and his friends have argued in this House that Sir Charles Tupper was opposed to the Government on the reciprocity question, that he was willing to go further in this matter than they were, and that upon other vital questions he was opposed to the Ministry. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to say now that Sir Charles Tupper was a Minister when they attacked him in this House, and out of it that he is a mere political servant of the Government, open to criticism, but when they accused him and when he comes to offer his defence to the people of Canada, before whom every public man in this country must expect to go for a verdict on his conduct, it is a sorry excuse for them to plead that he is an ambassador, and that in consequence he should be refused the opportunity of making his defence. After abusing Sir Charles Tupper during the past few years, I maintain that it is not fair that hon. gentlemen opposite should deny him the opportunity of making his defence, because they are pleased to say that he is an ambassador and that his mouth is to be closed. I am not sufficiently versed in constitutional law to know exactly what the position of the High Commissioner is with regard to the Government, but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that Sir Charles Tupper is an ambassador, and I suppose the hon. member is perfectly familiar with the fact that if he be an ambassador this House would not have any right to discuss or to vote upon his conduct. Hon. gentlemen on the other side also say that Sir Charles Tupper is a civil servant. Now waiving for a time any technical question as to what Sir Charles Tupper's position is, or what the position of High Commissioner is, let us look at the question from a common sense standpoint. It is quite clear that he is not an ordinary member of the Civil Service, for if hon. gentlemen opposite should by any chance come into power, they will admit, that while they would consider it an unjust act to turn out the deputy head of any department without cause —because he is an officer who was entitled to the protection with which custom and law surrounds the Civil Service—yet if they should come into power they would not for one moment permit Sir Charles Tupper, who had no sympathy with their views to represent them at the Court of St. James. Therefore, whatever may be the fine legal distinction in reference to the High Commissioner's office, yet from a common sense point of view there is a broad distinction between it and the position of ordinary members of the Civil Service. Sir Charles Tupper holds an office which depends upon the existence of the Government for its continuance, and he must necessarily go out with the Government whose representative he is. In that respect he stands in a distinct position from other civil servants. I observe that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in quoting evidence as to the statements of Sir Charles Tupper, had to resort to an alleged interview in the Detroit Free Press. We all know that interviews in American newspapers are about as unreliable evidence as can be produced in support of any assertion, and the hon. gentleman must have been very hard pressed for some corroboration of the allegations made by the other side of the House when he said that this interview bore internal evidence of having been written by Sir Charles Tupper himself. I say that the hon. member for Bothwell in advancing such a theory to this House, as evidence upon which they should base their judgment in passing a vote of censure upon Sir Charles Tupper, was trifling with the intelligence of the House. As he read the article I noticed, although I do not pretend to be a literary critic, that Sir Richard Cartwright—I use his name because it is mentioned there—was referred to in it as Mr. Cartwright, and I ask hon. gentlemen if it is likely that Sir Charles Tupper would, in writing, refer to the hon. member for South Oxford as Mr. Cartwright. The hon. member went on to say that in his judgment the National Policy led directly to annexation, and he was kind enough to tell us that he would not for that reason impute to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House any disloyalty to Great Britain or any anxiety for annexation; and he claimed in the same way that, although members on this side felt that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite led to annexation, the same courtesy should be extended to them. Well, personally I am quite willing to accord that courtesy to the hon. gentlemen. I am quite willing to admit that there were very many gentlemen working for commercial union who did not and who do not to-day realize where that policy would lead them. But I would remind the hon. member that he does not find in this country any person supporting the National Policy who is in league with people in the United States; he does not find that in the United States there is an organized band of persons favouring the National Policy in this country with the view of driving us into annexation with the United States. The argument of the hon. member for Bothwell is a mere abstract argument that the National Policy leads to annexation. But in connection with commercial union we have as the hon. Minister of Marine has pointed out so well to-night, the evidences of a conspiracy in the United States, which no hon. gentleman opposite has attempted to deny, avowedly for the purpose of bringing Canada into a political union with that country; and we have hon. members in this House, and leaders of the Liberal party who are not in this House, rewarded for favouring the policy of commercial union with dinners given to them in the United States by those who desire the political union of the two countries. The hon. member for Bothwell referred to Sir Charles Tupper's interview with Mr. Scargeant as an attempt to coerce the Grand Trunk, and with perfectly calm indifference he waived aside altogether Sir Charles Tupper's statement with regard to that interview, in which he alleges that he made no attempt to coerce the Grand Trunk, and he also waives aside Mr. Hector Cameron's declaration in support of Sir Charles Tupper. This is the spirit in which the hon. gentleman treats Sir Charles Tupper, and in which he considers the evidence offered by the hon. Minister of Marine in Sir Charles Tupper's defence. The hon. gentleman also says that if the policy of unrestricted reciprocity leads to annexation the majority of the members of this House from old Canada are in favour of that policy, and, therefore, the majority of the people of old Canada are in favour of annexation. It may not be very much to the point, but it is quite as much to the point as the hon. gentleman's argument, and it is just as well to remind him of it that although the Opposition have perhaps a majority of the representatives of the two old provinces of Canada in this House, they represent a minority of the people from those provinces. Now, I must say that of all the many great compliments that Sir Charles Tupper has got in his public career, both from his country and his Queen, I do not know of any that does him more credit than the speech delivered by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) in this debate. That hon. gentleman, in a motion confined to the narrow issue of whether or not it was right for Sir Charles Tupper to take part in the late election, did Sir Charles Tupper the honour to go back to 1866 to rake up stale and exploded scandals against him for the purpose of damaging him in this House. The House will remember that in 1866 Sir Charles Tupper stood alone in Nova Scotia as the maker of Confederation, and was battling to bring that province into the Union, so that it could assist in building up the Canada we have to-day. In doing so he met with intense hostility from various quarters, and in the course of that bitter and stubborn fight, in which only the great ability, perseverance and tact of Sir Charles Tupper succeeded in bringing Nova Scotia into the Union, he met with such charges as have been retailed during this debate; and the hon. member for West Huron is, I conceive, doing Sir Charles Tupper great honour in reminding the House that in working patriotically for the promotion of this Confederation he faced even such calumnies as those which the hon. gentleman has uttered against him. Now, these things have been discussed again and again, for hon. members of the Opposition in Nova Scotia, in Ontario and in Quebec have again and again been offered the privilege of meeting Sir Charles Tupper on the public platform and discussing these matters before the electorate of the country. Sometimes they have accepted that offer, but more frequently they have not. I believe that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) declined that honour on several occasions before the people of Ontario.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When, pray? Be good enough to state.

Mr. DICKEY. I cannot give the hon. member the date, and if he denies it——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Most assuredly. I may just say to the hon. gentleman, as he puts the question, that I was never asked to meet Sir Charles Tupper; but I rather think that on two or three occasions we asked that Sir Charles Tupper should join in a sort of tournament, but he did not see fit to accept the invitation.

Mr. DICKEY. I accept the hon. gentleman's denial, and I would accept it with a good deal more grace if he had not made a statement as to which I think he must have been misinformed, namely, that Sir Charles Tupper ever declined to face him or any other man who proposed to meet him. Those various offers of Sir Charles Tupper to discuss his character and reputation before the electors of this country have, one after the other, during the last thirteen years, resulted with unvarying effect in an endorsation of Sir Charles Tupper and the policy he has been propounding. This has been particularly true in the Province of Nova Scotia where Sir Charles Tupper is best known, where he spent his younger days, and where he led a Government. To-day the party Sir Charles Tupper supported comes back to this House with sixteen out of twenty-one members from the Province of Nova Scotia and that is quite sufficient argument to meet the charges which the hon. member for West Huron has thought proper to make in this House against him. I do not know what view the hon. member for West Huron and those who, like him, go back years for the sake of hurling these exploded charges against the High Commissioner can have. Possibly they want to go down to posterity by hanging on to his coat tails, or perhaps they want to be immortalized as notorious for having assailed and vilified a man who will ever be known as one of the makers of Canada. Whether that be their aim or not, I do not know; but as regards all those charges affecting his past life, I shall say nothing specifically, because they have been answered again and again, both in this House and before the people. Now, coming to the resolution before us, it is divided into three branches. It involves the affirmation that Sir Charles Tupper interfered with the elections, that he imputed treasonable motives to a large portion of the people of Canada, and that he vilified the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway. Now, unless every hon. gentleman in this House is satisfied as to the accuracy of those statements, he cannot support this resolution. With regard to the interference of Sir Charles Tupper in the elections, I would simply justify that upon the ground of fair-play. His position having been assailed, what could be fairer than that he should appear upon the platform, willing to meet anybody in a free discussion before the electors. If he had sulked in London and had refused to discuss these questions, there might have been some imputation against him; but I hold that, from his own point of view, regarding himself simply as an individual, he had the right, under every principle of fair-play, to be heard before the people. But that is not the position. Sir Charles Tupper came here at the request of the leader of the Government, and this resolution being a personal matter, it is, therefore, not entitled to any support. It should have been made against the Administration which brought Sir Charles Tupper out here and not against the High Commissioner. I will put it to hon. gentlemen opposite if this man is a civil servant and the Government ask him to come out and help them, what is he to do? Is he to disobey that command and be dismissed, or to come out and work as requested. Therefore the blame, if there be any in this matter, is chargeable to the Government and not to the High Commissioner. When one considers the speeches of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and the others who discussed this question, it seems to me that an attack is made directly and personally against Sir Charles Tupper and that there is no desire to draw the Government into the matter. The evident desire is to get at Sir Charles Tupper and give the hon. member for West Huron and others a text on which to hang abusive speeches of an absent man, who, always ready to defend himself when present, cannot do so now owing to absence. If a charge is to be made against any body, it should be made against the Ministers of the Crown who are here, well able to defend themselves. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, supposing a Deputy Minister were guilty of any misconduct, what would be the force of a resolution censuring him, without any enquiry, without his being present or being given an opportunity to reply in any way. If the hon. member for Bothwell is right in holding that Sir Charles Tupper is a mere civil servant, Sir Charles Tupper stands on the same plane as a deputy head of a department, and this motion should be rejected as being a mode of enquiry which would never be sanctioned in the case of any other civil servant, and for that reason violating the first elements of fair-play. Administrations are attacked because they take the responsibility of what they do and have to defend it; but to attack in this House a civil servant behind his back, without giving him a chance to defend himself, is to violate every principle of fair-play. In the second division of the resolution, we are asked to commit ourselves to the statement that Sir Charles Tupper imputed treasonable motives to a large proportion of the people of Canada. Now, I have listened carefully, and have never yet heard from any hon. gentleman opposite one tittle of evidence on that subject. The hon. member for South Oxford started out, as I thought pretty bravely, to prove it, but he wound up with a charge of treason against Mr. Farrer, Mr. Wiman and Sir Richard Cartwright; and as we cannot yet consider those gentlemen to be a large proportion of the people of Canada, we cannot consistently support the resolution. Why, not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken have been able to prove that Sir Charles Tupper imputed treasonable motives to a large section of our people. He said, it is true that some parties were treasonable. He imputed treason to Messrs. Wiman and Farrer, and I do not know whether any hon. gentleman on the opposite side is prepared to defend those two gentlemen. I do not know why after having received the aid of Messrs. Wiman and Farrer, hon. gentlemen opposite should, now that the battle is over, leave these friends of theirs without a defender. I do not know why they do not defend them against the charge of treason: for I have no doubt the hon. member for Bothwell could prove by the text-book and by authorities that Mr. Farrer and Mr. Wiman do not come within the definition of levying war against the Queen, and therefore are not traitors. But even that he has not attempted to prove, and these gentlemen stand charged, and I think properly, with the crime of treason. In the face of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have not offered any evidence that Sir Charles Tupper charged the Liberal party or any considerable portion of the people with treason, we have, in the very article which the hon. member for South Oxford cited as proof of that assertion, a distinct statement by Sir Charles Tupper that no considerable part of the people of Canada are disloyal or in favour of annexation. And for the House to come to a resolution of that sort proposed would not only be violating every principle of fair-play, would not only be condemning a man in his absence, but would be condemning him against the evidence. They would be giving what a judge would call a perverse verdict, opposed to every principle of evidence. There is another view to take, and that is that, if hon. gentlemen opposite are so careful of the dignity of this Dominion, if they are so careful that no imputations of treason should be made, I invite the House to consider why they did not read the declaration of Sir Charles Tupper in those articles that he did not charge that party with treason, and why they did not refrain from placing on the Journals of the House the false statement that a man in Sir Charles Tupper's position alleged that the Liberal party were in favour of annexation? I ask them why they would allow it to go to England, to the United States, and to all the world, why they would spread the report, the scandal, the slander that Sir Charles Tupper made any such statement as this when they had the evidence that Sir Charles Tupper made no such statement, but in fact stated the very opposite? So I think if any gentlemen are to blame in this matter, in giving the idea that Canada is honeycombed with treason, they are the hon. gentlemen opposite, who, in this resolution, invite the House to resolve that Sir Charles Tupper stated publicly throughout the country that the Liberal party were committed to the policy of annexation. The third charge is that Sir Charles Tupper vilified the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway. What are the facts? Sir Charles Tupper was in Cumberland on declaration day, and, as a matter of course, being the old member of the county, and the people being glad to see him, he was invited to speak. He discussed the issues of the day and the battle which had just been fought and the reasons why in some provinces the Government had lost and why in other provinces the Government had succeeded. In going over these reasons, he naturally came to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and he discussed their conduct in opposing the Government, and, as was perfectly natural under the feelings engendered by the struggle, he did so warmly. I do not know that there is anything very much out of the way in the leader of the Opposition accusing 215 revising officers of this Dominion as being unblushing partisans. He charged them with being guilty of the most disgraceful frauds, and this language was used by him in regard to the causes of the defeat of the Liberal party. Sir Charles Tupper, in discussing the reverses of the Conservative party in sections where the Grand Trunk Railway held sway, gave expression to his opinion of their action. I do not see anything very serious in that. In connection with that matter, Sir Charles Tupper was attacked most virulently by Sir Henry Tyler. It was asserted that he had tried to make a corrupt bargain with the Grand Trunk Railway in reference to the elections. He met that statement with a denial on his own part and also one by Hector Cameron. Various charges and counter charges were made, and what did Sir Charles Tupper do? I ask anyone who can fairly look at the question if any proposition could have been more proper than the one which he made. He said: "I will go to your own meeting, and there, before your own shareholders, before the people whose business you have been managing for years, before people with whom I have no interests, but who are intelligent Englishmen, I will discuss the charges I have made and produce the proofs I have to offer, and you shall produce whatever proofs you have to offer, and the meeting shall decide between you and me." I ask the House what fairer offer could have been made by Sir Charles Tupper or any other man. But that challenge was not accepted, and consequently Sir Charles Tupper had to write the letters, some parts of which are complained of by members of the Opposition. It only comes to this, that Sir Charles Tupper, in stating the causes of the defeat of the Government in certain places, fell foul of the Grand Trunk Railway, that Sir Henry Tyler attacked him and that he had to defend himself as best he could. After all, Sir Charles Tupper's chief complaint against the Grand Trunk Railway was that they interfered unfairly in the elections, that they did not allow their employés to vote as they wished. His statement is corroborated by Hector Cameron, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, I hold that we are bound to assume that is correct. Therefore on this head the motion is untenable. It is untenable on all grounds, but I submit that, as to the allegation that Sir Charles Tupper attributed treasonable motives to any considerable portion of the people of Canada, not only is there no evidence to support it but there is considerable evidence against it, sufficient to satisfy any one with a fair and open mind. Therefore, I appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House, whether they can come to a resolution involving a statement of fact such as appears in the middle branch of that resolution. As I said before, I think this motion should have been directed against the Government, or, if it was directed against the official, he should have had an opportunity to be heard. It involves a misstatement of facts, a statement contrary to all the evidence we have before us, and, therefore, I hope that this House will vote down a motion, which, in my opinion, was extremely ill-judged, a motion which appears to be the outcome of extreme ill-feeling against Sir Charles Tupper personally, an ill-feeling which was engendered by Sir Charles Tupper's successful efforts during the political campaign, a motion which the people of this country will see has been made on account of the success of Sir Charles Tupper's arguments and eloquence during the late campaign. I hope that a motion of this character, a motion which violates every principle of good taste and fair-play will be voted down by this House, and I trust by an overwhelming majority. If it is so voted down, it will show that this House has a rough-and-tumble sense as to what is due between man and man, that this House has not forgotten the work Sir Charles Tupper has done, work which we know is appreciated by members on both sides of the House, work that this country in the future will be proud of and for which it would honour him to-morrow if he were struck down by sickness or death. I hope the House will not allow a man with a record like that to be treated as he would be by the adoption of such a motion as this, and I hope it will be voted down by such a majority as will make it very satisfactory to Sir Charles Tupper when he hears of it in England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The speech which the hon. gentleman has just delivered does more credit to his heart than to his head. I would not have been disposed to follow him at all were it not for one observation which he uttered, at least three times, and which I think calls for refutation from those who are supporting the present amendment. That observation was to the effect that not a scintilla of evidence had been attempted to be offered to the House in support of the charge that the High Commissioner of this country had charged treason against a large portion of the population. That assertion of his has brought me to my feet, and I will deal with it in a few moments. If I understand the position correctly which the hon. gentleman assumed, it was that Sir Charles Tupper did not occupy, in any sense, the position of a diplomatist or an ambassador. He ventured, with the becoming modesty with which he generally speaks in this House, to say that he did not speak as a constitutional lawyer, and I suppose, to some extent, he formed his opinions upon those delivered by the Minister of Justice when he spoke. Arguing from that position, he said that the High Commissioner therefore stood in the position simply of a deputy head; and if I gathered correctly the argument which he intended to present to the House it was this: That it was perfectly proper, and a course which he would defend, for a deputy head of any of the departments to leave his office, leave unfulfilled the duties which he is paid to perform, and enter upon a campaign from one end of this country to the other, and indulge in any language he pleased to use against one political party or another.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think that the hon. gentleman wishes to misrepresent me, but he is doing so. My argument was the very opposite. I said that Sir Charles Tupper is not a civil servant subject to a Minister, like a deputy head, and in that respect I differed from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I fail still to understand the hon. gentleman. Will he tell us what position Sir Charles Tupper does occupy? Sir Charles Tupper does not occupy in any sense, he says, the position of ambassador or diplomatist. Now, he tells us that he does not occupy the position of a civil servant like a deputy head. What position, then, does he occupy? I think the position he occupies in the mind of the hon. gentleman is that of a man above all law and above all rule, and amenable neither to this House nor to any other authority. That is the one ground upon which he can be defended. Let us look at the position that Sir Charles Tupper really does occupy. When the Minister of Justice assumed his defence in this House he did it upon two grounds. He was aware, he could not but be aware, that if Sir Charles Tupper did occupy the position of an ambassador or diplomatist, his conduct in the late campaign was indefensible and indecent, and the Minister of Justice took the bull by the horns and laid down what he conceived to be the position, in very clear language. He said:

"It is perfectly true that the High Commissioner holds a very high and important position in respect to this country. He is one of our public functionaries, but conceding all that, I deny the hon. gentleman's proposition that he holds any such position as a foreign ambassador occupies. A foreign ambassador must necessarily keep himself, to a great extent, free from party politics. He must avoid anything that would impair the relations between himself and the court to which he is sent, because he is a medium of communication between the Government he represents and that court. The High Commissioner in our service occupies no such position; he is nothing but the agent of this Government living in London. * * * He does not occupy in any sense or in any degree such a position as an ambassador in diplomatic service in the British Government holds."

Now, if he could have supported that position, he might have had some grounds for the subsequent argument which he offered to the House. But let us, at this part of our enquiry, ask, is that position of the Minister of Justice sound? What did we hear to-day? We heard from an authority which I think the hon. gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Dickey) will respect, no less an authority than the High Commissioner himself, a definition of his own powers and his own position. And what did he claim for himself? He was in no sense a civil servant, but he was, as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) showed, quoting from Sir Charles' own speech, a diplomatist, and in a sense an ambassador. My hon. friend went on quoting the language of the High Commissioner in which he claimed to hold a high and responsible position, one in which he did not feel himself free to deal with disputes between parties; he stood in such a position to both parties that he could deal frankly and fairly with them both, and he felt that if he could not occupy that position, he would be unfit for the position of High Commissioner. Sir, I believe the High Commissioner properly and rightly conceived the responsibilities and duties of the office which he holds. If the authority of that gentleman is not sufficient to justify the statement I make that the position of High Commissioner is akin to that of a diplomatist in another country, I shall give the hon. gentleman another authority which I think he will respect. When that office was created in this country, we had a debate upon the subject, and the present leader of the Government (Sir John A. Macdonald) was asked to define the position which this officer would hold towards the respective parties in the State, and towards the Government of the country, and he laid it down then in language so clear that it could not be misunderstood, in language which has been understood ever since, that the gentleman who occupied that position for the time being was in the nature of a diplomatist, or an ambassador. The Prime Minister said:

"It is believed that by having an officer holding a quasi-diplomatic position, in fact holding a diplomatic position, so far as is consistent with our position as a dependency of the Empire——"

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let the hon. gentlemen cheer after I am through——"his statements, and actions, and prestige will be generally accepted by the public, and will greatly assist in giving a direction to the emigration from the United Kingdom and from Europe generally."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

He was to hold a position free from party and above party, a position so high above party that his statements, when made publicly, were to be accepted by the public at large as true statements; and the English public and the world were asked, on the statement of the First Minister of this country, to pay, not the respect that is paid to the voice or the statement of a politician, but they were asked to give that weight to the High Commissioner's statement, when made as High Commissioner, which should be attached to the statement of a man standing above and aloof from all parties. He went on to say:

"Therefore the Dominion, like the other Colonies of the Empire, has been, to a great degree, unrepresented; and it is of great importance, at the present juncture, to have in Europe a resident agent, or Minister, who will be on the spot for the purpose of being consulted upon any negotiations that are going on between Her Majesty's Government and the various European powers in commercial matters. Her Majesty's Government have, as will be seen by the papers laid before the House, assented to the proposition of Canada. They are willing to receive and to give proper position and prominence to such an officer. They will give him such a diplomatic position as is consistent, of course, with the subordinate position of Canada as a dependency of the Empire."

Further on he said:

"I would say, Sir, that I believe in all sincerity that it is not only a very important step, but that it is a very wise step that Canada should at once as a Dominion, as an auxiliary kingdom, if I may use the expression, have a resident Minister, representing our wishes, to receive instructions from us and take at once a position among the corps diplomatique, which has not latterly been accorded to any portion of Her Majesty's Empire."

What is the difference between a resident minister at the Court of St. James and an ambassador? I do not catch what an hon. gentleman opposite says, but, perhaps, he will explain the difference if he knows it. We have here the declaration of the First Minister defining the duties of the office. We have the statement that the occupant was to be above political party contentions, and that he was to occupy a position that would ensure for any statement made by him in England the most ample belief and confidence, and the opinion was expressed that he would be one of the corps diplomatique and the representative of an auxiliary kingdom at the Court of St. James. If that is so, what is the meaning of the language which the Minister of Justice found himself driven to use, that Sir Charles Tupper occupied no such position, but was merely a civil servant. We start, therefore, with this proposition, that on the evidence of the First Minister who proposed the establishment of the office, and on the evidence of Sir Charles Tupper, who fills the office, his position is not one akin to that of a deputy minister or a civil servant, but is one above and beyond such position and akin to that of a diplomatist. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to produce a precedent in history where a diplomatist accredited to a foreign country engaged in political warfare against one of the parties of that country and continued to hold his position. We remember the false step taken by a former Minister who represented Great Britain in Washington. He wrote a letter, not a very strong letter, in which he expressed a slight preference for the policy of one of the political parties. Few hours elapsed before he was obliged to leave his position, after the fact that he had written the letter was made public. He had to leave Washington and lose his position, and he has regained neither his position nor his prestige.

Mr. FOSTER. Sir Charles Tupper did not interfere in English politics.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It does not matter whether he interfered in English politics or not; but I will show how he interfered in English politics. He attempted to lead the English people into the belief that half the Canadian people were traitors. He basely took advantage of the position which he held to decry the Canadian people to the English people to whom he was accredited. That being the position of Sir Charles Tupper, the question is whether hon. members should attempt to justify his conduct or language during the late elections. It is said that we should not blame Sir Charles Tupper, but the Government. If the High Commissioner so far forgets the dignity and respect which he owes to his position and steps down into the turmoil of political life, and becomes a public calumniator, he should not escape the condemnation of Parliament. I understood the hon. gentleman who preceded me to intimate that this House of Commons is not the tribunal to pass judgment on an officer who mistakes and abuses his position. There is not a tribunal in the Dominion of Canada so competent to pass judgment upon an officer holding the position which Sir Charles Tupper occupies as is this tribunal which represents the people. For what purpose are we here? To maintain our own dignity and self respect.

Mr. DICKEY. I was quoting Todd's Parliamentary Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know from whom the hon. gentleman was quoting. The hon. gentleman never could get the authority of Mr. Todd for such a position. I will undertake to sit down if the hon. gentleman can quote from Mr. Todd a case in which a diplomatist abused his position by using such language as Sir Charles Tupper used and acted as he acted, and the House of Commons was held not to be the proper tribunal in which to bring him to book for that offence. Having established, as I have satisfactorily established, that position, what is the next point to be considered? It is that the High Commissioner, occupying that elevated, diplomatic position, made use of language towards one of the parties of the State, which the resolution characterizes as involving a breach of the duties of the office which the High Commissioner fills. Did he do so? It is a question of fact. How does the Minister of Justice meet the charge? By the statement that no evidence had been offered in support of the allegation contained in the resolution. My hon. friend and leader who moved the resolution thought that at least this House would be entitled to use knowledge which is common to us all. He thought it was common knowledge that Sir Charles Tupper was High Commissioner, and that he came to this country. Then we had the statement of the First Minister that Sir Charles Tupper came here to interfere in the elections, and that he spoke in favour of one of the political parties. Moreover, the press during three months teemed with his speeches abusing the Liberal party and the Grand Trunk Railway. Since the return of the High Commissioner to England he has not failed to vilify, abuse and traduce that great corporation to which Canada owes so much, the Grand Trunk Railway. The High Commissioner did not satisfy his spleen with the speeches he made in this country, but since returning to England he has done his worst to abuse the management of the road, and to diminish, if he could, the value of the shares of that great corporation in the English market. I do not think he has been successful; his statements have been discounted because he has become known. But that does not excuse him, because he did his worst in that matter. The Minister of Justice said that no evidence had been offered up to the time he spoke in support of the charges in the resolution, ignoring the fact that a two days' debate had occurred in which evidence was submitted without stint in support of the resolution. I heard the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) say that no evidence had been furnished in support of the proposition that the High Commissioner had vilified one of the great parties of the country, and had accused them of treason. Of all the representatives in this House, that hon. gentleman should have been the last man to make such a statement, because he came from the county, and the very county town in which the slander was uttered. I hold in my hands the Amherst Gazette, and I do not desire to quote from it, for the echoes of its language have barely died away; and yet the hon. gentleman does not remember that such language was uttered. What did Sir Charles Tupper say in the course of his carefully prepared and revised speech, a speech uttered in cold blood on declaration day, when the heat of the election was over? Speaking of one of the great parties of this country he said: "There are two great parties in Canada, one loyal to the mother country, the other alien thereto and turning its back on Great Britain." Did the hon. gentleman ever hear that language uttered? He may believe it to be true or false, but he must not deny that it was uttered by Sir Charles, and was a disgrace to the High Commissioner in view of the position he occupies. It was open to Sir Charles to throw up his position and declare that the issue between the two great parties was so important he would resign, and as a private citizen take part in the struggle. If he had resigned the emoluments of his office and the prestige attaching to the position he held, and, standing on a common level with other electors, have chosen to vilify, blackguard and abuse his opponents, he would have been met in proper fashion. But for the High Commissioner—whose words the First Minister says from his very position will be accepted by all parties in the Empire as true—to stand upon a public platform and charge that which he must know to be false, namely, that one of the great parties in this State was prepared to hand over the country to aliens, is a charge that cannot go unchallenged, a charge which is false in itself, and a charge which I do not think there are twenty gentlemen on the Government benches believe in. Under the circumstances, and considering the position which Sir Charles Tupper held at the time, I not only characterize the charge as false but the man who made it as acting indecently when he made it. More than that: Sir Charles Tupper was not satisfied with blackguarding and vilifying one of the great parties in the State, but he must needs vilify one of the greatest corporations in this country. The hon. gentleman attempted to make the House believe that there was no charge against the Grand Trunk Railway, but that it was all against Cartwright, Wiman, and Farrer. Is that true? Are we to shut our eyes to the record? Are we to believe what Sir Charles Tupper's own newspaper says he spoke on the occasion to which I refer? According to his own paper he said:

"When this election came on, notwithstanding all we had done for this company, it issued a circular commanding its thousands of employes to vote against the Government. He never could have believed that a company of English shareholders could be induced to use its great power and influence to strike down British institutions in this country."

Is that a charge against the Grand Trunk Railway or is it not? Is it not a charge that the Grand Trunk Railway was conspiring with these treason-mongers to whom Sir Charles Tupper previously referred. He goes on to say:

"The Grand Trunk Railway also, since the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been ruining its own shareholders in its vain attempts to try to obstruct that line and going into wild purchases of lines to embarrass it."

What could be more calculated to injure the interests of that great corporation than this language of Sir Charles Tupper, which was telegraphed to England and put into the hands of every shareholder of the Grand Trunk Railway, with the malicious purpose, I contend, of damaging the interests of that corporation, so far as any statement made by Sir Charles Tupper could damage those interests. I maintain that if there is a corporation in Canada which it is our interest to speak respectfully of, it is the Grand Trunk Railway. Why, you cannot float any great financial scheme for the country without that scheme being referred to those in that company who have great influence at home, and if you attempt to destroy the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway, just to that extent do you damage and destroy the interests of this great country. Sir Charles Tupper is not satisfied with denouncing the whole Liberal party as traitors, but he must single out for his abuse the leader of the Liberal party, the leader whom we are proud of, the leader whose policy we believe in, and advocated and supported at the polls, the leader whose policy only, we believe, can bring prosperity to this country; he singles that leader out and without a shadow of evidence to justify the vile charge he classes him with traitors and treason-mongers. Sir Charles Tupper says:

"Now you find Laurier, Wiman, Farrer, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, these craven creatures who have been representing us as people whose life could be crushed out by the United States, leading and abetting a party which turns its back on England."

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman who said "hear, hear," cannot mean it. He surely does not mean to characterize the leader of the Liberal party as a coward, he is too much of a gentleman and he has sat too long with the Hon. Mr. Laurier in this House to do so. He knows that there is no man in this Parliament of Canada less open to the foul charge, than the eloquent, the able and single-minded leader of the Liberal party. I denounce the language used by Sir Charles Tupper on that occasion not only towards the party as a whole, but towards its trusted leader, as unworthy of any man holding a position in the Civil Service, let alone a man holding the exalted position of High Commissioner. The hon. Minister of Justice asks his friends to vote down this resolution. Does he himself justify the use of that language, dare he rise in his place as a respected member of this House, and one for whom I have the highest respect, and say he will take the responsibility of endorsing that foul calumny? No, Sir, he will not, nor do I believe that there are ten men on that side of the House who will do it. While that language stands there uncontradicted, published in Sir Charles Tupper's own organ, circulated throughout the length and breadth of this country, telegraphed to England for the wicked purpose of injuring the Grand Trunk Railway and the Liberal party, we are not only within our rights in asking the House to condemn him, but I believe there are numbers of gentlemen on the other side of the House who if they do not condemn him by their votes will condemn him in their hearts. The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) places in my hands the Morning Chronicle of Quebec in which the very same foul charge is repeated from the very same foul lips, and yet in the face of these charges, and in the face of this evidence which is overwhelming, we have an honoured and respected gentleman of this House, who perhaps did not hear it across the floor, denying that such charges were ever made at all, and calling on his friends to whitewash Sir Charles Tupper because he said there was no evidence: when the evidence is overwhelming. I will be prepared to submit it to the hon. gentleman himself as a lawyer and ask him can he give any other verdict than guilty? The hon. gentleman, who is Minister of Marine and Fisheries came forward in a very gallant attempt to do that which his colleagues shrank from doing, and one cannot but sympathize largely with the Minister of Marine in his gallant attempt. He was standing up for an absent father, and the sympathy of the House went out in a large measure to him, but it must be painful to him to find that these men whom it is said Sir Charles Tupper put in their places, these men supporting the party which it is said he returned to power, remained mute and silent and left it for his own son to defend the High Commissioner. We have it stated to-night that whatever apology or excuse can be offered for any other living man no apology can be offered for Mr. Wiman, because he is an "admitted traitor and scoundrel." That is what he was called to-night. I do not know Mr. Wiman, I never saw the gentleman in my life, I never had any communication with him, but he may be, as I believe him to be, a very clever man. I heard Mr. Wiman's character once described in this House, not by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but by no less a personage than the High Commissioner, when he held the position of Finance Minister in the Government. My recollection does not enable me to say that upon that occasion Sir Charles Tupper called Mr. Wiman an "admitted traitor." I rather think that upon that occasion, and it is only a few years ago, the High Commissioner eulogized Mr. Wiman as a gentleman entitled to the gratitude of the Canadian people, as the personal friend of the then Finance Minister, the man who had invited him to approach Mr. Bayard when he offered unrestricted reciprocity to the United States; and, Sir, the thanks that Mr. Wiman, the friend of the then Finance Minister, gets for paving the way and smoothing the difficulties between this country and the United States, are the denunciations of him as an admitted traitor which we have heard to-night by the hon. Minister of Marine. Is this an indication of what the policy of the Government is to be? Is the language we have heard to-night likely to favour and assist the negotiations which we are told are to take place next October at Washington on the subject of reciprocity? Sir, I think the people of this country have a right to charge, against some of the Ministers at least, that they have not been wise, that they have not kept a proper control over their tongues, that they have forgotten the responsibility of their position, that they have made use of language which will rise up before this country when in the persons of her representatives she appears at Washington to negotiate a fair treaty of reciprocity.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on, go on

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry to see that the proposal to adjourn the debate is received in the spirit which is apparent. It is now a quarter to twelve o'clock, and I would say to the hon. gentleman who leads the House that four or five hon. members on this side of the House yet intend to speak on this question, so it is not possible to close the debate to-night, unless we continue to sit through the small hours, till four or five o'clock in the morning.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go ahead.

Mr. LAURIER. It can go ahead, and if hon. gentlemen want to have that kind of game, they know that it does not always have the result it is supposed to have. I do not want to enter into that game, and I hope the hon. leader of the House will understand that the proposition is a perfectly reasonable one. We have been endeavouring to carry on the business of the House by mutual agreement on fair terms. If we are to cease to have that, let us know it at once.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman who has just proposed the adjournment of the debate sent a note across to me about half-past ten asking whether an adjournment, if proposed, would be acceptable to our side of the House. I consulted with my friends, and the decision was that we would prefer to go on with the debate and finish it to-night. That was stated plainly to the hon. gentleman. He told me there were several other members who wanted to speak. I said that of course they could speak, as it was not yet late. Now, this is the second or the third night of this debate, and unless we sit to a later hour we cannot finish our work. There is a large attendance of members this evening: let us finish this debate. I have no doubt that hon. members will not make long speeches now after the full discussion we have had.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would remind the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that no opposition at all was offered to a very early closing on the first day of this debate, and the courtesy then extended by my hon. friend without the slightest reluctance on his part ought in all common reason to be extended to us now. In fact, as the hon. gentleman knows nothing is to be gained in promoting public business by refusing reasonable concessions; and he knows that a very large number of the members of this House have to be present at a moderately early hour to-morrow morning at a very important investigation. Practically most of the members of this House have been at work from ten o'clock this morning till nearly twelve o'clock to-night, and it is not reasonable that men should be kept at work from twelve to fourteen hours a day. We do not want to engage in any filibustering tactics: but I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that if it is their disposition to refuse reasonable concessions, they will have to be met in the same spirit, and it will not be convenient for them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this proposition is a reasonable one. Many of us sat in the committee this morning from half-past ten till one o'clock, and we have been sitting here till about midnight, and it is unfair to ask us to go on longer to-night with this discussion. It is desirable that business should be conducted in a way acceptable to both sides of the House. There are a great many members in this House, as there are a great many people in the country, who are very much opposed to the speeches and statements that have been made by the High Commissioner, and it is just as well that the subject should be threshed out in this discussion.

Mr. TISDALE. My principal reason for objecting to the motion for adjournment is this: that the ordinary courtesy, which I understand usually exists between political parties, to accommodate members who are called away by important private business, has been refused to us. If that sort of thing is to continue, I am prepared to sit night and day to get through the business, in order to have an opportunity to attend to matters of a personal nature which are only second in importance to my duties as a member of this House. While I am satisfied of the sincerity and force of the demand of hon. gentlemen opposite that we should not be detained here too long, still I should like to have a better understanding on both sides.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman ought to remember that upon the first night of this debate he asked me to consent to an adjournment at an early hour, under an expectation which luckily has not been verified up to this moment, but which, unfortunately, may be at any moment: and I think it would not be advisable, under the circumstances, that we should engage in a wrangle which would be most unseemly.

Mr. BOWELL. Under the circumstances, I do not think the hon. gentleman should consider a matter of this kind a matter of courtesy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say it is a matter of courtesy.

Mr. BOWELL. It is a matter of agreement. It would have been brutality in the one case, as it is ungentlemanliness in the other.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to see the Government unwilling to accede to the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I may tell them that soon, perhaps, they will be only too glad to have the leader of the Opposition concur in their wishes. During the present debate, personal accusations have been made against the hon. leader of the Opposition. We, the French members, in order not to take the time of the House, have been so good natured as not to take the floor; but if, with the half of members and strength, a sort of tyranny is to be resorted to, then we will demand our rights and those of our chief, and may take the time required to lay stress upon the arguments we may think necessary.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand that there are several gentlemen on that side of the house who wish to take part in the debate.

Mr. LAURIER. That is so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must say that on our side of the House the feeling is that we should not adjourn, and the reason which made me ask for an adjournment the other day was one that struck the House at once as a very good and strong reason.

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid if we continue the debate after the bulletin I have just received, we may find ourselves in the midst of it when the event we all dreaded the other night may occur. Under these circumstances, I will consent to the adjournment, but I may ask the hon. gentleman when he expects we may finish the debate?

Mr. LAURIER. That will be altogether at the discretion of the Government, and I promise we will finish it at the next sitting.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have just received a bulletin signed by the three medical men It reads as follows:—

"The Premier passed a quiet day without notable change since seven o'clock this evening. Since that time he has shown signs of great prostration, evidenced by perspiration and a laboured respiration, numbering 30 per minute: pulse 135, weak and irregular; took usual nourishment at nine o'clock.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 3rd June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PAYMASTER OF MILITARY DISTRICTS Nos. 5 AND 6.

Mr. LÉPINE (translation) asked, Who is the officer temporarily acting as paymaster of Military Districts Nos. 5 and 6? Has the said officer furnished security? Has he always discharged the duties of the office to the satisfaction of the Government? How much has he been paid for his services during the past twelve months? Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a permanent paymaster, or to retain without security a temporary officer in that important position?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend, I have to say that the officer temporarily acting as paymaster of Military Districts Nos. 5 and 6 is Lt.-Col. D'Orsonnens, the commanding officer of District No. 7. This officer has only been appointed temporarily, and, as temporary officer, has not been required to furnish security. He has discharged his duties to the satisfaction of the Government. He has not been paid anything extra for the services which he now performs. The question of the appointment of a permanent paymaster is still under consideration.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER—WHARFAGE DUES.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether the Department of Marine and Fisheries has obtained from the wharfinger at Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, a return showing the amount of wharfage collected during the year 1890? If so, what is the amount? If not, will the department order a return to be sent in? And how soon?

Mr. TUPPER. On the 15th December last the usual circular was sent to the wharfinger at Tignish, asking for his return showing the amount of wharfage collected during the year. The return not having reached the department, the wharfinger was instructed on the 21st May to send in his return, and the agent at Charlottetown has also been asked to report on the neglect of the wharfinger to forward his returns.

BEAVERTON DOCK.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What is the name and post office address of each party who tendered for the Beaverton Dock? What was the amount of each tender? Who received the contract? Have the plans or specifications been changed since the contract was let? If so, what is the nature of the change, and what additional cost will it entail?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will give the names of the parties who tendered, consecutively. They were as follows:—Patrick Navin, Lindsay, Ont., $12,400; George J. Wilson, Ottawa, Ont., $11,400; John Stewart, Ottawa, Ont., $14,800; Richard Tobin & J. C. O'Keefe, Ottawa, Ont. (together), $12,500; Henry Smith & John Heney, Ottawa (together), $9,917; H. Watters, Lindsay, Ont., $9,832; Robert Grant & Co., Toronto, $9,603; Charles Wynn, Peterborough, Ont., $8,300; Thomas Treleaver, Beaverton, Ont., $11,775; David Porter, Wiarton, Ont., $7,500; A. J. Belcher, Peterborough, and E. Thomson, Burleigh Falls (together), $10,570; John Burns, York, Ont., $11,490. The party who received the contract was David Porter, of Wiarton, the amount of his tender, $7,500, being the lowest. The hon. gentleman asks if the plans or specifications have been changed since the contract was let. Yes; the change has been caused by the construction of a block to fill in between the two outer blocks of the wharf, for the purpose of giving additional strength to the work at that point and the better shelter of vessels, and also an additional length of 50 feet of stone embankment required to place the outer end of the wharf in the depth of water stipulated in the contract. The additional cost is $830, which, with the amount of the contract, makes a total of $8,330.

INDIAN RESERVATION—BIRD ISLAND.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked, Was Sea Bird Island, B.C., set apart as an Indian reservation? If so, when, and in favour of what Band of Indians? Had said Band of Indians then another reservation? If so, was Sea Bird Island intended to be given in lieu of the one then occupied? And if so, why? Were any conditions attached to the exchange or grant? And if so, what were the conditions? Have they been complied with within the time limited, or since? Has any other disposition been made of said Island, or any part of it? If so, what? Has the said Island, or any part of it, been otherwise disposed of, granted, leased, or conveyed? If so, when, to whom, and on what conditions, and for what consideration? Have any white settlers located on said Island? If so, when? How many? Have their claims been recognized? If not, why not? Have such white settlers been removed from said Island? If so, by what authority and for what reason?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Sea Bird Island was set apart as an Indian reservation on the 13th June, 1879, for all the Indians between Cheam and Spuzzim. These Indians had other reserves, but Sea Bird Island was not intended to be given in lieu of any of them, but the Indian Reserve Commissioner for British Columbia reported, in connection with the allotment of this Island as a reserve, that the other reserves which those Indians had were for the most part poor soil, and that the Yale Indians in particular had no good land, and that some land had to be found for them. The conditions of the allotment were that if the Indians had not within six years from the date thereof used the land sufficiently, in the opinion of the Government of Canada, the unused portion was to cease to be Indian land; that is, that the allotment of the unused portion as an Indian reserve might be reconsidered. In 1888 the Indian agent for the locality reported that twenty-eight Indians had been in occupation of locations on the Island which had been cultivated by them for different periods ranging from one to thirteen years, and that some of their families resided on the Island. And that the work that had been obtainable by the Indians in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway had prevented more extensive and general cultivation of the land by the Indians, but that in future, that work having ceased, they must rely more upon the cultivation of their lands, which, without Sea Bird Island, would be insufficient. No other disposition had been made of said Island. No part of the Island has been disposed of, granted, leased, or conveyed. On the 10th February last the Department was informed that twenty squatters had settled upon the Island. Their claims have not been recognized, because the land was not available for settlement by white men. The white squatters were notified by the Indian agent, acting under authority of the Department, to leave, and they did so.

FISHING LICENSES—GRAND RIVER.

Mr. BROWN (Monck) asked, Whether the Government did, during the months of March and April, 1891, issue fishing licenses granting privilege to fish in the Grand River? And were such licenses issued at the village of Dunnville and in the County of Haldimand? If so, what is the date of the latest license issued, and for what term was it issued?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government issued no fishing licenses during the months of March and April, 1891, in the Grand River.

Mr. BROWN (Monck) asked, Did the Government, during the months of March and April, 1891, issue an order prohibiting fishing in the Grand River? If so, the date thereof?

Mr. TUPPER. An order was issued on the 23rd of March last, prohibiting fishing with seines in the Grand River.

Mr. BROWN (Monck) asked, Has the Government refunded any moneys to licensees collected for fishing privileges in the Grand River, or is it their intention so to do?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government has not refunded any moneys accompanying applications for fishing privileges in the Grand River. If it is decided to continue the prohibition against seine fishing after the expiry of the present close season (on the 15th of this month), these fees will, of course, be refunded.

Mr. BROWN (Monck) asked, Is it the intention of the Government that no fishing shall hereafter be done in the Grand River?

Mr. TUPPER. I have asked the superintendent of fish culture for a special report on this subject, and I will be in a position to answer the hon. gentleman before the expiry of the present close season.

SCHOONER MARIE ELIZA—SALE.

Mr. LANGELIER asked, Whether the Government has knowledge:—1. That, during the year 1887, the schooner Marie Eliza, belonging to one Philippe Caron, while in whose hands it had been seized by the collector of Customs at Rimouski, has been sold? 2. That it has been bought by one Pierre Pinault? 3. That the said Pierre Pinault only lent his name to the said collector of Customs at Rimouski, Mr. J. A. Martin, and that it is the said J. A. Martin who is the real owner of the said schooner? 4. That since the said schooner was in this way bought by the said Pierre Pinault, acting for the said J. A. Martin, it has been employed in the smuggling trade, for the benefit of the said J. A. Martin? Does the Government intend to take steps to put an end to the said smuggling, if it is proved that it was carried on by the said schooner? What are the names of the bidders and the purchaser at the sale of the said schooner? What was the price which was paid for it? And to whom was this price paid?

Mr. BOWELL. 1. In 1887 the schooner Marie Eliza was seized for smuggling, condemned and sold. 2. The auctioneer's return showed that the vessel was sold to one P. Pinault. 3. The department has no knowledge of Pinault having lent his name to J. A. Martin, nor has it any knowledge of Martin being the owner of the vessel. 4. The Government has no knowledge of the vessel having been used since for smuggling for the benefit of J. A. Martin, or any one else. 5. When it is ascercertained that the vessel is, or has been engaged in smuggling since her sale, all steps necessary for her capture and the stopping of smuggling, will be taken.

The department has no knowledge of who were bidders further than that it is stated in subsequent correspondence, that a Mr. Hudson, who held a mortgage on the vessel, was present at the sale and made bids: and that a Mr. Ringuet was present for the purpose of purchasing on account of Captain Lavoie, but the price obtained went beyond the limit he had placed upon it. The price paid was $200: that sum, less charges and expenses, was paid to the account of the Receiver General.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, as nothing but notices of motion will be in order before six o'clock, of making an intimation, for the convenience of the House, with regard to the first matter which will be on the Order paper this evening, if the House sits after six o'clock, and that is, the resumption of the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). It may be convenient for the House to know what is proposed to be done with that subject, in order that any other business that may be ready, or that may be urgent, may not be delayed by the anticipation that that debate will necessarily be resumed. When this day was fixed for the resumption of that debate—last Wednesday, I think it was—the Premier's unfortunate illness was but slight, but now it has reached such a very serious stage that, as the House is aware, there is no hope of a favourable issue. The motion of the hon. member for Lanark is one which, if carried, would affect seriously the policy of the Government, in fact it invites the House to declare that a serious change in the fiscal management of the country should take place. Consequently, I feel bound to ask the House to suspend the discussion of that resolution until the issue of Sir John A. Macdonald's illness is known. According to the constitution, if that illness should result fatally, it would be necessary that other advisers should be called in by His Excellency, and under these circumstances it would not be reasonable that the House should proceed to fix an important question of policy of this kind, at such a critical moment. Therefore, we shall have to ask, if the House should sit after six o'clock, that the debate be further adjourned.

COMMISSIONER HERCHMER.

Mr. DAVIN. In regard to my motion respecting an enquiry into the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer, I intend to allow the motion to stand, with the consent of the Government and the House. It is the wish of the person whose conduct is being questioned to have these words added to the motion: "and generally into the conduct of Lawrence W. Herchmer from the date he became commissioner to the present time." I move accordingly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to the addition being made to the motion as it appears on the Notice paper.

THE RIDEAU CANAL.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved for:

Return of all letters and memorials complaining of the high water in the Rideau Canal between Kingston and Jones' Falls: copies of letters from Colonel By and others, showing the depth of water allowed for vessels navigating the canal; a statement showing the average depth of water in the canal for the first forty years after construction, and for the last ten years: also for copies of plans and reports of engineers engaged on the survey of the Kingston Mill Level, showing the estimate of cost of lowering the water and the quantity of land to be reclaimed if the water is lowered.

He said: This motion has been standing for some time in the hope that the Minister of Railways would be in his place: but, under the circumstances, I move the resolution, and omit saying anything upon it, simply asking the House to adopt it.

Motion agreed to.

WRECK OF THE BARQUE MERMERLY.

Mr. FRASER moved for:

Correspondence with the Department of Marine respecting presentation of binocular glasses to the volunteers rescuing the crew of the barque Mermerly, lost on Roy's Island, Pictou County, in November last past.

He said: In November last the barque Mermerly, timber laden, was wrecked on Roy's Island, in the County of Pictou. The Department of Marine saw fit to order that binocular glasses should be given to six men who risked their lives in saving part of the crew. Those six men were commanded by Captain Graham, of New Glasgow, and, as might be expected when any deed of daring was to be performed, the majority of those who did the work were Liberals. The glasses were ordered by the department. Previous to the last election, I think, perhaps, eight or ten days or more, one of the parties, Mr. McGlashan, was presented with a pair of glasses at a public meeting, with some show of enthusiasm, by one of the candidates who was running in Pictou. Another, a native of the County of Richmond, received his glasses with the same formality, and the hon. member who now represents that county had the pleasure of showing the gratitude of the Government for the bravery displayed. The others have not, up to this date, or rather had not at the time of the date of this motion, received their glasses. Where they are, no one knows. They did not receive them before the election, nor did they after. In making this motion for papers in this connection, I wish to state that the English Royal Society were so impressed with the bravery of the men that it gave each a medal, and those medals were sent from England, and according to the correct custom, I think, followed in that country, they were sent direct to the collector of Customs and were handed to each of the brave men. I feel a little ashamed for my country that this recognition should come from England and be presented, before the recognition from Ottawa could be tendered to the brave men who performed these services; and brave men they are, for they risked their lives for their fellow-beings. My object in moving for these papers is to call the attention of the House to a system in the Department of Marine, which I think is a wrong one and which should be altered, namely, that these two glasses were presented during the heat of an election contest. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), whom I do not see in the House at the present time, I understand, refused to make the presentation during the heat of an election, as he did not wish that the recognition for heroic services should be given during that time. I understand that this is correct, but at all events I saw it so stated in the newspapers. Now, I believe that the department is not responsible for this. I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Marine would not knowingly permit such a thing to occur, and I call the attention of the House to it to show that things are done without his cognizance which would not be done if he himself had knowledge of the fact. I submit that when brave men gallantly risk their lives, a recognition of their heroic conduct should not be made at election times, but if this system is to be carried out I submit that it should be carried to its full extent, and that all the men who are deemed worthy should be placed upon the same level and receive the recognition of their services at the same time.

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatever to bringing down all the correspondence connected with this matter. It is only right, however, that I should say a word or two in reference to the subject which the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has referred to. He has very kindly told me that his object in making this motion was to bring out the facts he has mentioned to the House, and I am glad of this, for I was previously at a loss to know what his object could be. The papers themselves will give definite information, but I may say, speaking from recollection, that, on the report of the collector at the port of Pictou, I gave, in the usual way, the order for procuring the binocular glasses for those heroic men who risked their lives to save the lives of others: and I take it, that in the usual course the orders were sent to England for these glasses. The department endeavours to keep a supply of suitable articles on hand for presentations in such cases, and when these events occur, the glasses, or perhaps a watch in some instances, are sent to an engraver for a suitable inscription. That causes some delay, but the principal delay in this case was, I believe, due to the fact that the department was out of a supply at that time. The hon. gentleman mentions that Mr. McGlashan received his glass some time ago, but I do not remember how that came to be. I never knew of the politics of these men, and I regret to say that I cannot remember the names of some of them. Dr. McLean and Captain Graham are two gentlemen whose names come to my mind at the present moment. I observed recently in a local paper in the county that these glasses were on exhibition in some window, so I take it that since the hon. gentleman received his information the glasses have arrived. Probably the reasons that the medals to which he alluded came more quickly from England, was that we had to send to England for the glasses, have the inscriptions made on them, and then send them to the different recipients. I am quite satisfied, however, that the correspondence will show that, so far as the department is concerned the usual course was adopted, namely, that on receipt of the report as to the services rendered and the heroism displayed, an order was given by the head of the department for these glasses to be procured and to be forwarded—as is the invariable course, not only in my own time, but in the time of all my predecessors in any Government—to a prominent man in the district to present them in the most public manner possible to the recipients on behalf of the Government. The question of good taste on the part of these hon. gentlemen is one about which there can be various opinions. It might be that some would say, that in the heat of an election it was not the time to make the presentation, but, on the other hand, in a district near "Roy's Island" it might be the very opportunity for obtaining a large audience from the surrounding district, to make the presentation for heroism at a public meeting called by both parties. I am quite satisfied that neither my colleague in the representation of the county (Mr. McDougald) nor the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) would at a public meeting of that kind endeavour to claim any particular credit for a political party in the distribution of these recognitions of bravery. In fact, I take it that these heroic men themselves thoroughly understood the principle upon which Parliament makes an appropriation every year out of which recognitions of this kind are granted. However, when the papers are laid before the House, the full facts will be disclosed.

Mr. FRASER. I forgot to mention the names of those brave men who earned this recognition. They are Mr. John McGlashan, of Merigomish: Mr. Boudrot, of Descousse: Dr. E. P. McLean, of New Glasgow: Mr. W. Williams, of New Glasgow: Mr. David Fraser, of New Glasgow: and Captain Peter Graham, of New Glasgow. I wish to say that it is somewhat strange that if the department sent the whole order to England, a large house in England should have sent two of the glasses before the others and that the presentation should have been made to two gentlemen who are supposed to have leanings in one direction. I would suggest that the department in future should send the order to England and get all the articles sent over here at the same time. I think it would be much better if the presentation was made simultaneously to the brave men who rendered these heroic services on the same occasion, so that some of them, who are equally brave with the others, may not be disappointed in not receiving the recognition of their services at the same time as the others.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope the House will not understand that I am stating positively that the reason for the delay was that the department was out of a supply of these articles at the time. On the contrary, I surmise that that is the reason which the papers will show. I have not looked into that particular point: I have merely made a guess, as it were, that the reason for the delay was that we were out of the supply: because I know that we do receive these glasses from England. I make no positive statement as to that: the papers will show.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). I regret that the hon. gentleman who has made this motion did not give me notice of his object in doing so, as I would have given him some explanation that would have satisfied him that this matter was dealt with properly, and with due regard to the worthy men who risked their lives on that occasion. In January last I received the following letter from the Department of Marine and Fisheries:—

"OTTAWA, 21st January, 1891.

"DEAR SIR,—I have sent to your address by express today five binocular glasses which I have great pleasure, as Minister of Marine, in awarding to the undermentioned persons in recognition of their humane and gallant exertions in the rescue of the shipwrecked crew of the barque Merwerly on the 14th of October last:—Capt. Peter Graham, of New Glasgow: David Fraser, of New Glasgow: Watkin Williams, of New Glasgow: Dr. E. P.

McLean, of New Glasgow; James McGlashan, of Merigomish. I will be obliged by your presenting these testimonials to the parties concerned in as public a manner as you deem it advisable, and inform me when presented."

The box did not arrive until some time afterwards, and as the parties lived in different parts of the county it was inconvenient to get them together so that the presentation of all the glasses might be made at the same time. There happened to be a large political gathering east of Merigomish, in a remote part of the county, at which the two political parties were present: my old opponent, Mr. Carmichael, was also there; and before the close of the meeting I made the presentation to Mr. McGlashan, stating that it was not a political act at all, but a recognition of his brave and gallant services on the occasion referred to. On one of the glasses there was no inscription, and one of the parties I could not ascertain the whereabouts of, and I had no further opportunity to collect these parties together at a convenient place during the heat of the contest, or before I had to leave the county to come here and take my seat in the House. I, therefore, sent the testimonials to the collector of Customs at New Glasgow, with a copy of the letter which I had received from the department, requesting him to deliver the glasses in the manner directed by the Department of Marine. I think that will be a sufficient explanation to satisfy the hon. gentleman that what has been done has been done in good faith, and with no political object.

Mr. FRASER. All I have to say in reply to the hon. gentleman is this——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FRASER. I only wish to say a word of explanation. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman has made the explanation he has, and I have only to say in reply that Merigomish is much farther away from the home of the hon. gentleman than New Glasgow——

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid that this is not a personal explanation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FRASER. I have only two or three words to say. If one of the glasses was defective in not having the name upon it, I wish to state that we have an excellent engraver in New Glasgow, who will compare favourably with any man in England in doing work of that kind. He is a Liberal. I wish further to say that those four men lived in New Glasgow, which is only five miles from the hon. gentleman's residence, and he had ample time in which to make the presentation. I am glad that his explanation is made, and that there will be an opportunity for it to be read in the county from which the hon. gentleman comes.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn, and motion agreed to.

BAY OF FUNDY FISHERIES.

Mr. BOWERS moved for:

Return of papers, correspondence, reports and other documents in the possession of the Government relating to the subject of the fisheries of the Bay of Fundy and its adjacent waters, during the past year, including the report of the conference of Fishery Officers held at Ottawa on the subject.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the County of Digby being one of the principal fishing counties bordering upon the Bay of Fundy, the people of that part of the Dominion are deeply interested in all that pertains to the preservation or destruction of their means of livelihood. Only a few years ago the people of our shores were not at a loss to obtain herrings for bait, by which they were enabled to ply their avocation of catching cod, pollock and other scaled fish in sufficient numbers to afford them profitable employment. Almost any season of the year, by simply setting their gill-nets, they would obtain not only a sufficient number for bait for their own use, but often sold large quantities to the fishing schooners that frequented our harbours. In those days our line fishermen worked from six to seven months of the year and lived comfortably. Now they work the whole year round and can hardly eke out a living. What is the reason of this? It is on account of the almost total failure of the herring fishery in the Bay of Fundy and its adjacent waters, and our fishermen believe, whether rightly or not, that the greatest if not the sole reason is the enormous and wanton destruction annually of thousands of hogsheads of small herrings on the southern shores of the coast of New Brunswick, and about the Grand Manan Islands. By means of weirs and traps, placed at almost every point, ledge and inlet, herrings in all sizes are taken in immense quantities. Large numbers are packed as smoked herrings and exported, while many are pickled and sold to the dealers in such goods. These industries will soon be extinct under the present destructive system. Under the old way of catching in gill-nets, only such sizes as were used were caught, but at the present time often thousands of barrels are taken, most of which being too small for use are either allowed to rot or pressed as fertilizers. Again, the sardine business takes many thousands of tons yearly of these very small fish, and if the weather is very hot—and a very little heat spoils them—immense quantities are thrown overboard and wasted. In this connection I will read a short extract from the Digby Courier, which came here yesterday, to show what takes place in Digby County:

"We are informed that quite large hauls of herring, too small for bait, are being taken from the weirs at Smith's Cove and the Joggin, and are being spread on the grass grounds and heaped up for compost. This, the fishermen complain, is a great injury to the herring fishery, and hope that our Fishery Overseer will look into the matter in time to protect their interests."

This you see, Mr. Speaker, is going on all the year round. Many thousands of tons, yearly, of these small fish are thus taken, and if the weather is very hot, the heat spoils immense quantities.

Mr. SPEAKER. I thought, when my hon. friend commenced his speech, that he was reading the motion, but I observed, when my attention was drawn to the fact, that he is reading his speech: and of course the hon. gentleman must know that is not permissible.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is a new member and is entitled to the indulgence of the House: and I am sure the House will remember when we have had speeches read of four hours duration.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, I am not to be bound by what has occurred previously. The rule as my hon. friend knows, is imperative, that written speeches cannot be delivered in the House. Of course, if the hon. gentleman is only reading extracts he has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. BOWERS. I am reading from extracts and copious notes. Some people argue that herrings are so plentiful they cannot be diminished by any means that man can invent. Such arguments I believe to be wrong, and in confirmation I will read an extract from the report of the Fisheries Department, 1890, as given by Lieutenant Andrew R. Gordon at page 22 of the Fisheries Report:

"The fall herring fishery was at one time one of the great fisheries of eastern Nova Scotia; it was from these fish that the food of the people was taken; but of late years this fishery has failed. One reason of the failure is, I believe, the excessive fishery on one spot or spawning ground. In the Bay of Fundy the fishermen now recognize the benefit accruing to them from the preservation of the spawning beds on Grand Manan. And I would strongly urge on your notice the advisability of protecting what I believe to be a similar spawning ground for the fall school of herring near the mouth of the St. Mary's River, Guysborough. This ground has, for several years past, been visited each fall by a regular fleet of vessels, some carrying as many as a hundred nets, and not only have they injured, not to say ruined, the fishery, but this mass of nets, brought from all parts of the coast, has prevented the local resident fishermen from getting a reasonable share in the catch.

"I would recommend that the area which can be swept by a radius of seven miles from Wedge Island light house be set apart as a spawning ground for herring, and that between the 15th day of September and the 15th day of November, no net shall be allowed to be set in the waters of said area, save by those holding licenses therefor, such licenses only to be issued to local resident fishermen, and quantity licensed not to exceed 1,000 square fathoms of net to each boat owned in the coast of the district so set apart. This amount of net will not interfere with the fish coming in, but will be sufficient to enable these local resident fishermen to get the food supply which they require for themselves and their families. I feel that I cannot too strongly urge on your notice the advisability of adopting, with the least possible delay, this measure of protection for a much depleted fishery.

"I cannot do better than close this part of my report with a quotation from the report of the Fisheries Commissioners of Newfoundland, who say: 'It is useless for mere theorists to tell us that fish is so prolific that they cannot be exterminated: that for some unknown causes fish come in plentiful some years, then become scarce, and after years of absence return in abundance: that we cannot calculate their erratic pelagic movements: that man cannot exhaust the great ocean. These specious, but utterly baseless theories, are confuted by the undeniable fact that in all our great bays the supply of cod has been steadily diminishing, never increasing, and that several of them are almost depleted, so that the fishermen are driven to other distant places in search of fish. For such a decline there must be causes. It is our part to search out and remove these causes and use remedial measures.'

"These words are as fully applicable to Canada as they are to Newfoundland. I have endeavoured in my work to find out the causes, and I have placed before you what I deem to be remedial measures."

This is simply on a line with the report of W. H. Venning, late Inspector of Fisheries, for 1886 and 1888, as regards the great destruction of mackerel and herring by means of the purse-seine. This is another way in which large quantities of fish not available for food are thrown away, being too small to be salted and saved for that purpose. I will also read a short extract from a report of Mr. John H. Pratt, of the Dominion steamship Dream:

"A large fleet of schooners each autumn moor in Three Island Harbour, Grand Manan, and set their nets in the surrounding waters. About forty schooners are anchored there and in its vicinity at the present time, and as pickled herring commands a good price, and the catch being good, our fishermen will be enabled to make a good fall's work.

"I write the foregoing to show how important this herring industry is to the fishermen of the Bay of Fundy, and what an immense quantity of fish are taken and packed by them during a season."

After Mr. Pratt had written this, the good fall's work which he predicted turned out to be a failure. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the herring fishery has been more uncertain year by year, until this last winter scarcely a herring has been seen, where, in former years, they were so plentiful. A wilful waste makes a woeful want in this case as in many others. Now, the failure of the herring simply means the gradual extinction of our cod, pollock, haddock, and other deep-sea fish, which follow the shoals of herrings in their passage into the bays and inlets of our own coast. Consequently these fish have been growing scarcer every year, until it seems that the Government should take hold of the matter and ascertain if some steps cannot be taken, not only to check the depletion of our fishing grounds, but to again, by wise legislation, place them in a condition whereby they may be a continual source of increasing wealth. There are spawning grounds for all kinds of fish about our coasts, and by preserving these natural hatcheries we are persuaded that our shores and bays would stand a better chance of being restocked than they would by the artificial hatcheries operated by the Government. I find no fault with the Government in this matter as they deal with it, as is reported by their inspectors, who, oftentimes, having eyes see not, and having ears hear not, those things detrimental to the rules and regulations of the Fishery Department. As to the preservation of the lobster fishery, there are so many ways of looking at it, that I recognize the Government will always have difficulty in enacting laws to suit every section. However, I think that the department should not have a cast-iron rule applicable to all localities. In the waters of the Bay of Fundy, owing to so much windy and stormy weather in the spring months, the season for catching should be extended until 1st August, as July is, undoubtedly, the best month for the fishing, and also one of pecuniary profit, the lobster, during that month, bringing a better price in the American market. Our fishermen would be well pleased with the enactment of a law prohibiting the catch of any lobster under 10½ inches, realizing that all taken under that size are not to their pecuniary advantage; and in a short time these small ones would be large enough to send to the Boston market, and would thus bring a much greater price. Mr. Speaker, I have given a few ideas, as they prevail in our county; and if the Government, instead of appointing commissioners to go out to Scotland and other parts of Europe, to find out how to preserve and salt the herrings, would appoint a commission to try and obtain information whereby the herrings and other fish can be saved from extinction, I think that it would be far worthier, and would merit the lasting gratitude of the hard-working fishers of our shores.

Mr. HAZEN. In moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I called the attention of the Minister of Marine to the condition of the herring fishery in the Bay of Fundy, and I pointed out that the impression among the fishermen, whether right or wrong, was, that this was due to the operation of the brush weirs. Since then I have received a letter from a practical fisherman in my constituency, bearing on the subject, and it might not be improper for me to read that letter. It is as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—You wanted me to give you an account of the failure of our fisheries, and as I follow the fishing solely for a living, and as there are hundreds affected as I am, I will give you the facts as they are. First, let me say that the brush weirs are the chief cause, as they destroy all the young herring that frequent our waters, thereby robbing our waters of all the food for all other kinds of fish; and as an instance of this, there is used in Eastport alone, 500 hogsheads daily, besides great quantities destroyed in Grand Manan and other places along the north shore and used for manure and pumice, thereby cutting off the supplies as soon as they breed. In proof of this, say 10 or 15 years ago, since they began to fail, that is, our large herring, there was one man, a Mr. Thomas, told me he had shipped eleven million frozen herring, and the season not over then. Besides, there were twenty other buyers. Eight or ten years ago, I saw coming out of St. Andrew's harbour alone, one day, 25 sail of vessels all loaded with frozen herring, carrying from two to six hundred thousand apiece, besides other vessels loading in Beaver Harbour, Blisses and Lepreaux; and since then, there has been a gradual falling off, so that now it is a total failure. We used to own at that time in Carleton 30 sail of fishing vessels, large and small. They have all gone into decay or been sold but one or two, besides mine, and they are laid up decaying. I am prepared to prove, whenever you fish with nets, they are a benefit instead of an injury to the fishing ground. Thirty or forty years ago, when they had the privilege of fishing at the southern head of Grand Manan, they used to have to watch their nets for fear of getting too many fish in them. Now, these last ten years you would not get any. There is not the first sign of any fish there in the proper season, that is, spawn fish. I would recommend that that should be enquired into. I cannot estimate the loss we have suffered from the failure of our fishing, when we consider there were hundreds of our people along our shores engaged in it besides the merchants who supply them. I hold the overseers responsible for the weirs, in recommending the erection of them to the Government and having them protected by law, and a great many of them are owned by the men who own the sardine factories in Eastport, and the most of our people only get enough out of them to keep soul and body together. I would say, sweep every weir out of existence and let every man take his lawful nets, and our fishing would soon return. The best proof I can give you of this is, that I would not be surprised to hear that the Government would be called upon to help the people living along our shores and islands, as there is already great distress among them for the lack and failure these three years of our fishing. I also wish to state that there is another great evil; that is, trawling for lobsters around the Nova Scotia shores, which the herring frequent to spawn, and it drives them off and they are forced to spawn in places where the spawn perishes. There is another injustice to the fishermen; that is, the law governing what they call the spawning ground of Grand Manan. It is only a sham, and should be taken off, as it was only made for the inhabitants, and to keep off all other fishermen. We are indebted to the Nova Scotia shore, I might say from Cape Sable to the head of the Bay of Fundy, for all of our young herring, for that is the breeding ground for them. Years ago our bay used to be alive with them, and all kinds of fish would be feeding on them. Nowadays you will hardly see any. Their course was always for the north shore where there were harbours, bays and inlets to take shelter in; so you see how easy it is for the weirs, that are built in every place they can put one, and a great many weirs lie idle. The owners do not take the fish out of these hundreds of hogsheads, and when we consider that it would take 100,000 of the smallest fish to fill a hogshead, you can have an idea how great the destruction is. There is this fact to bear in mind—they will try to make you believe that the Americans will catch them all on their side of the water, but do not believe them, although it would be as well to have an understanding with the American Government about it."

I read this letter because it has been sent to me by a practical fisherman, one who has been engaged in the fishing industry for the last twenty or twenty-five years, one who understands the matter with which he deals. From matters which have been brought to my attention by the fishermen there, it is evident that the herring fishing industry in the Bay of Fundy, which is a very important industry, has fallen off in comparison with what it was in past years, and I would again call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has always taken a deep interest in the preservation of the fisheries, to the effect the brush weirs have, not only on the herring, but on the other fisheries in the Bay of Fundy which follow the herring. I would ask him to instruct the officers of his department to make a thorough investigation, and, if they report that the brush weirs are doing this injury in the Bay of Fundy, I would urge that regulations should be passed to cause this injury to cease.

Mr. SKINNER. I wish to give evidence as to the herring industry in the Bay of Fundy. That is a very important industry and one in which a large number of people are interested. The fishing season is, to a large extent, in the winter, and, therefore, a business which a large number of people have grown up to consider one from which they get their subsistence, is entirely swept away. A few years ago estuaries of the Bay of Fundy were, so to speak, crowded with herring which came there to their natural spawning ground. It seems to be the home of the herring, but they seldom visit there now, and, consequently, great loss has accrued to the fishermen of that locality and great injury has been done. It may possibly be that the fishermen may be mistaken as to what causes the destruction of the fisheries, but, whether they are or not—and upon that point a non-practical person cannot express a very decided opinion—the Department of Fisheries could, by having the necessary enquiries made, ascertain what has caused the depletion of that most valuable fishery in that part of the country. The sardine factories in that part of the State of Maine which fronts on the Bay of Fundy have been alluded to, and, of course, they consume a large quantity of these small herrings. Of course they are called sardine factories, but, as a matter of fact, they are not sardine factories at all. The sardine is a particular species of fish, and they only call the small herrings sardines, because they resemble them in appearance when they are caught. By taking so large a quantity of the small herring and using them at the time they do, they destroy to a great extent the productiveness of the fisheries, which suffer great and permanent loss. I think it is time for the Government to consider how far it may be right that those people carrying on that business along the line of the State of Maine, should be allowed to destroy these young fish, even though they make money out of the operation, if the destruction of those fish is going to lead to the final extermination of herring in the Bay of Fundy. Therefore, in any way in which the matter may be looked at, it is of the utmost importance to hundreds of people, to a great many families along the shore, as has been remarked by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, that something should be done in their interest. There can be no question that if the herring fishery on that portion of the Bay of Fundy is destroyed, it will lead to the destruction of the larger fish that come and feed upon the herring, because if the herring are destroyed, they have nothing left to feed upon; consequently this question involves not only the herring fishery itself, but the cod fishery and other fisheries as well, and they are all very valuable resources to the population of that part of the province. I hope, therefore, that not only will this House be impressed with the necessity of having this matter enquired into, but that the Department of Fisheries will take it up, and, after an investigation, that it will apply such remedy as may be necessary for the preservation of those fisheries, so valuable to that part of our country.

Mr. FORBES. I second this motion with a great deal of pleasure, but I must say that I am surprised to learn from the two members from St. John, that such a terrible indictment can be presented to this House against the Government on the question of the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy. We have it from their own mouths that the fisheries on that part of the coast of Nova Scotia have almost been depleted. Surely the Minister of Marine cannot, or will not, say that his attention has not been drawn to this matter; his reports are full of it. The mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers), has stated that these officers, either under instructions or otherwise, shut their eyes to what is going on. They may do so, or they may not; all we know is that the state of facts as presented by the junior member for St. John and his colleague, actually exists to-day. I am grieved to know that such is the case, and more especially because that portion of the coast of Nova Scotia is particularly adapted for the prosecution of this great industry of supplying bait. Lately we have had an interference on the part of this Government with the Government of Newfoundland, there having been negotiations between that Government and the home Government, and also that of the United States, as a result of which our fishermen are to-day excluded from the privileges of the Newfoundland bait market. In all reason, we should have an opportunity of looking to our own bait grounds to supply any deficiency, and the very moment our attention is turned to the subject, the fishermen are driven to seek new markets in which to purchase bait. It has now been forced upon the attention of the Government that these grounds are completely exhausted. The Minister of Marine may not personally have been aware of this, but his officers are aware of it, and although this may be the first time that any supporter of the Government has so strongly brought it to his notice, I trust it will not be very long before he will turn his attention to the matter and apply a remedy. We were told during the late campaign that our fisheries were to be given away to the Americans, that they would come in and destroy them and take whatever they could get for the mere trouble of taking them. In relation to that I may say that wherever I had the pleasure of addressing my constituents, I impressed upon them the fact that while such might be the case, the Americans would always have to give us a quid pro quo, that they could come and take these fish if they desired, but only upon condition that they opened their markets to our fish, and they could only catch these fish subject to restrictions and regulations imposed by the Government of Canada. I think that when the Government imposes these restrictions, and protect the fisheries as they should be protected, not by a mere phantom ship floating around the coast, but by some effective means, when this is done I really believe that that industry will largely develop and be much more profitable to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no objection, so far as I am concerned, in adopting this resolution. I would ask the hon. mover and seconder of the resolution, however, to consent to add the word "herring" before the word "fisheries," merely for the purpose of making the motion definite. I have no objection to bringing down any information the hon. gentlemen desire on any other subject, but as the motion now reads it is slightly ambiguous:

"Return of papers, correspondence, reports and other documents in possession of the Government relating to the subject of the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy, &c."

As the subject relates chiefly to the herring fishery, to which the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) confined himself, I make that suggestion.

Mr. FORBES. The word "fisheries" occurs twice; before which one does the hon. Minister wish to insert the word "herring?"

Mr. TUPPER. In the phrase "relating to the subject of the fisheries." I may say that this subject has engaged the attention of my department for a long time, but the solution of such a subject I need not tell those hon. gentlemen who have had greater experience than I in connection with the matter, is a very difficult thing indeed. The fishermen differ among themselves upon the means that should be employed to remedy the state of affairs alluded to by the officers of the department, and the hon. members for St. John have shown how far apart these views are. For instance, the moment that we attempt, as we have already attempted, to prevent the great injury being done by the erection and operation of brush weirs for herring fisheries, where these weirs were, as heretofore, placed on the spawning ground of the herring, by reducing the number of weirs, at once there springs up a cry among those fishermen who are not able to obtain permission to work and operate one of those brush weirs, that there is a monopoly in favour of the few who do the work. The owners of the weirs assert that the nets are the cause of the trouble, that they are not limited to the day time, that they are in the water day and night, and that, consequently, we have the destruction that is going on. I may say that the subject of the habits of fish for the last hundred years, has been debated with great interest in the mother country, and men who have given a lifetime to the subject are still trying to ascertain how far, in reference to the herring, we can assist in the preservation of that industry, and how far it is proper to interfere with these different fishing engines. But the Fisheries Department and those connected with it know well when a measure of relief is proposed in any of these directions, very great opposition is met with, the fishermen as a whole objecting to the slightest interference with them in their attempts to obtain from the sea as much as possible of the article in which they wish to deal. In addition to what may be found in the Fisheries Report, I may say I have since made an inquiry, and I am not at all satisfied that I see my way clear at present to take any other course than that we are now pursuing, namely, keeping the spawning grounds as free as possible from fishing engines of any kind. The herring and mackerel spawn near shore, and we can localize those places. Hitherto, it has not been the habit of the department to specially guard those grounds. Many of the officers feel that it is not necessary to further interfere with the operations of the fishermen, so far as herrings are concerned, except in that direction. However, the various officers to whom I have referred the matter have not agreed among themselves, and their reports are being carefully considered and will receive the closest attention. I am glad to obtain the views of hon. members coming from the fishing districts, upon this subject, and I am sure they realize the great difficulty in the way of arriving at a satisfactory settlement of the question. Even in the report of Captain Pratt, to which reference has been made, it will be seen how contradictory are the arguments used. For instance, great objection is taken to the sardine fishery, which is a very large industry in the Bay of Fundy, and an enormous number of people obtain their entire living from that industry, and to stop that suddenly would be in no way justified unless we had ample proof that that was the root of the evil. Captain Pratt, a man with great experience, a man who is sailing there constantly, takes a different view, and is of the opinion that it is not necessary to adopt such stringent measures. He also alludes in that report to the various conditions regarding the fisheries with which we have to do. I have not had the advantage yet of carefully considering the report of the fishery officers of the different districts. They did not conclude their labours until the beginning of the Session, and I have not had the opportunity of gaining that knowledge which I hope to obtain from a study of their views on the subject. Meanwhile, we will gather all the information possible.

Mr. GILLMOR. The Minister of Marine is, no doubt, aware that great difference of opinion exists in regard to matters connected with fishing, and more especially in regard to herring fishing. It is all very well to have the fisheries protected, but it will be useless if, as a result, the fishermen cannot get any fish. With respect to the weirs, I fail to understand how they exhaust the fisheries. If large quantities of fish come into the weirs and there is no market for the catch, they are not taken. No fisherman takes out of his weir a quantity of herring unless he can sell them; and this is a matter about which there is no doubt. As to the protection of the spawning ground of herring, it must be remembered that herring spawn wherever the water is shoal enough and warm enough. Figuratively speaking, the ocean is full of herring, but if they do not come to a certain spot at a certain time, then, by some means, they are thought to be exhausted. With respect to the winter fishing, the senior member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) spoke as if the winter fishing had been in operation for a very long time. I remember very well when there were no herring whatever taken in winter. It is an industry of comparatively recent date, for only during the last twenty or twenty-five years have herring been taken in the Bay of Fundy, a market being found with Gloucester vessels, who come there to buy frozen herrings for bait or for food. Last winter the herring did not come into the bay in any quantities, and there was, comparatively speaking, no winter herring taken except in a sheet of water on the south side of Grand Manan, Dark Harbour. A few fish went through a narrow passage into that harbour, but where the rest of the school went it is impossible to tell. I have been on Grand Manan and have found that the habits of the fish are hard to understand. One fisherman has one theory, and another fisherman another theory, but the united opinion of those most experienced is that the ocean is full of herring, not only for the use of man, but for the fish of the sea. The department talk about protecting the spawning ground two or three miles around Grand Manan, at a cost of $200 or $300, but fishermen and those acquainted with marine matters know that herring spawn at certain seasons all along the shore. Cod, hake, pollock and haddock all live at certain seasons on the spawn of the herring, and although the herring may not come to a certain spot to be caught every year, yet I have no fear of the herring fishery being exhausted, and I fail to understand how we can improve the condition of the fishermen by preventing men obtaining their living out of the catches of their weirs and their seines. The man who has a weir thinks it does no harm to the fishing, while a man who does not possess a weir thinks it does a great deal of harm, and the man who has no weir, and so takes a net or seine may be stopped by an Order in Council issued at the instance of the Fisheries Department. Altogether, this is a most perplexing question, and I have no doubt the Department have done all they can do. It would never answer to stop the great industry of sardine fishing. And why should the Department stop it? No man takes out of his weir sardines unless he can sell them. I have known a man take $1,500 worth in half-a-day out of a weir. The herring of that particular school seemed to find their way into his little pen, and they were caught. Doubtless millions were outside. In my opinion, not one herring in a million that come into the Bay of Fundy is caught, but for some reason the herring did not come into the bay to any extent last winter. The movements of the fish of the sea, particularly the herring, constitute a mystery, and we cannot understand them. Fishermen have various theories on the subject. I heard an experienced fisherman say that during the early part of the winter there were heavy northern gales which carried the food on which these great schools of herring feed, off shore, and, as the herring followed the food, they did not come into the bay. That is a very reasonable conjecture. There is no evidence that the small herring taken for the sardine business is the same as is taken in winter, that it grows to be the herring of which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) spoke. That is all matter of conjecture. It is the idea of some fishermen that the fishing was destroyed because the spawning ground had not been protected, and the young herring had been killed, and, therefore, the large winter herring were not caught. But the weirs might be empty one week and the next week be bursting with fish. So it is almost impossible to know how to deal with the question. The Minister seems to have the idea that he can protect the spawning grounds. Well, he has got to protect hundreds of miles of coast if he is going to protect every spot where herrings leave their spawn. I have seen the fishermen, particularly when they used the hemp ropes for their boats, bringing them up in the morning when the herrings were spawning, covered from one end to the other with herring spawn. The only thing I fear is that perhaps the herring, for some reason or other, may take their departure from the coast. For instance, there were plenty of herrings this last winter in Newfoundland, while there were none to speak of in the Bay of Fundy or around that coast. I do not believe that the Minister of Marine in this or any other Government will stop the people from catching herrings so long as it does not destroy the herring fishery. My own impression is, that the Department is doing the best it can under the circumstances; they may protect the lobster and some other fisheries, but in regard to stopping people from taking herrings I am sure they will never adopt any such plan. The winter fishing is very important indeed, but these gentlemen who say that the herring fishing industry is principally carried on in the winter know very little about the matter. Nearly all the smoked herrings produced in the Dominion of Canada are produced in the county I represent. We prepare from a million and a half to two million boxes annually in that county. These herrings are taken in the summer time and not in the winter, for they do not prepare smoked herrings in winter. They are a class of herring a little larger than sardines, and the winter herrings are larger still. In the Bay of Fundy we take herrings of some kind or another all the year round, and at all times that a man can work out of doors. It is difficult to arrive at what is the right thing to do, but I do not attempt to say that we must be so anxious to protect the fisheries as not to allow fishermen to catch fish, and to catch them in the way they can make most out of them. Of course fishermen themselves differ on this point, and I know the conflict of opinion must be perplexing to the Minister of Marine, who has got to exercise his best judgment on the matter. I believe the hon. gentleman will do the best he can, but I hope he will not attempt to prevent the people catching small herrings or sardines, simply because there were no herrings in the Bay of Fundy last winter.

Mr. BOWERS. It is not only during the last winter that the herring fishery has been a failure in the Bay of Fundy, but it is well known that year by year, spring, summer, autumn, winter and all the year round, the herrings are growing scarcer there. For three winters now scarcely any herrings have been taken in the Bay of Fundy in the winter time. Herrings have been destroyed there in immense quantities. Tons and thousands of tons of herrings are used, and have been used, as fertilizers, a statement of which I saw corroborated in the Digby Courier with reference to the herring taken in Smith's Cove, Digby County. There should be some law made that these herrings should not be allowed to be used as fertilizers, and in my opinion the entire fishery along the Bay of Fundy should not be destroyed for the sake of allowing a few persons near Eastport and Dear Island on the Bay of Fundy to catch sardines. It is well enough for the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) to talk in this way; I suppose his constituents wish him to do so, but he knows just as well as the rest of us that the herring fishery and the other fisheries have been failing for years because of the immense quantities of fish destroyed for fertilizing purposes.

Mr. KAULBACH. I do not wish to speak discouragingly in regard to the method of catching the small fish, but I do believe that it is an injury to the general fisheries of the coast. The small fish are taken by these weirs, and they are in a measure destroyed and cannot continue to be a source of profit. It would be well if legislation could be adopted which would in some way provide that the small fish should escape and the large fish remain. I do not wish to "wear" the House further by dwelling upon this "scaly" subject, and, therefore, I will allow the remarks as far as I am concerned to drop.

Motion agreed to.

COPYRIGHT LAWS OF CANADA.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada, on the subject of the Copyright Laws of Canada, and all other papers relating thereto, not already brought down.

He said: Mr. Speaker, for a good many sessions I have been trying to interest the House and the country in the copyright question, not only because there were a number of radical evils connected with the existing condition of the law, but because I felt that there was involved in it a very large question affecting the constitutional rights of Canada, the rights of Canada to legislate for itself, and the rights of Canada to self-government. When I first introduced this question to the House, I must admit that I did not receive very much encouragement from the Treasury benches. In 1885, when I brought the matter up first, I proposed an Address of the House to Her Majesty on the subject, and I remember very well that the Minister of Militia expounded the view of the Administration on that occasion, and he told me, in reply to my observations, that he could not agree in the conclusion that the law as it exists is anomalous or unfair to anybody or to any interest in the country, and the motion I proposed was killed by the adjournment of the debate. I persevered further, and in 1886 I took another course and proposed a committee of the House to enquire into this somewhat complicated matter, but that also was killed by the adjournment of the debate, proposed, I think, by the Minister of Public Works on behalf of the Government, and his excuse then was that the Berne Convention was in session trying to bring matters to a favourable conclusion on the subject of International Copyright. In 1887, I again drew the attention of the House to the matter, and I was told that the question was an important one, and that it was under consideration. Again, in 1888, I ventured to bring it up, and I was again told that it was under consideration. In 1889 I proposed to move an Address to the Crown on the subject, when the Minister of Justice explained to me that his contentions on the subject were what I would consider to be exceedingly satisfactory ones, and that he proposed, not only to introduce legislation on the subject in this House correcting the admitted evils, but also to press upon the Imperial Government the absolute right of the Parliament of Canada to legislate on the subject. Well, Sir, he did introduce that legislation, and on the whole, I think the Act of 1889 is a satisfactory Act. But that Act is not in force; it provided that it should not come into force until a proclamation should be issued by the Government. That proclamation has not yet been issued, and I would be very glad to hear all the reasons for the delay, although I think I know some of them. The Act of 1889 was, I believe, an exceedingly moderate and fair piece of legislation. All it did was to give the Canadian Government power under certain circumstances to issue a license to Canadian publishers to publish British copyright works. The circumstances under which that license would be issued were these: In case an author should not take out a Canadian copyright, either before or simultaneously with taking out his English copyright, and in case the book is not printed and published in Canada within one month thereafter, then the Canadian Government might issue a license to a Canadian publisher to print and publish the work. But the Act provides, and, I think, amply provides, for the interests of the British author. It provides that the publisher, who is authorized to publish a work here, shall give security satisfactory to the Government for the payment of 10 per cent. of the retail price to the author; and so far as I can learn, that is about as much as any ordinary author, unless he is a man of celebrity and fame, can get from a publisher who takes the risk and expense of publishing his book, and that is exceedingly reasonable and fair. Now, why has that Act not been brought into force? I think I partly know. Last session the hon. Minister of Justice laid on the Table of the House a return containing correspondence which he had with the Imperial Government on this subject, in which he contended that under the British North America Act this Parliament had the absolute right to pass that law, and further, what most people here believe, that when the British North America Act gave the Parliament of Canada the exclusive right to legislate upon a number of subjects, including the subject of copyright, it meant that we could absolutely deal with copyright in Canada without reference to the Imperial Parliament. As far as I can make out, the hon. Minister of Justice has not been able yet to convince the English Government that his position is correct, and he has informed them that he is awaiting their pleasure and their assent before the Canadian Government issues the proclamation to bring the Act into force. Now, Sir, even if it were true that we have not the legal right to pass this law, still, the least that the Imperial Parliament could be asked to do would be to pass such legislation as would place within our control unequivocally and distinctly the absolute right to legislate on this subject. Now, Sir, the motion which I propose to make is for papers which have not already been brought down. I do not know whether the Government took the press into their confidence intentionally or not, but I think they must have done so. In the Empire of Monday, the 29th December, 1890, I find what purports to be a copy of a despatch from the hon. Minister of Justice to Lord Knutsford on this subject. I suppose that among the papers to be brought down in answer to this motion we shall find this correspondence, and I hope a good deal more, bringing the question to a successful issue; but I only refer to this correspondence in the Empire for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to some expressions in it with which I entirely and absolutely concur. The hon. Minister in it says that he desires to express to the Colonial Secretary:

"In the strongest terms which can be used with respect to the dissatisfaction of the Canadian Government and Parliament with the present state of the law of copyright as applicable to Canada, and to request most earnestly from Her Majesty's Government that they will apply a remedy, either by giving approval to a proclamation to bring the Canadian Act of 1889 into force, or by promoting legislation in the Parliament of Great Britain to remove any doubt which may exist as to the power of the Parliament of Canada to deal with this question fully."

Notwithstanding the answer that was given to me in 1885 on behalf of the Government, the hon. Minister of Justice seems to have discovered that this grievance, which still exists to-day, had been existing for forty years, because in another part of this paper he goes on to say:

"After a lapse of more than forty years, I am charged with the duty of reminding your lordship that the promise contained in that despatch of Earl Grey has never been fulfilled, and respectfully to ask its fulfilment at the hands of your Government. The lapse of time which has intervened, has strengthened ten-fold every one of the reasons which induced it to be made."

I concur with him there again, Sir. In another place he says:

"Your Lordship cannot be surprised that after Earl Grey's promise more than forty years ago, and after more than twenty-two years of agitation on the part of Canada, by Addresses from both branches of our Parliament, by memoranda from our Ministers of Finance and Agriculture, by Minutes of Council and by statutes passed unanimously in both Houses, introduced by three successive Governments, representing opposite political opinions, and with encouragements held out at every stage of the agitation to expect a reasonable and favourable consideration of our representation by Her Majesty's Government: the Canadian Government believed in 1889 that the Act then passed to give effect to what had so often been asked for, to what had never been refused, and to what had been recommended by the highest authorities in Great Britain, after most mature deliberation, should receive a favourable consideration at the hands of Her Majesty's Government, when the Government of Canada asked for the assent of Her Majesty's Government to the issue of a proclamation to bring it into force."

Now, I do not quarrel with the views of the hon. the Minister of Justice. On the contrary, I applaud them and concur in them: but he says himself that most able papers from Canada, Addresses from Parliament and everything else, have been hurled at Downing street on the subject, and nothing has been done. As far as the House knows, there is no answer to the strong representations made by this House, and to the legal arguments presented by the hon. Minister of Justice. What I would ask the hon. gentleman to do is to take this House into his confidence, and ask us, by way of Address or remonstrance to the Imperial Government or the Queen, to bring before the Imperial Parliament this matter and let them understand that this House and country are perfectly in earnest. I am sure there will then be no more pigeon-holing in this important matter, but that our rights of self-government will be conceded to us.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the Act of 1889 on this subject was a perfectly fair measure, that it preserved all the rights of authors to as full an extent as they deserved protection, and that it was necessary to the Canadian interests involved. I have not changed my opinion in the slightest degree, and can say the same for every member of the Government, as to the justice of that measure and the necessity of pressing its coming into force. The Act was immediately communicated to Her Majesty's Government, in view of the provision it contained that it should only come into force when proclaimed. The House will readily conceive that in dealing with a very important interest of that kind—an interest in respect of which Her Majesty's Government had entered into negotiations and formed ties with foreign powers—it was necessary we should adopt one of two courses: it was necessary we should either have the Act reserved for Her Majesty's assent, or that it should contain a suspensory clause providing for its coming into force only when proclaimed. We adopted the latter course as more suitable, and immediately communicated the Act to Her Majesty's Government, with the wish that we should be informed, as soon as possible, that it pleased Her Majesty's Government to issue a proclamation bringing it into force. Among the correspondence already brought down is an Imperial despatch indicating that Her Majesty's Government were not pleased that a proclamation should issue to bring the Act into force. Two years ago it became my duty to set out at large the reasons which should prevail upon Her Majesty's Government to approve a measure of that kind. Soon afterwards a visit, perhaps of a semi-official character, was made to this country by Mr. Daldy, who represents the interests of the authors and copyright holders in Great Britain, and who has been for a number of years the honorary secretary of the association of authors and copyright holders there. I do not for the moment remember what the name of the association is, but I think it is the Authors' Association. Mr. Daldy had interviews with the First Minister and myself, and other members of the Government, and I had an opportunity of bringing him into conference with a number of our own publishers, who were able to discuss with him the bearings of this question on the publishing trade of Canada. I was present at that conference, and I was never more convinced of the fairness of the provisions of the Act of 1889 and of the necessity of its coming into force than I was when I heard the discussion which then took place. I have not in the slightest degree changed the opinion I expressed to the House, when promoting the Bill, as to our right, under the British North America Act, to legislate in the lines of the Act of 1889. It is unfortunate for us—and that is the only way I can express it, being very strong in my opinion of the legal ground on which the Act is based—that the interests of British authors in the United Kingdom have been paramount, not only as regards legislation, but as regards judicial and legal interpretation on the other side as well; and the result has been that powers which are conceded to us by legal opinion and by judicial decision in the highest courts of that country, as regards every other subject placed within our charge by the British North America Act, are denied to us when it comes to a question of the mode in which the interests of authors living in the United Kingdom are to be dealt with in Caanda. It is no fault of ours that the Act has not been promulgated, but it is due to an unfortunate method of construction, or an unfortunate accident of construction, which we must do our best to get rid of. We thought the best way and the shortest way was to adopt the Act of 1889. Challenging discussion as to our right to pass the Act, I insisted, as we shall do, that if we had not the right under the British North America Act, we should have the right conferred on us as soon as possible. Now, following the visit of Mr. Daldy, there were several other despatches leading, I am sorry to say, to a very unfavourable result as regards the expression of opinion—the apparently final opinion—of Her Majesty's Government on this subject. The House is aware that the Berne convention had only then been recently concluded; and the adoption of legislation of this kind by this Parliament seemed to the minds who control this subject in Great Britain, the untying of the cord which bound up the union of nations under the Berne convention. For that reason Her Majesty's Government were very reluctant to accede to our wish, and the immediate reason assigned was that legislation was about to be introduced into the United States in the direction of the Berne convention, and Her Majesty's Government were opposed to putting our Act in force while there was hope that the Congress of the United States would follow the example of the United Kingdom and adopt a liberal Copyright Act. But, in the course of last summer, I had the opportunity of pressing this matter on the attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies and some other members of the Imperial Government, and I think the hon. gentleman, when he comes to see the papers which we can lay on the Table in response to his motion, and when he hears the explanations I have to make, will not persist in the conclusion either that we have been dilatory in pressing this subject on the attention of the Home Government, or that our representations in past years have been simply pigeon-holed in the Colonial Office. The fact is that the current of opinion and interest in the mother country has been dead against the current of opinion and interest in this country, and I do not hesitate to say, even as a member of the Administration, that the time has come when we will insist that the interests of our own people shall be considered and that, while giving due consideration to the rights and the interests of others, this country shall not be kept a close preserve for authors or publishers in any other country, but that this Parliament shall regulate the laws on this, as it does on any other subject within our jurisdiction. The substance of the interviews which I had with the Colonial Secretary would, perhaps, be to long too detain the House with this afternoon, but the result was that I obtained permission to lay before Lord Knutsford the letter which the hon. gentleman has quoted from the Toronto press. It is true that that letter was given to the press of both sides of politics in December last, and the reason was that there had appeared in the London press, extracts from that letter and criticisms of it which were calculated to put public opinion in possession of one side of the case only; and we, therefore, thought it proper that public opinion in this, as well as the mother country, should be addressed by any argument in which we could show how Canadian interests were involved. I think I have a right to say that we fully expect and fully believe that one of two results will be reached, and that before long. We believe that Her Majesty's Government will consent to the issuing of the proclamation which will bring the Act of 1889 into force, or that Her Majesty's Government will promote such legislation in the Imperial Parliament as will settle any question as our authority as to pass legislation of this kind. The hon. gentleman has quoted Earl Grey's promise from my letter, and I may say that that promise which is there referred to was solemnly made in the name of Her Majesty's Government no less than forty years ago, and I may say further that Mr. Daldy, who has been the principal authority against us, and Lord Knutsford himself signed the report of the Royal Commission on this subject, recommending just such an Act as we passed in 1889, and, when I was asked to try and convince Mr. Daldy, I said it was a work of supererogation because I had a report in favour of the proposal, signed by Mr. Daldy's own hand. Of course these papers will be brought down. When I left England I had reason to hope that during the present session of the Imperial Parliament an Act would have been laid before that Parliament to give effect to our Act of 1889, if Her Majesty's Government should not think that without such an Act it could issue that proclamation. It is always easy, I am sorry to say, to account for delay in Imperial legislation, in consequence of the multitude of urgent measures which must be brought forward in that Parliament, and the vast amount of difficulty and delay in pushing through legislation there; but if I should be disappointed in that hope and should find reason to believe that we shall not have legislation in the Imperial Parliament during this session, I shall take steps to bring about an Address from both Houses of this Parliament in favour of the ratification of that Act taking place, or its being brought into force by proclamation. I have not thought it expedient to advise the adoption of that course so far, because, in 1889, to say nothing of what took place before 1889, this Act which is the subject of discussion to-day was unanimously passed by both Houses of this Parliament, and it seemed to me to be adding an unnecessary effort for both Houses of this Parliament to address Her Majesty's Government on the subject of giving effect to an Act which, a little less than three years ago, was unanimously passed by this Parliament; and I thought the strong representations of the Government of this country ought to have effect without moving Parliament again to adopt a solemn address on this subject. But, this course will be adopted if these measures fail, though I am still not without hope that they will not fail.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Justice has referred to the existence of the Berne convention as an obstacle in the way of the Imperial Government conceding to Canada what we desire in this matter, but, if I recollect aright, the Minister of Justice in some papers which were laid before Parliament, stated, in the summer of 1889, that the Government of Canada had requested the English Government, on behalf of Canada, to denounce the Berne convention and to give the year's notice that was necessary to relieve Canada, as one of the parties to that convention, from its obligations. If that was done, the Minister will perhaps tell the House whether the British Government conceded that very reasonable and modest request of our Government made two years ago. I assumed, of course, that this step had been accomplished, and, if that was not done, I should expect to hear from the Minister of Justice very strong remonstrances on the subject towards the British Government; but I will have to assume that it has been done and that that difficulty has been removed. The Minister also referred, as a reason for the delay by the English Government, to the expectation that an international copyright law would be passed by the United States Congress. That has been done, and I think it is to come into force on the 1st July; but, as far as I understand it, that will only make the position of Canada worse than it is to-day, because, speaking of the Canadian reading public, who are interested in and benefited by receiving American reprints of British copyright works, if the American copyright law which was passed at last session of Congress facilitates the copyrighting in the United States of more British works, then the Canadian public will be to that extent restricted from having the benefit of the American reprints here. I suppose that will be the effect of it, and, instead of its being an advantage to the Canadian public, it will be a greater source of injury to them, although it may be a further advantage to the British author. The Minister said that he was sorry to state that the interests of British authors were, he found, paramount, and that our rights were denied. That is a most serious condition of affairs for a Canadian Parliament to contemplate. The Minister said it was no fault of ours—speaking, I suppose, of the Government. I do not say that up to this time we can blame the Government or the Minister of Justice for his action in this matter; but I do say that if it is allowed to linger any longer, and if this session of Parliament is allowed to pass and the matter be delayed for another year, without pronounced and decided action on our part, then I will not say that the Government and Parliament are not to blame. I do not think there is any doubt whatever, no one in this House can have a particle of doubt, that the Parliament of Canada ought directly to address the Imperial authorities on that subject, not contenting itself with simply passing an Act and withholding it from coming into force until a proclamation is issued, but by a direct vote of this Parliament to assert and repeat what the Minister of Justice said himself in his despatch two years ago, that we always thought we had this right under the Confederation Act. The Minister of Justice on that subject said that he would hesitate to press the legal point:

"If it were not to his mind perfectly plain that the people of Canada would hold him culpable if he failed to assert that was the only interpretation under which they received the constitution, and under which they were willing to be content with that constitution."

Now, Sir, the Minister of Justice has gone too far to retreat; I do not think he wants to retreat; I do not think the people of Canada want him to retreat, and I am sure that this House does not propose to suggest a retreat or to listen to a retreat. I think, for once, the Government has progressed in the right direction. They have taken a great step in advance of the position which was taken in 1885 by the Minister of Militia, who, speaking as the mouthpiece of the Ministry, recognized no injury to the people of Canada and no rights of the people of Canada. The Minister of Justice now, speaking on behalf of himself and the Government, recognizes not only that the present law is a great and growing injury to the people of Canada, but also recognizes and asserts fearlessly the rights of the people of Canada on that subject. I am sure if all their measures of legislation were characterized by the same progressive improvement which characterizes this action of the Government, the members of the Opposition would have an opportunity to support the Government much oftener.

Motion agreed to.

BRIGADE MAJOR--VACANCY.

Mr. BURNHAM moved for:

Copies of all correspondence relative to the vacancy caused in the office of Brigade Major for Military Districts Nos. 3 and 4, through the death of the late Lieutenant Colonel Lewis.

He said: I make this motion on account of a rumour that is current that it is the intention of the Government to abolish the office of Brigade Major in those districts. Formerly there was a Brigade Major in each district, but the two offices were combined into one, which was held for both districts by the late Lieutenant Colonel Lewis. I do not know in what way the Government propose to exercise supervision over the district, but I understand it is the intention to give the office to some member of the permanent staff, or the gunnery corps at Kingston. It does not appear to me that that can be effectively done, inasmuch as these officers are supposed to have duties to perform which would not permit them to undertake this work. It is a large district, extending from Bowmanville to Prescott, the largest in Ontario, and one of the largest in the Dominion, and it contains about 120 companies. The duty required is the inspection of these different corps, their arms and accoutrements, which takes a considerable length of time, and involves a considerable amount of trouble. The militia officers in the district look at this proposal as an attempt to do away with an office to which they might aspire, and which they are fully competent and qualified to hold. The officers of the militia force in this country do their work at considerable loss of time, and at a great expense to themselves. These appointments are the only ones to which they can look forward as a means of promotion, and I think they should be kept for that purpose. I do not believe that if the system proposed were to be carried out it would result in saving the salary for the benefit of the rank and file of the force. In my opinion, there should be certain militia offices which should be open to the members of the force, although I do not go so far as the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and advocate the opening of the office of Major General to the members of the militia force. That involves a question of high policy, which has been heretofore to keep an Imperial officer in that position. I hope that the Minister of Militia will see his way to reconsider the matter, and allow the appointment to be made from the militia force of this country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There can be no possible objection to the papers to which the hon. gentleman asks for, being produced. But I must point out to the hon. gentleman that the districts, 3 and 4, are not at all different from other districts where it was considered that the efficiency of the service would not be impaired by the abolition of the office either of adjutant general or of brigade major. Districts 3 and 4 cannot be in any different position from several other districts where the department has considered that it was quite compatible with the efficiency of the force to have either the brigade major or an adjutant general in charge of the district. I must point out also the fact, which is well known, that in view of the number of men which we have in our present force, the amount of money now voted by Parliament, however large it may appear, is not by any means too large to keep the militia force of Canada in a state of efficiency. Both the Minister of Militia, who has examined into this matter, and those gentlemen who take an interest in militia matters, are all agreed that the greatest possible care must be taken in the expenditure of the funds voted by Parliament, if we would keep up the number of men which we now have in the force, and keep that force in an efficient state. Speaking for myself alone, I must say that the amount of drill which they receive under the present system is not sufficient. I would like to have them drilled every year instead of every second year, and if we are to keep up the force upon the amount now voted, every possible saving must be made. I consider that, at the present moment, an expensive staff would be a mistake. It would be far better, according to my views, that the money which is expended upon an expensive staff should be distributed among the rank and file, and the advantage of that outlay given to the militia proper. If it should be necessary, in time of danger, to secure a staff, we have within this country officers who can be obtained, at short notice, as we found during the rebellion in the North-West, officers who are perfectly capable of filling the duties of the positions they may be called upon to occupy. However, I can only say in regard to the present motion that the correspondence has not been very considerable, merely applications made by quite a number of gentlemen who were anxious to get the position; but whatever papers are to be found in the department will be brought down and submitted to the House.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

Mr. FORBES moved for:

Return showing the names of all persons in the County of Queen's, N.S., to whom fishing bounties have been paid during the last five years, with the amount paid each; the amount still unpaid, with the names of the persons to whom such bounties are still due.

He said: I do not desire the Minister of Marine to think that the members from the Maritime Provinces are trailing their guns on him to-day. I look upon the members representing the several counties interested in fishing, and I represent one such county, as being channels of communication between the fishing interest and the Minister who has charge of that department, and I, therefore, trust that the hon. gentleman will not take umbrage at anything I may say in calling attention to this subject. The Act under which this fund was placed at the disposal of the Government, provided that it should be distributed to aid in the development of the sea fisheries, in the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the general condition of the fishermen. I should like to call the Minister's attention to the fact that there are certain impressions prevailing in several of the counties as regards the disposition of the fund. One point to which I desire to call attention is, that the officers induce the men who are to receive money from this fund to believe that it is distributed from a board of charities somewhere, over which the Government has control. I do not know whether the Minister is aware of it, but such is the fact. I desire to obtain the information asked in the motion in order that the people may ascertain whether the object of the Act is being subserved by the distribution of the fund. We can only gather that information by ascertaining whether the men who receive the bounty are obtaining increased sums yearly in consequence of the increased catch made by their vessels. I do not understand that any objection will be made to this motion, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss it at length.

Mr. MULOCK. I suggest the words "and date of payment" be added.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RESCUE OF THE SCHOONER BLIZZARD.

Mr. FLINT moved for:

Correspondence between all persons and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, recommending or with reference to a reward given to Captain Peterson of the American schooner Seigfried for his services in rescuing the captain and crew of the schooner Blizzard of Lunenburg, in October last.

Mr. KAULBACH. The request made by my hon. friend, the member for Yarmouth, for the "return of all correspondence, between all parties and the Department of Marine and Fisheries with reference to a reward given to Captain Peterson of the American schooner Seigfried for his services in rescuing the captain and crew of the schooner Blizzard of Lunenburg in October last," seems to me—with all due deference to the hon. member—somewhat singular, inasmuch as the schooner belonged to the port of Lunenburg, in the county I have the honour to represent, and the master and owner to the same place. I would reasonably have supposed the enquiring party or correspondent of my hon. friend would have applied for the information through me as the representative, instead of going so far out of his way as to give trouble to my hon. friend from Yarmouth. However, I think I see through the mystery, and can solve the enigma. The hon. member's correspondent I consider has no love or affection for the captain of the Blizzard, little for myself, and still less for the owner, and I believe his desire is, by strategy, to traduce, if he can, the character of the owner, and thereby interfere with the recovery of his insurance, and has taken this course through my hon. friend to make this request, thinking to reflect discredit upon the owner and at the same time not be known. As regards the owner, I may say his character is beyond reproach, as he is thoroughly reliable in every way, and as a citizen is very highly respected, having held, and is still holding, positions of responsibility and trust, in the town in which he dwells, with credit to himself and satisfaction to those whose interests he has had in charge. In fact his record is a perfect one, and to know him is to respect him. He has been employed by myself and others as a shipmaster, and so generally well liked that we were sorry to part with him. As to the captain of the Blizzard, I may say that I have known him for a number of years as thoroughly reliable, and believe he would not deign to do anything approaching barratry or wrong practice. Now to the main point, as to the right of the Government in granting a reward to the captain of the Seigfried there can be no question, as the papers in the Marine Department asked for by my hon. friend will clearly show. The captain of the American schooner clearly showed the perilous position the captain and crew of the Blizzard were in when he rescued them, and his leaving the fishing grounds without a remuneration to put into Shelburne to land them. The report of the captain of the American schooner himself, and of the captain of the Blizzard; the letter of the United States consular agent at Shelburne, and of the customs official from the port of Shelburne: the report of the press, all present such a clear account of the case, that I feel the Government were fully justified in giving the reward they did to the captain of the Seigfried, it being so well merited. Cases of this kind should be recognized at all times, more particularly when bravery and humanity is shown to British subjects by subjects of another nation, as in this case.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Reports from the Deputy Adjutant General of Military District No. 11 to the Minister of Militia, since January, 1888: 1st. In regard to "C" Battery barracks: 2nd. In regard to drill hall in Victoria: 3rd. In regard to removal of magazine from Beacon Hill Park; 4th. In regard to condition of guns, stores, gun platforms, &c. Also, copies of all correspondence between the Deputy Adjutant General of Military District No. 11 and the Minister of Militia, on the same subjects, since the same date.—(Mr. Prior.)

Return of all papers, petitions and documents relating to the establishing of a post office upon Lot 29 in the 14th concession of Galway, and particularly for any correspondence addressed to the Postmaster General or his department by one Charles W. McMahon, and of all letters addressed by or on behalf of the department to one James Wilson, the postmaster at Kinmount.—(Mr. Barron.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons papers relating to the extension and development of trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, including the Colony of Newfoundland.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 3rd June, 1891.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the order for this evening will be to discuss the prohibition resolution, which my colleague the hon. Minister of Justice has spoken of as one that he would ask to postpone for this evening, and as a number of other matters follow which the promoters did not think would come up this evening, it is suggested that, under the circumstances, the House should stand adjourned from now until to-morrow afternoon. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. JAMIESON. Of course, I suppose the hon. gentleman will give some guarantee that an opportunity will be given to continue the debate on my resolution.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Oh, yes; you will have an opportunity.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jamieson) is quite wise in consenting to this, because I gathered from the Minister of Justice, this afternoon, that the Government will have a policy on this question, which he never could induce them to have before.

THE LANGEVIN BLOCK.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the adjournment of the House, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that, a week ago last Friday, the Public Accounts Committee passed an order for the production before that Committee of certain papers in connection with what is known as the Langevin Block. These papers have not arrived yet, although they are within a stone's throw of the Public Accounts Committee. I would like to know when the order of the Committee is to be obeyed with regard to these papers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understood from my department, that the papers had been sent to the Committee; I will see that they are sent to-morrow.

Mr. MULOCK. I waited until the last moment, and they had not then arrived.

CATTLE EXPORT TRADE OF CANADA.

Mr. MULOCK. It appears from the public press that legislation is now receiving the attention of the Imperial House of Commons in regard to the Canadian cattle trade, and that this legislation may or may not be to the advantage of Canada. Apparently it meets with the approval of the people of Canada, but the cattle trade is of such importance that I believe that it is only right that at every stage that legislation should be submitted to the people of Canada as a matter of courtesy, if possible, or that some person representing Canadian interests should be on the spot to be in communication with the Imperial Government, as that legislation passes through the English House of Commons. I understand that at this present moment we are without a representative in London. Who is going to look after the interests of Canada in this respect? I judge from the reports in the press that an announcement was made in the English House of Commons last night by Mr. Chaplin as to the intentions of the English Government in this matter, but when their Bill will be presented or the legislation completed, has not yet been announced. I think we should send over some person now to look after our interests in England, at all events until our High Commissioner is able to return to London. In connection with this matter I would further suggest that it might be possible to arrange with the English Government to appoint an officer in Canada who would have his office at the shipping point, so that his certificate might be of service in enabling Canadian cattle to be landed in England, without, as now, having to pass through inspection at the point of arrival. At all events, whatever may be the proper precautions to take, or the proper arrangements to make, I think that the present is a critical moment, in view of the fact that only a week ago our whole cattle trade was threatened with a serious blow by reason of the unwarranted act of an Imperial officer. Now that legislation is before the English House of Commons on this subject, it is the duty of the Canadian Government to give every attention to this important question.

Mr. TUPPER. I might say, that the authorities in England have been long since fully advised in detail of the views entertained in Canada regarding the proposed legislation touching the cattle trade, and I have at this moment every reason to believe that these representations will be successful. Legislation on this subject will be introduced in this Parliament, and a notice is now on the Order paper to that effect. I have reason to believe that, before we take many steps in that legislation, I can give the House more positive information as to its meeting the desires of the Imperial authorities concerning the shipping of cattle from Canada to England.

THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it possible that the Minister of Finance can give us an assurance of any sort as to when he will not, rather than when he will, bring down the Budget? I take it for granted that he does not propose to bring it down next Friday.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very difficult to say, under present circumstances. It is not, however, impossible, if more unfortunate events do not take place, that the Budget exposition will be made on Friday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance, my hon. friend has called my attention to the fact, which I had forgotten at the instant, that we have a motion undisposed of which can hardly be put aside; so that I suppose on that account we cannot go on with the Budget on Friday.

Mr. FOSTER. It is quite possible, on motion, to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course that is possible, but it would, perhaps, be objectionable under the circumstances.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 4th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

Canal Statistics.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Annual Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

Fisheries Statements and Inspectors' Reports, Supplement No. 1 to Annual Report of Fisheries.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. BARRON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 98) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to make plain that which I think is not plain in the Act passed last session amending the Electoral Franchise Act. The Minister of Justice will remember that I pointed out to him the danger of allowing declarations to be put in by the revising officer, with schedules attached, instead of the name and the qualification being in the declaration itself. The Secretary of State was good enough to incorporate in the Bill which he then had before the House, the views which I held, but, after looking over the Act which was passed last session, I think there still remains considerable doubt as to whether that Act really does meet the objections that I had in view at that time, and therefore it is to make that point clear that my Bill is now introduced. Then, also, I have found that some revising officers, notwithstanding the fact that the statute requires them to desist from receiving declarations on the 1st of August, do not, apparently, find that clause very clear, and some of them continue to receive declarations after the 1st of August, while others do not; and my Bill proposes to set that doubt at rest: it says that not later than the 1st of August shall the revising officer receive a declaration. Another clause provides that candidates, instead of being entitled to only four copies of the voters' lists, shall each be entitled to not less than ten.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ST. JOHN RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, 1. What is the "additional property accommodation" at St. John railway station for which a vote of $80,000 is asked, wanted for? 2. Was the necessity of this "additional property accommodation" reported upon by any Intercolonial or other official; if so, by whom? 3. How much land is at present being taken for the $80,000? Is it proposed to take any more land adjoining? Has the land proposed to be taken been valued by the arbitrators? If not, is it to be so valued? 4. Does the land proposed to be taken belong to the Harris Estate, Harris & Co. (Ltd.) or Jas. C. Robertson, or any and which of them?

Mr. BOWELL. The additional property proposed to be purchased is to furnish further railway accommodation for that station. The station-master at St. John complains of the lack of station yard accommodation, and the chief superintendent and district superintendent concur in his views. The quantity of land to be taken has not yet been defined. The land will be valued by arbitrators, before being purchased. The property, it is understood, belongs to the estate of the late James Harris.

STALLIONS AT EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, Whether the Government have purchased or leased stallions stationed at the Central Experimental Farm? If purchased, from whom, and what was the price paid? If leased, upon what conditions, and from whom? If neither purchased nor leased, upon what conditions are the horses stationed at the Farm?

Mr. HAGGART. Horses have neither been purchased nor leased, but placed at the Experimental Farm upon conditions which are named in the correspondence, which will be produced if the hon. gentleman moves for it.

BLACK RIVER IMPROVEMENTS, IN THE COUNTY OF DRUMMOND.

Mr. LAVERGNE (translation) asked, Whether the Government has sent any engineer to visit the improvements commenced a few years ago in the Black River, in the Parish of St. Germain de Grantham, in the Township of Grantham, in the County of Drummond, in order to have a report as to the usefulness of completing these works or not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I have to say that no engineer has been sent to visit these improvements.

DREDGING AND IMPROVEMENTS IN THE BLACK RIVER.

Mr. LAVERGNE (translation) asked, Whether the Government intend to place in the Estimates, or in the Supplementary Estimates, the sum of $2,000, or any sum of money, for the purpose of completing the dredging and improvements commenced some years ago in that part of the Black River which crosses the Parish of St. Germain de Grantham and the Township of Grantham, in the County of Drummond?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I will ask the hon. member to have patience until the Supplementary Estimates are put before the House.

BLACK RIVER INPROVEMENTS, IN THE COUNTY OF ARTHABASKA.

Mr. LAVERGNE (translation) asked, Whether the Government has sent any engineer to visit the improvements commenced a few years ago in the Black River, in the Township of Bulstrode, in the County of Arthabaska, in order to have a report as to the usefulness of completing these works or not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (translation.) I am told in my department that no engineer has been sent.

SUGAR IN BOND.

Mr. McMULLEN. The question I have on the paper I wish to apply to the port of Montreal altogether. It is as follows:—What quantity of raw sugar was in the hands of manufacturers, being manufactured in bond, on the 1st of April last? The entire quantity of raw sugar in bond in Montreal on the 1st of May? The name or names of the ship by which the cargo was delivered; the date of the arrival; her gross cargo by Customs weight? How long each lot of cargo has remained in warehouse? Who are the owners of such cargo; the gross amount of duty payable thereon; with the owner's name? What length of time are manufacturers of sugar permitted to hold sugar under manufacture in bond, without paying duty?

Mr. BOWELL. The quantity of raw sugar in the hands of manufacturers (refiners) being manufactured (refined) in bond, on the 31st day of March last, as shown by quarterly returns, was, at Halifax, 15,546,008 pounds; at Moncton, 4,578,175 pounds; at Montreal, 38,754,899 pounds; total, 58,889,172 pounds. It is impossible to give the further information asked for, as no return other than the quarterly one is received, and though a monthly account of stock is taken, it is not done on any specific day, but purposely, for obvious reasons, at irregular intervals. Under the Customs Act, bonded goods may be allowed to remain in bond two years, but under the regulations governing refining in bond, sugars are not supposed to remain longer than six months without duty being paid thereon.

LOUIS DOUCET, OF STE. FLAVIE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, For what reason was Mr. Louis Doucet, of Ste. Flavie, discharged as an employé in the shops of the Intercolonial Railway, in the said parish?

Mr. BOWELL. Louis Doucet, of Ste. Flavie, was discharged for using insulting language.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. To whom?

REVISING OFFICER FOR RIMOUSKI.

Mr. GUAY asked, Whether the Government are aware that Alfred Drapeau, Esq., advocate, revising officer for the County of Rimouski, took an active part in the last Dominion election and made speeches in favour of the Government and of the ministerial candidate, in the said county? Is it their intention to discharge the said revising officer for having so acted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government have no information on the subject, and I have no power in any case to remove the revising officer.

LIQUOR CONFISCATION AT MONTMAGNY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Has the Government been informed: 1st. That Eugène Hammond, an alleged officer of Customs, at Montmagny, has illegally seized and confiscated a certain quantity of liquor belonging to F. X. Lamonde, tavern keeper, at Montmagny; and that after having sent it up to Quebec, he was afterwards obliged to give it back to the said Lamonde, inasmuch as the duty upon it had been paid in due form? 2nd. If the Government is aware of the facts of the above case, does it propose to reimburse the said Lamonde, for the expenses which this illegal act has put him to, and for the damage which he has suffered? 3rd. Does the Government propose to remove this officer?

Mr. BOWELL. The Customs Department was informed by Mr. Choquette, the member for Montmagny, that Mr. Hammond, the officer of Customs at that port, had seized certain liquor belonging to F. X. Lamonde, and such liquor had been returned to him. Upon enquiry it has been ascertained that on or about 29th April last Mr. Hammond did seize five packages of liquor from Mr. Lamonde, and he notified his superior, the collector at Quebec. It was then found that the said liquors had been shipped from Quebec and were duty paid, whereupon they were returned to Mr. Lamonde by order of the collector of Customs. Mr. Lamonde has, under the law, recourse against the officer for any personal illegal act done by him. The Government does not hold itself responsible for acts of its officers performed without instructions. The question as to the removal of the officer is one for consideration, when it is shown, after investigation, that the seizure was made without reasonable grounds therefor.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. DEVLIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the Minister of the Interior when the papers in regard to the Manitoba School question, referred to in a motion which I made on 5th May last, will be laid on the Table of the House?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Minister of the Interior is out of his seat for a moment, but I will mention the matter to him on his return.

AMERICAN QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to draw the attention of the House to a very important matter to the farmers of my district, and no doubt also to a great many farmers throughout the Dominion. On 1st June, a question was put by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to the Minister of Agriculture, which was answered by the Postmaster General, as to whether the Government was aware of the fact that an embargo had been placed on lambs passing from Canada to the United States. The Minister on that occasion replied that no official information had been received by the Department of Agriculture with respect to the embargo referred to. Since that time several letters have been received—I have received no less than three, from parties who are deeply interested in this matter. This is about the season of the year when buyers go out to buy lambs with the intention of shipping them in the fall to the United States. On 30th August, 1890, the Americans amended their quarantine regulations, imposing quarantine upon sheep and swine coming into the United States from any other country save and except Canada. This Dominion was exempted on that occasion, but since that time representations appear to have been made to the Americans that sheep and swine are admitted into Canada without undergoing quarantine, and by that means they may pass from Canada to the United States, and consequently very seriously affect the flocks in that country. Under these representations the Americans have now imposed quarantine for fifteen days on all sheep and swine sent into their country from Canada. I will read the regulations, as follows:—

"UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.
"OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.
"WASHINGTON, D.C., 19th May, 1891.

"Whereas under the Act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, it has been provided by the Department of Agriculture, in order to protect the sheep and swine of the United States from contagious diseases now existing in foreign countries, that all sheep and swine imported from Great Britain and Europe must be held in quarantine for a period of not less than fifteen days; and whereas the Dominion of Canada makes no requirement of quarantine for sheep and swine imported into that country from Great Britain and the continent of Europe; and whereas, to permit the importation of those animals from Canada into the United States without quarantine would be dangerous to the stock interests of the United States, owing to the failure on the part of the Canadian authorities to enforce this measure of protection, and would enable importers to avoid the quarantine of the United States ports; therefore, it is ordered that all sheep and swine brought from Canada into the United States are hereby made subject to the regulations of the Department of Agriculture, date of October, 1890, and the exception contained in the third and sixth regulations of said date, as applicable to sheep and swine, is hereby repealed, and all animals named in the said regulations, except cattle imported from Canada are subject to same conditions and requirements as if they were imported into the United States from Great Britain or the continent of Europe.

(Signed) "J. N. CRASS, Secretary."

The Minister of Agriculture will see at once, that the imposition of this embargo on Canadian lambs and sheep entering the United States will prove a very serious matter. It is quite clear from the extracts which I have read, that it remains with the Canadian Government to take action. If they continue to permit the importation of sheep and swine into Canada without quarantine regulations, that embargo will, no doubt, go into force. If they take the necessary steps to impose quarantine regulations, as therein set out, we will be permitted, no doubt, to export our sheep, lambs and swine to the United States free from the quarantine regulations that ordinarily prevail. It is exceedingly important, in the interests of the farming community, that the Minister of Agriculture should note that fact.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman does not intend to conclude his speech with a motion, I am afraid he is not strictly in order. It is true, that the hon. gentleman is in order in drawing the attention of the Government to the question, but, if he is to be allowed to enter into a discussion on the Orders of the Day being called, it will prove a very inconvenient mode of dealing with public questions.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have before me the motion which I intend to present to the House when I have concluded my remarks. I bring this to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture on behalf of a large number of persons who are deeply interested in the matter. Now is about the time when the buyers commence purchasing from farmers; they pay in cash the price of these animals, and it is about the first money the farmer receives and the first relief which he gets. They pay three or four dollars cash for each lamb, and generally the farmer feeds the lambs until the fall when the buyers take them away and pay the balance, if there is any balance to be paid. I have three letters from buyers of lambs in my section of the country, who are very anxious to know if the Government is going to put a stop to the permanent imposition of this embargo, for, if not, they will have to buy lambs at a less price than they now pay. The present duty on lambs going to the United States is 75 cents a head, and if these quarantine regulations are imposed, it will virtually amount to a duty of 75 cents per head more, making $1.50 in all. To show that this is a very important trade, I may point out that we sent to the United States the year before last 363,000 lambs, and this year 251,640. The Province of Ontario is deeply interested in this matter, and in view of the urgency of the case, I felt it my duty to bring it to the attention of the House in order to give an opportunity to other members interested to speak on this subject. I considered this mode was better to bring it before the House than to put a question on the paper, because questions cannot possibly bring out all the information needed. My object is not to find any fault, but to draw the attention of the Government to the immediate necessity of moving in the direction of trying to get this quarantine order of the United States repealed. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Macdonald (Huron):

That such changes should be made immediately in our quarantine regulations as would prevent the importation of sheep and swine having contagious diseases, and thereby secure the removal of the embargo imposed by the United States upon sheep, lambs and swine exported to that country from Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. This motion cannot be put to the House. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. member and of the House to the Rule respecting what may be said when the Orders of the Day are called, and I do this for the purpose of preventing, in future, a repetition of what has occurred to-day. It is a very inconvenient mode of dealing with these public questions, that hon. gentlemen, upon the calling of the Orders of the Day, should make a speech upon an important matter of this kind. The Rule laid down by Bourinot is as follows:—

"Speaking on Calling of Orders.—It is a common practice for members in both Houses to make personal explanations, or ask questions of the Government, before the Orders of the Day are taken up. They may make these explanations in reference to an inaccurate report of their speeches in the official record, or in the newspapers; or in denial of certain charges made against them in the public prints; or in explanation of certain remarks which had been misunderstood on a previous occasion, and which they had not before had an opportunity of explaining; or in respect to the incompleteness or inaccuracy of certain returns brought down under the Order of the House. Questions may be asked, when the Orders are called, relative to the state of public business, or other matters of public interest; but no discussion should be allowed when a Minister has replied to a question, nor after a member has made his personal explanation. In asking a question, a member must not attack the conduct of the Government."

I think the House will agree with me, that it would be very inconvenient if members were allowed, upon the calling of the Orders of the Day, to make speeches, as the hon. gentleman has done on the present occasion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to dispute the correctness of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, although as regards matters of fact, your memory, as well as mine, will remind you of occasions on which considerable latitude has been allowed to members on both sides of the House in many other cases. This is a matter of urgency, and although my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) cannot very well put his motion, and that he will, no doubt, withdraw it after your ruling, it seems to me that it deserves the immediate attention of the Government, inasmuch as that there is a very great risk that a valuable trade which is now a good deal interfered with by the operation of the McKinley tariff, may be now much further interfered with. I cannot but suppose that the attention of the Government has been called to this matter.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman who has made the statement to the House, I may say that I admit that this is an important question. It has been, however, fully considered by the Government, and at the time I made the statement, some time ago, we had no official notice of the regulations, nor have we yet, but the department was immediately notified to find out from Washington what the regulations were, and as soon as we find these out we will adopt every means possible with a view to the public interest.

THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance definitely to proceed with the Budget statement to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. I shall not proceed with the Budget statement to-morrow.

PAIRING OF MEMBERS.

Mr. LANGELIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to a personal matter. After the vote the other day on motion to adjourn the debate in connection with the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) got up and said that I had been paired with another gentleman. I stated then, and I repeat to-day, that I had distinctly declined to be paired with anyone before I left Ottawa. I have enquired about the matter since and I find that I was not paired for that vote but that I was paired previous to it without my consent and knowledge. I regret that the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not now in his seat. I will not say any more on the question to-day, but I will not let the matter rest here. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has had further information on the matter since he spoke, and if he does not take back the insinuation thrown out against me I will not accept any pair in future so long as he is head whip of the Conservative party. I want to be respected, and I presume that when the head ministerial whip knows the facts he will make them known to the House, but I will not tolerate being charged by any whip with breaking what I consider to be my word of honour. I was not paired for the vote in question. I did not know that I was paired for any vote at all, and if I had known I would have said distinctly that I declined to be paired. There are some remarks of the member for South Leeds which I wish to be struck out of the official Debates, and I will refer to the matter further when the hon. gentleman is in his seat.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I was told that I had broken my pair. I denied it at the time, and I deny it now. But I see that the matter has got into the press, which states that we gentlemen have a very poor chance of getting a pair now. I must distinctly say that I did not wish to be paired, I did not authorize anyone to pair me, I did not know I was paired, and I do not wish to be paired any more.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a decided misunderstanding in this affair. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) and myself paired with the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) and the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) on Friday last, the 25th, until 8 o'clock p.m. on Monday, the 28th ult. I was present when the member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) agreed to this arrangement. I am willing to believe that neither Mr. Langelier nor Mr. Lavergne would have voted, had they known of this agreement, and I believe that the member for Rouville forgot to make those hon. members aware of it.

Mr. LANGELIER. The other day I put the question to every whip on this side of the House. I first went to the head whip, who said he knew nothing of that pair. Then I went to the other whips, and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) told me distinctly, and he repeated it to-day, that I had been paired by him for only one vote and until three o'clock that day, whereas the vote to which the pair was stated to have reference, took place in the evening. I met the hon. member for Rouville that morning on the train, and he never said a word to me as to whether I was paired or not, and I did not suspect that I was paired, because I declined to be paired with anybody.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I believe that because of my having endeavoured to serve my hon. friends on the Government side, there is now an attempt made to put me in a false position. This is, in two words, what has taken place: The other day, the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Frechette) came to ask me whether I could find him a pair for the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Dyer), I believe. As the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) was absent, I thought I could take upon myself to pair him, not at all till eight o'clock on Monday night, but until three in the afternoon. Now, Mr. Speaker, I find that we, the Opposition whips, are very hardly treated by the employés, who seem to be there only to serve the Government whips. Indeed, the list of paired members was even denied me. Under these circumstances, while the only proof offered are the sayings of these people, who are the employés of the ministerial whips, I think that our word can be taken when we expressly declare that there is no truth in what those employés have said. I must add, Mr. Speaker, that in the report of the Mail, referred to by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), the name of the member for Maskinongé (Mr Legris) is mentioned. The member for Maskinongé was not present: he did not vote, and, therefore, there was no fault to find with him.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is only with the consent of the House that this discussion can go on.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) I believe that my hon. friend, the member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) puts me in a false position when he charges the Government whips and the head of the Government whips with not doing what is proper. I was present when he paired the hon. members for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) and Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) in the presence of the head whip.

Mr. CORBY. In the absence of the senior whip, Mr. Taylor, I may say that I was in the whip's room, and I heard Mr. Cameron say that he was present when this pair was made, and that he had written it down in the book.

ENQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the Orders are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works when the clerk of the Public Accounts Committee will receive the papers which were ordered to be produced and to which I called his attention yesterday? I also desire to ask him when the order of the House, passed on the 27th of May, for the production of certain papers on the same subject, will be obeyed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After the question was put by the hon. member the other day, I enquired of the deputy of my department, first, why the order of the Committee had not yet been executed, and then, when the order of the House would be executed. The answer was that the papers had been looked after in the department, and that they were at that moment trying to give an answer at all events to a portion of the question put by the hon. gentleman in the address of the House. I told him that if he did that the Committee and the House would not have the documents at all during the session, and I gave him orders that he should obey, first, the order of the Committee by laying before it the original documents as far as possible, and that if other documents asked for by the Committee required writing or copying, that must be done afterwards. The hon. gentleman will, therefore, understand that the answer to the address of the House must be delayed for a very long time unless the Committee look into the documents and return them soon.

Mr. MULOCK. I am quite satisfied with the explanation of the hon. Minister except the last remark. I mentioned, in moving the order, that I did not wish it to be observed——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman will understand that an order of the Committee cannot be discussed in the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I am only going to refer to the order of the House. I mentioned to the House, in moving for it, that I did not wish it to be delayed by any order made by any Committee, and I, therefore, only asked that that portion of the order should be obeyed which could be obeyed without interfering with the order of the Committee, and I thought the hon. Minister so understood it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I thought he wanted, first, the order given outside this House, and secondly, that he wanted the address of this House executed secondly.

Mr. MULOCK. I will go over and explain the matter to the hon. gentleman and not detain the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman wants the address from the House to be answered first, it will take a good deal of time.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, be read the second time. He said: Legislation for the purpose of securing the better observance of Sunday, or the Lord's Day, as it is more properly perhaps called, is not necessarily religious legislation: and the Bill now under consideration does not provide for any religious observance whatever. The preamble of the Bill is as follows:—

"Whereas it is desirable, in the interests of religion and morality and public welfare, that better provision should be made for securing the observance of the first day of the week, hereinafter called the Lord's Day, as a day of rest."

The Bill is not for any other purpose: it does not provide for any religious observance: but simply proposes to provide that this day shall be observed as a day of rest, and that better provision shall be made to secure its observance as such. Of course the right arm, if I may use that expression, of Sunday observance is religious conviction. The day of rest, the Sabbath, had its origin in the order of the Creator for religious observance: but there is another arm to this motive, which may be called the left arm, that is the purpose of making the Lord's Day, the seventh day, or whatever it may be designated, a day of rest—the civil Sabbath: and it is with reference to this day, as the civil Sabbath only, that I propose to discuss the question. It is held by a great number of men—men eminent in religion, eminent in politics, and in science,—that to deprive man of his day of rest against his will is a crime: and any law which contemplates preventing the depriving of the labourer or any other man of his day of rest cannot properly be designated as a religious law, although the provision with regard to this matter is contained in the fourth commandment: "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy." The Decalogue also makes other provisions which the civil law enforces. It provides against murder, theft, perjury, adultery, and other offences: and we ask that the offence of violating the day of rest which is set forth in the Decalogue, may be also forbidden by the civil law. We are told, upon the highest possible authority, that the Sabbath was made for man. Man is not the creature of the Sabbath, but the Sabbath is an institution distinctly ordained for man's benefit. It is a day of rest, as conceived by the beneficent Creator, for our good. The Sabbath being made for man, I propose to consider what is the best course to be taken to secure to man that Sabbath which a beneficent God intended he should enjoy. We have no reason to suppose that this Sabbath, ordained at the dawn of creation, when the Creator, after working six days, rested on the seventh, and hallowed that day as a day of rest, was observed continuously before that law was promulgated from Mount Sinai by the greatest of all labour reformers, the prophet Moses. Israel had been without a Sabbath, no doubt, during her bondage in Egypt, where the Jews were driven by hard-task masters, and required to perform tasks almost impossible—required, in fact, to make bricks without straw, and work without a stated day of rest. When Moses promulgated the law of the Sabbath he appeared as a great labour reformer, and gave his people, not only the blessing of one day in seven as a day of rest, but the Sabbatical year, or one year's rest in seven, and the jubilee year, which was one year of rest in fifty years, on which day all the slaves were set free. The Christian Sabbath has been changed—it is unnecessary to go into the reasons why—to the first day of the week in place of the seventh, which was the Jewish Sabbath. Suffice to say that the first day has been accepted as the Christian Sabbath with the common consent of nearly all Christian denominations, Catholic and Protestant, and is also recognized as the civil Sabbath.

There is no doubt but that one day's rest in seven is a natural period of rest. There is no doubt that it is a rest required by the physical man and the mental man, and that we cannot, with impunity, disregard this law of nature, if it may be so called, which requires for the good of man that he should rest one day in seven from labour. There is a story told of a college professor, who, calling some students to account for hazing their fellow students, said: "Do you know that this conduct of yours is displeasing to God?" It is;" and furthermore, he said: "I will not stand it." I say equally, with regard to depriving man of his rest, that it is not only displeasing to God, but that man himself ought not to stand it: and if the public have it in their power to redress this wrong, they may go further and say: the act is displeasing to God, and so we will not stand it, but will enact such a law as will protect us in this right to a day of rest which God has given us.

Now, Sir, this proposal that we should have a day of rest is not a proposal made in the interests of religion. Perhaps we have no right to say that we should legislate in the interests of religion, but we have the right to say that we shall not legislate against the interests of religion; and if we refuse to provide for this day of rest, we, by that refusal, refuse to provide for, and do legislate against, the interests of religion. There can be no question that the State has the right to establish a day of rest. The State has a right to establish holidays. We have established two in Canada—the 1st of July, Dominion Day, and the 24th May, the Queen's Birthday. No man professes to doubt that the State has the right to establish days of rest. When this question was under consideration before a Committee of the United States Senate, there was a Bill before that body of similar character to the one now under consideration; and the infidel Wolff, who represented Ingersoll's "secular union" before the Congressional Committee, said:

"It would be legitimate for you to set apart a day of rest; you do set apart holidays where the people take recreation, are exempted from work and the performance of public duties, and that is going about as far as you have any right to go."

That is just as far as we ask Parliament to go. We simply ask Parliament to go so far, and to establish a day of rest and make that day of rest a legal day when labour cannot be exacted from our fellowmen. Before the Congressional Committee on Labour, a Jewish Rabbi, Rabbi Krausko, appeared, and he made this statement:

"Beyond the recognition, on hygienic grounds, that the human body needs one day out of every seven for rest and recreation, and beyond legalizing that day as Sabbath which is preferred by the greatest numbers of the people, and beyond protecting that day as much as is consistent with its authority, the State has no other duties in connection with the Sabbath."

That is a perfectly correct proposition. We do not ask anything further under this Bill than this Jewish Rabbi tells us the State may properly exercise. Now, we hear a good deal about personal liberty, and it is asserted that we have no right to take any course that will infringe upon the personal liberty of our fellow subjects. There are some things that the humane will not do, and we have a right to provide that the inhumane shall not do. It is perfectly right for the State to make provisions which may abridge personal liberty if it interferes with the general good. For instance, we make quarantine regulations. A vessel calls at one of our ports, and she may be properly quarantined and kept there for one, two or three weeks. That is an infringement of the liberty of her passengers, but it is a right exercised for the public good, and so it is in regard to the kind of legislation we are talking of to-day. A Bill such as we have under consideration is demanded by the Christian sentiment of this country; it is demanded in the interest of labour; it would be in the interest of the employer of labour; it is a Bill which would be in the interest of the State or the commonwealth, which would be in the interest of humanity, and perhaps, not the least of these considerations, will be that it is in conformity with the law of God. When we look carefully at the character of the opposition to this Bill, we will feel something, perhaps, as the Irishman did when he was going down a street and saw a house which attracted his attention. Someone looked out of a window and said: "Why, Patrick, do you think that this is a church?" "I did certainly," said Patrick, "until I saw the devil stick his head out of the window." When we look at the opposition to this measure, we find ourselves somewhat in the position of the Irishman. When we find that the anarchist, the infidel, the liquor dealer, the saloon keeper oppose Sunday rest, we are justified in saying that the devil's head is shown out of the window, and the opposition cannot commend itself to our approval or to our interest.

A great many interests are united in demanding a Bill of this kind. It is demanded by the dignitaries of the Catholic Church, by the Protestant element of the population, by the labour organizations, and the demand in favour of this Bill is very great and important. As to Catholic influence, as we have many Catholics in this House who, I am afraid, are not in favour of this Bill, I will call attention pretty fully to the Catholic utterances on this subject. First, I will quote the utterances of Pope Leo XIII on the subject, dated 23rd April, 1881, and, though the utterance is not very recent, it is just as binding as if it were used yesterday. His Holiness says:

"The observance of the Sacred Day which was willed expressly by God from the first origin of man, is imperatively demanded by the absolute and essential dependence of the creature upon the Creator. And this law, mark it well, my beloved, which at one and the same time so admirably provides for the honour of God, the spiritual needs and dignity of man, and the temporal well-being of human life. This law, we say, touches not only individuals, but also people and nations, which owe to Divine Providence the enjoyment of every benefit and advantage which is derived from civil society. And it is precisely to this fatal tendency, which to-day prevails, to desire to lead mankind far away from God, and to order the affairs of kingdoms and nations as if God did not exist, that to-day is to be attributed this contempt and neglect of the Day of the Lord. They say, it is true, that they intend in this way to promote industry more actively, and to procure for the people an increase of prosperity and riches. Foolish and lying words! They mean, on the contrary, to take away from the people the comforts, the consolations and the benefits of religion; they wish to weaken in them the sentiment of faith and love for heavenly blessings; and they invoke upon the nations the most tremendous scourges of God, the just avenger of His outraged honour."

His Grace Archbishop Taschereau, in a pastoral letter of the 26th April, 1880, referring to disorders and scandals, said:

"We mean, O dearly beloved brethren, those pleasure excursions made on Sundays and feasts of obligation, on steamers, on the railway, and sometimes in a long train of vehicles. Experience proves that they give rise to such disorders of intemperance and immorality that we feel obliged to prohibit absolutely, and under pain of mortal sin, pleasure excursions on Sundays and feasts of obligation. * * * Wherefore, having invoked the holy name of God, we rule and ordain as follows:—1st. We forbid, under pain of grievous sin, the faithful of this diocese, to take part, on Sundays or feasts, in pleasure excursions, on railways, on steamers, or in vehicles, even when the profit of those excursions is intended for a good work. It is not our intention, however, to condemn the pilgrimages made on those days, provided recollection, piety, and good order be observed."

Quite recently, Archbishop Fabre gives a pronouncement on Sabbath observance, which is as follows. I will read an article which gives the substance of his delivery—

"After mentioning the duty devolving upon him to protect the spiritual interests of his flock, the Archbishop quotes the commandment which makes the due observance of the Sabbath a divine law and mentions the chastisements referred to in Leviticus for the transgressors of this precept. The letter then goes on to say that the Sunday rest does not mean idleness, but positive acts of worship towards God, and adds that if to idleness are added profane and dangerous amusements, then God is most seriously offended and his wrath is aroused against man. Further on, the Archbishop refers to certain abuses which have been introducing themselves in our midst, and says: 'We denounce again and absolutely condemn the clandestine liquor traffic on Sundays, the entering of taverns, and the more or less numerous gatherings in which young men and fathers of families, victims of the gambling passion, pass long hours, forgetful of their duties, their souls, their God, and exposing themselves, besides, to lose their peace of conscience and their honour. We forbid, in the same manner, on Sundays, those picnics and pleasure excursions, organized for the public for speculative purposes, and which, as experience shows, are nearly always occasions of debauchery, drunkenness, altercations and licentious conversations. We particularly deplore that kind of amusement recently introduced into this city of Montreal, in which by announcing inoffensive concerts and promenades, the crowd are invited, by lavish advertisements, to throng to a public place, to witness dances, perilous feats, and performances contrary to morals, in a word, what is seen in the least modest circuses. Not only have those sights been unscrupulously given on Sundays and holidays, but even during divine service hours, so as to keep the people away from churches, and make them lose all spirit of meditation. It is time to oppose these disorders by the check of a formal prohibition, which has for its motive the sanctity of the Sabbath, and the obligation which rests with us to watch over the preservation of public morals.' "

Then, turning from the utterances of prelates in Canada, let us see what Catholic opinion is in the United States of America. We have the deliverances of the Catholic Lay Congress at Baltimore on the subject. We have the utterance of Cardinal Gibbons, we have the utterances of Cardinal McCloskey, of the Bishop of Buffalo, and of various other Catholic dignitaries. The Bishop of Buffalo, in calling attention to this subject, after forbidding picnics, excursions, fairs, &c., on Sunday and holidays, said:

"'Remember thou keep holy the Sabbath Day,' is God's own command. * * We must not only rest from all unnecessary, servile work, but we must hear mass and spend the day—or, at least, a good part of it—in the service of God and religious duties. * * Ours is not, as we have said, a Jewish or a Puritanical Sabbath, nor do we measure its obligatory observance by a sectarian standard or any American or national idea: yet we would be sorry to see the respect in which our separated brethren hold the Lord's Day weakened or discredited. God grant that we may never see the Sunday profaned here in our own country as we have seen it in other lands."

Bishop Keane, of Richmond, Virginia, at a meeting called by his authority, after a powerful address against the selling of liquor on Sunday, submitted a series of resolutions for adoption, and a pledge for signature, setting forth the sacred obligation of keeping holy the Lord's Day, recognizing the selling and drinking of liquors on that day as violations of the commandment of God, and the precept of the Church, &c. Cardinal McCloskey, in 1882, said:

"We wholly denounce and absolutely forbid excursions or picnics on Sundays, or after dark, all moonlight excursions and all Sunday picnics, and we exhort our good people who love their church to abstain from any participation in such scandalous, unhallowed and disgraceful practices, and to use all their influence to suppress them."

The following is an extract from a New York paper when Straskoch attempted Sunday operas there:

"Cardinal McCloskey was reported in the Herald to have said: 'You may say that I am opposed to what is generally regarded as Sunday evening concerts, and that, while not very Puritanical or domineering, I oppose the sensational amusement, which advertises itself under the name of sacred concerts, but which is nothing else than the ordinary week day show,' &c."

Dr. McGlynn, at that time a prominent Roman Catholic clergyman, and, I believe, he has since returned to the fold of the Church which he had temporarily left, is reported to have said:

"In France, Sunday is more of a tiresome holiday than a rest. This disregard for the Sabbath acts unfavourably on religion. The Sabbath I have always regarded as a great social conservator in this country. The regard in which Sunday has been held by the English-speaking nations, has had much to do with their keen sense of decorum and efficient organization. * * * The Sunday rest should be a set-off to the weekly work, and Sunday night quiet, to the boisterousness and enjoyment of the week nights."

The Catholic Lay Congress, in Baltimore, also passed strong resolutions in favour of Sunday observance and against the Sunday liquor traffic. A letter was read from Cardinal Gibbons on the 4th December, 1888, before the United States Senate Committee on Education and Labour, with reference to this question. It was written in reply to an enquiry from the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, who is a prominent advocate of Sunday observance in the United States. The letter is as follows:—

"Cardinal's Residence, 408 N. Charles Street,
"Baltimore, 4th December, 1888.

"My Dear Sir.—I have to acknowledge your esteemed favour of the 1st instant, in reference to the proposed passage of a law by Congress against Sunday work in the Government mail and military services, &c. I am most happy to add my name to those of the millions of others who are contending against the violation of the Christian Sabbath by unnecessary labour, and who are endeavouring to promote its decent and proper observance by legitimate legislation. As the late Plenary Council of Baltimore has declared, the due observance of the Lord's Day contributes immeasurably to the restriction of vice and immorality, and to the promotion of peace, religion and social order, and cannot fail to draw upon the nation the blessing and protection of an over-ruling Providence. If benevolence to the beasts of burden directed one day's rest in every week under the old law, surely humanity to man ought to dictate the same measure of rest under the new law.

"Your obedient servant in Christ.

"James Card. Gibbons,
"Archbishop of Baltimore.

"Rev. W. F. Craft."

Now, Sir, these quotations from Catholic authorities, in my estimation, are highly satisfactory, and I think they bear out my contention that a Bill of the character of the one now before the House, is necessary. To review, we have the declaration of His Holiness with regard to this matter; we have the declaration of the two most eminent prelates of Quebec, Cardinal Taschereau and Archbishop Fabre; we have the declaration of Cardinal McCloskey, of New York, and of Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore; we have the declaration of the Catholic Plenary Council assembled at Baltimore, and we have declarations made by eminent Catholic Bishops in the various parts of the United States. Surely, with these quotations—and I might easily make them much more numerous—we may assume that the Catholic Church is arrayed upon the side of Sabbath reform, and the granting to man of his legitimate Sunday rest.

I shall turn next to the position of the Protestant Church upon this question. I shall assume that that Church occupies a position favourable to Sunday rest, and shall not make as voluminous quotations as I have done in the case of the Catholic Church. I will first quote some observations made by the Rev. DeWitt Talmage with regard to the Sabbath in Paris:

"The Champs Elysées, one great mass, one great mob of pleasure seekers: balloons flying, parrots chattering, foot balls rolling, Punch and Judy shows in scores of places, each with a shouting audience; hand organs and cymbals, and all styles of racket, musical and unmusical. And then, as the day passed on toward night, I stood and saw the excursionists come home, fagged-out men, women and children, a great gulf stream of fatigue, and irritability, and wretchedness. A drunken Fourth of July, instead of a Christian Sunday. If you have ever been in Brussels or in Paris on the Sabbath day, it requires no great persuasion on my part to get you to pray morning, noon and night that such a Sabbath may never come to this country."

When before the Congressional Committee on Education and Labour, which was considering the question of the Sunday Rest Bill, Rev. Dr. Strong made use of the following language:—

"The continental Sabbath can hardly be called a day of rest. The time not devoted to business is, by the multitude, given up to amusements. But many amusements can no more take the place of the Sabbath rest than of night rest. Reaction may be afforded by a change of activities, but the intense living, the headlong rush of this generation, stands in peculiar need of repose, the rest which come only from quiet. As a matter of fact, a holiday Sabbath is commonly followed by a jaded Monday. Among the lower classes of operatives in France, Germany, and even in England, the effects of Sabbath dissipation very commonly make Monday an idle day. European manufacturers say that American workmen earn more than European by being able to work on Mondays. Among us, wherever the continental Sabbath has prevailed, Monday is the poorest work-day in the week, showing that Sunday amusements have served to exhaust rather than recuperate."

Rev. George Elliott before the same committee, speaking of Sunday laws, made use of the following language:—

"It has already been remarked that Sunday legislation is in some sort a part of the common law of the Anglo-Saxon peoples. It antedates what is known as statute law by great distances. It is in the old constitution or judicial codes which are back of the time of Edward the Confessor. The code of Alfred the Great begins with the ten commandments and repeatedly enacts penalties for violating the first day of the week or the Lord's Day. In the codes of Athelstane and Edgar the Peaceable, and away back even in the old days of the Saxons, when England was divided between West Saxony and Kent, there were Sunday laws. It is a part of the very constitution of all the English-speaking peoples, a part of their laws, an immemorial custom. Sunday is a non-legal day, as has already been observed by the recognition of even the constitution of the United States.

That is all I will trouble the House with in the direction of quotations from clerical authorities. I have given the position of the Catholic Church on the question by quotations from His Holiness, and their prelates; I have shown the position of the Protestant Church on the question, and I now wish to quote a few legal opinions. Chief Justice Field, when a member of the Supreme Court of California, gave this opinion, which was afterwards adopted by that court:

"The Sabbath laws are not so much for those who can choose their time for rest, as for the protection of labour against capital, for the defence of labour's natural right to a weekly rest day. The Lord's Day is also the people's day."

When on the Supreme Court bench of the United States, Justice Field gave this decision on a question relating to Sunday law. He said:

"Laws setting aside Sunday as a day of rest are upheld, not from any right of the Government to legislate for the promotion of religious observances, but from its right to protect all persons from the physical and moral debasement which comes from uninterrupted labour. Such laws have always been deemed beneficent and merciful laws, especially to the poor and dependent, to the labourers in our factories and workshops, and in the heated rooms of our cities; and their validity has been sustained by the highest courts of the state."

On another occasion, Mr. Justice Field remarked:

"There are very few points on which so many statesmen, scientists and philosophers are agreed as on the necessity and value of the weekly rest day."

I will trouble the House with only one more legal opinion bearing on the question, and that is one given by Judge Allan G. Thurman, of the Supreme Court of Ohio, in which he said:

"All agree that to the well-being of society periods of rest are absolutely necessary. To be productive of the required advantage these periods must occur at stated intervals, so that the mass of which the community is composed may enjoy a respite from labour at the same time. They may be established by common consent, or, as is conceded, the legislative power of the State may without impropriety interfere to fix the time of their stated return, and enforce obedience to the direction. When this happens someone must be selected, and it has been said the round of the week presents none which, being preferred might not be regarded as favouring some one of the numerous sects into which mankind are divided. In a Christian community, where a very large majority of the people celebrate the first day of the week as their chosen period of rest from labour, it is not surprising that that day should have received the legislative sanction, and, as it is also devoted to religious services, we are prepared to estimate the reason why the statute should speak of it as the Lord's Day, and denominate the infraction of its legalized rest as profanation. Yet this does not change the character of the enactment. It is still essentially but a civil regulation."

So much for the opinion of jurists in the United States. With regard to England it is unnecessary to say that the Parliament of the British Empire has the power, and has exercised it, to pass Sunday rest laws. Such laws are on the Statute-book of England, and have been from time immemorial. I propose next to cite the opinions of a few gentlemen, who are neither ministers nor members of the legal profession, to give the House a little lay opinion. First, I will refer to an opinion expressed by the celebrated Henry George, who is not a religious man, I believe. Mr. George gives expression to this sentiment:

"I believe that the institution of the Sabbath is one of the greatest benefits that the human race ever had. I believe in the strict enforcement of the law that prevents servile labour being carried on on the seventh day."

I will next give the opinion of Chief P. M. Arthur, of the Association of Locomotive Engineers. He said:

"I am in favour of any movement looking to the abolishment of all Sunday labour other than works of mercy and necessity. It has been repeatedly demonstrated beyond a question or doubt, that all Sunday traffic upon railways can be dispensed with without any detriment or injury to the interests of the railway companies. Had I the authority I would not allow a wheel to be turned between twelve o'clock Saturday night and twelve o'clock Sunday night."

Mr. T. V. Powderly, chief of the Knights of Labour, made use of the following language:—

"I believe in Sunday rest. So do the Knights of Labour."

We have the opinions expressed by public men of the past and public men of the present. Blackstone says: "A corruption of morals usually follow a profanation of the Sabbath." De Tocqueville: "Despotism may govern without faith, but liberty cannot." Mirabeau: "God is as necessary as liberty to the French people." La Place: "I have lived long enough to know what at one time I did not believe, that no society can be upheld in happiness and honour without the sentiments of religion." The great American historian, George Bancroft, says: "Certainly our great united commonwealth is the child of Christianity, and it may, with truth, be asserted that modern civilization springs into life with our religion, and faith in its principles is the life-boat on which humanity has, at divers times, escaped the most threatening perils." Franklin says: "What are laws without morals, and whence shall we get morals except from religion?" Washington: "Reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle." Daniel Webster: "The longer I live the more highly do I esteem the importance of the proper observance of the Christian Sabbath, and the more grateful do I feel towards those who impress its importance on the community." Wm. H. Seward, Secretary of State under Lincoln, in an address at the Sabbath Convention at Rochester, in 1842, said: "Every day's observation and experience confirm the opinion that the ordinances which require the observance of one day in seven, and the Christian faith which hallows it, are our chief security for all civil and religious liberty, for temporal blessings and spiritual hopes." When Sir John Sinclair wrote an essay against what he considered a Puritanical observance of the Sabbath in Scotland, his friend, Adam Smith, though an apologist for Hume, said: "Your book, Sir John, is very ably composed, but the Sabbath, as a political institution, is of inestimable value independently of its claims to Divine authority." Sabbath observance has been advocated by such men as Gladstone, D'Israeli, Shaftesbury, Argyle, Bright, Lincoln, Garfield and thousands of others. The action of the British Government in late years has been such as to show unmistakably the desire of the ruling classes in England to honour and observe the Sabbath.

I now proceed to point out that the observance of the Sabbath has been petitioned for, and the movement in favour of securing its observance, endorsed by various labour organizations. Chief P. M. Arthur, of the Brotherhood of Engineers, in a letter of 24th November, 1888:

"I am in favour of any movement looking to the abolishment of all Sunday labour other than works of mercy and necessity. It has been repeatedly demonstrated beyond a question or doubt that all Sunday traffic upon railways can be dispensed with without any detriment or injury to the interest of the railway companies. Had I the authority, I would not allow a wheel to be turned between twelve o'clock Saturday night and twelve o'clock Sunday night."

The Brotherhood of Railway Brakemen and Locomotive Firemen, at a union meeting held at Bloomington, Ill., 24th July, 1889, passed a series of resolutions as follows:—

"Whereas the Sabbath was ordained for man: and whereas all history shows the best state of society and the highest and best civilization when the hours of the Sabbath were devoted to rest and relief from labour: therefore, be it resolved that we, as railway employés, ask of the general public to forego Sunday travel on railways and the demanding or requiring managers of railways to run Sunday trains for freight traffic, to the end that we, who are willing to give six days and nights of our time to the faithful service of the public and to our employés, may have the hours of the Sabbath with our families at command for the great good and comfort to ourselves from being at home with our families, and for church, Sabbath school and other privileges the Sabbath is designed to bring to us.

Resolved, that we tender our sincere and hearty thanks to those presidents and managers of roads who have recently issued orders curtailing Sunday work, and we most respectfully ask all managers of roads to follow their example.

Resolved, that, as workingmen, we feel that we can do better service during the six days of the week when we are permitted the rest and recuperation the Sabbath was designed to give us.

Resolved, that we, as railway employés, pledge ourselves to be of the best possible service in our power to the several railways which employ us and to regard the interest of our employers when they show an interest in our best welfare by giving to us the best possible safety appliances and as much of Sunday rest as the exigencies of railway transportation will admit."

The American Federation of Labour at St. Louis, in 1888, addressed this communication to the Committee on Education and Labour of the United States Senate, having under consideration the Sunday Rest Bill:

"St. Louis, Mo., 15th Dec., 1888.

"To the Committee on Education and Labour of the United States of America:—

"The American Federation of Labour at its session today, adopted the following:

"Resolved.—That the American Federation of Labour is in hearty sympathy with any legitimate movement inaugurated by the American Sabbath Union, the object of which is to lessen the burden of those who toil."

The Knights of Labour at their International Convention in 1888 passed a resolution approving of the Sunday Rest movement, as well as the Locomotive Engineers, whose resolution I have read. I have here a communication addressed by 450 locomotive engineers of the New York Central Railway to Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt, and although it is somewhat lengthy, I wish it to be incorporated in the report, because it covers very fully the ground, and it presents the case of these poor men in the most effective manner. The communication to Mr. Vanderbilt is as follows:—

"We have borne this grievance patiently, hoping every succeeding year that it would decrease. We were willing to submit to any reasonable privation, mental or physical, to assist the officers of your company to achieve a financial triumph; but, after a long and weary service, we do not see any signs of relief, and we are forced to come to you with our trouble and most respectfully ask you to relieve us from Sunday labour, as far as it is in your power to do so. Our objections to Sunday labour are: 1st. This never-ending labour ruins our health and prematurely makes us feel worn out like old men, and we are sensible of our inability to perform our duty as well, when we work to an excess. 2nd. That the customs of all civilized countries, as well as all laws, human and divine, recognize Sunday as a day of rest and recuperation; and, notwithstanding intervals of rest might be arranged for us on other days than Sunday, we feel that by so doing we would be forced to exclude ourselves from all church, family and social privileges that other citizens enjoy. 3rd. Nearly all of the undersigned have children that they desire to have educated in everything that will tend to make them good men and women, and we cannot help but see that our example in ignoring the Sabbath day has a very demoralizing effect upon them. 4th. Because we believe the best interests of the company we serve, as well as ourselves, will be promoted thereby, and because we believe locomotive engineers should occupy as high social and religious positions as men in any other callings. We know the question will be considered: How can this Sunday work be avoided, with the immense and constantly increasing traffic? We have watched this matter for the past twenty years. We have seen it grow from its infancy until it has arrived at its now gigantic proportions, from one train on the Sabbath until we now have about thirty each way: and we do not hesitate in saying, that we can do as much work in six days, with the seventh for rest, as is now done. It is a fact observable by all connected with the immediate running of freight trains, that on Monday freight is comparatively light; Tuesday, it strengthens a little, and keeps increasing until Saturday; and Sundays are the heaviest of the week.

"The objection may be offered, that if your lines stop the receiving points from other roads will be blocked up. In reply, we would most respectfully suggest, that when the main lines do not run, tributaries would only be too glad to follow the good example. The question might also arise, if traffic is suspended twenty-four hours, will not the company lose one-seventh of its profits? In answer, we will pledge our experience, health and strength, that at the end of the year our employers will not lose one cent, but, on the contrary, will be the gainers financially. Our reasons are these: At present, the duties of your locomotive engineers are incessant, day after day, night succeeding night, Sunday and all, rain or shine, with all the fearful inclemencies of a rigorous winter to contend with. The great strain of both mental and physical faculties constantly employed has a tendency, in time, to impair the requisites so necessary to make a good engineer. Troubled in mind, jaded and worn out in body, the engineer cannot give his duties the attention they should have in order to best advance his employer's interests. We venture to say, not on this broad continent, in any branch of business or traffic, can be found any class in the same position as railway men. They are severed from associations that all hold most dear, debarred from the opportunity of worship, that tribute man owes to his God, witnessing all those pleasures accorded to others, which are the only oasis in the deserts of this life, and with no prospects of relief. We ask you to aid us. Give us the Sabbath for rest after our week of laborious duties, and we pledge you that, with a system invigorated by a season of repose, by a brain eased and cleared by hours of relaxation, we can go to work with more energy, more mental and physical force, and can and will accomplish more work and do it better, if possible, in six days, than we can now do in seven. We can give you ten days in six if you require it, if we can only look forward to a certain period of rest. In conclusion, we hope and trust that, in conjunction with other gentlemen of the trunk lines leading to the seaboard, you will be able to accomplish something that will ameliorate our condition."

Unfortunately, Sir, these locomotive engineers did not secure the boon they asked, and Sunday labour is just as prevalent now as it was then. Nothing can remedy this evil in that country except general legislation; and when that legislation is provided by the American Congress, then we can follow in their steps. It is said in objection to this Bill that its provisions ought to be matters of municipal and police regulation—that they should belong to, and be acted upon by, the various provinces. Well, Sir, the provinces have not the power to deal with railway traffic, with postmen, with letter carriers, with the Mounted Police, with the canals, with the publication and distribution of papers. These are powers which this House must exercise, if they are to be used at all. Now, the provisions of the Bill, from sections one to six inclusive, might, I suppose, be enacted by the provinces. The first section provides against labour on the Lord's Day. The second provides against the sale or purchase of goods, and the pursuit of ordinary callings. The third provides against horse racing, foot racing, cock fighting, dog fighting and other games that might disturb the public peace. The fourth provides against frequenting inns and tippling there. The fifth provides against hunting, and the sixth against fishing. These, I will admit, are offences that might be dealt with by the provinces; and if the Bill reaches the Committee of the Whole, and the House should choose to cut out those sections, I do not know that I would resist very strongly its opinion in that respect. But from the seventh section on, the Bill refers to offences which this House only can deal with. The seventh section is as follows:—

"Whoever shall on the Lord's Day, either as proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the printing, publication and delivery of a newspaper, journal or periodical, and whoever shall on the Lord's Day engage in the sale, distribution or circulation of any newspaper, journal or periodical published on that day, shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour."

Now, Sir, with regard to the Sunday newspaper, fortunately we have not that great demoralizer in Canada yet. Not many years ago the first Sunday newspaper was published in the United States, and a more demoralizing agency cannot be conceived. Its publication involves manufacture, trade, transportation, Sunday secularization and general demoralization. For the Sunday newspaper we see called into existence special Sunday trains; we have steamers transporting it, and we have the thoughts of the public directed into the ordinary rut of week-day concerns, week-day pursuits and week-day reading. It is said that the Monday edition of a paper may involve more Sunday labour than the Sunday edition. I deny that. On the contrary, the Sunday edition involves a hundred times more Sunday labour than the Monday edition. It is not necessary to have Sunday labour for the Monday edition at all; the editors and compositors may go home on Saturday night and return to their work on Sunday night at 12 o'clock, after which there is ample time to bring out the paper. But the Sunday paper is the most prolific and dangerous source of the demoralization and secularization of the ideas of the people that can exist in the country. Its existence in the United States is greatly to be deprecated and deplored.

The next section of the Bill has reference to the closing of the canals. The canals, of course, are Government works, and if the Government permits the operation of the canals on the Lord's Day, the Government itself is guilty of Sunday desecration, and outrages the feelings of the Christian community in this country. The Bill, it is true, makes provision that after the 1st of November in each year, the canals may by Order in Council be kept open. This might partake of the character of a work of necessity, to enable vessels to reach their destination before the closing of the canals and lakes by ice. Section 9 relates to the post office:

"No post office in Canada shall be open for the delivery of letters or the transaction of business, other than the reception of mails, on the Lord's Day."

Now, the example of London, the greatest commercial city in the world, is sufficient to show us that it is not necessary to have the post offices open on the Lord's Day. The excuse often offered for it is that it is necessary to send letters to dying friends. The telegraph, however, is the fast mail of this age, and if it is necessary to apprize persons of the death of a friend, it is not necessary to use the mail at all, because the telegraph, in nine cases out of ten, will reach them sooner. We have protests in various countries against the opening of the mails on the Lord's Day, and although there is little to complain of in Canada in that respect at present, I think the provision of the Bill on the subject is one that will commend itself to the Christian sentiment of the country.

The tenth section relates to railway traffic. If this section of the Bill should meet with criticism at all, it is likely to be charged on the part of those favourable to Sunday rest, that it is too liberal and permits too large an amount of traffic on the railways. It is as follows:—

"Any railway corporation, superintendent, traffic manager, or person or persons by virtue of whose authority and command railway cars or trains shall on the Lord's Day be loaded at any railway station in Canada, or despatched from such station when loaded, or permitted to continue a journey (except in the case of perishable goods) with Canadian local freight,—or any person or persons as aforesaid who shall direct local passenger trains to be run on the Lord's Day (except one mail train each way, and one milk train on each road, and such special trains as are necessary for the purpose of conveying medical aid and means of relief in cases of accident, or to persons injured or afflicted with sickness, or of conveying persons to visit dying relations, or for the purpose of conveying the means for extinguishing fire to places requiring such assistance, or for other acts of necessity and mercy), or shall direct empty cars to be moved from station to station within the territory of Canada,—shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour: but two through passenger trains each way, with their necessary connections, shall be permitted on any trunk line of Canada when American through passenger train connections render such trains necessary:

"2. At such time as the laws of the United States shall make corresponding provision, no through freight in transit from one point on the frontier of the United States to some other point on the said frontier, shall be allowed to pass over Canadian roads on the Lord's Day, except live stock and perishable goods."

It may be claimed that it is unnecessary to permit a mail train, or a milk train, or the transportation of perishable goods—and with regard to the latter, the refrigerator renders it unnecessary to move that class of freight on the Lord's Day. Perhaps it is unnecessary to have milk or mail trains on the Sunday, but it was felt our transportation interests in this country are very important, and that this is a question in a measure beyond our reach. It would be impossible, without doing great injustice to our railways, to make any provision which would compel them to adopt a different policy from that pursued by the trunk lines of the United States with which they connect. Take the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, they would be placed at great disadvantage in their competition with the American lines, if they were prevented making the necessary connections on the Lord's Day, and prevented carrying on that day the through freight, which they must bring to its destination without interruption. The second sub-section of the clause provides:

"At such times as the laws of the United States shall make corresponding provision, no through freight in transit from one point on the frontier of the United States to some other point on the said frontier, shall be allowed to pass over Canadian roads on the Lord's Day, except live stock and perishable goods."

So that, with regard to the transportation of through freight, the Bill places us in this position: that as soon as the United States, if they do adopt a Sunday Observance Bill, prohibit their through freight traffic on the Lord's Day, a similar provision will be enforced in this country. The provision in this Bill is contingent on the Americans adopting a similar one, and will not go into operation until they do so, because otherwise we would place our railways at a great disadvantage in their competition with American lines for passenger traffic and freight traffic. With regard to railway traffic, I suppose our railway managers have no desire to transgress in this particular. Mr. Seargeant, at present the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, in a letter last year, took a position with regard to this matter which was very satisfactory to those who favour Sunday rest reform, and the letter of Mr. VanHorne was also of a satisfactory character. As I intimanted a few moments ago, the transgressions on the part of the railway companies of the ordinance of Sabbath rest are in a sense involuntary. They are compelled to permit these transgressions in consequence of the necessity resting upon them through their American connections. The necessity for railway traffic on the Sunday is not admitted by the advocates of this Bill in the United States, and is not admitted here. Celebrated railway authorities there assert that it does not exist. Colonel Diven, who was for many years—seventeen years, I think—the general traffic manager of the New York and Erie Railway, said, in his evidence before the United States Senate Committee, with reference to this matter:

"There is no valid excuse for railroad traffic on Sunday, either for mail, passengers, or freight. Why should not traffic on our railroads rest with all the other business activities? None of the other great interests are paralyzed by resting one day in seven, nor would any follow the suspension of the railroad traffic. Is the transmission of mails a necessity? The best and most successful business men I have ever known never open their letters on Sunday. If there ever was a necessity for the Sunday mail traffic, it ceased with the telegram. If ever there was a necessity for moving perishable articles on Sunday, it has been removed by the refrigerator car. My article in the Christian Union was intended as a challenge to railroad managers to justify their management. When that challenge is accepted I believe it can be successfully met by men of practical experience."

Thirty-one railway managers, in response to circulars or letters issued by the Sunday-rest promoters, gave it as their opinion that Sunday railway traffic was totally unnecessary, that it might, with every advantage to the public and without detriment or loss to the corporations, be entirely suspended.

The eleventh and last section of this Bill makes provision against Sunday excursions by steamboat or railway. Many excuses and reasons are assigned in justification of these excursions. It is said that it is necessary for the poor toiler in the cities to see God in nature, and that he requires to go into the country on the Sabbath. Well, we have very few cities so large that the toiler cannot get out into the country on foot, and a walk of two or three miles will bring him into the heart of green fields and to the enjoyment of the purest air.

Mr. AMYOT. He will be in the dust.

Mr. CHARLTON. He will be in the dust with cinders as well on a railway train. The fact is the demand for excursions is a selfish demand, because it forces the necessity of performing labour on a certain class of men, engineers, brakemen, and other employés, in order to enable people to go on these excursions. These excursions are demoralizing. They do not afford rest, because those who participate in them come back at night fagged, worn out, and in a physical condition which renders it necessary for them to seek that repose on a Monday which they should have had on the Sunday devoted to the excursion. The Catholic sugar planters of Louisiana, in 1886, were obliged to petition to the Legislature of Louisiana to secure the passage of a Sunday Rest Bill. The evil of Sunday excursions on the part of their employers was so great that on an average they could only work four days in the week. They came back with a sulphurous Monday and blue Tuesday as a rule after a Sabbath desecrated by drink and excess. Investigations have proved that the labourer who remains quietly at home on the Lord's Day and attends Divine service and Sunday school, comes to his work on Monday morning refreshed for the week, while the man who goes on an excursion comes back, in nine cases out of ten, if not in a state of drunkenness, at all events, tired and unfit for labour the following day. The association to secure Sunday rest in the United States addressed a great number of circulars to employers of labour asking them the condition of their employés who went out on Sunday excursions as compared with that of those who remained at home and were Sabbath observers, and the reply invariably was that those who spent the Sabbath on excursions were not at hand on the Monday morning as a rule but required a blue Monday and a black Tuesday to get over the excitement of their Sunday revelry, whereas those who had spent the Sunday quietly at home with their families were on hand ready to begin work the Monday morning on time and with renewed vigour. With regard to excesses in connection with Sunday excursions I will give one extract from an address by Rev. Wilber F. Crafts:

"As a matter of fact, whatever may be said of 'Sunday excursions per se,' the real Sunday excursion is bad and leads to worse and worst. Refinement as well as religion taboos them. In California, where they have grown to ripeness and beyond, even the Sunday newspapers join in a general protest that has compelled some railroads to suspend them as nuisances. Think of a hoodlum picnic from San Francisco, after having terrorized a beautiful suburb all day, returning on Sunday night on a train with the lights turned out. That, as one has said, is the 'respectable Sunday excursion gone to seed.'"

That is said to be the tendency of the Sunday excursion. In nine cases out of ten these excursions are not productive of any good, and they are often attended by free liquor and free amusements, and they are always attended by weariness at the end of the day. There are two classes who oppose legislation of the character we have under consideration to-day.

One class opposes this legislation because they are averse to anything in the way of religious ordinances, those are the anarchist, the infidel, the brawler and the drinker. Another class opposes this legislation from religious scruples, and they include the Seventh Day Baptists, the Adventists and the Jews, who do not believe in the observance of the first day of the week. In Canada, probably, these do not exceed 2 per cent. of the population—perhaps not more than 1 per cent. We cannot change the day of rest from the first to the seventh day in order to suit 2 per cent. of the population, but we might meet this difficulty in this way: Certainly these people have religious scruples, and their scruples have a right to consideration, and it would be wrong to trample on anyone's religious scruples. Section 1572 of the General Statutes of Connecticut provides that:

"No person who conscientiously believes that the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as the Sabbath, and actually refrains from secular work and labour on that day shall be liable to prosecution for performing secular business and labour on the Sabbath, provided he disturbs no other person while attending public worship."

Some provision of that kind might be adopted, and that would provide for this assumed right and would meet the difficulty felt by Seventh Day Baptists, Adventists and Jews. The truth is that we cannot have two Sabbaths. We cannot have two days of rest, and it is useless to talk about it. We cannot provide that Saturday and the first day of the week shall both be observed as Sabbaths, and if we have to make any other provision than for one day, that provision which I have quoted from the law of Connecticut might be adopted. Men are often guilty of too great literalness. In regard to the Sabbath being observed on the first day of the week, that is a matter which, in my opinion, has no significance as to a day being chosen as the day of rest. If we adopted any day of the week, it might answer the same end. It might not answer religious views or religious scruples, but for the people in general one day of the week for a day of rest would do as well as any other. I think there is too much literalness with our friends the Adventists and the Seventh Day Baptists. If we were to start from any particular meridian, and were not to change our reckoning at the 180 degrees of longitude, we would find that we were keeping the Sabbath on a different day of the week. If a vessel sailed to the west and went around the globe without changing the reckoning on the 180 degrees she would arrive at her destination keeping Monday for Sunday; while if sailing in the opposite direction without the necessary adjustment of the calendar the vessel would reach her starting point with Saturday usurping the place of Sunday. In one case, in the Island of Samoa, the missionaries found that they were observing Saturday as the Sabbath, because they had not corrected their calendar when they went to that country; and I think our friends the Seventh Day Baptists and the Adventists might take a lesson from that fact.

I have already detained the House rather long, and this is rather like a sermon. Unregenerate man is not very fond of this kind of pabulum. I am sorry that this is not very interesting, but I think that, in conclusion, I may safely affirm, if my premises are correct, my conclusion is also correct; and that is, firstly, that a weekly day of rest is a natural need and a natural right of man. The celebrated Humboldt says that it is scientifically true that a weekly day of rest is a natural law and a natural right of man. My next proposition is that the day of rest must be the same for all. It would not do to have hod-carriers, merchants, lawyers and firemen select Saturday for their day of rest, while bricklayers, plasterers, judges and engineers observed Sunday, and other classes might observe Monday or Tuesday. That would derange the whole structure of labour. You must have one day selected as the day of rest. The next proposition I make is, that the common rest day must be protected by law. It is not an efficient rest day unless the law protects the right of the labourers to rest on that day. Many labourers cannot exercise their own choice on that day unless they are protected by law. They may be required to labour on every day of the week, and, if they refuse to do so, they are liable to lose their living and to lose their situation. Therefore, this God-given right must be secured to them by law as it is given to them by every right, human and divine. As to the law securing this rest day to the labourer, my fourth and last proposition is that two exceptions should be made. One refers to works of necessity, and the other to works of mercy. I, therefore, say that the rest day is a natural right and a needed right of man: the rest day must necessarily be one throughout the land, it must be secured to all men by law, and the only qualification is, that works of necessity and works of mercy, shall be exempted from the operation of this law.

When this Bill was discussed some five or six years ago, my hon. friend the Secretary of State, and the right hon. gentleman who then led the House, took the position that the Bill was ultra vires, that the provisions of the Bill properly belonged to the Local Legislatures. That was the Bill in reference to Sunday excursions. I suppose it is in the power of this House to declare what is a misdemeanour, and it is in the power of this House to punish a misdemeanour in such a way as its discretion may dictate, whether by fine or imprisonment. This Bill declares every offence in the Bill to be a misdemeanour. As I have said, the first six sections of this Bill relate to offences that possibly might be considered as more properly coming within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, but the seventh and the following sections to the eleventh inclusive, relate to offences clearly within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, and not within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. Consequently, I hold that the Bill is constitutional, that there is not an offence dealt with in this Bill that is not an offence which this Parliament may deal with under the assumption that it is a misdemeanour, and that all offences from the sixth clause, are offences that this Parliament must deal with and that the Legislatures of the provinces cannot deal with. For instance, they cannot deal with our canals, they cannot deal with post offices, they cannot deal with our railway traffic—these are offences that we must deal with.

Sir, the considerations and conclusions that, in my opinion, commend this Bill to the favourable consideration of this House, and to the favourable consideration of the people of Canada, are, first of all, and perhaps the most important of all, that a rest day has been provided by Divine law, and that the Sabbath is of Divine ordinance. It is a civil ordinance as well, but it is primarily a Divine ordinance, a blessing conferred by God upon man. The next consideration that will commend the Bill to the favour of the House, is that its provisions are calculated to promote the good of the people. It is evident that there is a vast difference between English institutions and the institutions of continental nations: it is clear that the observation of the Sabbath in the English commonwealths has had a salutary influence upon public life. It is impossible to over-estimate the value to the people of this country, and the value to the people of other English-speaking commonwealths, of the blessings that have resulted from the observation of the first day of the week as a day of rest, as a day of Christian observance. The next thing that, in my opinion, commends this Bill to the favourable consideration of the House, is the fact that it emancipates labour from the exactions of the employer, it strikes off the shackles from the bond slave, it may be, who is a labourer, who has no other means of asserting his right to the day of rest than the means provided for him by the enactment of a law to protect him. The next point, in my estimation, in which this Bill commends itself to our favourable consideration, is that it promotes not only the interest of the labourer, but it promotes the interest of the employer. It is in the interest of the employer to have on Monday a sober, alert, clean, respectable, efficient labourer, prepared to take hold of his work, in place of a labourer who has been, perhaps, spending a dissolute Sabbath, who is unfitted to labour upon Monday and often unfitted upon Tuesday. It is in the interest of the employer to have an honest, God-fearing labourer, instead of a hoodlum. The operations of this Bill, so far as it affects the interests of the employer, will be salutary; it promotes his interest in every respect as well as the interest of the employé, for the interests of both are mutual in this regard. The last reason for which this Bill deserves our favourable consideration is that it is a blessing even to those who curse the Bill, it is a blessing to those who oppose it. There is not a class in the community, there is not a person in the country, that is not really to be benefited by a Sunday Rest Bill, a Bill which will secure to him the right to rest: a Bill, the tendency of which will be to direct his thoughts out of the ordinary rut of week-day life and week-day pursuits, to something higher: and the operation of the Bill in every respect, looking at it from whatever point you may, criticize it in whatever way you please—the operation of the Bill under the consideration of the House, will be salutary and beneficient to the whole country and to every interest, to every class, and to every individual, within the limits of this broad Dominion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before the House takes action upon this Bill, I will say a few words upon the subject. This is the second time, I think, that the hon. member has spoken in support of a measure of this kind, for I think the Bill which he introduced last year, but which he did not press to a conclusion, was of a very similar character. The propositions which the hon. gentleman advanced with such strong argument and illustration, are propositions on which, I think, there can be no difference of opinion in this House: and the conclusions at which he seems to have arrived in his argument, are not conclusions which any one, I think, would be disposed to combat. Still, I am very doubtful if many of the provisions of the Bill are sustained as the result of his argument. For example, I suppose, there can be no difference of opinion in this House as to the fact that a day of rest has been ordained by divine law, there can be no second opinion in this House that the good of the state requires that a day of rest should be fully observed. There can be no difference of opinion at all as to the proposition that the law should enforce the observance of that day of rest. But, in discussing the features of this Bill, we have to deal with the fact that, granted it is the subject of divine law, granted the day of rest beneficial to the state, granted that law is necessary to its observance in every province in the Dominion, Acts have been passed, and in almost every municipality of Canada enactments have been passed, almost as strict as the provisions of this Bill. It is a subject of which the Provincial Legislatures have fully possessed themselves, and it is, no doubt, within the competence of the Provincial Legislatures, and within their practice, to say how far the enactments on this subject are sufficiently severe or how much the severity should be increased from time to time. I think that the hon. gentleman was almost fully conscious of that fact when he intimated that the first half dozen clauses of the Bill might, perhaps, on examination be found to be unnecessary, and he discussed at greater length some of the other provisions of the Bill, which he thought were not within provincial jurisdiction. The first point, however, I wish to make before discussing those clauses which are within our jurisdiction—possibly all of them are, but when I say within our jurisdiction, I mean not only within our competence—but within our competence only—the first point to be considered before going to that class of subjects, is the state of the provincial laws upon this subject, whether it is necessary for us to deal with this subject by the criminal law, or whether it is not better to leave it as it is now, a subject of provincial and municipal regulation. It is my own belief that it is better to leave it as it is now. We have laws of very considerable strictness and severity in regard to this subject, as I have stated, in every province; some of them, perhaps, not so strict as others, and the Provincial Legislatures are, for all purposes, better able to judge how far the provisions of the Sunday Rest Bill should be relaxed, in view of peculiar or local circumstances. I propose, therefore, and in this I have been given to understand the hon. gentleman will not differ from me, that the opinion of the House shall not be tested at this stage, on this Bill, by any division, but that the House will agree to refer the Bill, after its second reading, to a select committee, principally with a view to the consideration of this point. When the hon. gentleman came to consider some of the provisions of the Bill which he thought were outside of the province of the Local Legislatures, it seemed to me he was mistaken in some particulars, for example, in supposing that the subject of publishing newspapers could not be dealt with by Provincial Legislatures as well as any other active employment. I think it will be observed in this connection that as regards some of those provisions, they are far more severe than are necessary. For example, section 6 of the Bill provides that:

"Whoever shall on the Lord's Day go out fishing, or shall take, kill or destroy any fish, or use any gun, fishing-rod, net or other appliance for that purpose, shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour."

It provides that there shall be no fishing between twelve o'clock Saturday night and twelve o'clock Sunday night, notwithstanding it may be necessary for the actual sustenance of life: for the hon. gentleman has only made in his Bill a reservation in favour of the Indians, but there are many poor persons living in the country who need to engage in the pursuit of game and the taking of fish as well as do the Indians. It prohibits the catching in a net of any fish on Sunday, notwithstanding that the net may have been set on a week day, and that it may be exceedingly injurious to the party who owns it to remove it for the purpose of Sabbath observance. So when we come to the question of printing or publishing a newspaper on Sunday, the hon. gentleman's Bill, if I am correctly informed, would practically stop the publication of a Monday newspaper, inasmuch as the greater portion of the work done on the Monday paper requires to be performed before twelve o'clock on Sunday night in order to get the newspaper to press on Monday morning. I will now say a few words with respect to the provisions of the Bill which seem to affect the public interest, and the hon. gentleman directed our attention to them as indicating the necessity of legislation here as distinguished from provincial legislation. The provisions of sections 8, 9 and 10, require very careful consideration indeed. I think we shall have to oppose on principle the adoption of these provisions, although it may be desirable that the committee shall carefully consider how far the public interests are involved in sections of that character, irrespective of any attitude the Government may eventually take on that question. As to the provisions which refer, for example, to the absolute closing of the canals and the operating of the railways, I will speak only in a general way. The hon. gentleman has recognized in his Bill and in his speech the necessity of operating passenger trains, milk trains and several classes of trains of that kind for ublic convenience and for the convenience of the ordinary trade of the country. I am informed it is equally necessary that, within certain hours at least, vessels should be allowed to pass through the canals, to prevent the absolute stoppage of the canal trade between Saturday night and Sunday morning to the great detriment of those engaged in shipping and the great detriment of those whose cargoes are en route. As regards the railways, the Bill contains provisions which are entirely anomalous, I think. The hon. gentleman's proposal is that the carriage of all local Canadian freight shall be stopped on Sunday, but a railway may carry American freight, so that one train or one car which is on its way on Saturday night must be stopped and the freight divided: the American freight can go forward to its destination, but the Canadian freight must take its day of rest until Monday morning. The hon. gentleman has made that distinction intentionally, because he calls attention to the fact, and the Bill recognizes the fact that a different arrangement may be made when Congress shall pass a law of equal severity with this Bill upon this subject. But I do not see why that distinction should exist until that time arrives. A railway company is not allowed by this Bill to carry Canadian freight to the American border line, but it can receive American freight at the border line and carry it all over Canada. I do not see why that should be so: but much more do I fail to see why, after the freight comes into Canada, a railway should be limited to carrying American and not Canadian freight. The hon. gentleman will find, and the committee of investigation will find, that this will be a most serious and most inconvenient arrangement as regards trade and commerce. However, without detaining the House on the present occasion, I merely rise to indicate some considerations which I think ought to be very carefully taken into account before the Bill is adopted. If the House will concur in the proposal I have made, that in view of the general concensus of opinion in favour of the propositions which the hon. gentleman has advanced and on which his Bill is based, this Bill may fairly be read the second time, then, instead of referring it to the committee of the whole House, I will move that it be referred to a select committee to make an enquiry on the subjects I have mentioned: first, as to the effect of the present provincial and municipal enactments, with a view to ascertain whether those are not sufficient, and whether the matter should not be left in the hands in which it is now; and second, with a view to considering the public interests involved in regard to those provisions which, if adopted at all, must be adopted by this Parliament.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to concur in the wish expressed by the Minister of Justice that this Bill pass its second reading now, and be referred to a Select Committee of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee; said Committee to be composed as follows:—Messrs. Chapleau, Kirkpatrick, Charlton, Weldon, Mills (Bothwell), Coatsworth. Davies (P.E.I.), Gillies, Beausoleil, Mara and Christie.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. EDGAR moved the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. He said: The Bill which I propose should be read a second time is a short amendment to the Electoral Franchise Act. It involves the principle of residential franchise or, to a certain extent, the principle of "one man one vote." I am aware, Sir, that this Parliament, and the Parliament which preceded it, is committed to the principle of a uniform Dominion franchise, and although I am one of those who do not believe that to be a correct principle, still I propose by this amendment not to interfere with it. At any rate every one who advocates a uniform Dominion franchise will admit that the present franchise law is not perfect and is susceptible of improvement, and if we are to have a uniform franchise I think we should try to have it uniformly good. Now to secure a franchise that will only give one vote to one man, I can see that double legislative action should be taken, and that we would require to amend not only the franchise, but also the Dominion Elections Act. While by amending the Franchise Act, as I propose to do, we may prevent owners and tenants who seek to be placed upon the electoral list from becoming voters unless they are electors in the electoral division, we cannot prevent these same electors from voting if even they are at the time of voting non-residents of the electoral division, without changing the oath of voters at the polls as it now stands in the Dominion Elections Act. However, I only propose in this Bill to deal with the first part of the programme. The alteration which I propose is only necessary as far as regards owners and tenants, because already "residence" is a prerequisite of being placed upon the voters' list in most cases under the Act. Occupants, of course must be residents of the electoral division, income voters, farmers' sons, owners' sons, fishermen who have a special franchise under the Act, as well as annuitants, are all required to be residents of the electoral division before they are entitled to be placed on the voters' list. You will see therefore that Parliament has gone very far, indeed, towards recognizing the principle of residence in an electoral division as a prerequisite of conferring the franchise upon the electors. I propose to extend this principle of the Act simply to owners and tenants, in addition to its present application. Now, what objections can be urged against that proposition. I suppose I will be met with the old story that property would not be sufficiently or properly represented in Parliament if we only gave one vote to one man, irrespective of his property qualification. But, Sir, Parliament has already ignored the principle of property representation to a very large extent. In the first place, any member who sits in this House to-day requires no property qualification, and so long as he is elected by the qualified voters of the country he cannot be displaced because he has not a few thousands dollars worth of real estate. Therefore, in this House, where the result of all the voting is shown in the election of representatives, we do not recognize the right of property to representation. We have also ignored this principle as far as the electors are concerned when we have allowed to be placed upon the voters' lists the wage-earners, the income voters, the farm labourers and the mechanics. These farm labourers, for instance, who earn eight or ten dollars per month and their board, are entitled to vote now, and surely there is no recognition of the rights of the property qualification in that. The principle of the present Franchise Act in giving to the labourer on a farm, to the mechanic in a factory, or to the porter in a warehouse, the same vote that the proprietor of the farm, or the factory, or the owner of the warehouse has, is absolutely to drop the distinction as far as the franchise is concerned between the man who owns property and the man who does not own property. Then, another step this Parliament has taken has done away largely with the representation of property in this House. When in the old days the elections were held on a number of different dates, spread over several weeks, a man who owned property in several ridings was able without very great difficulty to put in his vote in each of those ridings by attending at the different polling places on different days; but now, under the system of simultaneous polling, a property owner who has votes in remote parts of the country is disfranchised by distance in time or space as to most of his votes, and to that extent we have ceased to recognize property as a qualification for the electors. Then, take the case of a man who may have all his real estate investment in one polling division. He may have one or two hundred thousand dollars' worth; and yet he has only one vote: while another man who may be possessed of only $1,000 worth of real estate may, if it is judiciously distributed among adjoining ridings, have five or more votes upon it. I could give plenty of instances of that kind. In my own case, I do not happen to have much property, but I live in one riding, I have an office in another, and I have a little lot in another: so that I have three votes in the city of Toronto, in addition to which I have some votes on property scattered about in the County of York. There are scores of men in Toronto who have very much more property than I have, but it being concentrated in one riding they have only one vote, whereas if I attended to voting on election day I would be able to record five or six votes. Now, I do not think that is fair. There is no doubt that property will always have its full weight, its proper and legitimate weight, in returning members to this House. If a man owns large property, and has tenants and treats them well, or has a large number of employés and treats them well, he will have all the legitimate influence that he should have in sending members to this House. But, Sir, when you come down to the principle of the thing, I do not think it is property which is, or ought to be, represented in Parliament. It is the brains, and the flesh, and the blood, and the opinions of men, and not the clods of earth, or the trees, or the hills, or the fields, or the piles of brick and mortar, that ought to be represented in this House. Now, Sir, there are some distinct evils, I think, arising from the law as it stands at present allowing non-residents to be placed on the voters' list. I think all the members of this House will readily acknowledge that a large non-resident vote makes a general election a very much more expensive matter to the country than it otherwise would be. If persons have votes in a number of different constituencies, and try to get them in, they must travel and either pay their own expenses or have them paid by somebody else, or else get passes from some railway company; and I am very sure that none of the members on either side of this House are anxious to owe their seats to the favours of the railway companies. The present system offers the temptation for the creation of faggot votes, and in close ridings the result is often affected by such fraudulent votes. There is an admitted evil, and the doing away of that evil is not an experiment in Canada. The last two elections held in the Province of Ontario have been held under a law providing for a resident franchise. When that law was introduced into the province, there were no objections made to it, that I have been able to discover, by the Conservative Opposition in the Ontario Legislature, nor have I heard of any complaint that they have made as to its practical working. I think they are very generally satisfied with it. And, Sir, I do not see why we should not try that very safe experiment in this House. I think it is right in principle. To leave the law as it stands, with a large non-resident vote on the electoral list, is undesirable in the interest of the country, and in the interest of parliamentary candidates, and I hope that this Bill will receive someproper support and consideration from this House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I doubt very much that it is, Mr. Speaker, the pleasure of the House that the Bill be read a second time; but in case it should be, I want to say a word on the other side. There is one feature of the Bill as to which I perceive my hon. friend has apparently considered that a very serious grievance exists in this country. He is evidently impressed with an article which a member read the other evening, stating that, in a campaign not very remote now, upwards of 2,000 persons owing allegiance to our Sovereign, but living in a foreign country, were transported to this country to cast their votes, and shouted acclaim to the leader of a great party in this country when they came across the line. The Bill of my hon. friend seems designed to meet what he, as well as some of our friends on this side, evidently conceive to have been a great evil, namely, that persons who have gone to reside in a foreign country could, in a moment of political crisis and excitement, be transported by one of these vicious railways to which he has referred, free of charge to this country, to the extent of thousands at a time, and shout political cries to the disturbance of the residents in this country as they pass over the border. Now, in opposing the second reading of the Bill, I do not mean to say that I do not, to some extent, sympathize with the feeling of my hon. friend that that is an evil which requires a remedy: but I mean to say that my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood) has a Bill before the House which deals with that subject alone, and does not complicate it with other questions; and I, therefore, propose not to vote for this Bill, but to wait until the Bill of my hon. friend from Brockville comes up, and give my vote for that. If the hon. gentleman who has this Bill in charge will read the Bill of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), he will find that it meets the great difficulty he has in view. It prevents these persons who are non-residents in this country and who have no stake in any electoral district in this country being brought over the lines free of charge by a railway company to disturb our elections. But the reason why I would rather vote for the Bill of my hon. friend from Brockville than for the present one is that the present Bill is complicated by questions relating to the basis of the franchise itself. Now, I do not propose this evening to detain the House by any argument on the question of property qualifications or on any questions of political economy. To these my hon. friend has barely alluded, because he, like myself, understands that this question is fully appreciated by the House, and has been continually discussed for the last six years, and that property forms one of the bases of the franchise established by the present law. If the Bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), the other day, had passed this House and we had repealed the Franchise Act entirely, there would have been no necessity to discuss the propriety of the principle of "one man and one vote" as regards some of the provinces—at least the principal province, perhaps, in Canada, because in that province that principle is recognized, although in certain portions of it I understand the operation of the principle is singularly prejudiced. But, Sir, the hon. member who has introduced the Bill has declared that the present franchise law ignores property qualification, and the argument he advanced in support of this contention is that members of this House do not require to possess a property qualification in order to be elected here. I submit that is not a sound argument. The Franchise Act recognizes the property qualification in the voter, and that property, which is possessed by the voter, may be represented in this House by a man who has no property qualification. The hon. gentleman further says that the Franchise Act ignores property qualification, because there are some persons admitted to the franchise who have no property whatever. That is true, but it only proves that the Franchise Act is not entirely based on property qualification. Nevertheless, in the cases in which that qualification is the basis of the franchise, the principle which the Franchise Act would keep in view is that, inasmuch as certain classes of voters get their qualifications to vote in respect of their property, it is but fair that the possession of that qualification in more constituencies than one should confer the right to cast a vote in more constituencies than one, in order that that property, to use a popular phrase, may be represented. The hon. gentleman who moves the Bill tells us that property ought not to be represented, that it is only brains which should be represented here. With great respect to the hon. gentleman, and without going into abstruse arguments on the question, that is hardly a fair way to put it. When we say that property is to be represented, we mean that thrift is to be represented. We mean that the rights are to be represented here which are to be affected by the legislation here, and the qualification which the voter enjoys, therefore, in Toronto and Hamilton gives him the vote in both places. The hon. gentleman has told us again that the principle of simultaneous voting has to a large extent impaired the effect of the representation of property in more constituencies than one. In saying that, the hon. gentleman has only shown us that the evils he complains of are very slight indeed, and that under the principle of simultaneous voting it is practically a matter of difficulty for a man to vote in more places than one, during a general election at least. That, however, does not derogate from the principle of the Franchise Act: it does not derogate from the right which that Act recognizes to have that property represented by the two representatives who are returned from the constituencies in which it is placed. I think that the additional argument advanced by the hon. gentleman, namely, that by a judicious distribution of property in more than one electoral district a person may thus acquire a vote in each, whereas by a concentration of property in one electoral district the voter loses the right of voting more than once, is hardly a sound, or even a plausible argument against the principle of the present law. It may be true that by an ingenious distribution of the property qualification a vote in more ridings than one may be obtained, but I doubt very much indeed that, for the mere privilege of casting a vote in more than one riding, the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge would be willing to distribute his property in various constituencies. When we find that this has been done in bad faith and for the mere purpose of controlling the franchise, let us have the proof, and let us apply the remedy; but if it be, as it is now—and no pretension is made to the contrary—that property is acquired without respect to the franchise, and that franchise is had as a reward of thrift, and that the individual who has acquired that qualification in more than one constituency, has acquired it without regard to the franchise, his right is not to be taken away simply because it might, under possible circumstances, lead to an abuse. Under these circumstances, and as the Bill is totally at variance with the principle of the Act which has been affirmed again and again, and no later in this Parliament than about a fortnight ago, I conclude by moving in amendment that the Bill be not now read the second time but be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not at all understand that this House precluded itself from proposing any amendment to the existing election law by the vote it gave on the Bill of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). The question in issue in that Bill was whether we should adopt the franchises of the various provinces as the franchise of the Dominion, or whether we should continue to act under the Dominion Franchise Act. The hon. Minister, in moving the six months' hoist to that Bill, did not for one moment suggest that we had reached the condition of ideal perfectability with regard to our legislation upon this subject. He did not pretend to argue that the measure now upon the Statute-book was so perfect or so complete in itself that it was incapable of improvement, but the hon. gentleman informs us, in the speech he has just addressed to the House in opposition to the Bill proposed by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Edgar), that that is the case, that this Bill is altogether unnecessary, that it ought not to have been proposed, that it ought to be opposed in this House, because the Bill proposed by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) a few evenings ago, was rejected by the House. I do not understand that that is the position at all. There were two radically different principles presented to the House as between the Dominion Act—an Act proclaiming uniformity on the subject of the franchise—and the measure which the hon. member for Huron proposed. Now, what is proposed by the present Bill is simply an amendment of the law as it now stands. There is no attempt to change the sphere of legislation. What my hon. friend proposes is that this House shall amend the existing law, and he points out that a very large number of persons who are now entitled to vote and do vote, do so after they have ceased to be residents of this country, and have ceased to be British subjects. The hon. the Minister of Justice tells us that this feature of the law, which he admits is objectionable and ought to be amended, will be met by a Bill proposed by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). I aver that it will not be met by that Bill. What are the provisions of the Bill of the hon. member for Brockville? Simply that persons who have become citizens of another country and subjects of another sovereignty shall not be voters in this country. But supposing an income voter who was qualified under the income franchise provisions goes to the United States, but still has not become a subject or citizen of the United States, he may have resided there for three years, he may have expressed his intention to become a citizen of the United States, but, not having resided there for five years, and not having become a citizen of the United States, he may take the oath under the Bill proposed by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) and may come back here and vote. I know, and everyone who resides in a border county knows, that we have a fluctuating population. We have many young men who are seeking their fortunes across the border whose names stand on the voters' list, and not having become citizens of the United States, many of them not having announced their intention to become citizens of the United States, or not having made up their minds one way or the other, nevertheless they are entitled to vote here under the law proposed by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). I object to that. What is the important fact to bear in mind in regard to this subject. Whether you require property as a qualification or not, this principle is recognized, and it is one that will be accepted on all hands, that a man in order to vote ought to be a member of the body politic on behalf of which he casts a vote. Upon what ground do you admit, as all the colonists of Great Britain do, and as the United States contend for, the right of self-expatriation? It is that, when a man separates himself from the country to which he owes allegiance and becomes the citizen of another country, he becomes a member of another society, and has no claim to vote or to interfere with the country from which he has separated himself. That is what we ask here, and the Minister of Justice will see that he has not met this condition of things. This Bill does that. The Minister of Justice does not say I object to recognizing the principle of "one man one vote," but I will confine the right to vote to those who continue to be residents of the country. There might be some argument in that, that a man who removes from one county to another in Canada should still have a vote in the county in which he is registered, but what can be said in favour of the man who is a resident of the country over the border and has no property whatever left behind him upon which he is qualified? Take the case of a man who is a tenant. He stands upon the voters' list as a tenant, but he has left, and his tenancy has expired. He may be brought back and he may vote as long as his name is on the voters' list, and I have known of persons whose names have stood on the voters' list as long as this law has been on the Statute-book though they left the country six months after it was passed. I think that is objectionable, and though you may not meet that by declaring that a man shall have but one vote, and that that shall be given only in the place where he resides, you may provide that a man may have his name transferred from one electoral district to another, if he has changed his residence, but he ought to vote where he resides, and ought to have only one vote. Upon what ground has one man more than one vote? The Minister of Justice says: We recognize property in the electoral franchise. Is that the rule to be adopted? Then a man with $10,000 worth of property should have ten votes to one for a man who has $1,000 worth of property. That is recognized in banking institutions, and, if my hon. friend the Minister of Justice were a member of a monetary institution, he would insist upon that being carried out; but, as people capable of thinking and reflecting, we believe that property is a mere incident to our intellectual power and our moral qualities, and these are the chief things which concern the Government of the country, and which we regard as an evidence of qualification. The Minister of Justice says that the man who has his property divided in several counties ought to have a larger number of votes than a man who has the same amount of property in one county. Upon what ground? You can easily pack votes that way. You find men purchasing small properties and renting small houses in different constituencies for the very purpose of voting in other constituencies than that in which they reside. I say that a man who has more property and more intelligence than his neighbours will derive more influence than his neighbours from his property and his intelligence. His character, his ability to think, his social position and a score of other things give him what the Minister of Justice proposes to give him by additional votes which he does not require. But, if a man ought to have a vote in every county in which he has property, you ought not to have simultaneous elections, because in that way you interfere with the exercise of his right. In many instances, he cannot vote in more than one county on the same day, while his property may be in other counties which he cannot reach on the day of election. Thus you ought to have an election extending over as many days as there are constituencies in the country, so that he may be able to cast his vote in every constituency in which he has property. Well, that may be an absurd thing, but it logically flows from the contention of the Minister of Justice, and it is the only contention upon which this provision of the law, as it now stands, can be supported or upheld. I submit that the law is defective in this particular. It is objectionable, and it is objectionable for the reason that we are constantly legislating against corrupt practices, and there is nothing in this country that contributes so much to corrupt practices as the fact that men who reside out of the constituency, and out of the country, may be brought in for the purpose of casting their votes. Why, Sir, if the contention of the Minister of Justice was well founded, if these men who have no stake in the country, and no interest in the country, and who have gone abroad for the purpose of living somewhere else, because their names happen to be upon the voters' list, can rightfully be brought back or come back for the purpose of voting, I think that right would be well sacrificed for the purpose of obtaining purity in the elections, and to enable us to conduct our elections without the enormous expense which they sometimes entail in this country. Why, Sir, we hear of large numbers of parties being brought into the country. Do they come at their own expense? In some instances they may, but in the majority of instances, probably, they do not. They have come at the expense of some individual parties, or some friend who is residing out of the county, or some powerful railway corporation which is interested in the success of one party rather than another for the purpose of promoting its own special interest. I say that the existence of this right to vote in more than one constituency, is a serious evil. It leads to corruption, it leads to additional expense in the elections, and in the case of many innocent parties, it leads to the filing of petitions, to vexatious proceedings and to election contests, none of which would exist if this provision of the law were stricken out, and if such a measure as that proposed by my hon. friend were put upon the Statute-book. I trust that this House will not rest merely upon the partial amendments proposed by either of the Bills now before the House, but that it will proceed to procure cheapness in the elections, purity in the elections, perfect fairness in the elections, by adopting the principle contained in the Bill now before us, giving to one man one vote, and that whatever additional authority or influence he may exercise in the elections, shall be due to his own merit, to his ability and his social influence, not to the possession of a vote in some other constituency than the one in which he resides.

Mr. WATSON. Coming from a province that has a great number of non-residents on the list I feel that I would not be doing my duty unless I gave my reasons for supporting the Bill now before the House. I believe, and have always believed, in the principle of "one man one vote." I believe that under our system of raising a revenue it is the principle that should prevail. Very often a man who is not possessed of any real estate at all, probably contributes more to the revenue of the country than a man who is worth $10,000; consequently he has a right to the same franchise. I support the Bill for other reasons. I believe that we would have much purer elections if this Bill became law. The present system leads to personation and perjury, and this is carried on more or less in every contest. Under the present system non-residents are not personally known, no one knows whether they are the proper persons to vote under the names that are on the list, and, consequently, personation is practised to an enormous extent in some elections. I know that in my own county during the last contest a large number of votes were personated. It is impossible to detect them, unless you have some person there who knows them, and who is prepared to prevent them from personating. They simply swear in their vote and leave. Even men who are known, and whom you would not expect to vote in different counties, have personated men high in position. I know in my own county during the last election an hon. gentleman who has a seat in the Senate of Canada, Senator Sutherland, came to my town and personated a vote, and swore in his vote, notwithstanding the fact that the property on which he voted was described on the list. He was sworn by my opponent's scrutineer, and he took the oath and voted, notwithstanding that the property qualification was on the list, a property which he never owned, a property which belonged to Mr. John Sutherland, a resident farmer, who has owned the property for the last twelve years. Now, it is estimated that in my county alone over 250 outside votes were polled, men who were brought into that county to vote, and a large number of them were supposed to be personated votes. In the city of Winnipeg it was estimated that over 400 outside votes were brought in, and these were cast for the hon. gentleman who has now a seat in this House. How many of these men were entitled to vote, it is hard to say. Special trains were run through my county: two special trains were carrying voters for my opponent, and not one elector who was known to be favourable to myself was allowed to ride on that train. Over 250 voters were brought into the county in this way. I will relate just one instance to show how this personation is carried on. An elector presented himself to the outside scrutineer, who asked his name. He looked at the list and said his name was James Cox Aikens. The scrutineer said: "You had better take the next name. That is the name of the ex-Governor of Manitoba, and he is not here to-day." The individual took the next name and voted, and this instance shows what manner of things are carried on under the present law. I thoroughly approve of this Bill. I believe it will lead to purer elections. I do not think that outsiders or railway corporations who can afford to bring in parties, should have the power to do so. We were told, the other night, in a debate, that over 2,000 residents of a foreign country were brought into the Province of Quebec and voted, because their names were on the list. I thought that statement, coming from a Minister of the Crown, was a reflection on the policy of the Government. In that case, it appears that over 2,000 electors who were entitled to be placed on the list, at the last revision, had left our country and gone to reside in a foreign country. That seemed to be a poor argument to use, coming from the source it did. In the interest of the country, and in the interest of honest elections, I hope that this Bill will become law.

Mr. TUPPER. I would like to draw attention to the argument that has been addressed to the House by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). It seems to me that hon. gentleman has not carefully read the provisions of the Bill now under consideration, since he addressed himself largely to the principle of "one man one vote." This Bill goes much further than that; this Bill is a much more drastic amendment to the franchise law than any proposition of that kind, because it can destroy a man with any vote, though he be a Canadian citizen holding property, having interests at stake in this country; it can destroy his influence and rob him of his franchise altogether. I may point out to the hon. gentleman that the proposed qualifications are based not upon "residence or domicile," but "residence and domicile." The Bill says that an elector must be resident and domiciled within the electoral district. So that if, for reasons that so often arise in a country like ours, with its enormous extent of territory and various industries and large districts over which business may be carried on, an elector having great interest, in any particular district for a season perhaps, or for temporary reasons removes his residence from the district in which his capital is invested, and in order to promote his business goes to another part of the Dominion, then by the provisions of this Bill he is deprived of the right of assisting in the control of the political interests of the country and of recording his vote at an election. If hon. gentlemen who are promoting this Bill have in view the principle they have stated, the language of the Bill is sadly astray. It does not assert the principle of "one man one vote," and that is the subject to which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat gave his exclusive attention. I merely rose to point out that fact, because in both of the sections there is the extraordinary proposition laid down, in support of which I have not heard an argument advanced, and that is, that it is expedient that a man in order to secure his vote at an election must keep his residence always and entirely within one electoral district in the Dominion. The proposition needs only to be stated, the clause of the Bill needs only to be read, to carry an answer at once to the mind of any reflecting man. I have heard no argument in support of the language of the Bill that a man in order to vote at any election must be resident and domiciled within the district in which he claims to be registered. The other remark of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seems a little at variance with the confident declaration he made a short time ago. The hon. gentleman said that within a few weeks he expected to be on this side of the House, and he is welcome, as the Minister of Justice suggests, whenever he comes. But I should like to point out to him that this seems a little at variance with his statement that the Franchise Act had been established by the vote a few nights ago, and a majority of the House having refused to repeal the Act the hon. gentleman, forgetting altogether the exuberant spirit in which he was then, now says we must bend our energies to the improvement of the measure. And so we should; but I am quite certain this is not a step in the right direction, and I claim that the hon. gentleman himself, since he is not converted to the principle expressly involved in this Bill, is not in a frame of mind that should lead him to support the motion for the second reading.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Like every good legislator, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), having first attempted to repeal an objectionable Act and found the majority in favour of its retention, bends his energies to the improvement of the Bill. No one can find fault with him for so doing; and that is the answer to the criticism which the Minister of Marine has just offered. With respect to the other point just referred to, I call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman's speech was delivered at the wrong time. The hon. gentleman has not attacked the principle of the Bill; he has simply spent a few moments in offering a few verbal criticisms on the language used. The question as to whether the words "residence" or "domicile" should remain in the Bill is one to be settled in Committee, and at present we are simply discussing the principle of the Bill and not its details. When we go into Committee, the hon. gentleman can then present his arguments, and strike out any words to which he takes objection. If he thinks the principle of the Bill is correct, he should vote for the second reading, and try to amend it in Committee. The main point now to decide, and it is involved in the amendment of the Minister of Justice, is whether the principle involved in the Bill, of "one man one vote," should be adopted, or whether a man should have a vote in every electoral district where he happens to have property. I am not going to repeat the arguments which have already been well presented, and which are in a nutshell. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has shown that whereas he happens to have three or four pieces of property very near each other, but in three different electoral districts, he has three votes, his neighbour who has ten times the property has only one vote. Logically the proposition is indefensible, and I do not think those acquainted with the practical working of the system as it now exists can defend it against the principle sought to be introduced. This is a fair, honest and square measure. Every man in the community capable of bearing arms and liable to be called on to assist in the defence of the country, being of full age and not being an idiot or under the ban of the law for having committed some crime, should have a vote, and if he has a vote he should have one vote and one vote only. I accede fully to the proposition that property always has had, and will continue to have, its legitimate and fair influence, and we should not add to that legitimate and fair influence an unfair and illegitimate influence by doubling or trebling the property holder's vote.

Mr. COCKBURN. I rise merely to direct attention to a statement made by the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of this Bill. He stated that the election law of Ontario gave almost universal satisfaction, that two elections had been conducted under that law and they proved its most satisfactory character. The hon. gentleman is himself a resident of the fair city of Toronto, he is a large property holder there, and he must be aware that it is there at most a two-thirds franchise and in many cases a one-third franchise. The hon. gentleman and the hon. member from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) have now taken to their hearts the principle of "one man one vote," but when the local elections come around they are content to find a law enacted under which two-thirds of a vote are given to the free and independent electors, or even only one-third, and how these hon. gentlemen can consistently occupy this position passes my comprehension.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Are you talking about the parish vote?

Mr. COCKBURN. No; but I am talking about the law enacted by the Ontario Legislature, through the misguided action of the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I should like my hon. friend (Mr. Edgar), if it is in his power, to endeavour to amend that Act, so as to do justice to the voters in the city in which he resides. As regards the remarks made by the hon. gentleman for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that we must deal at present with the principle of the Bill and not with the language, I always understood we were to deal with the words of a Bill and interpret those words, and this suggestion to change and mix matters in any such fashion is another illustration of the manner in which principles may be handled by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Before the question is voted upon by the House I simply desire to offer one or two observations on the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The hon. gentleman is mistaken, I submit, when he says the Bill I have introduced, and which stands on the Order paper for second reading, does not meet the objection of the member for Bothwell. I would not have referred to that Bill in this debate had not previous speakers done so. But now I deem it necessary that the House should know the extent to which the Bill I have introduced goes in this regard. The Bill I have introduced aims at preventing any person who has become a citizen of a foreign country from returning to this country and exercising the right of franchise. It only aims at disfranchising non-resident voters who are in that category. The hon. gentleman very truly observes that in the United States a man may declare his intention of becoming a citizen before the expiration of the allotted time during which he can become a citizen of that country. I may say to him and to the House that the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) has anticipated that objection and proposes to offer an amendment to this Bill when it comes before the House. That amendment will, I think, meet the objection urged by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in reply to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Justice. Now, with regard to the principle of the measure under discussion: We cannot close our eyes to the fact that the principle of property qualification is after all the principle upon which the franchise is based.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I say that it is the principle upon which the franchise is based. Any extensions of the franchise in other directions have been based upon considerations in the interest of farmers' sons and young men who have a certain stake in this country, and whose right to vote is surrounded by safeguards which place the franchise in that regard entirely independent of, and different from, what is known as manhood suffrage. The principle of property qualification naturally has been brought into this discussion and a comparison has been made by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar), between the working of the Dominion Franchise Act and the Ontario Franchise Act. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to what is a very serious evil in the working of the Ontario Franchise Act. That evil is, that it requires residence up to the time of voting to enable a person to vote under that Act. What is the result of this? The result is that thousands are disqualified under the working of the Ontario election law. Why are they so disqualified? Because before the day of voting comes around they have left their particular electoral districts, perhaps only a very short time before polling day, and hence they are wholly disqualified and cannot vote at all. Under the Dominion Franchise Act such a thing cannot take place, and the only objection that has been raised against it, is that it is a great expense, and a great inconvenience, and a serious trouble, and loss of time to the candidates in bringing outside voters in. I submit, Sir, that that does not in any sense affect the principle, and ought not to affect the principle, upon which the Dominion franchise is based, be it for good or evil, namely, the principle of property qualification. I only rose to make these observations, in order to repeat to the House that the remarks of the Minister of Justice with regard to the effect of the Bill I have introduced are strictly true, and the House will see when it is in committee on that Bill, that it will have that effect, and that if it is defective in any word it can be amended so as to produce the effect required.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The objections which have been urged to the second reading of this Bill by hon. gentlemen opposite have only served to show to the House how weak any opposition to it may be considered to be. The objection taken by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), is a weighty one, like this: You propose an amendment to the law of the Dominion, you think it could be amended; very well, but I think before you try your hand at amending that you had better try to amend the Act of the Ontario Legislature; a Legislature be it remembered in which the members of this House have no seat or no voice and nothing whatever to say in the matter. We would make great progress indeed in that direction. Then we have the very strong objections urged by the Minister of Marine that because there is a word in the Bill that does not exactly suit him, or that he thinks might not fully explain the object that the mover of the Bill has, although it has been clearly explained by the mover of the Bill and those who have followed him what the principle of the Bill is, and although the hon. gentleman knows what it is, yet because there is a word in the Bill that he thinks does not clearly express that idea, he holds it as a fatal objection to the measure. I would ask the hon. gentleman to apply that rule to any Bill introduced by the Government, even to the most carefully considered Bill introduced by the Minister of Justice, with all his ability, and if the Bill was to be rejected on the second reading and thrown out simply because there was one word or some words, or one idea, in the Bill that did not harmonize with his views, what legislation would we have? Why, take the Franchise Act of the Dominion, which we propose to amend in this direction. Does the hon. gentleman not know that when the Bill was introduced in 1885, and when its principle was affirmed by the House, it was considered for three months in committee, and when it came out of committee the person who proposed it would scarcely know it. Yet, the hon. gentleman takes exception to this Bill because there is a certain word in it objectionable to him, and he says that it should not pass its second reading. The hon. the Minister of Justice, who, I am bound to say, will make out a case, if a case can be made out, did not seem to consider this a fatal objection to the Bill. It is true that the Minister of Justice, in common with the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), said that we did recognize property as the basis of suffrage: but, as a matter of fact, it is not the basis, and if the argument of the Minister of Justice holds good, that a man by holding property in different ridings has a perfect right to be entitled to cast a vote in each riding, he might argue, perhaps, that these gentlemen had the same right in common with other citizens of acquiring property in different electoral divisions, and that then no injustice is done. The Minister of Justice will not fail to observe that if he uses an argument of that kind, in the using of such an argument he is doing an injustice to some classes of people, that he is making class distinctions and giving certain undue powers to certain classes in this community, because the hon. gentleman must know that there are many whose means will not enable them to acquire property in different counties. Will the Minister of Justice, and will hon. gentlemen opposite, take the view that because a man is not possessed of worldly means enough to acquire a property qualification in different counties, that he is less a true born Canadian, and less entitled to vote in making the laws of this country than the others? There is where the question comes in. The vital part of the present franchise law is to create class distinctions and to give an undue advantage to one man over that possessed by another in the community. I would ask the Minister of Justice if one man possessing property qualifications in several counties is entitled to cast several votes, would he say that a wage-earner, for instance, who earns twice three hundred dollars a year should have two votes? Suppose a man should happen to earn three hundred dollars in one constituency in six months, and to earn three hundred dollars more in another constituency during the remainder of the year, would the Minister of Justice give him two votes? No: the present franchise law does not say that. The objection taken to this Bill of my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is just a perpetuation of the old Tory doctrine that some men and some classes in this community shall have more weight and more influence than others; disregarding the fact that in this country, where the revenues are raised by customs and by excise, that the workingman, the mechanic and the artizan, owing to our system of taxation, is contributing as much to the revenues of this country as the man who may have property scattered through half a dozen different counties. Is it to be said that an honest, hard-working and tax-paying citizen of Canada, who may not have property scattered over different counties, is not to have the same rights as a more wealthy citizen of the country? The principle of the present franchise law in this respect is not right, and the principle of the Bill which is now proposed by my hon. friend from Ontario is, that in Canada those who are entitled to vote are those who have their stake in this country, who live in the country, who have to obey its laws, and pay its taxes, shall have a right to vote, other things being equal, and shall have as much power and influence in determining the election of a member of this House as any other person, save and except that legitimate influence referred to by the hon.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) which some men may have by reason of their study or superior knowledge of political affairs. That is the principle of this Bill: and in voting it down hon. gentlemen who do so vote against that principle, and declare that one man is entitled to more privileges and more rights under the franchise established by this Parliament than another. I believe in the principle of the Bill, and I propose to support it. If the hon. Minister of Justice has asked that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow or next week, or even for two or three weeks, in order that he might examine the Bill more closely, so as to make up his mind as to its merits, I would have been agreeable to granting him the time; but when he moves that the Bill be read this day six months, I fear that the House will not be then in session and I shall have to vote against his motion.

Mr. DENISON. The hon. member who spoke last referred to the two-thirds vote which exists in Toronto, and to the remarks of the member for Centre Toronto, and the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) suggested that we should have the same franchise for this Parliament as exists in the Province of Ontario. It is very well for him to suggest this change when he is in the cold shades of Opposition and can do nothing, whereas in Toronto, where his party are in power and have a chance to do something for the people, they only give us a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Two votes out of three.

Mr. DENISON. No; we have only two-thirds of a vote in Toronto, while other parts of the country have a full vote. The hon. member for West Ontario remarks that we ought not to have the trees and the ground represented; but, as the hon. member who spoke a moment ago said, what is the meaning of a vote? It means that those people who own the country, who have an interest in the country, should have a voice in the government of the country. It is not right that a man who comes here with his carpet bag, and who can go away in a moment, should have the same voting power as a man who is the owner of the soil. The people who own the country are the people who should rule and govern the country. I do not think it would be in the interest of Canada to allow anybody who can pack up his bag and leave the country at a moment's notice to have the same voice as we have. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), speaking of military duty, says they all have to serve their country; but we must not forget that those people who have no stake in the country, who can pack up their bag and go away at a moment's notice, are not in very much danger of doing military duty. The moment there is any work to be done, they might get out of the country. I shall not say any more; but I will vote for the six months' hoist.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that under the present law a great deal of difficulty arises from the outside vote. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) is making provision to prevent the outside vote from coming in. The members of the Government, I understand, made provision at the last election to bring them in. There seems to be a difficulty existing in the party; they are not in harmony on this question. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) wants to include the people who stay at home; the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) provides for that in his Bill, and then the hon. member for West Toronto will not support that Bill. It seems very difficult to please hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe that it was announced some time ago with a considerable flourish of trumpets that a great scheme was on foot to bring back from the United States many good Canadian citizens who went and settled there. I understand that a good deal of money was spent, and that officers are now employed and paid very high salaries with the view of bringing them back; and when we are endeavouring to bring them back by spending public money, we find the hon. member for Brockville introducing a Bill into Parliament to prevent them again becoming citizens and voting here.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No, no.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for West Ontario provides in his Bill that our people shall stay at home, and if we had a liberal policy we would keep our people in this country instead of having them settle in the States as they have been doing for years past. This policy of annexation pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite is one to be deprecated and condemned, and it is not to be wondered at that the hon. member for West Ontario should be endeavouring to prevent an evil that is sapping the foundations of the prosperity of the country. Every good Canadian and loyal man should deplore this condition of things and endeavour to remove it. Now, if we had the principle admitted of "one man one vote," it would be more in accord with the eternal principles of justice and right. Hon. gentlemen opposite have an idea that it is not the man that should vote, but that it is the soil: the man who has to cultivate and develop the country is to be debarred from voting, while the man who has accumulated a little soil, or treasure, is to have the cumulative vote. The principle of "one man one vote" is the principle adopted in the Province of Ontario, and the same principle is now being strongly advocated in England, and I would like to see our friends in the Government, who profess to have some love and devotion for England, strive in some degree to follow the example set there in this respect. When this principle is being taken up by leading statesmen in England, where property has had so many charms for the people hitherto, it is time that the Parliament of one of England's greatest dependencies should take up the question and imitate the example which will, no doubt, be set in England in a short time, by enacting here the principle of "one man one vote," and giving the world to understand that all men here are free and equal, that they all stand on the same footing, that one man is as good as another in this country if he behaves himself, that it is not the quantity of land he possesses that gives him the right to vote. Property after all is not a qualification to a voter. I think the day is not far distant when the Act that we have now will pass away, and when the other principle which is more in keeping with the principles of justice and right shall prevail. We have seen the evils of the present system. One admission has resulted from this discussion, and that is the admission of hon. gentlemen on the other side that there has been a large exodus of Canadians from Canada to the United States, whom they are now taking means to prevent coming back.

The hon. Minister of Justice has declared that a large number of these people came in to vote at the last elections. Well, Sir, they had been on the lists when the lists were first made out and had never been struck off, and the Minister says they were brought back to vote against the interests of the people of this country. And now we find the Government taking steps to prevent any of them coming in unless they will promise to vote for the Government candidates. It is all right when they come in to vote for the Government candidate, but it is all wrong when they do not. We do not go in on that principle. We are not holding for that principle. We are holding for the principle which the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has laid down, that a man must reside in the country in order to have a vote. I do not see why hon. gentlemen opposite should object to that. Their policy is different. When these people come back from the United States the hon. member for Brockville meets them with his Bill and says, you cannot vote here and become citizens, because you have resided a short time in the United States.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The Bill does not say anything of the kind.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think it was the hon. the Minister of Public Works, or if not, the hon. the Secretary of State—or probably it was the joint ability of both—to whom we are indebted for this great repatriation scheme, by which these people who had gone to the United States were to be brought back to Canada and made good citizens of. The House took a good deal of interest in that scheme. We were desirous of that result, but we are amazed to-day that the Government should put up a member of their party to prevent these people, when they do come back, from becoming citizens and exercising the franchise. It has been very well said to-night that one man may have $10,000 worth of property in one constituency and another may have $450 worth scattered over three constituencies, and the latter will have three votes while the former will have only one. When hon. gentlemen opposite take property as a basis, they are not logical in that provision. I hope the hon. the Minister of Justice will consider this matter a little, and if he will, he will alter his mind.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. During the next six months.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think if he will consider it before six months, he will withdraw his amendment, because, certainly, with the ability he has, he must see that it is part of the duty of his department to see that justice is done. You would almost imagine that from the title of his department, he will see that it is not just that one man with $450 worth of property distributed over three constituencies should have three votes, while another with $10,000 worth in one constituency has only one vote. I would ask the hon. Minister to get the officers of his department to consider that question; and if he does, I think he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. In the Irish Parliament which met in Dublin, there was a man known to history by the name of Sir Boyle Roche, who declared that we should not do anything for posterity because he did not see that posterity had done anything for us. I think we, in this Canadian Parliament, may rejoice that in my hon. friend we have a man who may go down arm in arm the pathway of history with that famous individual, for he has appealed to the Minister of Justice and to the party now in power, and in fact to this whole Parliament, speaking of some measure which is to be introduced in the British Parliament in the future, near or far, to imitate the example likely to be set by the British Parliament in a very short time. I am inclined to quote William Shakespeare and say: "O my prophetic soul, my uncle." To imitate an example that is to be given us in the near future, the features of which we cannot understand or have any idea of, will certainly require all the genius that belongs to the Treasury benches, reinforced however much it may be by whatever little talent there may be in the House. My hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) dealt with the principle of this Bill from the point of view of logic. Now, a great English statesman has said that nothing can be so foolish, nothing can be so impracticable, as to try to apply a rigid logical rule to political affairs.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How does the green-grocery policy suit you?

Mr. DAVIN. It would suit you well, but it would not suit me at all. You can imagine no political measure in which logical flaws cannot be found. If property is the basis of our franchise, as the hon. member from Brockville (Mr. Wood) very properly states, then it is perfectly right that men possessing property should be able to vote on that property. You can of course stand up like a young student in a college debating society, and say how anomalous it is that a man with ten thousand dollars worth of property in one district should have only one vote, while a man with two thousand dollars worth here and one thousand dollars worth in another district has two votes. But with property as the basis of our franchise, we may as well ask how utterly anomalous it is that a millionaire should have but one vote and a man with a house worth but three hundred dollars, his next door neighbour, has also one vote. You cannot exclude, Sir, from the practical affairs of life such anomalies as that. With reference to the criticism of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), of the remarks of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I consider that nothing could be more germane to the discussion or even to the principle of this Bill than the remarks he criticized. Remember, Sir, we are dealing with a very small Bill. The body of the Bill is in the very words criticized by the hon. Minister of Marine, and the principle must be wrapped up in the very words that constitute the operative part of the Bill; and surely it was a most proper criticism for the hon. Minister to point out that you had put a chain, so to speak, around the ankle of each man, when you require him, in order that he may have the right to vote, to have not only his domicile, but also that he shall be a resident in the district where he votes. And, as you have the term "resident" used, as well as "domicile," you must attach a meaning to each, according to the ordinary rules of interpretation, and, therefore, it was a most proper criticism to point out, that, according to the principle of this Bill, a man would be chained to the district. Now, I will take some trouble from the mind of my hon. friend in regard to the Bill of my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood). My hon. friend from Brockville does not wish to prevent anyone who desires to repatriate himself from doing so, but anyone who has become resident in a foreign country and who has foresworn his allegiance to Her Majesty, is to be forbidden from coming across the line and voting, and it is clear that, if he has gone across the line and has sworn allegiance to the Stars and Stripes, though he has property in this country, he should not be allowed to vote. There is the greatest possible difference between the two cases. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) declared that it was a Tory principle, that it made distinctions, that it put some men in higher positions than others. Well, Sir, if it be a Tory principle, it is a principle that has obtained up to the present minute in the most successful constitutional country in the world; it has obtained in the country, which, according to the words of John Bright, is the august mother of free nations. My hon. friend is a great Liberal. I do not know whether he can be called a Radical or not, but he can hardly be placed in a higher niche in the temple of liberty than Mr. Bright, and I know that Mr. Bright was strongly opposed to anything that looked to the principle of departing from basing suffrage on property, because he knew that, while that base remains, the state has a double bond, it has not only the bond of the individual interest in the affairs of the country but also the bond of the acquirements of the elector's sweat and thrift. It has this double bond for the performance of his duties as a citizen. The base upon which we have acted is the base of property. My friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) I think rather misapprehended the scope of the Bill. He argued that a man who possessed no property whatever may be as good a citizen as a man who possesses property. He might contribute as much to the revenue if he has an income, and there is a provision made for that already, so that a man who has contributed to the revenue and has an income is not excluded from the franchise. I admit that you cannot make an arrangement in which you cannot pick holes, and yet from the illogicality of the situation there may be advantages which it would be a mistake, from a statesmanlike point of view, to give up. As to what my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), and my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Denison) said, I think it was a fair criticism to point out, when Liberals here were talking as they were, that they were only allowed two-thirds of a vote in Toronto. My hon. friend near me said that the eternal right and fitness of things required this. He probably meant the unalterable rule of right and the eternal fitness of things. If he had used that Platonic phrase, it would have so pleasantly recalled my early studies that he might possibly have drawn me into his carrol. I shall vote with the Government on this Bill.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think now that the hon. gentleman has become an antique, he ought to be taken into the Cabinet.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on the motion of the hon. Minister of Justice, I wish to pass a few remarks on the two Bills now under consideration. I declare from the first that I am entirely in accord with the promoter of the first Bill. I believe a man should have only one vote. I must say that I am altogether favourable to this Bill, because I represent a county crossed by the Intercolonial Railway, which is an electoral machine in election times, by which its employés are enabled to vote as many as three times on the same day, when most of them are barely qualified to vote once. But, before discussing this Bill, I will observe that one thing always strikes me, whenever the debate falls on this question of electoral franchise. You never hear the hon. members on the other side of the House meet our arguments with arguments; but they turn on the provincial laws. They never fail to assail the laws of the Local Legislatures and to say that these Legislatures have passed bad laws. Thus, the other day, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) made a long speech—an eloquent speech, I must say—in the course of which he declared that he was opposing the Bill then under consideration, because Hon. Mr. Mercier had passed a bad law. This evening what answer do we get to our arguments in favour of the Bill now before the House? We hear the hon. members from Toronto say Hon. Mr. Mowat passed a bad electoral law, therefore we are opposed to this Bill. I believe it is paying a bad compliment to their friends in the Local Legislatures, and this condemnation of the local legislation is a poor excuse for approving that promoted by the Federal Government. I was saying a moment ago that I am in favour of the principle that a man should vote but once, and in favour of the present Bill on the ground that in the counties below Quebec which are crossed by the Intercolonial Railway, the employés are enabled to cast three votes. They first vote in Lévis, where some of them reside; then they vote at Fraserville where they get their pay; and then again at Ste. Flavie, because they sometimes sleep there during the week. There is not a member in this House who can gainsay this fact, and no one knows it better than the hon. Minister of Militia, who represents the County of Rimouski, for in one of the small parishes of that county, where only eighteen voters are on the list, more than a hundred votes were given at the last election by means of certificates from the returning officer given to employés of the Intercolonial. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is extremely dangerous. Moreover, on voting day the Intercolonial is used as an electoral machine. A train is put under steam at Point Lévis at nine o'clock in the morning, the employés having voted, the train is despatched at the country's expense, and the friends of the Government—for our friends are not allowed to board this train to which only those who bear the Conservative stamp are admitted—go to vote at Rivière du Loup, and in the afternoon reach Rimouski in time to cast their votes there. And all this is done at the expense of the country. These people give votes that they are not qualified to give, and often vote as many as three times without any qualification at all. Well, Mr. Speaker, would it be but for the sole purpose of preventing such an injustice, I would vote for the Bill now under consideration. As to the other one, that of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), I cannot favour it, for it often happens that people go to the United States for a few months without the intention of staying. They get naturalized in order to find themselves on equal footing with the Americans. I know that a large number of persons of my county only go to spend the summer in the United States. They go to Michigan where they are employed as shipbuilders; they work at loading ships, and if they are not naturalized they cannot belong to the ship labourers' societies and cannot get work. They take out naturalization papers with the only object of being on the same footing as the Americans in obtaining work. They only spend the summer there and come back in the fall to spend the winter in Canada. Consequently, if the hon. member's Bill was to become law, these people would be deprived of their vote, although they only go to the United States for a few months to earn their living, the policy of the present Government making it impossible for them to maintain themselves and their families. Now, there is another reason why the Bill of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) should be adopted. The Government has held that they were passing their Franchise Act for the sake of uniformity. They held that the qualification should be the same in all the provinces. Well, if the qualification must be the same, the voters should also be on the same footing; whatever be their social standing, whatever their wealth, whatever the amount of property they hold, they should all have but one vote. For all these reasons, and especially on account of the practice which I have mentioned as obtaining in the counties below Quebec which are crossed by the Intercolonial Railway, I will vote for the Bill of the hon. member for West Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. We find the operations of the Ontario law to be this: Before the last amendment giving manhood sufferage, and even then we find that many men who had property in the country, who were assessed upon property in the country, but were not resident in the place where their property was, were not allowed to vote. That is an injustice which no man should suffer, because it leaves the man in such a position that he has not the same interest in the country that he otherwise would have. That is especially the case in the towns in the Province of Ontario. But, how would that be if it were extended to the Dominion franchise? As to what was said by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) that the member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) had introduced a Bill to prevent Canadians from coming back to this country while we were spending millions to bring them back, I do not think he can have read the Bill so carelessly as to imagine that to be the fact. It seems to me to be the very reverse. It seems to me that that Bill asks Canadians not to take the oath of allegiance there as long as they have a stake in this country. Many Canadians retain a stake in this country by holding their property when they go abroad, and the Bill of the hon. member for Brockville will induce them to retain their interest in this country and not to take the oath of allegiance in the United States. If it had not been for the Bill which the members of the Opposition are trying to amend in this way, they would have suffered in the last election, and I am surprised at their present action, when I heard it stated in this House that 2,000 Canadians came across the line in the Province of Quebec, and an hon. gentleman said last night that he believed every man of them voted for the Reform party. Where would these men have been if the Bill of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) had been the law at that time? There would be no need for them to come here under that Bill, because, though they might still have a property interest in the country, they could have no say in the Government of the country as expressed by a vote. I think it is very important, as long as men have property in the country, that they should feel that they have a vote in the country, and there is no way better to give them an interest than to allow them to remain subjects of Her Majesty the Queen. Then, again it is said that the Dominion franchise is a restrictive franchise, and that we want manhood suffrage as they have it in Ontario. It is a fact that cannot be denied that, notwithstanding the very defective list, the last Dominion franchise list, that was said to be over two years old, there were more votes on that list in some constituencies, than were on the list of the Liberal Franchise of Mr. Mowat, which recognizes manhood suffrage, yet they are said to have a property qualification. It is true we have a property qualification, so small that every man who is an industrious man, and has his health, can have a vote under this franchise law. I think it is a very good one, and is better than the proposed Bill, which would give one man one vote, but would prevent many men having any vote at all if they did not happen to reside in the constituency where their property is located. I think we have a very much better system at present; therefore we should refrain from amending it. I believe the law will in a short time be acknowledged as good by almost every intelligent man in the country, when he comes to think of it on sober second thought, and freed from all political feeling under which he may now be labouring. I believe that the present principle is a much more healthy one than the principle of the proposed amendment. It is exactly in harmony with the system that has been found to be most effective, and I most strongly incline to the opinion that before many years the provincial law in the Province of Ontario will be amended. I think we should retain what we have got, because we find it to work well: we should retain it for the reason that it gives men an interest in coming back to vote, as long as they have property in the country, and prevents them from becoming citizens of a foreign power. It still gives men an interest in the country; they can use their franchise on behalf of the member who represents the locality where their property is; it gives them an interest in the country where they can vote in, perhaps, some one locality, because they may have properties scattered over the different parts of the country. Therefore, they have a larger interest in the country than men who are only wage-earners. The present law has been proved to be a good one in its working, and I think we should be very slow to amend it; therefore, I, for one, will vote for the six months' hoist.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have just heard the remarks made by my hon. friend for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) on the subject now before the House. My hon. friend complains of the manner in which the electoral rights are exercised in the counties which are crossed by the Intercolonial Railway. I believe that my hon. friend would do better to oversee the lists than to complain of the present law. As to the right which is claimed by certain electors—a right which is certainly not recognized by the present law, and according to which they would be qualified to vote on the ground of taking their meals or sleeping at a given place—such a right does not exist. Such electors have to own real estate at that place or draw a qualifying income. And if they have neither of these qualifications, my hon. friend has no excuse for allowing hostile electors so unqualified to be put on the voters' lists in his county. Mr. Speaker, I have always been, until to-day, opposed to the Franchise Act adopted by the Federal Parliament in 1885. Now I have thought proper to modify my opinion in this respect, for, since 1885, the circumstances have changed.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) And principles also.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Twice since 1885 the people have ratified the policy of the Government, and, consequently, I have felt that I should bow to the wishes of the majority. I have just heard my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) saying that my principles also have changed. I hope that when I have expressed my views on the subject, he will admit that I have not changed my principles, but that it is his new allies who have forced me to alter my views. In 1885, no Provincial Legislature had yet attempted any aggression against the Federal power. Since 1885, on the contrary, Local Legislatures have been seen to draw proscription lists against the employés of the Federal Government and deprive them of their vote. In order that such a thing might come to pass, the destinies of the provinces had to be in the hands of would-be Liberal Governments. Since 1885, events have taken place in different provinces which go to show the necessity of having in the future an electoral franchise for this Parliament. Indeed, in several provinces, owing to the spirit animating a majority of the population, there would no longer be any guarantee that the minorities should preserve their electoral rights, if the Federal Parliament were to decide that in the future provincial lists and provincial franchises are to obtain. We have of late been treated to a much-to-be-regretted spectacle, and that by a would-be Liberal Government, the Manitoba Government, which has thought it proper to violate the constitution of the province in order to abolish the Separate Schools and the French language in that Province. Now, Mr. Speaker, let, some day, this majority, regardless as it is of the rights of minorities, indulge the caprice of deciding that the French element be an obstacle to the progress of the Province of Manitoba, and pass such a tyrannical law as has been adopted in some of the States of the American Union, enacting that, in order to be an elector of the Legislature of Manitoba, it be necessary to know how to read and speak English. What should become, then, of the French minority, or of other minorities not acquainted with that language, in the Province of Manitoba, or in the North-West Territories, in the Province of Ontario or elsewhere, if the majority should pass such an iniquitous law? Mr. Speaker, a majority which has already violated the constitution of the province, to abolish the Separate Schools and the French language, could certainly pass such a law, which would be despotic, it is true, but, nevertheless, within the bounds of the constitution. Therefore, for the protection of the minorities, be they French or English, in the different provinces of confederation, it is important that this Parliament should have the control of the Federal franchise; and if my views on this matter have been modified, it is due to the arbitrary doings of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, of that of the Province of Manitoba, and of other Provincial Legislatures of the Dominion. I have heard my hon. friend the member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) complain with bitterness that every time the question of electoral franchise is discussed in this House, some one takes the liberty of criticising the franchise law of the Province of Quebec. It seems to me to be perfectly logical for members of this House to discuss a local law, when this Parliament is asked to say that in the future its franchise will be that which is determined by that local law. My hon. friend has, therefore, no ground to ask that we shall not discuss the local franchise laws. They necessarily have to be discussed, so that we may see whether they are good or bad, before adopting them as the basis of the federal franchise. Mr. Speaker, I have hardly heard, I must say, any argument capable of establishing that we ought to adopt the Bill presented by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). One essential thing is not to be lost sight of in this debate; that is, that the principle underlying the present franchise law is to be respected. This principle is, that to be an elector one must own real estate or have an income from real estate or otherwise. This principle being the foundation of this law, it is impossible to deviate from it, for its violation would be an attempt against the basis itself of the law. If it is absolutely intended that the franchise should extend to everybody, or, in other words, that universal suffrage shall be established, then I understand that a certain number of my colleagues in this House, favourable to that sort of franchise, should be in favour of any amendment violating the principle of land qualification as a basis of franchise for the Dominion of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, I warn the members representing rural constituencies to be very careful, for, in violating this principle, they forego a powerful safeguard of the electors, whom their mission is to represent and defend in this House. For, the very large majority, the almost totality of the electors of the rural districts want to preserve a franchise based upon real estate qualification. Besides, I think it the best principle, one which should be upheld in a new country like ours. It has been held that this principle establishes inequalities—that it is a Tory principle. Well, Mr. Speaker, I see nothing uniform, neither on earth nor in heaven, from what I am told. And if the Creator were to be judged of from what he has done on earth or in heaven, the Creator himself should be regarded as a Tory, having, as He has, created men in conditions unequal. It is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous, to find fault with the Government and with the principle of a franchise based upon real estate, because this principle will not give equal rights to all men. No more than in anything else, is it possible to give equal rights to all in electoral matters. Even with universal suffrage there is no perfect equality; for, there are men of great intellect, like my hon. friend from Montmagny, and like the hon. member for Bellechasse, and there are others in their constituencies who are their inferiors in intelligence and capacities of all sorts. You should give the latter a vote altogether insignificant and one much more extensive to all electors as well favoured as my hon. friends already mentioned. But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it, the franchise based upon real estate should be respected, for it is the franchise of the great mass of the Canadian nation; and if the laws are to be made for the majorities, none are better made than that which recognizes property qualification as the basis of the franchise. In our country, the mass of the population, I would say nine-tenths of the citizens, own real estate. Those of the electors who do not own any are tenants. As to the people who are neither real estate owners nor tenants, I hold that the majority of them are not in a condition to exercise properly the right of suffrage. We are often shown the example of European countries. We are told they are very advanced in matters of legislation; but if I judge from the state of society to be found there, I cannot conclude that the franchise they have given to the masses has done much to elevate character or develop civic or moral virtues. If we compare our laws with those made by the turbulent and wicked citizens who constitute a danger for the European societies, we must admit that the laws which in our country regulate the right of taking part in public affairs, are not inferior—whatever may be the opinions of certain Liberals in this House—to those in existence among the European nations. I do not propose to go any further, Mr. Speaker. I think I have pointed out the danger there would be in the adoption of the Bill of the hon. member for West Ontario. Only, I will say that, having modified my views on the franchise, after having been forced to do so by the illiberal legislation of the Liberal Government in the provinces, I intend to give in the future my full co-operation to any Government—may it belong to either of the parties in this House—which will offer any reasonable measure calculated to render the franchise law less expensive and more efficient in its application. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. members of this House for the attention that they have kindly given me.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) I wish to offer a few words of answer to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont). I was very well pleased to hear him explain why he had shifted from the position he had held for a few years in relation to this question of franchise. The House surely remembers that since 1885, that is, since the day the Franchise Act was introduced in this House, the hon. member for Bagot has always thought himself bound to vote against the principle embodied in the law so proposed by the Conservative party. The hon. member thought proper this evening to give us his reasons for the vote he gave the other day on the Bill for the repeal of that law. I think he would have done better had he then explained his course, instead of waiting and serving us to-day a speech which, under the circumstances, I regard as altogether untimely. For, Mr. Speaker, we are not discussing now the merits of the Franchise Act. We are not discussing now the principle of the franchise law. We are not discussing either what has been done in the Local Legislatures. What we are now at is the discussion as to whether we should adopt the principle embodied in the Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the principle of one man one vote. I, therefore, consider the remarks delivered this evening by the hon. member for Bagot as altogether out of place. However, Mr. Speaker, I shall take the liberty of answering them in a few words. The reason offered by the hon. member from Bagot for changing his principles in relation to the franchise law, is that the Provincial Legislatures have altered the election law in the Provinces of Quebec and Manitoba. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member remembers surely that, in 1885, the principle involved was whether the franchise in force in the provinces such as established by the Provincial Legislatures, or that proposed by the Federal Government, should be adopted. Consequently, the moment my hon. friend was declaring in favour of the principle hat the regulation of the franchise was to be left in the hands of the Provincial Legislatures, he was accepting all the consequences of that principle. He was submitting himself to whatever measures the Provincial Legislatures would ultimately enact on the matter. I, therefore, consider that the reasons given by the hon. member for his change of front are not at all logical. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bagot chiefly opposes the Bill now under consideration, on the ground that we are wanting the universal suffrage. Well, now, are we not virtually having universal suffrage? Is not universal suffrage to be found in principle in the Franchise Act? By the Act of 1885, have not almost all the interested ones a right to be put on the electoral list? What is going to be the effect of the Bill of the hon. member for West Ontario? It would afford one of the most efficient means of putting a stop to the unbridled corruption which is practised to-day. Under the present law, a large number of persons, under the pretence of bringing voters from a distance, are paid fares and disbursements, and all this involves a large outlay of money, for which there would be no occasion should the Bill introduced become law. With this law, all electors, or almost all, would be in the electoral district. They would be easily reached, no expenses would be entailed in bringing them, and one of the features of corruption would disappear from our political life. This is, Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons for which I am in favour of the principle of the measure submitted to us, and I shall be happy to vote for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, for my part, I own that I am beginning to be somewhat tired of constantly hearing accusations against a Government which has none of its members here to defend it. I am beginning to be tired of all those attacks against a law, no enacting clause of which is even mentioned. I am beginning to be tired of hearing insinuations based upon suppositions against the franchise law of the Province of Quebec. I defy any member of this House to justly find fault with a single word of that law, which is essentially based on principles of justice and of real progress from both material and moral standpoints. Let my hon. friend search this law; what will he find? A clause, proposed by one of his warm personal friends, which prescribes that no salaried servant of the Provincial or Federal Government, shall have a vote. I hold that this is just. When a man becomes the servant of a Government, he must mingle no more with the struggles of politics. He must withdraw from the field and become the servant of the public and not of a party; he must not expose himself, nor his family, to the risk of his being turned out of office on the morrow of a change of Government. But apart from this clause, which he does not like, what does he find to blame in this law? Does he object, for instance, to the teachers being given a vote? Will he find in this a principle contrary to liberty and progress in the country? The Government of Quebec has enacted a law as conservative in its principles and as liberal in its effects as it was possible to do. My hon. friend may examine the Statute-book, chapters 4, 5 and 6, 52 Victoria; he may search one by one all the sections; and he will see that this law is essentially favourable to public enlightenment, to representation based on the rights of property and intelligence. My hon. friend holds now that, in 1885, the Government had a right to violate the principle which he himself then defended—I then expressed no sentiment upon this matter—the principle of franchise resting with the provinces, that is, of leaving to the provinces the task of determining who shall represent them in the Federal Parliament. He now holds that the Government had the right to violate this principle; that it had the right of entrusting the preparation of the voters' lists to salaried officers, who think themselves in duty bound to make bad lists at the expense of the country, because they are the servants of the ruling power. He holds that the Government was right in doing so: and he takes this position in order to condemn an election law calculated to put an end to an odious reign of corruption. Mr. Speaker, when the result of elections in several constituences is changed by adding to the voters' lists fictitious electors that have been given qualification with public money, and who are carried from one constituency to another with public money, such practices are not calculated to raise a Government in the public estimation. This is what has been done. Let any one say what he pleases, but I state here, from personal knowledge, that the Intercolonial Railway, as my hon. friend from Montmagny so well put it, has been a vehicle of electoral corruption, and has falsified the expression of public opinion—and it is in the name of the rights of property that such a thing is condoned; and it is axle greasers and car sweepers that are taken to thus represent property. They are given qualification in three or four counties, and they are carried from one to the other with public money to slavishly vote for the party in power. Let my hon. friend study the local law which he attacks, and when he shall have passed to the Opposition he will better understand the evils of the present system. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I, as much as any one, believe that the Government should be very particular in the choice of the electors, of those who shall choose the members of Parliament. For my part, I am opposed to the principle of universal suffrage, because no nation in this world can be found composed entirely of intelligent and honest people, and there must necessarily be something to distinguish between those who deserve being electors and those who do not. This distinction is primarily to be found in property. Those who acquire or who preserve a property offer thereby a guarantee. This distinction is again to be found in the income which a man earns by his work. It ought also to be found in education, and I would favour a law by which a man, as Garcia Moreno had in the Republic of the Equator, should be required to know how to read and write before being a voter. I would like that wealth, property and income should not be the only qualification for a voter: I would also like a qualification based upon intelligence, upon the knowledge, theoretical and practical, which a man has had the industry and courage to acquire. The Quebec provincial law provides for all that. It has, nevertheless, as well as the Dominion law, made a great mistake—it has extended the franchise to the sons of farmers, on account of the father's wealth or property. It is very fine, on the face of it, to give a vote to a farmer's son: but go into the family, and look around. You will find the father of one mind and the sons of another. You introduce dissention in the families.—You destroy the father's rights and authority. And yet, the family is the basis of society. For my part, I regret this innovation. No doubt, a Government which goes before the people, and says to thousands of farmers' sons, "We have qualified you to vote," holds a fine trump. But if you consider the principles which must hold when you want to form a prosperous, peaceful and happy society, you must be careful not to destroy fraternal authority. However, all parties have united in this matter, and it would be useless now to find fault. What, then, is there to be found in the Quebec law which should turn one from the principles he defended in 1885? What, then, is there that has changed?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The Manitoba law.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) The Manitoba law, of which the hon. member spoke, is not passed yet. However, since my hon. friend wants to speak of Manitoba, I will follow him on that ground. If a Manitoba law should come to pass infringing on the rights of the French, as my hon. friend just supposed, we would then appeal to a Government which, I hope, would be mindful of those rights, and such a law would be disallowed. I am casting no blame in this upon the present Administration. The law in question is not yet passed.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE. (Translation.) I will point out to my hon. friend, that we have universal suffrage in Manitoba, since the Liberal Government is in power.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation.) It is possible that universal suffrage may exist in Manitoba. I am not discussing that now. But, if that law is bad, why has not my hon. friend asked his friends, to whom he is so devoted, to disallow that law? If the Province of Manitoba ever passes a law abolishing the French language, in the matter of franchise, Providence, I trust, will give us a Government regardful enough of our rights to disallow such a law. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the present Bill should have given rise to so much discussion. What does it aim at? It proposes that when time comes for choosing the men to be entrusted with the government of this country, each elector shall have but one vote. Let us take, for instance, a gentleman's son, with much more money than intellect, and who qualifies himself in ten counties around Montreal. He can vote ten times. Another man by the side of him, who has passed his life in study, who knows politics, who is honourable and competent in every respect, if he has spent his time in intellectual pursuits instead of bending his mind to money-making, shall have but one vote. It is in the name of property qualification that redress for such abuses is opposed. I say that the principle of property qualification is not involved in the proposed Bill. This Bill does not alter the franchise. It only proposes that a man shall vote once in a general election, and I believe that such a principle is correct. The reason given in favour of this Bill by my hon. friend who had the floor before me (Mr. Brodeur), is a complete proof of the soundness of this principle. What do we see in a general election, on one side as well as on the other? Forty or fifty thousand voters are absent. How much does that cost the friends of the Government and those of the Opposition? Money has to be spent to have these voters brought. Friends of the Government spend lavishly. Those of the Opposition have less money, but they also have to pay. Candidates ruin themselves, and when they reach Parliament, jobbery is rampant. The public chest is raided to reimburse the party. I appeal to the patriotic sentiments, to the sense of justice of my hon. friends on the right, and I ask them if they, who have the power in hand, should not take the initiative in measures calculated to put an end to this painful necessity, which leads members to join bands of plunderers in attacks on the public chest, because they have been obliged to go to ruinous expenses to get elected. Well, this Bill proposes a means of doing away with this dire source of corruption. When a man shall have to be a resident of a constituency in order to have a vote there, you will not be forced any more to spend a hundred, two hundred and even three hundred dollars to fetch voters from abroad. It will have a tendency to purify the political atmosphere. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why this Bill should be made a party affair. In a question of purity in elections, every one is equally interested. Let the Bill come from one side or the other, it should make no difference, provided an election system be found in which the francnise be truly the application of a right resting on the dictates of reason and of equal justice for all.

Mr. EDGAR. With every desire to give full weight to the arguments of hon. gentlemen who have opposed this Bill, I must say that I do not think very much light has been thrown upon the subject by their speeches since the six months' hoist was moved by the Minister of Justice. I also think it must have struck the House that the Minister of Justice, in his remarks, did not use his accustomed breadth of argument and skill in marshalling facts, when he set out to argue against this measure. However, we have had a few lively speeches. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in his own light and airy fashion, undertook to amuse the House at the expense of the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), and he accused him of imitating an English example which had never taken place. Well, now, I think the member for Assiniboia was altogether wrong in his facts, and the member for South Grey was quite right, because in bringing forward this principle that we advocate on the second reading of this Bill, we are following the example of the great leader of the Liberal party in England, who has laid down one man one vote as the principle of the Liberal party there. The hon. member quoted Mr. Bright as a great authority against this principle. I defy him to produce, now or hereafter, any statement or argument of Mr. Bright against the principle of this Bill. That there may be no doubt whatever about the position of Mr. Gladstone, whom I, for one, and every Liberal in this House, I am sure, are proud to follow, I will quote what Mr. Gladstone said on this subject no longer ago than the 23rd October last, when he made a speech at West Calder, in Scotland.

"I trust that we of the Liberal party are ready, when we get rid of this majority that terms itself unionist, to go on a little further, and by the abolition of their faggot, and plurality of votes to lay down the principle and give effect to the principle of what is called succinctly one man one vote."

So I think that the hon. member for Assiniboia took a wrong premise for his argument and his wit on that occasion. Now the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) came to the rescue of his colleague from the Centre (Mr. Cockburn), and undertook to explain that in some mysterious way the electors of the city of Toronto in elections for the Provincial Legislature had been disfranchised. Well, now, whatever objections have been made to the experiment of minority representation which has been introduced in the city of Toronto, certainly no objection can be made on the ground that it disfranchises parties there. The hon. member for Centre Toronto knows full well that in elections for the Ontario Legislature, every single voter in that city can vote for two candidates. If a man has only one vote in the whole city he can cast his vote for two candidates; therefore, the citizens of Toronto cannot complain of not having votes enough at their disposal. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman assigned a task to me which I must modestly decline; he suggested that I should introduce a clause in my Bill, or introduce legislation here, to set the representation of the city of Toronto right, according to his view. I must leave that to the distinguished genius of my hon. friend from Centre Toronto, because I cannot at present see how, by legislation in this Chamber, we can set the legislation of the Ontario House right. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) stated that our franchise is based on property qualification. Now, I am satisfied that on reflection and research he would take that statement back, because it is not based on property qualification. Besides, a dozen instances which have been given to-night, by myself and others, in which it is not based upon property qualification; it does violence to the principle of property qualification in distinct terms. Take the case of income; take the case of a wage-earner, earning $300 a year, half of it, or more than half of it, may be wages taken in the shape of board. He has a vote that is not based on property qualification, not based upon an educational or intelligence test, either. If we look at this Franchise Act there are in all eight different classes of franchise, and out of these eight, six are based on a residential qualification, so it would be much more fair to say that our franchise law was based on a residential qualification rather than property qualification. That is the principle which I propose to adapt to the only two other qualifications that are not based on residential qualifications. The Minister of Marine made a remarkable discovery about my little Bill. He seemed to come to the conclusion, as far as I can make out, and he was followed in that by the hon. member for Assinibois (Mr. Davin), that there is something in the Bill which would deprive a man of his vote, if he changed his residence before an election, if he did not continue his domicile in the county where his name appeared on the list. There is no such proposal or suggestion in the Bill. The word "domicile" is introduced in order that residence may be more clearly defined. There is no better test of residence than to say it shall be the domicile. "Residence" is a looser or larger term, and by requiring "domicile" to be connected with "residence," it defines it in a proper and safe way. From the arguments of some hon. gentlemen one would suppose that the Dominion Franchise Act does not say anything about "domicile" in connection with residence. It does so very distinctly. Take the case of a farmer's son. He must be a resident within the electoral district, and he must also be with his father one year. If that is not "domicile," I do not know what is. If the father is dead, he must not only be resident but he must be domiciled with his mother. So it is in the case of an owner's son. The Ontario Act, with which fault has never been found in that particular, requires that residence and domicile shall go together. I have heard of a case in the city of Toronto where the residence that is required for an income voter under the Dominion Act was claimed to be a man's office. A gentleman living out of the city was assessed for income in the city, and he was prepared to take the oath of residence. Although he was a lawyer and should have have known better, he did take the oath that he was a resident, and voted on income, swearing that he resided in Toronto, whereas he lived out of the city and only had a city office. I am sure he acted wrongly, unintentionally, of course, in taking the oath. I think I am right in saying that the courts have otherwise interpreted "residence;" and in order to make it clear, it is a proper and wise provision to couple domicile with residence, so that there may be no misunderstanding. If we are to have a vote on this motion to-night, as I hope we shall, I hope it will not be taken with a misunderstanding of the meaning, scope or object of this proposed legislation. It is not proposed to give universal suffrage, it is not proposed even to enlarge the franchise, it is only proposed to place a proper limitation on the franchise in the interests, I think, of the whole community.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1891, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 4th June, 1891.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 5th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PETITION OF WILLIAM PUGSLEY.

Mr. DAVIN moved that the petition of William Pugsley, praying that leave be given to present the petition of the promoters of the Regina and South-Western Railway, be now read and referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC HARBOUR CONTRACTS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. GIROUARD presented the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it the intention to make any motion with reference to the appearance of the witness, Michael Connolly, who is mentioned in the report?

Mr. GIROUARD, I presume a motion of that kind cannot be made until the papers are printed for the use of all the members; consequently the motion cannot be made before next Monday.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With respect to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, presented to-day, no doubt its adoption should be moved and action taken on it by the House. I thought, however, and I consulted the sub-committee on that point, that it might be better to move it on Monday, and in the meantime the report presented to-day, containing as it does a synopsis of the evidence and proceedings of the Committee on this part of the enquiry, should be printed in the Votes and Proceedings in order that, by the time the witness was summoned to the bar, the members of the House would have before them all the evidence and all the facts. I hope, therefore, the House will consider I will be prepared to move on the subject on Monday, and that hon. members will take this as a notice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman, of course, will understand, that I did not suggest that any positive action should be taken by the House in regard to this report. I merely suggested it was advisable that the witness who had been reported by the sub-committee as in contempt, should be ordered to be in attendance at the bar of the House, so that, if necessary, he could be examined. I did not suggest that any action should be taken. That course could be taken without interfering with any subsequent action to be initiated with respect to the witness.

Mr. EDGAR. Unnecessary delay will take place unless action is speedily taken. The witness is supposed to be in attendance before the Committee, and, if the House proposes to take any action, it is desirable it should be taken on Monday.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that this point will present itself to the Minister of Justice.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection, and I will attend to the matter during the day.

PAIRING OF MEMBERS.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege, and desire to refer to some observations made by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) during my absence. The hon. gentleman made the following statement :—

"Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to a personal matter. After the vote the other day on motion to adjourn the debate in connection with the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) got up and said that I had been paired with another gentleman. I stated then, and I repeat to-day, that I had distinctly declined to be paired with anyone before I left Ottawa. I have enquired about the matter since, and I find that I was not paired for that vote, but that I was paired previous to it without my consent and knowledge. I regret that the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not now in his seat. I will not say any more on the question to-day, but I will not let the matter rest here. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has had further information on the matter since he spoke, and if he does not take back the insinuation thrown out against me I will not accept any pair in future so long as he is head whip of the Conservative party. I want to be respected, and I presume that when the head ministerial whip knows the facts he will make them known to the House, but I will not tolerate being charged by any whip with breaking what I consider to be my word of honour. I was not paired for the vote in question. I did not know that I was paired for any vote at all, and if I had known I would have said distinctly that I declined to be paired. There are some remarks of the member for South Leeds which I wish to be struck out of the Official Debates, and I will refer to the matter further when the hon. gentleman is in his seat."

All I can say in regard to the matter is this: I had on my desk that evening when the vote was being taken, as I have to-day, a list of the pairs as they stand recorded in the pair book in the whips' room. I have a list placed on my desk every day, and I have one to-day. The night that vote was taken I had such a list. On that list were the names of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) and the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) as having been paired with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Dyer) and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier). After the vote was taken I asked to have the.

names read, to be certain that the names of those hon. gentlemen had been called Having heard them, and before the vote was declared, I rose, as it was my duty as head whip to do, and made this statement:

"I notice by the pair book that the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris) has paired with the hon. member for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers): the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) has paired with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Dyer); and the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) has paired with the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier)."

To that the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) said:

"That is not correct as far as I am concerned."

The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) said:

"I refuse to pair with anyone."

Then I said:

"I will read the pair book."

And in the meantime I had sent out for the pair book, and it was on my desk. But the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) interfered, and said: "Is this in order?" When you, Mr. Speaker, ruled it was out of order; and there the matter dropped. The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), in his statement, said: "I have received further information since." I enquired from the clerk of the whips, and he wrote me a letter to this effect:

"WHIPS' ROOM,
"June 5th, 1891.

"DEAR MR. TAYLOR,—The pairs between Messrs. Dyer and Lavergne, and Pelletier and Langelier, were dictated to me by Messrs. Fréchette (Megantic) and Brodeur (Rouville), and were entered by me in their presence on Friday afternoon last as follows: From 4 p.m. Friday, 29th May, 1891, until 8 p.m. Monday, 1st June, 1891.

"Both pairs read the same, and were made and entered at the same time.

"Yours sincerely,

Here is the pair book, and the entry reads as follows:—

"Mr. Dyer pairs with Mr. Lavergne, from 4 p.m. Friday, May 29, until 8 p.m. June 1. Pair 66. Mr. Pelletier, Ministerial, pairs with Mr. Lavergne, Opposition, from 4 p.m. Friday, May 29, until 8 p.m. June 1."

These pairs are so recorded. I made no statement except those recorded in Hansard, and I simply drew attention to the fact that those names were entered in the pair book, so I have nothing to retract. But I have learned this since, in conversation with Mr. Fréchette, the whip on this side, and Mr. Brodeur, the whip on the other side, that they had agreed to the pairs, and that they both went into the room and so had them recorded. My opinion is this, and, I think, I am borne out by the facts, that the whip of the Opposition did not notify the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), or the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), that he had paired them, and they, consequently, voted. But I drew attention, as it was my duty to do, to the fact that they were paired, and my hon. friend, Mr. Fréchette, said the pair was made until 8 p.m. Monday. So far as I am concerned, I have nothing to do with it, as I was not present, further than the entries in the pair book, the statement I made was based on the entries in that book. I do not think either hon. member had been advised by their whip that they had been paired. These are the statements I have obtained from the clerk, and from Mr. Fréchette.

Mr. BRODEUR. I desire to say a few words in reply to the hon. gentleman. On Friday afternoon the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Fréchette) came to ask me to get a pair for the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Dyer). On the advice of my friends I had these members paired with the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) and the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) for the day only, and I had these names entered, not in a book, but on a list which was affixed in the Government whips' room. Then, when these names were written on the list, I went away, and I saw on Tuesday that these names had been entered in a book. I saw that this book must be signed by the whips on either side, but I could not see either the signature of the Opposition or of the Ministerial whips to it. I did not see any book at the time the pairs were made, and the only thing I did see was a list attached to the wall in the whips' room, and on that list the pairs were mentioned as for Friday afternoon. I, therefore, do not understand how these hon. gentlemen could be paired for Monday. More than that, I met the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) on Monday morning, and I was so much under the impression that the hon. member was not paired after three o'clock in the afternoon of Monday that I did not say a single word to him about it. I was convinced at the time, as I am convinced now, that these hon. gentlemen were paired only for Friday, and the pairs were entered in my presence, not in a book but on a list attached to the wall. I learned only after this that there was a book for entering the names. I did not know that the person in the whips' room was clerk of the whips, because I asked the supposed clerk to make a list for me and he said that he was only the clerk of the Government whips and had nothing to do with the Liberal whips. That is the way we are treated in this House.

Mr. LANGELIER. I trust that this discussion will bring about some reform in the manner of recording the pairs. I see in the Hansard for the 1st June, after the vote on the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that my name is mentioned among a number of pairs. My name appears as having voted and also amongst the pairs, and it is very important that we should know upon whose authority that entry has been made in the Official Debates. It is a very serious affair that such entries can be made in the official record of the House without our being able to know by whose authority the entry has been made. Was it done by the authority of the chairman of the Debates Committee, or on whose authority was the entry made? I see that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who is chairman of the Debates Committee, says that he never gave such authority, and I want to know on whose authority this was done. Mention has been made of a book for pairs, but the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), who is one of our whips, has told me, as he has repeated to the House, that since this occurred he for the first time heard there was such a book, and he never before was called upon to sign the book or to see it. If it is the secretary for the hon. member for South Leeds

(Mr. Taylor) who keeps that book, we have no control over it and we would be completely at the mercy of that gentleman. I do not know him and I have nothing to say against him, but I maintain that, in this House, both parties should be on the same footing. The Liberal whips should be respected and treated as the whips on the other side are, and if not there should be no whips at all and each member should steer his own course without any reference to the whips. Our whips are not allowed to have a room of their own, they are not allowed to have a secretary; the secretary who is called the secretary of the whips says he has nothing to do with our whips, and, as I am informed by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), he refused to do anything for him, as he said he was the private secretary of the head ministerial whip. If the record in the Hansard is made on the information supplied by that gentleman, I decline to be bound by it, and I call the special attention of the chairman of the Debates Committee to the fact that entries are made in the Official Debates which are not correct, and without any warrant for making such entries. It is a very serious matter if we are exposed to entries being made on the official record which are not correct, but which will go down to posterity as being correct. It is a serious reflection on me to see my name printed in the official record, which will go down to posterity, as having paired and voted at the same time. That is not correct, and it never would have been entered in the official record, if there had been some one to supervise the proceedings. It should be now erased. I insist that in future no entry should be made in the Official Debates except on the authority of the committee, and we shall be able then to have recourse against the committee, if anything wrong is done. This entry is an unwarranted reflection on my character, because it is admitted now that it is not correct. The hon. member for South Leeds said the other day, when the vote was taken:

"I notice by the pair book that the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris) has paired with the hon. member for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers); the hon member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) has paired with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Dyer); and the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) has paired with the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier)."

The hon. gentleman admits now that I was not paired.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not make any such admission, and I think I am prepared to prove now by one of the members who was present with the hon. member, Mr. Fréchette, that the pairs were made.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. member stated that I had nothing to do with it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think your whip made the mistake that he did not inform you.

Mr. LANGELIER. The statement was that I had paired when I never had paired.

Mr. TAYLOR. I said that I noticed by the pair book that you had.

Mr. LANGELIER. I say that the pair book proves nothing at all. The pair book is the statement of the hon. member and he is contradicted by the statement of another hon. member whose word is as worthy of belief as his.

Mr. TAYLOR. There was a misunderstanding about it.

Mr. LANGELIER. There can be no misunderstanding, for I never paired, and I know nothing about it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may say that I have nothing at all to do with the printing of names in the Hansard. It has been always the rule that the pairs in existence at the time the vote was taken should be sent to the press, and, I presume, also to the Hansard, but I know nothing of the printing of the pairs in the Hansard, nor do I know by what authority they go there. I will say as I stated before, that I think the responsibility for this misunderstanding rests with the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur).

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course the hon. gentleman will see that this is merely a matter of opinion.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend from Megantic (Mr. Fréchette) and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) are the parties responsible, and my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. Dyer) corroborates the statement of the hon. member for Megantic to me that they had paired until eight o'clock.

Mr. DELISLE. I am not in any way interested in this debate, but I must state to the House that, after having heard the remarks made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and the remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), I thought proper to accompany the hon. member for Rouville to the whips' room; and there it was stated before me by the keeper of the book that he had received the list signed by both the Conservative and the Opposition whips, but that those sheets were lost, and that he had taken upon himself to enter them upon the book. At the same time he stated that he never cared about the signature of the whips, because, when some sheets of that kind came to him he entered them in the books as if the pairs were made for the whole day without caring about the hours when the members should be here. I state that, because I was a witness of it, and I think the House should take some steps to avoid such disagreeable things in the future.

Mr. DYER. It may, perhaps, be as well that I should make a personal explanation of what I know of this matter. On the evening of Friday last the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Fréchette), knowing that I desired to obtain a pair, came to me and intimated that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) had told him that one of their men desired a pair. I met the two gentlemen on Friday night, when they said that they had arranged a pair for me with the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) until six o'clock on Monday of this week. I said that six o'clock would not do me, and I wanted it arranged until twelve o'clock. They said, very well, and left me. To my surprise I found later on that the arrangement was not kept, and the hon. member for Megantic told me on Tuesday that the hon. member for Rouville had told him after leaving me that he could only make the arrangement till eight o'clock in the evening of Monday. I had not the pleasure of meeting the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska at all.

Mr. TROW. I regret exceedingly that this misunderstanding has taken place. I know nothing of it, and had no connection with it myself. As a rule, I have had the responsibility of all the pairs up to this session for many years, and we have worked harmoniously together: prior to this session we have scarcely had any mistakes. I know no more honourable men in this House, or in this Dominion, than the hon. gentlemen who are accused of having voted while they were paired. I am satisfied that they were entirely innocent of the knowledge that they were paired, or they would have been the last to vote under such circumstances. I presume some little mistake must have taken place with the clerk, in entering the time, as to whether it was three o'clock or eight o'clock. I have a book of pairs, and I also have an office—a very indifferent and uncomfortable one. I do not think I have been in it for an hour this session, for I am afraid it would cause my death in a short time. However, I have no complaints to make of the Government's treatment of me in that respect, although they have removed me from time to time. However, we keep our separate books, and the head whip of each party signs every pair that is entered in the books. In regard to members being placed in the false position of having voted and being paired on the same question, I can hardly understand why that should take place, because members who pair, as a rule, are anxious that the public should see that they have not shirked the vote, and, therefore, they leave their names with me, or with the Conservative whip, so that they will be published: and the first opportunity, we give to the reporters the names of those who paired, and they find their way to the press. It is evident that there has been a pure misunderstanding in this instance, and no intentional wrong.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). I want to answer a question put by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier). He asks on whose authority the pairs are published in the Debates. I told him it was not on the authority of the Debates Committee. It has been done at the desire of the whips, and it was a custom in the last Parliament. The hon. member will find in each volume of the Debates a list of the pairs on the principal votes during the session, and it has been understood that a list of the pairs would be sent to the reporters. There has been no order made on the subject by the Debates Committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As considerable unpleasantness has resulted from the present misunderstanding, I think it should be arranged to avoid a similar occurrence in the future. This could be done very simply by arranging that every pair should be entered in the books of both whips and signed by the senior whips. If that simple precaution were observed, there would be no unpleasantness.

Mr. LAURIER. It appears to me that, in justice to my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), and the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), they should not appear to have both paired and voted at the same time, and the entry in the Debates should be erased. Of course there is a misunderstanding somewhere. I do not wish to accuse anybody of doing anything wrong; but I think orders should be given to have this entry rectified.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course, if that is done, this whole discussion should be left out, and everything with reference to it.

QUEBEC HARBOUR CONTRACTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That Michael Connolly, the witness named in the first report of the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections, be ordered to attend at the Bar of this House on Monday next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

CATTLE QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

Mr. BOWELL. The quarantine regulations governing the importation of cattle from the United States as well as from England have not been removed, nor can they be, under the understanding which now exists between the Imperial Government and Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is there any danger with reference to the importation of dead meat?

Mr. BOWELL. There never has been any regulation covering the importation of dead meat, in the way of restriction.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MURRAY. I find in the Toronto Empire of yesterday an article reflecting on my conduct as a member of this House, and I desire to make a little explanation in order to put myself right. With the consent of the House I will read the article:

"The presumption these days of some of the Grit members is as offensive as it is unwarranted, but nothing that has yet transpired has in any way equalled the intolerable arrogance to-day of no less a personage than Mr. Thomas Murray, ex-member of the Ontario Legislature, ex-sheriff of Renfrew, and now M.P. for Pontiac, by grace of two Conservatives having run and allowed a Grit to slip in between them. Everybody knows that the members' rooms in the House are absolutely private. The Conservatives have their room, and they would no more dream of going into No. 6, the Grit room, than they would of entering Hon. Mr. Laurier's bedroom at the hotel during his absence. Yet, Mr. Murray—no green young member, but an old parliamentarian—this afternoon walked into the Conservative room——"

Mr. LANDERKIN. That was terrible.

—"accompanied by a secretary, coolly took possession of a table, and, with a nerve that was about an equal mixture of ignorance and impudence, proceeded to dispose of his correspondence. An attendant was called and Mr. Murray was requested to retire. He did so."

I must confess I was not aware that there are distinctive apartments for both parties in this House, and I did innocently walk into this room, which, I now understand, is reserved for the Conservative members of this House, accompanied by one of my constituents, a young man, who came to me to apply for a situation. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but such are the facts. This young man was out of employment, and as I employ a great many men in my different branch stores, he applied for a situation in one of them. I was anxious to know what kind of a hand he wrote, and asked him into this room in order that he might give me a sample of his handwriting. Whilst he was writing the letter, some gentleman—I do not know who he was—who was in attendance, came to me and said, "Why, this is the Conservative room." I said, "Is that so, I was not aware of it:" and I immediately left. I saw about half a dozen members in the room with whom I was not acquainted, with the exception of one gentleman. I think the hon. member for Hamilton, whom I met passing out, and to whom I said that I was not aware this was the Conservative room reserved exclusively for Conservative members. To my surprise, I find the reporter of the Empire has stigmatized my innocent action as somewhat very offensive. I may have offended some gentlemen in the room at the time, but, if I did so, it was unintentional. Judging by the Conservatives generally with whom I am acquainted, I do not think that many of them are so thin-skinned as to find fault with my going into their room on that particular occasion. I have been told that many Conservatives frequently come into room No. 6, which is set apart for the Liberals. For my part, I have only been in No. 6 once since I came to the House, and I do trust that when our friends come into power and we have the use of this very convenient room——

Mr. SPEAKER I think the hon. gentleman has proceeded far enough.

Mr. MURRAY. During my experience in the Ontario Legislature, we had no such rules. Here I am in a different atmosphere, but I do not know that there is any necessity for me to say anything further. Perhaps I have said too much, but I wish to impress on the House that I had no intention to infringe on the rights of the Conservative members; I would be very sorry to do so; and I think the attack made on me by the gentleman who writes for the Empire is utterly unwarranted.

MANITOBA SCHOOL ACT.

Mr. DEVLIN. I asked the other day the Minister of the Interior for information regarding the papers connected with the Manitoba School Act, and he said there would be no objection to bringing them down. When may we expect to have them?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have no recollection of having given such a reply, as none of the documents are in my department. I will find out where they are, and, no doubt, means will be taken to have them brought down.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Some of them are certainly in my department and will be ready in a few days. When the hon. gentleman spoke on the subject I thought, perhaps, there were some in the Department of the Interior, to which he has referred.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 99) respecting the settlement of accounts between the Dominion of Canada and the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and between the said provinces (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 100) for the settlement of certain accounts between the Governments of Canada and Ontario respecting Indian lands (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 101) further to amend the Act respecting trade marks and industrial designs (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

SUPPLY—THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. CHARLTON. The debate upon the question under the consideration of the House has occupied a considerable length of time, and I do not propose to detain the House for very many minutes on this occasion. I wish briefly to review some of the points made by my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the last night this question was under discussion. The hon. gentleman took the position that the motion was made by my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, without being based on any evidence, or without his procuring any evidence, to justify him in making the motion. The charges made against the High Commissioner of Canada in Great Britain by the leader of the Opposition, are, that he engaged in an election contest in Canada while occupying his position in England, that he traduced and vilified the character, not only of individuals, but of a political party in this country, and that he made an attack in England and in Canada upon a private corporation. It was hardly necessary, until the denial had been made by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that evidence should be laid before this House bearing out the charge made by the leader of the Opposition, as the facts are notorious. The Minister of Marine tells us that this matter should be dealt with by a special committee. The evidence is before the country, and is before the House, and can be easily obtained. There is no necessity for a special committee. The great Court of Inquisition of the Dominion is called upon to deal with the question which has been laid before the House of Commons of Canada.

I did sympathize with the hon. gentleman in the warm defence he made of the High Commissioner, who is a near relative of his. I thought it was natural that he should warmly defend his father, and it is not a very pleasant task to have to follow him in his defence of the High Commissioner. He tells us that, when the High Commissioner was in Canada on the occasion before the last election, he was received with the greatest degree of politeness by all members on this side of the House, with one notable exception, that of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is very true that Sir Charles Tupper was received with politeness on this side of the House, and we will always treat Sir Charles Tupper with politeness, but at that time we supposed that he was advocating a cause which would entitle him to the respect of the Liberal party. He had recently been in Washington, and, as it was expressed, he had not made an offer of unrestricted reciprocity but had made an unrestricted offer of reciprocity, and we thought that possibly he might be a means of obtaining that great boon which the Liberal party of this country desire for Canada. Therefore we looked upon him without any feeling of enmity, and we thought that he might induce his own party to take a sensible view of the case, and to obtain that which Canada languishes for to-day—free intercourse with the nation to the south of us. But it seems that the attention which we paid to him, under the impression that he could rise superior to party trammels, was not well grounded, and our politeness was, in a sense, thrown away, if it was bestowed upon him as an indication of our opinion that, with his high qualities and his desire for the interests of this country, he would be able to obtain what was desired. Then, the hon. gentleman tells us of the supreme qualities of his father, and, from his remarks, it would appear that he is so lifted up above the rank and file of ordinary politicians, that we were only animated by envy, malignity and animosity against him, and that it is because we envy him his lofty position and the possession of transcendent abilities, that we try to bring him down by moving this resolution. Naturally, the hon. gentleman will feel proud of his father, and will defend him with fervour, but he is wrong in asserting that the feeling on this side is caused by envy, malignity and uncharitableness against him.

Then the hon. gentleman says that Sir Charles Tupper has never imputed treasonable motives to any large portion of the Canadian people. That is what Sir Charles Tupper did. He stated that he had come to Canada to expose the desire for annexation on the part of a large number of Canadians. In Toronto and Windsor, he accused my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier), and all the leaders of the Liberal party, with being guilty of treasonable intentions, and with being engaged in a conspiracy with American statesmen and entertaining the purpose of handing Canada over to the United States. He called it "treason unveiled."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have to say that that was an accusation absolutely false, that he had no cause for making it, or evidence to warrant him in making such an accusation. I say that, as a public man, apart from his occupying a diplomatic position, he had no right to make that charge. When he came to Canada and hurled that charge against all the leaders of the Liberal party, and accused them of treason against their country, he acted in a manner inconsistent with the requirements that rested upon him as a gentleman, let alone the requirements that rested upon him as High Commissioner of Canada, acting in a diplomatic position in England.

Then, Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine has made a charge with reference to the management of the political organ of the Liberal party in this country. He charged that Mr. Farrer had been engaged as chief editor of the Globe newspaper, and that, upon exposure of various letters and pamphlets written by him, he was deposed from that position, and another gentleman was put in his place as chief editor of that paper. Now, that charge is entirely without foundation. Mr. Farrer was never chief editor of the Globe. The chief editor of the Globe newspaper is Mr. J. S. Willison. Mr. Willison succeeded Mr. John Cameron, who was for many years manager of that paper, and Mr. Farrer was simply engaged as an editorial writer upon the Globe. At the time that Mr. Farrer's pamphlet was published, I believe he was in the employ of the Mail. Mr. Farrer has been for many years in the employ of the opposite party. He edited the Mail when it was a Government organ, he edited the Government organ in Winnipeg, and the greater part of his editorial service in Canada has been upon the Government press, a press upholding hon. gentlemen opposite. I suppose that when an editorial writer is engaged for a newspaper, it is not customary to enquire what his religion is, or what his political views are; he is engaged because he is supposed to have the qualifications that render him available, and make him a valuable servant for the position he has to fill. Mr. Farrer is admittedly the best newspaper writer in British America. Whatever may be his private opinions, he serves admirably as writer of the leaders upon the Globe. The Globe had no cause to ask what his private views are. No doubt he served just as admirably my friends on the opposite side, when his views were exactly the same as they are to-day, and, were he writing on the Opposition side now, his views on any question would never be thought of or called into question at all.

Then, we are told by my hon. friend that the fact that Edward Farrer had enunciated annexation sentiments is a proof that the newspaper for which he writes articles is an annexation journal. Well, I remember when annexation sentiments were not held in such disesteem by my hon. friends opposite. There was an annexation manifesto published in 1849, and there is to-day, in the Cabinet of this Government, a gentleman who signed that annexation manifesto, and it is rumoured that he is to be called upon to act as Premier of this Dominion. Sir, there never has been a day since that annexation manifesto was issued, that there has not been one or more gentlemen who signed it in the Tory Government. They will take them, and keep them, and use them. They have no feeling against annexationists. They have more annexationists in their party than there are in the Liberal party of this country. If you find men expressing annexation sentiments in Canada, in two cases out of three they are Tories; and were the Liberal party to come into power, the hon. gentlemen opposite would not hesitate to change their attitude at any moment, and advocate annexation to the United States if they thought they could thereby attain power again.

Mr. BOWELL. If they did, they would be sure to have you as an advocate.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think they would. I do not advocate sentiments of that kind.

Then we are told by hon. gentlemen that the Liberals were in search of a policy, and they adopted the policy of Erastus Wiman, of New York, the policy of commercial union. Well, it happens, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States was advocated by certain Liberals a great many years ago. There was a United States Treasury Report issued in 1869, by Mr. J. L. Larned, which brought this question prominently before the people of Canada and the United States. I remember having advocated unrestricted reciprocity before entering public life. I remember having referred that question to a convention in my riding, more than ten years ago, and asking my supporters what their views were upon it, and I received their authority, by a unanimous vote, to stand up in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. That question was referred to the leader of the Liberal party more than five years ago. The question has been under consideration, and it was adopted by the Liberal party, not because Erastus Wiman had advocated it, but it was adopted after full and careful consideration, a consideration that lasted for years before a decision was arrived at. Mr. Wiman, in advocating the policy of commercial union, was simply acting upon his own lines, while the Liberal party has been acting upon another line. Mr. Wiman advocated commercial union, the Liberal party advocates unrestricted reciprocity. The two things are different.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the difference?

Mr. CHARLTON. In the case of unrestricted reciprocity, we make an arrangement with the United States by which all the productions of each country are admitted into the other country free of duty, but whenever articles are imported into either country from any other country, either country has the right to impose such duties upon them as it pleases. We have control of our tariff against all the world except the United States, and we have control of our tariff against any importation from the United States that come from any other country, and the Americans have the same control over their tariff. So that we simply provide for the free admission into each country of the productions of the other country. That is what unrestricted reciprocity means, and it is quite a different thing that our friends mean when they talk of commercial union.

Then we are told that Erastus Wiman is an admitted traitor. Who admits it? And what bearing has the matter upon the case if it were admitted? He happens to agree, perhaps, with me upon some points, upon other points he does not agree with me. He moves in his own orbit. But I wish to see fair-play shown Erastus Wiman. He has been living in the United States many years. He has accumulated a fortune there, but he never has become an American citizen. Erastus Wiman cannot hold real estate in any State where aliens are debarred from doing so to-day, and he cannot hold vessel property in the United States. He is a British subject, and he refuses to become an American citizen, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that that fact rather indicates that Mr. Wiman is neither an avowed traitor, nor an actual traitor. He prides himself on his British citizenship, he is a British subject to-day, and he takes that course which, in his own estimation, is the proper course to secure for Canada the prosperity that he desires to see it enjoy. I have heard, Mr. Speaker, and you have heard, Mr. Wiman publicly thanked in this House of Commons by Sir Charles Tupper himself for the great services that he has rendered to Canada. Erastus Wiman has time and again apprised this Government of critical events when this Government were called upon to act, and might have acted too late, but for the friend who could give them information in time; and he has on every occasion shown his disposition and shown his desire to benefit Canada by doing whatever he could for it, in any way that lay in his power.

Then my hon. friend spoke of the definition of commercial union given by Mr. Hitt. What have we to do with that in discussing the policy of the Liberal party? We do not go to Mr. Hitt to get a definition of our policy. We do not accept his definition, we define it for ourselves. We know what our policy is, we know the ground upon which we stand, and we do not ask for an exposition of that matter from Washington.

Why this feeling of animosity for the United States, that is professed by our friends on the opposite side? I know one of the most eminent lights in the ministry of Ontario who used to preach in Ottawa. He was extreme in his opposition to the United States and his denunciation of annexation tendencies, and he accepted the first call he could get and went to Detroit—I refer to Rev. Mr. Carson. He changed his religion and became a Presbyterian at the same time that he annexed himself to the United States, for he was a Methodist before he left us. And then we know that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) preached in the States. He preached in Buffalo, I believe, and I dare say he rendered good service there and was acceptable to the American people, and I do not want him to come now and throw any slurs or discredit upon those people who were so kind to him at that time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not advocate Sunday Observance Bills, and tell profane stories on that day.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I am sure he did not advocate Sunday Observance Bills, at all events. He may have done something more inconsistent with his professions, I am not sure as to that.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we have the assertion made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that Mr. Blake's letter abandons the Liberal position, and throws discredit upon the Liberal party, that Mr. Blake has left the Liberal party, and that he characterizes unrestricted reciprocity as treasonable. Mr. Blake, in his letter, refers to the access we have to the English market, to the fact that that market is open to us, not because Great Britain wishes to benefit us, but because she opens her market to all the world. He shows that this market is of great advantage, but an advantage of small moment when compared with free access to the American market. He then proceeds to speculate as to the results of the McKinley Bill, and arrives at the conclusion that some of the American duties will be reduced, and he goes on to say:

"Having regard to this expectation (reduction of duties in the United States), unrestricted free trade with the United States, secured for a long term of years, would (even though accompanied by higher duties against the rest of the world than I, for one, admire) give us in practice the great blessing of a measure of free trade much larger than we now enjoy or can otherwise obtain; it would greatly advance our most material interests and help our natural, our largest, most essential, and most promising industries. It would create an influx of population and capital and promote a rapid development of forces and materials now almost unused; in three words, it would give us men, money, and markets."

These are Mr. Blake's sentiments with respect to unrestricted free trade. How can you take those words and assert that Mr. Blake has gone back on the Liberal party, when he asserts that unrestricted free trade would be a vast advantage to this country? It cannot be done. Mr. Blake recognizes that free trade, as between Canada and the United States, is certain to be productive of great blessings.

We had an allusion made—and as it was a personal allusion, I feel bound to refer to it—by the Minister of Marine to a certain letter that appeared, or a portion of it, in the Empire, with a statement, quite characteristic of the journalistic mendacity of that organ, that the letter was of recent date. It was an easy matter, as they had stolen the letter, to give a date; but a date was not given. That letter was nearly two years old. In it I expressed the opinion that the prospects of the Liberal party were not as good under a French Canadian as they would be under a Protestant leader. It was a mere opinion upon the question of strength, popularity and availability. I will now say that the Hon. Wilfred Laurier, as the leader of the Liberal party, is, I believe, the very best man we could, at the present time, place in that position. He is a man whose character, affability, talents, kindness of disposition and thorough liberalism make him acceptable to the Liberals in this Dominion, and I take occasion publicly to say that I follow Mr. Laurier as the leader of the Liberal party of Canada. So much for this allusion. Hon. gentlemen who approve of the theft of correspondence, who approve of a sneak thief taking a private and confidential letter and carrying it to a newspaper which publishes it, and thereby becomes a confederate of the sneak thief, and all who approve of such transactions and can make capital out of this matter in their own little disreputable way, are welcome to do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will now tell us what he knows about machine politicians ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will say to the specimen of a machine politician who has asked me the question, that I will answer him. The hon. gentleman alluded to, I believe, stands as high morally and is as honest a politician as any man on the other side.

The Minister of Marine next quoted from the Globe of 1880 to show that it was opposed to reciprocity, because at that time an editorial appeared in opposition to commercial union, or Customs union. The founder, owner, and master spirit of the Globe was the man who negotiated the draft Brown reciprocity treaty, which made a long step towards unrestricted reciprocity, and which proposed to place on the list of free articles a large number of American manufactures ; and there has not appeared in the Globe since the preparation of that draft treaty any articles that have in any degree militated against the policy of unrestricted reciprocity now advocated by the Reform party.

Then we have an attack made by the Minister of Marine against the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It seems that my hon. friend was in Boston, and attended a public dinner there, and some enthusiastic American, who was very highly pleased with his oratorical power and was struck with the evidence of his statesmanlike qualities, said he would make a magnificent specimen of a United States Senator, that he would make a good Senator from Ontario. That was a complimentary statement made by an American. It was not a sentiment expressed by my hon. friend. It was not a sentiment expressed by any Canadian Liberal. We cannot be accountable for what is said by Americans in Boston, and we do not propose to be. He might have said he would make a good angel in Heaven.

Mr. BOWELL. You would have granted him absolution.

Mr. CHARLTON. I could not have vouched for the truth of the assertion had it been made. We have had reference made to the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) delivered on that occasion. My hon. friend wished to impress the Americans with the advantages that would result to them from unrestricted reciprocity. That is a great trouble with which we have to contend. Americans say that our arrangements are all very well, but what advantages are they going to get out of it ? The difficulty is to convince them that unrestricted reciprocity with Canada will not give us all the advantages, and my hon. friend was seeking to remove that impression, and to pave the way for a public sentiment in favour of that measure which is essential to our prosperity. So my hon. friend said that the policy of unrestricted free trade would open to them commercial access to half the continent, and that it would be equivalent to them, in a commercial sense, to a new tier of northern states. It would be exactly equivalent to that. It would add to the area in which the Americans could trade with perfect freedom the whole Dominion of Canada, and it would add to the area with which we could deal a country containing 65,000,000 of people. So my hon. friend, in the course of his Boston speech, was acting with diplomatic skill in attempting to create a public sentiment in the United States favourable to that measure which we desire to obtain, when we secure a Government which understands our wants sufficiently well to make an honest attempt to obtain it.

Then we had a statement made with respect to an opinion expressed by Senator Hoar, of the United States Senate, who is chairman of the committee charged with the investigation into commercial relations with Canada. Mr. Hoar expressed the opinion that "annexation sentiments are making headway in Canada, and the number of annexationists is increasing." I think Mr. Hoar is correct. I have no doubt of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS, No, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. I think if he went through the country on the great lines of travel and communication, he would find that every fifth Tory he met would express an opinion in favour of the United States. The whole Conservative party is honey-combed with that heresy of annexation to the United States, and they are like the woman who cries out about her chastity. They talk about treason, loyalty and annexation, and then attempt to cast a stigma on others than those to whom it properly belongs. The Minister of Marine told the House that he could give proof after proof from the United States newspapers and the utterances of American public men to show that they consider the Liberals of Canada their allies. The hon. Minister of Customs bows his assent. The public men of the United States of both parties, both Republican and Democratic, look upon the Liberal party of Canada as the progressive party, as the true Liberal party, as the party with whom they could make arrangements mutually advantageous, and they are justified in looking on that party in this light because the Liberal party in Canada is the progressive party in this country. If this country ever expects to obtain from the United States trade relations mutually advantageous, trade relations that will give us the great boon of a free access to the markets of the continent, I venture to say that that boon will be obtained by the Liberal party of Canada. The gentlemen who sit on the Government benches ; these reactionists, these men who foster antipathy and animosity between these two countries, these men who appeal to passion and to prejudice, these men who cast insults upon the people of the United States—these are not the men who can go to Washington to open negotiations or to secure that great boon for Canada. They have barred the door against their proposals at Washington, and they continue to do so every time they assert that a broad-minded, liberal man in Canada is an annexationist, forsooth, because he desires to live on friendly terms with the great nation to the south of us.

It has been charged that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier), had been guilty of indecent haste in making this motion, but, in my opinion, he acted at the proper time. The time to make this motion was when Parliament assembled, and if Sir Charles Tupper is guilty of that which is charged against him, the sooner he is arraigned by resolution before the House of Commons the better. I deny, Sir, that the charges made by the leader of the Opposition were made with indecent haste. I may, perhaps, be permitted to refer to a few articles from the London Times, which will bear out the charges made against Sir Charles Tupper. I would have gone into this matter more fully, but the hour is late, and I shall not trespass on the time of the House more than a few minutes longer. When Sir Charles Tupper returned to England, he was interviewed by a reporter of the London Times, on the 15th day of April, and a report of a portion of his interview is as follows:—

"In the course of an interview yesterday afternoon with Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner for Canada in this country, who arrived in Liverpool yesterday from New York, that gentleman, referring to the recent election in Canada, said: 'The Dominion has been agitated for the past three or four years by leaders of politics of the Separatists, led by Mr. Wiman, at public banquets and meetings; and when the general election came there was not time between the issue of the writs and the elections to disabuse the public mind of the fallacies that had been promulgated.'"

Now, Sir, was it the business of the High Commissioner for Canada, who is charged with caring for the interest of this whole Dominion, and who is the servant alike of Liberals and Conservatives—was it his business, when he arrived in London, to make a slanderous charge against one-half of the people of this country? Was he justified in asserting that the contest in which he had been engaged was a contest between the Separatist class, those who desire to separate from England, those who desire annexation to the United States on the one side, and the loyal class on the other. No, Sir; he had no justification for making that charge; it was a slander upon the people against whom the charge was made, and whether he had justification for making that charge or not, it was none of his business to prefer such a charge, considering the position he occupied as a public servant of the whole people. Then, Sir Charles Tupper proceeded to make a charge against the Grand Trunk Railway in the same interview. He said:

"In addition to this, the Grand Trunk Railway—a very powerful corporation, with its two termini in the United States, at Chicago and Portland, but holding great influence in Ontario and Quebec—threw itself, with unwarrantable vigour, into the combat, and exercised extreme coercion against the Government among its employés. The fact that the Government should have been able, under these adverse circumstances, to carry the country by larger majorities than four years ago, shows that there is, in the Dominion, a deep-seated loyalty to British institutions."

Now, Sir, this was a false charge, as the subsequent correspondence proves. It is proven that the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not exercise extreme coercion upon its employés. It is proven, if the assertion of their officers is worth anything, that they exercised no coercion, that employés were left to vote as they pleased; and Sir Charles Tupper, when he arrived in London, and when he made this slanderous and false charge against the Grand Trunk Railway had not only forgotten the duties of his position, but he was animated by that spleen and spite which actuated him when he could not use the Grand Trunk Railway as an instrument for carrying out the desires of the Conservative party. Sir Charles Tupper proceeds to say:

"The policy proposed by Sir John Macdonald, the Premier, was that of reciprocal trade in the natural products of the two countries, Canada and America, similar to the Treaty of 1854, with such modifications as could be agreed upon in the interests of both. The effect of such a policy would not be against England, as the articles exchanged between the two countries would not be to any extent, if at all such as are exported from England."

Here was a deliberate attempt to deceive English public opinion, a deliberate attempt to make the English people believe that the Government were moving in the direction, and could expect to obtain a treaty on the lines of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. Sir Charles Tupper knew that this was absurd, he knew that it could not be done. Therefore, in that short interview he charged one great party with being disloyal and with being Separatists; he preferred a false charge against the Grand Trunk Railway, and he placed before the British public a false statement with regard to the state of public questions in Canada. I might quote at great length to show the reprehensible conduct of Sir Charles Tupper, but I will not detain the House by so showing. We have in the London Times correspondence between Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Henry Tyler; we have charges made by Sir Charles Tupper that the Grand Trunk Railway issued free passes on their line from Point Lévis; we have charges that the Grand Trunk Railway exercised coercion with regard to its employés; we have charges that the Grand Trunk Railway threw itself, might and main, body and soul, into the contest in favour of the Liberal party; and we have all these charges denied and disproved by Sir Henry Tyler and by Mr. Seargeant, General Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway. We have a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper that he bitterly regretted the day when he lent his influence to secure for the Grand Trunk Railway an entrance into Chicago, and that he bitterly regretted that he had ever used his influence for the benefit of that corporation. We have him assuming an attitude of hostility throughout to the Grand Trunk Railway, we have him making the charge that the Grand Trunk Railway management was extravagant, corrupt and dishonest; and when brought to book on that charge, he attempted to wriggle out of it by saying he meant that the management was extravagant, corrupt and dishonest some 35 years ago, and we have throughout the whole controversy a lamentable degree of duplicity shown by the hon. the High Commissioner. We have also Sir Charles Tupper's offer to go on the stump in England to meet Sir Henry Tyler and to show the British people that he was a scoundrel, and a bad railway manager, and did not deserve their confidence. Suppose the British ambassador at Paris should attack the financial standing of some French railway corporation and propose to go before the French people to show that the management of the corporation was a bad one, would that be tolerated for a moment? No, he would receive his walking papers to go home. I assert that Sir Charles Tupper throughout this whole contest, in taking the course that he did, in accusing the Liberal party of dishonest, unpatriotic, treasonable motives, in making this attack on the Grand Trunk Railway simply because he could not use that railway for his purposes, I claim—without going fully into these quotations, which would take some time, and which I do not propose to inflict on the House—that Sir Charles Tupper has acted in a manner that renders him liable to, and makes him deserving of, the censure of this House; and so I shall support the motion presented by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. KENNY. During the past four years that I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have noticed that on many occasions reference has been made to the tone, and dignity, and order, and decorum which have marked the proceedings of this Legislature, and we have prided ourselves on the fact that in this respect we stood only second to the Imperial Parliament at Westminster. From both sides of the House I have heard references to British procedure, British precedents and British customs; and those references to British forms and to British habits always fell pleasantly on my ears, because I know that the great mass of the people of Canada, be they Tory or be they Liberal, are loyal to the institutions of our country, and are proud to belong to the great British Empire of which we form so important a part. During the present session I have heard individual members of the Cabinet assailed by hon. gentlemen opposite for departing from what those hon. gentlemen considered to be British practice. I have heard the whole Cabinet assailed because proceedings which they advocated did not accord with those hon. gentlemen's ideas of British custom. Now, I submit that hon. gentlemen opposite, have been following, during the course of this debate, the excessively un-British practice of attacking a man behind his back. I consider that the resolution now under discussion in this House is not only un-British, but unmanly. What are the facts of the case? The hon. leader of the Opposition has moved a resolution condemning Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner of Canada to England, because Sir Charles took part in the recent general election in this Dominion, because he made use of certain language, and because he made certain references to the chairman of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that the High Commissioner of Canada is a man well known throughout this Dominion. He was prominent in bringing about the confederation of these British North American provinces, and he has always taken an active part in the public life of Canada. As to how he there acquitted himself hon. gentlemen may differ; but we do know that for twenty years he was a prominent member of this House, and that during most of that time he sat on the Treasury benches; and we all know, and it has been acknowledged by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the important duties pertaining to the office of High Commissioner have been discharged by Sir Charles Tupper in a manner creditable to the country and satisfactory to all who have had occasion to seek his services on the other side of the Atlantic. Hon. gentlemen opposite have cheerfully given their testimony to the satisfactory manner in which Sir Charles Tupper has performed the duties of High Commissioner; but the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who has just taken his seat, has intimated to us that this politeness which was extended to the High Commissioner, when he sat in Parliament in 1887, the eulogia which were passed upon him by the hon. gentlemen opposite, were only extended to him in the hope that the Opposition would be able to induce him to accept their views as regards the commercial relations between this country and the neighbouring republic. As to the High Commissioner's parliamentary career, I am not in a position to speak from any personal knowledge. I had the honour of meeting him here only during one session, that of 1887, when Sir Charles Tupper occupied the important position of Finance Minister, and I must say that during that session I never heard such language applied to him as political bulldozer, and many other equally euphonious and elegant expressions which have been applied to him during the course of this debate. My knowledge of the High Commissioner's parliamentary career has been derived very largely from what I have heard of him from hon. gentlemen who have been his contemporaries in this House, and who sat on both sides of the Chair. I have heard that the High Commissioner was sharp in attack, and quick in defence, and I think that hon. gentlemen opposite, some of them at least, carry, and must carry forever the marks and scars of their redoubtable political opponent. It would really seem as if his very presence in Canada had opened those wounds afresh, and that now nothing but the unprecedented course of censuring a man in his absence will satisfy—the personal hostility, the animosity and vindictiveness towards the High Commissioner which seems to actuate some of the members of this assembly. Now, Mr. Speaker, before we censure Sir Charles Tupper for taking part in the recent general elections, it is only fair and proper that we should enquire into the character of that appeal to the people of Canada. Sir Charles Tupper, as I have mentioned, took part in the great movement which resulted in the confederation of these British American Provinces; but I submit that in the election which took place in March last in this Dominion, issues were presented to the country, far transcending in importance the question of Confederation or any other question which has ever been agitated in Canada since the British flag was first hoisted on this Continent. For the first time in the history of Canada a measure was proposed which assailed the national life of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. KENNY. I say yes. I say that in the question of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, as I view it, and as it has been viewed by the majority of the people of Canada, I believe our very national existence was imperilled. For that statement, I have the authority of an hon. gentleman opposite who has ever taken a prominent part in the discussion of the question of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, whichever you may be pleased to call it. I find it reported in the public press of the country that the hon. member for South Oxford used at Ingersoll, in 1887, the following language:—

"There is no doubt whatever that before we can obtain such a measure of unrestricted reciprocity as the advocates of this policy desire, it will be necessary to discriminate against the manufacturers of other countries, against even those of Great Britain. There is no doubt whatever in my mind also, that we cannot overlook the risk that does undoubtedly arise, that increased commercial intercourse may strengthen the hands of those who desire to see our political system absorbed in theirs."

These are words of caution addressed to the people of Canada as far back as 1887, before any motion was ever made in the Parliament of Canada in favour of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. And I think it is to be regretted that a gentleman of ability, occupying the position of prominence and influence which the hon. member for South Oxford undoubtedly does in this country, should have lent his assistance to a measure which, he recognizes himself, strengthens the hands of those who desire to see our political system absorbed in that of the neighbouring republic. That extract from the speech of Sir Richard Cartwright at Ingersoll in 1887, I think, very good authority for my statement that there is at least great peril to our institutions involved in this question of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat explained, in a moment of candor, what his view is of unrestricted reciprocity, and I was glad to hear it from such an avowed advocate of the greatest possible intercourse with the United States. He told us that, as he understood the measure and as it is understood, I fancy, by hon. gentlemen opposite, he contemplates that we shall have a common tariff with the United States as against the rest of the world.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, I did not contemplate that; I said the very opposite.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). That was your platform during the election.

Mr. CHARLTON. My statement was that there should be complete freedom of intercourse between the two countries in the articles produced by the labour of each, but that each country should impose such tariff as it pleased against the products of other countries. My proposition was to give each country complete control of its own tariff except as regards the products of each going into the other.

Mr. BOWELL. Is that continental free trade?

Mr. CHARLTON. No, that is unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you are not following your leaders.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was following the lines of the Liberal policy.

Mr. KENNY. Is that what the hon. gentleman means by continental free trade, that each country is to retain its Customs regulations and barriers, and that each shall have a separate tariff as against the rest of the world? The hon. member for North Norfolk tells us that we have nothing to do with Mr. Hitt's definition of unrestricted reciprocity, that it does not concern us what Mr. Hitt thought or said on the matter. I am astonished at the hon. gentleman repudiating Mr. Hitt, for this reason, that, since this session has commenced, the hon. the leader of the Opposition, in one of the early speeches he made in this House, recommended the members of this Legislature to enquire into the opinions of the Hon. Mr. Sherman and of Mr. Hitt. If, Sir, you will look to the pages of Hansard, you will find that the hon. the leader of the party opposite referred to Mr. Sherman and Mr. Hitt as exponents and advocates of unrestricted reciprocity. Not only is it not consistent on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it is not fair to Mr. Hitt that he should be so repudiated by his friends in this House, because any reference made in this Legislature to these gentlemen, occupying prominent and honourable positions in their own country, should be made with all courtesy. They are gentlemen occupying, the one in the Senate of the United States and the other in the House of Representatives, prominent positions, and they have been intimately associated with the advocates of commercial union in Canada and selected by them to represent their views in those assemblies. But I find that as late as 27th March, 1890, when the resolution in favour of unrestricted reciprocity had been introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford, that hon. gentleman said:

"You may see the reflection of the policy of the Opposition in this House, in the resolutions which were introduced by Mr. Hitt, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Just read that resolution.

Mr. KENNY. Does the hon. member for South Oxford repudiate Mr. Hitt?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read the resolution.

Mr. KENNY. I will deal with Mr. Hitt; the hon. gentleman need not be in such a hurry; nobody interrupted the hon. gentleman who preceded me. I certainly will comply with the hon. gentleman's request, and will give him the resolution of 1890 of Mr. Hitt, and his resolution of 1889, and I am not surprised that he does not repudiate that resolution, because, to my mind, it is the result of some of the pilgrimages of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite to the shrine of Wiman, and to Washington.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is the Minister of Finance you are referring to now.

Mr. KENNY. I find that, in 1889, Mr. Hitt moved a resolution in the Congress of the United States. I hold in my hand a copy of the speech which Mr. Hitt delivered on that occasion. The pamphlet is headed "Commercial Union with Canada" and not "Unrestricted Reciprocity."

Mr. LANDERKIN. Was that before the Government pilgrimage down to Washington?

Mr. KENNY. During the course of the very interesting speech which the Hon. Mr. Hitt then delivered, and with which, no doubt, hon. gentlemen opposite are quite familiar, he advocated that we should pool our tariffs, on the basis of population. Now, I would like to know if hon. gentlemen opposite are in favour of that? He said also:

"Can there be any question that it would be in the interest of our people to have free admission to that market for the sake of the American market—to have the preference, in fact, in that market by the establishment of a tariff against importations from any other country."

Further on, Mr. Hitt says:

"I have faith that the capital and labour of the United States, 60,000,000 strong, can easily take care of themselves in the opening of the market with 5,000,000 of Canadians."

Again he says :

"Undoubtedly they (that is the Canadians), in being subjected to the same tariff with us——"

Is this the reflection of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite? Is it for this definition that we are referred to Mr. Sherman and Mr. Hitt? You will find that hardly two of those gentlemen opposite agree on the question of commercial union, and we are obliged to go across the border and see what their allies there mean by unrestricted reciprocity. As regards this question, Mr. Hitt says :

"Undoubtedly they, in being subjected to the same tariff with us, would in all fairness be consulted as to its provisions, but we, 60,000,000, would in all fairness have generally the prevailing voice in declaring what the rate should be."

I will ask the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) if that is the reflection of his views?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not, and the hon. gentleman knows it perfectly.

Mr. KENNY. These extracts are from Mr. Hitt's speech of 1889. Hon. gentlemen will well remember that the question of commercial union suddenly became very unpopular in Canada. As soon as it was placed fairly and squarely before the people of Canada, they recognized that commercial union meant political union; and they recognized further, that the Americans with whom some prominent Canadians were associating in advocating commercial union, meant political union. Consequently the term "commercial union" was dropped. So these hon. gentlemen were obliged to change their tactics, or, if they did not change their tactics, they changed the name of their fad and called it unrestricted reciprocity, which was a distinction without a difference. Therefore it was that, after mutual arrangements which we can very well understand, Mr. Hitt's resolution of 1890—the one which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells us is the reflection of the policy of the Opposition—does not contain the words "commercial union," but it stipulates for the complete removal of all duties on trade between Canada and the United States. If I am wrong, I should be corrected at once. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has challenged me to read the resolution of Mr. Hitt. I have it not complete.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read it.

Mr. KENNY. I have it not in full, and the hon. member who may have had something to do with the framing of it, should correct me if I am wrong, but I say it provides for the complete removal of all duties on trade between Canada and the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. KENNY. Will any intelligent man say that, if the removal of all duties on trade between the United States and Canada is aimed at by that resolution, it does not mean the same thing as commercial union? An hon. member has kindly placed in my hands Mr. Hitt's resolution, and the House will see whether I have correctly stated its purport. It reads as follows :—

"That, whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States—— "

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What date is that, pray? That is not the resolution of 1890, and, if the hon. gentleman has been so informed, he has been erroneously informed.

Mr. KENNY. I think the hon. member for South Oxford is correct, and we can have no better authority on Mr. Hitt's resolutions than the hon. gentleman himself. The resolution which has just been handed to me is the resolution of 1889, and the difference between this resolution and the one of 1890 is simply that the words "commercial union" are obliterated. It is a distinction without a difference. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has given us a definition of unrestricted reciprocity, or rather of what he imagines unrestricted reciprocity to mean. I have referred you to Mr. Hitt, whom the member for North Norfolk, very unfairly as I think, has repudiated, considering all the services Mr. Hitt has rendered to the hon. gentleman's party in the Congress of the United States; but the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was more grateful, and he told us last year that in the Hitt resolution we would find the reflection of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. Is it any wonder, under those circumstances, that, when the hon. member for South Oxford travelled 500 or 600 miles to attend a dinner in Boston, the gentleman who presided on that occasion stated : "We have in Canada many in favour of our view, we have in Prince Edward Island Mr. Davies, we have in Quebec Mercier and Laurier, we have in Ontario Cartwright, who look to us, the people of the United States, for the sign by which they shall conquer." I think no men better deserved recognition at the hands of others than these gentlemen did at the hands of the merchants of Boston. I was most anxious to get from a gentleman as prominent in the Opposition ranks as the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a definition of unrestricted reciprocity, because I remembered that, during the last election, when I endeavoured to find out for myself what unrestricted reciprocity meant, and when the matter had to be dealt with by the people of the Province of Nova Scotia and of all Canada, suddenly a great change came over the gentlemen who were advocating that measure and the press which placed their views before the public, and then these gentlemen announced in the Province of Nova Scotia that what they understood by commercial union was that we were to have an interchange of the productions of both countries, but each country was to retain its own separate tariff. That did not coincide with what Mr. Hitt stated. Mr. Hitt was not deceiving his own countrymen when he moved the resolutions for the removal of all the duties between the two countries. But when the people of Nova Scotia who, in common with the great majority of the people of Canada, are loyal to the institutions of this country and to their Queen, had to pronounce upon unrestricted reciprocity, the advocates of the fad in that Province were obliged, to use a vulgar expression, to take back water. The leader of the Opposition did us the honour of paying us a visit in Halifax. I think it was in the December preceding that election. I am glad to be able to say here that I think the hon. gentleman's visit was a pleasant one, that he was treated by all parties with the greatest possible courtesy. I know very well that the Minister of Militia, with his usual kindness, placed the drill shed at the disposal of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and there a very successful meeting took place, and I should be very sorry, indeed, to say that it was not a successful meeting. Now, the hon. the leader of the Opposition will pardon me if I just, for one moment, divert from the discussion which is immediately before the House, to express my surprise that, after all we did to receive him courteously and kindly in the Maritime Provinces, he should have said, in Huntingdon, after the general election, that this Confederation, that this Parliament of Canada, would never be ruled by the tail of the Confederation.

Mr. LAURIER. Oh, I never said that.

Mr. KENNY. Well, I am very glad indeed to hear it. It was not like the hon. gentleman to use such language. But to come back to the definition of unrestricted reciprocity. I read in the New York Tribune of 12th February, 1891, the following :—

"The Halifax Chronicle makes statements which appear to need prompt correction. It argues in favour of unrestricted and absolute reciprocity between Canada and the United States, with each country at liberty to adopt such tariff as it may prefer, and represents this, and no more than this, as the deliberate purpose of one party in the Canadian contest. If this is the fact, one party of Canadians closely resembles the babe which cried for the moon, and got into a rage because the moon would not consent to be grasped. This nation has not the slightest notion of allowing Canada to open a back door as wide as it may please, while tariff enactments of the United States are closing the front doors against sundry importations at New York and Boston. If anybody is really silly enough to suppose that any such plan is entertained by Americans, he does not live in this country."

Now, I think that is a clear definition, from one of the highest authorities of the United States, of what the people of that country understand by unrestricted reciprocity, which is being so constantly pressed on Canada by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has hardly done Mr. Erastus Wiman justice. He must admit that Mr. Wiman is the father of the fad, and when they adopted his fad, he very kindly adopted them and took them all under his wing. Mr. Wiman makes no concealment of what he means by commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. He goes further, and tells the people of the United States—and when he tells the people of the United States it means that he tells the people of Canada, and that he tells the people of the mother country—that all this agitation means such a measure of trade and commercial intercourse as will ultimately result in the absorption of this country into the United States of America. That is what Mr. Wiman means, that is what Mr. Wiman intends, and he makes no secret of his intentions. But I have travelled off into this trade question, and this definition of commercial union, because I think we should know exactly what is meant by it before we attempt to censure Sir Charles Tupper for engaging in the last general elections and assuming a hostile attitude against commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that because Sir Charles Tupper occupies a semi-embassadorial position in England, therefore he is not warranted in taking part in a general election in the Dominion of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am ready to recognize that, to some extent, that doctrine is correct. If it were an ordinary party contest, I would not expect Sir Charles Tupper to take part in it, if it were a mere question of Grit and Tory, if it were a mere question of the "ins" and "outs," if it were a mere question of National Policy or Free Trade, then probably Sir Charles Tupper would not have appeared in Canada. But when the very existence of our nationality was assailed, it was the duty of every man, no matter what his position in this country may have been, to take part in such a contest as that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then let him resign his salary.

Mr. KENNY. It would be well for Canada if every man who has drawn a salary for services to Canada, had done as much for Canada as Sir Charles Tupper has. Is there any man in this House or out of it, that can point to one instance in this Legislature, or on any public platform in Canada, or anywhere else, where Sir Charles Tupper, hour after hour, abused his own country? Among all the accusations that have been levelled against Sir Charles Tupper, no one can point to a public utterance of his which is calculated to disparage his own country, either in the esteem of our own people or in that of strangers. Sir Charles Tupper has attended many public meetings on both sides of the Atlantic, he has attended public dinners on both sides of the Atlantic, but he has never so spoken as to have it said to him that the best way his views could be realized was for him to become a Senator of the United States of America. Now, Mr. Speaker, because Sir Charles Tupper happens to hold the position of High Commissioner, can it be said that he has thereby sacrificed his position as a Canadian citizen? Is not Canada as dear to him as ever it was? The hon. member for South Oxford told us, four years ago—I have quoted his words to you—that this agitation for commercial union imperilled our relations with the mother country, and meant, probably, the absorption of this country by the United States; and if, Sir Charles Tupper believed that statement of the hon. member for South Oxford, I say it was his bounden duty to come to Canada and take part in that election. Would it be any excuse to any ambassador, if his country was assailed, to say that his ambassadorial position would prevent him from taking part in the defence of his country? Nobody will admit such a doctrine as that. That point was very clearly placed before this House the other night by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Let me quote from another gentleman who differs very little in his view of the question of unrestricted reciprocity from the view taken of it by the High Commissioner. Will any one oppose question the honesty and sincerity of the hon. Edward Blake? Mr. Blake was for years, all his life, identified with the Liberal party in this country. For many years he was the leader of that party, and the eloquence of his voice has frequently wakened echoes in this Chamber, and it has been stated on many a platform throughout Canada that he sacrificed his health in the service of his party. And yet so strongly was Mr. Blake of the opinion that this policy of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, that the result of all these journeys to and fro to Washington, would act injuriously to Canada, that when his party placed this policy of unrestricted reciprocity before the country as their platform, he retired from his party and told them he had no more to do with them. Mr. Blake, prompted by a strong sense of duty, felt it necessary to make that public severance, and we all know how strong are party ties, and how difficult it must have been for a gentleman occupying the position which Mr. Blake occupied to take that step; but it became a solemn duty, it was a question of country before party, and Mr. Blake took that very important and decided step, and retired from his party. If the question raised in March last was so serious, if the issue which was then before the people of Canada was so fraught with danger to the Dominion that Mr. Blake felt constrained to take that extreme step, I say that Sir Charles Tupper should not be blamed if he chose to take the same view of the question as Mr. Blake adopted. If hon. gentlemen will read Sir Charles Tupper's pre-election speeches and compare them with Mr. Blake's post-election letter, they will find that on the question of unrestricted reciprocity these two gentlemen largely agree. I contend, therefore, that if it were necessary for Mr. Blake to take that extreme step, Sir Charles Tupper was equally warranted in taking the part which he did in the general election recently held. But let us for a moment see who are the gentlemen whose sensitive nerves and delicate organisms have been affected by the utterances of the High Commissioner. He has been accused of applying the term "ruined gamesters" to a large number of the people of Canada. That is mere assertion. That is not true. It has not been proven, in fact it has been disproved, and, therefore, it falls to the ground. As I said, who are the people whose feelings have been wounded by the utterances of Sir Charles Tupper? There is the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). I had the pleasure of being present the other afternoon when he addressed the House, and he had only just started in his speech, the flag had hardly fallen, before he called Sir Charles Tupper a political bulldozer. I do not think that an hon. gentleman who is so prompt and ready to indulge in such language as that should be so exceedingly sensitive as to what may be said by political opponents. Then there is the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I had not the pleasure of hearing that hon. gentleman's speech, and I read a very meagre report of it in a newspaper; but, in common parlance, I believe the hon. gentleman pitched heavily into the High Commissioner. I know there is no one better able to do it than the hon. member for South Oxford. The traditions of the House tell us that in times gone by the hon. member for South Oxford and the High Commissioner have had their tournaments here, and it is not for me to say who conquered; but I do not think it is on record, at least it has never been told to me, that the High Commissioner ever attacked the hon. member for South Oxford when that hon. gentleman's back was turned. I do not think that the High Commissioner can be charged with that offence; and, therefore, it is that one cannot help feeling regret that the hon. gentleman should make so fierce an onslaught on a political rival, on a succesful rival, who happens to be absent. The hon. member for South Oxford is the last man in this House who should find fault with any man in it or out of it for having made use of strong language. In the matter of abuse the hon. member's appetite is perfectly uncontrollable and insatiable, and when it comes to slander it is positively ferocious. He not only gobbles up an individual but he bolts a whole province. Why, in 1888 I think, or at all events during the last Parliament, the hon. gentleman stated across the floor of this House that the electorate of the Province of Nova Scotia had offered to sell themselves to Mr. Blake, but that he was too honest to buy them. Consider that that statement was made in the Parliament in Canada, that it is on record in Hansard, and stands there forever, for what it may be worth, recorded against my native province. Remember, also, that that was the utterance of a gentleman who has been long in public life, one of our trained parliamentarians. I characterized it at the time, and I repeat now, that it was an insulting and false statement. That the hon. member for South Oxford should feel a certain amount of chagrin and disappointment at the results of the election in 1887, and of the election in 1891, is only natural; but that he should permit himself, because he is so chagrined and annoyed, to indulge in abuse and slander of those who differ from him is really not doing even himself justice, and is most unfair and insulting to those whom he so attacks. I hold in my hand a document signed by Richard J. Cartwright. I really do not know of my personal knowledge, it is not for me to say, whether it was written by the hon. member for South Oxford or not. It bears date Toronto, March 7, 1891, and in contains the following sentences:—

"Our opponents' array, on the other hand, is most literally a thing of shreds and patches, made up of ragged remnants from half a dozen minor provinces, the great majority of whom do not even pretend to be actuated by any principle save that of securing a good slice of booty for themselves and the sections or constituencies they respectively represent."

I halt for a moment. That accusation is levelled at the representatives of the Maritime Provinces, at the representatives of Manitoba, of the Province of British Columbia and of the North-West Territories. With some of us that hon. gentleman has sat for four years, and as the result of that—I cannot call it intimacy—as the result of that parliamentary intercourse and communication, he declares that we are not "actuated by any principle save that of securing a good slice of booty for themselves and the sections and constituencies they respectively represent." The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) continued to say:

"And who know besides that popular feeling in those very provinces is strongly and distinctly in favour of our policy, though actual cash in hand or in the shape of railway subsidies has proved too much for the virtue of a majority of the voting population in many instances."

Thus writes the hon. gentleman. He appears to be amused. I do not envy him if he thinks this is an amusing production. Thus the hon. gentleman writes, not only of the people of the Maritime Provinces, of Manitoba, of British Columbia and of the North-West Territories, but of their representatives in this Assembly. Now, Sir, on behalf of those who have thus been insulted, and speaking more especially for my own province and for the constituency which I have the honour of representing here, I say that a more insulting, a more slanderous, a more calumnious, a more diabolically false statement was never penned by the hand of man. Yet this is the hon. gentleman whose sensitive nerves are wounded because the hon. Sir Chas. Tupper applies the words "ruined gamesters" to Mr. Wiman, to Mr. Farrer and to Sir Henry Tyler. I considered it my duty to those whom I represent to take the very first opportunity which I possibly could to tell the writer of that document that a more false or malignant statement was never written. Sir Charles Tupper has been blamed for something he said as to the conduct of the Grand Trunk Railway officers. It must be borne in mind that a prominent official of the Grand Trunk Railway has stated that he was instrumental in carrying a large number of people back into Canada to vote against the present dominant party in order to bring about the annexation of this country to the United States. I contend, Mr. Speaker, I submit it in all fairness to this House, if it were not the duty of the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner as he was in London, to tell the English shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company that possibly, by the connivance of the chairman of that company, such a transaction had taken place. I do not think, Sir, that the people of Canada or the members of this House will be disposed to censure Sir Charles Tupper very severely, either for taking part in this election or for the particular language which he applied to Mr. Farrar or to Mr. Wiman; or for bringing before the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway the conduct of their officers during the recent election. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), during the course of the speech which he made in this debate, indulged in a little prophecy, and we all know that that is a very dangerous rôle to play. The hon. member for Bothwell spoke in a jocular manner—he is always fond of a joke—and when nobody else could substantiate the charge against Sir Charles Tupper, why the hon. member for Bothwell travelled a long way and brought to his aid a comic paper from the United States. But the hon. gentleman indulged in the rôle of prophet and he said that in a short time he would be on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman did not tell us whether he was coming alone or not. I assume, after the disclosures which were made during this debate, that the hon. gentleman occupies the position of the leader of the loyal Opposition in this House, because the hon. President Lane, who presided at the magnificent dinner at Boston, which the hon. member for South Oxford attended, had told us, to quote his own language, that Laurier in Quebec, and Davies in Prince Edward Island, and Cartwright in Ontario, do not look to the people of Canada for a policy; he says that these gentlemen look to the people of the United States for the sign by which they shall conquer. Consequently, we all know that the people of Canada want a leader who will look to them for the sign by which they shall conquer, and I have no doubt that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) feels that he is the coming man. This is no laughing matter, gentlemen; it is a very, very serious matter. Assuming that the hon. member for Bothwell is to occupy that position, I would, in all fairness and frankness, be disposed to give him a few words of advice. He does not know, when he comes out in that rôle, exactly what position we may take—we the independent members who sit on this side of the House. In common parlance, we may be disposed to give him a "lift," but he must first of all instruct his followers that they must not abuse absent men. If we fight our opponents we like to meet them face to face, we do not want to wait until they are one thousand or two thousand miles away, and until the Atlantic rolls between us. Again, I would advise the hon. gentleman to bring forward a straight Canadian policy: Canadian first, and Canadian last, and always Canadian. I would further advise the hon. gentleman when he says his prayers night and morning, as I am sure he does most regularly, to pray that he may not be led into temptation, that he may not be carried away by the charms of these free railway runs, and these free dinners, and probably these free drinks which have been indulged in by a few Canadian politicians: but that the hon. gentleman being, as we all know, a most virtuous man, should avoid that broad path which leads to Wimanism, and that at all events, if he should go travelling in foreign countries, he will not go anonymously, and that he will not be ashamed of signing his own name. I really do think, Mr. Speaker, that when the hon. member assumes the rôle of leader of the loyal Opposition in Canada, if he will abide by these instructions, a great future awaits him. Above all, let him look well to the people of Canada for his support and policy, and not to the people of the United States: for if he does not, I am afraid that he will remain where he is for a very, very, very long time. That he probably will remain there, Mr. Speaker, and the Grits and the stars have disappeared forever.

"Till the world grows old,
And the sun grows cold,"

Mr. FRASER. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman, who in his beautiful speech—an oration I might call it—has lapsed into the future by turning prophet, will not think it indelicate on my part if I attempt to answer him in the peculiar way in which he seems to think a debate of this kind should be conducted, namely, by answering a charge directly made by simply bringing charges against others.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 96) respecting the Ottawa and Parry Sound Railway Company.—(Mr. Jamieson.)

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That as the time for the reception of reports of Committees on Private Bills will expire on Wednesday, the 10th inst., the same be extended till Tuesday, the 30th inst.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. FRASER. Before recess, I was about to say that, had not this debate assumed the peculiar phases it did, I would not have said anything upon the question. Had the mere denial of the hon. Minister of Justice of what was contained in the resolution been acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite, I should have willingly abstained from speaking, being content to leave that mere denial to go to the country with the evidence submitted, if this House did not decide the question of the correctness of the resolution moved. But when I saw this debate assuming such various phases, when I saw almost every conceivable attempt made to introduce matters which I submit ought not to be discussed under this resolution, when I saw that the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite were most cheerful when any attempt was made to move away from the contention of the hon. Minister of Justice, and to show that the statements attributed to Sir Charles Tupper were correct, and that in their force they affected every man on this side of the House; I saw at once, by the pleasure thus evinced by those hon. gentlemen, that they wished to stand by the remarks made by Sir Charles Tupper, and that their joy was complete if, while assuming as a matter of course that the great body of the electorate back of the Opposition were loyal, they could by any method fasten on the Opposition the stigma that Sir Charles Tupper attempted to put on the Liberal party of Canada. Nor does it seem that even that is sufficient for the hon. member who last addressed the House, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who began by the statement that such a resolution as this would not be introduced into the Parliament of England, and ended by showing the real purpose of his speech. He showed that at the bottom of his speech was the desire, not to answer the evidence adduced in this House in support of the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition, but to take advantage of the opportunity to have a fling at the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and to relieve himself of the animus that was shown not only by the words he used but much more, if possible, by his very appearance. I admit that such a resolution as this would not be possible in the English House of Commons, and why? Because no such occasion could arise. Let me deal for a moment with the remarks of the hon. member representing South Oxford. I am not going to enter into any defence of that hon. gentleman. I suppose that the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) having for four years satisfied himself on every occasion in striking at the late member for Halifax, finds that his occupation is now gone, and he seeks what he considers higher game. His blade being somewhat rusted, he will burnish it again for the battle, and, passing over ordinary mortals on this side, will seek the hon. member for South Oxford and tilt with him for the next five years. Well, I will leave him to settle the matter with the hon. member for South Oxford himself, and I will only say, with regard to the hon. member for South Oxford's statements, that Sir Charles Tupper himself, and the hon. member for Halifax, and every Government candidate in the late election in Nova Scotia, laid the groundwork of that remark, and even of a stronger remark. What did Sir Charles Tupper himself say in speaking at Amherst?

"You find the Maritime Provinces, eastern and western —the smaller outlying provinces—the North-West and Manitoba, smaller than ourselves—you find these holding the balance of power, these smaller provinces in a position to claim the very highest and first consideration at the hands of their party for the noble manner in which they have sustained the institutions of our country."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. Hon. gentlemen opposite cheer to the echo. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that passing events and the opening up of the future will disclose the fact that these hon. gentlemen are ready to take the hint of Sir Charles Tupper and act accordingly. I have no doubt the vigorous cheer from the members from the Lower Provinces indicates at least to the Ministers who now sit before them what they may expect and what they do expect. Why, Sir, could it be more clearly stated that those provinces might expect to receive from the Government more than they had received in the past? and when we had to meet on every hustings in the Province of Nova Scotia first, last and always, when we read in the public press this question: Will you return a member to the Opposition and get nothing? —When we met this remark everywhere, from hustings to hustings: Do you want a railway? then do not vote for a member of the Opposition: you have been out in the cold these twelve years, and what did you get? take the hint from a member who supports the Government, and you will get something—when we met this suggestion everywhere, I submit that the foundation was laid by Sir Charles Tupper himself who is now on trial, and by those members from the lower provinces for a man in Ontario, or for that matter for a man anywhere else, to make the remark implying that we had descended so low. Let me say that that method of political warfare is below, not only the dignity of this Parliament, but the dignity of any man seeking a seat in this Parliament; and I submit that any man who descends to that level to discuss the question of the day, and who seeks to secure the support of the electorate on grounds so low, should be the last man to complain of such a remark in this House. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said that he would be very glad to have the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), with the independent members, including members on the other side, form a new party. Is he beginning to think that Confederation is a failure? He said so once. Is he now thoroughly convinced that Confederation is a disappointment; and finding that the party he is following and the Government he is supporting are not independent, does he wish to form a new party? If the hon. gentleman wishes to find an independent, a Canadian party, he has not to travel far to find one. If I am not mistaken, the Canadian party is here now on this side—the only Canadian party—that party which seeks the best interests of Canada, which seek to make of Canada a prosperous country for the hardy sons of toil to live in. He will find that this side of the House is willing now, as always, to adopt the best methods of the mother country in order to make the conditions of life here as easy as possible for those who work for their bread. He will find here men ready to strike off the shackles and trammels imposed on our people by hon. gentlemen opposite, so that this country may become free as it ought to be. He will find on this side of the House the only Canadian party which has faith in our own people: the only party which does not fear competition, but is ready to stand up, man to man, in competition with our neighbours across the border in any labour or enterprise. He will find in the Liberal party men who do not need the support of combines, but depend on their own brains and energies, and are ready to make of Canada a country fit for independent men to live in; and if the hon. gentleman desires to cast in his lot with an independent Canadian party, he will find on this side a congenial home. The hon. gentleman said that the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford was directed at Sir Charles Tupper, because Sir Charles Tupper was a successful political rival. I do not know that the High Commissioner is now a rival for political fame; but, perhaps, if the hon. gentleman had looked to the other side of this House, he would find that Sir Charles Tupper has dangerous rivals there, and that if there is any rivalry to the High Commissioner, now or heretofore, it comes from hon. gentlemen opposite. Then the hon. gentleman quoted a letter of the leader of the Opposition. Now, I submit it is a well-established principle, that if you quote a man's letter or take a man's evidence, you must take it as a whole: and if the hon. gentleman finds any comfort in the statement, denied by Mr. Blake afterwards, that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity leads to annexation, he can, on the other hand, find consolation in the assertion by that gentleman, in the same letter, declaring that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite will lead to our absorption by the United States. I suppose in the one case Mr. Blake is as good a witness as in the other; and having given him the highest possible character, having spoken of him in a manner that would do credit to the most enthusiastic follower of that hon. gentleman, having spoken of him as a most reliable witness, the hon. gentleman must accept the authority as a whole and admit that Mr. Blake strikes at hon. gentlemen opposite just as much as he does at us. Speaking of the High Commissioner, the hon. gentleman also said that Sir Charles Tupper, in his breast, felt that Canada was as dear to him as ever. However that may be, there is scarcely a man, woman or child in Canada who does not believe that Sir Charles Tupper is as dear to Canada as ever he was. Whether or not the reasons for his loving this country are the same as those which render him dear to this country, I know not; but I know that, while I shall speak with the greatest possible respect of Sir Charles Tupper, who comes from the same province as I do, I would feel much better had I not, in this question, to speak on matters of fact, on which every man should speak. I do not forget the great services of Sir Charles Tupper to his country, but he only did his duty and was well paid for it. I do not forget that he is a distinguished statesman, but that is all the more reason why he should have remembered that his country's interests and the truth, in speaking of his fellow-citizens, ought to be dearer to him than a party triumph. And here let me say there has been much said on the opposite side about striking at Sir Charles Tupper behind his back. Well, we cannot have him here, and it is not our fault if he is not here; but I want hon. gentlemen opposite to remember that Sir Charles Tupper stabbed a large number of the people of Canada behind their back when they had no chance to reply. Let it not be forgotten that we have evidence before this House, evidence which I consider to be overwhelming and which I will treat of later, to show that Sir Charles Tupper forgot himself in speaking, if not of the majority, at least of the flower and chivalry of Canada. I think this House will admit that they would much prefer not having to speak or to vote on this matter. I submit that there are many hon. gentlemen opposite who believe Sir Charles Tupper made a mistake, who believe that astute statesman did forget himself as he never did before. He had assisted in winning the elections and the elections were won. Then was the time to be generous, then was the time to forget, even if he had thought that such a thing was possible, what his opponents had said or what he might consider they believed: but I do not think that even Sir Charles Tupper believed—and I know many hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe either—that the Opposition hold the views ascribed to them. We are told that we should not discuss this matter, that it is ungenerous on our part to discuss it. No, I submit it is not. The whole matter comes down to this: If the resolution of the leader of the Opposition be true, should we pass it? If the statements in that resolution be true, ought we to vote that Sir Charles Tupper be recalled? Now, if Sir Charles Tupper has said what he is charged in that resolution with having said, there is not an hon. gentleman opposite but will admit that he has slandered the people of Canada, and that he has slandered the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Let us see. Does the evidence agree with this? I said a moment ago that, had the defence been confined to that put forward by the hon. the Minister of Justice, I would not have felt called upon to say anything in this discussion. But this issue has raised the two pleas. The plea raised by the hon. Minister of Justice, cautious, good pleader as he is, is simply a denial. Other members file the plea of confession and avoidance. Can both the pleas stand together? It must not be forgotten that hon. gentlemen opposite, though they cheered to the echo the Minister of Justice when he rose, paid less attention to his argument when he sat down than they did when other hon. members taunted this side of the House with having been disloyal. I think they desired that that should be proved to be the case, and that they are hanging their political fortunes on that. Let me commend to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) the desirability of avoiding fault finding and the use of harsh expressions. He may find it disagreeable to have harsh words used, and he should be sure that he, as an independent member, can refrain from falling into the same error. The Minister of Justice said that Sir Charles Tupper denied all that Sir Charles Tupper was stated to have said, and went on to say that the Liberals who were returned to this House at the recent election would not have come here if they had not avowed their loyalty to British institutions and their disavowal of the disloyal utterances which had been attributed to them. Well, I, for one, found very little occasion to avow my loyalty. Where we were known, we had no reason to say that we were loyal. The country knew from our actions that we were loyal, but it was only hon. gentlemen on the other side who had to proclaim their loyalty. There were three classes who were attempted to be caught by this loyalty cry. One class was those who were really loyal, the class who believe that the institutions of this country are the best in the world and who believe that there is something in men who say that their opponents are disloyal. The second class consists of those who were anxious to leave the Conservative party but were standing off and saying: We cannot leave that party because it is stated that the other party is disloyal. The third class was the dapper gentlemen who appear on certain gala days, who dress in the uniform of Her Majesty, and are never heard except when they say they are willing to lay down their lives for their country when there is no battle to be fought. Many electors no doubt were caught by this cry in the last election, but the fact is that the Government returned here with a majority of less than 30 after having a majority, as they claimed, of over 50, and that shows that all this preaching of disloyalty and all attempts to bolster up their party by such a cry did not have the success they expected. The country took them on their merits in four weeks, and, if there had been four weeks more, those hon. gentlemen would not have been in their places to-day. Will they say that this country is so rankly disloyal, and that so large a number of Opposition members can be returned, and are those who elected them to be branded as disloyal? Whenever an election is run, there is always a crisis, according to these gentlemen. At one time it is stated that money will not come into the country unless they are kept in power. At another time, it is another cry. At each election, there is a crisis, and at each election Sir Charles Tupper must be sent for, as they cannot do without him. It is the highest possible compliment to Sir Charles Tupper. Were not the advisers of Her Majesty in this House sufficient to conduct the campaign? They had at their head, as we all admit, the ablest politician in Canada. They had the Minister of Finance, who could explains how little he had taken out of the pockets of the people to meet his large expenditure. They had the Minister of Public Works, whose works are as clear as daylight. They had the Minister of Justice, and I will take second place to no man in giving him the position he deserves. I thought, when he made that brilliant speech the other day which had so little in it, that he could hardly remember the time when he adorned the bench, and I was sure that, if I or anyone else attempted to make such a speech before him, with that inexorable logic which he possesses, he would have swept it away like cobwebs and would have shown that there was no reason in such argument. Then, there was the Minister of the Interior, whose great powers were so graphically described the other day by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Then, there was the Minister of War. Surely we disloyal men could be kept from carrying out our disloyalty when he, in his gay trappings, mounted on his prancing charger, having strictly prohibited the use of fire-crackers, could ride into his self-chosen Champs de Mars and say that the recalcitrant Liberals would have to pass over his body before they would obtain the object of their treason. Surely these and the other members of the Government were sufficient, but no: a moribund Government, with moribund lists, and a moribund policy, had to go out of the country and call in Sir Charles Tupper, to call in the great doctor, the magic doctor, to use his golden elixir as the lymph by which he would put life into the party and strengthen their sinews and bring them back again triumphant. I say, that is great praise for Sir Charles Tupper. No higher praise could be given to him. But, if that means that no election can be conducted at a great crisis without Sir Charles Tupper, I submit that the quicker Sir Charles Tupper joins the Government the better, or the quicker other men take their places the better still. I have only to say this much in reference to the Minister of Marine: I sympathize with him. No man could sympathize with him more than I did. He had to depend upon himself, and I could understand how all the instincts of his manly nature were roused in defence of his father, Sir Charles Tupper was sent for in order that the Government might get the advantage of his "skill, his influence and his eloquence;" and yet, when he was put on his trial, only the Minister of Justice, by a bare denial, could be found to stand up for him. But yesterday Sir Charles Tupper might have stood against the world—now, none so base as to do him reverence. Where were the Ministers who had profited by his golden elixir? Where were the Ministers who held their seats before he came here? Was this chivalrous? We heard a good deal from the other side, the party of gentlemen, about the methods that are carried on on this side. Was it chivalrous for the members of the Cabinet to leave him to his son, feeling as he did the delicacy of his position, who alone stood up among them all to speak for his father? I submit that that was not an exhibition that did credit to the Ministers, because, although he did not say so, they ought all to be ready, and nothing, except that they did not need to go to his rescue, nothing, except the fact that the Minister of Justice had said all that needed to be said, and that Sir Charles needed no defence at their hands, could place them in that position. And if that is the case, then it says very little for the hon. gentlemen opposite who followed him, and have to stand up for Sir Charles Tupper. Now, I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine, that he could be pardoned for many of his strong statements, stronger statements, at least, than were used on this side of the House, and I can very well understand how, chafing under the disadvantage, chafing under the wrong, he might be pardoned for saying what he did. What does he say? "No one would be returned from Nova Scotia who accepted unrestricted reciprocity." I can only speak for myself when I say that I accepted it, and my constituents accepted it; they accept it now, and will accept it as the best method of improving their condition. Then he says that we would not speak as we did of Sir Charles Tupper if he were here; I submit that was not a delicate touch on the part of the Minister of Marine. Unless I misjudge the character of the men on this side of the House, although we can be beaten, we can still stand up again. I can assure the Minister of Marine that that is not the kind of stuff we are made of. I would have him remember that valour resides not in one individual man, and it ought to be enough to say that Sir Charles, after writing all he did, and saying all he did, when offered a free share by a Grand Trunk Railway shareholder to attend a meeting of shareholders and prove his assertions, showed that discretion was the better part of valour, and did not accept the offer. Now, Sir, I submit that, under these circumstances, there need be no fear on this side, even were Sir Charles here. We will be glad when he comes here, and I can assure the Minister of Marine that for one, I, the least among all the members of the Opposition, shall not refrain from stating what I have to say in the presence, even, of Sir Charles Tupper, should I conceive that Sir Charles Tupper was wrong. There is no one man who can so persuade this House by his power, by his eloquence, and by his ability, as to keep the members of the Opposition, or for that matter, the members on the other side, from saying what they want to say; and although the contest may be unequal, we shall strive, as best as we can, to enter the lists, and when defeated once, to enter them again for another fray. No one man has such power. He said that one of the merits of Sir Charles Tupper was that he carried Confederation. Well, that may be a merit. There may be men who differ on that point. I am not going to say one word now about that matter. I want to make a statement for myself, and I trust no man will think that what I say ought to detract from the proof, that so far as my interests are concerned, and the interests of the people of Canada, we are all Canadians, and are building up in this country a nationality of which we may be proud; and I want to say here, that if I could go back to 1867, and undo that history, for myself I would not do it. I want now and here to say that so far as we are concerned, the Liberal party, we are as willing to work out our destiny, and we have as nearly forgotten those old issues as the members of the Conservative party. I want the hon. gentleman to remember that Sir Charles Tupper was not in the company of the great men of that day. The Hon. Joseph Howe, the noblest Roman that ever we had in Nova Scotia, was against him; the late Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, a man on whom the present Administration heaped the highest honours that were in the gift of the Crown, was against him; and no less a distinguished gentleman than the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), genial, dignified, able and eloquent, also opposed Sir Charles Tupper. Now he supports him, and I blame him not; now he is his friend, and I blame him not. But I want the hon. gentleman to remember that in that fight in which he took no mean part, he opposed Sir Charles Tupper, and I have not heard his confession, either in public or in private, that he ever thought himself less worthy for having opposed Sir Charles Tupper in 1867. I can assure that hon. gentleman that while there are many in Nova Scotia to-day who regret the methods employed at that time, many who will die believing that they were wrong, the great mass of the people of Nova Scotia are willing to forget that wrong, and I may say that the great majority of the people of Nova Scotia do not wish, at this early stage in our history, to canonize the man who carried them into Confederation despite all the glorification he gets here. I myself have only to say that so far as that issue was concerned, the people of Nova Scotia fought him believing they were right, the facts will show in the future that the methods were wrong, and the sequel will show that Providence was kinder to the country than the men who attempted to make its history at that time. Now, I said a short time ago that the whole question amounts to this: Was there ground for this motion? Is there evidence? I am not going to say a word upon that evidence. That evidence is in, it goes to make up the record in this House, and if I may be allowed to give an opinion, it is now, as it was to me before, conclusive that Sir Chas. Tupper did at least, to speak very kindly of him, lose his head at that time. Now, let it never be forgotten that the distinctions drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite between the leaders of the Liberal party and the rank and file of the Liberal party will not stand. Did not the hon. gentleman think that when the leaders were assailed as disloyal, then every man that voted for the leaders was disloyal too? That they adopted what was said by their leaders as being true? Did it never strike hon. gentlemen opposite that when they stated the leaders were disloyal, and when the people who followed the Opposition showed unmistakably, the last time, their sympathy with them, their sympathy with all that they did in Parliament—did it never strike them that the Liberal electors must either be dishonest in voting for disloyal men, or they must be disloyal themselves? It was said by some hon. gentlemen opposite that they wanted the people of Canada to speak well of their country. I want to do that, too. I am not going to impute any disloyal motives to those on the opposite side of the House. But I will say this, that the man who states that another is a disloyal man, who attempts to brand a large number of his fellow-citizens as men seeking an alliance with a foreign state, when he knows it is not true, is a worse man and strikes a more severe blow at his country than if he spoke against its material wealth all his life. In the former case, in charging disloyalty, he is speaking against a man's character, speaking of men as disloyal to their country, as men who although living in the country have their hearts elsewhere and are annexationists. If the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper, that the leaders of the Liberal party were disloyal, is allowed to pass, and he is to be held up to respect and reverence when that statement is incorrect, then I submit he is dealing a deadlier blow, if it should have any effect in Canada, than all the articles of the Government's party declaring we decry our country. We do not decry our country. We wish to state the facts about our country. Hon. gentlemen opposite think they are the country. Those hon. gentlemen think that if we talk about them and their methods we are disloyal. It is the old story over again. Louis XVI lost his head. Were all the Frenchmen opposed to him disloyal? Yet in every action of the men there was that germ of truth that gives to France its present glory. Were the brave men who fought against tyranny in England honest and true, or were they disloyal? We must assume they were loyal men, because they showed they held the best interests of the kingdom at heart. If we are disloyal because we speak against extravagance in high places and honestly think we are acting in the best interests of the country, I accept the accusation—I am disloyal because I am disloyal to that which is wrong. Does it follow that, when a man is opposed to the wrong, he is disloyal? Do hon. gentlemen opposite contain all the loyalty of the country? Are we not doing that which we think right, in battling, as we do with all our hearts, against the policy which has been imported from across the border, the worn-out shreds of republican protection, and when we are fighting for free trade in the interests of the people because it is the principle that every Englishman believes in, which has given England her continued glory? Are we disloyal because we are opposed to this miserable trade policy of the United States, which has been introduced into Canada? That is the whole question. By-and-bye no man can say to a Minister, or a follower of the Government, that any improper action has been taken, without receiving as a reply: You are disloyal. So well have they indoctrinated their followers with that view that the whole Civil Service of Canada believe, not that they are serving the people of the Dominion, but are serving the Government; they are the officers of the Government, the Government have everything to do with them. I said a moment ago that Sir Charles Tupper, at Amherst, laid the foundation for the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister. I was anticipating the event by a short time, I mean the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and my hon. friend had good ground for making that statement. Throughout Nova Scotia they well understand, and it did not need the remark of the Minister of Justice to make them act accordingly, that they are the officers of the Government, and they must, whenever an election is called, stand up and work for the Government. I am sure the Minister of Justice will not in his calmer moments say that Sir Charles Tupper, when he came to this country, took his fortunes in his hand. Must it be laid down as a principle that every officer of the public service, forsooth, is bound to take his fortune in his hand, to be a soldier of fortune, a political Major Dalgetty, to fight his fight and to prepare for the worst? Such a system would give the civil servant every opportunity not only of using his political influence but of using what he gets from the Government to keep him in power. Is that true British doctrine? I am not surprised at its introduction here, for it is an adjunct of the protective system of the United States, and we have imported this as the second part of American politics into this country, following as naturally in the wake of protection as night follows day. Hon. gentlemen opposite must also introduce the system of spoils and carry out the American doctrine that to the victors alone belong the spoils. I had vainly thought that in this new country we were going to build up a nationality which would engraft on itself that which was best from the old country; but hon. gentlemen opposite in their great loyalty have not gone to England for a pattern but have travelled across the border. Did it require that a member of the Government should rise in this House and lay down that doctrine? What will every office-holder in the Dominion think? He will now say, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Justice we are to so act, it is the correct method; we take our fortunes in our hands, we are asked to go into the fight with our fortunes and use all our power not to serve loyally and truly the interests of the people, but to keep ourselves in power, to fight the battles of the party, and to expect that when the smoke clears away we will be continued in office. Yet, I doubt not that these hon. gentlemen, should the same principle be applied when a change of Government takes place, be the first to whine under the lash. They would not wish that principle applied to them. If it were applied, they would find all the offices empty and new men going in. Would that be a good thing for this country? Soldiers of fortune, forsooth! The civil servants would be fighting the battles of the Government and theirs alone; no difference whatever interests are involved, no difference what wrong has been done, no difference if the country is being bled in the interests of the very power under which they hold office, they must stand by the Government, because the Government stands by them. I think the very statement of the case should lead any hon. gentleman on reflection to conclude it is wrong. Is the evidence in support of the resolution now before the House here? We have had a number of definitions of the office held by Sir Charles Tupper, given by the Minister of Justice and other hon. gentlemen, definitions, I admit, wide enough to cover the present case, definitions put out in advance to cover the next case. No two of these definitions agree; but the definition is wise enough to cover all the extravagance of Sir Charles Tupper and all the methods he adopted when last in Canada. If that evidence is complete; if that evidence is such as should lead to the recall of Sir Charles Tupper, I am sure the Government should recall him. In that case, I am sure, too, that Sir Charles would agree to it. I am satisfied that all he said during the election and after the election, if there is power in his words, must have done more harm to Canada than all the writing we have had in this country for the last 20 years. I am sure neither his skill nor his eloquence was used to the best advantage. It is said Sir Charles was sent for. I admit it, but surely it was to do the right thing and not act according to these methods. Hon. members no doubt noted how very carefully the First Minister spoke of Sir Charles Tupper some days ago in this House. The right hon. gentleman said nothing about Sir Charles' utterances. The Government assumed nothing, and the remarks so quietly and suggestively made by the Finance Minister when asked what the Government's intention was in regard to Sir Charles Tupper, was in the same strain, that the Government was giving the matter its attentive consideration. At that time and subsequently, unless the remark was a pleasantry, they were considering what should be done, and the conclusion they arrived at was that they should deny the whole charge, put us on the proof, and then say that the proof was not sufficient. It is said we of the Opposition are in favour of American institutions, that we are the party seeking to ally ourselves with the United States and that at this great crisis every man should have reason as he did to stand by Queen and country. I state here most positively that the only disloyal party in Canada are the Ministerialists. They are disloyal because their methods are American, they are disloyal because their conduct is American, they are disloyal because they are seeking to carry on a Government on the corrupt methods that obtain in that country, and they are disloyal because they have taken the worst features of Government in that country and applied them to this country. But are we the friends of the United States? No: we are not; and what authority is there for this? The papers laid upon the Table of this House yesterday in reference to the trade relations between Canada and the United States, state that Sir Charles Tupper showed conclusively to the satisfaction of Mr. Blaine, that the only party in Canada favourable to the United States was the party of which he is a member. He tried to show that the Liberal party of Canada always opposed every concession, and that his great difficulty was not alone to carry out methods by which we could have better trade relations with the United States; but in answering the Liberal party who are always finding fault with him for every concession which he made in the direction of extended trade relations with the United States. Sir Charles Tupper showed conclusively that the party in Canada who are in favour of the greatest possible trade relations with the United States was the Conservative party, and that the Liberals were the enemies of any better treatment of the United States by Canada. Read the papers and you will see if Sir Charles Tupper does not say this. Now I am sure that whatever Sir Charles Tupper may be, his statements will be evidence coming from a witness who is opposed to us and must be accepted by gentlemen opposite. He has given the Liberals the best possible character, he has shown to Mr. Blaine conclusively that we want no relations with the United States and that the Conservatives do, and I submit that in the face of all that it was not well that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) should speak about making pilgrimages. Pilgrimages forsooth, the last and most ridiculous pilgrimage comes from the side of hon. gentlemen opposite; pilgrimages so short in their duration that even the shrine could not be viewed; pilgrimages so short in their duration that even the smallest possible history of the saint could not be studied; pilgrimages so short that these brave men simply walked up the hill and down again; pilgrimages which we shall hear more about later on. The remark of the member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), in which he dared to say that the leader of the Opposition is forming the opinion and writing the resolutions of members across the border who are introducing this subject in the United States Senate and Congress, is an insult to the House. When he blunderingly took up last year's resolutions, and could not find this year's resolution in it, his answer was: Well, the men who write them over there can best find where they are. Is not that worse than the language of Sir Charles Tupper? And yet the hon. gentleman says he is an independent member; so are they all, all honourable men, every one of them. I submit that the evidence is conclusive against Sir Charles Tupper in this matter, and coming as I do from Nova Scotia let me say that I regret very much that Sir Charles Tupper should have said and done what he did. I would have much preferred that this statesman should have gone down to posterity with a brighter latter-day glory than he has at present, owing to his conduct at the last election. I submit that it would have been more in his own interest and in the interest of Canada, if, after having won the election, he should have been generous enough to have at least spoken a kindly word, that he should not have followed up his vituperation before the election by worse language after the election, and that he should not have attempted to throttle one of the greatest institutions in this country. We hear a great deal about loyalty from members on the other side of the House, but the men who shout loyalty are not the men who have it. The man who constantly speaks of his religious opinion is not the man who has very solid religious opinions, and loyalty, like that higher, and better, and nobler principle, lies in a man's heart and shows in a man's character, and not on a man's lips. The man who needs to be continually calling out that he is loyal, feels nothing of the first principle of loyalty which tries to improve a man's surroundings and to cause him to look upon his country as something he should serve, and not himself. There are men in this country whose hands are elbow deep in the public treasury, and yet we find them, like the thief running away with the bags of gold, when the populace shout "thief, thief"—they cry out that they are loyal. There are men in this country who are crying loyalty who are not as loyal than the gentlemen on this side of the House. I will not say that the gentlemen opposite are disloyal, but the fact that they are continually crying out that they are loyal is strong evidence to the contrary. During this great crisis the election was run upon that issue. All other issues were forgotten, the Government had no defence of their methods, they had nothing to say in favour of their conduct for the last five years, and so they fell to crying loyalty and trying to abuse their opponents. Loyalty of that kind is not the loyalty that will tend to the growth of Canada. The man who tries to make his home happy and prosperous, the man who wishes to lessen the difficulties of life, the man who wishes to get the freest possible relations with his neighbours, the man who wishes to make this country a cheap country to live in and to give us the most for our toil and labour, the man who adopts the principle which will lead us to sell our goods in the dearest market and to buy in the cheapest market is the only true loyal Canadian in this country of ours. By these methods and these only can the country be made prosperous. By these methods and these only can the condition of the poor be relieved, and by these methods only, pursued, as they are, by the Liberal party who have at heart the welfare of the people of this country, can prosperity be secured. It never can be secured by the methods pursued by the hon. gentlemen opposite who are shouting loyalty while they are impoverishing the country. That Sir Charles Tupper should have come to this country and should have stated that these men who are desirous of the best interests of their country, the men who had to fight their elections without the power of the Government at their back, the men who had to fight the methods resorted to by hon. gentlemen opposite—for Sir Charles Tupper to brand these men as disloyal, is, to say the least of it, one of the most infamous charges that was ever brought against a great party in Canada. I do not say a word about hon. gentlemen opposite and their loyalty. I leave that to themselves, but the least said about it the better. I will assume for the time being they are loyal, but loyal men are ready to believe that others are loyal and to accord to others the same right which they claim for themselves. Now, Sir, if it is disloyal for the Liberal party to seek better trade relations with the United States, what of the conduct of the Government, who, finding themselves in straits so desperate, that Sir Charles Tupper had to be sent for, had to borrow or steal a part of the Liberal policy, before they would dare to go to the country? What is to be thought of the men of the party opposite talking about discrimination, when they themselves have made a discriminatory offer against Great Britain to the United States? Under the treaty of 1854, which they offered to the United States, thirty articles were included, which thirty articles were a discrimination against Great Britain. Are they ready now to put one single article upon the free list, except raw material; and if they are it is only a question of degree. If hon. gentlemen opposite are ready to put one single article that comes from Great Britain into a treaty with the United States they are just as disloyal to Great Britain as if we had reciprocity in all articles. The London Standard, one of the greatest papers in England, published an article during the late election in reference to both the political parties in Canada, and the view of that journal was that the policy of both parties was only a question of degree, and where the loyalty question came in no man could understand. Let me say in conclusion that there is only one way of making people loyal, and if these gentlemen opposite are going to carry on the business of this country, if they think they are going to build up a United Canada by flinging lying charges against the members of the Opposition, they are very much mistaken. There are members of the Opposition in this House who, if the question of loyalty came to be discussed, could talk of loyalty as loudly as they. They could show that in their veins ran the blood of men who were ready, when the forefathers of their accusers were resting quietly at their homes, to take their lives in their hands and fight for their country. And these men who talk of disloyalty are maintaining a policy that is doing more to make men disloyal in this country than anything else. During the time the reciprocity treaty was in force, there could not be a more loyal people than the people of Nova Scotia. Prosperity was universal; and during that time—and I only mention it to show the result of people being well fed, well clothed, and well housed—there was a sentiment of loyalty throughout the province which could not have been exceeded. Every man was under arms. We had a militia law which compelled every man to bear arms for a certain number of days every year. So that a policy which will feed people and fill their homes with plenty, a policy which will make all their relations in life happy and prosperous, is a policy that will make them loyal. You make people disloyal when you cease to give them the objects of life. What makes the people of Ireland disloyal to-day? Is it not the action of the Government? Is it not the fact that they have not the necessaries of life? And I tell you that if this country were more prosperous, if it were enjoying the prosperity that it enjoyed under the old reciprocity treaty, there would not be a word of disloyalty. But go on making the conditions of life harder, go on depleting the country, go on driving our young men from the country, and you will sap the foundations of the loyalty of our people. I am going to vote for the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I am going to vote for it because I think the case is proved; because I think that Sir Charles Tupper uttered statements against our leaders which no follower ought to accept. I am going to vote for it because I think the best interests of this country require that the man who acts on behalf of Canada in England should be so free from politics as not to take any part whatever in them, and thus acting in the interest of our common country, will be removed from the temptation of saying and doing what he should not. Considering the case well proven, considering the evidence sufficient, and considering that Sir Charles Tupper has done that which he ought not to do in the best interests of the people of Canada, I am going to vote for the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Speaker, when this resolution was moved, a few evenings ago, by the hon. leader of the Opposition, it was not my intention to offer any remarks on the question; but since that time, the discussion has taken such a wide range, and so many different phases of it have been presented, that I feel I would be doing violence to my own conscience if I did not, at this stage, offer a few observations. I feel that a great wrong has been attempted to be done to the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper. When we consider the prominent position that hon. gentleman has occupied in the Province from which I come, down by the sea, for the past forty years, I think it ill-becomes anyone from that province to hurl against him such epithets as we have heard in this debate, from some of the hon. gentlemen sitting on the left of the Speaker. If we consider the different positions the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper has filled in that province for the last forty years, we may well ask ourselves, how comes it that such a man as my hon. and extensive friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) can make the remarks he has just made? Sir Charles Tupper, it is in the recollection of many hon. gentlemen in this House, entered political life as long ago as 1854. Since then, he has been identified with every important question that has arisen, not only in his native province, but in this great confederacy of ours. In the great work of Confederation he was allied with such Liberals as the late Hon. Mr. Howe and the late Hon. Senator Brown, Liberals whose cheeks would burn with shame if they were here to-night and listened to the speeches of some of those who claim that political title. He was, I say, associated with prominent Liberals and Conservatives of honoured memory, men who have gone to receive their reward; he was associated with the right hon. Premier, who, and I utter it with heart-sore and profound sorrow, lies to-night on his death-bed; he was associated with those honoured men who made this nation of ours what it is to-day. I was surprised the other evening to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). That hon. gentleman sat, I think in this assembly for some years with the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, at whom he was hurling his vilest abuse; yet during all those years that hon. gentleman never dared to point his finger to one single wrong or wrongful act of Sir Charles Tupper's during his long political lifetime, but he chooses to vent his spleen against him only when he finds him 3,000 miles away. During that time we never heard any reference to Springhill, or any of these other conjured up and exploded charges that find their utterance when the object of them is far away. But, Mr. Speaker, when I look into Hansard and read the speeches of the hon. member for West Huron, I am not at all surprised at the attitude he assumed when discussing this question. What did he say the other evening? He said:

"Had the motion of my hon. friend gone further than it does, I would have voted for it; I would have voted to abolish the office and to abolish Sir Charles Tupper at the same time. I never could see the utility or necessity for this office."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLIES. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but I think I can quote an authority at this very moment that is sufficient to convince even him of the inaccuracy of his statement, and that will show him both the utility and necessity of this office. I will read an extract from an address of the cattle dealers of Montreal presented to Sir Charles Tupper at a public banquet on the 9th May, 1884, and what does it say :

"We have learned with deep regret that your public duties will prevent the acceptance of the banquet tendered you by the cattle exporters of Canada, a regret that is the greater because an opportunity would then have been afforded of demonstrating the appreciation in which your public services, and especially the signal services you have rendered the cattle trade, are held by us. * * *

"Your vigorous, prompt and judicious action last autumn when a cargo of Canadian cattle was condemned, ordered to be slaughtered, and an embargo about to be placed on the trade, saved this important branch of commerce from a blow that would have definitely checked its development and caused most serious losses to all engaged in it.

"We desire in the name of the cattle exporters of Canada to thank you for that service, and to express our conviction that but for the happy fortune of Canadians possessing so able a representative in England as yourself, their trade would have been temporarily ruined and dwarfed for a long time to come by the scheduling of this country.

"We trust that a similar occasion will not arise, but should it happen otherwise we know that in your presence in England we have the best safeguard against unjust, hasty or harsh action on the part of the British authorities towards the export cattle trade of Canada.

"Montreal, 7th May, 1884."

I confidently submit that any one of those names would be quite sufficient to meet any of the virulent statements of the hon. member from Huron against the High Commissioner. This document of itself shows the ability displayed by the High Commissioner ; it shows the high tribute paid him by one of the largest commercial institutions in this country. The signers of this document admit that were it not for the action of Sir Charles Tupper in London the cattle trade would be lost to this country—a trade that is estimated to amount this year to forty million dollars. That, I think, very fairly disposes of the allegations of the hon. member for Huron, and should enlighten him as to the necessity and utility of the office of High Commissioner of Canada. That hon. gentleman, in the course of the debate, said he would like the Government to point out "what Sir Charles Tupper had ever done in the interests of Canada?" I point to the address I have just read and say that is a sufficient answer. But this is not all. We could go on adducing other reasons, equally potent with the one I have given, to show the great services done by the High Commissioner at London, and this I propose doing a little further on in the course of my remarks. But the head and front of his offending is the fact that he took part in the last election. We are asked : Was he justified in coming out here at that particular juncture? In the first place, we know that Sir Charles Tupper came here, as the hon. the Premier has told us himself, at the First Minister's earnest request ; and the point has been well taken that it is at the heads of the members of the Cabinet the resolution should be hurled for the offence, if offence it is, and not at Sir Charles Tupper. Had that been done, I am quite sure that the Cabinet would be fully prepared to meet the charge. But, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles Tupper, believing that the policy advocated by the leaders of the Opposition would be, in the highest degree, inimical to the interest of the Dominion, came over here and lent his valuable assistance to prevent the dire results to this country which would follow the adoption of that policy. Believing himself right, he entered into the contest with all his might. He believed that the doctrine propounded by Mr. Wiman would lead ultimately, perhaps immediately, to annexation. The great father of the fad on this continent, if it has any paternity at all, is Mr. Erastus Wiman. What does that gentleman say? I quote from the Boston Herald of the 22nd January, in which is contained a full account of a large meeting held at Thorndike in Boston, on the 21st January last, at which were present Mr. Erastus Wiman and Mr. W. H. H. Murray to discuss the question of unrestricted reciprocity. The leading men of Boston were present, and the meeting was presided over by Mr. Lane, President of the Merchants Association. Mr. Wiman there gave full scope to his views, as held by him ; and as they are held by him, so are they held by the advocates of unrestricted reciprocity in this Dominion. He said :

"In opposition to the Tory party which now controls the Government is the Liberal party, which has adopted a policy of entire conciliation towards the United States. The Liberal party believe that an unrestricted reciprocity between the two countries is possible, to the vast advantage of both, and they have adopted it as the chief plank in their platform. This policy, if adopted and put in force by a Liberal Government would settle almost every existing difficulty between the two countries."

He went on further to say :

"Now the question between the Tory party and the Liberal party is to be decided within a very short time, and is to be made the issue at the ensuing election."

Then Mr. Murray, his co-worker in the cause, said :

"I believe the time is soon coming when the Liberal party in Canada, which has always wished us well—the party, in whose members there is no antagonism to joining us—will represent the country and then overtures can be made and they will be received—I mean overtures for union. And by union I mean not unity merely in trade but political unity."

Now, what does that mean? I wish the House to mark well his words. He says: Let the Liberal party get into power and we will have political unity ; we will have the unity of the two peoples. That is annexation. Sir Charles Tupper, fearing such a calamity, flung himself into the midst of the fight. He came, he saw, and, of course, he conquered. It has been well said that the former leader of the Liberal party in this country, Mr. Blake, than whom I believe no more able or true-hearted man ever sat within these walls, and I venture to say a more eloquent voice has not for many years been heard pleading before the British bar within its extensive realm, said, as long ago as four years, that such a policy as unrestricted reciprocity was an impossibility, that it was beyond the domain of practical politics. But, the House will pardon me if I read an extract from Mr. Blake's celebrated speech at Malvern in January, 1887. He says:

"No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of absolute free trade for Canada he may be, no man, I believe, can suggest a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met otherwise than by the continued imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make, or can make, within our bounds, or on the raw materials. I invite the most ardent free trader in public life to present a plausible solution of this problem; and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada."

Yet we have men like the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), who boasts of being a Liberal, what he really is not, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who hurls epithets against his opponents that I would expect to hear from people in lower walks of life than he is supposed or professes to be, saying that it is possible. Mr. Blake goes on and makes his meaning clear:

"I have not believed it soluble in my day, and any chance of its solubility, if chance there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics."

That was Mr. Blake's opinion four years ago, and his recent utterances on that point are fresh in our memory, and are not consoling to the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition. The tributes paid to Sir Charles Tupper by the leaders of the Opposition are, and should be, sufficient to estop them from discussing, or should have estopped them from introducing, this resolution. What does the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), say about Sir Charles Tupper in a speech which will be found on page 105 of the first volume of the Hansard of 1888? I am sure he was an unwilling witness, but he says:

"He is very useful here, and I am bound to say that though I differ from him in toto coelo as to his policy, I think he is much the best Minister of Finance I have come across in my time, on that side of the House for a long period of years."

When we remember that there were such men as the late Sir John Rose, the late Sir Francis Hincks, and other men of great ability, filling that responsible position during the period alluded to, and when we find the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) saying that Sir Charles Tupper, against whom he has been hurling his accusations, was the best Finance Minister he had come across, he paid a great tribute to the ability of that hon. gentleman, and is consequently convicted by his own utterance. Here is another unwilling witness: the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) said the same evening:

"I fully agree in the tribute which has been paid to the ability of the Finance Minister by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I also fully and frankly accept his statement that the work of the office of High Commissioner was never more efficiently performed than during the year that has passed."

There is a double tribute paid to the hon. gentleman they are now endeavouring to traduce. In one paragraph a tribute is paid to his efficiency as High Commissioner, and in the other part the highest possible tribute is paid to his ability as Finance Minister. That is not all. Hon. gentlemen will remember the Hon. Peter Mitchell, who, it will be conceded, was no very great friend of Sir Charles Tupper, particularly during the last years he was in this House, and at the time he made the speech from which I quote. What does he say?

"When the hon. gentleman was appointed High Commissioner everybody was pleased. The country had confidence in his abilities, and I think his career on the other side of the Atlantic showed that a High Commissioner, who has some skill and some knowledge of the interests of the country, was of great service. I recollect that on one occasion, when Canada was threatened with being scheduled against the importation of cattle into Great Britain, the hon. gentleman took the matter up, went down to Liverpool, went into the cattle yards, took off his coat, and with that scientific and practical knowledge he possesses, convinced the British Government Commissioners that it was unnecessary to schedule the cattle of Canada."

Those are the words of the Hon. Peter Mitchell, and I think they meet the query of the member for South Huron when he asks: "I would like the Government to point out to this House what Sir Charles Tupper has ever done in the general interests of Canada?" But that is not all. Hon. gentlemen will remember that Hon. Mr. Jones represented the County of Halifax, and I do not think anyone will accuse him of having been a very warm friend of Sir Charles Tupper, but he said in this House of Sir Charler Tupper:

"I think the ground my hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) took with reference to the services of the High Commissioner in London might entitle that gentlemen to our high approbation."

Now, I hold that the evidence of those four unwilling witnesses, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), the Hon. Mr. Mitchell and the Hon. Mr. Jones, all bearing high testimony to the efficacy of the service rendered by Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner in London and as Finance Minister in this House, should be abundantly ample even to convince the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) of the error of his ways. But I have not yet done with producing evidence showing the popularity and ability of Sir Charles Tupper in his position as High Commissioner, and the confidence reposed in his official and executive abilities by all parties. I have here an address presented to Sir Charles Tupper on the 10th September, 1885, by the Agriculture and Arts Association of the Province of Ontario, and signed by George Moore, president, and Henry Wade, secretary, both of whom, I understand, are good and ardent Grits. Now the best kind of testimony are the admissions of a party when those admissions are against himself. This address is as follows:—

"We have learned with pleasure of your appointment as Executive Commissioner for Canada for the Colonial and Indian Exhibition to be held in London next year, and also of the naming of yourself in connection with H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, as a member of the Royal Commission, and we feel assured that under your able direction such a display of the natural products, manufactures, arts and industries of the Dominion will be made as will worthily represent its progress, its wealth and its possibilities, and maintain its proud position as the premier colony of the Empire."

This testimony is given by a party politically hostile to Sir Charles Tupper and I assume, therefore, there is no gainsaying its truth. Now, Sir Charles Tupper, besides being High Commissioner in London, acted as the chief executive commissioner of the Colonial and Indian Exhibition, in 1886, and I hold in my hand an address presented to him at the close of that exhibition by the exhibitors and others, which clearly shows the eminent services rendered the country on that great occasion by Sir Charles Tupper. An address was read on their behalf by the Marquis of Lorne, and was so high in his praise that I beg leave to read a portion of it to the House. It is addressed to Sir Charles Tupper, and reads:

"We, the exhibitors, agents and others, connected with the Canadian section of the Colonial and Indian Exhibition, cannot permit you to leave London without conveying to you a formal expression of our appreciation of the work you have done in the interests of Canada at this exhibition. We, who are on the spot, and have been brought into personal contact with you, can the better appreciate the magnitude of the labour imposed upon you, at the exhibition, in addition to your official duties as High Commissioner of Canada. The earnest and ungrudging spirit you have displayed in attending to the interests of the exhibitors, and watching the advantages to be gained by our country, has raised you greatly in our esteem. When the exhibition was first proposed, you visited Canada, and roused an interest in it in every province, and many producers and manufacturers who did not foresee, as you did, the results of this effort, have now to thank you for opening to them the opportunity of introducing their goods to the markets of this vast Empire. As for the prospective results of the exhibition, never before were the products of our fields, forests, mines and waters, and of our manufacturing skill, and last, though not less important, the character of our educational system, so conspicuously and advantageously placed before the world; and we have already abounding indications that this exhibition will mark a new era for Canada, in her commercial relations with the outside world. The distinguished part you have taken in the attainment of this result is too well known to our countrymen to need emphasis here, and we trust your mission home may be entirely successful."

Now, I respectfully submit that is another answer for the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), and I think it ought to silence him in the future when he is disposed to ask what good thing any man could point to as resulting from the mission of Sir Charles Tupper to London. Here is an extract from a London correspondent of the Toronto Mail, also speaking of the services of Sir Charles Tupper:

"It is only by being in the exhibition daily that one can form an idea of Sir Charles Tupper's unflagging devotion to his country's interests, now so largely at stake, or rather I should say so triumphantly assured. Canada is his one thought, and how to place her before the eyes of the world his only care. Of his ability it is needless for any Canadian journal to speak. But the tireless zeal, the earnest devotion and anxiety with which that ability has been applied to the assurance of Canada's success in this great gathering of her kindred nations, none but a constant eye-witness can know."

I think this is cumulative and convincing testimony of the great services rendered by Sir Charles Tupper to this Dominion. We all know the good that resulted from the Colonial and Indian Exhibition. Our trade with the mother country became vastly extended thereby, and the success of the Canadian section of that exhibition was entirely and admittedly due to the untiring efforts of Sir Charles Tupper. Now, I would like briefly to refer to one portion of the speech made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Fraser). He says that the Liberals never talk about their loyalty, that the shouting is all done on the other side. Well, this is the first time I heard an expression of that kind used. I do not think, indeed, that that assertion will find any response nor corroboration throughout this country. I would ask who, among the members of this House, talk more loudly and more frequently of his loyalty than the leader of the Opposition? Whether at a college dinner, at a political meeting in a remote district of the country, or on the floor of this House, that hon. gentleman avails himself of every possible occasion to drive down our throats, as it were, the belief that he is excessively loyal. I believe he is, I hope he is. I believe the statement that he is because he makes it. Holding the opinion of that hon. gentleman that I do, I feel convinced that of the statements made by his followers many, in this debate, are not approved of by that hon. gentleman. I do think that he is too scholarly and too refined in his feelings to approve of the unrepresentative conduct, without using a harsher and more applicable term, exhibited on the part of some of his supporters who have taken part in this debate. We find members like the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), himself coming from the Maritime Provinces, applying the words "blackguard" and "blackguardism" to such an honoured and honourable gentleman as Sir Charles Tupper, and if the hon. member for Queen's can use such language, it is no wonder that other Maritime members hang down their heads in shame. Let me remind the House that the subject of this debate was the theme of the very last speech made by the right hon. Premier who now lies nigh pulseless, and who said in that voice that we shall never hear again, and upon which our memory will ever love to linger, that Sir Charles Tupper came to this country at his express request, and that he was prepared to accept the full responsibility of his actions. With this it is co-incidental that the late D'Arcy McGee's last speech a few minutes before his life was taken was an eloquent and triumphant defence of Sir Charles Tupper. Sir, I believe that no matter how many members may come from Nova Scotia in future years, no matter of what ability they may be, or of what political stripe, I feel convinced that for many a day and many a year the equal of Sir Charles Tupper from that province will not be seen in this House, and his peer for all time to come among the chosen men of this wide Dominion will be difficult to find.

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not intend to go over the ground so well covered by the members who have spoken on this side. I think it will be difficult for some hon. gentlemen opposite to vote against the motion now before the House. I may mention in particular the Secretary of State (Mr. Chapleau) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives). Only three years ago the question of the conduct to be followed by officers of this House, came up here. Three unfortunate translators were complained of by the Secretary of State and by the member for Sherbrooke, for having interfered in the elections. They had understood that they were at liberty to act as ordinary citizens outside of the session, but because they had interfered in the elections of the hon. member for Sherbrooke and the hon. Secretary of State, those hon. gentlemen lodged a complaint against the translators and they were dismissed. Their dismissal by the Speaker was not only approved of by the members on the other side of the House, but it was very strongly insisted upon by those two hon. gentlemen. I need not go over the details of the charges made against Sir Charles Tupper. I think they have been proved to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced man in this country. I think there can be no doubt, after this discussion, that Sir Charles Tupper, being an officer of this Dominion, being a paid servant, not of one party alone, but of both parties, and being very highly paid by the two parties to work for this country, has left his duties in London to come to this country to support one of the parties. But Sir Charles Tupper has not contented himself with that. Many quotations have been made from the speeches he delivered during the election. I may add something as to what he did in Quebec. We had the advantage of a visit from the High Commissioner. On 26th February last, he addressed a large meeting at Tara Hall, Quebec, in my own division. It was intended to promote the candidature of my adversary. It was an extraordinary meeting, for there was electoral bribery, not small bribery, but bribery of the highest kind, such bribery as can be called high bribery by the High Commissioner of Canada. Three enterprises have been desired by the people of Quebec for a great number of years. One is the release of debentures of $1,000,000 due by the North Shore Railway to the Dominion Government. Sir Charles Tupper promised the release of those debentures. It appears from the statement made, the other day by the Minister of Public Works in answer to a question put by me, that in order to make his promise more distinct a telegram sent by the Premier to Sir Charles Tupper was garbled by him, for it would not have suited his purpose to have read it in its entirety. Another public enterprise in which the people of Quebec have been taking a very great interest during the last four or five years is the construction of a bridge opposite the city. Sir Charles Tupper called the citizens to elect a ministerial candidate and get the bridge. He said they might consider the bridge an accomplished fact—and he said so although it would cost four million dollars. The third enterprise in which the people of Quebec are interested is the establishment of a line of mail steamers from that port. Again Sir Charles Tupper promised they would get the line, and the steamers were to have the size and speed of the Teutonic. Sir Charles Tupper did not content himself with these statements. He had to speak of his opponents, and he traduced them and their leaders. I will quote from the Quebec Chronicle, the leading Conservative paper of the city, the remarks he made :

"He publicly charged that Cartwright, Farrer and Erastus Wiman sought to subvert the Canadian people from their allegiance to Great Britain. He spoke of Mr. Laurier's high attainments"—

He did not dare to do what he did at Amherst because it would not be safe, for no one would have taken the responsibility for his protection if he had said one word of a disparaging character against the leader of the Opposition, because if there is anyone there for whom all the citizens of Quebec of both political parties have respect and admiration it is the leader of the Opposition. Sir Charles Tupper had proof of that feeling during the meeting, for whenever he made a charge against the Opposition, there were cheers for Mr. Laurier. The report continues :

"He spoke of Mr. Laurier's high attainments, but he said he was a weak tool in the hands of designing men."

These are the words of a man who is paid $12,000 a year as salary to represent both parties of this country, and it is paid just as much by the people represented by members on the Opposition benches as by those represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. But he said something worse. It has been proved that he attacked the Grand Trunk Railway. He has acted the part of a traitor to this country. If there is one objection I have to the resolution it is that it does not go far enough. It reproaches Sir Charles Tupper in his capacity of High Commissioner for having interfered during the late elections, and with having attacked the Grand Trunk Railway ; but, I repeat, he did something infinitely worse. What would he said of an ambassador of Great Britain who, in a foreign country, traduced one of the portions of the kingdom and tried to ruin the credit of that portion ? That is what Sir Charles Tupper has been doing. The proof of it is to be found in this morning's Citizen, in the words used by the High Commissioner against the Province of Quebec. When the position of High Commissioner was created, it was stated that his principal usefulness would be in promoting the credit of the country and assisting in loans that would from time to time be made in England. What has Sir Charles Tupper done ? It is known, and he knows it better than anyone else, that at the last session of the Legislature of Quebec a law was passed authorizing a loan of $10,000,000. It was known that Mr. Mercier, the Premier of the province, and his colleague, the Treasurer of the province, were about to visit Europe to raise this loan for the consolidation of the provincial debt. Sir Charles Tupper should have done his best to help them so as to earn his salary, it was his bounden duty to help them to float the provincial loan and strengthen the credit of the province. But, instead of doing so, he used his best efforts to render the loan a failure. I quote the words he used, as they appear in the Citizen :

"Mercier, by his wild extravagance and determination to hold on to power, has spent the last dollar in the treasury. He is wandering about from bank to bank now, borrowing money at 6 per cent. interest to carry on his Government from day to day, and passed an Act of repudiation, the most dishonourable and injurious ever passed in a British province, and in fact the only instance of its kind in the British Empire. He has destroyed the credit of Quebec. His efforts on behalf of Mr. Laurier are well understood, and are the last throw of a ruined gamester."

I must say at once that a portion of that statement is a complete falsehood. It is not true there was an Act passed by the Legislature of Quebec repudiating its liabilities. Mr. Mercier is very strong and very popular in Quebec, but neither Mr. Mercier nor any other strong man could induce the Legislature or any portion of the Legislature to pass such a dishonourable Act as an Act of repudiation of its debts. It is not true that any such Act was ever passed. Even if that were true, it would not be becoming of the High Commissioner representing this country to run down the credit of Quebec. I say again it is untrue ; there never was any such Act passed by the Legislature of Quebec. We have the proofs before us that Sir Charles Tupper has acted the part of a traitor to his country, or a traitor to the Province of Quebec at least. He has struck Quebec a deadly blow with the financial institutions in England ; he has done his very best to prevent the loan which is to be floated from being a success, and he has injured the credit of the province as much as he had power to do. This being the case, I cannot understand how any member from the Province of Quebec, having the slighest respect for his province can do otherwise than vote for the resolution proposed by the leader of the Opposition. The only regret I have is, and I repeat it again, that the motion does not go far enough. I think the motion should condemn Sir Charles as a traitor to the Dominion of Canada and especially to the Province of Quebec.

Mr. TISDALE. At this late hour of the night, and particularly as I understand that members upon both sides of the House are desirous for a division as they are anxious to get away, I shall not trouble the House with any remarks upon this question. I did intend to trespass on the indulgence of the House for a short time but I shall forego it under these circumstances. I shall simply confine myself to a statement in regard to one of the matters discussed in this motion. I desire to say that in the riding which I represent, and also in the adjacent riding which returned a Government supporter, the Grand Trunk Railway or their officials did not in any way interfere with the elections, and the large majority of their employés voted for me and for the other hon. gentleman in an adjacent riding who was also a Government supporter.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I consider this speech of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) one of the strongest contributions we have had in this debate. The hon. gentleman has shown those who have attempted to make out that Sir Charles Tupper had not vilified and traduced the management of the Grand Trunk Railway road that to his own certain knowledge they are wrong. He has borne testimony that in his riding where the Grand Trunk Railway has a considerable power, to his own knowledge there was no effort made on their part in order to induce or compel their employés to vote in one direction or the other. It is a very strong testimony coming from that side of the House, and it will relieve us from the burden of referring at a great length again to the proofs which have been placed before the House by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. The question has wandered somewhat, and a discussion has been had to-night by hon. gentlemen opposite in a direction that seems to me would be more appropriate when we engage in the Budget debate. The proposition we are discussing to-night is the resolution that is offered by the leader of the Opposition, which is as follows :—

"The conduct and language of Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner of Canada in England, in interfering in the recent elections and in imputing treasonable and disloyal motives to a large proportion of the people of this Dominion, and also in assailing and vilifying the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and in reflecting upon the position of the said company, is a breach of the duties of the office which he fills, and is calculated to destroy the efficiency of the said office, and to injure the credit of the Dominion, besides damaging a very important corporation whose shareholders have invested large sums of money in the work of extending and promoting the railway system of Canada."

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that by the resolution we are called on to say that the language and conduct of Sir Charles Tupper in interfering with the election is a breach of the high office which he filled; that when he imputed treasonable and disloyal motives to a large portion of the people of this Dominion, and that when he attacked and vilified the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway, he was also guilty of a breach of the duties of his office. Now, it might be well, perhaps, just at the outset, to consider for a moment the position that Sir Charles Tupper occupies in this country. There has been somewhat of a difference of opinion upon that on the part of gentlemen who have spoken. Some viewed him as a civil servant: true, they said he was high in the Civil Service. Others viewed him in the light of an ambassador, but the Minister of Justice, if I understood him aright, does not take the ground that Sir Charles Tupper occupies a position similar to that of an ambassador. The hon. Minister viewed him as one who is simply an agent of the Government and who was at liberty to take part in party conflicts and election strifes, knowing at the same time if he did so he was taking his official life in his hands, as one of the minor officers in one of the departments would do, and that if the party he lent his aid to was not successful he would then resign his office. I think it is well, just at this point, that we should have the view of the office of High Commissioner and what is due to it, which has been expressed by the hon. gentleman who fills that position. I think that would be useful now, and I am happy to say that I am in a position to give to the House, from the lips of the High Commissioner himself, the light in which he regards that office, and the manner in which he believes the duties should be fulfilled. When Sir Charles Tupper reached Canada, summoned as we were told by the Government to lend them the benefit of his counsel, advice and eloquence, he was interviewed by a reporter of the Daily Citizen of Ottawa, and the Citizen states:

"Sir Charles received a representative of the Citizen, and with his customary courtesy consented to be interviewed. Entering at once upon the subject of his visit to Canada at this juncture, which he did with the utmost candour, Sir Charles said: I was most reluctant to return to this country to take sides in a party struggle. I have always held that the Canadian High Commissioner in England should not identify himself with the fortunes of any party, but should be truly representative of the whole people of Canada, and during my tenure of the office I have endeavoured to act, not as the representative of a party Government, but as a representative of the Canadian people. True, an ambassador even acts for the Government of the day. But Lord Lyons was twelve years an ambassador to France, although the Governments in England rose and fell during that period. Of course the representative of a country would feel it incumbent on him to resign his office in case the policy of the Government for whom he acted was such as, in his judgment, was injurious to the interests of the people. Otherwise, as in the case I have instanced, he would be justified in continuing in office independent of political changes at home. These are the views I hold of the position of the Canadian High Commissioner in London, and under ordinary circumstances and in the regular course of events I should never have consented to depart from this view of my duties."

These are his words: this is his view of what was due to the dignity of the position, and then he goes on to state that there were exceptional circumstances under which alone he found himself able to depart from that line of conduct. He says:

"But the circumstances just now are entirely exceptional. In the first place, we have arrived at a most important crisis in the history of Canada, when our industries and the interests of the people of Canada at large are seriously menaced by the fiscal policy of the United States as embodied in that measure generally known as the McKinley Bill, and it becomes necessary for the Government and the people of this country to put forth every effort to find new channels of trade and to devise means to meet the effects that this restricted measure threatened to bring about."

We find that Sir Charles considered it was his duty to come out here to aid the Government in finding new channels of trade, but I am not aware that he devoted himself to that object. I believe the Minister of Finance attempted to do a little in that line but with very poor success as far as I have heard since. Any effort that was made subsequent to Sir Charles Tupper's visit in order to open up avenues of trade, was not to open new avenues of trade which had been closed through the McKinley tariff, but to go to Washington almost on bended knees, to beg the United States to give us access to their markets as they had done before. In this interview to which I referred Sir Charles Tupper then speaks of Mr. Wiman and said that Mr. Wiman he considered was acting in such a manner and had been giving utterance to such statements that he felt it imperative upon him that he should lend his aid in the contest. The testimony given by Sir Charles Tupper as to what was due to the office of High Commissioner I have read to the House from his own lips: and, Sir, when he left his position and when he took part in politics—he, the paid representative of the Canadian people—he who himself declares his duty to be that of the representative of the whole Canadian people—when he ceased to act in that capacity and came to this country, and not only took part in political strife, but attributed, as the resolution says, treasonable motives to a large portion of the people in this country, I fail to see how any hon. gentleman, jealous for the honour of his country, jealous for its standing in the eyes of the world, can say nay to a resolution that declares that such conduct was a breach of the duties of the high office which he holds? Sir, it has not been attempted. One of the most notable things in this debate has been that the Ministry who invited this gentleman to come to this country have failed to rise in their places and attempt to justify Sir Charles' conduct. The hon. Minister of Justice, than whom there is no one on the other side of the House more able to make a defence, if defence can be made, must himself have felt, as everyone who listened to his utterances was struck with, the weakness that his case possessed. His only defence was a broad denial of the statements made in the amendment submitted by the leader of the Opposition, and to demand the proof. The proof was forthcoming, has been given to this House, and is recorded in the pages of what will be the history of this country: and after that was furnished, and after the excuse that was framed by the ingenious mind of the hon. Minister of Justice had been cast aside, where was there another Minister to rise in his place, and, with a chivalry that any man ought to be possessed of, defend this High Commissioner, whom some of their supporters on the back seats are inclined to charge us with want of chivalry for attacking in his absence? Sir, they assumed the responsibility of asking him out here. Let me remind them that they did not assume, and have not assumed, though pressed time and again in this House to do so, the responsibility of his utterances and his subsequent writings. When the question was pressed on the hon. Minister of Finance on more occasions than one, whether the Ministry endorsed the utterances and writings of their High Commissioner, he sat mute and dumb, until, when pressed and repressed, he stated that, if he could not get on with his estimates till an answer was given, he would answer; and what was his answer? The attitude of the Government in reference to that matter is one of attentive consideration. So that we find those hon. gentlemen opposite, whose bounden duty it is to defend the High Commissioner, fail to rise to do so. Yes; there was one other besides the hon. Minister of Justice, one who himself admitted that it was a difficult task, who felt that the task should not be left to him, who felt that if these men had been true to the High Commissioner they would each and every one of them be ready at once to rise in his defence for what he had said and written—in other words, be prepared to do by their utterances what they evidently are afraid to do, but what I suppose they will be prepared to do by their vote, giving it silently when the opportunity arises. Well, let us examine the question a little, whether it is an unfair thing that this motion should be introduced in the absence of Sir Charles Tupper. Has the House of Commons in England, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, never taken cognizance of any colonial governors? Has their conduct and administration never been brought under review in the House of Commons in their absence? If a civil servant in a minor position is guilty of misconduct, is it not discussed in this House? When the hon. member for Ottawa County brought up the case of one civil servant appearing on a platform in his county, he told us that the civil servant had at any rate this defence to make for himself, that, whether true or false, whether real or feigned, he had handed in his resignation to the Government and was no longer a civil servant. But, Sir, the head of our Civil Service does not seem to have that delicacy: he thought it not inconsistent, while holding that position, while deriving the emoluments connected therewith, to come over and take part in an electoral contest in this country; and, Sir, if he be not present here to defend himself, are the Opposition to blame for that? Did the Opposition prevent that hon. gentleman doing what he ought to have done, resign his position as High Commissioner and stand as a candidate for the representation of one of the constituencies of this Dominion and enter this House, and in the presence of the elected representatives of this people and of the Liberals among them, be man enough to utter the charges which he dare not make before their faces, but which he makes behind their backs on public platforms, and also writes to the public press? Why is he not here? It would be the proper thing for him to be here; but though he is not here, he has his defenders here, in whom he has as much confidence as he has in himself; and although his defender attempted a somewhat difficult task, yet I should judge that the High Commissioner would feel that his case was safe in his hands. In this same interview in the Daily Citizen which was had with the High Commissioner, the reporter, who seemed to take for granted that it was only a likely thing to expect that Sir Charles Tupper, having returned to this country to engage in the election, had handed in his resignation as High Commissioner and was about to enter the Cabinet, to give to it that strength that he had done before, asked him this question:

"'What are your plans, Sir Charles? Will you enter the Cabinet?'

"'I have no idea of entering the Government; I am proud to say that my name and family are sufficiently represented in the Government without my trying to create anything like a family compact.'

"Then evidently alluding to the eminent young ter, who has already achieved distinction in the statesmanship which has made his father famous, Sir Charles, with a ring of paternal and surely pardonable pride in his tones, continued: 'I have no hesitation in saying that, taking into consideration our respective ages, he is not only a younger but a better man. Nova Scotia is now represented in the Cabinet by two men, with whom, there is every evidence to conclude, she has, and justly so, a right to be satisfied."

Well, Sir, I will not attempt to deny that; but I will say that Sir Charles himself there says that there is one in the Cabinet who he considers is possessed of equal ability with himself. That one has spoken in his defence, and I am not desirous at all to detract anything from Sir Charles estimate of the abilities of that young man, for I can understand that it is a pardonable pride in a father to have a son of whose talents he need not to ashamed. The only two members of the Cabinet who have spoken are the Minister of Justice (Sir John Thompson) and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Tupper), in the latter of whom the House will admit Sir Charles Tupper has a successor, well fitted by his abilities to have a seat in the Cabinet. What has been the defence offered by these gentlemen? The Minister of Justice made no defence; he only said: You have made a motion without producing the proof. The other Minister followed for a time the same line, and then attempted to prove that what Sir Charles Tupper had said was not what the resolution imputes to him, but something entirely different. Let us examine now whether it is true that Sir Charles Tupper did impute treasonable motives to a large portion of the people. I think I have established, out of his own mouth, that it was a breach of the duties of his office to engage as a partisan in the elections of this country. Let us examine now whether he is guilty of the charge of having imputed treasonable motives to a large portion of the people. Surely if it was a breach of the duties of his high office to enter into party politics at all, that offence must be magnified manifold if, during the heat of the contest—nay, worse, if after the heat of that contest, and in cold blood—he is found attributing treasonable and disloyal motives to a large portion of the people of this country, whose paid servant he is. We have had the facts given to the House before, but just let me refer to them again. In the Amherst Gazette, the organ of the High Commissioner himself, appears a report of his speech delivered after the elections. That report was quoted by the hon. the member for South Oxford and by others; and I looked at the paper myself to see whether there was any qualifying context which would alter the meaning of the language attributed to Sir Charles. I found the quotation was exactly correct, and that it stands in a sentence by itself—that there is nothing to qualify it, and that the meaning cannot be at all doubted. Sir Charles Tupper said:

"There are two great parties in Canada, one loyal to its own and the mother country, the other ready to hand over our country to aliens and to turn its back on Great Britain."

That is the statement Sir Charles Tupper made at Amherst—made deliberately after the election was over and the excitement had subsided. Yet we are told there is no proof. When the Minister of Marine attempted to answer the charge, what line did he take? Why, Sir, after saying that we had taken scraps of newspapers out of their connection, he, in the same breath, proceeded to read portions of an article penned by the High Commissioner, long after the election was over, when he found he had got himself into a position he could not maintain, when he found he had to take back what he had said, and that his utterances were not believed. It was then he was kind enough to say, in the Review in May, that the great bulk of the Liberal party, under the leadership of Mr. Blake, were loyal, that it was just a few of the leaders who were disloyal. And the Minister of Marine gives us that statement made in May as a contradiction of this direct statement made about the 7th of March. All that the Minister of Marine succeeded in showing was that Sir Charles Tupper had made diametrically opposite statements in the course of a month, and we are bound to the alternative that one of them must be absolutely false, since each directly contradicts the other. That is all he accomplished: and since no apology or retraction has been made by the High Commissioner, we are justified in bringing him to account for having imputed treasonable and disloyal motives to a large portion of the people of this country. Which party did he mean was loyal to this country and which party disloyal? Hon. gentlemen opposite will claim that their party, at any rate, is loyal. I claim for the Liberal party that if Sir Charles Tupper's reference to a disloyal party refers to the Liberal party, it is absolutely and utterly false. My language is not too strong. Hon. gentlemen opposite bandy about the terms "traitor," and "treason," and "veiled treason," and "disloyalty," as if they were light charges to hurl against people. Do they not know that the charge of treason is one of the most serious charges that can be levelled against public men: yet after using it freely they hold it is very wrong for anyone to rise and denounce it as being false. But Sir Charles said more. He said:

"On the other hand, nothing had so raised Canada in the view of English capitalists as the Canadian Pacific Railway; for every one who invested gets his return. The Grand Trunk Railway, also, since the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been ruining its own shareholders by its vain attempts to try to obstruct that line and going into wild purchases of other lines to embarrass it. Now you find Laurier, Wiman, Farrer and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, these craven creatures who have been representing us as a people whose life could be crushed out by the United States, leading and abetting a party who turns its back on England."

Yet the Minister of Marine, in his attempt to defend the High Commissioner, said: Oh, he did not allude to the Liberals of Canada, but only to a few men, only to Messrs. Wiman and Farrer. Why, as the hon. member for Guysborough said, he attributed treason and disloyalty to the leader of the Liberal party; and does he suppose that the Liberal party will not resent that charge when they know it to be false? The last gentleman who spoke on the Government side, a supporter of Sir Charles Tupper, a man who owes probably his seat in this House to the influence exercised by the High Commissioner, when he declared that the leader of the Liberal party is a loyal man, gave the lie to the High Commissioner who declared him to be a disloyal man. And yet, there is not one of these men who are prepared to vote, if they are prepared to vote, that the language of Sir Charles Tupper was right, who dare rise in his place and charge upon the leader of the Opposition disloyalty, as was done. What a scene it is in the House of Commons of Canada, that a number of men should be prepared, if prepared they are, to justify a charge or an accusation of disloyalty made by a paid servant of the country against the leader of one great pary, and yet they are too craven to rise in the House and say that the charge is true.

Others may say that Mr. Laurier, who leads the Liberal party, is a craven creature and a disloyal man, and yet they will vote and will say that it is right for a paid servant of the people to stigmatize the loved leader of the Liberal party as a craven creature, associated with traitors in an attempt to subvert the institutions of the country and to turn Canada over to aliens. Can they escape from that position? Does the reading of that specify the leader alone? What is that leader doing? He is leading a party which adheres to him, and that party is stigmatized with being of the same views as he, and we ask for nothing else. If he is asserted to be guilty of anything disloyal to the country, it reflects on those who follow him and aid him. If hon. gentlemen will not rise and take the responsibility, in a manly way to that hon. gentleman's face, of the statements which their paid servant made publicly behind his back, let them be manly enough to say that that man said what was untrue, and what they know to be untrue, as one of their own members has stated. I do not know that I need go further. The proof is before you. It is a matter perfectly notorious that that has been the course of Sir Charles Tupper during the last election campaign; and not only so, but since the campaign has been over, we find him vilifying the leaders of the Reform party, and all the attempted defence that has been made has not been pertinent to the question. All the talk about Mr. Wiman or others has nothing to do with the question. The Liberal party and the leader of the Liberal party, who are proud to follow their leader, have had imputed to them disloyal motives. We have heard from the member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), that the High Commissioner, the paid servant of the Canadian people, in taking part in that campaign, attempted to bribe constituencies by offers of public works. What do we find him doing after this public speech to which I have referred? We find him giving an idea to the people of the North-West and Manitoba that now is their opportunity to press their claims on the consideration of the Government. That has been already alluded to, but I will refer to it again. He says:

"To-day we see the parties in Ontario and Quebec nearly balanced, and the other provinces not only holding the balance of power, but in a position to claim the first consideration, from the noble manner in which they had supported the Government."

What does he mean by that language? What do hon. gentlemen opposite understand by it? What do hon. members supporting the Government from the Maritime Provinces understand by that? I heard them laugh when, in a debate on the Estimates which I must not mention, the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) referred to that, and they implied that he did say in so many words that they were to press for these public works unless the interest of the country required them. Let us see. What does he mean by this further sentence in the same speech?

"Another fortnight would have considerably increased our majority in Ontario, but, after his 36 years experience, he preferred a majority of 40 to one of 80."

What for? With frankness he tells us, and this will give us the cue to what he meant when he told the smaller provinces that now they had the power in their hands. The reason was this:

"The Government has not so many people to provide for with the lesser number."

That will explain to the hon. gentlemen opposite, who seem to be in doubt what he meant as to the smaller provinces having the balance of power. What does he mean, for it seems difficult to get an hon. gentleman opposite to understand these speeches—what does he mean by its being better to have a majority of 40 than one of 80? He says:

"He dared say Mr. Dickey would tell us he occasionally gets a hint from some person that he wants a certain piece of work done by the Government."

I think that explains the whole position. Mr. Dickey can tell us whether he has ever had such hints or not. Practically he says: Support the Government, press your claims: Mr. Dickey, I guess, has had hints that certain people would like a certain work done, now is your time, press the power you have and take the advantage. Here is the High Commissioner, not only attributing disloyal and treasonable motives to one of the great parties in this country, but also endeavouring to corrupt the constituencies of this country, and yet those hon. gentlemen are inclined to shield him. Then there was my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who did not take the same line as the Minister of Justice. He had read the newspapers, he did not ask to be informed, but he was prepared to look upon this language of Sir Charles Tupper as figurative language, he contended that Sir Charles Tupper did not mean what he said. Well, it may be figurative language, but it looks very real indeed. The member for Assiniboia says that, even if he did commit an error, the services he has rendered to Canada ought to wipe that all out; and I was amused to read what he said about the services Sir Charles Tupper had rendered, for, according to the hon. gentleman, Sir Charles Tupper is not only the greatest man in Canada, but he is about equal to all the combined great men that Canada has ever produced. He says:

"My hon. friend complained of Sir Charles Tupper's enthusiasm over the Canadian Pacific Railway and the North-West. Sir, I doubt if I should be standing here to-day troubling the House if it were not for what Sir Charles Tupper has done for the North-West."

I will admit that Sir Charles Tupper, in bringing the hon. gentleman into the House, has conferred a signal favour upon the country.—

"There is no man in Canada, not even his illustrious leader, to whom the North-West is more indebted than to Sir Charles Tupper."

Then he goes on to say:

"Sir Charles Tupper built that railway in four years less than the specified time. He is a man of great energy, and that is a great railway, and has made Canada something in the eyes of the world. If the Minister of Justice claims that Sir Charles Tupper has rendered great services to Canada, the building of that railway is not the least he has done in the interest of Canada."

My hon. friend seems to be of the opinion that Sir Charles Tupper did the whole thing. We will give him credit for having brought the hon. gentleman here, but I demur to the statement that Sir Charles Tupper built the Canadian Pacific Railway. I thought, perhaps, some of the other members of the Government had something to say in it. I thought, perhaps, Parliament had something to say in it. I have been under the impression that there was some tens of millions of dollars of the Canadian people's money invested in that enterprise; and not till the hon. member for Assiniboia had pointed out how wrong this motion was against Sir Charles Tupper, because had he completed this road, did I ever know the true facts of the case, that Sir Charles Tupper built it himself, and is entitled to the whole credit. But he has rendered good services, he tells us, in England. He says:

"But there was one small instance that occurred a few years ago for which we, in the North-West Territories, are grateful to him, and Canada should be grateful to him also—I allude to the time when our cattle were supposed to be suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. What did he do? He rolled up his sleeves. He is a dissector in more ways than one. He had the cattle killed, and it was shown they were not suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, and that one act was of more value than all the money that the Tuppers have ever received from Canada."

Well, what was "that one act"?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Killing the cow.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, he didn't kill the cow, he had the cow killed by others. The one act he did was this: He rolled up his sleeves. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, that it is very wrong indeed for the leader of the Opposition to introduce a resolution of censure, granting that Sir Charles Tupper has been guilty of the grossest impropriety, granting he has been guilty of bearing false witness against one of the largest parties of this country, granting that he has endeavoured to corrupt the constituencies by offers of public moneys, whether they were entitled to them or not; he rolled up his sleeves and that is worth all the money the Tuppers ever received from this country. Well, now, I do not want to detract at all what the High Commissioner has done. I think he did good service on that occasion; but I ask: Did he do anything more than his duty? Did he do anything more than any other individual would have done?

Mr. DAVIN. It would not have occurred to most men.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If my hon. friend had gone into the business himself, it would have occurred to him. I suppose a veterinary surgeon would have been employed to kill the cow. Now, I wish not to detract from Sir Charles Tupper's service at all, but I say the man did nothing more than his duty. Should we, years after, have that pointed out to us as so meritorious an act that, forsooth, the Canadian Parliament should take no cognizance of his public acts and public utterances, even when these acts and these utterances are against the best interests of this country? No, Sir, we cannot understand the doctrine, we cannot accept the doctrine, and while the hon. member for Assiniboia may be pleased to offer that as a plea for mitigation of punishment, it is of very little value, and it seems to me that it cannot weigh in this question. The hon. gentleman himself cannot say that he was doing more than his duty. And if it was his duty before that, how will the member for Assiniboia say that he was in the line of his duty when he came over to Canada at the risk of neglecting the duties of that office, when there might at any time be a similar complaint made against our cattle? And if I am not mistaken that same circumstance was repeated, perhaps not while he was here, but scarcely had he got home before it happened; and I think he was not at that port at the time, though I speak under correction. Well, that is the best defence that could be made. I may say to the hon. member for Assiniboia that I have heard friends around me say that he had made the best defence of the High Commissioner that had yet been made. Now, my hon. friend is of a broader mind than Sir Charles Tupper. Sir Charles Tupper, as I read before the hon. gentleman came in, charges upon the leader and charges upon the party to which I belong, in plain, unmistakable language, that we are a party ready to hand over the country to aliens. The member for Assiniboia has a broader mind than that; still he thinks there was danger in our course, for he says:

"I believe that most of the Reform party, in fact I believe all the Reform party, as far as I know its members, are loyal; that is to say they are subjectively loyal. But objectively, if I may make that germane distinction, they are disloyal—they mean to be loyal. You can easily understand a man getting on a railroad that will lead to disloyalty and annexation, and yet deceive himself that every sleeper that he travels over was a loyal one, and on every rail there was the hall-mark of devotion to the Empire; nevertheless the rails would lead him to a disloyal goal. That is the position our friends occupy."

Now, you see the hon. member for Assiniboia, he too, if I may be allowed the expression, gives the lie to the utterance of the High Commissioner, because the High Commissioner charged upon us that we were ready to hand over the country, prepared to do it, and that we were in danger, by our course, of letting such a thing occur, unknown to us, unperceived by us and contrary to our wills. The High Commissioner said we were ready to hand it over. Now, the hon. member for Assiniboia says that is not true. I think that you are in danger, that your course might lead in that direction. What danger did the hon. member for Assiniboia see in the course of the Liberal party in desiring freer trade relations with the people to the south of us? Why should it end in annexation? Why should there be any danger in that course? Why does he warn us against taking the first step on that road that he says might lead us there? Does he always follow in that line? I think not. I think that he would scarcely do it. My hon. friend, I suppose, is opposed to polygamy; I know I am. Would he decline to take the first step towards matrimony, which is a right and proper thing in itself, because he might be induced or led into polygamy? Freer trade relations with the United States means in no way a yielding up of our national independence, in no case means a transference of our allegiance, in no case means the taking down of one flag and the substitution of another. But the hon. gentleman would forbid us to take the first step towards securing freer trade relations with those people, because of an imaginary evil that he conjures up in his brain. It is not worthy of the hon. gentleman to take that position and say that he fears that might be the result, and he has not confidence enough in himself, he has not enough skill, to enjoy freer trade relations with the people of the United States without handing over his country to that country, and bringing about that which Sir Charles Tupper says our conduct is not only in danger of doing, but which we are as a party ready and prepared to do. And now, Sir, with reference to the second charge, with reference to the Grand Trunk Railway, I need not allude to it at length. Hon. members know what Sir Charles Tupper has said, how he has vilified the manager of the road, how he has entered into a controversy with its president, how he has declared its whole course a wrong and improper one, how he has endeavoured to depreciate the value of its stock. All those points are matters of record, and I need not trouble hon. members with them again. The resolution sets out that Sir Charles Tupper is guilty of a breach of the high duties of his office, and, therefore, merits the condemnation of this House. The resolution further states that his course is calculated to injure the credit of the Dominion. I take it that that is a self-evident proposition. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they are prepared to vote down the resolution, there are two alternatives they can take. They can either believe that the credit of Canada has not been injured by Sir Charles Tupper, or they can believe that Sir Charles Tupper told the truth. I leave it to them to choose which horn of the dilemma they will take. If Sir Charles Tupper told the truth—and I should have added to that statement—if the people of England believe he told the truth, then the credit of Canada must be impaired. It is impossible for a man occupying the position of High Commissioner for Canada at the Court of St. James to declare as he has done, and as the English people know he has done, that the leaders of one of the great political parties in this country, and that party which is lead by them, are a disloyal party, which are ready to hand over their country to the people of the United States. If that statement is believed by the people of England, Canadian credit must be injured greatly. I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance and an hon. gentleman who spoke on the other side say that they believe Canadian credit stood as well as ever it did. I am thankful for that; but no thanks are due to the High Commissioner. Let us see the position in which we are placed. If our credit is high in England to-day, notwithstanding the utterances and writings of the High Commissioner, we are forced to this conclusion: that Canada has a representative at the Court of St. James as High Commissioner whose word is scorned, despised and disbelieved, and that is a position which is unworthy of this young nation of Canada. If his word is believed in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway, then he has damaged and impaired the credit of that company. Viewed in what light you will, I must say that the course of the High Commissioner has been one not worthy of commendation at the hands of this House, but his course has been such as must lead this House to declare that in the framing of this resolution, it has not been couched in any language too strong, but the statements contained therein are true, have been absolutely proved, and if proved, this House should manifest its opinion of the conduct of the High Commissioner by according it their support.

Mr. SKINNER. In debating this question for a few moments I will review some of the arguments put forward this evening. As I understand the position taken by hon. members supporting the resolution, they present it in a threefold form: first, that Sir Charles Tupper should not have taken any part in this controversy; second, that if he did so, he should not have used the expressions towards the Liberal party he did use; and, third, he should not have made any reference to the Grand Trunk. All the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite come under these heads. As to Sir Charles Tupper's right to come here and take part in an election campaign, the matter has been so thoroughly argued out that I need not address the House at any length to prove that proposition. Sir Charles Tupper holds the position he does in England, not only representing as it is said the whole people, but he must and does represent the Government of the day, and he must more particularly represent the Government of the day than any diplomatic officer of any Government represents his Government, and in that particular the High Commissioner's office does not correspond to the position of an ambassador. Could it be supposed for a moment that were a change in the Government to occur, and hon. gentlemen opposite to succeed to power, Sir Charles Tupper would be continued as the representative of Canada in London? He would not. No matter what his talents may be, no matter what his influence, no matter what acquaintance he may have as to the means of extending the influence of this country in Great Britain, hon. gentlemen opposite would not continue him in that position, because they would want a gentleman there who would be a custodian of their political secrets and their mode of conducting the business of the country. The two parties in this country are as wide apart as the politic poles can place them with respect to the policy to be pursued. Hon. gentlemen opposite, without enlarging on their policy, have one set of views. I need not say whether they are right or wrong, but they are entirely different to the views held on this side of the House. The party in power at any particular time require a representative as High Commissioner who will be their agent, who will carry out their ideas and carry out their policy to the people to whom he is sent. If the High Commissioner holds that position, this will be one of his duties, to represent that policy anywhere and everywhere, as he believes to be necessary. A diplomatist, when he goes abroad, represents only the ideas that the country want him to present with respect to the particular country to which he is accredited. He is an agent of an entirely different character. But Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, takes from Canada to Great Britain what are the opinions of this Government at home, and therefore he is in a position to talk politics there, and if he talks them there he has a right to talk them here. And along the line of argument it is his duty whenever he pleases to exercise it either there or here, to talk politics and act politically to the same extent as one of the Ministers of the Crown would do here, or if the Minister were in Great Britain. I say further, that if there ever was a time when the High Commissioner, and every man who believes as the Conservative party believes, should come forward and speak and act, it was during the recent election. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we accuse them of being disloyal, and of being traitors. They know as well as you and I know that we do not accuse them of being disloyal and of being traitors in the sense of accusing enemies of being such. What we say is that if their policy is carried out to its logical results it would become disloyalty and it would finally take this country away from the allegiance it now owes. Now, what did Sir Charles Tupper do after having gone through these elections? Gentlemen opposite allege that after the elections were over he charged them and their leaders with disloyalty in the ordinary sense. Read his speeches, read the text as well as the context that refers to this, and you will find that all the charges of disloyalty and everything of this character in the speeches were based on the principle that the Liberal policy leads to the disruption of the Empire, and that, therefore, they must, of necessity, be disloyal. I would ask gentlemen opposite if they cannot agree with us that their policy if carried out would lead to this result: Was the policy pursued by the Liberal party one that was calculated to cement the bonds that bind us to the mother country? Were they not above board in the proposition, so far as mentioning it was concerned, that they would not only have free trade with the United States, but that they would also have a discriminating tariff against Great Britain? Do they not know that nearly every public man in Congress who spoke upon this question, and every leading newspaper of the United States which wrote upon this question, declared that if free trade between the two countries were adopted, Canada must place the same tariff around our country that they did around themselves? Did not this result form the other proposition as logical as one thing can come from another, namely, that if we had to maintain the same tariff as the United States, the United States would control our tariff, because they were the larger, the more populous, and the greater trading country? If the policy of the Liberal party were carried out the consequence is that we were not only to have a discriminating tariff against Great Britain, but we were also to have a tariff that would be dictated to us and be controlled by a foreign country. Is it in the nature of things that Canada, under these circumstances, could remain a British dependency, or a British Dominion, in connection with the Empire? No; it must be driven away from the Empire, and eventually it would come to one of two things: either Canada must become independent, or it must become part of the United States; and if the policy of the Liberal party leads to that, then it leads to dismemberment of the Empire, and if it lead to dismemberment, it leads to disloyalty, and if it leads to disloyalty it leads to a traitorous course being pursued by the gentlemen on the other side, although they might not have intended it to have been traitorous or disloyal.

An hon. MEMBER. What is that but disloyalty?

Mr. SKINNER. Not in the sense of wilful treason. A party in any country may have a policy that may lead to a certain course of events, and they may know that it leads to that course of events, but they may not care so much whether it does or not. The hon. gentleman who interrupted me just now is a strong free trader; and the gentleman who spoke in the early part of the evening (Mr. Fraser) said that no matter what the consequences were we must buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. That was his argument. Now, what is the result of all that teaching? It is trade first and loyalty afterwards, and if you are going to pursue that course you are following along a line of proceeding that would finally lead us into disloyalty and dismemberment and break up this great national combination. What we on this side of the House said during the election and what Sir Charles Tupper emphasized was, that instead of discriminating against Great Britain we are ready to have all reasonable free trade with the United States; and if we are to look for more extended markets we will look to the markets of Great Britain itself, and if Great Britain is ready to make a discrimination against the world in favour of us we will fall in with her, and at all events stand by the Empire, whether we are going to be more successful or less successful. I believe that the one great principle is the union of this great Empire first and then success afterwards. Gentlemen on the other side of the House reverse that proposition. They say: Give us trade first and then let the Union or the connection of the Empire take care of itself. I contend that if the views and policy of hon. gentlemen opposite are carried into effect they will lead to disruption of the Empire, and to that extent we say they are disloyal. It is no use for them to spread the idea throughout the country that the Conservative party intended to charge them with disloyalty in the rough and ugly sense they are putting it. We know they are citizens of Canada; we think their political opinions are wrong; we think their political course can lead but to one end, and if that is to be disruption of the Empire, then it is disloyalty, and that is the whole sum and substance of the story. When Sir Charles Tupper spoke at Amherst he made that as plain as it could be. When he charged that the party opposite was ready, as the hon. gentleman said who last spoke, to deliver the country over to aliens, what did he mean? He meant that for the purpose of having free trade they would be willing, if the necessity called for it, to be annexed even to the United States. I know, and the people of the country know, that it was a part of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite during the last campaign to have free trade no matter what it cost the country. Take the speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Cartwright) at Boston. While it might have been made for pleasantry, yet it meant that the city of Boston must become the great sea emporium for the trade of this country. What did that mean to all the Maritime Provinces, who have been true to this Union and who have been true to the connection of the mother country? It meant the transfer of the trade that we have been labouring for, the trade that the Maritime Provinces as well as western Canada has been willing to be taxed for; it meant that this trade was to be transferred to Boston and New York. Why, Sir, we showed to our people, and the country recognized it, that inasmuch as New York has monopolized nearly all the import trade of the Atlantic, by the natural course of events it would also draw the ocean import trade from the Maritime Provinces. If that was to be the result, would not that be disloyal to all our interests, and that was what was meant to be charged. So far as saying that the people of England would understand by what Sir Charles Tupper said that half the people of this country were traitors in the ordinary sense, and thereby that it would damage the country, hon. gentlemen know that Sir Charles Tupper did not mean anything of the kind. When the hon. gentleman who last spoke said that he is glad to know that after all these things have been said our financial integrity still remained intact, let me ask him why has our financial credit continued to be good? It is good because the policy of gentlemen on the other side of the House has not been successful. If they had succeeded in the elections you would have found that the credit of this country would have received a shock which it would not have recovered from for a great length of time. Therefore, when hon. gentlemen opposite make charges against Sir Charles Tupper they do it in a Pickwickian sense; they know that they do not mean what they say when they write out such formidable resolutions as that which we have to-night. When the hon. member for Queen's said the other night that Sir Charles Tupper had blackguarded, vilified and abused the people of Canada, he knew that he had done nothing of the kind. Sir Charles Tupper simply pointed out what he thought would be the logical results of the political course these hon gentlemen had taken. Everybody understood what he meant and said, and it did not detract from his statesmanship or add anything to his name for abuse, but it showed that as representing the great party with which he was connected he had the bravery to stand up—because he must have known that his words would be repeated, not only all over Canada, but in the old country and in the United States as well—and declare that he believed the policy of the party to which he was opposed would lead to a disloyal result. Now, a moment with reference to what Sir Charles Tupper said with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway. I will pass by the question whether the Grand Trunk Railway was indebted to the Government or to the people of Canada or not for favours that had been shown to it. But it must be remembered that our country was passing through a terrible crisis; it must be remembered that even if we on this side of the House were wrong, yet we believed that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was going to ruin this country; we believed that if they succeeded, annexation and dismemberment would come. So, assuming for the sake of argument that we were mistaken, Sir Charles Tupper, in representing our ideas and speaking and acting for this party found, in his efforts to save the country from such a condition of things, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was not only exercising what might be said to be its political rights, that is to say, of allowing its officers and men to vote as they pleased, but was exercising its influence against the Government in the elections. And what more came out on that point? Did not Mr. Read, as agent of the Grand Trunk Railway, express the true inwardness of the case when he said that he did what he did, that he caused so many men to be brought from the United States to vote in the constituencies along the border, because he was an annexationist and wanted annexation to triumph in the country? Was not that disloyal? And in so expressing himself he not only indicated his own feeling, but he gave an index as to all that was done and said. Every lawyer in this House knows that when a case is on trial in court it is impossible to prove everything, but if a certain evidence is opened up the jury can from it plainly draw an inference of the facts. So, from the gleams of evidence furnished us as to what the Grand Trunk Company were doing in this election was it not easy to draw the inference that that company were in favour of our country at all events becoming connected with the United States in such a way that we would lose control of our tariff and have a discriminating tariff against Great Britain, and that they did not care a bit whether this country remained true to Great Britain or not; all they wanted was the trade at any price at which they could get it. That having been proved, it became very clear that the Grand Trunk Company were not loyal to Canada and Great Britain, and had not before their eyes, in the action they took in the election, the integrity of this Empire and loyalty to this country at all. Well, after all this was done, Sir Charles Tupper came to speak about it, as I think I have proved he had a right to do; and when he spoke the words he did, were they not words of truth? Had he not evidence to back him: and did not every intelligent person in this community, whose mind was not blinded by prejudice feel that what he said about the Grand Trunk Railway was the absolute truth and nothing else? Therefore I say that on the evidence before the country, what Sir Charles Tupper said he was justified in saying. The hon. gentleman who last spoke intimated that Sir Charles Tupper would lose all his influence in England because of what he said with reference to the Grand Trunk Railway and on this question generally. If you examine the record of Sir Charles Tupper since the elections you will see that he has not lost one whit of his influence in that country. He is representing this Government, and he is representing ideas that prevail on this side of the House as fairly and fully and capably as he ever did; and he is as well received in Great Britain, and has as much influence there, or more influence, than he ever had before. Some hon. gentlemen opposite who read extracts from certain British newspapers to show that Sir Charles Tupper did this or that wrong thing, have to go to a class of newspapers that do not care one farthing for the integrity of this Empire. Further, it will be seen from expressions in that portion of the press in Great Britain that is true to the British idea that what Sir Charles said is approved of there. Our friends on the other side seem to imagine that they can make the idea of loyalty discreditable in this country. They talk occasionally as if to speak of loyalty were to speak of something that was a mere fad. I think it will be a bad day for Canada and the Empire when loyalty is to be laughed at. Therefore, I say, go to the press in Great Britain that aims to keep this Empire together, and you will find that the action taken by Canada in this last election and the arguments used by Sir Charles Tupper and others have met a ready and hearty response in that great country. Therefore, I believe that Sir Charles Tupper is as valuable a representative there as he ever was. Just one remark with reference to the ridicule which the hon. gentleman who last spoke endeavoured to throw on what Sir Charles Tupper is doing there. Canada stands to-day much higher than she did ten years ago. To-day these provinces which were disjointed colonies a few years ago, are respected and known throughout the whole world. Sir Charles Tupper, by his speeches, and his influence, and labours, and by the exercise of his great abilities as our High Commissioner, has done more for us than any man who has ever represented this country abroad in any position. Therefore, instead of a resolution being brought in for the purpose of casting any slur on Sir Charles Tupper, I believe that not only has the Conservative party a right to be proud of his great talents which he has brought to bear on this question and of the manner in which he has guided this country along the high road of progress, but that the whole people of Canada, Liberals and Conservatives alike, owe him a debt of gratitude.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is one of the most eminent authorities in this House on the subject of annexation to the United States. He is an old and experienced politician, who has made a long, and careful, and critical study of all the bearings of this question, and has placed upon record his deliberate conclusion that the Conservative party of this country is the party most responsible for any annexation sentiment that may exist in the Dominion and the party whose policy has led directly in that direction. I will quote the language of the hon. gentleman, delivered on the 4th March, 1867, in Berryman's Hall, St. John. He said:

"When the Conservative press and speakers raise the cry of disloyalty against the Liberals they raise a standard of lies."

That old familiar cry, which was first hurled in this country, during the struggle for responsible government, against those who were trying to bring something like decent organization and the principle of progress into our affairs—that old cry of treason and disloyalty which was as familiar to our forefathers at is it to us to-day; that cry which was raised against our forefathers when they undertook to remove the disabilities under which we were labouring; that cry which was raised against the Howes, the Lafontaines, the Baldwins and the George Browns, and all those who, in our political history, have attempted to bring about political reform—that cry is still made to do duty against us to-day. In 1887, that cry was hurled against the Liberal party in Canada; and we find that the hon. gentleman, then a member of the Liberal party, gave it as his deliberate conclusion, after twenty-five years' study of the principles and policy of the Conservative party, that when they raised the cry of disloyalty against the Liberals they were raising a standard of lies. I have never yet heard that the hon. gentleman has recanted that opinion before any audience in the province from which he comes. He also placed upon record his deliberate opinion upon another occasion. In the Union Hall, on the 9th February in the same year, this eminent apologist for the policy of the Conservative party, of which he is now a member, gave expression to a similar opinion. I will quote the hon. gentleman's language when speaking to an audience in St. John, in the Union Hall, on the 9th February, 1887. He then said:

"Why, gentlemen, the greatest annexationist power in Canada, during the past twenty years, has been the Conservative party."

I agree with the hon. gentleman. His opinion, I may add, is but the endorsation of that of another great man in this country, a gentleman who, it is no discredit to the hon. member to say, occupies a higher standing than he in the minds of the people—a gentleman who has been eulogized during this debate by members on the Treasury benches, who has been quoted frequently with approval by other hon. gentlemen opposite, and who has been alluded to in terms of praise by Sir Charles Tupper himself. And here I may remark, with reference to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite regarding the great men of the Liberal party, that while they lavish on these men unstinted abuse, so long as they take an active part in politics, no sooner have they retired from the political arena than they become highly honourable, distinguished, and worthy of all commendation. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman to whom I have alluded, Mr. Blake, stated, as his deliberate conclusion, that the policy, the history, and the tendency of the Conservative party was directly towards annexation, and that the evils by which we are surrounded to-day, and which prevent that full development we should enjoy, have been caused by the shackles put upon trade and by the financial difficulties with which the Conservative party, for the last twelve years, has saddled this country. There, Sir, we have the opinion of the great Mr. Blake, as well as of the hon. gentleman, that the policy of the Conservative party has been the greatest annexationist power in the country for the last twenty years. I could not help being amused at the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman. It was taken in imitation of my esteemed friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who desired this House to entertain the opinion that all these charges of the High Commissioner against the Liberal party and its leaders of treason and disloyalty were to be taken in a Parliamentary or a Pickwickian sense; that they had no meaning, and that the most they could imply was a tendency to disloyalty, some four or five removes from direct disloyalty, as the hon. gentleman described it. It was, in fact, only treason or disloyalty at four or five removes. But is it not within the cognizance of every member of this House, is it not on record in every speech, address and article of the High Commissioner that he has accused the Liberal party and the Grand Trunk Railway of being concerned in a plot and a conspiracy? That is something very different from a mere political tendency. In almost every utterance, written or spoken by the High Commissioner, he invariably speaks in a most sneering manner of the United States as an alien people, and alludes to those gentlemen of the United States, whose names had been mixed up in this connection, as being agents of that country to undermine the loyalty of the people of these provinces. Although the evidence laid before this House by hon. gentlemen who preceded me has been overwhelming to prove conclusively that the High Commissioner has traduced and vilified a large proportion of the people of this Dominion composing the Liberal party, by charging them with being disloyal and engaged in a plot to break up our institutions and hand us over, bound hand and foot, to the people of the United States, and although no attempt has been made to contradict that array of evidence, I would ask you, Sir, to consider what shadow of evidence there is that should lead us to believe that the Liberal leaders have been engaged in any such plot or conspiracy or have given utterance to any expressions of disloyalty. We have had the Minister of Marine stand here, and in a very able and interesting manner, retail the articles, and letters, and speeches of the High Commissioner on various occasions, and he undertook to show, not that the High Commissioner had not made these charges, but that the charges were true, that the plot existed, that the conspiracy was formed; but I call the attention of the hon. gentlemen on the other side to the fact that there is not one line or syllable under the hand of any leader of the Liberal party to afford the slightest support to any such proposition. We have letters from Mr. Wiman; but what is Mr. Wiman to the Liberal party? We have letters from Mr.

Hitt; but who is Mr. Hitt? Will hon. gentlemen say that letters passing between gentlemen who have no connection whatever with the Liberal party should be held to bind the Liberal party? The propositions are absurd, and would not be listened to for a moment in any trial in a court of law. The question before the House is whether the High Commissioner has degraded the office which he accepted and filled, and should fill to the credit of this country, and with a view to the interests of this country in the mother country. In a recent debate I quoted some of the English journals in relation to this subject. Now, I will quote the opinion of a gentleman whose word ought to be taken as a fair and impartial estimate of the position the High Commissioner placed himself in by his attacks upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company. In his speech at Amherst Sir Charles Tupper made a virulent attack upon the president of that corporation, and referred to the directors of that company and the leaders of the Liberal party as craven creatures, who were prepared to use their influence to carry this country into annexation. An attempt was made to create an outcry in England against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and a great deal of comfort and encouragement was given to certain hon. gentlemen on this side of the Atlantic because it was found that some members of the Grand Trunk Railway Company were prepared to vote against the re-election of Sir Henry Tyler's directors. It gave great comfort to the Conservatives, because they thought it would show that the action of Sir Henry Tyler was considered to be inimical to British interests. They were also gratified because a delay was had in the election of the directors. The leader of the opposition among the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, was a Mr. Baker, who criticized the action of the directors who were in accord with Sir Henry Tyler, and sought to bring about the election of other directors. I am about to give the opinion of Mr. Baker, who was the main opponent to Sir Henry Tyler and his directorate. I will quote from the official report in the Railway News of 18th April last:

"Mr. Baker said he regretted that a gentleman holding the high position of High Commissioner for Canada should have so far forgotten the interests of his country and the need for maintaining friendly relations between capitalists on this side and the colonists on the other as to make attacks on the company."

This is not the opinion of an opponent of Sir Charles Tupper or of a man who is backing up Sir Henry Tyler and his management of the Grand Trunk Railway, but it is the opinion of a leading financier and a leading critic of the present management of the Grand Trunk Railway; and his deliberate opinion is that the High Commissioner, in his attacks upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company, had forgotten the interests of his country. Further Mr. Baker says:

"The interests of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Government were, as far as the people of Canada were concerned, of an entirely different character."

Having said so much in regard to what he called "this regrettable incident," he went on to criticize the management of the company. I call the attention of the House to a statement made by Mr. Seargeant, the gentleman who was attacked by Sir Charles Tupper, very recently, to his superiors in London, and I will call the attention of the House to the very remarkable observations which Mr. Seargeant, a man of reputation and character, makes in regard to some of the features of this case, and I would like some of the gentlemen on the other side to give us some comments upon this and some expression of opinion in regard to Mr. Seargeant's statements. Sir Henry Tyler, in a letter to the London Times, dated 23rd May, 1891, says:

"Mr. Seargeant informs us, in reference to these attacks (these are the attacks on the Grand Trunk Railway Company by Sir Charles Tupper): 'We have offers of assistance from members of the Tory party, and there certainly is no feeling against us. I get nothing but sympathy. I have not heard any one person defend Sir Charles.'"

He gets nothing but sympathy in the private letters of the Tory party to him; but where does he get any sympathy from the leaders of the Tory party in this House, or the members of the Government in this House, when the character of the management and the men at the head of affairs of the Grand Trunk Railway Company are so bitterly attacked? I will not attempt to enlarge at this late hour upon the subject of loyalty, but I do desire to say, in reply to an observation made by the hon. the Minister of Marine, that there are no more loyal people in the Dominion of Canada to British institutions, to the British Crown, to our form of Government, and to the interests of the people of Nova Scotia and of the Dominion of Canada, than the Liberals of the Province of Nova Scotia; and, although many of these Liberals have been secessionists, or have been called secessionists, although they have voted in favour of a repeal of the Union, I say the reason for the dissatisfaction that existed in the Province of Nova Scotia, the reason that that sore remains unhealed to this day, and will always remain unhealed until every man who was in public life in Nova Scotia in 1866 is laid under the sod, is principally the extraordinary and unwarrantable conduct of the man who is under impeachment to-day. If the people of Nova Scotia had been allowed a free choice as British citizens, as to whether they should enter into this Union or not, after the scheme was laid before them, I have many reasons for believing that they might have accepted some scheme. But I ask any member here, from Ontario or from Quebec, what those great provinces would have done if such a dastardly outrage had been attempted on them as was perpetrated by the Legislature of Nova Scotia in handing over the whole country without asking by your leave or with your leave. Was not that a blow at the ambition, the rights and the feeling of the people, a blow at their British traditions?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That is exactly what they did. They did not appeal to the people at all.

Mr. FLINT. The mistake, the political blunder, the crime of the High Commissioner at that time, has borne bitter fruit from that day to this, in the feeling of dissatisfaction and of discontent which has prevailed throughout the province almost from that time until the present, the feeling that they were outraged in their dearest rights by having their constitution swept away against their consent. I will quote an extract from a speech delivered upon the occasion of the passage of those resolutions by an eminent man, since deceased, whose words, I believe, will be received with respect in this House. Speaking in the debate in the Nova Scotia Legislature, the result of which was the passage of the Confederation resolutions, he said:

"Sir, round me sit the men to whom the constituencies of Nova Scotia entrusted her constitutional rights—her interest and welfare—to whom she for four years bared her neck—is there—can there be one among us who will help to fasten upon her neck this chain prepared by the delegates? No; let us rather keep sacred that trust—let us rather go back to the people, and learn of them at the polls their wishes on this great question, lest, in after years, they have just reason to execrate our memories—lest they pray heaven to strike palsied every hand that fastened a rivet of that chain."

These words are the words of the Hon. Mr. McLellan, Governor of Nova Scotia, who is much lamented. These are words of as true and patriotic a son of Nova Scotia as then stood in the Legislature, and he expressed the feelings of the people of Nova Scotia. The objection was not so much to the Union as to the outrage upon the feelings and national pride of the people by the manner in which the Union was carried. But they had to endure the taunts of disloyalty and treason from the hour they rose up and endeavoured to resist that pressure, just as the Liberal party here to-day have to endure the taunts of disloyalty. The reason they objected to the Union, some of them, was that they believed they had a more close connection with England under their own constitution, and yet their most patriotic feelings were outraged by being taunted with treason and disloyalty on that account. And so it has been with almost every political reform advocated by the members of the Liberal party, from the earliest days of the constitutional history of this country down to the present time. At every election there is said to be an awful crisis, as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has said, which calls the High Commissioner from his post in London and gives him some excuse for coming back to engage in an election. He has a perfect right to do so as an individual, provided he resigns the emoluments of his office, and takes the responsibilities which every other public man takes on those occasions. Now, I will call attention to the change which took place in the language of the High Commissioner after he had returned to England. At first he claimed to have plunged into this terrific struggle to save his beloved country from the calamities that would befall her by her absorption into the American Union. He then denied that there was any annexation sentiment in the country worthy of consideration. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) was kind enough to compare the action of the High Commissioner to that, I believe, of the Roman hero who leaped his horse into the ditch in order to save his beloved city at a great crisis; and he proceeded, after this indication of his opinion of the overwhelming character of the crisis the country had passed through, to eulogize at great length the hero of his song, the present High Commissioner for Canada. As he was proceeding with his eulogy I could not help thinking how disadvantageous it might be to him should any members on this side take the trouble to answer them in a manner in which they could be answered if one chose to descend to personal vituperation. There is a notion that when a prisoner pleads his character as a defence in a charge of crime, it is a strong indication that he has no other defence to make, that the evidence is against him, and as a last resort he pleads that his character is good. But in reply his character may be shown up. So the character and eminent service of the High Commissioner are placed before us as a mitigation, as an answer to the serious political crime with which he has been charged by the resolution before the House. I am not going either to belittle the praise heaped upon the High Commissioner, or to rake up from the distant past charges that could be raked up and levelled at the head of the High Commissioner. But I desire to place on record as my deliberate opinion, in opposition to that of the member for Richmond, that although the High Commissioner has done some service to some interests in this country by his great energy, yet it is the deliberate opinion of a large majority, of the Liberal party of this country at all events, that the influence of the High Commissioner upon Canadian politics has been distinctly detrimental and degrading to the best public interests of this country. Throughout this very discussion that has taken place with Sir Henry Tyler before the people of the mother country, where public men are held most strictly to the truth of their statements, do we not find that the High Commissioner is distinctly charged with a series of deliberate falsehoods and misrepresentations, and that he has failed in every one of his communications to withdraw himself from the painful and embarrassing position in which these charges have placed him? Is this a proper position for the High Commissioner for Canada to assume before the people of England, where he is pilloried in the press of that country as a falsifier of facts, as one who states that which is not true, and which is not susceptible of proof? I would call attention to some of these statements made in the columns of the London Times, as well as some of the comments that have been made upon them by papers of great influence in the other country. I disagree entirely with the statement made by the hon. member for St. John, that the papers which attack the High Commissioner are papers of no influence or position. There are no financial journals in England the editorial expressions of which are more deeply weighed by men whose financial interests are dependent upon public opinion, than the Economist and the Railway News. I would say that in the editorial columns of these papers before the full discussion developed, I find a distinct support of the position assumed by the Conservative party in this country, until it was exposed by the able and trenchant letters of Sir Henry Tyler. The first charge the High Commissioner makes against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, after the general charge that the Liberal party have entered into this mythical conspiracy which has no existence except in the diseased brain of that gentleman himself, is that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had issued a circular to its employés commanding them to support the Opposition to the Government of this country. This they denied, and no proof whatever of the charge has been offered. Another statement made by the High Commissioner is that Mr. Seargeant, the manager of the Grand Trunk in Montreal, had issued a manifesto, and he desired this to be recalled. The manifesto turns out to be a myth, and the whole of his argument falls completely to the ground. He also stated that the interview in which this matter was brought forward was sought by the Manager of the Grand Trunk, that that gentleman was placed in the position of asking an interview with the High Commissioner with a view to securing his influence and support by an offer of support from the Grand Trunk Company. But it transpired that the interview was sought by the High Commissioner himself from the Manager of the Grand Trunk through a mutual friend, and an interview was thus brought about. It is very much like the position assumed by the High Commissioner in another matter, which will probably be brought before the House in a few weeks, in which the Government stated that the interview was sought by the representatives of the United States Government, and we find this distinctly denied by the Premier of that Government, and practically admitted by the High Commissioner himself. Statement after statement of the High Commissioner in this correspondence have been completely disproved. Among others was the statement that the Government of the country had offered the presidency of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Sir Henry Tyler if he would undertake the construction of that road. Judging by the opinions of English journals in regard to the High Commissioner, it appears, if those opinions are the opinions of impartial men in the old country, the interests of Canada must have suffered. I find the Railway News of 4th April, a paper which had taken some stock in the allegations of the High Commissioner in regard to the disloyalty of a large number of the people of this country, assumed, and almost to the present hour assumes, that this country had a narrow escape at the recent election from being carried bodily into the American Union. It is very painful to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to read the calm utterances of the British journals on this subject, and to find that the whole public mind of the mother country has been poisoned by the vilifications and by the falsehoods of the High Commissioner. I do not wish to use strong language, but as regards these statements I desire in my place, and on my responsibility as a member of this House, to brand all assaults on the loyalty of the Liberals as false. I say the man who, professing to have the interests of this country at heart, would—after the disclaimer made, and the proof offered in the House and before the people—repeat the falsehood, is baser than he who invented the falsehood in the first place. The Railway News of 4th April, says:

"As our readers are aware Sir Charles Tupper has in some election speeches indulged in very vituperative observations respecting the Grand Trunk, charging that its extravagance, corruption and jobbery had inflicted a serious blow on the reputation of Canada."

Hon. gentlemen will remember that Sir Charles Tupper, in his phillipic, stated, among other things, that the corruption, extravagance and jobbery of the management of the Grand Trunk had inflicted a serious blow to Canadian interests and on the shareholders of the company. When Sir Henry Tyler, like a true-hearted gentleman that he is, anxious for his reputation in the financial world, and as manager of a great corporation, demanded a scintilla of proof of such outrageous statements, how did the High Commissioner meet him? He told Sir Henry Tyler that he alluded to the original construction of the road forty years ago. Is that a worthy and dignified position for the High Commissioner of Canada to take in a controversy, when he charged the manager of a great corporation with extravagance, corruption and jobbery. to crawl out of the hole by stating that he alluded to the transactions of men who had been dead for the last quarter of a century? The Railway News of 11th April says:

"Sir Charles denies that he went 'cap in hand' to the general manager of the Grand Trunk to ask him to withdraw a manifesto which he asserted had been issued to the employés of the Grand Trunk to vote against the Government at the recent election.

"It appears from the rejoinder of Sir Henry Tyler that the meeting was arranged by a trusty friend and supporter of the Government—Mr. Hector Cameron—who stated that 'Sir Charles would esteem it a favour if Mr. Seargeant would meet him.'

This leads me to notice, and I think the idea must have passed through the minds of many hon. gentlemen in reading this correspondence, the very superior air the High Commissioner for Canada assumed in the language he used to the Manager of the Grand Trunk, and in the whole of his dealings with that company. What authority had he to threaten the Grand Trunk, or to state what the Government would or would not do in regard to that company if it acted with the wishes of the Government or disregarded them? Has the Government placed in the hands of the High Commissioner the right to say that Government influence would be used or would not be used to extend the power, authority and influence of the Grand Trunk Railway? Has it come to this, that even if the Grand Trunk Railway saw fit, which we deny, and of which there is no evidence, to use its legitimate influence on one side or other of the political questions of the day, the Government have a right to say that it shall be prevented from extending and increasing its power and influence? Or do the Government hold out the promise to those corporations which will exercise their influence in favour of the Government that they may obtain increased power, patronage and influence throughout the country? I must say that circumstances connected with the late election would almost lead us to suppose that promises had been given in some quarters that increased power, patronage and influence would be placed at the disposal of those corporations which would give their power and influence to support the Government at the late elections. Continuing the News says:

"Because they would not vote as desired the Grand Trunk proprietors are denounced by the High Commissioner in England, who should represent no particular party, as 'craven creatures who had embraced the first opportunity to spring at the throat of the Government and endeavoured to choke it in the interests of an alien people.'"

The same paper in another article says:

"Sir Charles Tupper, however, thinks that his Government have a right to the support en bloc of the employés of the company, and that it is the duty of the officials to direct them in what manner they should exercise the privileges of the franchise. Because they would not vote as desired, the Grand Trunk proprietors are denounced by the Canadian High Commissioner in England, who should represent no particular party, as 'craven creatures who had embraced the first opportunity to spring at the throat of the Government and endeavoured to choke it in the interests of an alien people.' Mark the consequences! 'The Government would, he said, fail in their duty if they permitted this great corporation to obtain increased power, influence and importance in the country.' Fancy, if you can, a Minister of the Crown in this old-fashioned, but still free country, asserting that because the London and North Western Railway directors had refused to direct their employés to support his party at a political election, the Government would neglect its duty if it permitted 'that great corporation to obtain increased power, influence and importance in the country.' * * *

"The hon. gentleman in his official position as High Commissioner of Canada will, of course, feel it his duty to take some opportunity of explaining to the representatives of 23,000 British shareholders the 'reason why' he felt himself justified in designating them as 'craven creatures' who had 'sprung at the throat' of his Government to choke it in 'the interests of an alien people.'"

The same paper of 18th April remarks:

"The interests of the meeting (of G.T.R. shareholders) on Tuesday, mainly centered, however, in the complete answer which, in fulfilment of the promise given in the official report, Sir Henry Tyler gave to the unfounded and insolent charges which Sir Charles Tupper made against the company and its management." * * * *

When a paper of this kind, having great weight and influence in the mother country, states that the charges of the High Commissioner were unfounded and insolent, can we imagine that his influence in London would be as efficient in the interest of this country as it would be if no such assertion was made by a journal of that character. I will pass over the details of the negotiations with Mr. Seargeant of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I will come to a matter which shows how delicate the interests of these shareholders in England are. It was expected that the letter of Sir Charles Tupper, together with his speech in Amherst, would have such an influence on the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway that at the annual meeting they would change the whole directorate, including the president, Sir Henry Tyler. At the first meeting the hour had passed before there was an opportunity of taking a poll of the shareholders, and the gentleman who I have quoted, Mr. Baker, moved that the poll be taken on the following Thursday. We are informed by the London Economist that this slight circumstance, and the fact that the directors were not at once re-elected, reduced the price of the Grand Trunk Railway shares in the London market from one to three per cent., representing a total loss to the shareholders of something like half a million pounds sterling. That proves that in transactions of this kind the British people are accustomed, in listening to the utterances of eminent public men occupying high positions, to accept them at their word, and taking Sir Charles Tupper at his word, his charges having been made known, the market fell at once, on account of the danger that the directorate of the company might be changed in consequence of a partial belief in the truth of these charges. A reference to the attack made by Sir Charles Tupper upon the credit of the Province of Quebec has been ably brought before the House by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier). Was there ever in the annals of the whole history of Canada so outrageous a misuse of the public position of a man in a high place in the mother country as to decry the credit of a whole province? It was well known that the Premier of Quebec was at that very time preparing to negotiate a loan upon the European markets for a very large amount, in order to consolidate the debt of the Province of Quebec at a lower rate, so that a large amount of money paid in interest might be devoted to other public purposes; yet on the very eve of these delicate negotiations in the financial markets the High Commissioner for Canada launches the most untruthful and most damaging representations in regard to the credit of the Province of Quebec that have ever been made in the history of this country. He stated that the Premier of Quebec was borrowing money at an exorbitant rate of interest from day to day in the banks of his own city, to carry on his Government. He said that the Government had attempted to pass through the Legislature a measure repudiating the public debt of the Province of Quebec, and, as my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated, had his statement been believed by the financiers of the leading capitals of the world, where the Premier of Quebec was about to float his loan, the credit of the Province of Quebec and the credit of the Dominion of Canada would have been to a large extent irretrievably ruined. But, Sir, the reputation of the High Commissioner must have preceded him. We know that his charges against the Liberal party met with no response in this country and nine-tenths of all his observations were received only with a sneer by the people of Canada. His reputation for strong language was too well known on this side of the Atlantic, where everything that he may state in his public and official capacity is discounted at from sixty to seventy-five per cent. But on the other side of the Atlantic we feared it might be different, but we now find that during his short career as High Commissioner for Canada he has been found out not only by the people of the mother country but by the people of the United States as well. If this Dominion desires to preserve its credit and integrity, if this Government desires to uphold the true principles of constitutional Government in this country, they will remove Sir Charles Tupper from the anomalous position which he holds. He is neither a member of the civil service, nor a member of the Cabinet, nor a representative of the people, but he seems to be above and beyond the Government, and above and beyond the people, an official vilifier as has been stated by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the "chartered calumniator" of the people of this country. I say that the Liberal party of this country, whether they succeed or fail in the result of the vote on this resolution have only done themselves justice by placing upon the record their strongest repudiation, not only of the utterances of the man but of the responsibility which the Government has assumed by retaining him in that position after the statements he has made before the people of Great Britain and before the people of this country as well as of his conduct in discharging the duties of his office.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as no member from the Province of Quebec has, as yet, expressed any opinion on the important motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition now before the House, I will take the liberty of offering a few remarks. If they are to judge from the vigour with which the hon. members on the left side of the House attack the course taken by the High Commissioner at London during the last campaign, the public will conclude that the blows dealt to the Opposition by the High Commissioner during that campaign have greatly injured the popularity of the Liberal party. I am astonished, and the people will be astonished with me, at finding the Liberal party and its leader so thin-skinned when accusations of disloyalty are brought against them. I ought rather not to be astonished at all at the Opposition being so tender-skinned, indeed, four consecutive defeats such as they have met with are enough to make sore the skin of any political men no matter to what party they may belong. The hon. leader of the Opposition complained with bitterness of the words uttered by Sir Charles Tupper about him and his party. But, Mr. Speaker, four years ago the hon. leader of the Opposition—I should say first that I have no mission for defending the loyalty of the Tory party; this party contains men quite able to do so—four years ago, I say, the hon. leader of the Opposition was himself accusing his opponents of disloyalty, and every one knows, the friends of the hon. leader of the Opposition know, that words from his mouth have a great importance, not only in this House and in this country, but also in the neighbouring country and in the mother country itself. Here are the words spoken about his opponents by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Referring on that occasion to the policy of protection adopted by the Conservative party, and to the loyalty of the Conservatives of Ontario, this is what he said—I am quoting from page 179 of the Debates of 1886, vol. I:

"And if we continue the story even down to the days since this Government has been in power, we find that when they introduced the National Policy, and it was objected that that policy was unfair and ungenerous to England, and that it might possibly endanger British connection, the cool Tory answer was: 'So much the worse for British connection.' Sir, this is Tory loyalty. Ready they are to-day to sacrifice British connection, if British connection stands between them and their selfishness; ready they are to sacrifice British connection if it stands between them and their enjoyment of power; ready they are to sacrifice British connection for mere sordid greed."

Could more direct and more insulting accusation be cast in this House against a great party representative of the country's majority? For the hon. member made slight difference between the Ontario Conservatives and those of his own province. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition and his political friends seem to have in the matter of loyalty two weights and two measures, just as for the other political questions. This is not all. We have seen, during the last federal elections, the hon. leader of the Opposition only too willing to accept the help of public officers, of salaried Government officers.

Mr. DELISLE. (Translation.) What Government?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The Local Government. The officers of the Local Government are paid salaries from public funds just as much as is Sir Charles Tupper for his mission in England. Let us see, if you please, Mr. Speaker, what was done by a public officer during the last federal election. It was in the County of Kamouraska. The Government candidate was a Mr. Chapais, a young man of talent, and the Opposition candidate, who is now a member of this House for that county, had the energetic support of Hon. Mr. Gagnon, now sheriff of Quebec, who took an active part in the campaign, a violent part even, to secure the success of the candidate of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. And yet, when Hon. Mr. Gagnon was in the Legislative Assembly—if I had about me the Debates of Quebec, I could quote the words of this gentleman—he was holding then that a public officer must not mingle with politics, must not take part in election struggles. No, Mr. Speaker, it is a rare thing not to find the Liberal leaders and their friends in contradiction with themselves when they go to making such grand declarations of principles as are found in the resolution now before the House. One would think it is an unpardonable offence on the part of the Conservative party to denounce the conduct of the Grand Trunk Company, when we think, and when our public men think, that the company favours a policy contrary to the interest of this country and of the Empire. It is an offence for us. But if such is an offence for us, I will remark to the hon. leader of the Opposition, that his political ancestors must have been guilty of a mortal sin when they endeavoured to smother the Grand Trunk in its infancy. Mr. Speaker, the political ancestors of the hon. leader of the Opposition would not own him as one of their successors, if they could witness the policy which he follows to-day, so different is it from that followed by them when they were leading the Liberal party. The Opposition was violent, when at the outset of the company, the Conservative party was granting subsidies to the Grand Trunk, in order to ensure the success of that enterprise. It was the first railway being built in the country, and the Conservative Government wanted to ensure the success of the undertaking. Upon that success was to depend the future of railway enterprise in this country. Well, the Liberal party fought those subsidies which the Conservative party was granting the Grand Trunk Company to make sure its success. At that time the Liberal party learned the business of smotherers of public undertakings. Later on, when the company had acquired sufficient strength to do without public and governmental help, the Government of the Province of Quebec, as does the present Federal Government, thought it its duty to foster railway enterprise. What was the opposition which the new companies met with on the European markets when the question came of finding money necessary to secure the building of the new railways? They met with the opposition of this spoiled child of our country, the Grand Trunk Company, which burked the loans of the North Shore Railway Company and of the Northern Colonization Railway Company, when these enterprises were undertaken. The consequence was that, in order to secure the construction of these two first links of the great Pacific Railway, the Quebec Government was then forced to undertake it itself. At that time the Grand Trunk tried to smother these new-born companies, and in this they obtained the aid of the Liberal party, which had learned the business of smotherers of railway undertakings at the time it practised it on the Grand Trunk Company itself. To-day, Mr. Speaker, in the mind of the public men who compose the Conservative party, the Grand Trunk weds its interests to the political interests of the hon. leader of the Opposition in order to dominate the railway interest in the country, and to try even to dominate the very Government of the Dominion. Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner at London, protested against such a course, against such a policy. I have just heard one of my hon. colleagues on the right state that the Grand Trunk had taken no hostile position in his constituency. That may be, but one thing is certain, this company has taken a very active part at the last elections in the district which I have the honour to represent. The Grand Trunk Company sent letters to each of its employés, to each of its officers, with instructions to vote for the candidates of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not complain of that in any way. If the Grand Trunk Company thought it was to its interest that the policy of the Opposition should prevail, I find no fault with its being hostile to me. It was its right to be so. But in the name of what right does the hon. leader of the Opposition want to arraign or impeach the High Commissioner because he does not agree with him, because he opposed the Grand Trunk Company, which does not share his political opinions. As I was saying before, the hon. leader of the Opposition has been sore by four consecutive defeats. Seeing the hon. leader of the Opposition at work, one would think that he is always changing his programme, modifying it constantly. One would think that at this late hour, at this stage of the session, the hon. leader of the Opposition felt that he had another little addition to make to it. All my hon. colleagues in this House know that the first programme of the hon. leader of the Opposition and of his friends was a revenue tariff. Then, if I am not mistaken, it was free trade; then again, commercial union; later on, unrestricted reciprocity, and lastly, continental reciprocity. Now, he has thought that by the heroic resolution before the House, he would put a little appendix to his programme, by asking the chief of the Conservative party, in order to ensure victory to his political friends and to himself, to fold his arms when his troops are going to the front, so that he may the more easily conquer. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Public Works has been asked at the beginning of this session, to be good enough to give up his portfolio on account of accusations formulated against him, accusations which have not yet been proven, and which, I hope, never will be. A little later on, the hon. leader of the Opposition comes down with a resolution which he submits to this House, and by which he would like to have it settled that another chief of the Conservative party, who dealt hard blows to the Liberal party during the last campaign, should not take part any more in elections, so that victory might be easier for him. It is Sir Charles Tupper whom he now wants to see out of the political field. I admit that if he does want victory to be easy, he does well to try and remove from the field the chiefs of the party which defeated his own four times in succession. Perhaps he might thus secure for himself success in a fifth campaign. But I doubt if the chiefs of the Conservative party will consent thus to drop out. So, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles Tupper stands accused of the crime or of the offence which his traducers have themselves committed. Here is a party so lacking in liberality as to want to prevent the chiefs of the Conservative party from joining in the election campaigns. I am not, as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is, an authority on constitutional matters, but we have heard the hon. members from the right, who are constitutional authorities, state that Sir Charles Tupper had a right to take part in the last election, because he is not a civil servant in the ordinary sense of the word. Sir Charles Tupper is an agent in London, who is responsible for the policy of the Government, and it is certain that his duties shall cease as my hon. friend comes to power. I believe it will not be soon; but, nevertheless, his duties shall come to an end as soon as the leader of the Opposition passes to the other side of the House. Sir Charles Tupper is a political man, who occupies too large a place in his country to make it possible for the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends to seriously contend that this citizen has no right to take part in elections. Not only should Sir Charles Tupper answer the summons he had received, but I sincerely believe that if he had not done so he would have degraded himself in the eyes of his party. Sir Charles has rendered immense services to his country; his name is to a certain extent identified, as well as those of his colleagues, with our public enterprises, and especially with the great Pacific Railway, the wonderfully rapid construction of which he has secured by favouring the company entrusted with the carrying out of that great work. Under the circumstances, as a member from the Province of Quebec, my hon. friend knows more than anyone else what our province owes to Sir Charles Tupper. He knows that when he was Minister of Railways, Sir Charles Tupper did not hesitate a moment to indemnify the Province of Quebec for the enormous expense it had incurred to build a part of the Pacific. His speeches in the House remain to show under what circumstances he came to the rescue of our province; and they show that he treated her loyally, as indeed she could expect to be treated by a man gifted as this man is. The services rendered by Sir Charles Tupper in England—it has been superabundantly proven, and it has been admitted even by the hon. members of the left—are so considerable that it is almost an act of ingratitude on the part of public men of this country to attempt to censure the conduct of this statesman. These services are such that the hon. members who usually support the policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition, will not consent, at least those from the Province of Quebec, to commit such an act of ingratitude. The Liberal members from the Province of Quebec, judging the question on its merits with the spirit of justice and independence which should govern us in all things, will refuse to give their support to the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I have shown that on many occasions this hon. gentleman has himself formulated against his opponents the accusations which he contends have been uttered against his party by Sir Charles Tupper. These facts being known by his colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that they can hesitate to say that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition preaches, while in the Opposition, a doctrine which he could not practice were he on the ministerial benches.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Laurier:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—The conduct and language of Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner of Canada in England, in interfering in the recent elections and in imputing treasonable and disloyal motives to a large proportion of the people of this Dominion, and also in assailing and vilifying the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and in reflecting upon the position of the said company, is a breach of the duties of the office which he fills, and is calculated to destroy the efficiency of the said office, and to injure the credit of the Dominion, besides damaging a very important corporation whose shareholders have invested large sums of money in the work of extending and promoting the railway system of Canada.

Kingston Penitentiary..... $148,583.64

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I note a remark here with regard to the allowance to the Rev. J. S. Quinn: "Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Penitentiary Act." What is the meaning of that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By the statute relating to penitentiaries all new officers begin at a minimum and go gradually up to a maximum. The meaning of this note is that chaplains should be made an exception to that rule, inasmuch as their qualifications are the same when they enter the office as they are after a lapse of time in the office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I note that the total receipts from the farm are put down at $153.40. Is that the total value of the produce of the farm?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No. It only represents the sales actually made; it does not represent the articles consumed.

Committee rose and reported resolution.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was understood, I believe, that the hon. Minister of Finance would proceed on Tuesday with the Budget speech, but there are painful circumstances which I need not allude to further that will make that a very doubtful matter. I would like to know, however, what conclusion the Government have come to on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. It will depend entirely on the turn events take. If by any possibility no more unfortunate event occurs, I shall be prepared to go on with my Budget on Tuesday. But the House of course knows the condition of affairs at the present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Ministers have no information, I suppose, to give us on that matter just now.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No. The last information I had was that Sir John Macdonald was very, very low.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.30 a.m. (Saturday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 8th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to inform the House that, in view of the fact that the right hon. leader of this House died so late on Saturday night, it was impossible for me to communicate with hon. members earlier than the present, I thought it was only a fitting tribute to one who had occupied so prominent a position both in Parliament and in the councils of the country for so long a time, that we should exhibit some signs of mourning in this House to-day, and I took the responsibility of ordering that the symbols of mourning which are shown here to-day should be put up this morning. I venture to express the hope that hon. members on both sides, irrespective altogether of politics, will sustain me in the action I have taken.

Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, having to announce to the House the sad event that has been known for two days now, I was afraid I could not trust to my memory, and I, therefore, thought it desirable to place in writing what I wished to say. Accordingly, I will now read the observations I desire to offer. Mr. Speaker, as the oldest Privy Councillor it falls to my lot to announce to the House that our dear old chief, the First Minister of Canada, is no more. After a painful illness of two weeks, death put an end to his earthly career on Saturday evening last. To tell you, Mr. Speaker, my feelings under the circumstances is more than I can do. I feel that by the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, Canada has lost its greatest statesman, a great patriot, a man of whom any country in the world would be justly proud. Her Gracious Majesty the Queen never had a more devoted and loyal subject than the grand old man, whose loss we all deplore and regret from the bottom of our hearts. For nearly fifty years he has directed the public affairs of this country. He was among the Fathers of Confederation the most prominent and distinguished. He put his whole soul into that great undertaking, knowing full well that the confederation of all the British North American Provinces would give to our people a country and institutions to be glorious of, and to the Empire not only a right arm, but a great and safe highway to her Indian and other possessions. He told me more than once how grateful he was to the people of Canada to have allowed him to have consolidated that great work. The fact is, his love for Canada was equal to that he had for his own mother country. Mr. Speaker, when the historians of Canada write the history of the last fifty years, they will have to write the life of Sir John A. Macdonald, and, in writing his life, they may not agree with all his public acts, but they cannot fail to say that he was a great man, a most distinguished statesman, and that his whole life was spent in the service of his country, dying in the midst of his official duty, not having had a day's rest before he passed to a better world. I need not express, Mr. Speaker, my own personal feelings. Having spent half of my life with him as his follower and as his friend, his departure is the same as if I lost half of my existence. I remember how devoted he was, not only to the old Province of Canada, but how chivalrous he showed himself to the Province of Quebec, and specially to my French Canadian countrymen. He had only a word to say, and instead of being at the head of a small band of seventeen Upper Canada members, he would have had all the representatives of his province behind him. But, as he told me several times, he preferred to be just to his French compatriots and allies, and the result was that when Confederation came, the Province of Quebec had confidence in him, and on his death-bed our great chief could see that his just policy has secured peace and happiness to all. Mr. Speaker, I would have wished to continue to speak of our dear departed friend, and spoken to you about his goodness of heart, the witness of which I have been so often, but I feel that I must stop; my heart is full of tears. I cannot proceed further. I move:

That, in the opinion of this House, the mortal remains of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, G.C.B., should be publicly interred, and that this House will concur in giving to the ceremony a fitting degree of solemnity and importance.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the emotion which chokes the hon. gentleman. His silence, under the circumstances, is far more eloquent than any human language could be. I fully appreciate the intensity of the grief which fills the souls of all those who were the friends and followers of Sir John Macdonald, at the loss of the great leader whose whole life has been so closely identified with their party; a party upon which he has thrown such brilliancy and lustre. We on this side of the House who were his opponents, who did not believe in his policy, nor in his methods of government; we take our full share of their grief—for the loss which they deplore to-day is far and away beyond and above the ordinary compass of party range. It is in every respect a great national loss, for he who is no more was, in many respects, Canada's most illustrious son, and in every sense Canada's foremost citizen and statesman. At the period of life to which Sir John Macdonald had arrived, death, whenever it comes, cannot be said to come unexpected. Some few months ago, during the turmoil of the late election, when the country was made aware that on a certain day the physical strength of the veteran Premier had not been equal to his courage, and that his intense labour for the time being had prostrated his singularly wiry frame, everybody, with the exception, perhaps, of his buoyant self, was painfully anxious lest perhaps the angel of death had touched him with his wing. When, a few days ago in the heat of an angry discussion the news spread in this House, that of a sudden his condition had become alarming, the surging waves of angry discussion were at once hushed, and every one, friend and foe, realized that this time for a certainty the angel of death had appeared and had crossed the threshold of his home. Thus we were not taken by surprise, and although we were prepared for the sad event, yet it is almost impossible to convince the unwilling mind, that it is true, that Sir John Macdonald is no more, that the chair which we now see vacant shall remain forever vacant; that the face so familiar in this Parliament for the last forty years shall be seen no more, and that the voice so well known shall be heard no more, whether in solemn debate or in pleasant and mirthful tones. In fact, the place of Sir John Macdonald in this country was so large and so absorbing, that it is almost impossible to conceive that the political life of this country, the fate of this country, can continue without him. His loss overwhelms us. For my part, I say with all truth, his loss overwhelms me, and it also overwhelms this Parliament, as if indeed one of the institutions of the land had given way. Sir John Macdonald now belongs to the ages, and it can be said with certainty, that the career which has just been closed is one of the most remarkable careers of this century. It would be premature at this time to attempt to fix or anticipate what will be the final judgment of history upon him; but there were in his career and in his life, features so prominent and so conspicuous that already they shine with a glow which time cannot alter, which even now appear before the eye such as they will appear to the end in history. I think it can be asserted that for the supreme art of governing men, Sir John Macdonald was gifted as few men in any land or in any age were gifted; gifted with the most high of all qualities, qualities which would have made him famous wherever exercised and which would have shone all the more conspicuously the larger the theatre. The fact that he could congregate together elements the most heterogeneous and blend them into one compact party, and to the end of his life keep them steadily under his hand, is perhaps altogether unprecedented. The fact that during all those years he retained unimpaired not only the confidence, but the devotion—the ardent devotion and affection of his party, is evidence that beside those higher qualities of statesmanship to which we were the daily witnesses, he was also endowed with those inner, subtile, undefinable graces of soul which win and keep the hearts of men. As to his statesmanship, it is written in the history of Canada. It may be said without any exaggeration whatever, that the life of Sir John Macdonald, from the date he entered Parliament, is the history of Canada, for he was connected and associated with all the events, all the facts which brought Canada from the position Canada then occupied—the position of two small provinces, having nothing in common but a common allegiance, united by a bond of paper, and united by nothing else—to the present state of development which Canada has reached. Although my political views compel me to say that, in my judgment, his actions were not always the best that could have been taken in the interest of Canada, although my conscience compels me to say that of late he has imputed to his opponents motives as to which I must say in my heart he has misconceived, yet I am only too glad here to sink these differences, and to remember only the great services he has performed for our country—to remember that his actions always displayed great originality of views, unbounded fertility of resources, a high level of intellectual conceptions, and, above all, a far-reaching vision beyond the event of the day, and still higher, permeating the whole, a broad patriotism—a devotion to Canada's welfare, Canada's advancement, and Canada's glory. The life of a statesman is always an arduous one, and very often it is an ungrateful one. More often than otherwise his actions do not mature until he is in his grave. Not so, however, in the case of Sir John Macdonald. His career has been a singularly fortunate one. His reverses were few and of short duration. He was fond of power, and, in my judgment, if I may say so, that may be the turning point of the judgment of history. He was fond of power, and he never made any secret of it. Many times we have heard him avow it on the floor of this Parliament, and his ambition in this respect was gratified as, perhaps, no other man's ambition ever was. In my judgment, even the career of William Pitt can hardly compare with that of Sir John Macdonald in this respect; for although William Pitt, moving in a higher sphere, had to deal with problems greater than our problems, yet I doubt if in the intricate management of a party William Pitt had to contend with difficulties equal to those that Sir John Macdonald had to contend with. In his death, too, he seems to have been singularly happy. Twenty years ago I was told by one who at that time was a close personal and political friend of Sir John Macdonald, that in the intimacy of his domestic circle he was fond of repeating that his end would be as the end of Lord Chatham—that he would be carried away from the floor of Parliament to die. How true that vision into the future was we now know, for we saw him to the last, with enfeebled health and declining strength, struggling on the floor of Parliament until the hand of fate pinned him to his bed to die. And thus to die with his armour on was probably his ambition. Sir, death is the law—the supreme law. Although we see it every day in every form, although session after session we have seen it in this Parliament striking right and left without any discrimination as to age or station, yet the ever-recurring spectacle does not in any way remove the bitterness of the sting. Death always carries with it an incredible sense of pain; but the one thing sad in death is that which is involved in the word separation—separation from all we love in life. This is what makes death so poignant when it strikes a man of intellect in middle age. But when death is the natural termination of a full life, in which he who disappears has given the full measure of his capacity, has performed everything required from him, and more, the sadness of death is not for him who goes, but for those who loved him and remain. In this sense I am sure the Canadian people will extend unbounded sympathy to the friends of Sir John Macdonald—to his sorrowing children, and, above all, to the brave and noble woman, his companion in life and his chief helpmate. Thus, Mr. Speaker, one after another we see those who have been instrumental in bringing Canada to its present stage of development, removed from amongst us. To-day, we deplore the loss of him who, we all unite in saying, was the foremost Canadian of his time, and who filled the largest place in Canadian history. Only last week, was buried in the city of Montreal, another son of Canada, one who at one time had been a tower of strength to the Liberal party, one who will ever be remembered as one of the noblest, purest, and greatest characters that Canada has ever produced, Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion. Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion had not been in favour of Confederation. Not that he was opposed to the principle; but he believed that the Union of these provinces, at that day, was premature. When, however, Confederation had become a fact, he gave the best of his mind and heart to make it a success.

It may indeed happen, Sir, that when the Canadian people see the ranks thus gradually reduced and thinned of those upon whom they have been in the habit of relying for guidance, that a feeling of apprehension will creep into the heart lest, perhaps, the institutions of Canada may be imperilled. Before the grave of him who, above all, was the father of Confederation, let not grief be barren grief; but let grief be coupled with the resolution, the determination that the work in which Liberals and Conservatives, in which Brown and Macdonald united, shall not perish, but that though United Canada may be deprived of the services of her greatest men, still Canada shall and will live. I agree to the motion.

Mr. DAVIN. I think, Sir, it would be unbecoming, if I may venture to say so, that I should remain silent on this occasion, and that no expression should be given of the way the North-West feels at this supreme hour. For myself it would be hard not to express a sense of grief at such a time as this, because it so happens that for some years I was brought closely into contact with him whom we mourn at this time, and I was able to see into those features of his character which were probably of as much value to the world and as much the secret of his strength as the great abilities which struck the superficial observer. Mr. Speaker, the man whom we mourn here to-day was emphatically a great man. When I came to Canada first, his friends, misdoubting that they might have formed a provincial conception of Sir John Macdonald, used to come to me and ask how he would compare with the great men in England. I said he could stand up to the greatest of them, and when I knew him intimately and was brought closely in contact with him, I became more and more convinced that, far from doubting whether he could stand up to the greatest of them, few of them had the varied qualities, the extraordinarily varied and complex qualities, that are necessary to make a political leader such as was Sir John Macdonald. Ranging over the field of history, and recalling the names of the men who have reached those heights which it takes a lifetime to climb, it is hardly possible to find one who has possessed the diverse qualities of the great man who the other day was leading in this House. You may find great power of intellect, great powers of statesmanship, far-reaching views, great powers of oratory, but where will you find, conjoined with all these, that incomparable, that genial humour, that politeness which never fails, that delicate consideration for the feelings of others, that exquisite urbanity, that distinguished Sir John Macdonald—that ever and anon played, the light and shade of a rich and abounding nature—

"Le bon sens ironique et la grâce qui rit."

Sir, the measure of his great abilities are the difficulties that he overcame. I remember, when I first visited these buildings, some twenty years ago, a gentleman then occupying one of the highest positions in the Government, said, to my surprise, when I admired the buildings: "But what an expense, what a waste of money." Now we find they are hardly equal to their needs; and the fact is, these very buildings emphasize the imperial cast of mind of the great man who is gone. I remember the first time I had a conversation with him, some seventeen or eighteen years ago, he drew a sketch of the British possessions confederated together, and then, in his own emphatic way, he said, "That is the time when I should like to lead." In truth, he was not only a Canadian, but an Imperial statesman, and the brightest gem in the British Crown was polished and set by his hand. Thrice in his great career he accomplished events such as give tone, and colour, and form to history, and affect the relative position of nations. I have read somewhere of a child who planted a tree, which ultimately shaded his old age, and with the dews of evening watered his grave. Sir John Macdonald is in that position, because he found Canada a petty province and he leaves it something like an empire. At this moment a nation more important than the nation over which Elizabeth ruled, weeps the loss of a statesman who built it up. As I have said, it does seem to me that the qualities most startling in that remarkable man were the kindness of heart and that alchemistical power which transmuted all that came near him into gold—which made of every foe that came within its influence either a friend or a devotee. And when we think of his loss, we mourn, not merely the statesman who directed the affairs of the country, but the friend; and not only do we that knew him thus mourn, but even those not personally acquainted with him, for he had that power, which only belongs to the highest genius, of making men who never saw him feel the extraordinary charm of his personality. We may build statues to him in these grounds, monuments will arise to him in Kingston, but the real, the grandest monument to Sir John Macdonald will be the love that Canada feels it her privilege to cherish for so great a personality. But even should we never erect a statue to his memory, humanity would keep his memory green, for he belonged to that rare group of men who enchain the memory of mankind. Sir, language was addressed to a great countryman of his, a great Scotchman—not a statesman, but belonging to another order of activity—which might well be applied to the great statesman we mourn:

"Dead heroes in marble from memory fade,
But warm hearts shall weep where thine ashes are laid,
And earth's proudest priesthoods like phantoms flit by,
But thou'rt of the priesthood that never can die."

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As hon. gentlemen may have learned by the papers to-day, the funeral of our departed friend will take place in this city on Wednesday, and in Kingston on Thursday. It will be Friday, therefore, before we get back, and, under these circumstances, I would move that when this House adjourns, it stands adjourned until Tuesday week, the 16th inst., at three o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. I would have expected that before this motion was made, some gentlemen on the Treasury benches would be able to inform the House as to whether anybody had been summoned by His Excellency to carry on the Government of the day. I assume that he has done so, if British precedence is, as it ought, to be followed. Under such circumstances, I think the motion to adjourn should have been coupled with such a statement. If the hon. gentleman is ready to show that His Excellency has summoned some one to form a Cabinet, I am ready at once to agree to an adjournment. I can well conceive that the new Cabinet would require some days to prepare for the hard labour they will have to do this session, and there would be no hesitation in granting an adjournment for a short time; but so long as no Cabinet has been formed, it seems to me that the proper way of conducting business is to have the House adjourn from day to day, except, of course, the day set apart for the funeral, in order that we may receive at once what communications may be made by His Excellency with regard to the formation of a Cabinet. The hon. gentleman is aware that this has invariably been the practice followed in England.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When I mentioned to the hon. gentleman, before the House met, that I would make this motion, I knew the hon. gentleman would make the remarks he has made, and I do not find fault with him for doing so. I may say that we are not aware of any party having been sent for by the Governor General to form a new Administration, and, as I have just said, as this week will be taken up altogether with the funeral ceremonies, nothing can be done before next week. The hon. gentleman is aware that in this country the English precedents have not always been followed in matters of this kind; and, in any case, if His Excellency thinks proper to send for some one after the funeral to form an Administration, the party sent for would have but Saturday and Monday to carry out his instructions, and would not be able to communicate to the House before Tuesday, so that no time would be lost by consenting to an adjournment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that the course suggested by the hon. the Minister of Public Works is a very unusual one. The hon. member says that English precedent has not always been followed in this country. So far as I am aware, it has been very closely followed since the organization of this Confederation and before, and, if it was not followed, that has arisen from oversight or inadvertence rather than from any intention to depart from the precedents established in the mother country. At this moment His Excellency is without a Cabinet. The death of the Prime Minister has dissolved the Administration as advisers of His Excellency on matters of general policy. They retain, of course, their constitutional right to advise His Excellency individually as Privy Councillors. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that His Excellency, if he follows the English constitutional rule, will, without delay, notwithstanding the death of the Prime Minister, which the House deplores, send for some one to whom he will entrust the duty of forming an Administration I do not think that His Excellency can delay that until Saturday. No one can tell at what moment some emergency may arise when it will be necessary that His Excellency should have constitutional advisers enjoying the confidence of Parliament, and there would be as much propriety in his sending for some one to assume the responsibility of forming an Administration now as on Friday or Saturday. When Mr. Percival, who was Prime Minister of England, fell by the hand of an assassin in the House of Commons, steps were at once taken to form an Administration, and the House adjourned from day to day, only remaining in session so as to be in a position to advise the Crown, if it were necessary, with reference to its proceeding in constituting a Government; and it did actually intervene and carried through the House a resolution in which advice was tendered to the Crown upon that subject. And so we find that, on the fall of the Aberdeen Government, Her Majesty first sent for Lord Derby, who failed to form an Administration; then she sent for Lord John Russell, who also failed; and, after a fortnight had elapsed, Lord Palmerston succeeded in forming an Administration. During all that period after the defeat of the Government, nothing took place from the 15th January until the 16th February, but during that time there was only one day's adjournment. The House met every day for the purpose of watching the proceedings, and intervening as the Great Council of the Nation if it thought fit to do so. Looking at the precedents which we have before us, and at those which occurred in England under circumstances somewhat similar to those which now exist here, I think the course advised by the Minister might very well have been taken by him if he could at the same time have informed the House that His Excellency had sent for some one to form an Administration, but that information has not been given to the House, and, while we owe it to ourselves and to the late Prime Minister to pay all proper respect to his memory, we also owe it to the country that we shall not be derelict in discharging those duties which the law and the constitution and our public responsibility impose upon us.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would be a mistake for the House to exercise its judgment on the motion to adjourn for a week on the supposition that it is put forward on the ground of inconvenience to His Excellency, or with a view of desiring the re-formation of the Cabinet being deferred until the expiration of that time, or until the funeral arrangements have taken place. The motion is made with no such view, with no view that the re-formation of the Cabinet should be deferred. We are not, as the Minister of Public Works has announced, in a position to state that His Excellency has yet sought the advice of anyone in regard to the formation of his Cabinet, but we cannot assume that His Excellency will not do so at the convenient and proper time, at a time to suit the convenience of this Parliament; nor, by acceding to the motion to adjourn, will the House be acceding to the idea that the re-formation of the Cabinet should be deferred. I think the motion is made by the Minister of Public Works, on the ground on which I support it, that, in view of the funeral observances, this House should adjourn out of respect to the memory of him who was so recently its leader, until the funeral ceremony is over. The arrangements already made will take the rest of this week. The re-assembling of the House on Monday would be awkward, and we thought it would suit the convenience of hon. members to meet again on Tuesday at three o'clock. In the case of the death of distinguished members of Parliament, it is not unusual for the House to adjourn, in respect to their memory, and we cannot foresee any emergency, any crisis, any danger to the State, which would interfere with the adoption of the motion proposed by the Minister of Public Works. I think the House will refrain from tendering advice to His Excellency as to the formation of a Cabinet, because it has full confidence that His Excellency will follow the precedents laid down and will do the best in the interests of the country in forming his Cabinet. I hope, therefore, that the House will accept the motion to adjourn on the ground that it is proper, that it is expedient, and that it is respectful to the memory of the late leader of the House that we should adjourn until after his burial has taken place.

Motion agreed to on division.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is an item on the Order paper which requires to be disposed of in order that the business of the House may be kept in proper shape. I, therefore, move :

That the Order of the House in regard to the attendance of Michael Connolly at the bar of the House this day be discharged, and that the said Michael Connolly be summoned to appear at the bar of this House on Tuesday, 16th June instant, at the hour of four o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 16th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 102) respecting the Ontario and Qu' Appelle Land Company.—(Mr. Trow.)

Bill (No. 103) to further amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. Barron.)

QUEBEC SKATING RINK.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Friday next, to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to convey to the Quebec Skating Club certain Ordnance lands in the city of Quebec, subject to such provisions and conditions as the Governor in Council deems proper.

A NEW MINISTRY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to read to the House a statement that has been entrusted to me by the Hon. Mr. Abbott, a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, as follows :—

Having obtained the requisite permission from His Excellency, I desire to make a statement of proceedings after the death of the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. It was felt by His Excellency that the state of public affairs did not necessitate the formation of a new Cabinet until the grave had closed over the late Premier and the last honours had been paid him. On the morning following the funeral, His Excellency, exercising his constitutional right, applied to the Hon. Sir John Thompson for his advice with respect to the steps which should be taken for the formation of a new Government. Later, on the same day, by Sir John Thompson's advice, I was myself summoned by His Excellency, and, after consideration, I accepted, on the following day, the duty which His Excellency desired me to assume. I, therefore, communicated with my colleagues and requested their consent to remain in their respective offices, and with their assent submitted to His Excellency my recommendation that they should be continued in the positions, which His Excellency was pleased to approve, and he also sanctioned my assuming the departmental office of President of the Council. The vacancy caused by the lamented death of the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald has not been filled, and pending the appointment of a successor the affairs of the Department of Railways will be administered by a member of the Cabinet.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 14) with respect to certain matters affecting the Administration of Justice.

Motion agreed to : Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BARRON. I draw the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that in some of the counties to which is attached jurisdiction such as it is now proposed to add to the county, the county court judge already, under the Ontario Government, does the work and receives salary from the Provincial Government. If this becomes law, I suppose it will not interfere with the jurisdiction, so far as it is claimed by the Local Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The jurisdiction is now exercised in various parts of the Dominion by the judge of the adjoining county, or another judge who may happen to be called in. He is not, I think, called in by the Provincial Government, although it is very likely the Provincial Government approves of the arrangement. He does not receive any salary, but doubts have arisen as to his having jurisdiction when so called in, and conflicting decisions have been rendered on that point; the First Minister of Ontario has requested that this legislation should be introduced. In fact, nearly all the provisions of the Bill are enacted to remove doubts which have arisen in Ontario, and in pursuance of an arrangement arrived at between the Attorney General of Ontario and myself.

On section 4,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I desire to amend this clause by inserting in the second line after the word "offices" the following words :—"either by the Governor General in Council, or, previous to the passing of the British North America Act, by other competent authority." I think the Committee will agree with me that the provisions of sections 1 and 4 should be made retroactive, to remove doubts which have arisen as to jurisdiction of judges who assumed the authority it is here intended they shall have. I, therefore, propose to insert in clause 1 the words : "shall be deemed always to have extended."

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if, in conferring upon these county court judges this additional duty, by which they will be compelled to go into the additional territory that may be assigned to them by the Provincial Governments, he contemplates making any provision for increased remuneration? We have some very large districts, and additional expense will be thrown on the judge in the shape of travelling expenses. If a judge is to perform his duty in two districts and save the appointment of another judge, some additional pay should be given him, or at least an allowance for travelling expenses. I have in my mind the position of a judge who has two districts under his care at present. It was only yesterday he told me that his travelling expenses to one district and return home cost him $45.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not contemplated to insert anything in this Bill upon that subject. The Bill is not intended by any means to make provision for the case of a judgeship being left vacant and another judge being called on to perform permanently the duties in addition to his own, but it is intended merely to provide for an emergency. We should never call upon a judge of one county to exercise jurisdiction in another county permanently. Those duties are now exercised at the request of the provincial authorities or of a judge who may be ill; and it is intended also to apply to the case of a judge suddenly removed by death or other disability when there is business requiring immediate judicial attendance. When cases arise under section 3 for the calling in of any county court judge, we will have to consider whether provisions should not be made for paying him, inasmuch as he receives no salary if he is of the class mentioned in section 3. If such cases arise, it would be necessary to ask for an appropriation in that regard, but it is not proposed to make any such provision in the Bill. In fact, section 3 could only be enforced if the judge were willing to act without remuneration, or if he would trust to an appropriation being made by Parliament afterwards. The object of the Bill, as I have stated, is not to introduce any new system of administering the county court jurisdiction, but rather to remove doubts as to the class of cases in regard to which one judge, as a matter of courtesy or of necessity, is called upon to perform duties for another judge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Section 2 compels the judge to act. It would be better to say that it shall be lawful for a judge to exercise the duties in such a case.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The second section imposes the duty upon any judge to go to any district that the Lieutenant Governor in Council may decide. I do not think the Local Government pays the expenses in these cases, and there ought to be some restriction on their powers, or some provision made for these expenses. It is imposing a very onerous duty upon the judges.

Mr. BARRON. If any county court judge is asked by the Lieutenant Governor in Council to go to another district, his expenses are paid by the Local Government, in the same way as the county court judge in Victoria, who has been asked to take the Division Courts in the County of Haliburton, is paid by the Local Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The additional duty is imposed upon the county court judge of going to an adjoining or any other county, and no provision whatever is made for his remuneration, although he may be compelled to go. If the object of the Bill be what the Minister of Justice says it is, I do not see the necessity for the first part of section 2 at all. It would be sufficient to provide that the county court judge shall have power to hear cases in any other county, but, if it is left as it is, the county court judge ought not to be compelled to leave his own county and go to another without some provision being made for his remuneration. The fact that the Local Government makes some provision does not affect this matter at all. When the Lieutenant Governor in Council orders the judge to go to another county, the judge receives remuneration, but by this Bill the Federal Government takes power to compel a county court judge to go to another county, and I think that is unfair to the county court judges. It is true that in the western part of the Province of Ontario the county court judges have very little to do. In most of those counties there are two judges, the senior receiving $2,600 and the junior $2,200 each, including $200 for travelling expenses, although there is really work for only one judge, and the Government might very well call upon one of those judges to discharge duties elsewhere. But, in general, I think the point taken by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is correct, and that, if the Government can call upon any judge to go from one end of the province to the other, they should not do so without providing for his remuneration.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask the Committee to remember what I have already stated, that this is not an attempt to introduce a new system of administering justice, but to provide for cases of emergency. Whenever a judge is called upon under section 2 to discharge a duty which is onerous to him, I think he may rely upon it that Parliament will do what is just in regard to his disbursements. Of course, it would be absurd to ask for any salary, because we have a right to his services during the whole year. I would ask my hon. friends opposite to remember that section 2 is simply a re-enactment of the legislation of the Province of Ontario in regard to this matter. Doubts have arisen as to the right of the Local Legislature to pass such legislation, and we have introduced that provision to set those doubts at rest. The Federal authority is not taking the power to itself to order a judge from one end of the province to another. We only take power to make an Order in Council of that kind when we are called upon by the Local Government to do so. The Provincial and the Federal authorities must, therefore, concur, and I think it is not unreasonable that this provision should be made. Under the rare cases that will arise under this enactment, no doubt a fair provision will be made by Parliament for travelling expenses, as it is made by the Local Governments when, for instance, a Queen's Counsel is called upon to hold a criminal court, and Parliament has been asked to give the same indemnity for expenses to the ad hoc judge as would be given to the judge appointed by the Federal authorities. No difficulty has ever occurred of the kind referred to, and whenever it does occur, I have no doubt it will be met by this Parliament.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). After the explanation of the Minister of Justice, I do not think there will be any difficulty in the matter. We are pretty sure that if judges are called upon to perform these duties, they will make application, either to this Parliament or to the Local Legislature, for remuneration, and no doubt they will get it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must ask the Committee to leave the Bill in committee in order that I may draw up with some care a clause to meet the needs which have been developed in the discussion. I move that the Committee rise and report.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I believe there are cases still in litigation, and it would not be fair to take away their rights by Acts of Parliament. I hope the hon. gentleman will have regard to these cases.

Committee rose and reported progress.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

The Order being read:

Michael Connolly, the witness named in the First Report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to attend at the Bar of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms will please see that Mr. Connolly is in attendance.

The DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Michael Connolly is in attendance.

Mr. SPEAKER. Admit the gentleman.

MICHAEL CONNOLLY came before the Bar.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. For convenience, I move that the report of the sub-committee and the exhibits annexed thereto, be read in the presence of the witness, in order that he may have full cognizance thereof, after which I propose to put a question to him.

Motion agreed to, and the Assistant Clerk read the report, as follows:—

The Select Standing Committee to whom was referred certain statements made in connection with the tenders and contracts respecting the Quebec Harbour Works, &c., with instructions to enquire fully into the said allegations, and especially, but without limiting the scope of such enquiry, to investigate all circumstances connected therewith, and the payments and other matters mentioned in the said statements, beg leave to present as their First Report, the following Report of the Sub-Committee, to which they have unanimously agreed, viz.:—

REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE.
HOUSE OF COMMONS, 5th June, 1891.

The Sub-Committee on Privileges and Elections have unanimously agreed to the annexed Draft Report on the reference to them in the case of Michael Connolly, a witness refusing to produce certain books required by the Committee; and they recommend it to the Committee for adoption as the Report to be submitted to the House.

D. GIROUARD, Chairman.
JNO. S. D. THOMPSON,
J. A. CHAPLEAU,
DAVID MILLS,
F. LANGELIER.

DRAFT REPORT SUBMITTED BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE.

The Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections have the honour to report that, in pursuance of the reference made to the Committee by the House on the eleventh day of May last, several witnesses have been in part examined, and a large number of documents have been produced.

One of the witnesses so examined in part was Michael Connolly, a member of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Company, mentioned in the reference. The said Michael Connolly's summons required him to produce a number of documents and books of account.

The witness having attended with documents and books of account containing entries relating to the matters under enquiry, and being under examination, was required to produce the books and place them under the control of the Committee.

This demand he distinctly refused to comply with. He was likewise required to hand certain of these books to a member of the Committee who expressed a desire to look at them in order to put certain questions to the witness relating to certain matters of account which were supposed to be entered therein. This was also refused by the witness.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

The proceedings of the Committee, and the testimony of the witness, will appear more in detail by the Exhibits hereto annexed, marked "A" and "B," being the minutes of the proceedings of the Committee, and the shorthand writer's notes on the evidence.

Alexander Ferguson, Esquire, Q.C., referred to in the exhibits, was counsel for the witness and for another member of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Company.

Your Committee, being of the opinion that the discharge of the duties of the Committee, imposed on them by the House, requires that the books should be placed under the control and in the possession of your Committee, and that the books be placed in the hands of members of your Committee for the purpose of interrogating the witnesses, report the refusal of Michael Connolly to obey the orders of your Committee in these particulars, and request the action of the House thereon.

All which is respectfully submitted.

D. GIROUARD,
Chairman.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed

Mr. Michael Connolly was recalled, and, in answer to the Chairman, stated that the books and papers which he had been ordered to bring with him had arrived, and he now produced them.

Mr. Ferguson stated, on behalf of the Messrs. Connolly, that they wished it to be understood that these books and papers were not produced before the Committee in the ordinary sense of the term. There was a great deal in the books which had no relevancy whatever with the subject under investigation, and the Messrs. Connolly did not think that their private books should be thrown open to the public, as they would be more or less, were they produced in the ordinary way. They were quite prepared to submit them to an expert accountant appointed by the Committee, or to search the books themselves and give any information required by the Committee, but they could not give up possession of the books.

This not being considered satisfactory, it was moved by Mr. Edgar, that the books of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., now produced by the witness, Michael Connolly, be kept under the control of the Committee until further orders.—Motion agreed to.

Mr. Connolly submitted a list of the books and papers which he had with him; he then produced seven books and papers, which were filed and marked as exhibits as follows:

Exhibit X 2.—Specifications and contract for Esquimalt Graving Dock.

Exhibit Y 2.—Contract for closing and opening of Princess Louise Embankment.

Exhibit Z 2.—Contract for dredging Quebec Harbour Works.

Exhibit A 3.—Contract for Quay-wall and entrance for Wet Dock.

Exhibit B 3.—Contract for dredging Wet Basin, Quebec Harbour.

Exhibit C 3.—Contract for Lévis Graving Dock.

Exhibit D 3.—Trial balance sheet, British Columbia Graving Dock.

Witness being ordered to produce cash books in connection with the Lévis Graving Dock, declined to do so; stating at the same time that he was willing to do with them as he had already suggested.

The Clerk being ordered to lay the said cash books on the Table, the witness declared that he would not allow any man to lay hands on the books, but he consented to have them marked and identified. And after some discussion the books were accordingly identified and marked as Exhibits P 3 to U 3.

The Committee then adjourned till to-morrow, Thursday, at 10.30 a.m.

Flint,

The minutes of the last meeting were read, amended, and confirmed as amended.

Mr. Ferguson stated, in regard to the books belonging to the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., that, after the adjournment of yesterday's sitting, they had been put in a box in the next room (No. 50) under lock and key, the key being in the possession of Mr. Connolly, that they were still there, and that they were at the disposal of the Committee in the same way that they were yesterday.

Mr. Michael Connolly, being recalled, was ordered to produce the cash books in connection with the Lévis Graving Dock contract.

Having brought the books, and being requested by a member of the Committee to hand them to him that he might have an opportunity of examining their contents, Mr. Connolly refused to allow the books to pass out of his possession.

On motion of Sir John Thompson, it was Resolved, That a sub-committee be appointed to report to the House the facts which have transpired in relation to the books of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. from the minutes and stenographer's notes, and that such sub-committee consist of the Chairman, Messrs. Mills (Bothwell), Langelier, Chapleau, and the mover.

Mr. A. Gobeil, Deputy Minister of Public Works, was sworn and examined.

During his examination certain letters and papers were read and filed, and marked as Exhibits B 3 to Q 4, both inclusive.

The Committee then adjourned until to-morrow at 10.30 a. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Wednesday, 3rd June, 1891.

The Committee met at 10.30 a. m., Mr. Girouard in the chair.

Investigation into certain circumstances and statements made in connection with the tenders and contracts respecting the Quebec Harbour Works, &c., resumed.

Mr. MICHAEL CONNOLLY (recalled).

WITNESS.—I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that all the books we have in our possession are here in the building and we are ready here to submit them to inspection, but I do not think we ought to have them open to the public. If there is any particular entry wanted I am ready to read it.

By Mr. Tarte:

Q. Will you produce on the table of this Committee all the books, contracts, vouchers, letters, receipts, cheques and other documents in your possession or under your control in connection with: first, the dredging of the harbour of Quebec since 1882: second, the cross-wall in connection with the same work: third, the dredging of the wet basin in the same harbour: fourth, the south wall or retaining wall in the same harbour: fifth, the graving dock at Lévis: sixth, the graving dock at Esquimalt, as ordered by a subpœna issued by this Committee upon the 20th May last, and again by a second summons dated the 26th May last, and again by an order given on the 29th May last to you?—A. Here is a list of the documents we have, and if there is anything here that this Committee—

By the Chairman:

Q. Is this a list of the documents asked for by Mr. Tarte?—A. I believe it is.

By Mr. Davies:

Q. Do you produce the documents asked for here?—A. Yes: I do.

By Mr. Tarte:

Q. Will you read the list you have produced?—A. Lévis Graving Dock—two cash books, two ledgers and two journals. Quebec Harbour Improvements—two cash books, one ledger and one journal. South Wall—ledger and journal. Esquimalt Dock—two ledgers, three journals and one cash book.

By Mr. Amyot:

Q. These books now belong to the Committee?—A. No; they do not belong to the Committee.

MR. FERGUSON.—The statement I have to make on behalf of Mr. Michael and Nicholas K. Connolly is that they are ready and willing to attend before this Committee and to exhibit the books from time to time for the purpose of showing any particular entries therein, as to which witnesses may be examined pertaining to the charges referred for investigation in this matter. We take the position that these books contain a large number of accounts and transactions in no way pertaining to the subject of investigation before this Committee. There are a large number of unsettled accounts by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., for which Nicholas K. Connolly and Michael Connolly are alone liable, and they submit that they should not be called upon to submit these books for general exploratory inspection, but that they should be called upon to produce them and point out entries and accounts from time to time as they are required for the purposes of the Committee, and that they should not be given up for general inspection and general discovery. They should remain in their own custody. The point I make is that in the general meaning of the word production they are not produced. The witness is attending here under a subpœna duces tecum, but they are not produced in the ordinary sense in which documents would be produced in a suit. He is here as a witness producing them from time to time, the books remaining in his custody.

By Mr. Tarte:

Q. You have handed to this Committee a list of the books which we have now in our possession?—A. A list of the books I have here yet.

Q. But you have produced here a list of books?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you got any other papers, vouchers, receipts, cheques or notes belonging to you, or under your control, bearing on the works that are the subject of this enquiry?—A. All the papers I have are here. There is another list not enumerated in that list, but they are here. This is the list:—1. Trial balance-sheet, Esquimalt Graving Dock. 2. Contracts—(a) Graving Dock, Esquimalt: (b) Closing and opening of Louise Embankment: (c) Graving Dock, Point Lévis: (d) Contract for dredging Quebec Harbour: (e) Cross-wall: (f) Quebec Harbour dredging: (g) Letter H. F. Perley to Larkin, Connolly & Co., May 17, 1883.

Q. Is there a trial balance-sheet?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you produce it?—A. With pleasure. Here is the contract for the Esquimalt Graving Dock (marked X 2).

Q. You say you have brought the contracts here?—A. All the contracts enumerated in that list are here.

Q. What are they?—A. For closing of the opening in the Louise Embankment (marked Y 2): Contract for dredging the Quebec Harbour works (marked Z 2): Contract for the construction of the quay wall: an entrance for the wet dock, Quebec, between the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co., dated Quebec, 6th June, 1883 (marked A 3): Contract for dredging and removing material from wet basin, Quebec Harbour Commissioners and Larkin, Connolly & Co., No. 3796 (marked B 3): graving dock contract, Point Lévis (marked C 3). This is a trial balance-sheet of the Esquimalt Graving Dock (marked D 3).

By Mr. Edgar:

Q. Is that the final one?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. Look at it?—A. It says: "Trial balance of Esquimalt Graving Dock up to date."

Q. What date?—A. I do not see any date on it.

By Mr. Tarte:

Q. In the list of the books I see "Lévis Graving Dock—two cash-books." Will you produce them?—A. They are all here, and I am ready to produce any item you want.

Q. Will you produce them?—A. I must decline to give them up.

Q. Will you please put those two books on the table of this Committee?—A. The books are on the table. I am willing to point out any particular item in the books and read it to the Committee, and willing to remain here from day to day and be examined on any item.

By the Chairman:

Q. You are ordered to lay those two books on the table and leave them under the control of the Committee?—A. I am quite willing to leave them on the table and open the books and read any portion that the Committee may desire, but to turn them over to the custody of the Committee I must decline.

By Mr. Davies:

Q. I ask you to produce those two books and have them identified?

(No answer.)

The CHAIRMAN.—Let the Clerk take the books.

WITNESS.—I decline to allow the Clerk to touch those books.

By the Chairman:

Q. You are ordered to lay on the table the above two cash books for the purpose of being marked and identified?—A. I am quite willing to do that, but I do not know exactly what that means. If it means turning the books over to the custody of the Committee, I must decline: but if it does not mean that, if it is intended for the purpose of investigation, I am quite willing to do that.

Q. Are you quite willing to lay the books on the table for the purpose of being marked and identified?—A. Yes.

Q. Give us those two cash books in order that a letter may be put on each of them?—A. I may state, if you will allow me, that we have made every effort since yesterday to ascertain the address of our bookkeeper. If possible, we will have him here. He can identify everything in these books. We have nothing to hide or conceal.

The following exhibits were filed:

LEVIS GRAVING DOCK.

Exhibit E 3.—Cash book.
Exhibit F 3.—Second cash book.
Exhibit G 3.—First ledger.
Exhibit H 3.—Second ledger.
Exhibit I 3.—First journal.
Exhibit J 3.—Second journal.

QUEBEC HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.

Exhibit K 3.—Cash book.
Exhibit L 3.—Second cash boak.
Exhibit M 3.—First ledger.
Exhibit N 3.—Second ledger.

SOUTH WALL.

Exhibit O 3.—Ledger.

ESQUIMALT DOCK.

Exhibit Q 3.—Cash book.
Exhibit R 3.—First journal.
Exhibit S 3.—Second journal.
Exhibit T 3.—Third journal.
Exhibit U 3.—Ledger.

The CHAIRMAN.—I understand, Mr. Ferguson, that you undertake to produce the books here to-morrow?

Mr. FERGUSON.—Yes.

Mr. MULOCK.—We do not want any undertaking.

Mr. FERGUSON.—Then I withdraw my undertaking.

By Mr. Tarte:

Q. Can you point out in any one of the books any entry for expense, for notes of $25,000 in 1885, I think?—A. I suppose I could. It would take me a good while to find it, though.

Q. Will you try—from 1883 to 1885?—A. What book is the entry in?

Q. The cross-wall.—A. What date?

Q. I cannot give you the date.—A. You see I will have to hunt through the whole book.

Q. You will hunt then?—A. What year was the entry you speak of?

Q. I did not make the entry myself. Did you make the entry about the notes?—A. I did not.

Q. Who did?—A. I think that all the entries in these books were made by Martin P. Connolly.

Q. Is it to your knowledge that some entry was made about $25,000 notes, given in 1883, in connection with the cross-wall?—A. I cannot say that there was.

Q. Did you ever see any entry in the books about these notes?—A. I never examined the books. My time was fully occupied on the works directing the operation of the men and that sort of thing.

Q. Then you are not in a position to say when that entry was made, if made?—A. No, Sir, I am not.

Q. You cannot point out to us the books, or the book, in which such entry should have been made or has been made?—A. No: all I can do is to bring the books here and hunt up any item you tell me, which, of course, I am quite willing to do.

Q. Can you tell us if to your knowledge any entry of about $22,000 in notes in 1884 was entered in the books?—A. These books? These books are the books of the Quebec Harbour Improvements.

Q. Have you the books in connection with the graving dock at Lévis?—A. I have.

Q. And the supplementary contracts?—A. I have them here.

Q. Are you in a position to point out to me in what book that entry of about $22,000 notes was made?—A. I am not.

Q. Did you make the entry yourself?—A. No.

Q. You never saw such an entry?—A. I never examined the books nor audited them.

By Mr. Davies:

Q. Did you see it?—A. I may have seen it or I may not. As I said before, my time was fully occupied.

Q. Did you see the entry or did you not?—A. I won't swear that I did or did not.

By Mr. Tarte:

Q. Did you ever see any of the cheque books of the firm?—A. Yes: I have seen many cheque books.

Q. Have you some of those cheque books left with you?—A. There are none of them here. I telegraphed to Quebec yesterday afternoon, when you gave an order for the books, and I think all the cheque books, letter books and vouchers will be here to-day.

Q. Are you prepared to hand over to this Committee the vouchers that are coming up to-day?—A. I am prepared to hand over or explain anything to the Committee that I am able to explain, but to give up possession of the books, I must decline, as I said before.

Q. I do not speak of the books, but the vouchers, receipts, papers or notes that you may have in your possession?—A. I have no objection to the vouchers, but the letter books must remain in our possession. I am willing to read any letters in those books.

Q. Will you answer in a positive manner that you have no objection to handing over letter books, cheque books, notes and receipts that you may have in your possession in connection with the cross-wall, dredging in Quebec, and the graving dock at Esquimalt and Lévis?—A. I have answered that. I am willing to turn over any vouchers we have, but letter books and account books we must consider in our possession, of course allowing the Committee the privilege of hearing any entry that they may wish, or having any letter read.

Q. You have stated a minute ago that you have no knowledge that an entry for $25,000 notes was made in 1883?—A. No; I did not say that. They may be there or they may not.

Q. You said, to your knowledge there was no such entry?—A. I said nothing of the kind. I said they may be there. If you ask me to read any item, I will.

Q. Can you point out to me where that entry is?—A. I cannot. I will have to look it up.

By Mr. Daly:

Q. Will you kindly turn up the expense account of the Quebec Harbour Improvements in May, 1883?—A. I cannot find it.

The Committee then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, THURSDAY, 4th June, 1891.

The Committee met at 10.30 a.m., Mr. Girouard in the chair.

Investigation into certain circumstances and statements made in connection with the tenders and contracts respecting the Quebec Harbour Works, &c., resumed.

Mr. AMYOT.—What has become of the books, and are they in the possession of the Committee?

Mr. FERGUSON.—Yesterday the books were taken by the Messrs. Connolly into the other room and put in a box which they had there for that purpose and which they had brought from Quebec, and locked them up under lock and key, the key being in possession of Mr. Connolly, and they are there yet.

The CHAIRMAN.—Are the books now at the disposal of the Committee?

Mr. FERGUSON.—In the same way as yesterday. They will be produced here when called for as yesterday.

Mr. DAVIES.—Mr. Ferguson claims control and will not give them to the Committee.

Mr. FERGUSON.—Exactly.

Mr. EDGAR.—Are the books here for the Committee to examine?

Mr. FERGUSON.—No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK.—Are they open for examination by any member of the Committee on any item connected with this enquiry?

Mr. FERGUSON.—Yes.

MICHAEL CONNOLLY recalled.

By the Chairman:

Q. Will you bring those two cash books, please?—A. Yes, Sir: here are the two cash books.

By Mr. Choquette:

Q. Let me see the two cash books. Will you hand those books to me that I may look into them?—A. No, Sir; I must decline to let the books pass out of my possession.

By Mr. Monerieff:

Q. I would ask Mr. Connolly, whether you would have any objection to let any member of the Committee look at any page of the book while you stand by and have possession of the book?—A. Not the slightest.

Q. You are perfectly willing that I should go there and turn over every page of the book?—A. No: not every page. I wish them to specify what particular page they want.

Q. Of every account belonging to this investigation?—A. Yes: every account from start to finish.

Q. At the same time keeping control of your books?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Kirkpatrick:

Q. Why didn't you allow Mr. Choquette to look at your book?—A. Because he did not specify the account.

By Mr. Daly:

Q. I would like to know if Mr. Connolly has any specific reason for not wishing to produce the books in the manner required by Mr. Choquette?—A. I have, Sir. There are a great many unsettled claims in those books and a great many other matters not pertaining to this enquiry, that I do not want other people to prowl through.

Q. Can you give us the names of those people?—A. There are a great many contractors here that I do not want to have see our books.

Q. And there may be friends of the contractors on the Committee?—A. Just so.

By Mr. Amyot:

Q. Would you kindly state the names of some parties who have claims against Larkin, Connolly & Co. in 1883?—A. I must decline to state that.

Q. Do you give the same answer to 1884, 1885, 1886 and following years?—A. I must decline to give the name of any of our creditors.

Q. Would you give us an idea of the amount of claims there are?—A. They are not the subject of enquiry before this Committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the following question be put to the witness:—

Are you willing to place in the custody of the Committee of this House on Privileges and Elections, or in the custody of the Clerk of this House, for the purpose of reference to the said Committee, the several books of account which you produced when you appeared as a witness on the 3rd day of June instant before the said Committee, for the purpose of enabling the said Committee to pursue the investigation of the charges which were referred to the Committee by the order of this House on the 11th day of May last, and in relation to which you have been in part examined before the Committee?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DALY moved:

That Michael Connolly, now at the Bar of the House, be heard by Counsel.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the question must be put and answered, unless Counsel desires to be heard in opposition to the question being put.

Motion agreed to.

MR. FERGUSON, Q.C. (Counsel). I am instructed, on behalf of Mr. Michael Connolly, now at the Bar of the House, to read the following statement as his statement; showing the reasons why he declined to give up the custody and possession of the books which he was requested to do by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The statement is as follows:—

"In obedience to the subpœna served upon me requiring me to bring with me certain books and papers, as follows, that is to say: All the books, contracts, vouchers, letters, receipts and other documents in my possession, belonging to me, or to the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., in connection with—1st, the dredging of the harbour of Quebec since 1882; 2nd, the cross-wall and lock in connection with the same harbour; 3rd, the Langevin memorial fund; 4th, the graving dock of Levis; 5th, the graving dock at Esquimalt; 6th, the dredging of the wet basin in the Quebec harbour; and 7th, the south wall or retaining wall in the same harbour, I appeared before the Committee of this Honourable House on Privileges and Elections on the 3rd and 4th of June instant with the books and papers called for. The books of account of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. that I brought with me in obedience to the subpœna, consisted of ledgers, journals and cash books, which contained some accounts and entries relating to the contract and public works referred to in the matters under investigation by the Committee, but they also contained a large number of accounts and entries which had no relation to or bearing upon said matters under enquiry. That these other accounts and entries related, amongst other things, to unsettled claims of the late firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. against other parties, to the indebtedness of the firm to other parties, to their dealings with sub-contractors and employés, to the cost of doing the work, and the books also contained much valuable information of a practical character as to the carrying on of such works acquired only by years of practical experience, and many other matters of a private character. That these books are, and have for some time past been the property of the firm of M. & N. K. Connolly, composed of myself and N. K. Connolly, who were members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and who acquired the interests of the other partners in that firm, and its assets, accounts and books. That I was not, nor was my partner, N. K. Connolly, one of the accused in respect of the charges under investigation before the Committee. That after being served with said subpœna, I was advised by Counsel that I must take the books to the Committee in obedience to the subpœna and submit to examination upon them as to any accounts or entries in them relating to the matters in question before the Committee, that I must also open them for inspection of these accounts and entries before the Committee and for the examination of any witness who could give evidence in regard to them, but that I would not be obliged to hand over the custody or possession of them or to have them examined indiscriminately by the Committee or by any one else. I was informed by Counsel that only to the extent mentioned would a court of justice, under the circumstances, enforce the production and discovery of the contents of the books, and that this honourable House, guided as it would be by the principles and rules adopted in respect of such matters in the courts of justice, would equally respect the private rights and interests of a witness under such circumstances, and would not require that I should part with the custody or control of the books or oblige me to submit them to the Committee for a general inspection of their contents. That, acting upon his advice and in obedience to the subpœna, I brought the books before the Committee, and they were marked for identification by the clerk of the Committee, but I always retained custody of them. When asked by the members of the Committee to give up control of them and allow them to be generally inspected, I respectfully but firmly declined to do so on the grounds stated in the evidence and minutes of the proceedings of the Committee by myself and my Counsel, and which I have in this statement shortly put forward. That I, at the same time, submitted my willingness to attend with the books from time to time, whenever required, for the purpose of being examined upon them and having them inspected in regard to the accounts and entries relating to the matters in question, or so that they might be used on the examination of any other witnesses who could give evidence in regard to said accounts or entries, more especially Martin P. Connolly, the former book-keeper of the firm, who was in attendance on the Committee and ready to be examined. That it was further stated in my behalf to the sub-committee appointed to prepare a report on this matter, that I was willing to attend with the books before a sub-committee of three for inspection from time to time, whenever required by the sub-committee, in so far as they related to the charges under investigation, in my presence and that of my counsel, with liberty to Mr. Tarte and his counsel and an expert, first agreed upon by all parties, to examine those portions of the books which related to the charges before the Committee. If I were forced to give up the custody or control of the books and submit them for general inspection, I believe my partner and myself would be greatly prejudiced in our private interests by the accounts and entries above referred to, not in question herein, being exposed to inspection. In view of the above facts and of the statements made by my counsel and myself in this statement and before the Committee as to my reasons for not giving up the custody of the books, I most humbly and respectfully submit to this most honourable House that I have fully complied with the requirements of the subpœna served upon me, that I have produced and submitted said books for inspection and examination to the same extent and in the same manner as would be required of me in any court of justice under similar circumstances, and even to a further extent, and that I ought not to be required by this honourable House to give up the custody of them or to allow a general examination of them to be made by the Committee or any one else. I also most respectfully submit that I should be forthwith discharged from further attendance at the Bar of this honourable House."

I may add to this statement, Mr. Speaker, that if this Honourable House sees fit, notwithstanding the reasons the witness has assigned why he should not be called on to give up the custody of his books, to still order that he should give up the custody of his books to the Committee, he is prepared to bow with submission to the Order of this honourable House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That the witness, Michael Connolly, do now withdraw.

Mr. LAURIER. Subject to the Order of the House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Oh, yes. I presume that no other member of the House has any question to submit, and I propose to offer a resolution on the subject. I presume that the question has been answered by the paper which has just been read, and I propose to treat that as being the answer to the question propounded.

Motion agreed to, and witness withdrew.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, everything connected with this transaction has, I know, received the most careful attention of the large Committee that was ordered by the House to pursue the investigation; but it is necessary besides, now that it has assumed this important phase, that members of the House who are not members of the Committee should carefully consider the course which this House ought to pursue in regard to the transaction. Therefore, before offering a resolution to you, I propose to call the attention of the House briefly to the circumstances which now present themselves, and which seem to me to call for our action. The Committee having undertaken the duty, in accordance with the order of the House, to make this investigation, issued a summons to this witness to appear on a certain day and to bring with him certain books of account, in which it was believed there were entries relating to the transactions which formed the subject of the charges referred to the Committee. On page 219 of the Votes and Proceedings it will be seen what those books were. There were a set of books in relation to the Lévis graving dock, which included cash-books, ledgers and journals; a set of books relating to the Quebec harbour improvements; a set of books relating to the south wall, and a set of books relating to the Esquimalt graving dock. I am relieved from the necessity of showing the House that entries in these books may have been, and likely were, pertinent to the subject of the Committee's investigation, by the statement which has just been read to the House, in which it is stated :

"The books of account of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. that I brought with me, in obedience to the subpœna consisted of ledgers, journals and cash-books, which contained some accounts and entries relating to the contract and public works referred to in the matters under investigation by the Committee."

Therefore it is unnecessary for me to say to the House that these books are likely to contain entries bearing on the important enquiry the Committee is pursuing : the witness says they do contain those entries. The answer which the witness makes as his reason for not giving up the books, is briefly expressed in the passage following that which I have just read :—

"But they also contained a large number of accounts and entries which had no relation to or bearing upon said matters under enquiry."

This is the case with every set of account-books which a witness is ever called on to produce in any court of justice or in any kind of enquiry : and if the mere fact that the books called for contain entries not relating to the subject of enquiry, relieves the witness of any obligation to produce them or to submit them to an examination, then no witness would ever be obliged to submit books of accounts or to be examined with regard to them. The position, however, which the witness occupied when he came with these books of accounts, and when these books of accounts were identified, was the position in which a witness is placed in a court of justice, producing them under a subpœna duces tecum. So far, I fully concur in the answer he has made, and to which his counsel has added supplementary remarks; but the position which he assumed, after producing the books and they were identified, was by no means, in my humble opinion, that which any witness would be allowed to assume in a court of justice. The position he took was this (I, of course, paraphrase his words): He said: "I am totally unacquainted with these books: I never made an entry in them, and have never examined them. I am willing to hold them in my hands and turn up any entry which the members of the Committee may specify." The House will see at once that no member of the Committee had had any access to these books or knew a single line in them; and the witness, who did not know what was in the books, because he had not examined them or made any entries in them, was to keep possession of them and turn up any entry he might be called on to refer to by persons who had never seen anything but the cover of the books. Of course that was quite equivalent to his refusing to produce the books at all. To show the House the analogy between the position the witness really occupied, although he was not conscious that he occupied it, if I may judge by his subsequent conduct, with that of a witness producing the books under a subpœna duces tecum, I may mention what actually transpired in the Committee after the refusal of the witness had been persisted in for some time. He was asked by a member of the Committee to turn up a certain page of a certain cash book and indicate a certain entry relating to a certain money transaction of which another witness had spoken. He said: "There is no entry there of any such sum of money." A member of the Committee said: "Hand your book to me that I may see for myself." That would be the right of any counsel in a court of justice. It might be that upon counsel seeing that page, he would find that the witness was not telling the truth, or he might find on the following page the very entry he was looking for, or he might find part of the entry under one date and part subsequently; but if the witness is to hold the books and allow no one to see them, he is complete master of the situation and may make any answer he chooses without fear of detection. Therefore I thought it was perfectly clear he was bound to pursue a different course. I thought he was bound to act as a witness in a court of justice, and that the members of the Committee were entitled to examine him as to the books, precisely as a counsel or a judge would examine him in a court of justice. I see he has taken the ground, in his answer, that he has complied with the law as fully as a witness would have been required to do in a court of justice. I think he has not complied with the law at all, and if these books are relevant to the enquiry, they are sealed books to us unless they can be investigated, as they would be in a court of justice. I hope the House will do the Committee the justice of believing in advance that the objectionable kind of examination to which the witness takes exception—examination into matters not necessarily involved in this inquiry—will not be gone into by the Committee. If the witness were brought before a court of justice and produced these books, the first duty of the court would be to see that no irrelevant impertinent enquiry into the books would be allowed; but the witness must not be allowed to decide that question for himself, because, in that case, he could close and seal from the eye of the tribunal any passages he did not wish to expose. The judge would take ample precaution against an impertinent scrutiny into transactions that did not relate to the subject of the enquiry, and I have no doubt whatever the Committee will also take means to avoid any such scrutiny. I admit that an enquiry of this kind, by means of a committee composed of upwards of forty persons, sitting in the capacity of judges, is a very awkward proceeding, indeed, and a very inconvenient one sometimes, when we have to decide nice questions of this kind; but it is by no means beyond the power of the Committee to arrive at a method of testing what part of the books ought to remain closed. It may be that the witness is right in supposing that the best way to do that is to have a small sub-committee to decide whether the passages of the books he does not wish to turn up are relevant or not to the enquiry; and it is true he made to the Committee an offer that if we should appoint a committee of three he would supply those books for our examination. It was impossible that we should make any bargain or contract with the witness. We felt the Committee were entitled to dispose of the matter when he had put the books in their custody and were confident they would dispose of it fairly. I, therefore, beg to move a resolution, which is virtually an order of the House for the production of these books to the clerk of the House, in order that they may be referred to the Committee. In view of the statement made by the counsel for the witness, that, notwithstanding the protest he has made, the books would be produced if the House so ordered, I think we will wait until we see whether the statement of the counsel was made in good faith, before ordering the prisoner into custody of the Serjeant-at-arms. I, therefore, beg to move:

That Michael Connolly having been summoned by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the statements made to this House on the 11th of May last by J. Israel Tarte, Esq., the member representing the Electoral District of Montmorency in this House, with power to send for persons and papers, and having thereupon appeared before said Committee, with certain books of account which have been identified and marked by the Clerk of the said Committee, as indicated in the Report of the Committee to this House, and having refused to place the said books of account under the control of the Committee or to permit the Committee to examine them for the purpose of conducting the investigation which the Committee were ordered to conduct by the Order of the House on the 11th May last:

This House doth now Order that the said books of account be now produced by the said Michael Connolly and delivered to the Clerk of this House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—TREATY PAPERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before you go into Supply, I would like to enquire of the Minister of Justice whether he has yet obtained the additional documents affecting the correspondence with Washington which were to have been produced in a day or two when we last separated?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Assent was given to the production of a further set of documents, and I will be able, I hope, to make a full statement on the subject to the House to-morrow, indicating what the documents are which can be produced and the day on which they can be laid on the Table.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. . . $90,511.50

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister of Justice whether it is at this penitentiary or at Dorchester that the manufacture of wooden-ware is carried on?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At Dorchester.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that the total sums received from the farm of this penitentiary is nominally $254. At what does the Minister of Justice estimate the total value of that farm? I think it covers about 200 acres, and I should think a considerable amount of produce of one kind and another ought to be received from it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot answer the question at the moment, but I will answer it before the Committee rises.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Minister would state what he is doing with these convicts. I see there are about 345 estimated for. What employment have you found for them in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary; and, for that matter, I would be glad to know what conclusion the Minister has come to in regard to the troublesome question of the employment of convicts generally?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am in very much the same position in regard to that subject as I was last year, as a very large amount of work is being done in the way of construction, and in Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul gangs of men are employed in getting material, stone and other kinds of material, for carrying on the works which which have been in progress for two or three years past. The capacity of the prison, without the completion of the wing which has been under construction for two or three years, is about exhausted, and the greater part of the new construction is being done by the convicts. We have also a large number working upon the farm, but the farming and work of construction, occupying in the case of Kingston, I think, some 80 men, in addition to the ordinary duties of the penitentiary, are the only resources we have in regard to the employment of labour. In Dorchester, which was indicated by the question put a few minutes ago by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), we have some machinery at which men are employed in making what is called woodlen-ware—that is, buckets, tubs, pails, as well as brooms. A good deal of work in the way of construction has also been carried on at Dorchester on account of the building being new. We are not making any new work there, but the completion of the building has given us tolerably good employment for many hands. I may say that the question will come up almost immediately, if these works of construction are not carried on, as to what employment we shall give the convicts, and I have no hesitation in saying that, when we cannot get remunerative employment for them on the farm, in works of construction, and in the ordinary work of carrying on the routine of the prison, it will be necessary for us to have some kind of manufacturing industries, which, as I know, are considered objectionable, but which, nevertheless, we shall be compelled to resort to in order to find satisfactory employment for the convicts. In times past, we have been able to give them a good deal of employment in making clothing for public purposes, such as the North-West Mounted Police, and it is possible that the manufacture of clothing for bodies like that and for the penitentiaries themselves will continue to give employment to many. The labour question so far has not been very serious, but it is likely to be very much more so very soon, and probably within another year. Speaking of the work of construction and the necessity of continuing it for some little time yet, I am inclined to think that in Kingston, when we have concluded the work there, we shall have to undertake the erection of an asylum for insane criminals. Under the present system, insane criminals are sent to Kingston from all parts of the Dominion, and there we have not sufficient accommodation to give them the requisite exercise. The building is very commodious as far as the interior accommodation is concerned, but the provision for outdoor exercise is very limited. I think it will be necessary for me to ask Parliament before very long for an appropriation for an asylum for insane criminals, and that will give ample work for the employment for the surplus labour at Kingston, which, as hon. gentlemen know, is the largest pententiary we have.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the number of insane criminals?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. About thirty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know if it would be constitutional, but would it not be almost as easy, and perhaps better, to make an arrangement with the Local Government to have a large asylum there with a sufficient number of guards to take charge of the insane criminals instead of establishing a branch asylum for yourselves? I know there may be objections to that, but I think that, if the hon. gentleman starts a branch lunatic asylum of that kind, he will find that the cost will be enormous in proportion to the number of unfortunate lunatics who will have to be kept in confinement there.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It might be more economical to adopt that course, but I do not think it would comply with the plan upon which we send our criminal lunatics to the asylum. The cases are supposed to be studied under the care of alienists, who are skilled in the treatment of insane criminals, and I think it is desirable that that plan should be carried out as far as possible. No doubt if we were governed by motives of economy, it would be better to make arrangements with the provincial lunatic asylums, and change the law so that it could be done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not solely for reasons of economy that I made that suggestion, but because that unfortunate class, in many respects, are likely to be better treated, I am inclined to think, by men who have made the treatment of lunatics their special care for many years. The Minister is aware that if he is going to obtain the same skill as can be obtained in the larger asylums, it will be difficult, or very expensive, to say the least. However, if he is prepared to go to the cost required, and if the objections, which I admit may exist, to mingle the two authorities together, appear too strong, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I notice the receipts from the farms connected with these penitentiaries range from $123 to $250. I suppose this does not include the whole value of the products of the farm, but only the cash receipts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will refer to page 70 of my report for the year ended 30th June last, he will see a statement of the proceeds of the farm at St. Vincent de Paul, and on the credit side of the account the value is put at $6,180.21. Under the item "customers," is put down $162.10. That is all that comes into the returns here. Page 20 contains the Kingston account, and the farm is declared to have yielded $6,669.50.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there has been a large amount granted in the way of gratuities, over $7,300, on page B—110 of the Auditor General's Account. The Minister will notice there are no less than nine gratuities granted, making altogether $7,317. Why are those gratuities granted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The circumstances under which they were granted were these: About a year ago there was reason to believe that a very extensive revolt had been planned at Kingston. Information reached the warden from several quarters that an extensive rising was to take place on a certain day, and means were taken effectually to prevent that rising. This circumstance led to a very thorough examination of the means of preventing anything of that kind, and it was found by the department that, partly from motives of economy, and partly from humane considerations as regards the officers themselves, quite a number of officers, some eight or nine, had passed the age when persons were allowed to remain on the staff by the regulations. An order was given immediately that the regulations should be complied with, and the officers retired on gratuity, and although the amount was a large one, we thought that it was absolutely necessary to incur it in order that we might feel that we had a staff of men fully able, not only to do the routine duties, but to meet any great emergency that might arise as in the case of a revolt, which would involve a risk of life as well as of property, and we decided that the staff of guards should be composed of able-bodied men.

Mr. McMULLEN. While the statement made by the Minister may be a very reasonable one from his standpoint, my opinion is that it is not wise to establish those precedents, because we are aware that when a precedent is established in the administration of one penitentiary, the officers in other penitentiaries will expect to be as liberally dealt with. This appears to me to be a very large amount. No doubt the Minister has thought proper to make the changes in order to secure more complete safety. At the same time, I think that when we pay officials a good round sum as salaries from year to year, the country has a perfect right to expect from them a full and efficient discharge of their duty; and when their retirement becomes a necessity in order to put more efficient men in their places, I do not think it is quite right, or in the interests of the country, that we should encourage demands of this kind, or make a precedent that may be possibly followed out by other Governments afterwards. It may be made the ground-work of granting gratuities to a very large extent. I was struck with the amount when I noticed it in the item on this page, and I thought it my duty to enquire into the reasons thereof.

Dorchester Penitentiary..... .....$43,454

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to call the attention of the department to a matter that I referred to on a former occasion. It is with regard to woollen-ware that I wish specially to speak, although I believe that convict labour there is also employed in the manufacture of other articles of general merchandise. Some few years ago the manufacturers of woollen-ware made representations to the Government with regard to the subject, and, as a result of those representations, the Government, instead of selling the output in the ordinary markets, endeavoured to meet the objection by distributing it among the manufacturers. I am free to admit the embarrassments of the question, and the manifest desire of the Minister of Justice on that occasion to endeavour to give satisfaction to the manufacturers. However, I happen to represent, probably, the largest manufactory of woollen-ware in Canada, and I have received a communication from them upon the subject, wherein they express their entire dissatisfaction with the present system, and they have requested me to raise my voice against it. Although the Government have endeavoured, as I mentioned, to consider to some extent the interests of those manufacturers, nevertheless my constituents inform me that the output of convict labour, even if it is sold at wholesale prices to the manufacturers, does, pro tanto, interfere with the employment of free labour. As this convict labour is so employed, even if the output is sold to wholesale men, nevertheless to that extent it displaces free labour, and the interest I refer to feels that very seriously. In the communication that I received upon the subject, and which I need not refer to more particularly, my correspondents state that not only they, but other manufacturers who joined with them in the memorial, have come to the same conclusion, and I desire now to know from the Minister of Justice whether he has considered the question so as to be able to give a satisfactory answer to the petition which I offered, namely, that there should be a discontinuance of the employment of convict labour in the manufacture of woollen-ware.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not able to give what the hon. gentleman considers a satisfactory answer to that question. The facts are, that the present machinery was employed in the two penitentiaries which were amalgamated when Dorchester penitentiary was formed. In St. John and Halifax the same work was carried on, and to as great an extent as at present. I have not, therefore, increased the output of woollen-ware since the penitentiary was opened. But manufactories have grown up since, in different parts of the country, notwithstanding the penitentiary at Dorchester was putting out this quantity of woollen-ware. The manufacturers thought the wants of the country or the profits of the enterprise would reward them for establishing manufactories of their own and competing with us, and having to some extent failed in achieving success in that regard, they desire us to be put down. We have the advantage of age, and the occupancy of a fixed portion of the market. In various parts of the country they objected to the prices at which we are accustomed to place our products on the market: but, on the matter being inquired into, I was able to convince them that we adhered to the ordinary trade prices, and were not, therefore, in any way taking advantage of the fact that we obtained our labour for nothing. On turning to page 87 of my report it will be seen that our output is only of the value of $2,250. This was at the time of the preparation of the last annual report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice the amount is put down at $4,196.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That was by the collection of some arrears. When we made the arrangement to which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) referred, we closed up the accounts with our agents in the Lower Provinces and collected the balances. In the warden's report he intimates that the value of the labour, exclusive of material, used in Dorchester penitentiary was on wooden-ware $2,250, and all the items were given. I made an arrangement, in order to prevent local inconvenience from these goods being placed on any particular market and thus destroying in any way the results of local enterprise, with persons selected by all the manufacturers of wooden-ware, of whom there are only five or six in the country. The arrangement I made was to place our whole output in the hands of Mr. Eddy, of Hull, who would distribute the articles, and thus meet the great objection the manufacturers had in view, namely, that of our goods being put on the market at fair trade prices, without taking advantage of our convict system to undersell the trade. That was sufficient for the time: I think it should be sufficient altogether, inasmuch as it removes the true grievance. But I am afraid the grievance now really is that we are engaged in manufacturing at all; and that is answered by the fact that we were engaged in doing so before these manufacturers commenced operations, and I suppose if any of their goods are unmarketable that is not attributable to us.

Mr. MULOCK. I am unable to accept the last reason assigned for the continuance of the industry. I think wherever convict labour comes into contact or competition with free labour, I do not care whether convict labour was in the field first or not, it should give way. The convict system may press heavily on the general public; but it would be a great inconvenience to place the maintenance of convicts on a special industry. It is an extraordinary proposition to advance, that because it happens that convict labour was, as is alleged, first in the field, therefore it should have the right to occupy the field. If that is a valid reason, why did the Minister yield, when he adopted a year ago the system of selling the penitentiary output to an agent of the manufacturers? The hon. gentleman certainly felt there was a good argument against the competition. Yet, if because the prison industry was first in the field, it has the right to exist fully and freely, the hon. gentleman conceded something he should not have conceded. So there appears to be nothing in this argument advanced by the Minister, and I think he will not seriously press it. The real defence of the system, and it is one in which I sympathize with him, is the difficulty of finding other employment. That is probably the reason of the maintenance of the system, and for the reasons I have already mentioned, I request in the name of my constituents, the discontinuance of this system: and, unless there is some assurance given to that effect, I may deem it necessary to bring the matter before the House before the close of the session in some more formal way.

Mr. SPROULE. Almost every year we have a discussion on this item in connection with convict labour. It appears to me very strange that it should be used as an argument against convict labour, because every hon. member will admit that it is utterly impossible for a convict to be engaged in labour of any kind without his labour being brought into competition with the other labour of the country. Even if he be employed in raising grain to feed fellow-convicts, he becomes a competitor of the farmer: and yet the farmer does not complain. If he is employed in any other line, his product comes into competition with that of free labour: but when the article is sold at market value, no one has reason to complain. It should be our object as far as possible to obtain as much as may be fairly obtained from these men who are undergoing punishment, without doing injustice to any class: and no injustice is done when the prison product is sold at the regular market price.

Mr. DEVLIN. Suppose a great many people were thrown out of employment by the fact that furniture was made in the penitentiary cheaper than in the ordinary factory, would not great injury result?

Mr. SPROULE. It was not sold cheaper.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Eddy is acting as the Government agent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He purchases wholesale.

Mr. DEVLIN. Probably he is allowed to buy the goods cheaper than he could make them. In fact he does buy the goods from the Government, and sells them at a lower figure than he otherwise could do.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We charge him the ordinary trade price, except that if he buys our whole output we give him a slight advantage, such as we would give to any wholesale dealer. I do not think he will continue much longer to be our agent: he complains loudly that we charge him too much.

Mr. DEVLIN. I trust he will soon discontinue to act as the Government agent, because he will then be obliged to manufacture, and consequently employment will be given to a great many people who are now out of employment and compelled to walk the streets.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The great objection seems to lie in the fact that most of our penitentiaries are allowed to produce goods, and that these are sold out of the penitentiary. There is a question behind that one, and it is: Is it right and proper that these men should be kept at work, and thus earn something to pay for their keep? I think so. They have made themselves a burden on society by their crimes, and society has the right to compel them to do something for their support, to decide that they shall not be supported in idleness, and that hardworking people shall not be called upon to contribute all that is necessary for their maintenance, but that these convicts shall to a certain extent be compelled to contribute to their support. If hon. members assent to that proposition, I submit that no occupation can be named to which the same objection cannot be raised as has been raised on the present item. If it is decided to make them work at all, they must be compelled to work at whatever is most convenient and advantageous. If that is the correct view to take, it is the duty of the Government not to give way to these complaints. If you admit it to be a valid objection that their work is going to come into competition with the work of people outside, you must stop convict work altogether. That is not the right view, and I hope the Government will be firm in their position, and set the convicts to work at whatever employment is most convenient and can best be done by them, irrespective altogether of complaints from outside.

Manitoba Penitentiary..... ..$53,863.60

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe there has been a change made in the wardenship of this penitentiary. Will the Minister please state the reason he made the change, and who has been appointed in the place of the late warden?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Towards the close of last year the warden of Stony Mountain penitentiary was taken very ill: his life was despaired of, and although temporarily recovered, he is by no means fit for duty. During the spring, when it was quite apparent that he was no longer able to fill his office, he was superannuated, and the prison has been put in charge, for the present, of the Accountant of the Penitentiary Branch of the Department of Justice. Mr. Foster had a thorough knowledge of the penitentiary accounts: he is aware of the complaints which had been from time to time made as to the management of fiscal affairs at the penitentiary, and I thought it very advantageous that before making any permanent appointment to the wardenship, I should give the affairs of that institution thorough investigation at Mr. Foster's hands, and that matters there should be put on an entirely new basis before the new regime is entered upon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did the retiring allowance which the hon. gentleman gave to the late warden, include any number of extra years' service?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The allowance, which is about $1,200, is based on the years of actual service only, and does not include any extra computation of years.

Mr. WATSON. Is it the intention to retain Mr. Foster as warden of the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At present he is only temporarily appointed, and I have not yet formed any opinion as to whether or not any other applicant ought to be appointed. I consider that Mr. Foster's acquaintance with the affairs of the penitentiary made it advisable that he should go there for a time.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister to a few items in connection with this penitentiary. At page B—113 of the Auditor General's Report, I notice there is a marked difference in the price of coal oil used, some being at 22½ cents and some at 30 cents per gallon. At page B—114 of the Auditor General's Report, I notice an item of $147 for travelling expenses of S. L. Bedson: $103.77 for lunch for the Governor General and party, and $194.21 for a lunch for the Queen's Printer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Queen's Printer did not get a lunch. That is an amount paid to the Queen's Printer for printing in connection with the penitentiary.

Mr. McMULLEN. I beg your pardon: it looked as if it were charged for a lunch.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With reference to the other item, the expenditure was authorized by me under these circumstances: The party referred to, comprising a considerable number of persons, during their travel in Manitoba and the North-West, visited the prison, and, as it is a long distance from any place of entertainment, I authorized the warden to give them a meal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt the Finance Minister took care that it was carried out on temperance principles.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly. You will observe there is nothing in the account there for anything else. The warden of the penitentiary had permission to go to Europe on leave for three months. He was not, of course, paid his travelling expenses to Europe, but I agreed that while he was in Europe I would pay his travelling expenses in visiting any prison in which I thought any information was to be had in the line of his duties. I presume that if there is a difference in the price of coal oil, there is also a difference in the quality, and perhaps the better quality is supplied to the officers' quarters. We have had two or three contracts for supplying coal oil to that penitentiary, and we have had considerable difficulty about it. In the first place the oil was supplied from Winnipeg, but it was very bad and not according to sample, and we refused to take it and called for tenders from the oil districts in Ontario. I believe the cost of the oil is increased on account of the expense of transport to the penitentiary.

Mr. WATSON. Do you require all the coal oil used should be manufactured in Canada?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As a matter of fact I believe it is Canadian oil, but there is no requirement, and the contract was let in the oil districts of Ontario.

Mr. WATSON. If we want good coal oil in Manitoba we have to get American oil, and it costs 5 cents a gallon more.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad to hear the statement made by the hon. Minister of Justice. I think it was full time that some change should be made with regard to the expenses of this institution. It has been the duty of members of this House during several sessions to refer to the extra expenses under Mr. Bedson's management. I think the Minister of Justice has done well in putting a man in charge, to ascertain as to how the expenses of the Stony Mountain penitentiary could be cut down, for I think some investigation into the management of that penitentiary was badly needed and did not come too soon. I presume that the oil is American oil supplied by a Canadian manufacturer, as the amount charged is about the price of Canadian oil.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to Mr. Bedson, I believe in some respects he was a good officer, and I rather think he did very fair service during the troubles in the North-West, but I would desire to know, in connection with this gentleman, whether the Minister of Justice obtained from him any satisfactory explanation with reference to his connection with certain matters brought before a committee of this House last session, as regards certain furs that were alleged before that committee to have got into his possession? I think, in parting with that gentleman, the Minister, who is fully cognizant of these facts, probably required some explanation and should have got some. I should like to know what that explanation was: whether Mr. Bedson was one of the parties who assisted in impounding the Bremner furs, or whether he cleared himself from all connection with that matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have nothing more than the statement of Mr. Bedson, that he received none of the Bremner furs whatever. He made that statement over and over again, and he has declared that in no way did he participate in that transaction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it is a matter of astonishment that this officer was kept in that position so long. I believe that if there was a dishonest officer in the service of the Government and the country, Mr. Bedson was that officer. I know that immediately before the retirement of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, it was brought to the notice of the Government that this same officer had called upon certain parties in Manitoba and offered to give them contracts if they would pay him a commission of 10 per cent. upon them. Upon our going out of office I brought this statement to the attention of our successors, and it has always been a matter of astonishment to me that he should have been retained in his position so long afterwards.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I know that the hon. member for Bothwell makes these remarks in sincerity, but I am sorry he has thought it necessary to repeat them now, after Mr. Bedson has retired from the service and is in a position to excite sympathy rather than censure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I believe them to be true.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I know the hon. member believes them, or he would not have made them. He speaks very strongly, notwithstanding that he does not usually speak so strongly of public officers. What the reason is, I have not been able to surmise, beyond the fact that Mr. Bedson's management of the financial affairs of the Manitoba penitentiary has not been successful; I have admitted that myself. I believe that in some respects he was a most exemplary officer. As regards discipline, and training his men to respect him, he had no equal in the service; and he has done good and efficient service to the country in other capacities as well. I have never had any reason to doubt his personal integrity, though I have not considered him a financial success. With regard to the letting of contracts and getting a commission on them, I may say that he had no letting of contracts at all. Ever since I have been in the department, the tenders have come to the department, and in every instance my hand has awarded the contract. I have heard it commonly stated, with regard to public officers, by disappointed tenderers or contractors, that they were offered the contract if they would share in the profits or give a commission; but the charge is generally ill-founded.

Mr. DALY. Coming from the Province of Manitoba, and being a personal friend of Colonel Bedson, I cannot allow the imputations cast upon him by the hon. member for Bothwell to pass without saying a few words. I think the attack made upon Colonel Bedson by the hon. gentleman is cowardly in the extreme. The hon. gentleman knows, from the statements made by the hon. Minister of Justice, that Colonel Bedson has retired from the superintendency of the penitentiary. I know the reason why the hon. member for Bothwell has such a feeling against him. It is a matter of long standing, and it seems to have rankled in his breast for years. He will remember going to the penitentiary years ago and being refused luncheon by Colonel Bedson.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not true. I was not at the penitentiary 20 minutes, and never asked for or looked for luncheon. The statement is untrue.

Mr. DALY. I say the statement is true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DALY. And when the hon. gentleman rises in this House and makes this imputation against a public officer whose conduct for integrity has been marked by the hon. Minister of Justice and by every other person who knows him, I can say myself, and other representatives from Manitoba will corroborate the statement, that there has not been a more honest officer in the service of the country than Colonel Bedson. I regret very much that owing to his illness, and the unfortunate condition in which it has left him, he is not able to continue to fill the office of superintendent of the penitentiary, and I am satisfied that the Government is losing one of the most efficient officers they have ever had in charge of any of our public institutions.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must resent some of the remarks the hon. gentleman has made. It has been the duty of this Committee for the last eight years to closely scrutinize and criticize the expenses of this penitentiary, and I think every man who has examined carefully the items of those expenses has come to the conclusion that Mr. Bedson has been playing a grab game in connection with that penitentiary for many years. The items prove it; his actions prove it; and the statement the hon. gentleman has made is not in accordance with the past experience of this House. The hon. gentleman may possibly have found Mr. Bedson a very genial, kind man in his way to him and those who associated with him there; but it is our duty as servants of the public to criticize the acts when they come before us. We have been compelled on all occasions to make a most searching investigation of the expenses in connection with this penitentiary, and I must say that they show that Mr. Bedson has been a reckless officer, regardless of his own name or the credit of the institution.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). As the member for the district in which the penitentiary is situated, I think it my duty to say a few words regarding Mr. Bedson's career. I know intimately nearly every one who has tendered for contracts in connection with that penitentiary for many years past, and I have never heard any one of them charge Mr. Bedson with fraud, or impugn his actions in any way. With regard to his conduct of the penitentiary, everyone in the city of Winnipeg and throughout Manitoba has expressed but one opinion, that is, that he is one of the best disciplinarians we had in the country. In fact, I believe that in this respect he has no superior in Canada. One reason why the expenses of the penitentiary have appeared great has been owing to the fact that prices in Manitoba have been higher than they are in the eastern provinces, and in some cases higher than they are in British Columbia. In my county I have come in contact with some who have made charges against Mr. Bedson, who have told me that they believed things were rotten in the penitentiary. As far as I could, I endeavoured, as the member representing the district, to find out what basis these persons had for the charges they made, and they have utterly failed in every case to give any evidence for them. The only thing that could be pointed out was the amount of money paid for supplies. But with regard to Mr. Bedson playing a grab game or being guilty of personal misconduct, no one in that country believes it. Those who know Mr. Bedson best know him to have been incapable of anything of that kind, and I know that he retires from the service to-day a poorer man than any man in this House, and that is saying a great deal.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Whether Mr. Bedson is a wealthy man or a poor man I do not know; nor is it a matter of any consequence to this enquiry. It is no evidence of a man's honesty that he has become bankrupt. Whether Mr. Bedson is so or not I do not know; but I do know that the statements made to me were made by parties who said that corrupt offers had been made to them. One of those parties was Mr. McTavish, and the hon. gentleman knows him and what his standing was. Another is a member of this House at present and stands as well as any gentleman on that side, and another was a prominent member of the bar in the city of Winnipeg. Whether he is there yet or not I cannot say, but I believe he is. I have no doubt whatever of the accuracy of those statements, and the statements I make now I made twelve years ago to those who succeeded me in office; and I made them because I believed they were strictly true. The cost of the management of that institution from that day until Mr. Bedson's retirement has convinced me he was not an honest public officer.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). As one of the members from Manitoba, I feel it my duty to say that I am certain no one coming from that province has any doubt about Mr. Bedson's honesty. I have been more than surprised to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I have no doubt the hon. gentleman believes them to be true, but I have very grave doubts as to their being founded on fact. I am very certain that if they were investigated, it would be found that although Mr. Bedson may have been extravagant in the management of the penitentiary, he has done nothing which reflects in anyway on his character as an honest man. I can easily understand the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) being astonished at the prices charged for some of the articles; but I believe that if the hon. gentleman had lived in Manitoba for some years, he would find the figures much more reasonable than he now considers them. Ever since I went to Manitoba, some nine years ago, I have known Mr. Bedson very intimately, and have always found him strictly honest and straightforward. I have never heard anyone who knew him speak of him as anything but a straightforward and honourable man; and I believe, if the hon. gentlemen who are attacking him to-day knew him better, they would admit that although he may have managed the penitentiary extravagantly—and I have not followed the figures closely enough to speak positively on that point—his integrity is undoubted.

Mr. WATSON. I am not at all surprised to hear the hon. gentleman eulogize Mr. Bedson, because Mr. Bedson is a good fellow who receives his friends well, but it has been a crying shame that the cost of the penitentiary is nearly double that of any other penitentiary in the Dominion. Last year it was pointed out that in the Manitoba penitentiary it cost almost as much to board the inmates as it would in a first-class hotel. Some articles of necessity cost but little more in Manitoba than in other portions of the Dominion, and others are cheaper. For instance: beef, potatoes and flour are articles which we export to the eastern provinces. While we have nothing to say against Mr. Bedson as being hail-fellow-well-met and a man who treats his friends well when he meets them, still he has been an extravagant officer. That was admitted by the Minister of Justice last year, who, I believe, instituted an investigation into the irregularities connected with the penitentiary; and if the result of that investigation were laid before the House, perhaps the hon. gentlemen who speak so well of Mr. Bedson would change their opinion as to his business management, and possibly as to his honesty.

Mr. MULOCK. I see an item for binding twine, showing a cost of 19 cents per pound. Is that a fair market price, and is there a contract for it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have no contract for binding twine, and the item is so small it is hardly worth while to call for tenders. I have no knowledge of the value of binding twine.

Mr. MULOCK. I assume the Government has paid the same price that an ordinary farmer would, and 19 cents per pound strikes me as rather high. I call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this in connection with a motion of mine which he has been inducing me to allow to stand over from time to time, and I trust, in view of the experience he learns from this document, he will see fit to make it unnecessary for me to press that motion, when he makes his Budget speech.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How much land is there in connection with the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Very little; there is really no farm there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is there any stock kept there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, some stock.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the stock brought in by express? I see an item here showing two pigs cost $32, and the express $19.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is undoubtedly so stated in the report, but I am sure that is not expressage on the pigs.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. Minister said there was not much land under cultivation, but I see 313 lbs. of twine were required, or sufficient to bind 150 acres of crops.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That was used to bind the convicts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All the ordinary supplies are obtained by contract.

British Columbia Penitentiary. $45,982.72

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of the first note respecting the deputy warden's salary, that this is to be granted to him notwithstanding anything in the Act to the contrary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object is to put the deputy warden at his maximum, notwithstanding that he would not yet have arrived at it under the Penitentiary Act. I think that is the object, but, if not, it is to give him the $50 increase. He is an exceptionally good officer and an old officer trained in Kingston. He is chief keeper, deputy warden and farmer, and is altogether a superior man.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this simply giving him a statutory increase?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; I am inclined to think it is giving him more than that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How may convicts are there in this penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think about 60.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How many pounds of tobacco does each one get a year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not many.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Because I see here that 458 lbs. of tobacco are charged for at 45 cents a lb.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I see that the number of convicts in that penitentiary on the 30th June, 1890, was 76.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And they all smoke?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly the Minister of Inland Revenue might explain how this is, because 458 lbs. of tobacco for 76 convicts is rather a handsome allowance.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no experience in regard to that, and I do not know that the Minister of Inland Revenue has any experience either.

Mr. McMULLEN. I also see that 30 lbs. of snuff are charged for in Kingston penitentiary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Looking back, my hon. friend will see that others were more liberally dealt with, for in Manitoba they received 683 lbs. of tobacco at 65 cents a lb. It strikes me that they deal liberally with the convicts in the article of tobacco.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I find that in Manitoba 418 lbs were obtained and 265 lbs. used.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But 418 lbs. were purchased.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No doubt some is kept in stock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does not the Minister think it is unnecessary to buy an amount of tobacco sufficient for two years?

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to ask something in regard to the furnishing of the British Columbia penitentiary. I find here tapestry carpet, 514 yards, $411.20; Brussels carpet, 290¾ yards at $1.05, $305.29; Brussels carpet, 229¼ yards at 90 cents, $206.33, or over 1,000 yards of carpets. Surely they did not carpet the whole place!

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A house was provided for the warden last year for the first time. It was considered absolutely necessary to do that or to build a wing in addition to the present building, as we had no place for a hospital, and by providing a house for the warden we were able to give the deputy warden the warden's apartments, and to use the deputy warden's quarters for a hospital. In accordance with the practice we have supplied the regular furnishings, such as window blinds and carpets.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he considers it proper to use tobacco in the penitentiaries?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I do. A year or two ago I brought down a file of papers on that subject. Tobacco is given to sick men who are accustomed to the smoking habit, and it is also given as a slight reward to those who have been accustomed to use it, and have deserved the reward by extra labour, or by exposure, or by anything that requires recognition, and we have found it a very useful ration, and we have also found that the deprivation of it is a great hardship to those who have been accustomed to use it. It is not served out as a ration in the ordinary way, but is given for extra good conduct or hard work or exposure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to be a pretty regular ration, judging from the amount consumed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In British Columbia the Indians are very often in hospital, and they are so accustomed to the use of tobacco that it has to be given to them regularly.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I should like to know if the Minister of Finance is of the same opinion as the Minister of Justice on this subject?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not considered it.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before disposing of this item on the British Columbia penitentiary, which we reached before six o'clock, I want to draw again the Minister's attention to a point with regard to the new residence for the superintendent of the penitentiary of British Columbia. He said they had built a new house for him. Now, I have looked into the matter, and if the Minister of Justice will carefully calculate the amount that is charged for carpeting, he will see that it must have been an enormously large house, if all this carpet was put in there, or else there must have been some carpeting used in the penitentiary in fitting up some of the rooms. It surely cannot all have been charged to the new residence, because there is carpet enough charged to cover 900 yards square. That will supply five houses 24 by 36, two stories high, with ten rooms each, and cover the stairs to boot. He will find that it will cover 30 rooms 15 by 18. Now, it surely cannot be possible that all that carpeting has gone into the new house. I simply wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to it. I do not, for a moment, mean to insinuate that he is cognizant of any wrong being done, but I simply call this fact to his attention. It has cost altogether, for carpets alone for that new residence, if it all went in there, including cocoa-matting, $1,418.74, and it would cover the space I have mentioned. This appears to be an enormous amount to go into a residence of that kind. There are other little items to which I wish to draw attention. There is a coffee mill, $12; there are half a dozen coffee pots, costing $27; 12 razors, $1.50 each, $18; 18 rat and mouss traps, $12. There are many other items which I consider very exorbitant. Now, I think it is due to the Committee, when items of this kind come before us, to discuss them and criticize them. We have a duty to perform, and we desire to perform it. Our sole desire is to see that the country's interests and rights are protected. We have no desire to keep the Committee beyond the time that we can extract from the Government intelligent explanations of the items to which we call attention. This is the duty of every Opposition, and we do not propose to shrink from it, however small the item may appear to some hon. members. I say it is absurd to ask us to consent to the passage of this item of 1,100 yards of carpeting to put into the residence of the manager or superintendent of the British Columbia penitentiary. We have a right to some explanations. The Minister has said there was a new house built and carpeted. We admit that. It may have been necessary, although I challenge the propriety of giving these people such lordly mansions to live in, and I think that something less costly than Brussels carpet would do for them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think, perhaps, the hon. member did not catch all that I said on that subject. I said that the warden's house had to be furnished with carpeting and window hangings, the deputy warden had been moved into the warden's apartments, and we furnished his house likewise to some extent. When I assumed charge of the department I found that not only the practice, but the regulations provided that we should furnish these houses. I thought that was unsatisfactory for several reasons that I need not enter upon now. But it was evidently necessary, when we provided a new house for the warden as for the deputy warden, that we should at least cover the floors and provide window hangings, or it was impossible for them to do it out of their salary. The house in British Columbia is not a lordly mansion; it is a good-sized house, but it is plainer and cheaper than the houses that have been given to the wardens anywhere else, unless, perhaps, at Dorchester, where the house is a very modest one. All I can say is that I agreed to furnish the carpeting and the window hangings for these two, and I was assured that the measurement that we provided for was the actual measurements for the two establishments, and I am assured that the sum to which the hon. gentleman refers in the Estimates as having been paid, is not enough to cover the actual cost of providing what I promised to provide, and in the Supplementary Estimates I have to ask for a further allowance for the same purpose. Of course I have no personal knowledge of the subject; all I can say is that I believe all these furnishings have gone into the new house and into the deputy warden's house, and that the quantities supplied there have not been enough to cover the floors.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There are two or three items in the account upon which I would like some information. I notice that 211 tons of coal were purchased at $8.50 a ton. Now, I have understood that British Columbia was a coal-producing country, where coal could be obtained much cheaper than the price here mentioned. Doubtless the Minister can give me a satisfactory explanation. I find that British Columbia last year exported 499,000 tons, at an average price of $3.95 a ton, whereas the Government has paid $8.50 a ton to provide for the penitentiary, and I think this item requires some explanation. There is another item which the Minister may explain when he gets on his feet—that in regard to coal oil. There were only 20 gallons provided, but the expenditure was something extraordinary unless they sell coal oil there at a very much higher price than it brings here. We find that coal oil there cost 40 cents a gallon, whereas on importations from the United States by British Columbia only 28 cents a gallon were paid. Then again there is another item which appears to require some explanation. There are 14 hour's labour entered under the name of G. W. Cooley, for $7. Is he a professional man or an ordinary labourer, for he is paid at the rate of $5 a day? There is an item for Cumberland coal, which is charged at the rate of $30 per ton. There are 92 lbs. of rope, for which $27.32 were paid. Perhaps the Minister will explain these items.

Mr. PRIOR. In regard to the price of coal charged for British Columbia penitentiary, I may say that it is the usual retail price paid in Victoria, Vancouver and New Westminster, which retail price is $8 per ton as a rule. During the last 12 or 18 months we paid $10 for every ton we used. Although the mines are within 70 miles of each of these towns, there is to all intents and purposes a monopoly, only three companies getting out coal, the regular retail prices ranging from $8 to $10 per ton. The export price at the wharves for coal shipped to San Francisco and to South America is, I think, about $4.50 per ton; but there is no place we can get coal except from the Nanaimo mines, and every one has to pay the price I have named, not only householders, but manufacturers who have to use it for manufacturing purposes. In regard to the Cumberland coal for which $30 per ton is charged, that comes round the Horn from the east, and it is the usual price paid. I know the wholesale price is $25, the retail $30. In regard to rope, the usual price charged for small quantities by dealers, such small quantities as are mentioned, is from 16 to 20 cents per pound. No doubt these will appear large prices to many hon. gentlemen, but every article sold on the Pacific coast is sold, as hon. members from British Columbia have frequently stated, at a price far in excess of that demanded east.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Both the coal and the coal oil are supplied by contract. We adopted the best means to obtain tenders for coal from all quarters, and even enlarged the usual number of advertisements in order to get the contract well advertized. I do not know exactly what claim Mr. Cooley has; but he is a mechanic, and was employed in connection with renovating a basement where the flooring had rotted away. He was the only mechanic employed, and convicts were under him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The explanation of the hon. Minister in regard to the coal price is not satisfactory, because the Trade and Navigation Returns give the price as $3.95 per ton. It is most extraordinary that people of that province, which exported 4,495 tons to the United States last year, at an average price of $3.95 per ton, should be willing to pay $8, $8.50, and even $10 per ton. I cannot understand how coal is kept up to people of that province when it is sold at such a low rate to people of other countries. No doubt the British Columbians will see the necessity of free trade so far as that province is concerned.

Mr. PRIOR. If the hon. gentleman were living in British Columbia he would find a good many things he could not understand. Coal is sold in large quantities, such as by the ship load, at $3.95, $4, and $4.40 per ton; but as regards the price in Vancouver, Victoria, and New Westminster, I never knew it to be less that $7.50 during my residence there, covering a period of 18 years. This price is due simply to the fact that there is a monopoly. Only three companies sell it retail. It is shipped from the mines to coal dealers for retailing, and they keep up the price. If coal was brought from the east, it would cost more than we now pay, and the people of our province believe in patronizing home industries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be as well to remind the House of a circumstance which may be fresh in the memory of a good many of the older members and to which this state of things bears close relation, namely, that the late Government, when in charge of public affairs, gave the most available and valuable coal territory in British Columbia to a certain corporation, on which occasion members of the Opposition told the Government they were trifling with the resources of the country and doing a very great injury to the future of British Columbia. No doubt the fact which we have now heard, that coal is exported at $4 per ton, for the use of American citizens, from British Columbia, but that the inhabitants of British Columbia have to pay from $8 to $10 per ton, forms a most striking commentary on the action against which we protested some years ago on the part of the Government, in depriving ourselves of the control of valuable coal areas and handing that control over to monopolists.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) calls attention to the fact that great areas of coal measures at Vancouver were given away to a company, and therefore increased prices have to be paid by reason of the monopoly thus caused. Before the company obtained these lands, and especially before any portion of the Island railway was built, the people were perfectly willing to give away all the coal lands that were given away. Although different opinions may be entertained now, still at the time the lands were given away everyone was satisfied, and the majority of the people are satisfied now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That does not in the slightest degree alter the fact or undo the mischief that appears to have been done in regard to the future of our province on the Pacific coast. The whole future of manufactures in British Columbia will continue to be most seriously affected, if the state of things to which my hon. friend alludes continues, as apparently it is likely to continue: and it is a most ample justification of the protest which was made from this side of the House against that most improvident and foolish grant.

Mr. PRIOR. I draw attention to the fact that coal has been no dearer since the land has been given away than before. It has been the means, however, of raising hundreds of thousands of tons of coal and giving employment to thousands of men.

Mr. BOWELL. The mines from which Victoria is now supplied were owned by the Dunsmuir family long before the land was given to build the railway, and it is only now that the mines in the Comox district are being opened, and the products of those mines are being shipped to San Francisco and are being brought to these markets; so there is no telling what the effect of opening these mines may be on prices hitherto prevailing. The remarks of the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) have no force, nor are they at all pertinent, owing to the fact that the lands were owned by the Dunsmuir family before that railway was built and before the lands were given in aid of the construction of the road.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But my remarks have a great deal of pertinence from the fact that if the most available and valuable mines were placed in the hands of monopolists by the deliberate action of the late Government, the Government by that action deprived the people of British Columbia of the chance of getting cheaper coal. That is what they did.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. gentleman does not see that the mines are in the hands of three companies and not one company, and if three companies can combine to keep up the price, fifty companies can do so. Every day in the United States, England, and even in Canada "corners" are arranged in grain, coal and almost everything.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will find out that when these matters are placed in the hands of three companies it is three times as easy for the companies to arrange a "corner" as it is when they are in the hands of ten companies.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is earnestly to be hoped that the hon. member for British Columbia will support the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), in his Bill to prevent combines. Can the Minister of Justice give us any information as to the size of the residence for wardens?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot give any idea as to what the size is. I will lay the plan on the Table in a day or so. The deputy warden's quarters consist of half a dozen rooms.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Perhaps the Minister will give the information on concurrence, for the statements made by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) disclose a startling condition of affairs, which should not exist.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject will come up under a different head, and I will then submit the information.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Government should adopt a system under which the buildings of these officials would be of certain specified dimensions. When you build a post office in a town you are guided by the importance of the place as to the size of the building, and I think that, in such cases as this also, the size of the building should be minutely described so as to leave no room for extravagance. If the amount stated here is correct, I think the Minister of Justice will find that there is a screw loose somewhere, and that they have intruded on his generosity to practice extravagance.

Mr. CORBOULD. In reference to the statements made with regard to the price of coal, I may say that my personal experience in New Westminster is that I have never paid less than $8 per ton exclusive of delivery, and I have paid as high as $10 a ton exclusive of delivery. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated that all coal lands in that region have been given away. I must differ from him there. There are plenty of coal lands found on the Island of Vancouver outside the railway belt, and so soon as the requirements warrant it these lands will be opened up and developed. I may also remind the hon. gentleman that on the mainland, and outside of that belt, we are paying $12 a ton for anthracite coal from Banff. If I am not mistaken I think that the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was sent out there by the Mackenzie Government and made exactly the same offer as the present Government made with reference to the land in that railway belt.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some years ago there was a vigourous protest in this House against the Government giving away the extensive coal fields they had in British Columbia. It is not to be wondered at that the settlement of British Columbia is very slow when, under the system of government we have, the great natural resources of the province are given away, and that the country has become so expensive for settlers that it is impossible for people to live there. If you do not provide that people can live cheaper, the immigration of settlers into that country will be very slow indeed. It is a singular thing that while coal can be exported from that country for less than $4 dollars per ton, the people living there have to pay from $8 to $10. The attention of the members from British Columbia having been called to this state of affairs, it should be their earnest endeavour to remove a system which is producing such prejudicial effects in British Columbia, and which is retarding the settlement of that province. It is well known, as mentioned by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that a strong protest was made against the policy of the Government, in giving away these lands. It was foretold at that time that it would lead to a monopoly, and the statements now made by the hon. members from British Columbia show that a monopoly does exist in British Columbia, which is prejudicial to settlement and which interferes with the development of the province. We hope that the Government will now take some steps to prevent this monopoly, and to give the people who settle in that province an opportunity of living there cheaper than they do under the present system. I remember that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Gordon), I think, struggled with all his might against this monopoly which the Government then gave, and he was supported by members on this side of the House. The people of British Columbia now see that if they are paying these high monopoly prices for the necessaries of life they have to blame the Government who gave these coal fields away to monopolists; and, I believe, Yankee monopolists at that.

Mr. ROSS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin), when he says that British Columbia is slow in growth, has made a statement not warranted by facts. I think I know a great deal more about British Columbia than the hon. gentleman does, and I can state that during the last ten years that province has grown remarkably, not only in population, but in the development of the various enterprises in that country. The census recently taken will prove that my statement in this respect is absolutely correct. The people of British Columbia have every reason to be proud of the manner in which their province has grown during the last ten years.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, allow me to call your attention to the fact that we are drifting from the item under consideration and undertaking a discussion over a very wide range as to the prosperity of British Columbia and the prices of articles there. Both sides of the House have now had their fling, and I would ask you to draw the attention of the Committee back to the item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must remind the Minister of Finance that it is pertinent to the question under discussion, which is the high price of coal, to point out that the Government have caused this high price by their former action. I am not going to prolong the discussion as the hon. gentleman has requested that we should not discuss it further, and very likely he has good reasons for that. A statement was made as to an offer said to be given by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), which, to the best of my recollection, was wholly incorrect. I do not think he was ever authorized to make any offer respecting the coal lands of British Columbia. However, the hon. gentleman is here and he can speak for himself.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. the Minister of Finance will recollect that this statement was made by one of his own supporters, and I have a right to require that it be proved or disproved.

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to the statement made by my hon. friend from Westminster (Mr. Corbould), as to my having been a party to offering these lands in British Columbia, I know that I offered the people of that province a great many things when I went over there, and I know that most of them are very sorry that they did not accept the offer when they had the chance. I admit that I was responsible for recommending to the Government the construction of the Nanaimo Railway, but it never got so far as to consider the question of a land grant or a money grant. The railway itself was all that was proposed at these initial stages, and I had not the good luck to be in Parliament when the Nanaimo Railway Bill was introduced the first time, or when it was introduced and carried through the second time. So far as that goes, my hon. friend (Mr. Corbould), who was not in British Columbia at that time, cannot have read the ancient history of his province or he would never have made that mistake.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to call attention to the high price of sugar, which, at page B—115 of the Auditor General's Report, is stated to be 8½ cents per pound. Now, we find that the present tariff enhances the price of sugar, not only to the Government who buy it for these institutions, but to the people generally, about 75 per cent. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if we can hope for any relief in this direction. In the United States to-day sugar can be purchased for two or three cents a pound less than in Canada, and that is an uncalled-for condition of affairs. This operates against the interests of Canada, and I think the time has arrived when the Government should come to the relief of our people. If the necessaries of life are purchasable on the other side 30 or 40 per cent. cheaper than they are in Canada, that is an inducement to people to leave a dear country and go to the cheap one.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question at all.

Mr. MULOCK. I accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I only ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he intends to devise a scheme for supplying these public establishments with sugar at a cheaper rate?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Everything appears to be very dear in British Columbia. I see that some newspapers have been subscribed for, one at $12 and another at $10 a year, while the Empire, the weekly edition, goes for $1 a year. While on my feet, I would like to ask if any portion of this 1,095 yards of carpeting was used for some of the wards of the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. None.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I also find a charge of $141.47 for 145½ yards of cocoa-matting. I cannot conceive how so much carpeting can be needed for a private house which is stated by the Minister to be not a very large one.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The question was not answered.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the answer was given half-a-dozen times.

Mr. MULOCK. I would recommend you, Mr. Chairman, to be a little more gentle in guiding the course of the discussion. I think we want to facilitate the progress of these Estimates, but I doubt very much if that will be obtained if any member thinks, even unjustly, that he is prevented from obtaining information by arbitrary conduct on the part of the Chair. I am not suggesting that that is the case in this instance: but when an hon. member asks a question, an opportunity should be given for an answer before the Chairman decides whether the item is carried or not. I doubt very much whether it is the duty of the Chairman at all to suggest whether the discussion is ended or not.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I may take this opportunity of saying that I have noticed on many occasions that questions had been put by hon. members after the Minister in charge of the particular item under discussion has already answered the same question three or four times. Sometimes hon. members who are not in the House when a question is first put and answered, and afterwards come in, look over the Auditor General's Report, and ask the same question again. I am here to stay as long as the House sits, but I think it would be in the interest of all if hon. members would keep their seats so that each question could be put and answered once, instead of being repeated by different members one after another.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the action of the Chair, the Chairman had no alternative but to declare the item passed, if no one rises to speak. I did not dream of answering the hon. gentleman's question, because I had already answered it, and I supposed him to be not asking for information, but just restating his objection and indicating that he was not satisfied. The hon. gentleman must have heard me state that the whole of this carpet was bought for the two dwellings, and I promised at a future date to bring the plans of those dwellings down and lay them before the House.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The question asked by my hon. friend from East Huron was not regarding the carpet. He wanted to know why the Government were paying $40 or $12 a year for newspapers in British Columbia, and then he went on to give his opinion about the quantity of carpets.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He was answered at the time, by British Columbia members, that that was the usual price.

Mr. CORBOULD. That is the usual subscription price for daily newspapers in British Columbia. The Colonist and Columbian are each $10 a year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I sympathize with the hon. Minister of Justice, because I recollect when I sat on the opposite side of the House having, on a great many occasions, to answer the same question from the same gentleman eight or nine times over. I thought it very hard, and so I sympathize entirely with the remarks made by yourself, Sir, on this point. But I would just observe this: there is always a little murmur through the House, and it is not always easy by any means for hon. members a few seats back to hear what is said on the front benches. Of course we cannot expect the Ministers to speak at the full pitch of their voices in committee, but in justice to my hon. friends I think what is said is not always heard or is very imperfectly heard, and that is the reason questions are sometimes repeated two or three times.

Regina Gaol..... $13,520

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this requires explanation. I see the vote last year was only $900.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Last year when the estimate was taken, the gaol was not quite finished, and I only took a vote for the salaries of the permanent officers—the warden, and, I think, one guard; but the gaol is now completed and receiving prisoners, and this vote is not only for salaries, but is to include the maintenance of prisoners.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What was done with the prisoners before you had the gaol?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They were confined in the police barracks at various places, and the police authorities were paid by the Department of Justice out of the vote for Miscellaneous Justice.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate..... $60,488

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is time we should cut down a great many of the contingent expenses of both Houses. I find that in the Senate, last year, we paid for: 339 inkstands, $258; 416 knives, $373.80; 3,048 pencils, $323.84; 54,124 pens, $201.78; 228 pairs of scissors, $136.06; 144 scrap books, $93.20; 680 balls of twine, $84.26; 15,600 b.s. visiting cards, $30. What can eighty-six or ninety Senators want with 339 inkstands and the other articles? It is absurd to ask the committee to grant a sum of money to the Senate to repeat the extravagance which evidently exists in that body. I do not know whether those hon. gentlemen are under the control of this House or not. It appears we are asked to pass this item, and if so we have certainly the right to criticize the expenditure. I believe there are a great many very honourable, high-minded gentlemen in that chamber; men not at all responsible and not desirous to be responsible for the items here enumerated. I challenge anyone to go carefully over the different items and accounts and not find that these articles have been scattered right and left from that particular chamber. It is time some change should take place in the items connected with contingencies of the Senate. We really ought to ask those hon. gentlemen to meet with a committee of this House and let us investigate together this expenditure and see if we cannot ascertain where all this stuff goes to. I have only mentioned a few of the most extravagant items. As I have said, I do not believe many of these old gentlemen are aware of the facts. They quietly take their seats, and their knives, and their scissors; and knowing a great many of them as I do, I cannot believe they are winking at the extravagance that is going on in that chamber. We are entitled to some explanation from the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the champagne knives?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know.

Mr. MULOCK. There is something to be said in favour of the expenditure, because I wish to say a word on the other side, and give the Senators credit for an economy, though perhaps it may be an unwise one. I find that these seventy-eight gentlemen have only charged the country with three flesh brushes and one foot bath.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice each one of them has a thermometer.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There is a charge here for sixty bottles of glue. Is that to fasten them to their seats?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This involves a large amount of the tax-payers' money and I think it is the duty of some Ministers to give some explanation of this most extraordinary expenditure. If any Minister will take the trouble of going over the items in detail, he cannot help coming to the conclusion that there must be something radically wrong. Here are charges for cooking knives and saucepans. Why should the tax-payers be called on to pay for these? Here are other items for feather pillows and nail brushes and methylated spirits. I dare say there may be other spirits as well; surely we are entitled to some explanation of this extraordinary expenditure.

Mr. WELSH. It is easy to find fault, but the trouble is to find a remedy. Every session this question of extravagant expenditure at Rideau Hall and the Senate comes round, and the Government always acknowledge that the matter requires looking into. It is high time it should be looked into and some remedy devised; and as this is our first meeting, the Government should propose some plan for a reasonable supervision of the expenditure of both Houses. In other countries there is a committee of both Houses to settle what the expenditure shall be, and I think the Government pledged itself last session to see that some arrangement would be entered into with the different departments to supervise the expenditure of public money.

Mr. FOSTER. One of the hon. gentlemen who spoke thought that this was not a laughing matter, and rather chided us on this side for making light of it. I want to assure my hon. friend that the laughing commenced on that side, and we caught the contagion and laughed in unison. It is all very well to speak of the supervision of this expenditure, and it may be that some hon. gentlemen really think that the Government are responsible for it. We must take into account the fact that, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, those expenditures are supervised and ordered by the Houses themselves. Hon. gentlemen have had a great deal to say about the Senate and their extravagance. I hope, when we come to the items of expenditure for the House of Commons, the hon. gentlemen will be just as free in criticism of themselves, because I think they are just as much open to criticism in regard to the contingencies of the House of Commons as the Senate are in regard to their contingencies. Now, as to the saucepans and matters of that kind, perhaps my hon. friend never strays far away from his own habitat, but if he should happen to wander into the Senate restaurant he would find that there is a place there in which he can be served with meals, and that requires cooking ranges, cooking materials and everything necessary for that purpose. My hon. friend must not run away with the idea that the Senators cabbage these saucepans, put them in their tail pockets and carry them home. These matters are arranged just the same as they are in the House of Commons. And so it is with regard to brushes, combs and so on. This does not only refer to what the Senators use, but there are rooms all around the corridors and offices, and these rooms are supplied with brushes, combs and everything necessary for cleanliness. These are not for the Senators to take away, but the amount is simply for the contingencies for the Senate in its corporate capacity, and includes the rooms of all the Senate clerks and the Speaker's apartments. A proportion of that amount goes into the trunks which members of the House of Commons, as well as the members of the Senate are accustomed to get. I have never heard in this House any vigorous denunciation of that practice which has existed from old times, and I think it is not altogether disagreeable to hon. members to get their boxes of stationery. That is not done by the Government, at all events. It is done by a Printing Committee which is formed of members of both Houses, and I think it is a sub-committee of that Printing Committee that arranges for these boxes and for what is to go into them. A number of these fittings are quite familiar to members on both sides, as they come to them in the box they receive every year, and I have no doubt that they carefully treasure and sparingly use what they get. There is no doubt that more of these articles are got than are actually necessary. Hon. members who have been long in Parliament, know, however, how difficult it is to supervise expenditures of that kind. Two years ago a committee of members from both Houses was appointed, and they met day after day and hour after hour, and endeavoured to secure greater economy in this matter. I think not much eventuated from the meetings of that committee. At all events, a report was made to this House, but I do not think it was ever adopted. If that be so, it was the fault of this House itself. I think that report had good features, and would have been productive of economy, but it is not the fault of the Government that it was not adopted, but the fault of the House. Not being a member of the Senate, I am not acquainted with the inner workings of that House, but, I suppose, they are something like those of the House of Commons. However, if members of both Houses desire to be economical and to save a part of this expenditure, they can easily do it, and it would be, I think, a good thing to do, but the initiative rests with the House in each case.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This expenditure as to trunks I do not think is attended to by the Printing Committee, but is left to the Senators themselves. It is notorious that their trunks are furnished with better stationery and better articles of every kind than those which are furnished to the members of the House of Commons, and I do not know why that should be so. I think there should be a change in the method of purchasing these articles. Some years ago I proposed that this whole system of supplying boxes of stationery should be done away with, but, so long as this provision is made, I think the Senate and the House of Commons should be on the same footing. I cannot see why the members of the Senate should have better articles than those which are furnished to the members of the House of Commons. For my part, I do not see why these articles should be furnished to either. I think it would be preferable that it should not be done, but, as long as this money is expended, there is no reason why the members of the Senate should be preferred above the members of the House of Commons, as they invariably have been since I have been a member of this House. I think it should be left either to the Printing Committee or to some other joint committee of both Houses to make a selection of those articles which are required, and that there should be no discrimination between the two Houses. I cannot see why the Senators deserve more consideration than members of the House of Commons in this regard, but they have always maintained their superiority and have always had something better than has been given to the members of the House of Commons. It was mentioned that, even in the matter of trunks, they have better trunks than are given to the members of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope they are not larger.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They are larger. If there is no way of controlling the exorbitant expenditure of the Senate, I think this House should have something to say about it. I see that the amount for these contingencies last year amounted to $60,247.96.

Mr. FOSTER. That takes in $32,933 for salaries, $1,059 for pages, $2,070 for messengers, and amounts for charwomen, postage, newspapers, $2,073 ; Debates, $9,000, unforeseen expenses, $2,000, and so on.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is all in connection with the running of the Senate, and we ought to do something to equalize this matter. I think the Government should devise some means by which the expenditure in both Houses should be controlled either by the Government or by a special joint committee or by the Committee on Printing, so that the two Houses may be dealt with alike, and I ask the Finance Minister if some arrangement of this kind could not be made?

Mr. BERGIN. I think the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. The Senate does not get better stationery than the Commons. The stationery for the Commons and everything that is furnished to the Commons in that small trunk, is furnished, as a rule, by the stationery department of the House of Commons under the direction, I may say, of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow), the whip on the other side, and by myself as chairman of the committee; and we have endeavoured to provide just as good stationery for the House of Commons as for the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. What committee do you mean?

Mr. BERGIN. The Joint Committee on Printing. We have given no advantage to the Senate over our own House. There has been the most perfect understanding between the hon. gentleman who acts as chairman for the Senate, when he happens to be chairman for the Senate alone, and the other members of the Printing Committee. If we have not as good stationery as the Senate, it is not because of any favouritism, but because the hon. member for Perth and myself have not had sufficient knowledge of what was necessary in ordering stationery for the House of Commons.

Mr. SPROULE. I must say that I partially agree with what the hon. gentleman opposite has said with regard to the difference in what was furnished to the Senate and what was furnished for the Commons, and I refer particularly to the trunks that have been given out this year. I do not think that the trunks that have been given to the members of the House of Commons reflect very great credit upon the parties who ordered them or the parties who made them. I think that anyone who understands the value would say that the trunks given out for the Senate are much more valuable than those for the Commons. Those given to the Commons are very inferior in many respects. In my own trunk, when I lifted off the lid inside, I found it was only pasted on with mucilage, and the handles came right off. They were merely stuck on inside with mucilage, instead of being fastened on in a substantial way. There are no heads to the nails to protect the sides of the trunk, whereas the trunks given to the Senate have large brass-headed nails that protect the trunk to a large extent, and the trunk will wear very much longer. In looking through other parts of the trunk, I found it very much inferior to the Senate trunk, so I think there is a great difference in favour of the Senate. If they cost the same, there is something inexplicable that I cannot understand, because I think any one who has examined the two carefully will say that the Senate trunks are much more valuable. But I wish to speak more particularly with reference to the stationery provided in the trunks. It always seemed to me that it was useless. We have very nice letter pads that we get upstairs, and they are valuable for our purposes, but they are only supplied to us during the session. Why not have a supply of this in the trunks of stationery? We have note paper, but it is so small in size that it is practically useless, with small sized envelopes that we cannot use to advantage. If you would give us the kind of envelopes that would suit any ordinary size of note paper, they would be much more valuable. Now, I believe you might put in these trunks a much better class of stationery than we now receive, and give us letter pads so that we can use them, either ruled or unruled.

Mr. MULOCK. Did you say liver pads?

Mr. SPROULE. Liver pads might be needed on that side of the House, but we do not need them here. I say, put in letter pads the same as we can get upstairs, of the ordinary letter size, and put in a number of them, and not so many of the small pads. Then do away with package after package of small note paper, that is comparatively useless for any one who wants to do much writing.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Notwithstanding the statements made by the hon. gentleman opposite, I maintain that I am right with regard to the difference in the stationery. Ever since I have been a member of this House, the statement has been made that the Senate have the best stationery, and the Senate themselves claim that they have superior articles. I did not know until to-night how the selection was made. I have been a member of the Printing Committee for nine sessions, and during the whole of the time of my connection with the Printing Committee—and I have been at nearly every meeting—I never remember any sub-committee being appointed to select stationery. I doubt very much, if the minutes of the Printing Committee were examined for any one year during the last nine years, that a motion would be found appointing a sub-committee to select the stationery for the Commons and the Senate. It is possible there may be one, there may be an understanding that these gentlemen should do it, but there has been no regular appointment that I was aware of, and I do not think that there have been any meetings of that committee at which I was not present. However, I maintain that I am correct in saying that the Senate have had indulgence in this regard, whether by the committee or by the management of their own affairs, I do not know; but they claim it themselves, and no doubt it is a fact. Now, there is one item here which seems rather singular, as it can only be used during one year. During the last year in the Senate, which is composed of about 80 members, they had no less than 313 almanacs and 12 card calendars. Now, what do they do with 313 almanacs? They must have had them in every room. They must carry them around in their pockets, and have them pinned upon their backs, and use them in every sort of way. I think we ought to have some explanation of this item. If the member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin) is responsible for this stationery, I want him to tell me now why he authorized the purchase of 313 almanacs in one year for 80 members. They cannot keep them for another year's use, and if the member for Stormont is going to defend his position, I want him to answer that question.

Mr. BERGIN. I repeat that the articles of stationery have been selected ever since I have been a member of the Printing Committee, by the Chairman and by the member for Perth.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who authorized that selection?

Mr. BERGIN. The Printing Committee authorized it. It was understood that the hon. member for Perth should act for the Opposition, and the Chairman of the Printing Committee for the Government, and we have always acted harmoniously together. I do not know that we went together during the last two or three years, because we thought that we had provided all that was right and all that was necessary. There are some hon. gentlemen who want nearly all their stationery in the form of letter pads, others want it in the shape of foolscap; others, who have ladies with them, want very small envelopes, which they think are more convenient for the dear creatures; but others, who are business men and write voluminous letters, want very large note, for they do not write billets doux. We know by experience that we cannot please every one. Officers of this House are furnished with almanacs.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. These 313 almanacs are for the Senate. What has the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin) to do with the Senate?

Mr. BERGIN. We select the Commons' stationery, and I deny that it is inferior to that obtained by the Senate. I suggest that we place on the Table at our next Committee meeting a box of the Senate stationery, and I will show that our box is better and costs no more.

Mr. CHARLTON. We must have the test made.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin) now takes a different position from that which he occupied at first. He then claimed that he selected the stationery for the Commons and the Senate.

Mr. BERGIN. No, no.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. gentleman said the stationery was uniform because he selected it. He now says he does not select the stationery for the Senate. Who does select it? We should like to know.

Mr. BERGIN. We must enquire from the Senate.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is evident that the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin) does not know anything about the stationery business. He admits he does not know anything about the stationery supplied to the Senate; all he knows is in regard to the Commons' stationery, and, therefore, I do not consider he is an authority on the matter. I should like to ask the Government who selects the stationery for the Senate?

Mr. BERGIN. I told you that the Chairman of the Senate Committee, when not Chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, selected the stationery for the Senate as we did for this House.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who joins him in the work? The Chairman of the Printing Committee has the assistance of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), and there is uniformity in their selection; but the chairman of the Senate Committee appears to act alone. If the Chairman of the Printing Committee of the Senate and the Chairman of the Commons Committee, with the assistance of the hon. member for South Perth, act together, I will be satisfied. The Government should make some other arrangement in regard to this stationery business. Although I have been a member of the Committee for nine years and have attended, I believe, every meeting, I have never heard a motion made to appoint anyone to select the stationery, either a member of the Senate or the Commons. There may have been an established practice before I became a member, but the practice has never been authorized by the Committee in an official way, to my knowledge. Will the Minister of Finance state if the Government will take any action on the matter?

Mr. FOSTER. This is a matter entirely in the hands of each House. I spoke merely from memory when I stated that the Printing Committee generally did this business. I remember once, when a member of that Committee, helping to select the stationery for the Commons. The members of the Commons on that Committee did not select the stationery for the Senate, and the Senate did not have anything to do with selecting the stationery for the Commons; but it was understood, whether by resolution of the Committee or not, that the heads of that Committee were to select the stationery. I quite agree that there should be no distinction between the class of stationery used by the two Houses. It should be equally good in each case, and one should not have any advantage over the other. I suggest to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), who is an influential member of the Committee, that when the Committee meets again, now that he knows the modus operandi, the matter should be discussed in order to ascertain whether the Senate and Commons cannot come to a satisfactory conclusion for a proper and uniform selection of the stationery for both Houses. The hon. member must not refer to the Senate too harshly. He spoke of 313 almanacs being required for 78 or 80 persons connected with the Senate, but he must remember that 215 persons connected with the Commons require 430 almanacs. So, both Houses are at fault if there is extravagance.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Do I understand that the Joint Printing Committee have full control of this matter? If not, it would be useless to attempt to arrive at an amicable arrangement, because the Senate members would act in their own way and the Commons in their way. Unless this House and the other House delegate the power to their representatives on the Committee, we might talk until doomsday and not arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Do I understand that the Committee has absolute control over the matter?

Mr. FOSTER. I say that the Committee has done the work. This House finds the money, and if the House refuses to vote the money the stationery could not be bought. I made the suggestion as a feasible way of coming to an arrangement. If the hon. gentleman does not think it can be done, he may, perhaps, be able to devise some other means.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Has the Committee control of this matter?

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee having done the business for years is quite capable of making a recommendation to the House in regard to stationery.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is well understood that the power of each House is just the same as is the power of each House in the United Kingdom, and the House of Commons has no control whatever over appropriations made for the purposes of the other Chamber. Each House is in that respect complete master of its own business. It is true that if the Government pass a Bill to take this matter out of the hands of the two Houses and vest it elsewhere, a different system might be adopted; but there is nothing to prevent the House of Commons, if it chooses, obtaining the best quality of paper on the market, and there is nothing to prevent the Senate from adopting the same course. If this matter is to go to the committee the other House must consent. It cannot be done unless the other House chooses voluntarily to surrender part of the power it possesses. If the system is to be one of uniformity, legislation is required and a joint committee will not accomplish the purpose. It will require legislation, as we required legislation with respect to the Library in order to secure joint action there.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is a point in connection with the reading rooms of the two Houses that is worthy of consideration. The Senate and the House of Commons get along with the use of the same library, and I fail to understand why they cannot get along with the use of a common reading room. The Senate spent last year for newspaper subscriptions $2,073, while for the same purpose the Commons spent $1,967. It is absurd to maintain two separate reading rooms. The two Houses could get along very well with one, and the members of the Houses would become better acquainted with one another, and there would be no jostling or crowding caused by using a common room. By spending a thousand dollars or so less on one common reading room than the sum now spent on both, a reading room could be established which would be greatly superior to the two existing rooms. I am well aware that the Senate are very tenacious of their rights. The Committee which made various recommendations with a view to economizing the expenditure, and which might have been adopted with great advantage, found that feeling to prevail. The members who sat on that Committee could not have failed to have noticed that the Senate were very tenacious of their rights, but it strikes me that if the matter were placed in a proper manner before them an arrangement could be come to whereby some thousands of dollars could be saved by having a general reading room.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that the chief Opposition whip (Mr. Trow) has just come into the House. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) made some reference to the fact that he and the whip on this side of the House ordered these trunks for the Senate and the House of Commons, and I must say that it appears to be a general skirmish with regard to matters of incidental expenditure. I am not often able to agree with the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), but I am glad to be able to endorse what he has said about these trunks. They are no credit to the three gentlemen who had the ordering of them, as the trunks furnished to the House of Commons are very inferior articles, although I understand that the same price was paid for them as for the Senate trunks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. If that is not the case, then I would like to know how it comes that this inferior and trashy article is furnished to the members of the House of Commons, while members of the Senate get a superior and a more expensive trunk. I would like to know from the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) whether or not he has got the same trunk as the Senators. I have been credibly informed that he secured for himself a Senate trunk, and I do not know whether my friend the whip on this side of the House did the same. If the same price was paid for the trunks furnished to the Senate and to the House of Commons, the price paid for the House of Commons trunks was altogether too high, or the price paid for the Senate trunks was too low. I believe the Senate trunks were made in Ottawa and the House of Commons trunks in Montreal, and I would like to ask the hon. member for Cornwall if he has secured a Senate trunk?

Mr. BERGIN. I may inform the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that I did not state the member for Perth (Mr. Trow) had anything to do with purchasing the trunks. After prorogation, and when it was proposed to make a contract for trunks in obedience to the orders of the House, I wrote to the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow), and whether he was at home or not I do not know, but I did not receive an answer to my letter, and I did not see the hon. gentleman until we met again this session. I went to the different trunk makers in Montreal and the Chairman of the Senate Committee said he would do the same in Toronto. I found that I could buy no trunks for anything like the money it had been suggested in the House such articles should cost. I spoke to a friend of mine who is a commission merchant and a dealer in leather, and he said he would get samples of the trunks from different manufacturers and let us know when the samples would be brought together. I referred the matter to the Speaker and we saw the different samples of trunks at Montreal and selected the one which he thought was the better one. With all due deference to what has been said by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), in my opinion one of the trunks supplied to the House of Commons will outlast two or three of the trunks supplied to the Senate. They have not the appearance of the Senate trunks, I admit, but I think they are more solid and better constructed. They are made of solid leather on iron frames and I am informed they are equal to the sample. As far as the trunk which I have received is concerned, I may say that it is the same as that which other gentlemen have, and I have not a Senate trunk, nor would I exchange my trunk for the Senate trunk.

Mr. TROW. I will take some responsibility for these trunks, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin). Some two years ago I urged upon the special committee of the Printing Committee to purchase trunks of the description we have received which would be of some service and of some value to us, instead of having our houses encumbered with shoddy trunks received every session which were totally useless, and the cost of five during the parliamentary term would cost nearly the price of the leather trunk. Now you have something that is useful for yourselves and families through time. I do not know what kind of trunk my inquisitive friend from Wellington received, but I fancy it was similar to the one I got. It was made in Montreal and cost $25, while the Senate trunks made in Ottawa cost $32. The latter trunks perhaps are somewhat better and a little more durable. Our trunks are in my opinion cheap, and good, and serviceable, and every member ought to be thankful that he has something to point to, to show that he has been a member of Parliament during his life.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It seems that, while the Minister of Finance is quite correct that the expenditure of money is under the supervision of the joint committee, yet, after all, the responsibility rests in the first place with the Government and in the next place with the House. If the members of the House are satisfied that things are wrong, it seems to me they ought to remedy them, and now is the time to do so, because it will not do to lay the blame on the committee or anyone else. We have the power in our own hands to stop this matter, and, if the Government think that there has been extravagance in this line, either in the Senate or in the House of Commons, they should not assume the responsibility of asking for so large a vote. I agree with the hon. Minister of Finance, in a large measure, that a comparison of the Commons with the Senate will not show that the Commons deserve a very great deal of credit for economy in this matter either. The question is, are we prepared now—and now is the time to do it—to control the committee by simply refusing to vote the money? If so, the Ministry ought to have the courage to reduce the item, and in doing so they ought to be supported by the House. But you cannot greatly blame the committee, when you vote this year as much for contingencies as was voted in previous years. You find the members of the House of Commons charged with 888 knives, nearly four for each member. If you place as much money at the disposal of the committee this year as they had last year, they will consider that they have authority to expend it. The control is really in the House, and now is the time to deal with the question by simply reducing this vote, or, if you like, by wiping out the whole amount for contingencies; or, if you still think you should in the public interest have stationery, then vote the amount you think necessary.

Mr. BERGIN. There is no doubt a great deal of waste in stationery, and there can be no doubt that the House is charged with using a large number of different articles which are not used by the members of the House. Some hon. gentlemen forget that in addition to the members of the House, stationery is furnished to the Hansard reporters, to the press, to the clerks, and to all the officers of the House. Almost every clerk gets a knife. There can be no denying that there is a great deal of waste of stationery inside of the House, and that members are not as careful as they ought to be in the use of stationery. We endeavoured to introduce a check on this wasteful consumption of stationery three or fours years ago by asking Mr. Romaine to insist upon an order being sent by each member of the House for the stationery he requires, so that I think the amount of stationery used by each individual member is on record every day in the Stationery Department, and it can be seen at a glance who are the members so wasteful and extravagant. It is not only in paper, but in other articles of stationery that there is waste. You can understand that if a member goes to Mr. Romaine and tells him that he must have this or that, that one has carried off his knife or another his paper-cutter, Mr. Romaine cannot very well refuse him.

Mr. DENISON. I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) that hon. members opposite each get two knives. I have only been able to get one. I think the paper they get is also very much better than what we get on this side.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not wish to belittle the efforts of the Printing Committee, but I think both Houses would be better served by having the selection of paper made by men who are thoroughly capable of making a proper selection.

Mr. BERGIN. Like the member for North Brant, I suppose.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. No. I am not like the hon. member for Stormont. I do not think all the common sense is contained in my own head ; I give others credit for having a little as well as myself, and I am going to suggest that the power to select this stationery be delegated to Mr. Romaine and the corresponding officer in the Senate. That would be the way to have a uniform selection made for both Houses, and they would probably be better served than they are at present. I do not think the Printing Committee have authority to delegate this power. I think the Government ought to take the matter up and instruct these two officers to make a uniform selection every year, so that there would be no disparity in the quality of the stationery supplied to the two Houses.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is not, I think, the quality of the article that we have reason to complain of. I think the stationery all round is perfectly good stationery for anybody, and if the Senators get a few articles of a little better quality than we do, I do not complain of that. I complain of the quantity, not of the quality. I see there were 888 knives bought for members of the House of Commons last year. I got only one knife ; who got six ? Where are the men who have appropriated these articles ? I suppose Mr. Romaine who distributes these articles makes an entry of the name of every man to whom he gives a knife. In more than one case, three extra knives have been given, but, of course, not to any members of this House. Let a member of the Government ask Mr. Romaine to send down a return of what has become of those knives and then we will know where the leak is. Why buy 888 knives for 215 members ? If a member loses his knife, let him buy another, and not ask the taxpayers to pay three or four times over in the same session for knives costing from $1.25 to $2. The difficulty is not so much in the quality as in the quantity, and the condition of things appears to be really worse here than in the Senate, with respect to knives at all events. I do not know how the scissors stand, but I know that in my trunk there is only one small pair. If there is a knife wanted for the reporters, buy that and no more ; and when a man loses a knife let him get another at his own expense.

Mr. FOSTER. The House will remember that two years ago we had a joint committee of both Houses which came to certain conclusions, that it was found impracticable, in some way or other, to carry out, and they made a report which was never adopted. The leader of the Senate has informed me that last year they appointed a sub-committee on contingencies, which went through the whole matter thoroughly and devised a means of cutting down this expenditure to the actual wants of the Senate, so that these extra knives, &c., will not hereafter be bought. They also sent us a report, which is on the Journals of the House of last year, so the leader of the Senate informs me. Now if the House of Commons will reform itself in the same way, we will get rid of these annual discussions and of a great deal of the blame which attaches to the Government throughout the country for these things which cannot be properly explained. I do not despair that before the session is over we shall be able to devise a means whereby this expenditure shall be cut down.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The best way would be to reduce the vote at once. So long as we leave it at the same amount, those who have the spending of it will purchase to the full amount at their disposal. If there is this economy to be effected in the Senate contingencies, they will not require so much money. The hon. Minister may say that they will not spend it ; but if they do not need the whole of it, we would be strengthening their hands if we did not vote the full amount. I do not hold the Government responsible for this thing, because it is in the hands of the House as well, and if we are honest we ought to be prepared to reduce the amount and thus accomplish the reform the Minister recommends.

Mr. FOSTER. No one can be prepared to say now, what, under the new regulations to be adopted, will be the exact sum required. We had better pass this item now, and if we can come to an arrangement before concurrence it will not be difficult when we find the basis on which we can proceed, to drop a certain amount before the item is concurred in.

Mr. TROW. I wish to say one word with reference to this streak of economy which has seized hon. members apropos of this small item of extras. We must take into consideration the fact that it is not merely 215 members who receive these knives. The reporters all receive them—about fifty reporters; and there are other civil service men who receive knives. The Hansard staff and translators receive knives, the pages and the messengers of the House. Why, the very time occupied in this discussion is more costly to the country than all these extras hon. gentlemen have been speaking about. Very likely some of the hon. gentlemen whose ire is roused with reference to a few knives and reams of paper have been sinners themselves. I do not know any set of men in this country who could make a better selection of stationery than is contained in the stationery trunks. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen should be so ready to make complaints against the committee which has done its duty in every respect. I can say this conscientiously that I have received one knife each session and no more, and do not want any more. At the same time, I would not raise my voice over a few extra knives.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I wish to disabuse the mind of the hon. member for South Perth that I found fault with the selection of stationery. I have not done so, but what I contended for, and what every hon. gentleman in this House ought to contend for, is that there should be uniformity in the selection, and that the Senate should not receive better stationery than the House of Commons.

Mr. BAIN. Perhaps the most reasonable remedy for the complaint is that made by the hon. member for Huron. The leak is not so much in the selection, but in the fact that parties apply at the department when they have lost their knives, for others. They go to Mr. Romaine and insist on getting these extra things. If a man loses his knife he should buy another. For myself I may say—and I have had a good many years' experience in this House—I never on any occasion received more than one knife in any one session, which I got in my sessional trunk along with my stationery. I never asked Mr. Romaine for another knife. If I lost my knife, I thought I was to blame, but I think the leak occurs in a way for which we are ourselves responsible, and the sooner we realize that it is not creditable to the Commons the sooner we will have this leak stopped.

House of Commons—Salaries, per Clerk's estimates..... $73,350

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an increase of $1,300 here.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are twenty-nine statutory increases of $50 each, making $1,450, and there is a reduction in the estimate for the assistant law clerk of $150. Mr. McCord, who was receiving $1,950, has been promoted to be the law clerk, and the estimates for the assistant is at the minimum of $1,800.

House of Commons—Contingencies.... $23,100

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice here an iten for a silk gown, $60, and also for 17½ yards of silk, $30.13. There is also an item for swords for Serjeant-at-Arms, $47.12, and many other items of expenditure that I think ought to be fairly explained. There is a payment to Mrs. F. Wilson of $1,500 for example. I would ask how many silk gowns are required?

Mr. OUIMET. I am informed that the silk gown was bought for the use of the Clerk of the House. It has been the custom for many, many years, long before I was here myself, to buy these gowns at the public expense, and I have seen no reason and no resolution from the House varying that practice. I suppose it was done in the same way as before.

Mr. McMULLEN. What about the 17½ yards of silk?

Mr. OUIMET. I know that some silk was bought for the ornament of the Speaker's chamber, and this may be the item, but I cannot say. I can state that no silk was bought for the private use of the Speaker or any of the employés of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Speaker is allowed $300 for a private secretary during the time the House is in session. I understand that last year the Speaker used a clerk of the House as his secretary, and that the $300 allowed for that purpose was made payable to that clerk in his own office. I should like to know if that is correct?

Mr. OUIMET. That is not correct. The money was paid to the private secretary.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Has the Deputy Speaker a clerk?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Apparently there is no increase in this item, but I think there is an increase in fact. Last year the expenditure for contingencies of the House of Commons was $23,100, but it included $2,000, the salary of the Deputy Speaker, which appears this year under a separate item.

Mr. FOSTER. The Deputy Speaker's salary was a separate item last year.

Mr. MULOCK. I was quoting from the Auditor General's Report, but I see that I am in error. There is an item of $47.12 for swords for the Serjeant-at-Arms. Is this an annual expenditure?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the old swords have worn out. They have probably been used since Confederation.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see here items for cab-hire for the Speaker, $137, for his clerk $79, and for sundries $14.25, making about $230 last year. I think we should have some explanation in regard to those items.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the $79 is not for the Speaker's clerk, but for the Clerk of the House, and my own experience is that the item of $137 for the Speaker is not very much.

Mr. MULOCK. This account should be better classified in the Auditor General's Report. It would be proper, under Commons' details, to have one account showing the expenses in connection with the Speaker's department and the Speaker's household, and so on, and a separate account in regard to the House of Commons itself. At present it is impossible to distinguish in regard to these items, whether they are for the House of Commons, or some officers of the House of Commons.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt the Auditor General will read the suggestion; he is very apt to take suggestions.

Publishing Debates..... $40,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that cover the expenditure? I doubt it very much. What was the sum last year?

Mr. FOSTER. $63,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman see any advantage in voting what we know will not be sufficient? I am afraid that $40,000 will not cover the expenditure, from my recollection of the experience of former years. I should be very glad if it would.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think there is anything gained in making an estimate smaller than it is known will be needed; but it is rather a difficult matter for a Finance Minister to make an estimate larger than the proper officer who sends in the amount thinks is necessary. I do not feel myself at liberty to make it greater.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is the expenditure for the last year?

Mr. FOSTER. In B—164.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see the Debates last year cost $63,066.

Mr. FOSTER. It depends on the length of the session. It is impossible to estimate for it accurately.

Salaries and Contingencies—Serjeant-at-Arms' estimates.....$33,032.50

Mr. McMULLEN. On page 165—B, I see "Mrs. F. Wilson, two months, per Order in Council; $533.33; special vote, $1,000." What is that for?

Mr. SPEAKER. That was for the late law clerk, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the salary of the law clerk?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is $3,200. It will be remembered that Mr. Wilson died rather suddenly, and there was an Order in Council to give his widow two months' salary.

Mr. McMULLEN. On page 165—B, I find an item for 20 yards of silk in one place, and 17½ yards in another place. What is that for?

Mr. SPEAKER. I imagine that is for furnishing the Speaker's rooms. These accounts, as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has stated, are all dispersed throughout the Auditor General's Report. They are arranged alphabetically instead of being arranged under the different services for which the amounts were paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have tried to keep some trace of the items connected with the Speaker's department in this chamber for the last seven or eight years. I notice that an enormous quantity of stuff goes in there. I do not know whether it is there now; but, I fancy, if the hon. Speaker now in possession found all the stuff there, he would not be able to get into the place at all. Year after year a large amount of stuff is bought and put in there, and when another Speaker comes in there appears to be room enough for any quantity of stuff more. I think there is room for saving a good deal of money in connection with that department, as well as in connection with the restaurant. I find a large amount of stuff is bought for the purpose of refurnishing the restaurant every year when Parliament assembles. I do think that all the expenditure connected with these two departments should be put under the strict supervision of some person who would be held responsible, and that when one man goes out the contents of the Speaker's department should be carefully listed and the list should be handed over to the new Speaker, and at the end of his term he should hand over to his successor everything that he receives, except those things that may be broken or destroyed. It appears to me there is an enormous quantity of stuff that is bought and charged to the Speaker's department and the restaurant downstairs, and I do not really know what becomes of it. If all that has been bought and paid for during these eight or nine years, were to be found either downstairs or upstairs, there would not be room for a rat to get through it. I would like to know what becomes of all this stuff that is bought and paid for every year. I was much pleased to hear the remarks that dropped from the Finance Minister. I think when the Senate go to work and cut down their expenditure after careful investigation, they set a wise example for us, and there is room to carefully criticize the expenditures in connection with the two departments I have mentioned. I have endeavoured to criticize these things from year to year, but it does not appear to do any good. We find afterwards the same quantity of stuff is bought, and the same expenditure is made. You would fancy, from the charges that appear in the Auditor General's Report, that at the end of every session the place is cleaned out and the stuff is carried off, and we have got to refit, refurnish, recarpet, and rearrange the whole place for the purpose of meeting the convenience of the Speaker who is going to occupy it. I think that there is something wrong, and some effort should be made to find out where the leak is.

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to the restaurant, an inventory of the goods was made at the time the keeper took charge of it at the beginning of this Parliament, and an agreement was made with him that he would return these articles to the charge of the Serjeant-at-Arms at the end of the session, and would make good any deficiencies there might be. With regard to the Speaker's rooms, I suppose my hon. friend will hardly expect that no renewals would be needed. He, perhaps, has kept house himself, and he knows that articles wear out and have to be replaced, and he would hardly expect the Speaker, no matter who he might be, to exercise police supervision over the rooms during the recess between one session of Parliament and another. I take it that the servants are perfectly honest, and that nothing is taken away from the Speaker's chambers during the recess. But I think my hon. friend will understand that those goods, after they are used for a certain length of time, become worn out, and perhaps the Speaker's wives think they are rather unfashionable, and would like to change some articles. But I would say for my own part, that very few additions have been made to the furnishing of the rooms since I have had the honour of occupying the position of Speaker.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I will suggest the adoption of some plan similar to that adopted by the Public Accounts Committee in regard to Rideau Hall. When a Governor leaves, or at the end of every year, an inventory is taken of all the goods in the Hall; and, I think, a similar plan should be adopted with regard to the Speaker's apartments.

Salaries of Officers of the Library. ... $16,895

Mr. MULOCK. Will the Minister of Finance explain the increase?

Mr. FOSTER. There are the statutory increases, and, in addition, $200 to the salary of each of the librarians. It was thought that their present salaries were not sufficient, and an increase of $200 each is to place them at the same salaries as deputy heads.

Grant to Parliamentary Library..... $17,500

Mr. MULOCK. I notice $148 for newspaper subscriptions. If these subscriptions are to purchase papers for the accommodation of the staff of the library, they are unnecessary, because the reading room is quite accessible. An item of $288, travelling expenses of the librarians, needs explanation. I find that of the gross expenditure of $12,000 or $13,000, mainly for books, not more than $100 is expended in Toronto, a considerable sum being expended in Montreal and a large sum in Ottawa. I do not know whether special rates are obtained by dealing with particular firms. If not, the expenditure should not be made in this fashion.

Mr. FOSTER. The expenditures are made under the supervision of the Library Committee.

Mr. SCRIVER. As a member of the Library Committee I may say that these purchases are all made by the librarians. They are made subject to the supervision of the Library Committee, and the accounts are all accurately audited by a sub-committee of that committee during each session. The bulk of the purchases are made abroad, either in the United States, England, or foreign countries, but some are made in Ottawa. I do not know how it happens that the city in which my hon. friend for North York (Mr. Mulock) takes so much interest appears so infrequently. I suppose it is because, perhaps, they do not bind books as well, or publish as many books as many cities. At all events, the selection is made by the librarians themselves.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend's explanation hardly covers the point. I do not suppose our book purchases are made direct from English or other publishers, but through Canadian dealers.

Mr. SCRIVER. The orders are sent direct to the publishers abroad by the librarians, but not always.

Mr. MULOCK. Do the librarians make the purchases themselves and afterwards account to the committee for the expenditure, or has the committee anything to say as to the channels through which the purchases shall be made? If not, I submit there should be a fair distribution of favours.

Mr. SCRIVER. The members of the committee are requested to make suggestions as to the character of the works to be purchased. I do not know that they are expected to make suggestions to the librarians as to the places where or the persons from whom the purchases are to be made.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I ask that the librarians be asked to furnish a statement as to the principle on which they purchase books, having reference to the sources through which they purchase them.

Mr. FOSTER. The report of the Library submitted to the House at the opening of the Session may contain the information. If not any other information necessary may be obtained through the Chairman of the Library Committee; who is Mr. Speaker.

Printing, printing paper and binding....$70,000

Mr. LANDERKIN. Much printing is done that is altogether unnecessary, and elaborate and expensive reports are scattered through the country and little use made of them. A considerable saving might be effected on this item without loss even to the country or to the individual.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It would be satisfactory, not only to members of this House but to the public, if some Government officer was instructed to prepare a comparative statement as to the cost of printing done at the Printing Bureau as compared with the cost of printing done under the old contract system. It would indicate to the country whether we had made an advance by establishing a Printing Bureau. In connection with this item, I desire to ask whether any further information can be given with respect to Barber & Co.'s suit against the Government for damages?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no further information to offer, and the Secretary of State is not in his seat. I am informed there has not been any decision in the case.

Revision of Electoral Lists under Franchise Act.....$ 150,000

Mr. LANDERKIN. Have instructions been given to the revising officers to go on with the revision of the lists, or do they go on without instructions? Because last year when they were going on with the revision they were told to stop.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was some public intimation given that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill to suspend the operation of the Act and they are going on.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When you suspend, do you give them notice or do you let the Statute take its course?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would the hon. gentleman say if this $150,000 is adequate to pay all expenses in connection with the preparation of the voters' lists?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am afraid not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the total estimate?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. About $240,000.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand that the revising officers do not advertize when the preliminary revision is to take place. I believe this is one of the economies the Government has introduced into the system.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The revising officer prepares a list of additions and erasures, and he publishes this at a certain number of places and states that he will sit to hear objections, but he does not give notice when he begins his work.

Mr. DEVLIN. What is the consequence when the revising officer sends out notice that he will go and sit at a certain place and does not go and sit?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to know how this estimated amount is expended: how much does the Minister estimate as necessary to pay the salaries of the revising officers, whether it is proposed to pay clerks as well, and how much will be required to pay the cost of printing the lists ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Speaking roughly, the amount required for the salaries and disbursements of the revising officers would be about $150,000. It is not intended to pay the clerks separately, but to follow the system which was adopted last year of paying the revising officer a sum sufficient for his services and his disbursements, and he provides his own clerks and his own bailiffs and pays them out of that sum.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to call the attention of the Government to a matter which was brought to my notice by a member of this House, namely, that at least in one electoral division of the Dominion one of the revising officers appointed by the Government is the law partner in business of one of the members in this House who is very likely to become a candidate in an election. I would like to ask the Government if any representations have been made to them in this matter, and if so what they propose to do in regard to it ? I need hardly say that it is considered very improper, and that it is looked upon as a violation of the spirit if not of the letter of the Franchise Act, that a person so near in relation to a member of this House, and to a probable candidate in a county in which the elections have always been very close, should occupy that important office. As this matter has been brought to my attention, and as it appears to be very pertinent to the subject under discussion, I would like to hear the views of the Ministry upon the matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The case the hon. gentleman refers to is not quite as he understands it to be ; however, I will not challenge the statement of fact which he has made. I may point out that the law makes no provision whatever for removing a revising officer, except the provision that he is to hold office in the same way as a judge does, and be removed by a vote of both Houses. We have, therefore, no power to remove a revising officer. There is no provision for his disqualification because of the fact that his law partner is elected to the House, but the subject is well worthy of consideration and will be considered.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I believe I am the person to whom the hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) refers, and I may say to him that he is quite astray altogether in his ideas on this point.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I say that the revising officer is not my partner at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was he your partner ?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I am quite ready to give you a very full explanation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, do so.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). He has never been my partner.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then he does not refer to you.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Yes, he does; and the reason I know it is that he has put a question on the order paper, and therefore I am quite satisfied the hon. gentleman refers to me. He never has been my partner. He was appointed revising officer before I had any idea whatever of running in an election. I may also say that the voters' list, as made in the County of Shelburne, gives satisfaction to both sides of politics, and I venture to say that it would be impossible for the hon. gentleman to find anybody in the county who objects to the list as it now stands, or to the acts of the revising officer.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Last year a Minister of the Crown intimated that there would be a revision of the lists and I went to the trouble of getting blanks printed and having them sent out. It cost me a considerable amount of money, and after I had made that outlay, the revision did not go on. In the year 1888 a similar thing was done. If you are going to have a revision it should be stated publicly that you are going on with it, so as to save trouble and expense to the members. This Act has been suspended on several occasions, the first revision was in 1886, it was suspended in 1887, it was again suspended in 1888, it was revised in 1889 and was again suspended in 1890, and we want to know whether it is going to die or not this year. I want to have more than the words of the Secretary of State for this before I go to the expense, because we had his assurance that there would be a revision in 1890 and no revision took place. We would like to have the assurance of the leader of the Government now, as the Minister of Justice rather evades the issue.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not evading the issue at all. I would advise the hon. gentleman to send out his blanks and I can comfort him with the assurance that they will not be wasted, as the same blanks will do. I am extremely sorry that we had not a revision, for I know the hon. gentleman likes it, but he will not be disappointed a second time.

Mr. BARRON. This item in itself may not be large but we all know that the cost of revising the lists is something enormous. A reduction might be made by reducing the number of revising officers. In Victoria you have two revising officers, one the county judge, and another a gentleman practicing law. The population of the County of Victoria is less than that of the County of Peterborough ; yet in the latter county there is only one revising officer, who is a County Court judge. If he can do all the business for a larger population, why would not one revising officer be sufficient for the County of Victoria ? This system of unnecessarily duplicating officers goes on all over the country. By doing the work with a fewer number of officers you could save a large amount of expenditure.

Mr. DEVLIN. I agree with what has been said to a certain extent, but I believe that in the Province of British Columbia there are six revising barristers, whereas in the County of Ottawa, which has a larger population than that province, we have but one. I can understand how it is that some portions of the county have not been visited by the revising barrister at all. When a revision of the list took place, there were three townships, Hartwell, Ripon and Suffolk, which received notices that they would be visited by the revising barrister ; but strange to say that gentleman did not see proper to go into those townships, with the result that although the provincial lists showed nearly 300 names in Suffolk, and over 300 in Hartwell, the Dominion list showed only 60 names in the one township and 62 in the other. So carefully was the list made, moreover, that even a public square was put on it, and that square voted, and I believe voted against me. Therefore, if in the Province of British Columbia six revising barristers are necessary, it seems to me that in the County of Ottawa, which has 70,000 population, even a larger number are needed.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is the printing included in this vote?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Only in part.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it the intention to do away with getting printing done by outside parties?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be all done away with outside except the printing of the supplemental lists in the first instance. That is to say, the list which the revising officer posts up indicating what names are to be added and what to be struck off will be printed in the locality, but the regular lists will be done here.

Mr. FRASER. Might I ask if the Government could not have uniform blanks furnished? At present different forms are used in different counties. Could not the Government prepare official blanks and sell them to both parties, instead of leaving the parties to prepare them themselves? That would give us uniformity.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that could be done under the law as it stands, but the question could be considered when the law comes to be amended, as to whether forms of application should not be embodied in the Act.

Mr. FRASER. It is hard to get amendments made here. I have no doubt that if the plans were prepared in the office of the hon. Minister of Justice, they would be accepted by all the officials.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it would be an improvement if the revising barrister were paid in some other way than according to the number of names. Many names appear in duplicate, and sometimes I have seen the same name three times on the list, so that there is a direct inducement to the revising barristers to get as many names on the list as possible. Then they are also induced to keep on names which have been struck off. In the town of Chatham there were no less than 150 names struck off which we objected to, but strange to say when the list came to be finally revised these names appeared again. I do not know whose fault it was; but I think if the revising barrister were paid a definite sum for the work instead of by the number of names, we should have a purer and better list.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the large size and inconvenient form of the present lists. Could he not direct the revising officers to prepare them in more compact and convenient form, which would be more easily handled and carried about?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think there is no doubt that a smaller sized list would be much more convenient, and I will ask the hon. Secretary of State who has charge of the subject, if the change can be made without adding largely to the expense. I fancy that some mechanical difficulty may be in the way, owing to the forms having been permanently made up.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Would the hon. Minister of Justice state what is the argument in favour of paying revising officers according to the number of names?

Sir. JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure that no case can have arisen of names having been left on the list by the revising officer in order that he might get a few cents for such extra names: but mistakes will necessarily sometimes occur. If any names were improperly left on the list after the final revision, it must have been through some oversight of the parties watching the revision. The object of establishing the mode of payment was to arrive at some system by which we could adjust the cost of revision to the labour in the revision. If you leave it at large, it will be impossible to get any standard by which the payment can be made. In rural constituencies the number of names is less, but the work is probably greater than in urban constituencies, as there is more travelling from home and greater inconvenience to the revising officer. We equalize the conditions to some extent by providing that there shall be a stated salary of $300 to each revising officer, no matter whether his constituency is rural or urban. Then up to a certain number of names we allow five cents a name, and above that number three cents. In that way we provide by a permanent vote of three hundred dollars a fair allowance to the revising officer in the rural districts where he has to travel more and has fewer names, and we provide compensation to the urban revising officer who has a larger number of names involving more clerical work. It is an attempt to get at equalization, and we have found it to work well in this sense, that there are very few complaints that the distribution of remuneration is not even. There are of course exceptional cases, enormous constituencies like the Counties of Ottawa, and Chicoutimi and Algoma, which always have to be treated exceptionally, but otherwise the present plan of payment has been found fairly to adjust the remuneration to the labour.

Mr. MULOCK. Did I understand the Minister to say this item would have to be increased by $90,000?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; about $240,000 altogether.

Mr. MULOCK. That would mean the vote is short by ninety thousand dollars of the amount necessary to pay the cost of revision. I am surprised and disappointed at that statement. Some time ago we were informed that the cost of revising the lists, on the only two occasions they have been revised, was $680,078; and on the 20th May last the Secretary of State said: "The old lists being in type will by so much reduce the cost of the next revision." Well, looking at the figures furnished by the Secretary of State on that occasion, it appears that the revision of the lists in 1889-90 cost $236,800, and I inferred from what he said that the revision for the current year would be much less. But now we are told it is much more; in fact it is nearly a quarter of a million dollars. In other words, for the sake of putting this Act into force, on the three separate occasions, the country has to pay $922,000. That is an unwarrantable waste of public money, for which there is not a shadow of excuse. The Act has been condemned by the Administration by their refusing year after year to enforce it. It is discredited by every person in the country. There is not one who has got to do with the enforcing of it, with the exception of those who receive their portion of the million dollars, who does not condemn it. I have conversed with many members on both sides, and am perfectly in order when I say that I have not yet been able to find a member on the other side who approves of the Act.

Mr. DENISON. I approve of it.

Mr. MULOCK. I commend the hon. gentleman for his courage; but it does not follow that, because he approves of it, it is a good measure. One swallow will not make a summer. His opinion no more than mine will decide the question. I speak from observation and experience, and, whilst the hon. member for West Toronto approves of it, no one else on either side does so. If the new Government are prepared to strike out a new path and are not to be hampered by the policy of their predecessors, they could not inaugurate their Administration better than by reforming this obnoxious and cumbersome election law.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). As a young member, I take this opportunity of stating that I am of the same opinion as the hon. member for West Toronto. Having some experience in the matter. I must say that the Act is the best ever enforced in the District of Algoma, for this reason, that under the provincial Act a very large number of voters in that district are disfranchised. A very large number of young men engaged in fishing, mining and railroading, who have not the means to place themselves on the provincial lists, have a vote under the Dominion Franchise Act. For that reason I think the Act the best ever enforced in that end of the Dominion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Explain how it is?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). If you take the Act of the Ontario Legislature passed in 1888—I think it is on page 11 of the Statutes of that year—you will find that it stipulates that only householders and property owners in the unorganized districts of East and West Algoma, Hastings and Essex, and one other county, are allowed to vote. There are no lists provided. There is no machinery to provide lists in that unorganized portion of the Dominion I have the honour to represent. Thousands who are not householders or property owners have thus no means of getting on the provincial lists, and consequently have no votes in that district. If I am wrong, I am liable to be corrected.

Mr. BARRON. The hon. gentleman who has spoken knows very well that the Ontario lists are prepared, in the first place, by an assessor, and if there is an unorganized district, there is no assessor; and, as my hon. friend behind me says, every one votes. I want to point out to the Minister of Justice that he has not yet answered the point I made, whereby I think the extraordinary expense of the Act can be very materially reduced. Representations have been made to the hon. Minister on the advisability of reducing the number of revising officers. There is, for instance, the County of Peterborough, which has a larger population and area than Victoria, and yet has but one revising officer to two in Victoria. I do not mean to say an unkind word regarding the revising officer for North Victoria. On the contrary, I find him most accurate, and am perfectly satisfied with his fairness and justice. I delight in taking this opportunity to so speak of him, but it seems to me that, when we can have one revising officer in the County of Peterborough, surely one is sufficient in the County of Victoria, and I think representations have been made to the Minister of Justice to that effect. I see the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson) in his place, and no doubt he can tell us that the revising officer in his county had plenty of time to do his work and did it well. I, therefore, think that in the County of Victoria, with less area and less work to do, one revising officer would be sufficient and would have plenty of time, so that would be one way of reducing the expense of this unfortunate Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with the hon. member that it is very desirable to decrease the expense by having not more than one revising officer in an electoral district, where that is possible, but that cannot be done in regard to the existing revising officers whose tenure of office is such that they cannot be removed. However, it will be remembered in future appointments.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to know if any instructions have been issued this season to revising officers in regard to the revision of the lists, and, if any instructions have been issued, what they are?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No instructions have been issued at all to them beyond the announcement that the revision would proceed according to law this year, and as to the scale of remuneration which would be adopted.

Mr. WATSON. In the election of 1882, when a portion of the western territory was added to Manitoba, every resident householder had a vote, as I understand he has now in the district of Algoma, in the Province of Ontario. Consequently, the franchise is more liberal for the Local House of Ontario than it is for the Dominion, where a man has to have a house and has to be registered.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The state of affairs in Algoma is entirely different from the way which it was represented by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson). The Ontario Act provides that householders and property owners only shall vote in the unorganized district. The Dominion Act provides that everyone 21 years of age and a British subject, and not otherwise disqualified, is entitled to a vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Well, provided he complies with the conditions of the Act. It is not necessary for him to be a householder or a property holder, but if he has $300 a year he can vote. We have a very large element there composed of railroad men, lumbering men, fishermen and miners. They generally board. The Act contemplates that every man shall have a vote. It is practically manhood franchise. The Ontario Act is manhood franchise in a measure, but in these unorganized districts it is not, because they are neither property holders nor householders.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member is perfectly right, but I think what is complained of is that, in this unorganized district, there are a great many of these railroad navvies and men engaged in the mines who have votes in other counties, men who go into these lumbering districts for the winter and possibly into the mines in the summer. They work in Algoma and have a vote there, and they have votes elsewhere at the same time.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is worthy of putting on record that, of all the members who sit on the other side of the House, only two have had the courage of their convictions, and have risen to declare that they think the Franchise Act is a good one. Evidently there are two men there at all events who believe in that Act.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would make another appeal to the Minister of Justice. This season has been very unfavourable. I am told the prospects are that we are not likely to have a third of a crop. If ever there was a time to reduce expenditures which are unnecessary and uncalled for, that time is now, and this quarter of a million might be saved to the people by repealing this Act and might be expended in furnishing the people with seed grain, which it may be necessary to do if the weather remains as dry as it has been. I, therefore, appeal to the Government to lop off this quarter of a million in the interests of the country, though not perhaps in the interest of the Tory party, and expend it, if they are bound to expend it, in some work which will be useful to the people.

Patent Record.....$15.000

Mr. FOSTER. That may be made $12,000.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That might be dropped altogether this year in view of the hard times.

Mr. FOSTER. It is out of that that a large revenue comes to the country.

Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

ADJOURNMENT—THE BUDGET.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know from the Minister of Finance if he proposes to make his Budget statement on Friday?

Mr. FOSTER. I am diffident about making another announcement. I have made so many that I am afraid the House will consider I am fickle in this matter. I think, unless extraordinary events occur, the Budget will be delivered on Tuesday next.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think it is important that the Budget should be brought down immediately. It should have been brought down long ago. The Minister must know that the sugar trade of the country, which is an immense trade, is, I may say, almost paralysed. It is in such a state that extra provision had to be made for handling it meanwhile, and the large season of consumption is upon us. It is expected, whether rightly or wrongly, that the Government may deal with it in some way. It seems to me that the public interest demands, if any tariff changes are made, that they should be announced at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Finance does know all that the hon. gentleman has stated. It is not his fault that the Budget was not delivered a fortnight ago, but events over which we had no control kept it back. It may be possible to deliver it on Friday, and if so, I shall certainly do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is well, for many reasons, that the date should be definitely fixed. If the hon. gentleman says Friday, all right.

Mr. FOSTER. I will be able to say to-morrow.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 17th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that, in obedience to the Order of the House of yesterday, Mr. Michael Connolly had delivered to the Clerk of the House the books of accounts, &c., required for examination by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in connection with the enquiry relative to the Quebec Harbour Works, &c.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 104.) to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, 1890 (from the Senate).—Sir John Thompson.

DECK AND LOAD LINES.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to provide for the marking of deck and load lines. He said: It will be recollected that last year the owners of ships built chiefly in the Maritime Provinces, were exceedingly alarmed to find that it was proposed by the Parliament of Great Britain to adopt extraordinarily severe regulations in reference to the loading of ships. By the provisions of the Imperial Bill then under consideration, all colonial ships, as well as ships built at home, were compelled to conform to these rules, regarding the extent to which they could be loaded and the amount of free-board to be given any vessel loading and clearing outwards at a British port. The history of that sort of legislation began in 1876, when the Imperial Parliament adopted what was known as a load line or a maximum mark under which a ship could be loaded on departing from a port in the United Kingdom. The fixing of the load line was left, however, entirely to the owner, a penalty being imposed only when no load line whatever was fixed; and the criticism on that measure was that the load line could practically be put upon the mast, and therefore the Bill fell entirely short of its object. Very exhaustive enquiries were promoted after 1876 by Parliamentary Committees, and elaborate calculations gone into in order to settle, mathematically as well as nautically, the exact measurement which should be adopted and the exact capacity of each ship for carrying certain cargoes, and after these elaborate enquiries had been made, chiefly with reference to iron and steel vessels, built as vessels in England and Scotland are, the Bill to which I have just referred was brought forward in the British Parliament. But instead of being confined to the vessels which had been chiefly considered with reference to the framing of rules for the free-board, it embraced the wooden ships of this country, although apparently the rules and calculations had very little reference, if any, to the requirements and capacity of our wooden ships. Those interested in the wooden ships of this country became exceedingly alarmed at the contemplated legislation, more particularly as the surveyors contemplated by the Imperial Bill, under the Board of Trade, upon whom devolved the duty of fixing that load line, were Lloyds' surveyors; and as the vessels of this country were chiefly classed Bureau Veritas, it was also feared great injustice would be done by these surveyors in dealing with ships classed entirely under different forms and rules from those of Lloyds. The Canadian Government, acting at the desire of the ship-owners of this country, immediately proceeded to represent to the Imperial Government the grave injustice and the great injury which would be done to the Canadian wooden ships, and the Bill in England was, after consideration, considerably amended, and passed with the following section added, to meet, if possible, the objections raised by the ship-owners of this country :—

"An Act to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts relating to load lines, Chap. 9, 53 Vic., Imperial Act, Sec. 3, provides: Where the legislature of any British possession, by any enactment provides for the fixing, marking and certifying of load lines on ships registered in that possession, and it appears to Her Majesty the Queen that the provisions of that enactment are based on the same principles as the provisions of this Act, and are equally effective for ascertaining and determining the maximum load lines to which such ships can be safely loaded in salt water and for giving notice of the load line to persons interested, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to declare that any load line fixed and marked and any certificate given in pursuance of that enactment shall, with respect to ships so registered, have the same effect as if it had been fixed, marked or given in pursuance of this Act."

In consequence of that clause, this Bill has become necessary. I may say that in the petitions, large numbers of which have come to this House, with many signatures from those owning ships in the Maritime Provinces, the difficulties are pointed out that are to be encountered in the English Bill, notwithstanding that in another clause of it, which I did not read, the surveyors charged with the ascertaining where this load line is to be marked may be either Lloyds or Bureau Veritas; and the petitioners have pointed out that the rules upon which these surveyors are bound to act, under the Imperial Act, are inapplicable to the style of ships built in this country, no reference having been made, —the subject, perhaps, not having been understood in England—regarding the breadth of beam and the extraordinary buoyancy of the wooden ships of this country, and they point out that if it is impossible to get rid of the restrictions under the Imperial Act, if the load line is to be marked, it be marked by surveyors both here and in the United Kingdom appointed by the Dominion Government, who have special knowledge of wooden ships and their great carrying capacity. The proposition on the part of the ship-owners of this country seems to me not at all unreasonable, nor do they appear to be actuated by any selfish interest or desire to escape the imposition of necessary restrictions; and in support of this, I would refer to the very elaborate report I have included in the last annual report of the Department of Marine, of the Marine Conference held in Washington in 1889, where all the shipping countries in the world were represented, and where the very able English representatives endeavoured most earnestly to obtain the passage of a resolution in favour of a universal load line mark. After careful investigation and able presentation of the British case, the report of that conference was to the effect that it was impossible to lay down a general rule, or adopt a broad rule for the shipping of the various countries in the world. I would like to read to the House one extract in connection with this, as it supports, to my mind, the position taken by the shipping interests in Canada in favour of the load line being controlled by the authorities in the country to which the ships directly belong. The members of the conference, referring to the English rules, say :

"The above mentioned rules have proved to be a good standard upon which to determine the proper loading of British vessels, which are classed in Lloyds' register, or for other vessels, the particulars of whose strength and fitness to carry any particular cargo can easily be ascertained by the surveyors of the Board of Trade. As regards foreign ships, however, which are loading in the United Kingdom, and which are either not classed in Lloyds' register or the particulars of which cannot be ascertained without a minute examination, the difficulty is, that the law which intends to guard against dangers arising from overloading cannot be enforced without serious disadvantages to the owners of ships and cargoes consequent upon the difficulty of ascertaining whether the ships are fit to carry the cargo in question."

And they concluded that this very important subject of underloading or overloading ships should be left to the Governments concerned, and while they made many recommendations in regard to shipping, which they thought of universal application, and in the interest of the world's shipping generally, they took special pains to point out that, in a delicate matter such as this, it was impossible to make any hard and fast general rule which would apply to the different ships of different countries, since they are all built on different models and for different purposes. In the Bill which I ask leave to introduce, I have endeavoured to meet as far as possible the principle which is at stake, that is, to fix the maximum load line, but in fixing that line, I have endeavoured to secure the interests of our own shipping, and to prevent their being handicapped in a competition for the world's carrying trade, or for the trade which they now get in English ports. In the Imperial Act of 1890, the owner has no voice, whereas he has all the voice in the Bill of 1876, as to the fixing of the load line. I propose that, as we have no mathematical rule in this country, and no machinery to fix this even if we had the rule, so as to make it applicable to our shipping, we shall include the owner in the settling of the load line and associate with him a surveyor from the British Lloyds' Register, or from the French Bureau Veritas, or any authorized surveyor appointed; and, if they do not agree as to where the line shall be fixed, then the department shall take the responsibility, as it does in other matters which are represented in England by the Board of Trade. There are many other provisions suggested in regard to the safety of ships, and all the owners are agreed upon that point. The safety of their ships is important to them. Many safeguards have been thrown around them, and the only danger is that we might go too far and injure them. I know that the provisions of the Bill will be carefully scrutinized by the representatives of the shipping interests in this House, but, the House being aware that we are without any scientific calculations which have been applied in the rules adopted by the Board of Trade, I propose that, on the second reading of this Bill, it shall be referred to a select committee, composed chiefly of the representatives in this House of the shipping interests which are concerned, and, with the aid of that committee, I hope we will be able to meet the difficulty which now presents itself. It must be remembered that, on or after the 1st October, the rules of the British Board of Trade will apply, and without complying with those rules no vessel will be allowed to enter or clear from any British port. Those rules of the English Board of Trade are very stringent, and, to comply with them, the vessel must go into dock and suffer great detention and consequently great embarrassment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CATTLE TRADE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the fact that, in regard to the Bill respecting the Shipping of Live Stock which he proposes to allow to stand, the persons engaged in the cattle trade are very anxious to see some legislation passed. I have a telegram on the subject which I will send to him.

Mr. TUPPER. I intended to introduce this Bill to-day, but I find that there is a necessity to pass a resolution first, as it has to do with trade and commerce. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for promising to send me the telegram. I am also in receipt of a telegram stating that certain vessels have left our ports in such a condition in regard to the accommodation for cattle that should not have existed. But the Minister of Agriculture has, it seems to me, power to deal with the chief question at point—that is, the space allowed for the animals—under the Order in Council which is passed under the Act relating to Contagious Diseases of Animals, and I think the objection will be satisfactorily met, notwithstanding that this Bill is not now introduced.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I have to-day received a message from Montreal from some shippers there, who say there is an order sent there by which a space of only 2 ft. 6 in. is allowed on deck, and the shippers say their cattle are too large at this season of the year, especially distillery cattle, which have to go on deck, and are not able to go into any space less than 2 ft. 8 in.

Mr. TUPPER. I think that information is incorrect. The Minister of Agriculture told me instructions had been sent to insist upon 2 ft. 8 in. space on deck and below deck. That is the space which has been adopted by the American Board of Trade.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. This is the telegram :

"Dr. McEachran says: Has orders fixing space for cattle at 2 ft. 8 in. on main deck, and 2 ft. 6 in. on upper decks. This compromise not satisfactory. Impress on Minister the fact that all the exporters in Canada have signed requisition to have space on all decks fixed at 2 ft. 8 in. They own the cattle and should know what is necessary. It is their property that is being injured. Salesmen on other side report cattle arriving in bruised condition owing to overcrowding, and boats have sailed within past few days which no Montreal insurance inspector would pass, one losing eighteen head before reaching Quebec."

Which shows that they were right in their judgment.

Mr. SPROULE. I have also received a telegram——

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there is nothing before the House at present. All these messages may be sent to the Minister or spoken of when the Bill is introduced, but the Bill has not been introduced.

Mr. LAURIER. This is a very important matter, and at present we do not know exactly where we stand, whether the space is 2 ft. 6 in. or 2 ft. 8 in. I think that hon. gentlemen should have an opportunity of bringing this important question before the House.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not know whether it would be appropriate to mention this matter here now, but, seeing that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) did so, I thought it would be proper for me to read the telegram I received from Mr. Dunn, who went to Montreal with about 2,000 head of cattle to ship. I telegraphed him yesterday, after seeing the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Marine, who stated that they had telegraphed to the inspector there to see that the space allowed was 2 ft. 8 in. for each head of cattle. This is the reply I received from Mr. Dunn :

"Government inspector here says he has orders fixing space for cattle at 2 ft. 8 in. on main deck only, and 2 ft. 6 in. on upper deck. This compromise not satisfactory. Please impress upon Minister the fact that all the exporters in Canada have signed requisition to have space on all decks fixed at two feet eight inches. They own the cattle and should know what is necessary. It is their property that is being injured. Salesmen in England report cattle arriving in bruised condition, owing to the overcrowding, and boats have sailed within the past few days which no Montreal insurance inspector would pass, one steamer losing eighteen head before reaching Quebec."

Mr. TUPPER. I thought the House understood, if the hon. member did not, that this is immediately under the charge of the Minister of Agriculture in consequence of the provisions of the Act to which I referred, and I understood him distinctly to say that they had conversation with reference to the matter on several occasions, and that instructions had gone to insist upon a space of 2 ft. 8 in., whether above or below, and whether on the upper deck or not ; and I was surprised to hear some hon. gentlemen make a statement as to the instructions that were actually sent. I shall see the Minister and have the matter cleared up at once.

Mr. DENISON. Do I understand the Minister of Marine to say that those instructions were telegraphed yesterday or to-day ?

Mr. TUPPER. I understood that those instructions went yesterday. With reference to that I may be mistaken. I know the Minister told me, when I spoke to him about the matter to-day, that 2 ft. 8 in. was the space.

Mr. DENISON. I have a telegram also, and they say they can take only 2 ft. 6 in. on the upper deck, and that the inspector was acting on these instructions.

Mr. TUPPER. There has apparently been some confusion.

Mr. DENISON. If the Minister will say that he had been instructed to make it the same on the upper deck as on the lower, that would probably cover the whole thing.

Mr. TUPPER. I understand the Minister has already said that. I shall see him with reference to the instructions.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BOWELL moved for leave to introduce a Bill No. (105) respecting the Intercolonial Railway. He said: The Government railways on the mainland now comprise the Intercolonial Railway, the Eastern Extension, the Cape Breton and the Windsor Branch Railways. A separate set of books for capital account on each of these railways has been kept in the past up to this year, which entails a considerable amount of extra work and expense. The object of the Bill is to make the three railways last named a part of the Intercolonial Railway, by which means the branches, ferries and all connected with the mainland will simply be designated the Intercolonial Railway, which will do away with the necessity for keeping a number of books, and the employment of a number of clerks for that purpose.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LAURIER. Before you proceed with the next order, I would call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that in the statement which he gave to the House yesterday with regard to the formation of a new Cabinet, he made no statement whatever as to what would be the policy of the new Administration. I shall expect that to-morrow, or on any other day which would be convenient for him, he will give information to the House in that respect.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will probably be able to make some statement to-morrow, but I do not promise the hon. gentleman.

THE BUDGET SPEECH.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a convenient time to enquire of the hon. Minister of Finance when he intends to deliver the Budget speech, whether on Friday or on Tuesday next?

Mr. FOSTER. As a sop to my hon. friend, I will present him with the ten days' statement down to the 10th June, and say that the Budget speech will be delivered on Tuesday next.

SEALING IN BEHRING SEA.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether this Government had been advised by the Imperial Government that it is the intention of Her Majesty to issue, immediately after the passage of the Behring Sea Bill, now before the Imperial Parliament, an Order in Council as provided for in said Bill, prohibiting persons belonging to British ships from killing, taking, hunting, or attempting to kill, take or hunt, any seal in Behring Sea during the remainder of the present sealing season? If so, has Her Majesty been advised by this Government, that up to the 24th of May last, no less than forty-nine British or Canadian registered vessels, with a tonnage of 3,042 tons valued at $458,000, have been fitted out, and have cleared from Canadian ports for the purpose of sealing in Behring Sea during the present sealing season? If this Government have not so advised Her Majesty, will they do so at once by cable? so that no misapprehension may exist in the mind of Her Majesty as to the magnitude of the interests involved, and of the compensation that should be provided for to indemnify the vessel owners and crews for the losses they will necessarily sustain, if driven out of Behring's Sea before the end of the season.

Mr. TUPPER. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may say that while this Government has not been advised by the Imperial Government that it is the intention of Her Majesty to issue, immediately after the passage of the Behring Sea Bill now before the Imperial Parliament, an Order in Council as provided for in said Bill, prohibiting ships and those interested in taking seals, a convention has been entered into between the United States and the Government of Great Britain, which contemplates the passage of an order of that character, under the provisions of that Bill which has now become law. I may say that Her Majesty was advised by this Government of the great magnitude of the interests involved in Canada, so that no misapprehension exists as to that point, and as to the compensation that should be provided to indemnify the vessel owners and crews for the losses they would have necessarily to sustain.

QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following order issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, dated 19th May, 1891, quarantining for fifteen days lambs and swine imported from Canada:—

"Whereas, under the Act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, it has been provided by the Department of Agriculture, in order to protect the sheep and swine of the United States from contagious diseases now existing in foreign countries, that all sheep and swine imported from Great Britain and the Continent of Europe must be held in quarantine for a period of not less than fifteen days; and,

"Whereas the Dominion of Canada makes no requirement of quarantine for sheep and swine imported into that country from Great Britain and the Continent of Europe: and,

"Whereas to permit importations of these animals from Canada into the United States without quarantine would be dangerous to the stock interests of the United States, owing to the failure on the part of the Canadian authorities to enforce this measure of protection, and would enable importers to evade the quarantine of the United States ports: therefore, it is "Ordered, That all sheep or swine to be imported from Canada into the United States are hereby made subject to the regulations of the Department of Agriculture of date October 13, 1890, and the exception contained in the third and sixth regulations of said date, as applicable to Canadian sheep and swine, is hereby rescinded, and all animals named in said regulations, except cattle imported from Canada, are subject to the same conditions and requirements as if they were imported into the United States from Great Britain or the Continent of Europe.

(Sd.) "J. M. RUSK,
"Secretary."

If so, has the Government taken any steps with the view of having the order withdrawn, and what are they? If no action has yet been taken by the Government, does it intend at the earliest possible moment to take action to have, if possible, the quarantine removed? If so, will the Government remove the cause assigned by the United States Department for the issue of the said order, namely, the absence of quarantine by the Government of Canada against the importation of sheep and swine from Great Britain, by establishing a quarantine against such importations? If not, what line of action does it propose to adopt?

Mr. HAGGART. The attention of the Government having been drawn to the United States order relating to the quarantining of sheep and swine referred to, an Order in Council was passed on 6th instant amending the Canadian regulations, so as to place a quarantine of fifteen days on each sheep and swine entering Canada at the seaports of Canada (which is a similar quarantine arrangement to that which the United States itself possesses), instead of a simple inspection. This order has been published in the Canada Gazette, and officially communicated to the United States Government.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the Government has any intention of moving the adoption, during the present session, of a measure prohibiting the sale by wholesale of intoxicating liquors, within the compass of any municipality in which the municipal authorities have passed a regulation to the same effect?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In the opinion of the Government, this is a matter which should not be pressed on the municipal authorities.

Mr. AMYOT. That is not the question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that it is, for the hon. gentleman enquires whether the Government will pass a law contingent on the acts of the municipal authorities.

INDIAN AGENT AT SUTTON WEST.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Out of what moneys did they pay the sum of $181.65, being expenses incurred by the Government in connection with an investigation held into the conduct of the Indian Agent at Sutton West in 1885?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The sum of $141.65 was paid out of contingencies, and $40 out of the Indian land management fund, making a total of $181.65.

VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

Mr. ALLISON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make a grant of land to each of the survivors of the volunteers who assisted in suppressing the rebellion in Canada in 1837-38?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to make a grant of land to each of the survivors of the volunteers who assisted in suppressing the rebellion in Canada in 1837-38, as we have always considered, and this House has always considered, this is a matter affecting the old Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada previous to Confederation.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, When was the Electoral Franchise Act passed? How many times has it been amended since? How many times have the lists been revised? How many times suspended? Have the revisions and suspensions occurred alternately? Were revisions promised which did not take place? If so, why? Will the lists be revised this year? What has been the cost of each revision? What the total cost? Was anything paid for the lists in seasons when suspended? If so, how much?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Electoral Franchise Act was passed in 1885. It has been amended three times. The lists have been revised three times. The operation of the Act has been twice suspended. The revisions and suspensions have not occurred alternately. Revisions were not promised that did not take place. The lists will in all probability be revised this year. The cost of each revision has been already stated fully to Parliament. A small sum was paid, the amount of which I am not in a position to state this afternoon, for lists during one year when the revision was suspended, this amount being necessary for preliminary expenses which had been incurred before the introduction of the Bill to suspend the operation of the Act

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman has not given the amount paid when the revisions were suspended.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I said I was not able to state this afternoon the amount so paid; but I will give it subsequently.

BREAKWATER AT CENTREVILLE, N.S.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Has the Government received any report from their engineer as to the amount required to repair the breakwater at Centreville, Digby County, N.S.? If so, is it their intention to allow the breakwater to remain as it is, risking the total destruction of the same by the next winter's gale? Or will there be placed in the Supplementary Estimates an appropriation sufficient to save it from destruction?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I sent to my department for information in this matter, and received the following answer: No report has been received as to the amount required to repair the breakwater at Centreville, nor has any information been received by the department relating to the state of that work.

POST OFFICE BOX AT KINGSTON.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Who was, on or about the 28th May, 1889, the lessee of box No. 524, in the post office at Kingston, Ont.; and what was the name of the person who appeared on the books of the post office as having paid the annual rental of that box?

Mr. HAGGART. The department has no knowledge as to who was the lessee of that box at Kingston post office.

WALKERTON POST OFFICE.

Mr. TRUAX asked, Has the contract for fitting up the interior of the Walkerton post office been awarded? If not, will it be let by public tender, and when? Will notice be given in the local papers as to the time for receiving tenders?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A contract has not been given. It is usual to give such work to the party who has the contract for the erection of the building, when his work is satisfactory, and the work is given at architect's estimates. Of course, the notices referred to will not appear in the local papers.

DRILL SHED AT TORONTO.

Mr. COCKBURN asked, 1. Have any contracts been awarded in connection with the erection of the drill shed in the city of Toronto? If so, for what parts of the work and who are the contractors? 2. If any contracts have been awarded, when is the work to proceed? 3. Have tenders been asked for the other parts of the work yet? If not, when will the Government advertize for tenders?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To the first portion of the question, the answer is, yes. To the second portion, the answer is, that a contract has been let for the excavations to Davis & Son. To the third portion of the question, the answer is, that the work will be proceeded with on 1st August. To the last question the answer is: Tenders have not been asked for the other parts of the work yet, but they will be called for within the next eight or ten days.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, In what newspapers is the table showing the hours of the arrival and departure of the mails for the Ottawa post office published? What amount is paid to each of the said newspapers yearly for publishing the said table? Is the table inserted in any French newspaper? If not, why not; and if so published, what is the name of the newspaper and the yearly sum paid for the service?

Mr. HAGGART. The time table showing the hours of arrival and departure of the mails for the Ottawa post office is published in the following newspapers:—Citizen, $100 per annum; Journal, $100 per annum; United Canada, $50 per annum. The time table was also published in Le Canada until the 30th April, 1891, at $50 per annum.

WELLAND CANAL—SURPLUS WATER.

Mr. GIBSON moved for:

Copies of all petitions, letters and communications from the city of St. Catharines, and other municipalities on the Welland Canal, or from any persons or corporations, for the privilege of using surplus water from said canal for manufacturing or other purposes; and of the reports of Engineers of Canals thereon, and the replies of the Government to all such applications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving for this return I desire to say a few words regarding the vast quantity of waste water that is continually passing through the waste weirs of the new Welland Canal, that might with profit to the country be used for manufacturing purposes. In fact, sufficient water could easily be spared to run several factories according to their requirements at each one of the twenty-four regulating basins, without, in my opinion, affecting the efficiency of the canal. If encouragement were given by the Government for the free use of water for a few years, or at a nominal rental, until industries were securely established, there is every reason to believe that the Welland Canal would be the means of making that section of the province a veritable hive of industry. Within a very few miles of the Welland Canal, on the American side of the Niagara River, an aqueduct or tunnel is in course of construction for manufacturing purposes, which, I understand, will cost about $3,000,000. Now, Sir, we have a much better supply of water running to waste, and connections with the regulating basins of the new Welland Canal could be made by the Government, and the cost would be gladly paid for by parties requiring the use of water. I understand that investigations have already been made by the engineers of the department, as to the practicability of supplying water to mills and manufactories along the canal without affecting navigation, and I think it is time that the matter should be brought to a practical issue and the public fully informed thereon. It may be said that several sites on the old canal are at present unoccupied, but it must be borne in mind that the large vessels now passing up and down on the lakes cannot pass through the old canal, so that for all practical purposes the old canal is simply fit for a mill-race. I was pleased to hear the late right hon. Minister of Railways and Canals state that my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) was mistaken as to the reasons for the water being let off the new canal. But I am afraid, Sir, that the right hon. the late First Minister was not furnished with the exact reasons, or, I am sure, he would never have given his consent to expose the embankments of the canal and basins, and the lock and weir masonry, to the winter frost, even to secure a political victory. A public work that cost the country millions of dollars, a work of so much value and importance, should not have been exposed just because an election was taking place. This work stands to-day a credit to the memory of the late Mr. Page and his able assistants, Messrs. Monro and Thompson; a work which Mr. Page often said to me would be his monument after he had passed away. I am sure, Sir, that if Mr. Page were then living he would not have given his consent to run the water off the canal during the winter months. It never was done before, and even on the old canal the work of repairs is not commenced until spring, immediately before the opening of navigation, for the reasons I have just given. If this care is exercised upon the old canal, how much greater care should be taken with the works of the new one. There was no excuse for letting the water off, as far as repairs were required; because four years ago during the work of the enlargement every part of the canal was thoroughly overhauled and renewed, and so perfect were the specifications and schedules covering the works made by the late Mr. Page, that the Government did not require to arbitrate on a single case from sections A to J. Being one of the contractors I know whereof I speak, and I have to add that it was the talk of the Counties of Lincoln and Welland, that letting off the water was a wilful waste of public money. The only repairs that was really done when the water was let off was to fix up the banks damaged by their exposure to the frosts of winter during the time the water was let out of the canal, and the only qualification required to secure work was a promise to vote for the Government candidate.

Motion agreed to.

MINING MACHINERY—FREE ENTRY INTO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARA moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Customs and the Collector of Customs at Kootenay Lake, and between the Minister of Customs and any other person, relating to the admission of mining machinery into the Kootenay Lake district free of duty. Also copies of the instructions of the Minister of Customs to the Collector of Customs at Kootenay River, referring to the free admission of mining machinery.

He said: My object in asking for this correspondence is to ascertain where the difficulty lies in respect to the admission of mining machinery into the Kootenay Lake district free of duty. At the close of last session, before leaving here, I received assurances from the hon. Minister of Customs that every facility would be given to the mine owners on Kootenay Lake to bring in mining machinery free of duty, and that the most liberal construction would be placed on the law. I am informed that instead of that being done, so many obstacles have been placed in the way of the mine owners that they have ceased to take advantage of the liberal Act passed last session. I am also informed that in one case, six months after the machinery was entered, and after it had changed hands, the collector of Customs, in the most arbitrary manner, wrote to the mine owners stating that unless the duty was paid immediately the machinery would be seized; and to prevent the machinery being seized and the mine being closed down, the duties were paid under protest. There is an impression in the Kootenay Lake district that the department is responsible for these obstacles being placed in the way of the free importation of mining machinery. The correspondence I ask for will, no doubt, show where the difficulty lies.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down all the correspondence that has taken place between the department and those who are interested in the introduction of mining machinery into Canada, either in the Kootenay district or in any other portion of the Dominion; nor is there any objection to bringing down the instructions. On the contrary, I shall be very much pleased to do so, when not only the House but the country generally will know what has been done by the department in this respect. I think it will be found that the difficulties and delays which have arisen in the passage of what is termed mining machinery are due to the difficulty of establishing whether such machinery is manufactured in Canada or not. With the view of preventing similar difficulties in future, I had an Order in Council passed requiring importers to make an affidavit that the machinery imported is for the purposes of mining, and that it is not made in Canada; and upon an affidavit of that kind being produced, no delay that I am aware of has taken place in the admission of the machinery into the country. On the contrary, the machinery has been admitted, the duty has been exacted, and afterwards when the necessary affidavit has been made a refund of the duty has been made; and if there are any such cases in the Kootenay district, it will be the duty of the Government to see that the amount is returned to the parties making the importation. The intention, not only of the Government, but of the House, in making that change in the tariff was to encourage, as far as practicable, mining operations in this country, while at the same time guarding against the introduction of such machinery interfering with Canadian enterprise.

Motion agreed to.

NEW CARLISLE WHARF.

Mr. FAUVEL moved for:

Return of all payments and cost of construction of the New Carlisle wharf, including amount paid to the Crown Lands Department and owners of timber limits in the County of Bonaventure, for timber used on the said works.

He said: The wharf referred to in this motion has been in course of construction for the last ten years, and I must say it has been most miserably built. In the County of Bonaventure we have three public wharves on which during the last two years the Government have exacted wharfage dues, whereas I find, on asking my friends in the House, that there are several counties in the province where the Government do not exact similar wharfage dues. I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Public Works what is the reason he subjects the County of Bonaventure to these tolls?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not know the correctness of the statement for which I suppose the hon. gentleman has authority, but if there are some wharves on which wharfage dues are not charged, I have no doubt that upon my colleague's attention being called to the matter, he will see that in future we shall have the advantage of similar tolls being collected there.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I must protest against the Government's policy of charging wharfage on farmers' goods deposited on the St. Lawrence River wharves. The Government, while boasting the prosperity they claim to have created in the country, is acting in this in antagonism with commerce and free navigation, in the course of which it puts obstacles by means of such dues. The Government levies taxes right and left by means of which it exercises political persecution. It is not those who support it or who are in favour of its policy, it is not the blind partisans of the Administration who suffer from them, but its political opponents. The farmers' goods are allowed to be put on board the boats, and then advantage is taken of that for batches of actions to be taken against our friends. It is not public revenue that is cared for—this barely brings a few paltry dollars: but the object is to encourage a few lawyers who advocate its policy, as well as to persecute the friends of the Opposition. I say that this conduct of the Government is not worthy of the reputation they pretend to have in this country; and if the Government build wharves here and there with the object of using them as means of persecution and as fetters for trade, it certainly does not deserve the support of the population. For my part, I denounce it. I say that when these wharves were built it was understood that the farmers would have the free use of them; and now the practice of charging them three or four cents per head of cattle or box of goods, is not calculated to encourage agriculture, and is contrary to the principles of the protective policy of the Government.

Mr. TUPPER. I believe, although I did not gather it from the notice of this motion, that I have some connection with the subject to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. While my department does not construct these wharves or look after their repair, it devolves on my department to do that horrible work which the hon. gentleman has been so vehemently denouncing—to collect the tolls from the vessels using those wharves. I have not heard before in Parliament any denunciation of the policy of the Government in collecting a small toll in order to pay some man to look after each wharf, and this toll, I may say, is fixed in the same manner for all the different wharves, under regulation by Order in Council. There is not a very handsome revenue from those wharves, as will be seen by the annual return published in the Marine Report. In most cases, the wharfinger is allowed twenty-five per cent. of the toll, so as to enable us to secure the services of some man to look after the wharf. The neglect to which the hon. gentleman has alluded in connection with the imposition of these tolls, is due chiefly to the fact that, in the Province of Quebec, I have found it exceedingly difficult, owing to various causes, to get men to undertake the work of wharfinger for the very small remuneration allowed them, there being no remuneration at all when there are no receipts.

Mr. LISTER. There are no wharves of that kind in the country.

Mr. TUPPER. There are some, and a case was brought up the other day from Prince Edward Island, in which it was stated ships used the wharves and paid no fees; but, so far as the department is concerned, I can assure the House that no attempt, direct or indirect, is made to favour any person or class of persons who use these wharves, the one great difficulty being to get people to act as wharfingers for the small pittance they receive in most cases. In many places, of course, the wharves are a great necessity, and the people along the coast have been most anxious to have them; and in some places the Federal Government took charge of the wharves built by the old provinces; but after the wharves are built, the demand naturally arises that they should be maintained free of charge to shipping. That demand, however, has never been seriously advocated. In some cases it would work great injustice to the owners of private wharves, and the system now administered is one that has prevailed from the beginning.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I also must protest against the action of the Government in the matter of wharf dues. There are two wharves in my county. Until after the election not much was said about the levying of dues. The wharfingers had been chosen among the Conservative chiefs, and in election time they made it understood to their friends, on the hustings or otherwise, that no tolls would be collected on the wharves. But as soon as the elections were over, the first thing done was to appoint a lawyer for the collection of the dues and the prosecution of the people who had used the wharves, especially the Liberals. The hon. Minister of Marine says that no protests have been made before the House about the collection of these dues. It is quite possible; but it is perfectly certain that the system was denounced to the department. Two years ago, and last year again, I myself wrote several letters on the matter, and I caused to be sent by the municipal councils of the parishes of Berthier and Crane Island, petitions praying for the removal of these wharfages. In the parish of Berthier, what do we find to have been done? A wharf was built, and the municipality was caused to build a road of at least ten arpents to reach this wharf, with the promise that nothing should be paid for the use of the wharf. The municipality had to spend considerable sums of money to build this road, and then the Conservative chief who was appointed wharfinger, takes the people by the throat and makes them pay three or four cents to put an animal, a tub of butter or a bag of grain on the wharf. This should not be, all the less, since the Minister of Marine gives no good reason for the continuance of such a system. He says the receipts are so small that he can find no one to keep the wharf for its tolls. Well, if the revenue is so petty, the system should certainly be discontinued: these dues should not be kept as an arm over the heads of the farmers, and the arm then handed for political purposes to the Conservative chiefs in the parishes where such wharves are in existence, who will say to the farmers: "If you vote for the Government, I, the wharfinger, will make efforts to save you from that tax." There are no reasons for the maintenance of that tax, which is rather an encumbrance than an advantage—for when people reach the wharf they have enough to do to see to their horses and their cattle without having to seek the wharfinger to pay him two cents, ten cents or a shilling, for the privilege of putting their goods on the wharf. Therefore there is no reason for the continuance of these wharfage dues and the Government ought to abolish them. As to the parish of Berthier, I specially protest against the existing state of things: for, when the Government built the wharf, it obtained from the municipality that a road should be built to reach it, by promising the people of the parish that they would never have to pay a cent for the use of the wharf. But now that the people have built this road at a great expense, and that they have put it in a fine condition for the benefit of the wharf, they are made to pay the wharfage. Under such circumstances, I believe that the Government should change its policy, and abolish this system of taxes altogether.

Mr. PERRY. The other day I asked the Minister of Marine if the wharfinger at Tignish had made a return. The hon. gentleman said no, but that he would write for it, and I am not aware that it has come yet. What is the reason? I suppose it is that if the wharfinger were to send a correct return, the name of every unfortunate Grit who has had to use that wharf would be down as having paid his fees, while not a single Tory would find a place in it. Is it honest that such a state of things should be allowed to exist? I know that the Liberals have been made to pay their taxes for the use of that wharf, and that the Tories have gone scot free. Is that the policy of the department? Does the hon. gentleman intend to allow this year to pass, as he has allowed last year, without having any return from that harbour master? I think it is high time that gentleman should be dismissed; for if he intends following up the course he has hitherto pursued much longer, there will be a small rebellion down there. The breakwater there is more for the benefit and advantage of the fishermen of New Brunswick, who are well represented here—well, I do not know that they are much represented here this session. I went there one day last winter during a storm, and saw the harbour filled up so that you could not pass your hand between the crafts. There were ninety-five boats there, and ten outside, and twenty-five had to go to Alberton, and our boats were inside and could not get out, and so they lost their morning's fishing. Is there any use in having a harbour master there when such a thing as that takes place? I wrote to the member representing the constituency of Gloucester—I think his name is Burns—asking him to use his influence with the Government to get them to do something, either to dredge the harbour or do something so as to allow the smaller boats to get out in the morning. He promised me that he would do everything in his power, and said he was all-powerful with the Government. I have not seen him this session, and I am afraid to approach the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It would be no use anyway.

Mr. PERRY. Yes, it would be no use; he is so cross; but I hope, if I get this report, I will be able to show this House how the people of Tignish are affected in regard to politics. I know all these vessels, and who owns them, and the side of politics they belong to, and I think I will be able to convince the Minister of Marine that his friends are made political gods of, and that the Liberals there are sacrificed in order to gratify the spite which the Tories have against Liberals. It is not just. When a poor man sends his sheep, cows or produce across the line in order to purchase in return flour or lumber, he is heavily taxed, and what he brings back is heavily taxed. I would not wonder so much if all were treated alike, but a poor man cannot get a blanket from across the line without having to pay a heavy tax upon it. This is the way in which we are treated in Tignish, but the Minister of Marine will sit there quietly and will not try to show that he has swollen the treasury of the Dominion of Canada by this means, because he will give us no information whatever. We have no information except what the Minister is inclined to give us. Is this the kind of Government we have? I am not prepared to submit to this much longer, nor are my people inclined to submit to it. I should not wonder one day or another, on a dry day, to see them give him a little wetting to cool him off. I hope the Minister will at once see that this return is laid before the House, that there will be no more humbugging about it. That report ought to have been here in the month of January or February, but it is not here yet. At all events I have not seen it. There was also a return which I moved for more than a month ago in reference to the Stanley, and that is not here yet. How can members discharge their duties properly when they are kept in the dark, when Ministers of the Crown will not give information they are legally bound to give? I say that we, representing the Opposition, have a duty to perform, and we are willing to perform it, but the fact is that the Government are afraid of the Opposition. I hope the Minister will at once cause this report to be laid before the House.

Mr. LISTER. I understand the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to make a statement that the compensation paid to those who are in charge of docks and wharves is 25 per cent. of the annual receipts.

Mr. TUPPER. As a general rule.

Mr. LISTER. Then there are exceptions?

Mr. TUPPER. Where the receipts are so small that it would not induce anyone to act, the amount is sometimes 50 per cent.

Mr. LISTER. Since I have been a member of this House, I have heard complaints constantly, session after session, from the Maritime Provinces as to their treatment in regard to public works constructed by the Government and in the hands of the Government. It seems that on the inland lakes of this country they have adopted the same principle, that is, of constructing works at certain ports on the upper lakes according to circumstances of a political character. The statement made by the Minister of Marine justifies to the fullest extent the charges which have been made against the Government from time to time, that these public works have been constructed in order to influence the electors. We know that the policy of the Government in the past, in order to secure support from different parts of the country, has been to erect custom houses and post offices where they were not required and where the revenue did not entitle those places to have them, while in other places that kind of work has been neglected, if not refused, simply because those constituencies have not returned members to support the Government. The Minister of Public Works knows that that is the case. So far as docks are concerned on the Sault Ste. Marie river and on Lake Superior, the Government have erected docks particularly at Sault Ste. Marie. There was a gentleman who ran in support of the Government, and the Government purchased his dock at an enormous cost, erected another dock in its place at a cost of from $5,000 to $10,000 and placed that gentleman in charge of the dock, as I am told by residents of that place, at a fixed salary. Not only that, but they appointed that gentleman's brother as Custom-house officer at that place, and the result is that anyone who desires to land goods at Sault Ste. Marie must go to the public dock. There are other docks there built by private enterprise, but they are of no value to the owners because, in consequence of the policy of the Government, it is an inconvenience for any shipping to go there. The consequence is that what was, in effect, public property is to-day, for all practical purposes, the property of this individual, although it has been built by the Government, with the money of the people of this country. At St. Joseph Island the same state of affairs exists. There the Government, whose object and motive are perfectly manifest, built a very expensive dock, which should have been built by private enterprise. To-day the gentleman who is the practical owner of that dock, collects the fees and attends to it, and I am told he is paid a salary; in other words, the Government has, with the money of the people of this country, built what he was not enterprising enough, apparently, to build for himself, they constructed a dock with a very large sum of money; and to-day this individual owns what the country has paid for. I point out these things because there has been, and there is, a strong feeling in certain sections of the country that private enterprise should not be annihilated and destroyed by the Government stepping in and doing what private enterprise ought to do, doing what, in effect, there is no necessity for, inasmuch as other wharves exist in several places that offer all needed facilities, and their value is reduced very much, if not entirely destroyed, by the action of the Government. Sir, these things should not be encouraged. People should not resort to the Government for aid in every enterprise which private individuals should undertake. Private enterprise must, to a certain extent, meet these cases, and the effect of the Government policy is prejudicial and injurious to a large section of the country. So far as I can see there can be no possible justification or excuse for the Government except the desire to expend public money in order to influence the electorate of a certain section.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no information upon any of the points to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. I desire to say, however, that he has been misinformed with reference to the necessity of vessels, or any persons, being compelled to go to the public dock when they bring goods into the country. There are at present three or four officers appointed for the express purpose of attending the different docks, receiving entries and examining dutiable goods when they are brought in from the United States. If the hon. gentleman's information, with reference to other matters, be no more correct than that which refers to the Customs, he has been sadly misled as to the facts in connection with the construction of these docks, as well as to facts in connection with their management. As I have already stated, I do not desire to refer to the other points alluded to by the hon. gentleman, because I have no official or personal knowledge of them; but I desire to assure him that he is in error, he has been misinformed, with reference to the management of the Customs Department at Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. LISTER. I am making no charge against the Customs Department, but I only ask, why, if there are other docks at Sault Ste. Marie, should there be a Government dock there at all? The public have opportunities of landing their goods already, and why, in the name of common sense, should the Government go to work and build a Government dock at all? This dock was owned by the gentleman I speak of. He was the owner of it before the Government took it over, and they went to work and built a new wharf.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Customs does not answer one part of my hon. friend's statement. I understood the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) to say that the Custom-house officer at Sault Ste. Marie is a brother of the present owner or lessee of the dock, or is a partner of the lessee or owner of the dock. Is that the case?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not hear the hon. gentleman say that. In the first place, the hon. member for Lambton asked no question whatever. I merely got up to make an explanation, so far as his reference to the Customs Department was concerned. He did say, however, that the Collector of Customs was a brother of the owner of the dock.

Mr. MULOCK. A partner.

Mr. BOWELL. No, I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that. I did not understand him to say that he was the partner of the owner of the dock.

Mr. LISTER. What I did say was that the de facto owner of the dock is the brother of the Custom-house officer.

Mr. BOWELL. Can you give me the name of the owner of the dock?

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Plummer.

Mr. BOWELL. A Mr. Plummer—I do not know his Christian name—is the Collector of Customs at Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Plummer is the owner of this dock.

Mr. MULOCK. I have some information on the subject which I will bring up at a later period; and when I do bring it up, in order that the Minister may be able to deal with it, I will tell him now that the papers which I have here show, if I have caught the point correctly, that the two gentlemen, the Messrs. Plummer, are in partnership in Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. BOWELL. In mercantile business?

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know; at all events, they are in business that involves the importation of articles at that point. I am informed by these documents that one of these gentlemen is the Custom-house officer, and the other imports through this Government dock. It is further suggested that the one who imports receives favours through the Custom-house officer, and it is further stated in these papers that underneath the dock which the Government has placed in the custody of the Custom-house officer, the one who imports has facilities for bringing in small crews who are able to proceed under the shelter of this dock, and when they are under the dock they are practically beyond the reach of the Custom-house officers.

Mr. BOWELL. I will only say to the hon. gentleman that if the statements which he has made are true, the collector will be subject to dismissal. In the first place, his alleged conduct is directly opposed to the provisions of the Audit Act, which prevents a man receiving a certain salary, from entering into any other business. In all cases where an officer receives a salary beyond a certain amount, he is strictly precluded by law from being connected with, or interested in, importations. I may add, for the information of the House, that Mr. Plummer, brother of the collector is a merchant of long standing at the Sault. I have no knowledge, nor has the department, that his brother is a partner with him, or has any connection whatever with the business. I can only repeat that if the allegations made by the hon. gentleman are substantiated, the collector will be subject to dismissal.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not making the allegations on my own authority.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the pier at Wood Islands, which is an important public work in Prince Edward Island. I had the honour, I think last year and the year before, of calling his attention to the condition of that work. I pointed out to him that for the last ten or twelve years the Government had been making the repairs by day work, spending only one or two thousand dollars upon it. I pointed out to him the fact, which I know from personal observation last year, that the Wood Islands breakwater at that time was in a very dilapidated condition, although the Government were charging wharfage for everything landed at that wharf. As a matter of fact a horse and cart could not be taken within half a mile of that part of the breakwater where vessels land their goods. When any article was landed from a schooner it had to be carried on the backs of men over the breakwater till it reached the upper portion, where it was placed in a cart. This was most cruel and intolerable. I was promised by the department that steps would be taken to place this most important work in an efficient condition. I am glad to know that an engineer of the department proceeded there last year, Mr. Brown, I think was his name, and he no doubt made a report to the department as to the condition of the breakwater. The hon. Minister will no doubt find, although I have not seen a report or Mr. Brown since, that the condition of affairs was very much as I stated it from my place last year. I cannot allow the session to pass without bringing the condition of this breakwater in a very formal way before the attention of the House, unless some assurance is given, as I hope it will be, that the Government intend to place that wharf or breakwater in efficient repair. The people in the immediate vicinity of that work have to endure more than any people I know of in the Island as regards shipping. They have no harbour and no breakwater within miles of them, except this one, and it has been allowed to gradually get out of repair until to-day it is hardly any use whatever. I hope, therefore, the suggestion which I and my colleague made last year in regard to the repairing of this breakwater, backed up, as no doubt it is by the report of the engineer sent by the department, will have the effect of inducing the Minister of Public Works, not to expend a thousand dollars on repairs to be done by day work, because the money might as well be thrown into the sea, but to expend such sum as the engineer reports to be necessary to place it in a fairly efficient condition. If the Minister will do that, he will confer a great boon on the people in that vicinity, and do a simple act of justice to a long-suffering people.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I remember the hon. gentleman made a remark to that effect last year, and he is perfectly right in stating that an officer of my department, I think Mr. Brown, was sent to report on the matter. As I was unable during three or four months to attend to my official work, being very unwell, I cannot say what the report was. I cannot say whether the work has not been repaired to a certain extent; but I know that after the remarks last year by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh), I gave orders that such small repairs should be done as, I understand, the Local Government would have done, tenders being called and the contract being given to the lowest bidder. I think that was done last season. At all events, those were my instructions. I shall take a special note of it.

Mr. WELSH. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick. For four years I have brought up this question every session. Hon. members may talk about the Minister's promise; he has given me his promise verbally and in writing, and he has broken his word; and if there ever was a dead-meat business brought before this House it is this, and it is the most false act ever perpetrated against Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELSH. I will rise and say what I think. If I were to express my feelings in regard to the way the Minister has treated the Island in the matter of this breakwater, my remarks would not be very complimentary to him or to the Government.

Mr. BOWERS. While the subject of breakwaters is before the House, I desire to call attention to several breakwaters in Digby County, N.S., which are suffering for lack of repairs. At Centreville there is a wharf which cost several thousand dollars. A sum of $500 or $600 is required to place it in repair. If this is not expended, $5,000 or $6,000 will be required at some future time to place a new wharf there. At Comeauville, in Digby, there is a wharf which requires an expenditure of $1,000 or $1,500 to place it in a proper condition of repair. At Salmon River the inhabitants have asked several years for an addition to their breakwater, and which has been promised them several times. For lack of the necessary accommodation trade suffers, as the vessels cannot load their cargoes for the American or other markets. I also call his attention to the condition of the wharf at Meteghan, for which $3,000 will be required to place it in repair. This is a very important work. A large sum of money has been expended in erecting a breakwater outside the wharf, but certain portions of the wharf inside of the breakwater have become out of repair. The inhabitants do not object to pay wharfage, provided the Government place the wharves in such a state of repair that they can be used. I hope that as the Government's attention has now been called to those works they will do something towards the wharves in Digby County, which county has a seaboard of 125 miles and requires a large number of these public works.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH SHORE RAILWAY.

Mr. LANGELIER moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, papers, reports and documents in relation to the returning of the debentures of the North Shore Railway Company.

He said: During the session of 1885, it will be remembered, a discussion took place regarding the Short Line Railway. It will be in the recollection of hon. members that two principal lines were proposed for a short line railway from Montreal to the sea. One was through the city of Quebec, involving the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence River. The other, and it was the one adopted by the Government for reasons which are very well known, was through Sherbrooke. When the question was under discussion, the Minister of Public Works, speaking for the Government, pretended that he deeply regretted that the Government could not adopt the route by the city of Quebec, but he said they had adopted the shortest route, and that was through Sherbrooke. It appears now that the shortest line was not through Sherbrooke, and, in fact, that the line through Sherbrooke was neither the shortest nor the best. It was the worst and not the shortest. But we will pass that by. On that occasion there was a very strong feeling expressed in favour of the route by way of the city of Quebec by members from that part of the country supporting the Government. Two members especially were very active in their opposition to the line through Sherbrooke and in support of the line through Quebec: they were the then hon. member for Montmagny and the then hon. member for Dorchester. In order to give them some consolation the Government stated that they had taken steps to secure to the city of Quebec the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, in order to effect that purpose, the Government proposed to the House a grant of $1,500,000. I must say at once that $1,000,000 of that amount was only a revote, it having been voted at a previous session. The Minister of Public Works, explaining the policy of the Government, stated the manner in which the money was to be used. He said that it was proposed with that money to secure the control of the North Shore Railway, that is to say the portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway between St. Martin's Junction and Quebec, which was then the property of the Grand Trunk. Everyone knows the history of the construction of that line, and it is not a history very much to the credit of the then Government of Quebec. Before the construction of that line, we had only the Grand Trunk Railway between Quebec and Montreal, and it was stated over and over again, when the North Shore Railway was about to be built, and as a reason for the construction of that line, that it would be a Government railway, that it would be a competitor to the Grand Trunk Railway and consequently advantageous to the city of Quebec. However, the line was scarcely finished when in 1882, under the Administration of the present Secretary of State at Quebec, a law was passed confirming a sale made by the Government of the Province of Quebec to a company authorized by the same statute, which was called the North Shore Railway Company. By the Act creating the company in question, it was authorized to issue second mortgages on the railway, because the first mortgage was in order to secure the purchase money which was to remain due to the Government of the Province of Quebec. I repeat again, that the Minister of Public Works on that occasion, in 1885, solemnly promised that the $1,500,000, which he was then proposing the House should vote, was to secure the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at the city of Quebec. I forgot to mention that this line which had been publicly proclaimed as a competing line to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, was afterwards sold to the Grand Trunk Railway Company by the North Shore Railway Company. That very same company which had obtained control of the railway a few months afterwards, sold it to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and Quebec was in a worse position than ever it had been before so far as communication with Montreal was concerned. Such was the state of facts when the Act of 1885 was passed. The Minister of Public Works explained to the House then, that with the $1,500,000 which he asked Parliament to vote, the Government would try to secure control of the North Shore Railway from the Grand Trunk Railway, which then owned and ran the North Shore Railway, and he added that if the Government could not secure control of the North Shore Railway they would use the $1,500,000 to subsidize another line which would be built between Quebec and Montreal. That would, of course, compel the Grand Trunk Railway to sell the railway in favour of the Government; and after the session of Parliament the Government succeeded in getting control of the North Shore Railway. They paid $500,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway Company; $250,000 to recoup the Grand Trunk Railway of what it had paid to the North Shore Railway Company, or rather, I should say, to Senator Senecal, because he was nearly the whole company himself, and $250,000, the profit of the Grand Trunk Railway, on the transaction which they had made with the North Shore Railway Company. I am giving these sums in round numbers. There then remained a sum of $1,000,000 of the money voted in 1885, and what did the Government do with this money? It had never been contemplated by this House that the money voted would be used to pay Senator Senecal's debts to the Bank of Montreal or to any other bank or individual, but the Government found that Mr. Senecal's company had issued debentures for a certain amount and nearly $1,100,000 had been pledged as collateral to the Bank of Montreal for a loan to Mr. Senecal. The Government acquitted the debt of Mr. Senecal to the Bank of Montreal, and with this money which was to be used in the interest of the city of Quebec, they bought these debentures in order to release the debt of Mr. Senecal to the Bank of Montreal. The result of this is, that up to the present moment the Government are holding these debentures, for which, I think, they paid $970,000, so that there remains nothing of the $1,000,000 which was to be used for the city of Quebec and to secure for that city the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. What has been the consequence of all this? Every one can see that it would be in the interest of the city of Quebec that the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway line should be developed, but by the arrangement which was entered into between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, coupled with the fact I have just mentioned in reference to that debenture indebtedness of nearly $1,000,000, the city of Quebec is suffering. It is now in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company not to develop the traffic on that portion of their line, but rather to prevent its development, and why: for this reason, that under the arrangement entered into the Canadian Pacific Railway Company must take from the gross receipts of the railway, first, whatever is necessary to pay the running expenses of the line; then, whatever sum is necessary to pay the interest that is due to the Government of the Province of Quebec on the balance of the purchase money, which, I think, is some $3,500,000; and if any surplus remains it must be used to pay 5 per cent. interest to the Government on these debentures which they got by releasing Mr. Senecal's indebtedness to the Bank of Montreal. The result is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company see very well that if they develop the traffic on the North Shore line it will not be to their advantage at all, for it would be simply to enhance the price of these debentures. Of course the Canadian Pacific Railway must be anxious to get hold of the debentures in question to discharge the mortgage which they bear on the railway, and they see very well that if they give themselves any trouble to develop the traffic and increase the receipts of the railway between Quebec and Montreal, they would be enhancing the debentures which they want to get hold of. The result has been practically ruinous to Quebec, for instead of having that great railway company working to develop the trade and commerce of the localities with which it is connected, it is doing its best not to extend the traffic between Quebec and Montreal. Another very serious consequence is, that under that arrangement the Government seem to be so very anxious to secure the 5 per cent. interest on their debentures, that they do not want the Canadian Pacific Railway to be at liberty to spend too much money for the maintenance of the road, and the company is not even allowed to build a new bridge or to purchase new rolling stock. At one time we were threatened with a complete stoppage of traffic on the North Shore road, because the bridge engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway reported to that company, as was stated to this House last session, that two bridges were dangerous and that the Pont Rouge bridge, 24 miles from Quebec, was so dangerous that the engineer suggested to the Canadian Pacific Railway to completely stop the running of trains on that line. Eventually the company obtained permission from the Government to rebuild that bridge at an expense of some $17,000. I have learned from some of the highest officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway that they have had the greatest difficulty in getting the repayment of that money out of the $1,000,000 which remains, and which should have been used for that purpose. Another bridge which became dangerous was the Portneuf bridge, and although there were two years of negotiations on the subject the Government failed to repair it. These facts, with many others, will give an idea of the way in which the city of Quebec has been treated. I need not tell the House that the release of the $1,000,000 of debentures has been a burning question with the citizens of Quebec. They are a dead load, not only on the Canadian Pacific Railway, but on the trade and commerce of the city; and the city council, the board of trade, and almost all the important commercial men of the city have been urging the Government during the last three or four years to release them. Promises were made to every delegation that came to Ottawa on the subject, but nothing was done. The elections of this year came on. It had been stated that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could obtain the release of that indebtedness they were prepared to use the money in improving the road, building elevators on the Louise embankment, repairing the bridges and increasing and improving the rolling stock of the railway; and I am told on good authority that such is the present intention of the company if this indebtedness is released. They do not want to keep the money for themselves, but will use it in improving the road. I need not say that in the last election this was a very prominent question before the electors of Quebec, and especially before the electors of Quebec Centre. A meeting took place for he purpose of selecting a candidate to oppose me. That meeting was attended by no less personages than the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Militia. At that meeting a very respectable gentleman, a vice-president of the Board of Trade, Mr. Chateauvert, was selected as the candidate, and I will take the trouble to read to the House the speech he made on that occasion in the presence of those two hon. Ministers. I translate the report:

"I can say without boasting that I have succeeded with Col. Forsyth"——

A great friend of the hon. Minister of Militia—— ——"to induce the Government to release the $1,000,000 of debentures on condition that the Canadian Pacific Railway do the improvements necessary on the Louise embankment by building elevators and executing other works which shall help to make of Quebec a centre of distribution like Montreal and Toronto, and one of the finest harbours in the world."

There can be no mistake as to the correctness of the report of that speech, because Mr. Chateauvert himself took the trouble to distribute it among the electors of Quebec Centre along with a circular which he did me the honour to send me, and in which he says:

"You will see by the enclosed report of a speech which I delivered on Saturday night what my views are, and for what purpose I solicit the suffrages of my fellow-citizens."

That was not enough. Mr. Chateauvert was so sure of the promises he had obtained from the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Militia that he went further and published in Le Courrier du Canada, the special organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works, his promissory note, as it was called by the paper, and he was so sure that these promises would carry the division that he called himself already the member. Here is the promissory note:

"QUEBEC, 21st February, 1891.

"As member for Quebec Centre and in return for the confidence of my electors, I promise to give them the settlement of the $1,000,000 of debentures of the Canadian Pacific Railway and assistance for the bridge."

This promissory note, so called, was published in every issue of that paper for a considerable time during the election contest, at the top of its editorial page, with the following commentary added:——

"Here is a promissory note signed by a business man in full knowledge. It has not been signed in blank; the date, the consideration, the amount, everything is mentioned therein."

That is perfectly true. Well, Mr. Chateauvert is a very respectable gentleman, who, I believe, would not tell a lie even privately, and still less publicly, in a statement of that kind; and when I saw it I could not have any doubt, nor could the citizens of Quebec, that he had received from the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Militia the promise which he stated he had obtained from them. In connection with the same matter, the city of Quebec had the honour, among other cities during the elections, of a visit from the High Commissioner, and of course, he made a speech, in which he, of course, made promises. I do not think he could make a speech in election times without making promises of money. I take the report of his speech in the Morning Chronicle. I am sure the hon. Minister of Public Works will not dispute the fidelity of that paper to the Government and to himself personally. The meeting took place in a hall in the centre division called Tara Hall. Here is what the paper says:

"Sir Charles then addressed the audience for about two hours, speaking most eloquently and being loudly applauded. Sir Charles stated that, not being a member of the Government, he had telegraphed Sir John to-day—(meaning Sir John A. Macdonald)—what he could say on the question of the Quebec bridge and the North Shore railway bonds. The answer received had been as follows, and he published that answer before the meeting :—

"'KINGSTON, 26th February, 1891.

"'Parliament will be asked to transfer bonds to Canadian Pacific Railway, on conditions imposed by the city of Quebec.

(Signed) "'JOHN A. MACDONALD.'

"(Loud applause.)"

Of course the applause must have been very loud, but it would not have been so loud if the same audience had read the answer given by the Minister of Public Works some time ago to a question which was put for me by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island. Here is the question :

"1. Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government, that, at a meeting held in Tara Hall, at Quebec, on the 26th of February last, Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada to London, declared, that having telegraphed to the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, First Minister of Canada, in order to know from him what he ought to say on the question of a bridge at Quebec, and on that of the North Shore Railway debentures, he had received the following telegram :—

"'KINGSTON, 26th February, 1891.

"'Parliament will be asked to transfer bonds to Canadian Pacific Railway, on conditions proposed by the city of Quebec.

(Signed) "'JOHN A. MACDONALD.'"

"2. Whether the said telegram was sent by the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, to the said Sir Charles Tupper? 3. What are the conditions imposed by the city of Quebec, referred to in the said telegram? 4. Whether the Government intends to keep the promise thus made in its name by Sir Charles Tupper? 5. When does the Government intend to introduce the measure promised by the said telegram? 6. Whether the Government is aware, that, at the said meeting, Sir Charles Tupper declared that the citizens of Quebec might regard the building of the said bridge as an accomplished fact? 7. Whether the Government authorized the said Sir Charles Tupper to give the said promise? 8. Whether the Government intends to carry out this promise? 9. When does it propose to introduce a measure to give it effect?"

I will now read the answer given by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. I am quite sure there would have been very little applause if such an answer had been given in Quebec. The hon. Minister said :

"The telegram mentioned in this question is not complete : it is only a portion of the telegram, and that is the only answer I can give to that part of the question. There will be a measure brought down during the present session in reference to the bonds of the North Shore Railway."

It is not said in what respect the telegram was incomplete. If it was garbled, it was not garbled by myself, for I took it as it was published in the Morning Chronicle, nor was it garbled by that newspaper which took it from Sir Charles Tupper himself. Therefore, if there was any garbling of the telegram, it was done by Sir Charles Tupper. I would like to know what does the rest of the telegram contain? I think the hon. the Minister of Public Works should have stated whether the portion of the telegram which was not read contained a promise of help for the bridge, for that was the respect in which the telegram was deficient. The Tories of Quebec were very exultant the next morning. Every one of them said : "Now we have the bridge; we heard Tupper yesterday, and we will have the million dollars of debentures released, and we will have the bridge. He said so, and of course he always tells the truth. He never made a vain promise." So they all thought they would get the bridge. I read the telegram again and again, and could not find in it any promise about the bridge. Most probably that is the portion of the telegram which has been left out, and I expected the Minister of Public Works would have read that portion, which must have contained the offer of assistance for the bridge. What we want to know is the exact truth with reference to the question concerning the million dollars debentures of the North Shore Railway. Every one must see that the answer of the hon. Minister is most incomplete. There may have been some excuse for the incompleteness of the answer when he gave it, for then nobody was in charge of the Railway Department, but now we have reorganized the Government, and there must be somebody in charge of that department and in a position to give us the information we want. The House will see this is a subject involving a million dollars, and it is entitled to correct and complete information. I put another question on the same occasion. I asked :

"Whether the Government are aware that during the period of the last election Victor Chateauvert, Esq., ministerial candidate in Quebec Centre, published in Le Courrier du Canada the following notice :—

"'QUEBEC, 21st February, 1891.

"'As member for Quebec Centre, in return for the confidence of my electors, I promise to give them a settlement of the Pacific million, and help for the bridge.' And that in a speech made by the said Victor Chateauvert, Esq., about the same date, to the electors of Quebec Centre, he made the following statement :—

"'I can say, without boasting, that I have succeeded, with Colonel Forsyth, in inducing the Government to give up the million dollars of debentures (the million dollars of debentures which the Government retains on the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Quebec and Montreal) on condition that the Canadian Pacific Company shall make the necessary improvements on the Louise Embankment, construct elevators, and carry out the other works which will serve to make Quebec a distributing centre like Montreal and Toronto, and one of the finest ports in the world.

"'After having secured from the Ottawa Government, through the influence of our Ministers, Sir Hector and Sir Adolphe, the return of the million of debentures, and a promise of aid for the bridge between Quebec and Lévis, I should consider myself a bad citizen if I did not consent to come forward under circumstances so favourable for the city.'

"2. Whether it is true, as so stated by Mr. Chateauvert, that he had secured from the Government the remission of the said million of debentures and a promise of aid for the said bridge? 3. What is the nature of the aid so promised? 4. When do the Government intend to introduce measures to carry out the remission of the said million of debentures, and to assist in the construction of the said bridge?"

Here is the answer which the hon. the Minister of Public Works gave to my question :

"The Government are not aware that the article in question was published in that paper, but they do know that Mr. Chateauvert exerted himself very much about this remission of the million dollars, and also about the bridge in question. The Government will introduce a measure about the million dollars debentures. The remainder of the question I cannot answer now."

Certainly the Minister of Public Works should have been in a position to say whether or not Mr. Chateauvert told the truth when he publicly stated, in a speech to the electors of Quebec, that he had obtained from the Minister of Public Works and also from the Minister of Militia a promise for the release of the North Shore Railway debentures. Either Mr. Chateauvert was publicly telling a lie to all the citizens of Quebec and should be branded for having told a lie, or it was true that the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Public Works had promised the release of that million of debentures. We want to know whether Mr. Chateauvert, whom we have always known to be a Tory, but whom we have also known to be a good and respectable citizen of Quebec, is to be branded publicly as a liar or whether the Ministers referred to made the promise, and, if so, whether they are prepared to redeem it. Let them say whether they are or not; let them say whether the promise was made or not, and, if it was not made, we shall know how to deal with Mr. Chateauvert in Quebec. We do not want to be fooled any more. We want to know whether the citizens of Quebec have been shamefully deceived by Mr. Chateauvert or whether Mr. Chateauvert has been shamefully deceived by the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Militia.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would say a few words in answer to some of the observations which the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) has made, because some of the matters he has touched upon happened to come under my notice in a departmental way. I presume that the speech he has made this afternoon is not intended to elicit the policy of the Government upon this question of the million dollars of bonds, because the hon. gentleman and the House have been promised at an early part of the session that a measure on this subject will be brought down during the session, and it will be more convenient for him, as well as for us, to discuss that question when the papers and the correspondence and the documents are accessible to members on both sides of the House. The hon. gentleman is quite misinformed, or else he has unintentionally misstated the question as to the betterments required from time to time to be made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman stated, for instance, that we did not wish betterments to take place in connection with the North Shore Railway. He also stated that a great deal of difficulty occurred in the negotiations between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government in relation to repairs which were actually necessary for the safety of the travelling public, and he intimated that, at one time, there was a serious danger of the road being closed because there were bridges which were not safe for the travelling public. I beg to say that there is not the slightest foundation for the supposition that we did not wish betterments to take place on the road, or that there was ever any delay on the part of the Government of Canada in regard to the necessary repairs taking place on the bridges on that road. The single question that arose in regard to betterments was as to whether we were bound by the terms of our contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to allow them to increase the capital expenditure on that road at our expense. They were entitled by the terms of the contract with us, according to our interpretation of it, to make renewals from time to time, but if they were to substitute, for instance, steel bridges for wooden bridges, we had no objection to their doing so and they did not require our consent, but they did require our consent to charging against the capital sum the additional cost of steel as compared with wood. In that respect we felt we would not be warranted, without coming to Parliament in regard to the matter, in assenting. We felt that our position under that contract and under that lien might be changed, but in regard to necessary repairs or betterments, the Canadian Pacific Railway were always free to make any betterments, to substitute steel for wood wherever they pleased, to make repairs where they were necessary, or to substitute wood for wood. In these matters they were at perfect liberty, because they would involve no extra capital charge whatever. As to the question which was put to us across the House the other day by the hon. gentleman, and in regard to which he has made some complaint in reference to the answer he received, I think the answer was pretty full, considering that there was a definite promise that a measure would be brought down in regard to the million dollars of railway bonds. The hon. gentleman finds fault with us, and indicates that we could not have paid very close attention to the progress of the election contest in Quebec or we would have discovered that the Quebec Chronicle did contain the article which he has read from Hansard. I might with equal justice say that the hon. gentleman did not pay much attention to his own election contest or he would not have had to come to the House of Commons to ask if that article had appeared in a paper published in his own constituency. The Government had no official knowledge of the publication. He had the same knowledge as the Government had on that subject, and his question was not a fair one. As to whether Mr. Chateauvert has deceived the electors of Quebec or Ministers of the Crown have deceived him, the hon. member will find, when the measure comes to be laid on the Table of the House, a full answer to that question, and he will find that, in any indication that Mr. Chateauvert has given of any pledge on the part of the Government of Canada, there will be no difficulty in carrying that pledge into effect. The measure will be brought down in the course of a few days, and the hon. gentleman will be able to see from its details whether it corresponds with the promise Mr. Chateauvert gave to his constituents or not. What may have transpired between the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Millitia and Mr. Chateauvert I do not know, but the Government of Canada will keep faith and will ask the House to ratify whatever promise was made by the Government of Canada, upon which no doubt the statement of Mr. Chateauvert was based. I will not go further, because I presume the hon. gentleman desires to have the returns and it is close to six o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that, in the discussion of a matter of this moment, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Militia are not present to defend their own course, and to explain the promise which they gave.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They will be here when the matter is before the House.

Mr. LAURIER. But they are not here now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 87) to revive and amend the charter of the Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Desjardins, L'Islet.)

Bill (No. 91) to amend the Act to enable the City of Winnipeg to utilize the Assiniboine River Water Power.—(Mr. Macdonald, Winnipeg.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Anglo-Canadian Electric Storage and Supply Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

Bill (No. 102) respecting the Ontario and Qu'Appelle Land Company (Limited).—(Mr. Sutherland.)

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS—MEETINGS OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the next Order is called, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was supposed to have been called, beyond all manner of doubt, for to-morrow, has not been called, and that rumours have been circulated to the effect that that Committee is not to be called to-morrow, but is to be called on Friday instead. I cannot but think that this is to be regretted for many considerations. We cannot ignore the fact that one of the leading members of this House is on trial before that Committee, and the dignity of the House demands that under circumstances of that kind, at least reasonable speed should be adopted by the Committee in its proceedings. Now, we know very well that for the convenience of members of that Committee, or a portion of that Committee, the Committee does not meet upon Saturday and it does not meet upon Monday; but it was clearly understood, and the understanding was expressed when the Committee had met once or twice, that we should meet de die in diem. It was afterwards suggested that, as many members would be away in Montreal and Toronto on Saturdays and Mondays, that understanding should not be carried out to the extent of meeting upon those two days, and while I myself yielded, and yielded very reluctantly to that conclusion, I think the understanding of the Committee was that on those two days we should not be called together, but outside of those two days it was clearly understood by all members of the Committee that the Committee should meet on every other day and proceed diligently with the important charge which this House entrusted to them. Sir, we have a large number of witnesses in attendance by virtue of the subpœnas we have served upon them in the Committee. The expense, no doubt, is comparatively trifling, hardly to be spoken of at all, but when one considers the magnitude, the gravity of the charges, and the position of the hon. gentleman against whom those charges are made, the serious character of these charges, and the inevitable conclusion that if they are proved they will result in the most serious consequences, one stands aghast in surprise at the fact that this Committee is not called to meet from day to day, but that its meetings are, it seems to me, to be postponed so far as it is possible to postpone them. I cannot, for one, assent or consent to this delay. I protest in the strongest language against this procedure. I think if the Government are responsible, they are to be blamed; I think if the Chairman of the Committee is responsible, he owes an explanation now to this House and to the Committee. I think the agreement which was come to has been broken. I think the hon. gentleman himself who stands charged before that Committee owes it to his own dignity to insist that that Committee should meet at once and determine whether he is guilty or not. If he is innocent, why, Sir, it is the interest of the whole country, it is in the interest of this House, it is in the interest of its representatives, I won't say anything of his own interest—that his innocence should be proclaimed, and if evidence is given to justify any other conclusion, it is in the interest of the whole country that we should have that evidence given before us, and that this matter should be brought to a close. Sir, I cannot but think that, looking at the matter from a general standpoint, and looking at it from an outside standpoint, the Parliament of Canada does not occupy a dignified position. Its leader stands to-day impeached before one of its principal Committees, and that Committee ought to put all other considerations to one side, and proceed at once to determine the innocence or guilt of the hon. gentleman charged before it, instead of allowing his reputation to lie under a cloud. I will say no more upon that point, but I do say that the Committee has a right to insist that the understanding which was come to shall be carried out, and this House has a right to insist and to know why it is that that Committee does not proceed with the investigation of these serious charges.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman, in framing his protest, has used language which was utterly undeserved and inappropriate to the occasion. The hon. gentleman said that it was the fault of the Government, and he intimated——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I did not.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman said so in exact words.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I did not. I said if it were the fault of the Government, they should be held responsible, and if it were the fault of the Chairman of the Committee, I should expect him to rise in his place and explain his conduct to the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman said that it was the fault of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no. Order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be entirely in vain for hon. gentlemen to say "No," and "Order." I am perfectly in order. I say that the hon. gentleman did impute fault to the Government in the matter——

Mr. LAURIER. I rise to order. My hon. friend beside me has stated distinctly that he made no such imputation. He said: "If it is the fault of the Government," and in face of such an explanation the hon. gentleman is entirely out of order in persisting to attribute to my hon. friend words which he declares he did not utter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman—

Mr. LAURIER. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have a right to speak to the question of order; I am going to speak to the question of order. I was interrupted by the hon. member, and I am speaking now to the question of order, and the hon. gentleman would not have pretended I was out of order if he had allowed me to finish my sentence. My statement was this, and I am speaking now to the point of order, and the hon. gentleman will see I am entirely in order: The hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), who spoke, imputed blame to the Government in this matter, and as the hon. gentleman has stated he did not do so, I am bound to assume he did not intend to do so, although at the same time the hon. gentleman's words certainly bore that construction. I wish to say a few words with respect to the proceedings of the Committee. I desire to say, first, that it is very much to be regretted, indeed, that a matter of this kind should assume a party aspect. We have conducted the proceedings of the Committee so far almost without any difference of opinion. We have all realized, I think, on both sides of the House that the investigation was a most disagreeable and painful one, and we must all have regretted that charges like these had to be investigated. We all, however, realized that these charges having been made, the investigation had to be proceeded with by regular methods, no matter where they led us. The Committee arrived at a determination, subject, of course, to be changed as circumstances made absolutely necessary to sit de die in diem. The hon. gentleman, I again admit, I may not have properly heard him, said, or I understood him to say, that everything had been done to put off the investigation. We have sat de die in diem, except when it was the unanimous wish of the Committee that we should adjourn over a day. I am quite willing that the Committee should sit on Monday. I explained to the Committee at the last meeting that we could not sit on Saturdays, because it is absolutely necessary for the business of the House that the members of the Government should be in Council all day, and inasmuch as the charges are so important and involve one of our colleagues, it is very unsatisfactory to be absent when witnesses are giving their testimony, and trust to reading the evidence afterwards. Subject to that reservation, I am quite willing that the Committee should sit on Monday and de die in diem, without any exception, except when the business of this House makes it imperatively necessary that the sitting of the Committee should be suspended. This is what occurred: We continued to sit de die in diem except when the Committee unanimously agreed that it was inadvisable to meet, as they did on one day, when we gave way to the Committee on Railways and Telegraph Lines. On the last day the House sat before the adjournment, in consequence of the death of the late Premier, I attended at the Committee room at half-past ten o'clock. The Committee were to have met that day. I found, not at all to my surprise, there was no quorum present, and one could hardly have been expected, because everyone understood that the House would adjourn, and in the minds of members there was no disposition to go on with ordinary business. That, therefore, made an adjournment sine die. If there had been a quorum there might have been a different result. I do not think there were half a dozen members present. I know that when I arrived, not more than five minutes after the hour, there was no member present, and I was told by the clerk that two or three members had been present but they realized there was no possibility of a meeting being held. The Committee thus stood adjourned sine die. We could not meet yesterday or to-day because the Committee of Railways and Telegraph Lines required to meet, and that Committee has forty Bills before it. The business of the House in that regard was standing still, and we gave up the room to that Committee. To-morrow it will be absolutely impossible to meet in consequence of other engagements that have been made, or to get a quorum even if the Committee did meet. Friday is the only day we can give. I am very sorry. I would be quite willing to give next Saturday, if I supposed a sufficient number of members would remain in town to constitute a quorum. We are not only willing, but as anxious as any members of the Committee can be, that this Committee shall go forward next week and sit de die in diem, without interruption, except such as is inevitable on account of the business of the House. I say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), as I understand him to say the Government is to blame, that we have no wish except to get at the end of this investigation. It is no more agreeable to us than to him, and nothing will stand in the way of speeding it to a conclusion except the transaction of the business necessary in connection with this House. Considering we are meeting after that last adjournment under very peculiar circumstances, considering that the Cabinet had to be reorganized, and that this had to be done in the middle of the session, with very important questions of policy to be considered, it is not unreasonable that we should ask the House for one day to deliberate before important questions touching the Budget and other matters which are now on the Order paper should come up for determination. That is the necessity which makes us ask that to-morrow should not be given to the business of the Committee. I must say as regards my colleague against whom these charges are brought, that he has not only never expressed an opinion, but has never been consulted as to the propriety of the Committee adjourning on any occasion. It is only on account of what we consider imperative necessity that we ask to have the Committee not to meet to-morrow. I have already explained why no meeting was held yesterday, and why to-day had to be given up; but it was not in accordance with our wish that there should be a suspension of one day.

Mr. TARTE. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the very long delay that is taking place in the production of papers that I feel necessary for my enquiry. I made the statement on which this investigation proceeded on May 11th. On May 15th the first meeting of the Committee took place. An order was then given for the production of all papers connected with the charges. Since that time they have been delayed from day to day. Of course I do not want to assume anything I am not in a position to prove, but there is one thing perfectly sure, and it is this: I have found in private letters that fell into my hands, traces of official letters and other papers that were not produced before the Committee. Some of these were only produced after we put in the hands of one of the officers called before the Committee a book containing evidence that such a paper existed and had not been produced. I might say more than that. There are to-day letters and telegrams, which were exchanged between Mr. Trutch and Mr. Perley, under the control of the Minister of Public Works, and which have not been produced before the Committee, and I state here that those letters are an essential part of the evidence that I desire to present to the Committee. As I said, I do not want to make any imputations. When I made the very grave charges that I thought it was my duty to make, I fully realized all the difficulties I would have to meet: but when objection was taken in this House in regard to the Minister of Public Works keeping control of the papers, I did not take part in sustaining it. I hope that the Minister of Public Works, who is the official leader of my race in this Parliament, will not place me under the painful obligation of believing that those who at the time made that objection were right. I hope that they were wrong, but, Sir, I hope at the same time that he will realize that it is his immediate duty to order that all the papers should be brought down, and brought down without any more delay. Look at what we have witnessed, Mr. Speaker. We have seen people who have for the last eight years controlled, as a matter of fact, a great many things in a great public department, hiding their books from day to day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman not confine himself to the mere statement which he wishes to make on the Orders of the Day being called? He is now entering upon matters which give rise to a debate.

Mr. EDGAR. In order that this matter may not be slurred over, I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no occasion to slur it over at all. I simply reminded the hon. gentleman of the Rule of the House, which I thought perhaps he had not in mind. There is no objection to his making a full statement of what he desires, and it will be answered.

Mr. TARTE. What I say, Sir, is that we have before this Parliament in the official report of the Committee, the clear evidence, I might say more than that, the clear admission that the books were not forthcoming and that the book-keeper was dismissed.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let me draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he is now speaking as to the delay in producing papers by the Department of Public Works. What connection has that with the holding back of the books or with Connolly's clerk, I do not see.

Mr. TARTE. If you allow me, I believe that I can show you that I am perfectly in order, and, more than that, that there is a perfect relation between that delay and the other delays that we have suffered before the Committee. It should not be forgotten, I think, that the persons named in the charge I have brought are Larkin, Connolly & Co., and also, unfortunately, the Minister of Public Works. My charge is, that improper dealings have taken place between the parties named. I yet hope that the hon. Minister will prove that my charges are false: but still the charges are there, and they are now being investigated. Well, Sir, I was saying that we could not obtain until to-day important correspondence, letters and telegrams that are under the control of the hon. Minister. I state this from my seat in the House, and I will prove it in due time. At the same time we see that the other parties accused of having corruptly dominated the department have themselves hidden their books and sent away their man who was in a position to explain the entries in these books. This cannot be denied, because one of them has clearly admitted that he has dismissed the bookkeeper. I made these charges with a certain hope that they were going to be investigated in an honourable manner. I have expected justice, and I still expect justice, from this Parliament. Well, Sir, if we cannot get these papers, if we are delayed from day to day, I will certainly not be able to make all my evidence, although persons who may have been parties to destroying papers may be deceived in the long run. But still let us take the facts as they are before us. As a matter of fact we have been delayed, but I fully admit that the Government, I believe, is not responsible for that delay. I am quite prepared to say that I have received justice from the hon. Minister of Justice, who has directed all our proceedings in the Committee, but one thing that all the members of the House will be obliged to admit also is, that we have not acted with the energy that was to have been expected from us. We have been delayed from day to day: papers we have had a right to have are not produced yet, and I again call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that he has got under his control in his department a great many letters extending between the years 1885, 1886 and 1887 that he had an order to bring before us, and that have not been brought down yet. I do not wish to say any more now, but, Sir, I believe that the House will agree with me that, in the interest of all parties, we should not prorogue until this enquiry is over. I believe that I may appeal to both sides of the House. If I have been deceived in the accusations I have brought I am quite prepared to bear the full responsibility and penalty of it, but, Sir, if my accusations are true, as I have every reason to believe they are, then the guilty parties ought to be punished.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I will not follow the hon. gentleman in his argument nor in his speech, because I believe the House does not expect that from me. The only thing I can say to the House is this: That every paper, every letter, every document, every plan and every thing that is in my department connected with this case, I have given orders from the beginning that they should all be produced before the Committee. I repeat again, that if the hon. gentleman will lay before the Committee when it meets to-morrow or the next day, a list of what he wants and which he does not find in the numerous papers and documents that have been laid before the Committee already, if any of those documents are to be found in my department every one of them will be brought down as soon as possible. I know perfectly well that my position as a member of Parliament and a Minister of the Crown is this: That as the head of that department, and the House having ordered through its Committee that all these documents and papers should be produced, they must be produced, and an order has been given to the deputy head of the department to do so. He has full liberty to do so, his duty is to do so, his orders are to do so, and I have no doubt that if any document is missing it is because he did not find it. If the hon. gentleman will give a list of one, or two, or three, or twenty documents which he wants, Mr. Gobeil, the Deputy Minister of my department, is bound to find them if they are in the department.

Mr. GIROUARD. With regard to these missing papers, I may be allowed to make one or two remarks. First, the papers coming from the Department of Public Works are contained in several large boxes. Evidently this investigation requires the production of a large number of papers, and it would not be surprising if some of them, on the first inspection, should be found to be missing. The hon. gentleman mentioned the other day, at the sitting of the Committee, that he had found out that some papers were missing. Surely there could not have been any intention of deceiving the hon. gentleman, or preventing his going on with his investigation. He found complete lists of those papers published in the blue-books.

Mr. TARTE. It was a very small blue-book.

Mr. GIROUARD. If those papers were mentioned in the blue-books, there could not have been any intention of hiding them.

Mr. TARTE. They were not produced.

Mr. GIROUARD. But there could not have been any intention of deceiving him or the public. I wish to make another statement as to the papers which were not found in the two boxes, but which were mentioned in the blue-books. They were produced on the very day that it was noticed they were missing, and I notified the hon. gentleman that he could have access to them. With regard to the correspondence of Mr. Trutch, I was informed yesterday that the hon. gentleman had made a demand on the clerk of the Committee for those papers. I looked at the order of the Committee, and I found that he was entitled to have them produced; I therefore, immediately, gave instructions to the clerk to demand the production of the papers from the Public Works Department. I do not know yet what answer he has received from the department. I am sure the hon. gentleman has no reason to complain of delay. He has received from the Committee and the Government all the assistance he could get.

Mr. IVES. I wish to say, on behalf of the private members of the House, that we do not complain that the Committee on Privileges and Elections should sit every day; but we have been in session now nearly two months, and we have had only two meetings of the Railway Committee, and none of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, or the Committee on Private Bills. The whole time has been monopolized by this investigation. Now, it seems to me that arrangements should be made by the Government for this Committee to sit simultaneously with the sittings of the other Committees, and for its vacating the Railway Committee room. We had a short meeting of the Railway Committee this morning with over forty orders on the paper. Among them was one Bill the promoters of which asked that we should not only pass it, but that we should reduce from two months to two weeks the notice required to be given to the Governor General in Council for the sanction of a lease, the reason given being that the whole season would be lost for the work of construction if the time were not reduced. I have no doubt that other very large interests are being injured and imperilled in consequence of the monopoly of our time by this Committee, to the exclusion of all the ordinary legitimate business of the country. Now, while we sympathize with the Government in their anxiety not to delay this investigation, I think it is not too much to ask them, because they have the control of the matter, to make provision that the ordinary business of the country may go on in the meantime. Of course, we do not expect to satisfy certain gentlemen who seem bound to find fault anyway—to find fault with the non-production of papers which were only asked for yesterday, and all that sort of thing; but we do think that the Government—and I am speaking not only for my own friends, but for hon. members on the other side who have Bills before the different committees—should make arrangements so that the other committees may meet simultaneously, and that they should not ask us to wait till the end of the Session for private Bill legislation which is urgently needed.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure it is not the intention of any hon. member to cast suspicion or blame upon anyone in connection with this matter. For my own part, I will gladly add my testimony to that of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), that the hon. Minister of Justice is entitled to credit for the manner in which he has discharged his duty to the House in this investigation. At the same time, the anxiety of the hon. member for Montmorency is natural, because he has assumed a task which is painful to him, and the consequences of which may be very serious to him if he does not establish the charges which he has made; and it seems to me that a remark made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) fully justifies the complaint of my hon. friend. My hon. friend has complained that certain papers which were ordered to be produced by the Department of Public Works were not produced.

Mr. TARTE. A month ago.

Mr. LAURIER. Ordered to be produced a month ago. The hon. Minister of Public Works says that he gave orders for the production of those papers. I unhesitatingly accept his statement; but it appears from what the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has said that up to yesterday certain papers which were ordered a month ago—that is, the correspondence of Mr. Trutch, the inspector of public works in British Columbia—were not yet produced. Therefore, while I will not say that there was a failure of duty anywhere, for one reason or another the papers were not produced, and the remark of my hon. friend that the Order of the House has not been complied with is fully borne out. It is easy to understand that some warmth of blood may be exhibited; but when we come to sift the matter, let us admit that no one has intended to do wrong, though there has been a hitch somewhere, and it is quite natural that the matter should be brought to the notice of the House.

Mr. GIROUARD. The Order of the House was for papers, correspondence, and so forth, without specifying any particular papers. As the papers produced filled two trunks, it was quite possible that some of the desired documents might be missing; but the moment any paper was specified, an immediate order was given for its production.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think this matter is irregularly before the House, not only because we are having a debate on the Orders of the Day being called, but also in this sense—and it may not be amiss that I should make the suggestion now for future guidance—that we are really prosecuting the business of the Committee in the House. It was an order of the Committee that was given for the papers some weeks ago; that order covered not particular papers or letters, but all papers, contracts, specifications, plans, accounts, vouchers, and so forth, relating to four large transactions, and extending over a period of twenty years. From my experience of the departments, I venture to say that if any order were given for documents extending over that period of time, there would be no surprise if when we came to examine them we found that a further search would have to be made and further papers obtained. But I submit to the hon. member for Montmorency that if he again finds that to be the case, as is not at all unlikely in view of the circumstances, it would be more convenient for all purposes to bring up matters of that kind in the Committee. Then if it is found that the order of the Committee has not been obeyed, the officers will be called up and put on their guard to be more vigilant; and instead of anyone in the House being subject to suspicion, we shall have the officers before us under oath to say why the papers were not produced and produced before. If such a course is followed, I think feelings of impatience and irritation will be less likely to be excited.

Mr. TARTE. I did more than that. I went myself to Mr. Gobeil four or five days ago. I indicated to him the papers that are missing, and these papers are not yet brought down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice is a very proper one. It is only the importance of this question that, to my mind, justified its being brought up here to-night at all. These papers were ordered by the Committee, and the proper place to deal with their non-production is in the Committee and not in the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to these papers at all, but I would like to say to the Minister of Justice and the Government generally, that I think there is a good deal in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) thus far. I think the importance of this enquiry demands that precedence be given at any cost, even to the delay of ordinary business, to the investigation before the Committee of Privileges and Elections; but, after all, that Committee only comprises forty-two members, and there is no reason why the various committees of this House should not sit in other rooms during a reasonable number of days. If questions arise which absolutely require the presence of Ministers who have to be present at this investigation, these questions might be held over, but I think it is desirable the other committees should sit as well as the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If there is any difficulty with regard to obtaining a sufficiently large room, it might possibly be necessary to poach on the room immediately adjoining this, which is now handed over to gentlemen of the Conservative party; but I think the other committees, and certainly the Public Accounts Committee, should sit even while this investigation is going on, but, of course, in other rooms.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the other committees will have to be called.

LANGEVIN BLOCK—PAPERS.

Mr. MULOCK. Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I wish to bring to the attention of the Government the non-production of certain papers ordered some time ago. I refer to the papers connected with what is known as the Langevin Block. The hon. Minister of Public Works has several times promised to have the Order complied with.

Mr. SPEAKER. Were these ordered by the House or the Committee?

Mr. MULOCK. There is an Order both of the House and of the Public Accounts Committee; but, even if the order were only made by the Public Accounts Committee, you will see there must be some way of getting the order of the Committee complied with. We have not had a meeting of that Committee for a month, and, if we cannot ask for the papers until it meets, we may not be able to ask for them at all. I was notified by the clerk yesterday afternoon that these papers had been produced, and this morning I attended before the clerk to examine them. I can only say that there has been, in my judgment, a great deal more attention paid to the non-production than the production of the papers. The most studious efforts have been apparently made to prevent their production. As far as I went, I made a note of a few of the papers that I could see have not been produced and are pertinent to the enquiry, but I am perfectly satisfied that there has not been a proper compliance with the Order of the House or of the Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The deputy of my department has told me that he had sent to the Committee on Public Accounts all the papers that were in the department and were asked for by the Committee. In so far as this House is concerned the hon. gentleman asked for a number of documents and information, which the House granted. I said to the hon. gentleman, and I repeat it now, that it is impossible for my department to comply with the Order of the House so long as the Committee on Public Accounts has the original documents from which we could give the information asked for: and I said to the deputy of my department that whilst he was sending these documents to the Public Accounts Committee he should tell the clerk of the Committee that so soon as the Committee would send back the documents, we would prepare a statement for the House; but we have no double sets of original documents, and therefore cannot comply with the Order of the House until the Public Accounts Committee has returned the originals.

Mr. MULOCK. The documents, the non-production of which I complain of, are not with the clerk of the Public Accounts Committee, but have been withheld from him.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no intention on the part of my department or my deputy, who is an honest, straightforward man, to keep away from the Committee or members of the Committee any paper or document that is to be found in my department. If the hon. gentleman will send a list of what he says is missing, and if these papers are to be found in the department they will be sent here. It must have been because the documents could not be found that they have not been sent, but if they are in the department they will be laid on the Table. We have no reason to fear the investigation of the hon. gentleman or the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. LISTER. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that all the documents are not produced to the clerk of the Committee because the officers in his department are engaged in copying them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. LISTER. There can then be no possible reason for not producing the original documents before the Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. All the original documents which are not in a book used every day by the department have been sent. Documents, such as letters, which are in books that are used every day, must be copied, because we cannot stop all the work of the department by sending away the books; but all the original documents which are not in books are sent.

Mr. BARRON. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works if he will comply with the promise made last session by the late Premier in regard to the production and laying on the Table of the evidence taken by the Trent Valley Canal Commissioners in regard to the completion of that route. That subject is very important to a great many people in Ontario, who are very anxious to know something about it. Of course, we have the report of the Trent Valley Canal Commissioners, but we require to have the evidence on which that report is based in order to discuss it intelligently.

Mr. BOWELL. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if those papers were moved for in the House, either last session or this session?

Mr. BARRON. I am glad the hon. gentleman has referred to that question. They were not moved for because the late Premier promised that, if they were not too voluminous, they would be printed during the recess and given to each member of the House, but that, in any event, I or anybody could see them on applying at the office where they are kept. He intimated, at all events, that members could get possession of them as soon as possible, and, inasmuch as the promise was of a nature which did not require anyone to move for the papers, I mentioned it at the beginning of this session, and there was an intimation that they would be given to the House.

Mr. BOWELL. I will make enquiry in the department as to the character of the evidence. There is no possible reason for withholding it, and I will see that such evidence as it is possible to lay upon the Table shall be brought down as early as possible.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When are we to have a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee?

Mr. FOSTER. I understand a meeting has been called for Friday morning.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

On the Order being read for the proposed motion of Mr. Jamieson:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

The motion of Mr. Mackintosh in amendment thereto and the motion of Mr. Taylor in amendment to the amendment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have to renew the request which I made when this subject was called on the Order Paper the week before last and for the same reason. The motion will, of course, be reached this night week, and, unless something unexpected occurs in the meantime, we shall not ask for any further postponement.

Order postponed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The object of this Bill, as I partly explained on its introduction, is to change the Dominion election law in two respects: first, as regards the form of oath; and, secondly, to remove some confusion which exists in consequence of the provisions of the Act as it now exists. The first part of the Bill seeks to prevent British subjects who have become American citizens from voting in this country. The second part seeks to amend the law in such a way as to make the instructions contained in the Act itself correspond with the 46th section of the Dominion Elections Act. It is within the recollection of almost every member of this House that, after the recent elections, recounts were had, and difficulties arose over the taking of the ballots in certain constituencies. The result, I submit, was owing to no fault on the part of the deputy returning officers themselves, but might very naturally be attributed to the peculiar or confused reading of the instructions contained in the Act. There is no necessity for enlarging any further upon the Bill, but I will read one of the clauses of form "M" which it is proposed to change, and I think hon. members on both sides will see the necessity for a change:

"The voter will then fold the ballot so as to show a portion of the back only, with the number and initials of the deputy returning officer."

From that wording, I submit that any person, even though he had a legal education, might consider that not only the initials but the number of the deputy returning officer should be placed on the back, and, when you consider the very small number of persons who are allowed to each polling sub-division, and the consequent necessity for a large number of deputy returning officers, farmers' sons, clerks and others, who are not versed in law, it will be felt that every line or clause in the Act which tends to confusion should be made as clear as possible, because, when a mistake is made, the quick tendency is on the part of those against whom the mistake may be made to say that it is done from some improper motive. We know that, when we are in the heat of a conflict and even when the smoke of the battle has not quite cleared away, none of us are too careful to avoid imputing motives, and in that way many are brought under the ban of suspicion. I think both sides of the House will assist me in putting this Bill through so that we may make the Act as clear as possible.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman who moves this Bill seems to have in his mind the idea that he is going to make a tremendous reform in the law by preventing British subjects who have been naturalized in the United States from voting here as British subjects. I apprehend that is the main scope of his Bill. I am very much mistaken in my reading of the law if that is at all necessary. I think the hon. gentleman must know that a British subject who goes to the United States and becomes naturalized there has no right to vote in Canada to-day. He is no longer a British subject when he becomes naturalized in a foreign country, and under the Franchise Act he cannot vote, he cannot be placed on the list, and he cannot take the oath as it stands to-day, because he cannot truthfully swear that he is a British subject either by birth or by naturalization. Perhaps he was a British subject once by birth, but he cannot swear that he is to-day. That there may be no doubt whatever on this subject, I will refer the House to the Naturalization Act in the Revised Statutes on the subject of "Repatriation," and there it is laid down that "Any British subject who has voluntarily become naturalized in a foreign state shall, from and after the time of his so having become naturalized in such foreign state, be deemed within Canada to have ceased to be a British subject, and shall be regarded as an alien."

Now, a man who has ceased to be a British subject has no right, in the first place, to be placed upon the voters' list under the Act, because only British subjects can be placed there, and he cannot take the oath truthfully, because he has to swear that he is a British subject by birth or by naturalization. Therefore, the introduction of this additional clause proposed by the hon. gentleman, "and am not a subject of any foreign country," while, perhaps, it will not do any particular harm, does not work any reform in the law as it stood. It does not do any good. I will not refer to any former debate, but I think I have a distinct recollection, indeed I know, that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was on one occasion very loud in his expression of opinion that the only thing necessary to make the law perfect and to stop non-residents voting, was a Bill such as the hon. member proposes now. I think I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) say the same thing, and I think the Minister of Justice even did not, on that occasion, point out to the hon. member who is moving this Bill to-day, that a British subject who became a naturalized citizen in the United States, was no longer a British subject and could not vote. The hon. gentleman thinks that it does no harm to make this change. If he puts it on that ground, and will admit that it is not necessary, then, I think, there may be something in his Bill; but he cannot surely pretend that he is going to effect a great reformation in the election law.

Mr. LISTER. I think the Bill which my hon. friend has introduced to the House is one that should receive the approbation of this House. If it has the effect of making clear what before was somewhat confused, it will be advantageous. Any person who has any experience at all in election matters knows perfectly well that so far as marking the ballots is concerned, many deputy returning officers throughout the country not only initial the ballots, but they also number them, which is against the law. The provisions of this Act make it perfectly clear that the numbering of the ballots should not take place, and that only the initials of the deputy returning officer are allowed upon the ballot which is handed to the voter. Then again, as respects the affidavit, or oath, which the voter has to take on presenting himself to vote, I think the amendment of my hon. friend is one which should receive favourable consideration. As I stated a moment ago, it makes clear what was before confused. We all know that many men present themselves to vote who have become citizens of the United States, and they satisfy their conscience by swearing that they are British subjects by birth. There is an idea prevalent throughout this country that once a British subject, always a British subject, that nothing he can do divests himself of that natural allegiance that he owes to his country by birth. I think it is safe to say that during the last election hundreds and hundreds of people who have taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign state, and have, under the law as it is, no right to vote, satisfied their conscience by declaring that they were British subjects by birth. This section makes it clear that if they have become subjects of a foreign state they lose their right of franchise under the law of this country. For these reasons this Act shall receive my support, and I think it ought to receive the support of hon. gentlemen who want to make the law perfectly clear. It may be, as my hon. friend at my right says, that under the law as it is, they have no right to vote, and their names ought to be struck off the first list. But who looks after the first list? When you come to make out your list then you find out whether a man has really a right to vote or not on the ground of being an alien. That is the time you object to him, and although men have over and over again been challenged, they have taken this oath, believing they were entitled to vote, and they did vote. This law makes it clear, and I think it should receive our support.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I desired to make remarks very much in the line of those which the hon. gentleman has just made. I do not think any one overlooks the fact that a British subject who renounces his allegiance to Great Britain and becomes a subject of a foreign country, is no longer a British subject. But that is not the point. The point is that our statutes at present do not, at any rate with clearness, proscribe such person from voting or from being on the election list. For my part I have no doubt whatever, except such doubt as arises from the opinions expressed by lawyers just now—I have never had any doubt that such persons have an absolute legal right to vote, because the only thing we ask is the oath which requires them to say they are British subjects by birth or by naturalization. Undoubtedly, although a man may have renounced his allegiance to Great Britain and be no longer a British subject, he is a British subject by birth, and if the intention of Parliament was, as it probably was, to prevent such persons from voting as being no longer British subjects, the least that we can do is to make the law plain. I think the current opinion is that such persons have a legal right to vote. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) says hundreds of persons voted in the last election who had renounced their allegiance to Great Britain and had become subjects of a foreign country; they took the oath and satisfied their consciences in the belief they had a right to do so. I may indicate to the House that if it should be the pleasure of the House that the Bill should be read a second time now, I will move that it be referred to a sub-committee. There are other Bills on the Order paper touching the same subject, some provisions of which it may be wise to adopt, and it would be convenient for the Committee to weld these together, so that we may have one Bill on the one subject.

Mr. BURDETT. While approving most of the letter and spirit of the Bill, I would suggest that we go a little further and that the ballot should not only be initialled by the deputy returning officer, but that it should be initialled also by authorized agents of the opposing candidates. Deputy returning officers are not always emblems of purity. A deputy returning officer, if he is so inclined, may issue a few ballots before the polling occurs with his initials upon them, and they can be circulated outside the booth, and a man may get his five dollar bill and the ballot already marked, provided he goes in and brings out one with the initials upon it not marked. That may occur, and if the initials of the deputy returning officer and the agents of the opposing candidates are allowed to be put upon the ballot as well, nothing of this kind can occur. Speaking on another point of the Franchise Act, I think that men who have gone to the States with the intention of residing there, ought not to be allowed to come back here and vote and thus affect the conduct of affairs in a country that they have left practically forever. Respecting the matter of postage, it is one of great importance to those who object to votes on the list. Now, these lists have to be registered and sent out at a cost of eight cents, and I think it ought to be made as cheap as possible to those gentlemen who revise the list, because under the present Act enough trouble and difficulty occur to both political parties.

Mr. BARRON. I, too, would like to see the Bill become law, including the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Burdett), because it has come under my own notice that electors go to the polls and take the oath that they are British subjects by birth, relying upon the fact that, though they had removed to the States, they were born British subjects. But my main object in addressing the House now is to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice and also the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill to the fact that this Bill should not become law at all events this year, because it specifies what is a qualification for an elector. It may be that the revising officer in accepting declarations, knowing what is the qualification of an elector by this Bill, might require the clause setting forth that I am a British subject by birth and not the subject of any foreign country, to be incorporated in the declaration. We know that the revising officers, by statute, began their work on 1st June last, and if this Bill became law, without a clause being provided that it shall not be retroactive, those officers might hold that declarations received before this Bill became law would be bad, inasmuch as they would not contain the whole of this paragraph, "I am a British subject by birth and not the subject of any foreign country." I, therefore, suggest to the Minister of Justice and the promoter of this Bill that there should be a clause making it not applicable to the present revision, or, at all events, not to become law until after this year.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is only the form of the oath that the Bill seeks to amend. A person coming from the United States to Ontario could take the present oath because he could swear, and with something of a clear conscience, that he was a British subject by birth, notwithstanding that at the same time he was a citizen of the United States. The objection taken does not hold, because in the declaration required by the revising officer the party who seeks to have his name placed on the preliminary list only swears that he is a British subject.

Mr. BURDETT. The revising officer can accept the declaration whether this clause is in it or not.

Mr. MASSON. Surely the question as to what the revising officer may do cannot interfere with the passage of this Bill. It will be his duty to act in accordance with the Franchise Act and this Act, and I understand that the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), also proposes to amend the Franchise Act bearing on the same subject. I am glad to see that made clear which was obscure. I would suggest that a further step be taken, and it should be declared that the person making the declaration is not only not the subject of a foreign country, but has not filed any declaration of intention to become the subject or citizen of a foreign state. In many of the Western States persons resident a few months are allowed certain privileges as citizens, provided they file a declaration with the county clerk of their intention to become citizens of the United States. I think such a clause should be embodied in the Bill as drawn, because, to use the sentiment expressed by Mr. Blaine, that Canadians should be taught that they cannot be Americans and Canadians at the same time. Canadians must be taught that they cannot be American citizens and at the same time come here and assist in controlling the legislation of this country.

Mr. FRASER. That argument does not apply to this case. The fact of a man declaring his intention to do a thing is not the performance of it. If so, every man who declared his intention to steal would be entered as having stolen. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Bill should cover cases where the parties had simply declared their intention to ultimately become American citizens.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Some of the States permit a man who declares his intention, and makes a formal declaration to that effect, of becoming an American citizen, to enjoy all the rights of American citizenship although he may not have been a resident long enough to have become a citizen.

Mr. FRASER. He has only certain rights concerning municipal matters, and he is not a full citizen. He is not a full citizen unless he has taken out his naturalization papers, as in this country. There is no necessity of placing such a clause in this Bill.

Mr. MASSON. In the Western States men, on filing such declarations, secure many of the rights of citizenship. If these people choose to go to a foreign country and make a declaration of their intention to become citizens, it is only right that we should provide that they should have nothing to do with the Government of this country.

Mr. CHARLTON. The object of making this declaration is to enable persons to hold real estate. In many States aliens are not allowed to hold property, but in no State, I believe, does the filing of such declaration entitle such a person to the right of citizenship and suffrage. The person has simply the right to acquire property; but he is not a citizen, he has simply made a declaration of his intention to become a citizen, and is looking forward to the enjoyment of the rights connected therewith. I do not think that a person going from Canada to the United States, making possibly a declaration of his intention to become an American citizen in order to hold real estate, but not consummating his papers by becoming a citizen, perhaps returning to Canada and never becoming an American citizen, should be prevented from subsequently voting here. We will go far enough in declaring that an individual shall lose his right to vote after he has become an American citizen.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does the promoter of the Bill intend to bar out any persons who have acquired property in the United States? Some young men may go to that country, may possibly file declarations to become American citizens in order to acquire property, and may subsequently return to Canada. Will this Bill permit such young men to vote or not? This question should be carefully considered, and it should be stated as to whether this Bill will place such men under the ban, and if so, for how many years after the return. There are members in this House who have acquired property in the United States, and I wish to know if this Bill is intended to strike a blow at them. It would be well that the promoter of the Bill should take the House into his confidence and let it be known whether it is intended to meet such cases.

Mr. McMULLEN. I concur in the view expressed by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson). There are no less than fifteen states in which a man may vote for President if he has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States. I can give the names of the states, if my statement is challenged.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That Bill No. 5 be referred to a special committee consisting of Messrs. Wood (Brockville), Cameron (Huron), Amyot, Barron, Sir Adolphe Caron, Sir John Thompson, Langelier, Desjardins (L'Islet), Montague, Skinner and McKeen.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 31) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. He said: The Bill I shall call the attention of the House to is one which I trust will commend itself to the Minister of Justice and to the Cabinet. I have introduced this Bill without any desire to make political capital or to make a point against the Government, but simply with a desire to correct an abuse which has existed and which is liable to occur again. The Bill is a brief one and I shall preface my remarks by reading its provision:

"Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

"1. Section thirty-nine of 'The Electoral Franchise Act,' chapter five of the Revised Statutes, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"'39. If, from any cause, the list of voters for any polling district is not revised and certified at the time when it should, under this Act, be sent to the returning officer at any election, then the last list of voters, revised and certified for such polling district, shall be sent to the returning officer and used at such election: but if such last list is not as recent as the last list of voters prepared under the laws of the province in which such polling district is situate, then such last provincial list shall be sent to the returning officer and used at such election.'"

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had two revisions of the Dominion list under the Franchise Act since 1885. These revisions are expensive and vexatious. They are vexatious to the members, vexatious to the provinces and to the Dominion at large, and I have no doubt that many members of this House would be pleased if the revision of the lists for the present year is postponed. We had the last general election held upon an old list, and I presume that there was scarcely a young man in the Dominion of Canada under twenty-three years of age who was entitled to a vote. The result was that many thousands of young men who ought to have voted and who were entitled to a vote, were not able to do so in consequence of the delay in the revision of the voters' lists, as the list was practically two years old at the time the election was held. The elections were held upon a list which disfranchised all the young men, which left on the voters' lists thousands of men who were dead and who were in many cases personated; a list which included thousands of men who had removed from the country, because the older the voters' list is the larger the number of people on it who do not live in the country. The consequence of this was that at the last election we had not a fair expression of public opinion. It was estimated that there were fifty thousand young men debarred from voting who had a right to vote, thirty or forty thousand dead men on the list, many of whom were voted for by personators, and tens of thousands of voters who were out of the country, and there was a disposition in some quarters to use improper means to bring these men back. The result of this condition of things was most unfavourable to political morals, and the consequence of it was to secure a verdict which in many cases was not one that would not have been given if the lists contained the names of those actually entitled to vote.

This Bill does not propose that the provincial list shall be substituted for the Dominion lists except in cases such as occurred last election, where the Dominion list was an old one and where manifestly it was unjust to have used this list. This Bill proposes that in such cases, where the provincial list is a more recent one, and if for any cause a revision has not been made under the Dominion Franchise Act, and the Dominion list does not properly represent the electorate of the country, then in such cases the provincial list if more recent, will be substituted for the Dominion list. I think this proposition is a very fair one and if the Government orders a revision of the Dominion lists every year, its provisions are of course inoperative, but if for any reasons, one, or two, or three years should elapse without a revision and there should be a bye-election in the meantime, this election would be held on the provincial list. If, as was the case last year, there should be a general election precipitated on the country and there was an old Dominion list, under the operation of which no one under twenty-three years of age could vote, then it would be in the interest of the country generally to adopt a voters' list which would allow these young men to vote and which had all the names of those entitled to vote upon it, and the names of dead men and absentees excluded. Looking at the matter entirely free from political bias I think that it would be in the interest of the country generally to adopt the provision of this Bill. I move the second reading of this Bill, hoping that my motion will be carried and that the Minister of Justice will consent that the Bill be referred to a special committee to see if there is anything in its provisions which would be advantageous or useful to the country.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very sorry that I cannot acquiesce in the opinion so politely expressed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when he invited me to concur with him in making this Bill law. I think its adoption would introduce very serious confusion into the franchise law of this country and I am inclined to believe from the observations which the hon. gentleman himself made at the close of his remarks that he has hardly himself realized the confusion that would result. If the qualifications of voters for local elections and for Dominion elections were the same, and it were a mere question of the remoteness of the revision it would be a matter of no concern which list was taken and it would be most desirable to have the most recent one, but we cannot forget that the franchises are materially different in some of the provinces ; indeed in some of them widely different.

Mr. CHARLTON. They are different under the Dominion list also.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Now, it is absolutely necessary that we should have certainty, whatever inconvenience or delays there may be, as to what the franchise is, and as to the persons who should exercise that franchise. But under this Bill, in certain circumstances one set of persons might be qualified to vote for a member of Parliament, and a few days later an entirely different set, and only that set, would have the right to vote. I suppose the case which the hon. gentleman probably had in his mind, and in which the inconvenience would be somewhat less, is the case of a suspension of the Franchise Act for a year. I infer that from the hon. gentleman's closing remark that the operation of a Bill like this would have the effect of compelling the Government to prompt revisions—I suppose he meant regular revisions without suspensions. If that is his object, the Bill would come up more appropriately as a clause in a Bill providing for the suspension of the Franchise Act, because I need not inform him that without a special Act the revision must go on. But what I wish particularly to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the House to is the unforeseen inconvenience—for I think the hon. gentleman has hardly foreseen it—which would result, even with prompt and regular revisions of the lists, from the passage of this Bill. Let the present law be carried out regularly and fairly, and the lists completed by the 1st of November every year, as I suppose they could be. In all conscience those lists ought to be good for twelve months. But a vacancy occurs in the following June, before the time for revising the lists again comes around. In the month of May, the local revision has taken place ; so that in the month of June, were the hon. gentleman's Bill in force, we should find that all the electors who were qualified in November would be disqualified in June, and the lists made in the month of May would come into force instead. Not only would that inconvenience be open to occur in any province in which there would be a different date for revision from the date for the revision of the Dominion lists, but in point of fact there would be different dates in the different provinces, because I venture to say that the revision is completed at a different date in every province in Canada. So that, if we adopt this amendment we shall never know, when a bye-election is likely to occur in a province, under what list or what electoral qualification the election is to be carried on. I think the hon. gentleman will see that it would lead to an enormous amount of uncertainty, an uncertainty multiplied by the number of provinces in Canada ; and I therefore feel compelled, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's courtesy in recommending this Bill to my consideration, which I duly appreciate and very often comply with, to move that it be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day three months.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With most of the observations made by the hon. Minister of Justice, I must say I concur. I think my hon. friend, whose motives I have no doubt were the best, had not fully considered the difficulties and inconveniences that would arise necessarily from the passage of his Bill. It is absolutely essential, in matters of this kind, that there should be certainty—that the candidate on the one hand and the electorate on the other should know on what lists the election would be conducted ; but the Bill of my hon. friend, so far from introducing certainty, would introduce an amount of uncertainty which would be very trying. As between the Dominion franchise and the provincial franchises I have never scrupled to declare my preference for the provincial, but this is not the question now before us. The fact that the provincial lists are not coterminous with the Dominion electoral districts would involve a difficulty which could not be overcome. I hope my hon. friend will not press the Bill to a division, as I certainly cannot concur in it, and would be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. WALLACE. Another difficulty would arise in this way : The provincial lists are prepared by the various municipalities. In case there are no appeals to the county judge, the lists are certified by him at least as early as October in each year, while if there are any appeals, the hearing of them is fixed for some time ahead, and the lists are not completed until a later period, perhaps not till January. The result might be that in the same district you would have to use the Dominion list in one municipality and the provincial list in another. For this reason I think the Bill should not become law.

Mr. SPROULE. I think all amendments should be designed to make the law as simple as possible ; but if this Bill were carried, it would only cause the worst kind of confusion. Suppose a voter came up to a polling booth, and you wanted to swear him, which oath would you put, the Dominion or the provincial? Then, the Dominion law provides that one man may vote in different ridings, while the provincial law provides for one man one vote. In other respects the rules of voting in the two cases are different. So that the only result of passing this Bill would be to introduce confusion, and perhaps a violation of the law, though unintentionally, by returning officers and voters.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. Minister of Justice is not willing to accept the Bill or to submit it to a committee to see whether it can be made acceptable, I submit to his decision and will withdraw it. I must say, however, in justice to myself, that the reasons urged against the Bill, many of them, I am not able to see the weight of. In every state in the American Union the revision of the lists takes place immediately before the elections, and it is held wrong to hold an election on a list even three months old. I think it is not an objection to this Bill to say that a revision of the Dominion lists might take place on the first of January, and then an election be held six months later on provincial lists revised a couple of months later than the first of January, but on the contrary that is a recommendation. It is an advantage to have an election on lists revised one month previously rather than on those revised seven months previously. I do not see any advantage in the Dominion franchise, with regard to equalization over the provincial lists. There is as much inequality under the Dominion Franchise as in the franchises of the various provinces. Under the Dominion Act, there is universal suffrage in some provinces and not in others, and there are different property qualifications in different provinces, so that no claim of uniformity can be made with regard to the Dominion lists in preference to the provincial lists. I believe the most recent lists should be used, as it is not in the public interest to use a list seven months old in preference to one revised but a month previous to the election. Although the object of the Bill is to provide for cases where a greater disparity exists than that, I do not believe the objection made can lie against the measure. Of course, I hold that the provincial franchises are, on all occasions, preferable to the Dominion franchises. I hold that we should go back to the provincial lists and that any step in that direction is in the right direction; but of course I bow to the decision of the Minister of Justice, and will give him not only three months but twelve months to consider it.

Amendment (three months' hoist) agreed to.

PREVENTION OF FRAUDS.

Mr. BURDETT moved second reading of Bill (No. 42) to prevent fraud in the sale of certain articles. He said: I cannot speak for the eastern or western provinces, but I know, as a matter of fact, that very extensive frauds have been committed on the farming community in the central part of Ontario by men who have sold hulless oats and other seed grain to farmers, obtaining from them promissory notes, the sellers giving the farmers bonds to purchase in the fall the produce of the seed grain so sold. For example, they will get a farmer to buy ten bushels of hulless oats at ten dollars per bushel, taking his note for a hundred dollars. They will then give him a bond to take back twenty bushels of the proceeds of those oats in the fall at ten dollars a bushel and to sell the balance of the crop produced from that ten bushels at $7.50 per bushel, the farmer allowing 25 per cent. commission. When the fall comes round, these parties will redeem their bond by selling the crop to the neighbouring farmers on similar terms, being thus enabled to hand over to the first farmer sufficient notes or money to cover their indebtedness. Thus, they can go on perpetrating the fraud, and in the county from which I come it has been carried on for three years. Last year public attention was drawn to it by newspapers in the city of Belleville, and the schemers had to leave the country. Still, frauds to a very great extent were committed there. I think I am within the bounds when I say that in the neighbourhood of one hundred thousand dollars has been taken out of the community in this way. That scheme has been practised of late in other parts of Ontario. This same class of men will go to a farmer and dispose of an article, say a piano, and get the farmer to sign a document by which he agrees to assist in selling four on condition that he will then become the owner of the one in the house. Another agent will soon come along and the farmer will find that he has signed an absolute order for the piano at a price of, say, $480, for which the agent will insist on his giving a promissory note, and all he will have in return is a basswood box filled with penny whistles. I propose to meet that class of frauds, first, by preventing any person from taking notes or other securities for the sale of cereals or other grain, or musical instruments, or farm implements, where the sale is of a fictitious character, or at double the market value of the article sold. I propose also to reach the case of persons who give bonds to become agents for selling this class of property. I propose to make guilty of misdemeanour all those who, knowing the character of those notes, receive or dispose of any notes or securities they may get in that way, or that they may get by reason of their becoming agents to sell for the farmers. This Bill reaches the case completely and in saying that I speak with knowledge of the law of which it is a transcript. This is virtually taken from the statutes of Ohio, where similar frauds were committed for a number of years, and where it was found effectual in putting down that class of fraud. It is true our court of appeal has held that the persons to the original transaction, those who had knowledge of the character of the notes and the transaction, could not recover from each other, but that if the notes had fallen into the hands of an innocent purchaser, they would have to be met at maturity. I may also state that I understand from the legal gentleman who argued the case in the Court of Appeal in Ontario, that it was suggested by the court it was time a law of this nature was passed. I know of the case of a man who is to-day in prison for having carried out one of those piano transactions, but under another section of the criminal law, he having been indicted for fraud. I trust the Minister of Justice will permit this Bill to become law. It can do no injustice to honest dealers, as it only treats of cases where property is sold at a fictitious price or at a price double its value. I trust, therefore, there will be no serious opposition to this Bill. It is in the right direction, and I believe its passage will deter men from going into similar transactions and being robbed. It may be said that anyone who enters into such a transaction and makes a note of this kind is served right if he gets beaten. That is true to a certain extent, but a man's folly often reaches further than himself. His wife and family who have done more than he has to make the farm valuable may suffer, and thus innocent people may be wronged.

I hope this Bill will meet with the approval of the House as it has met with the approval of the Legislatures in many of the States and as I believe it has the approval of the people generally.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Is this the Bill which was introduced last year?

Mr. BURDETT. Yes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I forget what the fate of it was last year.

Mr. BURDETT. You intended to bring in some amendments to the criminal law. I was unfortunately ill at the end of the session and was unable to be here, and the Minister of Justice did not deal with this measure. I think it was to have been incorporated in the criminal law amendment, if the Minister of Justice approved of it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I remember now that I was introducing a Bill amending the criminal law, and intended to refer that Bill and this one to a committee, but the hon. gentleman was unfortunately not able to be here. I think the Bill is a good one. The only objection is the preference it proposes to give. We are endeavouring to pass a criminal law amendment Bill which will probably be dealt with by the House, but, if the hon. gentleman thinks this measure is urgently required, I will not persist in objecting to its passage.

Mr. BURDETT. I know that there is a person now charged with attempting to commit some of the frauds at which this Bill is aimed. They are attempting to reach him through another clause of the criminal law. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should allow the Bill to pass, and, when he does codify the criminal law, he should incorporate this provision, or something like it, in his measure. I know this is of paramount importance to the people of the County of Hastings and the adjoining County of Prince Edward, and I think the Minister of Customs will agree with me in that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is this a copy of the law in force in the United States?

Mr. BURDETT. Yes; of the law in the State of Ohio.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am glad to hear that the Minister of Justice approves of the principle of this Bill, and I hope he will allow it to become law this session. I understand that he does not intend to proceed this session with the Bill for the codification of the criminal law, and I, therefore, hope he will allow this Bill to pass. I know that the frauds which have been spoken of by my hon. friend prevail to a considerable extent in the west. The only objection I have to the Bill is that it does not cover a great many other cases, but it does cover a very extensive class of frauds; and if the Minister of Justice is in favour of the principle, I hope he will allow it to pass the second reading, refer it to a special committee if necessary, and by the strong arm of the law stamp out a class of frauds which is very prevalent.

Mr. BERGIN. I think this is a very valuable Bill, and will be productive of much good, but I agree with the last speaker that it should take a wider range and include other articles which are being sold in a most fraudulent way by which people are being robbed every day. I hope the Minister of Justice will allow this to go through this session.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that there might be some conflict of jurisdiction between this measure and the provincial laws in reference to contracts, but, if it were possible to frame a Bill which would not interfere with the provincial legislation, I think it would be very important that this Bill or some other provision of the kind should become law at an early date. It is patent to every member, especially from the rural districts of Ontario, that a certain class of individuals are going around every year victimizing the farmers and taking their hard earnings and giving little or nothing in return. If a law of this kind were put in force, I believe the passage of it would have a good effect. These people are careful not to go into towns and villages but to keep to the rural districts where they are not likely to be detected by those who understand the law better. I think there were thousands of dollars taken out of East Grey a few years ago for seed grain. One year it is seed grain, another year it is implements, and so on, but the fraud is carried on almost incessantly and the farmers are being victimized by unprincipled men. I think, if it were possible, this Bill should go further, and that manufacturers who sell agricultural implements should be prevented from taking a lien of such a character that prevents the farmer from disposing of any portion of his stock until that lien is disposed of. If the farmer sells a horse, if he has bought a mower or binder or reaper, the manufacturer has a lien, with such provisions that the note becomes due at once, though it may not be properly due for a year, and the purchaser of the horse may be sued at any time and the note collected from him. While it may be true that many manufacturers will not take advantage of this provision, I think it should not be left in their power to do so, and the notes which are given out at present by manufacturers to their agents for signature by the farmers are a disgrace to any civilized country. There is no reason why the manufacturer should have a lien on all the property of a farmer, when perhaps the value of his purchase may be only $14. I think the law should prevent the manufacturer from having the power to do that. I would not abrogate the section itself, but I would prevent manufacturers from taking a lien upon a man's property that would prevent him selling that property to advantage when necessary.

Mr. McMULLEN I desire to say a word upon this subject. Hon. gentlemen will remember that during the last Parliament one of the members from Hamilton (Mr. Brown) asked for a committee to enquire into frauds practised upon farmers. I happened to be a member of that committee, and the member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), whom I do not see now in his place, was also a member of that committee. We took up something like six weeks in the investigation, and although we were aware in our individual experience of the frauds committed in the several sections of the Dominion from which we came, we were surprised to find how general they were in all sections of the country, and I am quite certain that the interest taken by Mr. Brown at that time in finding out the existence of those frauds led to the introduction of this Bill. I think it is fully time that we should have such a measure. I quite agree with the remarks dropped by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). There are enormous frauds practised in the way in which notes are now taken by implement agents, the notes reciting that if the party parts with any portion of his property the note shall mature at once. I have known cases in which these have been used, and parties have almost ruined some men by suing on the notes, although they were not due for two or three years. I do not know whether we can reach anything of that kind in this House. I think there is an Act of the Ontario Legislature which would reach these parties, although I am not sure. However, I am quite in accord with the spirit of the Bill introduced by the hon. member, and I am exceedingly pleased to learn that the Minister of Justice is disposed to recognize its importance, and to give it his serious consideration, with the view of having it become law at the earliest possible date.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. gentleman has not alluded to another class of frauds that have been largely practised in the West—that is, the lightning rod frauds. A case came under my observation where a lightning rod agent came into a settlement and went to a farmer, and asked the privilege of putting lightning rods on his buildings without costing him anything, as the agent only wished to put up the rods for an advertisement. The farmer was simple and uneducated, and the agent got him to sign what he supposed was a paper allowing him to put a lightning rod on his barn without being guilty of trespass. But after the man had left the farmer's suspicions were aroused, and it turned out that he had signed an order for a lot of lightning rods, and given his note for them, and it almost ruined the man when he had to pay the note. I think this Bill is necessary in the interest of the agricultural community, and I hope the Minister of Justice will not throw any impediment in the way of its becoming law. It may be impossible to include in this Bill all classes of frauds practised upon farmers; but if a Bill was once passed and it was found to be ineffective, it could be amended so as to cover other classes of frauds.

Mr. CORBY. I agree with the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) that it is very important that this Bill should pass this session. The County of Hastings has been overrun for years with hay-fork agents, hulless oats agents, and seed-wheat men, and I hope the Government will take up this Bill and pass it this session.

Mr. BARRON. The House will probably remember that in the first and second session of the last Parliament this matter was brought up by way of resolution, and a committee was appointed, who went on and took evidence throughout the first session, and also, I think, during the next session. That evidence was printed in book form and distributed, and was very useful indeed. I think there was a consensus of opinion in that committee that it would be very difficult indeed to legislate so as to meet the variety of cases which came before the committee. There is no doubt whatever that a large portion of the community, throughout Ontario especially, are demanding legislation of the kind proposed by the hon. member for Hastings. It seems to me, however, that the criminal law, such as we have to-day, will reach nearly every case that has occurred.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. BARRON. Well, some hon. gentlemen say "no," but I think that if they will put the criminal law in force they will find that it will reach the majority of cases, at all events. That has been my experience, because I have had something to do in prosecuting men who have carried on these vicious practices. There is, however, this much to be gained by this legislation, that it aims at these practices which have been carried on, and it may frighten people who have been in the habit of carrying them on and prevent them from doing so in the future. However, if it is possible I hope that some such legislation as is proposed may be brought about, and perhaps my suggestion that the work of the committee during the first and second session of the last Parliament might be utilized will be adopted by the Minister of Justice. He might examine that evidence and take in the variety of cases that came before the committee, with a view of framing legislation that would cover them all.

Mr. MASSON. I quite agree with the principle of this Bill, and think it is very necessary that these frauds should be met in detail by special legislation. Many years ago we had a very extensive clause put in our Criminal Act, known as the omnibus clause, which was supposed to embrace all these kinds of frauds. The gentleman who has just spoken says that in many cases these frauds can be reached by that law, but my experience, not in prosecuting, but in defending, is that it is very hard to secure a conviction. In fact, grand juries throw out the bill. When the Crown closes the case judges dismiss the accused: when petit juries consider them they find them not guilty. These fraudulently-disposed persons display great ingenuity, and with a full knowledge of the statute as it stands to-day, they try in some way to evade the strict language of the statute. Even when this Act provides a penalty for selling these articles at a fictitious price or at a double price, they will evade it in some way by selling a little less than double price, and in that way, being at the same time assisted by grand juries and by petit juries, they will succeed in evading the penalties which they should incur. I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, and I think many of the points that have been spoken of should be embraced in it—not that I believe the placing of such an Act on the Statute-books would frighten or alarm those fraudulent persons and prevent them attempting to carry out their nefarious practices, but it would enable us, when they do so, to secure convictions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the state of our society is that indicated, I fear very much that the passage of this Bill will not give any relief. If grand juries fail to find bills against such parties, if petit juries refuse to find them guilty, and that under the direct cognizance and with the consent of the judge, no Act that can be passed will relieve the evil. I am quite sure nearly every hon. gentleman is in favour of the object of the present Bill. Personally, I agree with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron) in the opinion, and I think it is one worthy of consideration, that the law as it stands enables you to reach any person who commits a fraud such as is contemplated by this Bill. The difficulty I have always found is, that the person committing the fraud leaves the country, and the note or other security signed by the farmer is left in the hands of an innocent endorsee. The bill is sued on, and recovery cannot be prevented. There is no measure to punish a man who holds innocently a bill. If this proposed measure were adopted the obstacles and difficulties would be increased, because if grand and petit juries are disposed not to find these persons guilty—and I cannot see why their sympathies should be with the criminal or offender—you are, by defining the offence, as this Bill does, rendering the difficulties of conviction double what they are at present. I find some of the clauses very difficult to understand. For instance, a man must sell an instrument, and he must sell it at a "fictitious price." What is a "fictitious price?" How are you going to define it? The law does not define it. The hon. gentleman must not imagine I am raising captious objections. I am only looking at the Bill as a lawyer. I personally would like to assist in the passage of any Bill which would punish people engaged in these frauds, but I have been long enough in Parliament to know that hasty legislation does not always attain the desirable end which many hon. gentlemen have in view, and it is very desirable that this Bill should be very closely scrutinized and its language to a certain extent simplified.

Mr. COCHRANE. I desire to offer a remark from the farmer's standpoint. These frauds are being perpetrated throughout the country, and I am sorry to come to the conclusion that all the legal ability in this House appears unable to frame a statute that will cover these cases. It is strange that with all the legal ability here, and the knowledge that these frauds are being constantly perpetrated, this House is not able to cope with the evil. If lawyers cannot cope with it, let a committee of farmers be appointed and they will try to do so. We had the fact brought prominently before the House and country by a committee appointed to consider this question, and of which I happened to be a member, that these frauds were perpetrated to an alarming extent in the western part of Ontario, and my constituents suffered very largely from these frauds. Some people say that farmers are fools. They are not fools, but they allow these rascals to impose on their honesty. It is because the farmers are honest, and not fools, and because they expect that other people are as honest as themselves, that they permit these frauds to be perpetrated on them, and then find they are mistaken. I hope the House will try to frame a Bill to cover the case. It goes without saying that at present these rascals cannot be reached, but I trust the law will be so amended that they will be dealt with by its stern hand.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has too little faith, both in the power of lawyers to frame a suitable Bill, and, more than all, in the common law of the country, which is more to be relied on than is the ingenuity of any draughtsman. I agree with a great deal that has been said by hon. members. Any man who commits the offences enumerated is guilty of a felony or a misdemeanour, and can be indicted and punished; nevertheless, I do not oppose the passage of the Bill on that ground. I am convinced that sometimes offences of a peculiar nature crop up all over the country, and people do not realize that the law is strong enough to punish the offenders. It is supposed that some of these offences are not punishable by law, and sometimes advantage is gained by declaring what the law is. I hope the Bill will be read a second time, and to-morrow we can go into committee on it, after giving attention to the points mentioned by hon. gentlemen to-night.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 108) to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to enable coulées, where water can be stored, to be guarded from contamination. The first clause provides that wherever, under this Act, lands entered either for homestead or pre-emption are sold or otherwise disposed of, and there is water on a coulée or ravine in said lands, or which may be utilized for the purpose of forming a reservoir for storing water, such entry or disposal may be made subject to the condition that no building shall be erected within a specified distance from the border of such coulée or ravine, the object being to provide water for the cattle and to keep it from being contaminated by outhouses or other buildings. The other clause provides for the repeal of section 43 of the Dominion Lands Act, and proposes to substitute one in its place, the only difference between the clause to be substituted by this Bill, and the clause in the Act of 1887, being that instead of 1887, 1889 is inserted. Should this clause be adopted, you will hear no more of second homesteads in this House. The next clause provides that where land has been homesteaded and five years have elapsed without the homesteader taking out his patent, his interest may be sold by the municipality, or the school board, for the taxes levied by the municipality or school section in which they are situated. At present, by not taking out a patent in time, the homesteader escapes the school tax, and, if in a municipality, the municipal tax, whereas those who have been energetic and have taken out patents have to bear the whole burden. There is a difficulty about this, but I fain would hope, if the Government approve of the clause, they will be able to overcome it. The difficulty is that we are trying to collect taxes in regard to land, the patent of which has not passed to the homesteader. The Government is still seized of the land, but these people if they have, say, forty or fifty acres and a house worth $500 or $600 on the one hundred and sixty acres, have clearly an interest there; and if we could so manage that the municipality or school board should be able to tax the interest, then the chances are that, instead of the homesteader holding back to avoid taxation he would, at the end of three years, take out his patent, or, at all events, as soon as he had fulfilled the conditions.

The next clause provides that from and after the 1st January, 1895, no patents shall be issued to the homesteader except on the condition that should the land be suffered to remain two consecutive years without cultivation of at least fifteen acres, the homestead shall revert to the Government, and any homestead sold by the homesteader, or by anyone who has purchased from him, shall be sold subject to the same condition. There, again, I apprehend that in this House and out of it there may be some adverse criticism, but the object is one which has been pressed upon my attention by the farmers in the North-West, and it would effectually prevent homesteads being dealt with as a speculation. We have a large number of what are called buckboard farmers, men who fulfil the letter of the law without carrying out its spirit; and the moment they get their patent they allow weeds to grow on the fifteen acres they have cleared, and the shack they have built goes to ruin and decay. I know that I am, in some of these clauses, out of order; but I hope the Government will take them, and indeed the whole Bill, in hand. This would effectually prevent any person buying a homestead from a homesteader without intending to cultivate it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know whether the attention of the Minister of Justice has been called to the provisions of this Bill, but I question whether it is in order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that part of it is in order and part is not.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 107) to incorporate the Burrard Inlet and Westminster Railway Company.—(Mr. Corbould.)

Bill (No. 109) to regulate private detective, financial and commercial agencies and corporations.—(Mr. Sproule.)

MARITIME PROVINCES—GEOLOGICAL MAPS.

Mr. FRASER asked, When do the Government intend to publish accurate geological maps of the Counties of Guysborough, Antigonish, Pictou, Colchester and Halifax? When published, what will be the size of each?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It would be impossible to state precisely the time when the geological maps referred to can be published. The survey in Nova Scotia is progressing satisfactorily in view of the small strength of the staff available for the work. When the surveys are completed they have to be plotted, reduced and drawn for the engraver, and are, when engraved, published in sheets of uniform size (12 by 18 inches) covering 3,456 square miles. The first sheet (Cape Canso) is already engraved, and will be published during the year.

EAST RIVER—DEEPENING.

Mr. FRASER asked, What amount do the Government propose expending this year in deepening the East River, Pictou, between New Glasgow and Pictou?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The distance from the harbour to the town of New Glasgow is six miles. To open a channel 120 feet wide over this distance, to a depth of 16 feet below low water, will cost $208,923; for a depth of 18 feet, $299,000; and for a depth of 21 feet, $466,125. Therefore the Government do not intend expending money this year for this purpose.

NEW HARBOUR, &c., BREAKWATERS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Do the Government propose building breakwaters at New Harbour and Port Hillford, Guysborough County, this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In 1874 an examination was made at New Harbour, Guysborough County, relative to the construction of a breakwater, the cost being placed at $53,500. No action was taken. During 1884 the department was asked to ascertain if a small and comparatively inexpensive work could be built at New Harbour, for the benefit of the fishermen. The report furnished states that owing to its extremely exposed position and the want of any natural protection, it would not be possible to provide a comparatively inexpensive shelter for fishing boats or craft of any kind, and a breakwater near the head of the cove would have to be of considerable length, and to be constructed in a strong and massive manner to withstand the heavy seas and undertow from the Atlantic. Nothing is known in the department of any place in Guysborough County under the name of Port Hillford. The Government do not intend going on with the works this year.

RED RIVER SURVEYS.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar) asked, Are the surveys on the Red River yet completed and reported upon? If so, what is the estimated cost of the necessary improvements on the said river for the purpose of navigation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The surveys have been completed and reported on. The estimated cost of the works proposed is $922,000.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH WASHINGTON.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. LAURIER. May I ask the Minister of Justice if he can give us a definite answer in reference to when the correspondence with Washington will be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that all the remaining papers which will be available this session will be laid on the Table on Monday.

ACCOMMODATION OF OFFICIAL REPORTERS.

Mr. BARRON. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a matter to which I drew his attention last session. If he could find it convenient to visit the room which is occupied by the Hansard reporters, he will find eighteen gentlemen working in a room 18 ft. by 25 ft. It is almost impossible for them to do their work or even to live in such quarters with comfort. The Minister promised last year to give this matter his attention, but nothing has been done in regard to it. I understand that, prior to the last Parliament, the Hansard reporters had a room above that in which they now are, but that the predecessor of the present Speaker took that room from them, and they had to put up with their present accommodation. I am informed that you, Mr. Speaker, do not find it necessary to use that room, but I understand that it has been occupied as a private room by some members of this House on the back benches, and, I think, in view of the limited accommodation we have, before those members are considered the Hansard reporters ought to be considered, because we know what their work is and how difficult it is for them to perform it in a room such as they now have. I hope the Minister of Public Works will promise that he will at once see that these gentlemen have better accommodation provided, for it is impossible for them to do their work with any view to comfort or even to health in the room they now have.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I remember that the hon. gentleman called my attention to this matter last year, and I enquired about it; but the hon. gentleman knows how difficult it is, when rooms are occupied, to evict the tenants, and therefore, I have not found it possible to accede to his recommendation of last year. However, now that my attention has been called to this matter again, I think I will be able to give some more accommodation, or certainly will try to do so, to these reporters, who certainly deserve more room than they now have.

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I wish now to answer the question which was put by the leader of the Opposition yesterday, who wanted to know whether I was ready, either to-day or on any other day, to make a statement as to the policy of the Government. I have this to communicate to the House: The Government proposes to carry out the policy which has hitherto guided the Liberal-Conservative party, the outlines of which, in respect to the measures of this session, are indicated in the Speech from the Throne. The trade and financial policy will be declared in the Budget speech.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot say that the declaration just made by the leader of the House takes me in any way by surprise.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must say to my hon. friend that this practice of raising discussion on ministerial statements has, I think, reached a point that requires my intervention by calling for the Orders of the Day. It will be remembered that yesterday the discussion went on at considerable length, and I think it is about time that the practice should be put a stop to. I would ask the House to sustain me in endeavouring to put down that practice which, I think, if it continues to grow as it has done this session, will become a very inconvenient one for Parliament.

Mr. LAURIER. I bow to your ruling, and will give my humble assistance in carrying out your very safe policy. I did not rise for the purpose of criticizing the statement of the hon. Minister, but simply to point out to him that the promise of the Government somewhat reminds me of a certain place which is said to be paved with good intentions. I have no doubt at all that they want to follow the policy of the late Sir John Macdonald, but, in my estimation, they have already departed from it very widely, as I will, to-morrow, endeavour to convince the Government and the House.

PREVENTION OF FRAUDS.

The Order being read for House in Committee on Bill (No. 42) to prevent fraud in the sale of certain articles (Mr. Burdett),

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would respectfully suggest to the Minister of Justice that if he is in favour of this Bill, as he appears to be, the object of the Bill can be better obtained, in my judgment, by referring it to a select committee. It is an important Bill, and it cannot be as thoroughly considered in Committee of the Whole as it can be by half a dozen members sitting and quietly deliberating upon it. It may become necessary to enlarge the scope of the Bill to some extent, and it may become necessary to consider carefully the phraseology of the Bill, and I submit that that can be better done by a select committee than by the Committee of the Whole.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection at all to that course, if it commends itself to the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge, although it seems to me that the Bill is very carefully drawn.

Mr. BURDETT. I agree to the proposition.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I suggest that perhaps it might be well for the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett) to take a little time to select those members to whom he would like to refer the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Does the Minister consent that the reference of the Bill to a select committee should be made later on in the day?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

NORTH SHORE RAILWAY.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Langelier for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, papers, reports and documents in relation to the returning of the debentures of the North Shore Railway Company.

Mr. LAURIER. The answer given by the Minister of Justice to my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) requires, perhaps, a word in reply on my part, though a single word only. The answer given by the hon. Minister of Justice was, in the first place, that the Government of Canada had not at all interfered with the Canadian Pacific Railway to prevent them from improving the line of railway formerly known as the North Shore Railway. This was not at all the gist of the charge made by my hon. friend. He did not at all complain of the interference by the Government with the conduct of the North Shore Railway by the Canadian Pacific Railway, but he stated that by the action of the Government the Canadian Pacific Railway were placed in such a position that they had no object in improving the line, but, on the contrary, if they did improve it, they made their position towards the Government worse than it was before, and that until that position had been rectified the company allowed the road to deteriorate and would not at all attempt to make it better than it was. That is the gist of the charge made by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre. As to the rest of the charge brought by my hon. friend, the Minister simply stated that it was the intention of the Government during the present session to introduce a Bill with regard to this question, and he asked us to wait until then. He did not indicate what would be the character of the Bill. But the Bill can have but one object, and it is an object against which I must protest—the object of the Bill can only be to free that section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, formerly known as the North Shore Railway, from the encumbrance that now rests upon it in the shape of debentures. But why is this legislation necessary in the year 1891? Why should there be the necessity for such a measure as is contemplated? It is in the memory of every member who was in the House in 1884-85, that the policy then indicated by the Government was to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway to the city of Quebec, and to make the harbour of Quebec the summer terminus of that railway. Nothing can be more certain than what I have stated. It was declared by the then Minister of Railways, Sir Charles Tupper, and embodied in resolutions. Here is the language used by Sir Charles Tupper when this policy was first propounded in 1884:

"Thus the policy of Parliament and this Government has been that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall be extended on the north shore of the St. Lawrence down to the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, by the North Shore Railway, to Quebec, and thence by the Intercolonial Railway."

Such was at that time the declared policy of the Government—to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway along the south shore towards a maritime harbour, and on the north shore towards the city of Quebec, to make the harbour of Quebec the summer terminus, and to connect the North Shore Railway with the Intercolonial Railway. For this purpose a sum of money was appropriated, and it is to be found in the statute of 1885:

"For the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway from its terminus from St. Martin Junction, near Montreal, or some other point on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the harbour of Quebec, in such manner as may be approved by the Governor in Council, a subsidy not exceeding $6,000 per mile, and not exceeding in the whole $960,000."

At the same time Parliament appropriated this amount, $250,000 a year for twenty years for the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to a port of the Maritime Provinces, by the south shore. This latter part of the agreement has been carried out. The subsidies have been paid towards the completion of the railway from Montreal by the south shore to a port in the Maritime Provinces, but nothing of the kind has been done towards the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal to the city of Quebec. Certain transactions have taken place by the Government. The road has passed from the North Shore Company into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but neither the letter of the statute nor the intention of the statute has been carried out. This subsidy of $6,000 per mile, amounting to $960,000, has never been paid by the Government. The Government have distributed money; $960,000 have been taken out of the treasury, not towards carrying out the object contemplated, that is to say, the application of this subsidy for the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Quebec, but the Government have made an investment of that amount, and this sum is to be found entered in the Public Accounts. On page 12 of the Public Accounts we find, under the title of investments, North Shore Railway bonds amounting to $960,000. What my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Langelier) complains is, that the intention of Parliament in this matter has not been carried out, that neither the intention of Parliament nor the letter of the statute has been carried out, under which that sum of $960,000 should have been paid as a subsidy to the road and have discharged the liabilities and debts that were accruing. Instead of so acting, what has the Government done? It has simply purchased bonds, which are to-day assets of the Government of Canada. This was certainly not the intention of Parliament. When Parliament voted this money, it had no intention of voting it to be invested in this manner, but simply to have it applied in like manner to that adopted on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, and to have the railway carried as far as Quebec. But, instead of doing so, the Government have simply taken the bonds of the North Shore Road, and now hold them against the Canadian Pacific Railway, who are the owners of the road; and, under such circumstances, the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is simply to let the road go to decay and not improve it, because if they improve it they give value to those bonds and make it worse for the company to redeem them. That is what my hon. friend pointed out. The policy of the Government is such that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has no object in improving the character of the road. On the contrary, the company are serving their best interests in allowing the road to fall into decay, because then, forsooth, the Government bonds will be valueless, and the company will get rid of them. What we have asked, and what has been asked by the people of Quebec generally, is, simply, that the letter of the law should be carried out, and that the money voted in 1885 for this object should not be kept in the treasury in one form or another, because it is still in the treasury in the form of bonds, but should be applied to improving the character of the road. That is a just policy. This question was again and again brought before Parliament by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), and no dissent was ever expressed by the Government. During the last election there was a new departure. When a candidate was selected to contest Quebec Centre on behalf of the Conservative party against the present member, the Conservative candidate, Mr. Châteauvert, appeared flanked on one side by the Minister of Public Works and on the other side by the Minister of Militia and Defence, and he stated that he had the promise of the Government that justice would be done and the question connected with the $1,000,000 of North Shore Railway bonds would be settled. That is what we object to. The people of Quebec desire no favour, they simply ask for justice. What was the measure of justice demanded? It was simply one that could have been given long before. A measure, that should have gone into effect some years ago, was then held out as a bribe to the electors in order to corrupt them from their conscientious and correct view of public affairs generally. I say, again, that the people of Quebec desire no favour in this matter but simply ask for justice, and not only for justice but for the carrying out of the letter of the law; and if it had been carried out, we would not be now in our present position. I maintain the position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Langelier) yesterday, that it was a bribe offered, and that of the worst kind, because the people of Quebec were told that if they would elect a member to support the Government, then indeed they would have extended to them that measure of justice for which they were contending. The measure of the Government should come not as a favour but as a right, and as one carrying out the orders of Parliament.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think that yesterday, when I was out of the House for a few moments, the Minister of Justice answered the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier), and told him, among other things, that the Government intended, as we have stated before, to bring in a measure to settle this question. The hon. leader of the Opposition does not say that it is a bad thing.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. But the hon. gentleman is not pleased that this measure is to be brought in by us, not at his instance, but because we think it is for the public interest, for the interest of the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and also for the city of Quebec. Whether the good is done in that way by the present Government, or at the suggestion of my hon. friend opposite, surely he should not find fault with us when we are doing a good deed, for the hon. gentleman says it should be done, and that it should have been done some years ago. Suppose it should have been done as he suggests, now at all events he should not find fault with us because we are now adopting the course which he thinks should have been followed four or five years ago. The hon. gentleman calls this a new departure, on account of the election in Quebec Centre, and he represents the Conservative candidate (Mr. Châteauvert) as flanked on one side by the Minister of Militia, and on the other side by myself. I did not flank that gentleman very long, because I was only half an hour at one of the meetings, I being there as a citizen and an elector of the division. Unfortunately, I was not in the city to give my vote at that election, so the present member obtained an additional vote. I was present at the meeting, as I had a right to be, and as an elector. On being requested to address the electors, I did so in a very short speech, but I went there certainly for the purpose of showing that we were taking an interest in that election, in the same way as the member for Quebec Centre did not fail to have his friends to attend his meeting, and his wisdom in that regard was shown by the fact that he is here now. The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke of the sum of $960,000, the appropriation which was used for the purchase of bonds. Well, these bonds were a mortgage on the property itself, and whether we purchased the bonds or whether we gave the money to the company, it was certainly the same thing. The bonds were always there, and the money would have been in the hands of the company purely and simply to meet the bonds. In this case we purchased these bonds—I do not remember at the moment what was the amount we paid for them, but, if I am not mistaken, we purchased the bonds at a large discount, and, therefore, it was to the profit of the Government representing the country that these bonds were purchased in that way. To-day the question is not to go and squander these bonds, but the object is, as the Bill will show, to benefit the North Shore Railway and the city of Quebec. This money was given for that purpose and it is intended to be applied to that purpose. The hon. gentleman says that the interest of the company was not to improve the line, but rather to allow the line to run down, because, he says, if they improved the line then it would give value to these bonds and the company might have to pay interest on the bonds. I do not think there was much danger of that. I think the improvement of the line might not have given all the advantage that the hon. gentleman believes it would have given; but, on the other hand, the hon. gentleman must see that the traffic on that road must have increased, and is increasing very much just now. It will increase much more when the money which has been used for these bonds may be used in some other way. It is just the time to use this money now; the traffic is coming to this railway line, and if this very rapid line of steamers coming to the St Lawrence comes very soon——

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; they are coming very soon.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, no doubt; I hope they will, and when they do, the hon. gentleman will see at once that the improvements intended will be of great benefit, not only to the city of Quebec and to the north shore of the St. Lawrence, but to the country at large; and, therefore, this money which the hon. gentleman calls an investment has been properly invested, and now the use of that investment will be a very great advantage to the country. The hon. gentleman said—and I have no doubt that when he says it he believes it—that the appropriation made by Parliament of $1,000,000 or more was for the purpose of extending the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the city of Quebec. Well, that has been done; the road has been extended to that city, and now there is only a very little gap which may be necessary to fill up to join it with the Intercolonial Railway, and I suppose time will settle that question as it has settled many other difficult questions. At all events, let us take things quietly, one by one, and I have no doubt that in that way we will succeed tolerably well. In this case the Government has promised and intend to bring down a measure to settle this question. That Bill will be forthcoming, but the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to give us a little time to bring it down, because we have had very little time lately to consider these matters. However, as soon as we possibly can the Bill will be brought down, and then the hon. gentleman, as well as all the other members in the House, will be in a position to see how the matter will be settled in so far as the Government is concerned. The House can obtain this information from the papers asked for by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), and from the provisions of the Bill itself which the Government will submit to Parliament.

Mr. FRÉMONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the question brought up by the motion of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), is of such an importance, not only for the residents of the city of Quebec, but also for those of the district of Quebec and those of the whole Province of Quebec, that I cannot let the matter pass without saying a few words. Some years ago, when the question of the short line of the Pacific was debated in this House, the electors of the Province of Quebec were allowed to believe, nay, Mr. Speaker, were given promises, that the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be the harbour of Quebec. However, Mr. Speaker, owing to the position into which the Pacific Railway was placed, the company found that they had no interest in favouring trade and promoting business on their line between Montreal and Quebec. Such is the reason why the former North Shore Railway, that is to say, the portion between Montreal and Quebec, is not run any more as a main part of the line, but rather as a branch connecting Quebec with the great Pacific road. In that respect the whole electoral body of our district was greatly deceived, and for many years the electors of the district of Quebec and those who reside along the line of the former North Shore Railway, have been clamouring for justice. Until to-day, this justice was denied them. It is only during last elections, in the midst of the election broil, that at last silence was broken, and that the promises which were mentioned by the hon. member for Quebec Centre, and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) were made. I must say in addition that not only were these promises made in the city of Quebec, but that they were repeated in several other constituencies. A question of justice pure and simple was used as a powerful election lever. Thus, Mr. Speaker, in the county which I have the honour to represent here, the County of Quebec, one of the great arguments used by my opponent was that he had had long interviews with the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Militia, and that he had obtained the formal promise of a favourable settlement of the question now before the House, as well as the promise of help in the matter of the building of a bridge between the two shores of the St. Lawrence in front of the city of Quebec, or quite near. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that this question came before the House. I intend to discuss it more at length when the measure promised by the Government is presented. I hope that, at least, justice is to be rendered to this portion of the province, which is so vitally interested in the question before the House.

Mr. DELISE. (Translation.) I cannot let this question pass, in which the district of Quebec and particularly the county I represent are so much interested, without taking the floor to show that the Government, by the conduct they seem to have adopted during the last elections, is far from having deserved the congratulations and the sympathies of the district of Quebec. The question now before the House and which we have to consider, is not a new one. Since the building of the North Shore Railway, since the engagements taken by the city of Quebec, the Government has tried to induce the electors of the Province of Quebec, and especially of the district of Quebec, to support it, by ever fallacious promises that the city of Quebec would get what she was entitled to. When the time came for the decision as to where the terminus of the Pacific was to be, certain friends of the Government, making then a great show of devotion to the public good and of their personal disinterestedness, made loud but little to be feared threats to their party, trying to obtain from the Government a satisfactory arrangement for the city of Quebec. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, other interests carried the day. If we consider the contempt with which the Government seems to have treated the district of Quebec for the last ten years, it must be admitted that the Government has done very little for the interests of the district and Province of Quebec, notwithstanding its election promises. Mr. Speaker, during last elections the Government wanted to make a masterly stroke in trying to deceive the electors and promising to settle this important question. One of the most important men of the Conservative party was sent to Quebec, a man, who, for long years, was identified with all the important political questions which interested the Dominion, and particularly the Maritime Provinces and the Province of Quebec. This man, Mr. Speaker, was called from England; he was dragged away from his duties, and caused to come here in the midst of the election turmoil, in order to deceive the electors in giving fresh life to the promises which had so often been made and never fulfilled—I mean the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, who in the midst of an election, with the object of deceiving the electors of the city, of the district and of the Province of Quebec, came and held a public meeting in which he undertook to procure the settlement of important questions of interest for the district and particularly the city of Quebec. He told us in his speech there that the question of the debentures of the Pacific, which concerned the city of Quebec, would be settled. Then, Mr. Speaker, he induced the Conservative candidate, Mr. Châteauvert, to make the same promises. Mr. Châteauvert, pushing zeal very far, went the length of publishing over his own signature, in the newspapers, promissory notes, in which he stated that if he was elected the questions which were interesting the district and city of Quebec would be settled. Mr. Speaker, the members of the district of Quebec now wish to know if the Government made such promises to Mr. Châteauvert. We wish to know if Sir Charles Tupper was authorized to come and make these declarations to the public of Quebec. We desire to know whether the people of Quebec can depend upon the pledges of Mr. Châteauvert, and whether Mr. Châteauvert could depend on the pledges given to him by the Government. The whole question is there. Although this is the first time I occupy a seat in this House, I know that this is not the first time the members for the district of Quebec complain of their representatives in the Government. Now that the question is brought before the House, and in view of the dangers which threaten the Government, we hope that the representatives of the district of Quebec in the Government, will do justice to the city of Quebec, to the electors that they so often deceived, and thereby to the whole Province.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would not feel called upon to address you on this question, which has already been very well presented, if it was not for one point which I wish to elucidate. In referring to chap. 8 of 47 Victoria, it will be seen that, in 1884, the Dominion Government granted the Government of the Province of Quebec a sum of $6,000 per mile for the railway between Montreal and Quebec, on the north shore, and a sum of $12,000 per mile for the same railway between Montreal and Ottawa. Further on will be found another sum of $6,000 per mile given for the extension of the Pacific Railway from St. Martin's Junction to Quebec, that is to say, $960,000. Mr. Speaker, what I have to state I state here, while those who have known the facts are still in existence. I intend to reveal no secrets, to make known nothing of what took place in caucus; and I will only relate facts which became public at the time. I wish to record them here, in order that when we shall have a Government with the courage and ability to keep a pledge we may hope that the honest and true agreement then arrived at will be fulfilled. When it was requested from the Dominion of Canada, from the members convened in Parliament, to grant the Pacific Railway an additional help, amounting to about $30,000,000, we, the then ministerial members of the Province of Quebec, had a meeting, and said that we believed that the policy of building and supporting the Canadian Pacific was a good policy, provided it did not have the effect of exhausting the old provinces. We were ready to vote additional grants. I hear caterwaulings. If the night is not long enough for those cats, their propensities must be strong indeed to so bring them out in plain daylight. If the Government means to have ill-bred individuals as supporters, or if it wishes to pass for having such, it may let them behave in this way. If it is thought that we will be intimidated by such treatment it is a great mistake. We are good-natured enough not to use often our right to speak French in this House; but if an attempt should be made to curtail our rights and liberties in this respect it is the reverse that will be gained. Instead of spending here a session of two or three months listening to bad English spoken in this House, these people will be forced to stay one or two months longer hearing good French. Mr. Speaker, we, of the Province of Quebec, said that we were ready, provided we had a share of advantages equivalent to the sacrifice we were making. We did not prevent the other provinces doing the same. We did not prevent Ontario, New Brunswick nor Nova Scotia demanding what they wanted; but we, representing the Province of Quebec, made plain our demand. It may be said this is sectional. Well, when it comes a question of choosing Ministers, is not the choice a sectional one? When public moneys are to be apportioned, the total is always proportionately allotted to the provinces. So, we, of the Province of Quebec—and I say it openly, so that it may be well understood—we told the Government: We are ready to support the Canadian Pacific provided the Province of Quebec may have a quid pro quo. And then, in room No. 8, that room which remained famous, the Ministers came before all the ministerial representatives of the Province of Quebec, and they solemnly promised that the Government of that province would receive, as compensation, not $6,000 per mile, but $12,000 per mile, computed on the length of the railway from Ottawa to Quebec. And as early as 1884 this promise was broken, and $6,000 per mile only was granted for the road from Montreal to Quebec. So, this vote had been extorted from us under false pretences. Such was the commencement of the policy which was, later on, to bring disaster on the city and district of Quebec; for since these $960,000 were taken from the Province of Quebec to be given to the Canadian Pacific, what has been done? This sum was used to destroy the commerce of Quebec, because, owing to a contract imposed upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, it had become the interest of the Canadian Pacific to kill this commerce, in fettering traffic between Quebec and Montreal, in preventing the travelling public from using this road, and the merchants from sending their goods that way. From the date of this contract, the Canadian Pacific has been interested in having this road fail to pay, and it bends its efforts towards preventing it from becoming a paying road. Such being its interest, I do not blame the company; but I blame the Government for having broken the solemn pledge which they gave us then; and I blame them for having, ever since 1884, used this promised money, which belongs to the Province of Quebec, prejudicially to the interests of a great district, and contrary to the interests of the country, since its general commerce is thereby made to suffer. On the other hand, is the Government now ready to proclaim before the country that they can, on the eve of an election, in the full turmoil of a campaign, and in the name of the Government majority, say to the electors: Here are so many millions for the purchase of your votes? They have the courage of not admitting that they were wrong. They have the courage of not regretting having come to the electors and of having said: Here are millions; vote for us, in spite of our bad general policy, in spite of our having no trade with the United States——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, if those cats do not go back into the bag, let them remember that we have a voice that cannot be squealed down, and we will use it. It is really to be deplored, Mr. Speaker, that here we cannot be presumed to address an assembly composed entirely of gentlemen.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Government should not somewhat deplore the grave offence they committed during the election excitement. Happily the city and district of Quebec are enlightened enough not to allow themselves to be bought, to be bluffed, to be deceived by false promises. For a long while the Government has been at fault in this matter. They now promise to do better. Very well: let them do this; it will be in order afterwards to settle the accounts between them and the country. These are, Mr. Speaker, the observations I had in mind to make when I took the floor.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. Minister of Justice, in replying to me yesterday, misstated what I said. I never pretended that the Canadian Pacific Railway had been or were being prevented from improving the road. What I stated, and what I repeat to-day, is that under the arrangement entered into with the Government the company are not at liberty to make any improvements on the road out of the money voted for that purpose in 1885, without the consent of the Government. Of course, if they choose to make those improvements at their own expense, the Government would not interfere; they would be only too glad to see them made. But how can it be expected that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will improve the road at their own expense? It is not denied that the company have experienced the greatest difficulty in getting the consent of the Government, not only to important, but to most necessary improvements on the road itself, not to speak of the rolling stock. The hon. Minister of Public Works stated a few moments ago, that we should be satisfied with the statement he has made. We are satisfied, but he should not expect us to be very grateful to the Government. We do not owe anything to them, under the circumstances. In 1885 they got some of their supporters from the district of Quebec, to vote for the policy they were then proposing to the House, by promising to use $1,500,000 to make Quebec the terminus of the railway. Instead of doing so, they used nearly $1,000,000 of that money for another purpose altogether, for purchasing bonds. The members from the district of Quebec supporting the Government would never have voted for the policy of the Government on that occasion if the Minister of Public Works, who spoke for the Government, had stated to them: Gentlemen, we are asking you to vote $1,500,000, of which $1,000,000 is to be used, not to give you the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway in summer, but to buy $1,100,000 of bonds which Mr. Senecal has pledged. I am bound to say that the Government on that occasion obtained the votes of those gentlemen on false pretences: and as they did not intend to use the money for the purpose stated, they obtained the money from Parliament under false pretences also. But there is something worse. As has been stated by the hon. leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), that money, which belonged to us and was voted for us, and should have been used for the benefit of the city and district of Quebec, has been used as a bribe. They attempted to bribe the people of Quebec with their own money, and therefore it was worse than an ordinary bribe. Fortunately, the city and district from which I come is not one of those portions of the Dominion which can be bribed by railway subsidies. We have been asking the Government for improvements year after year; and when a local or bye-election has taken place, the attempt has been made to get the support of the electors by more or less definite promises of those improvements: but the electors of Quebec have always taken this position, which I hope they will always take: If those improvements are in the public interest, let them be made, no matter what our vote may be, and if not, we do not want to obtain an expenditure of money which is not in the public interest. But we need not be surprised that the Government have attempted to bribe our city and district with money belonging to them, because that is only carrying out the policy announced by the late leader of the Government. At a banquet given to that eminent statesman at Quebec three years ago, the question of that $1,000,000 of debentures, and of a subsidy to the bridge, was brought up; and what did he say in regard to it in the speech he delivered on that occasion? That it was the practice of his Government to bribe the people of the country with their own money; and he added, what is perfectly true, I think, that when he would leave the Government there would be very little money left in the public treasury for the Liberals if they came into power. I am sure that the promise to release that $1,000,000 was only intended as a bribe. What did the Government say, only two or three weeks before the beginning of this session? The board of trade of Quebec held a meeting at which they instructed their secretary to write to the Government, asking them when and in what manner the promise made by Sir Charles Tupper at the public meeting in Quebec would be redeemed. The reply of the First Minister was that the question was under the consideration of the Government. It was quite evident that when the bribe was held out by Sir Charles Tupper, there was not the slightest intention on the part of the Government to carry out the policy adopted by this Parliament in 1885, because, two months afterwards, the Prime Minister in this way intimated that the Government were then for the first time taking the question into consideration. This was not because the question had not been brought under their notice. Last year I brought it to the attention of the House, and the First Minister then said that that was the first time he had heard of it. Although he had two colleagues from Quebec, they had not said one word to him about it. I am glad that we have compelled the Government to-day to state at last that they will redeem the promise made in 1885 in this Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. There is one feature of this question which, I think, requires a little attention. We all sympathize with our friends from Quebec in their desire to improve their means of communication with the rest of the Dominion and the outside world: but some of the points referred to by the hon. member for Quebec Centre are likely, I think, to have more far-reaching effects than the betterment of the North Shore Railway. It appears that the promises out of which this discussion has arisen were made in the city of Quebec on the 26th of February, 1891, by Sir Charles Tupper, the duly accredited agent of the Dominion Government; and in the Morning Chronicle of the 27th of February you will find those promises set forth, I presume, accurately. Now, I presume that the Government propose not to repudiate the promises made by Sir Charles Tupper, but to make them good, and if so it is time that the House and the country should understand how far ante-election promises are intended to be binding upon the people and the people's representatives. It appears that Sir Charles Tupper—shall I say, in the public interest, or for the sake of carrying a few constituencies—made certain promises; and I would ask the Government and the House if they have the slightest idea of the extent to which the carrying out of those promises will mortgage the resources of this country? I find there were three distinct things promised by the High Commissioner on this occasion. First of all, he promised to hand over $1,000,000 of the assets of the Dominion to the Canadian Pacific Railway; then he promised to deal with the bridge; and for fear that I might overstate his words, I will read them as they appeared in the press:

"On the question of the bridge in which all are equally interested, why he——"

That is, Sir Charles Tupper.—

—"would say that from the time he took the matter up, as Minister of Railways, he had concluded the bridge was necessary as connection between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway; and his old colleagues in the Government knew how strongly he held to that view. Yesterday——"

What a singular circumstance—on the 25th of February—eight days before the general election—

—"he had met Mr. Schreiber, the Government Engineer of Railways, who had told him there was no great difficulty in constructing this work, which was destined to make a great railway centre of Quebec and a great Atlantic port. In fact, he said, you may, one and all, regard the work as an accomplished fact. (Tremendous applause)."

The High Commissioner there declared publicly, in the presence of the present leader of this House, and of another member of the Government, that so convinced were he and his colleagues of the necessity of this work, that now, those who were listening to him might consider it as an accomplished fact. When did the Government decide in favour of that important work? I well remember, only four or five years previously, when that work was the subject of an animated discussion in this House. I remember when, on one occasion, a number of hon. gentlemen refused their support to the Administration on a very important issue, but gave it afterwards, and it was admitted in the lobbies and outside that something in the nature of the Quebec bridge was to be the outcome. But as soon as the votes of those hon. gentlemen had been secured, from that time until the 25th of February last, we heard no authoritative utterance on the part of the Government with regard to this work. But suddenly on the 26th February, within eight days of the election we find the pledge given on behalf of the Government, which makes this country responsible—for how much? Has there been any estimate? I ask the Minister of Public Works, who was listening to this speech, whether any estimate of the cost of this public work has ever been made as to how far the public treasury would be taxed to carry out this pledge? Surely the High Commissioner did not speak without the authority of the Minister of Public Works. No doubt the High Commissioner must have consulted him, for the hon. Minister was at his elbow, and, I presume, incited him to make the speech. I would like to know where are the papers to show the cost of this work, for surely an Administration such as we have would not pledge the country to an uncertainty, even to accomplish so necessary a work. Where are the surveys, and plans, and estimates? Or, was the statement made by the High Commissioner in the name of the Government absolutely made to deceive, as has been represented? Or was it a statement intended to be carried out? If made to be carried out, surely it was not made hastily, just after a conversation with Mr. Schreiber, but must have been made, in a business way, after more mature consideration. But that was not the only pledge. I am told that this bridge will cost at least $5,000,000, if it can be built for that. Add that to the $1,000,000 bonds, and you have $6,000,000 promised by the High Commissioner. No wonder his promises were popular in that district. Again, he made another promise, which involves a little bagatelle of expenditure of a few more millions. It appears some time previously this House had passed an Act in favour of improving our Atlantic service; but this Government or its predecessors, great in promise, dealing continually in futures, put this statute on the Statute-books, and it has never materialized since. What have become of those Atlantic steamship promises made in 1889? Parliament, in 1889, voted a subsidy of $500,000 a year for ten years for the construction of this Atlantic service, but the Government did nothing. They went to sleep upon it, or mismanaged it, or whatever may have been the result, we have had nothing practical done from that day to this, and they never could be induced from that day until the 26th of February last to give their serious attention to the question. But suddenly there was an awakening. Again the Atlantic steamship service was to be utilized, and Sir Charles Tupper, speaking to the electors in the presence of the Minister of Public Works, told them that Sir John Macdonald was so deeply concerned in the development of the Province of Quebec and of the city of Quebec that he had agreed to that $500,000 subsidy which Parliament voted some years before, and an increase of about $250,000 a year, or an actual amount of £49,200 sterling, in round numbers $250,000 a year. I presume for the whole time the original subsidy was granted, or ten years, or in all Sir John Macdonald gave his word the Government would grant $2,500,000 extra money, without ever having taken the House into his confidence or having had any consultation with the people's representatives in Parliament, or concerning which, in so far as I know, there had never been any action taken by the Administration in Council or otherwise. Nevertheless, eight days before the general elections, Sir Charles Tupper promised the people of Quebec that there would be an extra grant of $2,500,000 given by the Government. In all, our High Commissioner promised, in that two hour speech, three things: to hand over $1,000,000 of bonds to the Canadian Pacific Railway: to build a bridge costing $5,000,000; to increase the subsidy to the Atlantic service, which would help the city of Quebec, by $2,500,000. He pledged the resources of this country to the extent of $8,500,000. And for what purpose? Was it for the purposes of the election? Or was it a mere coincidence that an election was about shortly to be held? I do not wonder that the Minister of Justice should shrink from discussing this part of the question. I do not wonder that the other members of the Government shrink from reviewing these wild promises. But the people of Quebec apparently believed in them, because it is said, in the editorial column of the newspaper from which I have quoted, that never before was such applause dealt out to any public speaker: that the people fairly stood on their heads, so great was their excitement. They rose as one man, they surrounded him, and with torches accompanied him to the railway station, and sent him on his way, bringing other gifts to the Maritime Provinces, and illuminated his whole trip down the St. Lawrence with fireworks, until at last he had ceased to be visible. Our High Commissioner, continuing his journey, repeated himself five days later in the Maritime Provinces. On the 5th of March, addressing an audience at Amherst, he said: Now is your opportunity, now is the time when the Maritime Provinces hold the balance of power, to demand what he called justice. It would be interesting to work out what I might call a mathematical problem. If the result of his addressing one meeting in the city of Quebec, is a series of promises to spend $8,500,000, how many more millions must he have promised to spend during the remainder of his campaign in the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I think it is proper to explain the circumstances which have given rise to the question now before the House. During the session of 1885, the Government submitted to the House certain resolutions which served as a basis for a law by which it was declared that in order to help the Pacific Railway Company to extend its road as far as the harbour of Quebec, the Government was authorized to spend a sum of $1,500,000, either for the purchase of the North Shore Railway, which was then owned by the Grand Trunk, or for the building of another line between Quebec and Montreal. The resolution stated that if the Canadian Pacific Railway wanted to buy the North Shore Railway, the Government undertook to acquire the latter from the Grand Trunk Company in order to re sell it to the Pacific, and to spend for this purpose the sum of $1,500,000. Here are, in fact, the words of the statute 48-49 Victoria, chap. 68 :

"Sec. 2. Whereas it is essential, in the interest of Canada generally as well as of the Province of Quebec, that free access to the port of Quebec be obtained by the Canadian Pacific Railway, as contemplated by the said last mentioned Act, and such access has not been obtained, and it is necessary to make further provision for the purpose of procuring such access: therefore the Governor in Council may grant a further subsidy as an aid towards procuring free access as hereinafter described for the trains and traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from St. Martin's Junction, near Montreal, a sum not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,500,000, payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada."

Section 3 provided that if the Pacific Company failed within two months to obtain a free access to the Harbour of Quebec, then

"The Governor in Council may acquire the North Shore Railway, and may apply the said sum of $1,500,000, or any part thereof, in aid of such acquisition, and upon such acquisition may transfer and convey or lease the said railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, subject to such obligations as the Government shall have assumed in acquiring it."

This was therefore, in the intention of Parliament, an aid given the Pacific Company for the purpose of allowing it to reach the harbour of Quebec, and to give a first class railway service to that part of the country which extends from Montreal to Quebec. In this choice of either building a new road between Montreal and Quebec or purchasing the North Shore Railway, the Government, and the Company of the Pacific chose the latter. Of the million and a-half voted by Parliament, it was agreed that the Grand Trunk would receive $525,000, that $5,000 would be used to cover certain costs, and that the available balance of $970,000 would go towards the improvement of the road. Instead of giving the road the benefit of that sum, and of obliging the Pacific Railway Company to spend it in improvements which were daily becoming more urgent, the Government bought and paid for an amount of North Shore Railway bonds, and forced the company to accept the following agreement, to wit: That if the net receipts of the North Shore were not sufficient to meet the interest on the North Shore Railway bonds which the Government of Quebec had on hand, the Government undertook to pay the deficiency out of the $970,000; but the day the net receipts would be sufficient to pay such interest, then the Pacific would lose all right to this sum, and would even have to pay the interest on the bonds redeemed and held by the Dominion Government. This stipulation is contained in the following terms in the contract passed in September, 1885, between the Government and the Pacific Company, which is to be found in the Sessional Papers of 1886, No. 35*d* :

"In consideration of the premises the Government agree to apply and use part of the said sum of $1,500,000, to wit, the sum of $970,000 in aid of the said company in the acquisition of the said railway in the following manner, that is to say: in the event of the net receipts of the operation of the said railway, after paying the operating expenses thereof, proving insufficient to meet the interest on the first mortgage bonds of the said North Shore Railway Company, including those held by the Government of Quebec as collateral security for the balance of the price of the said railway, the Government will apply the interest on the said sum of $970,000, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, in whole or in part, as may be required towards the payment of the deficiency. But if or when after payment of all such deficiencies, the net receipts of the said railway as aforesaid shall be sufficient to pay the interest on the said bonds, the said company shall cease to have any further claim or demand upon the Government in respect of the said sum of money."

And in order to prevent the company from being in a position to spend in works of renewal any portion of this sum, and with the view to secure its being employed only in the payment of the deficiency on interest, the Government have stipulated that no renewal could be made with materials more costly than those originally used and charged to operating expenses, without the consent of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and this had been done in the following terms :—

"Provided that as regards operating expenses the cost of no new works or renewals of a more expensive character than existing works were when new, shall be accounted as forming part of such operating expenses, unless the previous consent of the Minister of Railways and Canals has been obtained to their construction."

Mr. Speaker, what was the result of this proviso? For months, and I could say for years, the Pacific Company applied to the Government for the permission of replacing by iron bridges the wooden constructions which were falling into ruins; and and it has taken months and years of negotiations to obtain this permission. It is only last year for the most part, and the year previous for the rest, that this permission was granted, thus allowing the road to be put in a proper condition of safety. For there existed then, between Montreal and Quebec, dangerous bridges over which none could pass without fear, and which had been recognized as dangerous by the engineers of the company. Another result was that the company knowing that the Act of 1885 entitled it to $970,000, while the contract of September, 1885, forced it to pay interest on that sum, was unwilling to make the necessary improvements to give that part of the country means of communication proportionate to its importance. The reason given by the managers of the Pacific was that they did not intend to work their line in the interest of the Government, and that they would not do anything until the question of the million was settled. It had been agreed between prominent citizens of Quebec and the Pacific Company that the latter would contribute to the construction of a large hotel in Quebec. The Pacific Company had even bought the necessary ground for the purpose; but owing to the temporizing of the Government the hotel was not built, and the ground was re-sold. The Pacific had also promised elevators and other improvements, but in consequence of the Government failing to put into execution the law of 1885 according to its spirit and its letter, Quebec did not get these improvements nor these elevators. I believe that it is more than time that the Government should fulfil the obligation contracted in 1885.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved second reading of Bill (No. 9) to amend the Acts respecting the election of members of the House of Commons. He said: I was not in the House last evening, when the Bill of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) was moved. I understand, however, that upon the hon. member's moving the second reading, the Minister of Justice indicated his intention of referring all Bills amending the Electoral law to a select committee. If that is so, I shall not trouble the House with any explanation other than I gave on the first reading of the Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I stated that there were some Bills on the paper relating to the Election Act and the Franchise Act which it would be better to refer to a committee, and I had in view this Bill as well as some others. This Bill contains some features which I object to, and some features which I think are embodied in the present law, but it also contains some provisions which I think are worthy of the consideration of a committee. If the hon. gentleman thinks fit to press it to a second reading and refer it to the same committee, I shall acquiesce.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to the Committee on Bill No. 5.

MEMBERS' MILEAGE.

Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 43) further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons. He said: In rising to move the second reading of this Bill, it is necessary, perhaps, for me to offer some explanations why I considered it necessary to introduce this measure. It will be within the recollection of hon. members who were members of the last Parliament, that an hon. gentleman, who represented the County of Shelburne, N.S., had, after his election, removed to the city of London, in England. On receiving notice that Parliament was about to assemble, he left London and came to Ottawa to discharge his duties for the County of Shelburne. On applying to the pay clerk for his mileage and answering the question as to where his mileage was to count from, a reference was made either to the Department of Justice or to some Minister, and the clerk was advised that, if the member for Shelburne was so disposed, he was entitled to mileage from London to Ottawa, and that mileage was paid to him. At the time, I objected to the law as it then stood, and I drew the attention of the Government to the matter and asked whether they intended to introduce legislation to prevent a repetition of incidents of that kind. No definite promise was made that they would introduce such legislation. I consider that when a man is elected as a representative of a constituency in this Dominion, he should at least be a resident of the Dominion, and that some provision should be made that, when a man becomes the representative of a county, he should not be permitted to remove to a foreign country or to any part of the world outside of this Dominion, and be allowed to draw mileage from that point to the city of Ottawa when he comes here to discharge his duty. My object is to provide that any senator or member of the House of Commons shall be entitled to mileage from his residence, which shall be in Canada, on coming to Ottawa to discharge his duties. That, of course, requires that he must be a resident of this Dominion. I believe that, in the interests of the whole Dominion, the sooner we get down to the principle which is virtually carried out in the United States, that a man has to be a resident of the state and of the constituency he claims to represent, the better for all parties. I think that a man coming to this House should at least be a resident of the province in which he has his constituency. However, I do not wish to go so far at present, but we should ask at all events that the representatives of the people in this House or the senators in the other Chamber should be residents of this Dominion, and for this reason I have introduced the Bill now before the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 45) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.—(Mr. Amyot.)

COMPULSORY VOTING.

Mr. AMYOT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 53) to make voting compulsory.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. member explain?

Mr. AMYOT. The object of this Bill is to enforce upon every elector the obligation of performing the material act of voting, at least to act as if he were voting, that is, he must go to the poll and receive a ballot paper, then go into the polling booth and hand his paper over to the deputy returning officer. When he is in the room assigned for the purpose of depositing his ballot, he may vote as he likes, for whom he pleases, he may spoil his ballot paper, or do what he pleases with it, he may write down his name upon it, or may make as many crosses upon it as he likes. The Bill compels him to go there on his own responsibility, and relieves the candidates or the friends of the candidates, from paying any vehicle to transport him to the poll, or from paying for his day or half day that he may be off work to go to the poll. I know that in addressing this honourable House, composed of members who have gone through elections, I shall be easily understood. One of the great causes of electoral corruption is found in the fact that, in spite of the law against it, we have to pay for transporting the electors to the poll. I have seen it stated in the press that this Bill would be an infringement upon the liberty of the subject. This objection, at first sight, appears to be very serious, and in my view, any unnecessary restraint upon the liberty of the subject is blameable. But a moment's reflection will convince us that nearly all our laws are infringements upon the liberty of the subject. If we consider our municipal laws relating to road inspectors, the valuators or the assessors of property, and all the municipal officers whom the Legislature forces to act, we will see that the liberty of the subject in infringed upon. If we consider the restrictions on trade and commerce in the manufacture of liquors, in the selling of tobacco, in the imposition upon commerce of taxes in the shape of Customs laws, in fact on nearly every page of our statutes, we will see that for the general welfare private parties are asked to give up a portion of their individual liberties so that the good of the nation may be enhanced. This is the object of the Bill: to put a stop to the intense corruption to which the candidates are almost forced to resort, by the necessity in which they stand to-day of paying for the transport of electors to the poll. I have not heard any plausible objections yet made to the Bill. I think it will tend towards securing purity in elections, although I do not pretend that it will have the effect of putting a stop to all corruption. Doubtless some other way will be discovered of purchasing electors, of bribing their consciences, but the passage of this Bill will do something towards taking away from the enemy that source of corruption. At the present time a great many men enjoying the right to vote are out of the country, and if we force them to be present a great amount of money will be saved to the candidates, a great source of corruption avoided, and a great improvement will be made on the present system. I have also been told that an elector might not like to go to the poll and vote, but the Bill provides that in such a case an elector would have to write to the revising barrister—and an interval of 30 days has been suggested, although we might make it longer—asking the revising barrister to erase his name. His name will then be erased, and he will no longer be an elector, and the candidates will not be at the trouble of looking him up and sending for him. This would greatly simplify the law as compared with the present system, and greatly lessen the work of the candidates and the anxiety of all interested parties, and would tend, as I said before, towards the purity of elections, which is my only motive in introducing this Bill. I hope the measure will not be looked upon as a party measure in any sense, either in fact or in intention, and I hope that if the Government see no harm in it, they will take charge of it so as to secure its passage during the present session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Bill which the hon. member has just moved is altogether too important to be treated like the measures which were referred to a select committee for consideration, because it involves an entirely new principle. The other Bills applied to details of the Franchise Act, the Controverted Elections Act, and the Elections Act, but this Bill makes a fundamental change in our system of voting, and I feel bound to call the attention of the House to it, because the principle is one that certainly should not be adopted in silence. My own impression is that the Bill is a very severe restriction, not only on liberty, as the hon. gentleman has said, but on the right of choice of the electors. The condition of things occurring in an election contest in any electoral district when all the candidates are distasteful to an elector, is one that very often occurs. This Bill, under such circumstances, compels him to vote for a candidate who he thinks ought not to be a representative.

Mr. AMYOT. He may spoil his ballot.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The principle of this Bill is that a person shall be subject to a penalty because he does not vote for a candidate who he thinks ought not to be elected, or else he must perpetrate a fraud and deceive the returning officer by pretending to vote when he does not vote. At the election it is intended to supply ballots, not for the purpose of electors spoiling them, but for the purpose of enabling them to vote. This Bill will compel a man either to spoil a ballot or violate his conscience by voting for a man who he does not think qualified to represent his constituency. To spoil the ballot would be merely to evade this Act. Every line of the Bill is open to objections of the same kind. For instance, he must have "a valid and sufficient excuse," and the burden of proof as to the validity and sufficiency of the excuse is upon him, and it is a matter of pleading. But the authority before whom the penalty is collected is to be the judge of the "valid and sufficient excuse." One cannot tell, and no guide is furnished by the Bill, as to how the judge or magistrate is to decide whether the excuse is valid or not, whether it is from personal inability, as on account of illness, distance of the poll, or disinclination to make a choice between the candidates. Then he is to "appear at the polling station of his electoral division where he is entitled to vote, in order to apply for and receive a ballot paper and exercise his franchise according to law." The Bill falls short of the hon. gentleman's intentions, because it requires him to be there for that purpose, but it does not require him to carry that purpose into effect. Then mark the severity of the penalty. It may reach $50 with costs, or, in default of payment, a term of imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, and also to be disqualified from voting at any election during the next five years. So an elector has to violate his conscience by voting for some person who he does not believe should represent the county, or pretend to vote when he does not vote, or be disqualified for five years, although in the meantime a suitable candidate may come forward. The second section enables any person of full age to exact this penalty and put it in his pocket. There are very few cases in which people should be subjected to a procedure of that kind. In nearly all of those cases where the informer is rewarded out of the fine, the proceeding is subject to the supervision of some public officer; but in this case every person of full age may sue for the penalty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the law now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the law in some cases, and in every case it is a bad law, and of late years has never been adopted by Parliament, that I can remember. There are several bad laws on this subject, and the action of Parliament has been growing stricter on that point of late years. The Bill further provides that "upon receipt of a duly certified copy of the final judgment, the revising officer shall strike off the list of electors the name of the elector (who is disqualified for five years) and in default of doing so he shall be held guilty of a misdemeanour." Section five is the only one in which an attempt is made to preserve freedom of choice, and that enables the elector to go to the revising officer and have his name struck off the list in force, providing he does so 30 days before the election. But that is at a time when candidates have not been nominated according to law, and it is impossible for him to tell who may come forward; and by fixing so remote a time, 30 days before the election, perhaps before any general election is announced, or any writ issued for a bye-election, it is impossible for an elector to tell whether he will desire to vote or not. The Bill, of course, involves a principle of very great importance, besides being objectionable as regards these details; and in order that it may be fully considered by the House, after its attention has been thus called to it, I suggest that the debate be adjourned. I must say I do not see my way clear to accept the Bill, but I do not desire the House to pronounce on it now, because hon. members may desire to have a debate on the proposed measure at a future day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. Minister is not quite fair to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), in declaring this Bill invited any man to commit a fraud. That is a harsh construction to place on the provision which enables a man who does not like either candidate, to spoil a ballot, and I hardly think it was warranted either by the terms of the Bill or the speech of my hon. friend. Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that the Minister of Justice is perfectly right in saying that a departure of this importance ought to be very carefully considered by the House. I am bound to say, however, that my experience, extending over a very considerable number of years, leads me to believe that there are no sources of corruption in elections at present greater than those which are inflicted upon candidates by the temptation to bring persons from a distance to vote in any constituency. I know at the present moment enormous frauds and enormous corruption exists, and has existed for a number of years past in connection with the bringing of electors from distances, and more particularly in bringing them from the adjacent States, were, unfortunately, a very large number of persons qualified to vote at our elections are to be found. Then there is another evil that has been growing and increasing all the time, that is, the evil of personation, of bringing persons forward to represent men who have been for a considerable time absent from the particular constituency. Both these evils will be very largely removed by the adoption of the principles of one man one vote, and that party resident in the constituency in which he gives his vote. However, with respect to the question of compulsory voting, I think there is a great deal to be said for the principle, although I am at one with the Minister of Justice in the opinion that the penalties proposed in this Bill are decidedly too severe. I do not think it is an offence, if we create it an offence, which should be subject to imprisonment or fine, because an elector does not choose to exercise his privilege of franchise. But I do think this: If a man does not choose to exercise his franchise without having good and valid reasons for neglecting that duty, for it is a duty and not a mere right, I think it would be a good thing if some penalty were inflicted on him, and if a man without sufficient valid cause or excuse neglected to exercise his franchise, it would be a very fair thing indeed to disqualify him for a term of years, five years or even more, from exercising the franchise, and that the returning officer, on proof being given that, without just cause, an elector had neglected to exercise his franchise, might very fairly strike his name off the list of voters. I therefore think that the principle of the hon. gentleman's Bill is one that well deserves consideration, although I cannot say that I myself, any more than the Minister of Justice, can see my way to agree with its details. However, I am glad that the Minister of Justice has proposed an adjournment of the debate, and I hope various members of the House will express their opinions on this subject. I believe if steps were taken to make voting compulsory in some degree, they would tend very largely to reduce the expenses of elections all over this country, and that is very desirable indeed, and they would tend largely to put down corruption, which, as our election courts show, has existed to a very considerable extent in the conduct of our elections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has rendered an important service in bringing this question before the House for consideration. It has for some time been a subject of discussion in the country, and it is just as well that it should be carefully considered in Parliament. Of course, the Minister of Justice is quite correct in saying that this measure is far more radical in character than the others we have been considering this afternoon. It will necessitate a very material change in Parliament, and in the existing law, in order to give effect to this measure. The rule referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), of one man one vote, and the exclusion of non-residents in a constituency from voting within that constituency, would be a necessary part of a measure of this kind; because you can scarcely enforce a law of this kind against non-resident voters, and especially where these non-resident voters are no longer dwelling within the limits of the Dominion. I must say that, so far as my own individual opinions are concerned, it always seemed to me that although a measure of this sort would remedy many existing evils, yet there were many serious objections to it; objections which, in my judgment, counterbalanced any advantages which would be derived from it. I do not go into a discussion of the objections to the details of the Bill referred to by the Minister of Justice, but I thought some of these objections were scarcely fair and did not properly apply to this measure any more than to the existing law. Certainly, if the elector comes to the poll the object of this measure is entirely met; it is not necessary that he should even vote. At the present time the elector comes to the polls, tenders his vote, and if some scrutineer present asks that he should be sworn, and he refuses to take the oath he cannot vote. Surely the Minister of Justice would not press his criticism so far as to say that the person who comes to the poll should be compelled to take the oath in order that his vote might be recorded, whether he was willing to take it or not. That is not the intention of the Bill; the intention is that the voter shall come to the poll without being induced to come by any improper or corrupt consideration, and if the law requires him to be present at the polling division in which it is necessary that his vote should be recorded, if recorded at all, the object of the Bill is in that respect entirely accomplished, whether he spoils his ballot or refuses to take the oath, or records his vote for one or the other candidate. But, Sir, under our system of parliamentary government one of the things that happens at an election is, that sometimes there is a very great deal of indifference exhibited by the electors owing to the fact that no important issue interesting to the public at large has been presented in the elections. Sometimes that indifference is confined to a particular party, because the members of that party are not altogether satisfied with the policy that has been marked out by its leaders, or with the views that have been put forward in Parliament. Now, under our parliamentary system, although we have often changes of administration, we have not very often, or to any very great extent, a change in the political opinions of the electors. There are more frequently change in the results of the elections, arising from a large number of the electors refusing to record their votes, than from their having gone from one political party to the other, and it does seem to me that a measure of this sort tends to interfere with that free play and free working of our parliamentary system which is necessary to make it really a representative system of government As an instance, let me refer to what happened in England in 1885 and in 1886. We know that the Government of Mr. Gladstone introduced into Parliament after the elections of 1885, a measure of Home Rule for Ireland, and that measure was defeated by a small majority in the House of Commons. When an appeal was had to the country the Government of Mr. Gladstone was defeated and the Conservative party, led by Lord Salisbury, obtained a decided majority in Parliament. Now, if anyone looks at the vote in these two elections, he will see that it was not due to the fact that a very large number of those who had hitherto supported Mr. Gladstone and his party had changed their votes in the elections which took place in the various constituencies in the United Kingdom, but that a large number of those who had, in the previous election, supported him had abstained from voting altogether. We may have this condition of things in this country: you may have a large number of electors of one or the other political party not disposed to change sides but disposed to withhold their votes for the time being, and the fact that they have withheld their votes brings about a change in the constitution of the Parliament as complete, and makes the Parliament as completely a representative body as if these voters had gone to the polls. In some instances, by introducing the principle contained in this Bill, you would alter the result, and alter it not in accordance with the interests of the country. Let me suppose that a large number of persons who support one or the other political party in this country were, at an election, compelled to attend the polls. Whether these parties would spoil their ballots or whether they would mark them for one of the candidates, would depend very largely upon how far their dissatisfaction extended. In nine cases out of ten, I will venture to say that if a person is compelled to go to the polls, and actually did go there, he would not spoil his ballot, but he would give his vote for the candidate from whom he was disposed to withhold that vote, and thus, by compelling him to go to the polls you might in the end produce a different political complexion in Parliament, and you might give to a party a political ascendancy in Parliament that, if the electors were left free to do just precisely as they desired, would have been different from what it is under a measure of this sort. I do not see myself, nor have I ever seen, how you are to reconcile compulsory attendance at the polls with the free working of our representative system. I am of opinion that if you adopt the rule of excluding non-resident voters from the electoral lists, and if you adopt the principle of one man one vote, then you will have done all that can well be done with a view of preventing that system of corruption and that large expenditure at elections which my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) proposes to remedy by this measure. It is a fact that under the present system non-residents do remain upon the electoral lists, and this in a large degree has led to the discussion of this subject and induced a very great number of the intelligent and thoughtful electors of this country to subscribe to the views embodied in the Bill which the hon. member now presents to the House. The subject is, however, an important one, there is much to be said on both sides of it, and it ought to be very fully considered.

Mr. STAIRS. The hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill, refers to the large expenditure at elections, and it would seem that he expects to secure the decrease of this expenditure, as well as to prevent corruption at elections, by compelling voters to attend at the polls. Now, it seems to me that this Bill, if passed, will not have the effect of lessening corruption. It does not follow, if you make it compulsory for voters to go to the polls, that in every case they will not be taken, or if they do go, that they will vote. My experience is that the parties are most anxious to bring voters to the polls, and generally succeed in inducing them to go; and, I understand, that it is not proposed to make it a corrupt act to bring voters to the polls. There is nothing in the Bill that I can see, that is going to prevent corruption that the present law fails to provide against. I put forward these views very briefly as a layman, and, I think, before such a radical change is made in the election law, it should receive very careful consideration.

Mr. COCKBURN. As a layman, may I add something to what has already been said? It seems to me that the provisions of this Bill will be of peculiar benefit to the rich man, because if he wishes to abstain from voting, he can afford to pay the fine of $50, while a poor man, if unable or unwilling to go to the poll, and if he cannot afford to pay the fine, is practically disfranchised for five years or is sent to gaol as a criminal. Then, I cannot help thinking, from the little experience I have had in these matters, that provision number 2 would tend to bring into existence a class of persons who would be a curse to the country, namely, persons who, by threatening those who had failed to vote, with the penalty of $50, would try to compound with them for a sum of money, varying from the full sum of $50 down to whatever they could extort. It appears to me that this provision would tend to create the worst class of informers, such as those who flourished in the days of Charles II, and tend to produce more corruption than exists under the present Act. Then, the question arises, what is a valid and sufficient excuse? Now, while we are all willing to do everything that lies in our power to secure purity of elections, I think it would be very difficult for any of us to decide what is a valid and sufficient reason. What in one case would be a valid and sufficient reason might not be so in another case. Therefore I cannot but think that the provision in section 2, which, instead of tending to diminish the bitterness of party, which is already great enough in this country, would encourage men to attack a man of means and worry him into paying $50, is a provision that would defeat itself, and that is unworthy of the further consideration of this House.

Mr. McMILLAN. I believe that this Bill instead of favouring the rich man, would, if passed, be very much to the advantage of the poor man, for this simple reason, that many wealthy men who are the employers of labour, while not daring to compel their men to vote in a particular way, are at present able to influence their votes by compelling them to remain away from the polls if they are likely to cast their votes in opposition to their employers' wishes. Under a system of compulsory voting the poor man would be able to go to the poll, and if he could not conscientiously cast his ballot, he could spoil it. I think such a measure would do away with a great deal of the corruption which exists at the present time, because it would enable a workingman to cast his vote independently, instead of being compelled to remain at home or lose his place if his sympathies were not with those of his employer. I would not be in favour of a fine of $50, but I would require the deputy returning officer to keep a list of those who did not cast their votes, and send that list to the revising barrister before he finally revised the voters' list; and I would disqualify those persons from voting for a number of years. I think this is a greater measure in the interest of the purity of elections and in the interest of the workingman, than almost any other that could be introduced on this subject.

Mr. SPROULE. I, for one, cannot assent to the principle of this Bill for the following reasons: I believe it is against a man's liberty. It is out of harmony with the freedom of our humanity as exercised in the British dominions. In no line of life, so far as I am aware, whether for candidates or for by-laws, or for anything that may be submitted to the public, is it compulsory on men to vote; and if it has not been found necessary in other cases, why should we think it necessary for the election of members of Parliament? It might be that both candidates would be objectionable to many voters, so that they would prefer remaining at home. But it is contended that if this Bill were made law it would do away with a great deal of corruption. I am informed that in some States where compulsory voting is now in existence, it is not successful in this respect.

Mr. AMYOT. Which State?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the name of the State,——

Mr. AMYOT. I am not aware that it exists anywhere yet.

Mr. SPROULE,—but I will, perhaps, be able to do so at a later stage of this Bill. I speak with some knowledge of the subject, because I was a resident of the States for some time, and I believe that although a measure of this kind was enacted for the purpose of accomplishing what it is supposed this Bill would accomplish, it did not accomplish that purpose; but corruption is just as rife, and election expenses there are greater than in Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think such a measure is in existence in any State. It has been suggested, but not tried.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman may be giving only his opinion, and I will endeavour to satisfy him whether I am correct or not. If I am incorrectly informed, I will be pleased to set myself right, but that is the information I have. I think this is too radical a change for this House to assent to. I think it would introduce a new system of corruption which we have not had to contend with hitherto. It would make compulsory what is now a duty, and I do not think we should impose that obligation upon free electors of this country, who at present are free, not only to vote or not for members of this House, but in every other line of life in which they require to record their votes—in municipal elections, elections of school trustees and others. I say the principle of this Bill is out of harmony with the freedom of that system which is now enjoyed.

Mr. HAZEN. I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to another difficulty which exists in some parts of the Dominion, owing to some people being opposed to voting from religious convictions. I understand that is the case with the Mennonites who have settled in the North-West and Manitoba; but the representatives from that section can speak with more authority on that point. I know, however, that, during the course of the canvass in my constituency, I met a number of people who told me they belonged to a denomination of Christians against whose principles it was to vote at all. That being the case, it is clearly useless to force these people to come to the polls, when they have not the slightest intention of voting on reaching there. Should the principle of this Bill be admitted, certainly exemptions should be provided in the case of the people to whom I have referred. The Bill which the hon. gentleman has introduced involves a principle of great importance and worthy of the highest consideration; and the hon. gentleman who introduced it is evidently seized of the old idea that while one man is able to bring a horse to water, ten men cannot force him to drink, for the hon. gentleman is clearly of opinion that though we may by law compel a man to come to the polling booth, yet it would not be right to compel him to vote. The main thing, however, he seems to think, is to get him there, and then let him destroy the ballot paper if he likes. The point made by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) was very well taken indeed, namely, that very little can be accomplished in the line contemplated by the mover of this Bill, that is, putting down corruption. As the hon. member for Halifax has pointed out, the law to-day declares that, if a candidate conveys voters to a poll he is liable to disqualification, or if his agents convey them, he is liable to be unseated. Yet I venture to say, that there is not a constituency in the Dominion—certainly not a rural constituency—in which, at the recent elections, voters were not conveyed to the polls in defiance of the law. Now, if the law at present is unavailing to prevent electors being carried to the polls, I would ask the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, how it would be possible to successfully carry into effect the principle of his measure, which is to prevent candidates and their friends from conveying electors to the polls? If they break the law which exists to-day, we may be pretty certain that they will violate the one proposed by the hon. gentleman also. I must confess, if the only object of his Bill is to compel people to come to the polls, whether they vote or not, no good, from the standpoint of purity, will be accomplished by it. It seems to me, if anything is to be accomplished, the principle of compulsion should be carried further, and the voters not only be compelled to go to the polls, but also to cast their ballots. I cannot see—leaving out of the question the propriety of adopting the principle of compulsory voting at all—what object there can be in forcing people to come to the polls and then saying it makes very little difference whether they cast their ballots or not; and certainly I do not see what there is to be gained, from the standpoint of purity of elections.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat says that the religious scruples of some electors prevent them from voting. In that case all they would have to do is to avail themselves of the clause of the Bill, which allows them to have their names erased from the voters' list. They could thus either adopt this means and avoid going to the poll at all, or save equally their fifty dollars cash and secure their eternal salvation by going to the poll and then abstaining from voting. The hon. gentleman says if the present law is ineffective, how can we expect the proposed law to be effective? The answer to that objection is that the sanction of the proposed law is very severe. If a man who makes default of going to the poll to vote is to be deprived of his right to vote during five years, or be condemned to pay a fine, he will no doubt not fail to do his duty as a citizen. This is, however, a matter of detail. The question involved at the present stage is the principle of the Bill. Is it right or wrong to compel the attendance of an elector at the poll? Some hon. gentlemen contend that to do so would be to interfere with his liberty. But we force a man to attend court as a witness or as a juryman and keep him in court away from his business, for fifteen or twenty days or even a month if necessary, or even a year, and this is, no doubt, an infringement on the liberty of the subject. But each individual is bound to make personal sacrifices for the general good of society. The question for us to consider is, can we do away with the corruption that now exists by making the attendance at the polls compulsory? I am very grateful to the Minister of Justice for having given his attention to the matter, and I accept his suggestion. I hope every member of this House and every citizen in the country will look into the question involved, and see whether, if it does seem to curtail the liberty of the subject, the sacrifice is not one which every one should be prepared to make in order to obtain purity in elections. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) sees nothing at all in the Bill, and prefers going on with the present system. He could not have heard the hon. member for Halifax tell him that in the last election there was not one rural division in which teams were not hired to carry the electors to the polls. Does he owe his election to bribery and corruption?

Mr. SPROULE. No; I deny that.

Mr. AMYOT. I have too much respect for the hon. gentleman to believe that he has calumniated himself, or he does not wish, like us, to be returned by electors who have voted from patriotic motives and have not been bribed or corrupted. I am sure, if the hon. gentleman will look over the Bill, he will find that the only objection to it will be that it comes from this side of the House. I accept the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice. If we agree upon the principle that we should make attendance at the polls compulsory, I will be satisfied, as I do not pretend to have a perfect Bill. I do not pretend that this Bill is perfect, and I will be most happy to receive any suggestion or to hand over the Bill entirely to any hon. gentleman who may be more competent to deal with the details than I am. I only desire to give the House an occasion to express its opinion upon the principle of the Bill, and if the principle be found good, I hope we will unite our efforts to make it the law of the country as soon as possible. No doubt it is a radical change, but, when the evil is radical as it is now, it requires a radical cure.

Amendment (Sir John Thompson) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BARRON moved second reading of Bill (No. 54) further to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The first section of this Bill proposes to define beyond any possible doubt the nature of the money which is to be paid into the office of the clerk of the county court whenever a candidate requires to have a recount. The Bill has been suggested to me by reason of recent occurrences in the south riding of the County of Victoria. A recount was demanded there, and the $100 required to be deposited by the 64th section of the Act I propose to amend was paid in to the clerk, not in money, but by a cheque. The gentleman who paid the money thought he was sufficiently protected by getting the receipt of the clerk in the language of the statute. However, his Honour the judge of the county court thought differently, and it was considered by many that the ends of justice were defeated by a recount not being had. The county court judge gave a long judgment on the subject, and I think the concensus of opinion was with him. He held that the deposit of the gentleman who applied for a recount was not a deposit according to the language of the statute. The statute says: "One hundred dollars." The learned judge held that that should be in legal tender. I ask the House to say in this Bill, in order to prevent any question, that it shall be either in legal tender or in bills of any chartered bank doing business in Canada. The second clause is intended to afford means to compel a county court judge, at the instance of a dissatisfied party, to hold a recount. At present, if a judge of a county court declines to go on with a recount, a mandamus will not lie from a superior court to compel him to go on, and thus again the ends of justice may be defeated. I would refer the House, and the Minister of Justice especially, to the Centre Wellington case, reported in 44 U.C.Q.B. Reports. This is a portion of the decision given by Chief Justice Hagarty on that subject:

"I am satisfied that there is no jurisdiction in this court to interfere in the manner proposed."

The manner proposed was to issue a mandamus to compel the junior judge of the County of Wellington to hold a recount, after he had declined to do so. The learned judge goes on to say that :

"The right to deal with all such matters belongs to the House of Commons, except so far only as the Legislature has expressly devolved on the courts certain express duties and powers respecting elections, and this proposed interposition by mandamus is not one of those so devolved."

So that, inasmuch as there are, or might be, cases where injustice might be done by a county court judge in his refusing, no doubt rightly, in his opinion, to have a recount, I propose that mandamus will lie compelling him to have a recount. I understand from the hon. member from Queen's, N.B (Mr. King), that the same difficulty has arisen in his province, but there they do not seem to have held in the same way as the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ontario. In New Brunswick they think that a mandamus does lie, but it is not so in the Province of Ontario, and, if there is a difference of opinion in the several Provinces of the Dominion, I think all doubt should be set at rest by the Act which I ask the House to pass to its second reading. It will be observed that I have not provided for a prohibition as well as a mandamus. It might be well, perhaps, if the Minister of Justice thinks the Bill should pass, to amend that clause by providing for a prohibition, because, if a writ of mandamus should lie, a writ of prohibition should also lie. I do not think it is necessary to give any more explanation, but I hope the House will pass the measure.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Bill No. 5.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved second reading of Bill (No. 59) further to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. He said : I think it is the intention of the Minister of Justice to refer that Bill to the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 5, and I think perhaps that would be the best course to pursue.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to Committee on Bill No. 5.

PREVENTION OF FRAUDS.

Mr. BURDETT moved that the Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 42) to prevent fraud in the sale of certain articles, be discharged, and the said Bill be referred to a special committee composed of Sir John Thompson, Messrs. Wood (Brockville), Barron, Skinner, Desjardins (L'Islet), Corby, Lister, Cochrane, and the mover.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In order to facilitate the business of that Committee, I move that it be an instruction to the committee to which Bills numbered 5, 9, 43, 45, 54, and 59 have been referred, to consolidate such Bills or unite any provisions of one Bill with the provisions of another.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY BRIDGE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANGELIER moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council, instructions to engineers, correspondence, papers, reports and documents respecting the building of a bridge at Quebec.

He said : I wish to say a few words on the subject with which this motion deals. For the last forty years the question of a bridge over the River St. Lawrence at the city of Quebec, has been more or less prominently before the public, and it has especially acquired great importance within the last five years. A company was incorporated some years ago to construct such a bridge, and the Government have been very frequently approached by delegations from Quebec asking for assistance for the construction of a bridge. It cannot be said that it is an extraordinary proposal to ask for assistance for such an undertaking, because we have seen other undertakings of the same kind assisted by public money. It is very well known that the Victoria Bridge at Montreal was constructed with money advanced by the old Province of Canada. The bridge constructed at Lachine by the Canadian Pacific Railway has not, perhaps, been built directly with money advanced by the Government, but indirectly it has been built with such money. It is very well known that the country has advanced immense sums of money to that great corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it was with money advanced by this company that another bridge has been built near Montreal. As I have said, the question of the construction of a bridge near the city of Quebec has acquired a great deal of importance within the last few years. Within the last ten years a bridge at that point has become a matter of life or death for the trade of the city of Quebec. As I stated on one occasion when I headed a deputation from Quebec to interview the Government, matters have come to such a point that without a bridge Quebec now stands commercially in a worse position than it was before it became connected by rail with other points of this country. Before there was any railway Quebec, commercially, stood in the same position as Montreal and other cities, but since railway communication between the two cities has become so easy, the absence of a bridge has been the cause of a large portion of the trade and commerce of Quebec being transferred to Montreal. Every one at all acquainted with the position of Quebec knows that in the winter time, especially, when the crossing of the river is almost impossible at that point, country merchants coming from localities below Quebec and who used to make their purchases at Quebec, now go directly to Montreal. It takes them no longer to reach Montreal than to reach Quebec. Take, for instance, merchants coming from Rivière du Loup, or Rimouski, or any other place below Quebec, and who used to come to Quebec to do their business ; if they arrive in the evening after the ferry has ceased to run, they have to remain till next morning at seven o'clock, which is the earliest hour at which they can cross the river. But if they continued on directly towards Montreal, they could reach that city at half-past six the next morning ; therefore, it is an advantage to them to go to Montreal. There is also another great practical difficulty which I may mention, and that is the cost of transport by the ferry. For the transportation of goods between Quebec and Rimouski, especially for those merchants of Quebec who deal in bulky or very heavy goods, it is more expensive for them to take their goods across the River St. Lawrence than it would be to carry them all the way from Quebec to Rimouski. Another difficulty is that at present we have no direct communication with the United States by rail, nor can we have except by some such arrangement as was proposed a long time ago—that of a railway ferry. It is in the recollection of members of this House who were here in 1884, that it was proposed by the Government to establish a railway ferry for crossing passengers and freight cars. The execution of that enterprise has been postponed from year to year, and now we hear no more of it. I think such a ferry would be a waste of money. I do not think it would pay the Government to establish such a ferry, because it would be a very imperfect solution of the question which interests the citizens of Quebec, and it would cost a sum of money almost as great as the interest and sinking fund on the money which it would be necessary to advance for the construction of a bridge. Therefore the citizens of Quebec have not paid much attention to that scheme. Without such a ferry it becomes almost impossible to send goods, not only from Quebec, but from all the country north, which is now served by the Lake St. John Railway, to the United States, or to the southern portion of the Province of Quebec. I may give an instance of some of these difficulties. There is at St. Raymond, a place 36 miles north of Quebec on the Lake St. John Railway, the largest manufactory of pulp in the whole Dominion. It is controlled practically by the Canada Paper Company of Montreal. The pulp has to be carried from St. Raymond by the Lake St. John Railway to Quebec and up to Montreal, a distance of 172 miles, and then back all the way by the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Windsor Mills, a distance of over 100 miles; whereas, if there was a bridge at Quebec the distance would not exceed 100 miles. The absence of a bridge at Quebec renders it impossible for the Lake St. John Railway, which is an enterprise of great importance to the Dominion, and which has accordingly been very largely subsidized, to accept freight that is offered it every day. I happen to be a director of the company, and I know that on several occasions proposals have come from firms to carry lumber of one kind and another from the Lake St. John region to the United States. On one occasion the company refused more than 1,000 carloads of lumber, which is supplied very largely from the country north of Quebec. We could not accept the offer, because it would have cost just as much for the crossing of the river at Quebec as to send the cars all the way to Montreal, and from Montreal by the Grand Trunk or Canadian Pacific Railway to the United States. These are the principal reasons why the citizens of Quebec consider it a question of life or death to them to obtain the construction of a bridge at that city. The cost of the bridge has been estimated at between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. As to the traffic, estimates have been prepared by no less an authority than Mr. Walter Shanly. Taking only the present traffic between the south and north shores of the St. Lawrence, and supposing it would not increase, he has calculated that it would be sufficient to pay interest on the cost of the bridge. Then it was said, why should not the bridge be constructed by private enterprise, without any help from the Government? The answer is easily given. It is very well known that in enterprises of that kind much higher interest is demanded for money borrowed on the money market when the enterprise does not receive any public assistance. The assistance that is asked at this moment is not a bonus of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, but only a guarantee of interest on certain bonds of the company necessary for the construction of the bridge. To the several demands made, not only by that company, but by influential delegations of citizens, delegations from the city council of Quebec, delegations from the board of trade, the Government have always promised more or less aid, or if the Government have not promised it directly, it has allowed the deputations to believe that some assistance would be given. The objection made at one time was that no complete plans had been prepared for the bridge and no estimate made. That objection does not exist longer. At this present moment there is a Bill before the House to continue the company's charter for a certain number of years. That company obtained assistance from the Local Government at Quebec, and plans and surveys very complete in their character, were prepared two years ago. The company is now in a position to say to this Government the kind of a bridge that is to be built, and the amount it will cost to build it. There is another point to which I desire to refer. The Local Government has found it to the advantage of the general interests of the province that such a bridge should be built, and during the last session but one of the Legislature of the Local Parliament subsidized the bridge to the extent of $1,000,000, that subsidy being made conditional upon this Parliament, which is more interested in the scheme than the Local Parliament, doing its share, that is to say, assisting in proportion to its means and its interest in this public undertaking. I need not say that the question of the bridge has come up at every election during the last ten years, especially during the last two general elections. It is a question brought forward before the electors, not only of the city, but of the whole district of Quebec. It interests not only the three divisions of Quebec, one of which I have the honour to represent, but also all the counties south and north of Quebec which do business in that city, all the way from Rimouski to Quebec on the south and Montmorency to Three Rivers on the north shore. The people of these counties have signed a petition, which has been presented to this Government, asking aid for the construction of a bridge at Quebec. Such was the condition of affairs when the last elections came on. In a previous debate, to which I need not refer, I spoke of what took place with respect to the other question brought prominently before the people of Quebec during the same visit made by Sir Charles Tupper to that city, and to which I alluded the other day. Sir Charles Tupper spoke of the scheme for the construction of the bridge. Here is what he is reported to have said on the subject:

"From the time he took the matter up as Minister of Railways, he had concluded that the bridge was necessary as a connection between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. His old colleagues in the Government knew how strongly he held to that view. Yesterday he had met Mr. Schreiber, the Government Engineer of Railways, who had told him that there was no great difficulty in constructing the work, which was destined to make a great railroad centre of Quebec, and a great Atlantic summer port. In fact, he said, you may one and all regard that work as an accomplished fact."

He also said:

"He was certain that the traffic of the Quebec bridge would repay all that would be expended upon it, whether the different railways interested voted subsidies towards its construction or paid tolls for using it."

Those were the statements made by Sir Charles

Tupper, after having by telegram consulted Sir John Macdonald. As if that were not sufficient, the ministerial candidate for that division, Mr. Châteauvert, having on his right hand the Minister of Public Works, and on his left hand the Minister of Militia, both of whom were present, according to the paper, at a meeting where he was chosen as a candidate, spoke on the question of the bridge. I wish to call the attention of the House and of those two Ministers to this statement, and I want to know from them whether the statement is true or not. Mr. Châteauvert said:

"After having obtained from the Ottawa Government, through the influence of our Ministers, Sir H. Langevin and Sir A. Caron, the release of the million dollar debentures and a promise of assistance for the bridge between Quebec and Lévis, I should consider myself a bad citizen if I did not consent to come forward under circumstances so advantageous to the city."

There is the statement that, through the influence of the Ministers in question, Mr. Châteauvert had obtained a promise of assistance for the construction of that bridge, and, as I have already said, there can be no dispute of the correctness of the report of that speech, because it has been sent to all the electors of the division by Mr. Châteauvert himself. I have here a circular addressed to myself enclosing that speech, and in which Mr. Châteauvert states that this is a correct report of the remarks he made at this meeting which was attended by the two hon. Ministers I have referred to. Some time ago I put a question to the Government with respect to this speech. I asked the Government as to their intentions with regard to the bridge, and I asked the Ministers whether it was true that Mr. Châteauvert had made the speech and had obtained the promise. Here is the question I put:

"Whether it is true, as stated by Mr. Châteauvert, that he had secured from the Government the remission of the said million dollar debentures and a promise of aid for the said bridge? What is the nature of the aid so promised? When do the Government intend to introduce measures to carry out the remission of the said million dollar debentures and to assist in the construction of said bridge."

Here is the answer that was given to these questions by the Minister of Public Works:

"The Government are not aware that the article in question was published in that paper (Courrier du Canada) but they do know that Mr. Châteauvert exerted himself very much about the remission of the million dollars and about the bridge in question. The Government will introduce a measure about the million dollar debentures, but the remainder of the question I cannot answer now."

The article referred to, was the article containing that promissory note of Mr. Châteauvert promising to his constituents the remission of the $1,000,000 debentures and the assistance of the Government for the construction of the bridge. This is a very unsatisfactory answer; as a matter of fact, it is no answer at all to the principal portion of my question, and I am very much surprised that such an answer should be given by a Minister of the Crown. The principal part of my question was: whether it was true or not, as stated by Mr. Châteauvert in that speech, which was distributed broadcast all over the city of Quebec and especially in my division, that this promise was made to Mr. Châteauvert. That gentleman states, that through the influence of the two Ministers now sitting in their seats he obtained such a promise, and yet, one of the Ministers alluded to by Mr. Châteauvert was the very one who, I suppose, is charged by the Government to give that answer to my question. The hon. Minister did not say anything on that subject in his reply, he did not say whether it was true or not that such a promise had been made, and I ask him again now, is it true or is it untrue? If it is untrue that the promise has been made to Mr. Châteauvert, then Mr. Châteauvert would be branded in Quebec as a liar, and I would regret it very much, because he is a respectable citizen. There is no two ways about it; if the Ministers now state that they made no such promise, then Mr. Châteauvert told a lie to the citizens of Quebec, and he tried to get the votes of the electors under false pretences through that lie. On the other hand, if it is true that such a promise was made by the Ministers to Mr. Châteauvert, we want to know it, and we want to know also whether they intend to redeem that promise made to him, and in what manner they do intend to redeem it. That is the object of the motion I now make. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this speech of Sir Charles Tupper in Quebec, and that this promise which was spread broadcast through the city of Quebec as having been made by the Government, were all intended to bribe the city. Mr. Châteauvert said he was not boasting when he said that he had obtained this promise from the Government, and I think that I may state without boasting that very few other constituencies could have resisted such bribes as these which were used in the city of Quebec. It is well known that only one division was carried by the Conservatives in Quebec. I want to know if the people of Quebec are going to get assistance for this bridge; we do not want to get it as a bribe, we want to get it as a matter of justice to our city, which has been so neglected by this Government, and if it is not just we do not ask for it. The people of Quebec want a grant in favour of the construction of the bridge to be given as a matter of justice and as nothing else. I will await the reply of the hon. Minister whose name was mentioned as having given that promise on the part of the Government, and I want to know in that reply whether such a promise was made.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the full extent of the remarks which the hon. gentleman has just made in reference to two very important questions affecting Quebec. I thought possibly, from the remarks which I heard, that the answer to the question might be found in the information which the hon. gentleman has given to the House to-night. He said that, in so far as the bridge was concerned, that it was indicated that the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway would find it to their interest to build that bridge, and I, for one, am prepared to agree with my hon. friend in this and to think that for once he has been practical and has viewed the question from the standpoint of commercial interests. I am well known in Quebec to have been an advocate of the building of that bridge from the time the subject was first brought before the public; and I believe it can only be built when the different railway interests so combine as to make it a commercial necessity. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to another question which is quite different from that of the bridge—the question of the $1,000,000 of bonds which are still in the hands of the Government, and which different interests ask us to remit in exchange for the great commercial advantages which we could obtain for the city of Quebec; and my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of Public Works, has announced to-day that a measure settling that question will be brought down. Until that measure comes down, the hon. gentleman is not in a position to discuss the policy of the Government; and when it does come down I am prepared, as a representative of the district of Quebec, to stand up and discuss that question with him. But, Sir, though I am an advocate of the building of that bridge, I never considered that the Government of this country should assume the responsibility of building it alone.

Mr. LANGELIER. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. "Hear, hear," says the hon. gentleman, though I am only repeating what the hon. gentleman himself said. He says that when the combination of these various interests, the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway, make the building of that bridge a necessity, it will then be time for the Government of Canada——

Mr. LANGELIER. I said nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman did not hear me. That was what I quoted from the remarks of Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is exactly the position which the hon. gentleman has taken, because he says that all he knows about this bridge is what Sir Charles Tupper has promised, and the promise of Sir Charles Tupper is the promise of a man who knows the interests of Canada: and I am quite prepared to say that when that bridge becomes a commercial necessity from the development of the great railway interests at that point, then will be the time for the Government of Canada to discuss what proportion of help we can give towards the building of that bridge. Now, I know very well that the hon. gentleman feels very bitter against his late opponent in Quebec Centre because he was very nearly defeated by that gentleman.

Mr. LANGELIER. Not so nearly as the gentleman who was defeated in the County of Quebec.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I know that the hon. gentleman feels very sore, because he met there a foe who very nearly defeated him, and nearly prevented him from sitting in the seat he now occupies. I can say more than that. I can say that Mr. Châteauvert, in all his pledges to the electors, displayed that judgment which might be expected in a man occupying the prominent position which he does in commercial circles in Quebec, and never made any promises as a candidate on behalf of the Government which he should not have made. Now, Sir, when the papers are brought down and the Bill with regard to the $1,000,000 of bonds is introduced, if that Bill is not acceptable to the House, it will be time for the hon. gentleman to complain that the Government have not looked after the interests of the city of Quebec.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand the remarks of Sir Charles Tupper any better than mine. He attributed to me some words which I quoted from the speech delivered by Sir Charles Tupper when he came to Quebec, but I said nothing of that kind myself. I did not say that we would have to wait until the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railways would build a bridge. If they would build a bridge, it would be unnecessary for us to come to Parliament to ask for assistance for it. I never talked such nonsense, nor did Sir Charles Tupper either. But here is what Sir Charles Tupper said on that occasion—I repeat it because the hon. Minister does not seem to have understood his remarks:

"You may, one and all, regard that work as a completed fact."

That is the statement of the paper.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. LANGELIER. If it is an accomplished fact, according to the speech made by the hon. Minister, I must say that the bridge is much easier to build than we ever thought it would be. I wanted to know, when Mr. Chateauvert stated, not only in his spoken speech, in which allowance might be made for a slip of the tongue, but in the speech which he took the trouble to get printed and distributed, in the shape of a circular, broadcast through the city of Quebec, that:

"After having obtained from the Ottawa Government, through the influence of our Ministers, Sir Hector and Sir Adolphe, the remission of the $1,000,000 debentures and a promise of assistance for the bridge from Quebec to Lévis"——

He was only coming forward after having obtained that promise; he stated the truth. Did he ever obtain that promise? The hon. Minister did not say one word to show that he had made any such promise, or that any such promise had been given by the Government; but he said, when all those great commercial corporations, the Intercolonial, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, agree, the Government will agree that they should let them build the bridge. That is the substance of what he said here. Is that what he said to Mr. Châteauvert? If it is, it is not what Mr. Châteauvert said to the citizens of Quebec. If we are to take as the truth what the hon. Minister said a few minutes ago, and we are bound to believe him, he made no such promise, and Mr. Châteauvert shamefully deceived the citizens of Quebec. The hon. Minister said that Mr. Châteauvert talked a good deal of common sense when speaking of that bridge. There is no question about Mr. Châteauvert's common sense, but what about his veracity? Did he tell the truth when he said to the citizens of Quebec that he had such an important promise, and was attempting to be elected on the faith of such promise. We have not been able to obtain from the Minister an answer, yes or no. I believe the Government never gave such a promise, or, if they did, they do not want to keep their word.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF WILLIAM LAIDLOW.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return of all letters, correspondence and papers relating to the cause of the resignation and removal of William Laidlow, of Arthur, from the North-West Mounted Police, and all papers and correspondence relating to his application for compensation for the loss of his thumb while in the service; also, the award of compensation paid him, if any.

He said: In 1874, Mr. William Laidlow engaged in the first corps of the Mounted Police that went up to the North-West. He went from Port Arthur to the Rocky Mountains and back, and was some fourteen months in the service. Unfortunately, while in the service he lost the thumb of his right hand. He had been a widower before he left, and had lost all his property, leaving some four children in the care of his father-in-law, his intention being, if possible, to serve out his period of service in the police and then take up land in the North-West and establish himself and his family there. Unfortunately, however, he suffered the accident to which I have referred, and was compelled to obtain his release. That was in the year 1876. He made at the same time an application to be compensated for the loss he had sustained, and his petition came before the Secretary of State, who was the Minister then in charge of the Mounted Police. The Secretary of State, after considering the matter, wrote to the then member for the county I have the honour to represent, Mr. Drew, now Judge Drew, and to which county this man Laidlow belongs, to say that all the Government could allow him was his expenses home and one month's pay. Mr. Drew had pressed very strongly upon the Secretary of State that something should be done for this man, and this was the reply given. The poor man had to accept this, and returned home, and from that day to this he has not been able to get a single cent in addition. I think it is a very great hardship that the law should be in such a state that a man who engaged in the Mounted Police Force at its inception, and underwent all the hardships and privations to which those who first composed the force were subjected, should not receive some remuneration for the loss occasioned by his labours in that force. The loss of his thumb was due to the fact that after the doctor performed the operations in the first place, owing to the exposure which this man had to suffer without shelter from the inclemency of the weather, he had to undergo a second operation, and, finally, a third, and in that way he almost entirely lost the use of his right hand. The commanding officer under whom he served reports that he was a most efficient and attentive servant, discharging his duties faithfully and well, and that by the accident he met he was rendered unfit for work. Now, I hold that it is a cruel thing that this man who has suffered so serious a loss—a loss which has compelled him to be a burden on his friends ever since, his father-in-law having virtually to keep both him and his family—should be sent adrift with only one month's pay, and have had to struggle along some sixteen or seventeen years in that condition without getting a single farthing. Those who went to the North-West during the rebellion were dealt with very generously, and justly so, by this House and the country, and I think that somewhat similar treatment should be meted out to those who were the pioneers of the Mounted Police Force, and who suffered the privations the men had to undergo at the outset. It is nothing short of an outrage to force that man, who has to work out the balance of his life with only one hand, and that the left, to be a burden on his friends, through an accident suffered by him in his country's service. My principal object, in moving for these papers, is to give the hon. Minister an opportunity to reconsider the whole question from the beginning. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the officers under whom Mr. Laidlow served, he will find that Mr. Laidlow was an efficient and faithful man, and it is with the hope that the Minister will be able to see his way to giving the man some remuneration, I make this motion. I believe an alteration has been made in the statute, and that those who now suffer loss in the service by accident are allowed a certain pension. I think it is right they should be, and I hope that, if the law stands in the way of this man receiving some consideration for the privation to which he has been subjected, even if the action of this House is necessary to reach an unfortunate case of this kind, the Minister of the Interior will ask for such legislation as will enable him to deal with the case, which bears on its face evidence of gross injustice and evidence that this man, who has submitted to this condition of things for seventeen years, should have some consideration. I have no personal interest in this matter except sympathy for the man and for his children. I know the circumstances of himself, his family and his friends, and I know the struggling efforts of himself and his relations to get along and support these children. I hope some step will be taken, and that the Minister of the Interior will ask power to enable him to reach this case in some way. I am sorry that, when this case came before Mr. Mackenzie's Government in 1876 or 1877, no settlement was made and nothing was done. I do not desire to reflect upon any person, but I very seriously regret that the law was in such a shape that nothing was done. Something should have been done, and, if the law establishing the Force barred the way, the Government should have got such legislation as would enable them to reach a case of this kind.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not think anyone can object to the hon. gentleman bringing this matter before the House at this time, although the accident he refers to occurred to this policeman some sixteen or seventeen years ago, nor do I think it is too late to do justice to the man if at that time an injustice was done to him. The accident which is referred to by the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) was, I believe, the loss of his thumb in connection with the coupling of a waggon or something of that kind; at least so it was reported. The matter was reported to the department here shortly after it occurred, and an investigation was ordered. As I understand, the doctor's report was that the injury to the thumb did not originate from the accident with the waggon, but from an old whitlow from which the man had been suffering for some time. However, an enquiry was made, and I think it went further than the Secretary of State. I think the Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Blake, reported against any material amount being given to this man, and probably that resulted in his receiving his month's pay and his passage back to his home. At any rate, an investigation was held, and I think the matter was carefully considered by the gentleman who then had charge of the Mounted Police Force. I understand that the officer who was in charge of his company will be in Ottawa to-morrow or on Monday, and the sergeant-major, who is now an inspector in the Force, is available. From both of these officers we can get further information in regard to the case. If we find that the enquiry made before obtained incorrect information, if the commanding officer is aware of the facts of the case, and the sergeant-major, who was with him when the accident occurred, can give information on the subject, I shall take pleasure in asking my colleagues to allow me to put a sum in the Estimates in order to recompense that man. I will see that this is not the last of it, and I will bring the papers down at once and make the further enquiry I have mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

SETTLERS ON VANCOUVER ISLAND RAILWAY RESERVE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copies of all reports by any officer of the Department of the Interior, on the complaints of settlers in the Districts of Cranberry, Cedar, Wellington, Nanoose and Nanaimo, British Columbia, in reference to their claims on lands comprised in the Island Railway Reserve.

He said: The Minister of the Interior will probably remember that last year I brought to the notice of the House the complaints of certain settlers in the section of country referred to in this motion, who complained of a very serious grievance. That grievance was that they had settled in good faith upon lands which afterwards were reserved for the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, and that, therefore, they were entitled to all the benefits accruing to settlers, and that their patents should convey to them, not only the surface, but the minerals as well—perhaps not the precious metals, which are ordinarily reserved to the Crown, but the ordinary minerals. But the patents conveyed to them only the surface. When I brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of the Interior last year, he promised that at an early day in the recess he would cause an officer of his department to go to the island and investigate the claims of the settlers. This is what he said:

"An officer of the department will be sent at an early day to investigate the alleged grievances, with the view of ascertaining the rights of the squatters under the said Act, and the patent of the company."

My present object is to ascertain, first, whether the promise then made by the Minister of the Interior has been redeemed, whether an officer has been sent over there, and, if so, to have a copy of his report laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I recollect very well the hon. the leader of the Opposition bringing this matter to the notice of the House last session, and also the promise which I made that some means would be taken during recess to enquire into the grievances complained of. The hon. member states that the settlers on what was known as the Railway Belt on the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, or a number of them, appeared to have had grievances, and there are two or three classes of those grievances depending upon the different times when they settled within that reservation. Immediately after the close of the session I brought the matter before my colleagues, and it was proposed to send out Mr. Burgess, who is acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, and to join with him Mr. Aikman, who, up to a late period, had been one of our Dominion Land Commissioners, but who had left and was then practising as a barrister with his partner in the city of Victoria. Mr. Burgess left on that mission, but before he reached Winnipeg we received information that Mr. Aikman was not available for the purpose. I was then about leaving myself on an official visit to British Columbia, and I determined, when there, to make enquiries into the circumstances myself, so far as I was able. On my arrival in Victoria, I found that one of these cases which were mentioned by the hon. gentleman, was before the court in Victoria, and I thought it unadvisable at that time either to make an investigation myself or to have one made through another party.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that the case of Heoggan?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes. It was subsequently, I think, taken to the Court of Appeal, and the judgment, whatever it was, of the first court was sustained, and, I think, to-day it has been argued before the Supreme Court here. Those are the circumstances with regard to the investigation which I have mentioned, and the case remains practically as it was before the hon. member moved in the House last year in reference to it. The case, I think, involves questions of an intricate character, and, when we get a decision from the Supreme Court, we shall be far better able to come to a decision as to what action we shall take in the matter.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the answers given by the Minister of the Interior are not at all satisfactory. A solemn promise had been made to the House that these cases would be investigated. They were not investigated, and what is the reason? The reason given is that litigation is going on between two parties. I know something of the case to which the hon. gentleman refers, though I do not pretend to be quite familiar with it. If my information is correct, and I believe it to be correct, this case of Heoggan does not turn at all upon the grievances of the settlers. It is a case between settler and settler, not a case arising out of complaints made by other settlers: that is to say, it is not an endeavour to obtain from the Crown the minerals to which they believe they are entitled by their patents, but it is a case between one settler and another settler as to the ownership of a piece of land which is in dispute between the two. So that, if my information is correct, the hon. gentleman is altogether misinformed as to the nature of the case, and his information would certainly lead to what will be a denial of justice to these men. It matters little, however, whether the case of Heoggan turned upon the question at issue now or not. A promise has been made to the settlers who have been, as I am told, year after year seeking to obtain from the Government a decision as to what their rights were under their patents. Certainly, whatever their position may be, the answer we have from the Government is simply that they do not know whether, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, these men are entitled to the minerals or not. This question should have been investigated. Now, what is the consequence of delay? Another year must elapse before these men will know where they stand. I am not conversant myself with the matter, but, judging from the answer of the Minister, it seems to me, under the circumstances, that it will amount to an absolute denial of justice on the part of the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY. All that I can say is that I acted in accordance with my own judgment at that time, and I thought I was acting in the interest of the settlers when I refused to make an investigation which might prejudice their case before the courts.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY BRIDGE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copy of the report of Collingwood Schreiber, Esq., upon survey made by him, of the River St. Lawrence immediately opposite and in the vicinity of the city of Quebec, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was possible to build a railway bridge there.

He said: I desire to ask the Minister of Public Works if the report of Mr. Schreiber will be brought down on the motion of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier)? If so, my motion will be without any object.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Let the hon. gentleman make his motion, and let the two go together.

Mr. LANGELIER. May I press on the Minister of Public Works the importance of bringing down the report as early as possible At the next meeting of the Railway Committee the Bill to continue the charter of the company, which was formed some years ago for the construction of the bridge, is to come up, and it is of the highest importance for the consideration of the Bill that Mr. Schreiber's report should be before the Committee. Sir Charles Tupper stated in his speech delivered at Quebec that Mr. Schreiber had made a favourable report on the bridge, and it will, no doubt, have considerable influence on the Committee, in considering the Bill for the continuance of the charter, and also, I hope, with the Government when they are called on to give a subsidy to that company.

Motion agreed to.

SHOALS AT ST. JEAN DESCHAILLONS.

Mr. RINFRET (translation) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, letters, reports and paper writings of every description, respecting the dredging of the River St. Lawrence, and the lifting and removal of the boulders from the shoals of St. Jean Deschaillons.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I wish to ask the hon. member if he really desires to obtain all the information mentioned in his motion. The motion has the following: "All correspondence, letters, reports and paper writings of every description respecting the dredging of the River St. Lawrence." I believe the hon. member could restrict his request to the latter part of his motion, for the information wanted in the other part covers the whole of the River St. Lawrence, and it would be a work of several months to prepare such.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I believe there is an error in the translation of my motion. What I mean to ask for is the papers relating to the dredging of the river and removal of boulders on the shoal only.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I would suggest to the hon. member to strike off from his motion the words "the dredging of the River St. Lawrence" after the word "respecting."

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I have no objection to the striking off of those words.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

DOMINION AID TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return showing: 1. The names of the several railways in the Dominion to which Dominion aid has been granted, except the Canadian Pacific main line and Soo Branch; 2. The province within which the said railway, in whole or in part, is located, and if located in two or more provinces, the number of miles in each; 3. The county or counties through which the said lines run in each province: 4. The amount of money paid to each up to the 1st January, 1891: 5. The railways built in the Dominion by the Dominion since Confederation, excepting the main line of the Intercolonial and main line of the Canadian Pacific: 6. The province within which built: 7. The entire cost of each line built in each province, including equipment: 8. The entire sum spent up to 1st January last, on the construction of Dominion roads in each province, excepting the Intercolonial main line and Canadian Pacific main line.

He said: There has been considerable agitation, more particularly in the Province of Ontario, with regard to a refund being made to sections of the province which have built railways at the entire cost of the people of those sections and of the Ontario Government. A very large deputation came here during the session and waited on the late First Minister and the Minister of Finance for the purpose of presenting their claims for a refund of a portion of the money so expended. The railway statistics issued each year do not contain the information I desire to obtain by this motion, hence the necessity of asking for the return. The deputation that waited on the Ministers was a very large and influential one. But there were a great many places represented that should not have been represented, such, for instance, as towns along the line of the Grand Trunk, which never contributed a dollar towards the building of that road, because no municipal bonuses were granted, and the towns sold out their stock at par value. Other places were represented that had already, under the present policy of the Dominion Government, received aid for competing lines, such as Kingston, Guelph and many other towns. I consider these places do not stand in the same relation to this important question as other sections that have never received a dollar from the Dominion treasury towards the construction of their roads. It is an important question, and the people of the section from which I come, and also the people in the Counties of Bruce and Huron, and a portion of the County of Grey, will not rest satisfied with anything short of receiving some sort of return for the enormous sums spent on railways, while railways have been built in other portions of the Dominion, in some cases entirely at the cost of the Dominion and in others largely subsidized from the Dominion treasury. It is quite clear to anyone who will investigate the claim presented, that it is a just and equitable one. The First Minister very generously and kindly promised to give the subject his serious and careful consideration. Unfortunately he is not here to do that now. Last year, when I brought the question before the House he stated that, if a case was presented to the Government during this session, they would take it up and consider it. A deputation came here for that purpose. The First Minister's reply was in the direction of giving some encouragement at least, although no immediate relief, but he promised the Government would give the question careful consideration, and if some scheme was devised whereby those sections that had been called on to provide for themselves the necessary accommodation and to contribute such large sums of money could be recouped in some way, the Government would consider it. The object of this resolution is to enable those sections, and all other sections, to ascertain the extent to which the people have contributed towards the construction of railways and the extent to which other sections have been benefited by the expenditure for the construction of Dominion lines, or by sums of money granted to bonus competing lines, or lines entering into new territory. I have no desire to detain the House with further remarks at this stage, but I intend before the close of the session to bring the whole question before the House by resolution.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will find most of the information asked for in this motion in the railway statistics and in the report of the Minister of that department, but I have no doubt that he desires to have a compilation of the whole as a matter of easy reference. I think a moment's reflection will show the hon. gentleman that it will take some time before it can be prepared in the complete state in which he requires it. Take, for instance, the seventh paragraph of the motion in which he asks "for the entire cost of each line built in each province including the equipment." It would be somewhat difficult, I think, to give the information required by that paragraph, because, if I understand it aright, it applies to all the railways which have been built in each province in the Dominion since Confederation, whether by private parties, or by the Dominion, or the Provincial Governments. The hon. gentleman shakes his head as if I do not read it aright. If I am in error as to his meaning I think it would be well that the paragraph should be more explicit in order that the Railway Department, when they set their clerks at work to prepare the return, should know precisely what the hon. gentleman wants. The paragraph does not say, you will observe, that it refers to roads built by the Dominion or by provincial or other aid, but it makes a bald request for the entire cost of each line built in each province, including the equipment. I will also call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the first paragraph of the motion in which he makes an exception to the Canadian Pacific Railway main line and the "Soo" Branch. I do not know why the hon. gentleman has added the "Soo" Branch, because it implies that Government aid of some kind has been given to that road. I believe the House is aware that the Dominion Government has never extended any aid to the "Soo" Branch which was built entirely out of the resources of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If I might be permitted I would suggest the propriety of striking out the words "the Soo Branch" in that paragraph, for I do not suppose the hon. gentleman wishes to have the motion pass in such a manner as would imply that aid has been given to a road which has received no aid. As far as the information can be obtained by the department it will be prepared and brought down as early as possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. My reason for leaving out the main lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway was this: The Dominion was supposed to be committed to the construction of those lines. The Intercolonial Railway is looked upon as a necessity and so is the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was undoubtedly understood at Confederation that the Intercolonial Railway should be built, and it is understood also that the Dominion should construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. Consequently I consider that the money spent on these lines was spent in accordance with the understanding that the Government had to carry out.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will understand that I only made objection to the "Soo" line being included.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was not aware that no aid was given to the "Soo" line, and I am quite willing that that should be dropped out of the paragraph. As regards the seventh paragraph, I will consent that it should read "the entire cost of each line built or assisted in each province by the Dominion." That was my object in asking for the return, and I am quite willing that it should be confined to those lines assisted by the Dominion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think it is very desirable that we should get the information as fully as possible, which is asked for by the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I was one of those who attended the deputation which waited on the First Minister some time ago in reference to the refund of these bonuses. The difficulty complained of by the First Minister at that time was just the difficulty which is sought to be removed by the return asked for in this resolution, for none of those gentlemen who spoke on that occasion were able to lay clearly before the First Minister the various places in which Dominion aid had been granted. This return now asked for, if made out fully and thoroughly, will enable the Government to see whether all these people who ask for a refund have a clear and a distinct right to receive it. It will at once settle that question and remove that objection. Certainly it did appear to me, as it appeared to the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that there were gentlemen attending that deputation who could scarcely expect any refund for their localities as they had already had public money expended in them and it would be impossible for them to get a refund. In fact it did appear to me that the deputation was so unwieldly, embracing so many and widely different interests, and involving such a large outlay of public money, that the Government could not entertain their proposals. Instead of there being a sincere desire to secure to these localities that had a right to the refund, that had reasonable grounds to expect the refund, and from the assurance given by the First Minister last session that their claims would be considered, the unwieldly character of the deputation would have a tendency to prevent these localities which had a right to expect it, getting justice. On that ground I regretted the composition of the deputation, because I know, and I think the members of the Government know, that there are some counties which have never received any public money, and which have been paying all along to enterprises which have been assisted by the Government in other localities. It is on behalf of these counties that we want to get the clearest and most distinct information that it is possible for the Government to give, so that there will be no invidious distinction made, and so that there will be no counties or localities coming to the Government asking for aid unless they are entitled to it. It is only through the fullest and most ample knowledge which we can obtain from the Government that we will be able, and that the Government itself will be able to arrive at a decision as to the justice of the claims put forward. The county from which I come has a perfect right to a refund of some portion of the railway bonuses which it has granted. The people of that county have not only very largely built railways for themselves, but they have contributed by taxation to the building of railways all through the Dominion, without having had any public money for railways expended there. I remember that the late First Minister stated to the gentlemen who waited upon him: "Are you prepared to show the Government the position you occupy in reference to these claims?" They were unable to lay all the necessary information before him, and for that reason he could hold out very little hope of any refund being made to them. Now, this matter has been before this House on several occasions. I had the honour of bringing it before the House the first time several years ago, when the Dominion had entered upon the policy of taking over local roads and making them roads of Dominion concern. The claims of these localities have since that time become so strong that justice demands that they should be satisfied in the near future. For instance, in the County of Grey there has never been a single public building erected, or a single dollar expended by the Government on railways. I believe it is the same with the County of Bruce as to railways, and I know that very little, if any, public money has been expended in North Wellington. But these sections have contributed largely to building local roads elsewhere, and I think the time has come when their claims should be considered. I am glad the hon. member has brought this question up again. When it was brought up last year the late First Minister told the hon. member for North Wellington that if the claims of those localities which appeared so strong were brought before the Government they would be considered this session. It is no answer to those claims to say that to satisfy them will involve a very large sum of money, and I do not think that objection will prevent the Government or the House from doing justice to those localities which are entitled to it. I am very glad to find that the question is still engaging the attention of Parliament, and I believe that the claims of localities such as that from which I come are so strong that the Government will be obliged at no distant day to look into them and settle them.

Mr. WATSON. While this question is before the House, I deem it my duty to call its attention to the claims of the county which I represent. That county has aided largely in the construction of a railway for opening up and developing a large section of the country, and I think that it has a strong claim for compensation for the money which it has expended. In 1873 and up to 1880 the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as surveyed, was intended to run through the county I represent, along the route now taken by the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. In 1881 the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway was deflected south; consequently the people who went into that country from 1873 to 1881 were deprived of the advantage of having the road run through the district, according to promise. A local charter was obtained by the North-Western people for the construction of a road to accommodate the settlers, which had to be bonused by the various municipalities of the district with cash bonuses to the following amounts: Portage la Prairie, $50,000; Westbourne, $75,000; Shoal Lake, $20,000; Birtle, $40,000; Neepawa, $17,000; Minnedosa, $25,000; Rapid City, $10,000; and Birtle Town, $12,000; amounting in all to $249,000. Now, the expenditure of these moneys has benefited the Government to a great extent, because it had the effect of opening up a tract of country and securing the construction of a road which has increased the value of lands belonging to the Dominion. Therefore, I think the Government should, in all fairness, reimburse those municipalities in the amounts which they have expended in this way. No cash subsidy has been given to any railway in Manitoba, except to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is true, some roads have received land grants: but large sums of money have been paid to assist local competing roads in the eastern provinces. About $34,000,000 has been voted since 1882, of which I believe $24,000,000 has been paid, while not one dollar in cash has been granted to any road in Manitoba. I think the municipalities I represent have a strong claim on the Government to be reimbursed for the expenditure they have made in building a road which was promised to be built for them previous to the settlement of the country.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIM OF DR. WALKER.

Mr. BAIN moved for:

Copies of Order in Council, correspondence, reports, statement of claims, receipts or accounts with or made by Dr. Walker, or on his behalf, or with or by any other person, respecting the Dundas and Waterloo Macadamized Road, since the close of the session of 1889.

He said: This is a matter that I have at intervals brought before the House during a long series of years. It was one of the questions between the Minister of Public Works and myself. The purchaser, after he realized that he could not acquire a title to the property, like any other man having an eye to his own interests, was not particularly anxious to expend any very large sum of money in keeping this road in repair; and at intervals I used to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this question. But I am bound to say that the masterly inactivity he displayed was always too much for me; and if the Minister of Justice had not finally come to the rescue and declared that the work belonged to the Province of Ontario and not to the Dominion, I suppose we should have continued indefinitely to go over the whole difficulty. However, about the close of last year it was decreed, on investigation of the original papers, that the Dominion were not the proper owners of this property, and to-night I am only asking for the completion of the papers in connection with that road, from the time I brought it last before the House in 1889. I may say this, however, that the condition of the road was such that as soon as the winter frost broke up this season, the bottom, in two or three places, disappeared altogether, and the authorities were obliged to make temporary repairs to enable people to pass at all. Under these circumstances, I felt it was a matter of great interest to us to know as far as possible what amount of money the occupant acquired out of the road and what amount he claims he has expended on it. It is simply for this purpose I make the motion to-night, and will then say good-bye to my hon. friend the Minister on this question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry the hon. gentleman parts from me in this way, as we have been good friends for several years in this matter. Although he applies the term "masterly inactivity" to me, nevertheless he may be sure that if I could have obtained a decision before it would have been given: but there were great difficulties in ascertaining, first, whether this was a military road, and then whether it belonged to the Province of Ontario or to the Dominion. Finally, after having obtained what information we could on the subject, the whole matter was referred to the Department of Justice, which, after careful investigation, decided that it belonged to the Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman says that the bottom has disappeared in some places. Well, we cannot help that, but at all events what remains has been declared to belong to the Province of Ontario. An Order in Council was passed to that effect and sent to the Government of Ontario. Dr. Walker has made a claim, but I must be excused if I do not discuss that claim here, because it must be considered elsewhere, and if Dr. Walker has a good claim, of course it will have to be decided in his favour. It would not be convenient, however, to discuss a question of that kind here. The proper place is in the department, and most likely the final decision will be given by the Department of Justice. The papers will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

H. M. S. LILY—RESCUE OF CREW.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of all papers and correspondence in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, relating to the saving of the lives of part of the crew of H.M.S. Lily, wrecked on the coast of Labrador, in September, 1889.

He said: It is not often that a member of this House has so agreeable a duty to perform as I have on this occasion. I have been asked to bring before the House an instance of remarkable bravery and heroism displayed by the family of a Canadian lighthouse-keeper, the story of which should be known from one end of Canada to the other. I am not personally familar with the facts, but they have been vouched for, and I have been requested to bring them forward by a gentleman whose name is a household word in Canada for everything that is kindly and chivalrous and true. It is only necessary for me to mention the name of the Hon. J. G. Joly, of Quebec, as the gentleman who asked me to bring this matter forward, to satisfy the House in advance as to the merits of the case. It appears that H.M.S. Lily was wrecked in the Straits of Belle Isle in September, 1889, and the following are the circumstances of the case as given by Mr. T. Wyatt:—

"The wreck of H. M. S. Lily took place on the 16th September, 1889, between four and five in the afternoon, at Forteau Light Station (marked on the maps as Pointe Amour, Straits of Belle Isle, Labrador coast) during a terrible gale from the south-west, and one of the thickest fogs ever seen there—what we call a black fog. Our fog-alarm had been sounding regularly for the last eighteen hours. Between 4 and 5 p. m. my son, Thomas Wyatt, who was in charge of the fog-alarm, and has since succeeded me in the charge of lighthouse-keeper at Forteau, heard the sound of a steamer's whistle, out at sea, followed immediately by two short blasts. He ran down to the water's edge, and heard a steam vessel, which he could not see, owing to the fog, blowing off steam, and soon after heard loud screams and saw a number of men struggling towards shore, in a terrible surf.

"My son ran up at once for ropes, which he brought down, accompanied by two men, Jack Davis and William Cannon, and by my wife, my daughter, eleven years old, and our maid servant, who helped the men to carry the ropes. My son, with a rope around his waist, the end of which was held ashore by the two men above mentioned to prevent the under-tow from dragging him out to sea, rushed into the surf.

"He had a heaving line in his hand, which he flung to one man and brought him safe ashore; then he saved two more in the same way. He then attempted to save a fourth, who was so helpless that the sea was rolling him over, but ultimately he managed to tangle his heaving line around him and brought him near enough to take him up in his arms and carried him ashore, senseless.

"He went in again and managed to throw his line to an officer, whom he brought ashore safely. In attempting to save a sixth man, a coloured sailor, he was drawn out by the under-tow and drew after him the two men who were holding with the rope, and nearly perished.

"Twenty-one men managed to reach the shore, that evening, in a state of exhaustion, some with no clothes on, having stripped to save themselves; seven perished in the attempt. Knowing how little chance those who had remained on the wreck had of reaching shore by swimming in such a surf, Thos. Wyatt attempted to make them remain on board, he ventured out in the surf as far as possible, and shouted with a speaking trumpet, but they could not understand him. One of the officers saved, then asked him if he could telegraph by the sound of the fog-horn. Owing to the construction of the new fog-horn actually in use, he could not do so with it, but he ran to the old steam whistle, not in use, a quarter of a mile away, got up steam, and with some knowledge he had of telegraphing and the help of one of those who had been saved from the Lily, a signal man, who was so weak that he had to be supported while he pressed my son's arm, heavily for a long sign, lightly for a short one, so as to indicate the different letters, he succeeded in sending the following message to the Lily:—'Stay on board if possible. Don't attempt to come ashore; life-line fouled on rocks in bottom, midway.'

"This was the means of saving valuable lives among the seventy or eighty men still on board. They waited until the next morning, when the sea went down considerably, and they were then able with a small boat, the only one left to the Lily (as all her other boats had been smashed in launching, except one that only landed next day) to bring a life-line ashore from the wreck; a hawser was stretched and a boatswain's chair rigged, by means of which all those remaining on board were saved, the captain being the last to leave the ship.

"When all the survivors were crowded in the lighthouse the order was given 'hats off,' and the chaplain of the Lily returned thanks to God and all joined heartily in the Lord's prayer.

"The lighthouse-keeper's wife and children did all they could to comfort the poor sailors (my wife even clothing some with her own clothes). They gave them all they had, provisions, blankets, everything, and spared themselves in no way in nursing those that were saved through the surf and were almost gone when they reached land. The names of the officers of the Lily that I can remember are:—Commander, Gerald W. Russell; First Lieutenant, John G. Hewitt, and Henry W. Sharpe.

"The old lighthouse-keeper, in giving this account, says he does so, not for the sake of reward, but that our country may know that the Canadian lighthouse-keepers can do their duty, and that their wives and children will stand by them, with open hearts and open doors, to relieve those in distress.

"It appears that these services have been promptly acknowledged by the Lords of the Admiralty. Sir Baldwin Baker, Baronet, Captain of H.M.S. Emerald, on arriving in Forteau Bay in the spring of 1890, sent for young Wyatt, and on the deck of his ship, in the presence of officers and crew, presented him with a beautiful clock, on which was engraved the following inscription:—

"'Presented to Mrs. Wyatt, Mr. Thomas Wyatt and the members of their family, by the Lords and Commissioners of the Admiralty, in recognition of their valuable assistance and kindness and hospitality on the occasion of the wreck of H.M.S. Lily, September, 1889.'"

Now, when the ponderous machinery of the Imperial Government was set in motion and the services of these people were recognized publicly so long ago as the spring of 1890, I would be sorry to hear that the Canadian Government had not done its duty in that way. I am informed that this young man Wyatt has already succeeded his father in the position of lighthouse-keeper, and that, I have no doubt, is some practical acknowledgment of his services, but I think we would all be glad to know that, if the Government had not already done so, they will soon do what is right and proper to acknowledge the services of these people; and, at any rate, I am sure every member in this House will agree with me that Canada should be proud indeed that she has such faithful servants along her stormy coasts, who are willing to risk their lives in the attempt to rescue vessels and human beings in distress.

Mr. TUPPER. I suppose it would be only proper that I should say a word upon this subject. From enquiries that I have recently made, it appears that the heroic action of this light-keeper—which I say with great pride is not an uncommon thing to hear of the light-keepers on our coasts, for, whenever there is distress or has been distress in the vicinity of the different light stations I have yet to learn of an instance where a light-keeper has played any other part than that of a true man—in this particular case the facts have not been presented to me or have not come to my knowledge in the succinct manner of the statement made by the hon. gentleman who has made this motion. I have learned, however, that when my deputy was in Halifax, N.S., shortly after the occurrence of this disaster, the Admiral on the station, Admiral Watson, consulted with him in regard to the matter, and the papers and the account of the transaction were forwarded at once and promptly to the Admiralty, and not to me. Certainly they were not brought to my personal notice, and it was only after seeing this notice in the paper that I became aware that the usual course in these matters had not been followed, and it has not yet been followed, as I understand. Certainly, this is a case which deserves the best consideration that can be given to it, and the best recognition that can be given at the hands of our department. I understood that the Admiralty had sent the reward and presented it in the most solemn and impressive manner to the light-keeper, but the incident to which reference has been made at such length only came to my personal knowledge a short time ago. It speaks a good deal for the modesty as well as the bravery of the men in question, that they have not been active in pressing upon the department the incidents connected with this transaction. It will give me the greatest possible pleasure, if it be not too late, to show that the Canadian Government is glad to appreciate, and reward, and encourage any such conduct as that which has been described to-night.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS EXPENDITURES.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

Return showing the amount of money expended and the date of expenditure in each electoral district since Confederation, under the following heads:—(1.) Public Buildings; (2.) Harbours and Rivers; (3.) Roads and Bridges; (4.) Telegraph Lines.

He said: I have thought that the information I have asked for in this return would be very valuable to members of the House during the session, and it can be compiled very easily and speedily. Perhaps it would be well to substitute the year for the date.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would suggest, first, that instead of saying the date of the expense, we should say the year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I suggested that.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN Then, as to the fourth item, concerning telegraph lines, the hon. gentleman must see the difficulty there would be in giving him that information because the question covers each electoral district, whereas a telegraph line usually runs through several districts. However, we will do the best we can.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Perhaps we might as well drop the telegraph lines.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of the pay-roll of the last military camp at Sorel and St. John's, P. Q.—(Mr. Lépine.)

Statement showing: (a) The number of suits which have been instituted by the Government against persons accused or suspected of smuggling within the Province of Quebec, and of having introduced therein intoxicating liquors without paying the duties imposed thereon by law, from 1887 up to the month of March, 1891; (b) The names of the persons against whom suits have been brought in the premises; (c) The respective places of residence of these persons; (d) The names of such of these persons as have been condemned; and the sums to the payment of which they have been condemned, respectively; (e) The dates upon which they have thus been condemned; (f) The nature of the judgment rendered against each of them, and the amount thereof; (g) Whether the persons thus condemned have paid to the Government the amount of the judgment rendered against them, and whether further proceedings have been instituted against those who have not paid this amount; (h) The sums the Government has in this way received, since the said first above-mentioned date, from the persons thus condemned to pay the penalties, under the judgments; (i) The names of the advocates who were employed by the Government to conduct the said suits and proceedings; (j) The amounts which the Government paid to each of the said advocates in connection with the said suits; (k) The suits of a similar nature, now pending in the courts; (l) The amount of the account filed by each of the said advocates for his services in connection with such suits and proceedings.—(Mr. Delisle.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 19th June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 110) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This is a very important measure. It contains a clause that was in the Railway Amending Act of last session dealing with prairie fires. This clause is one which the people of the North-West Territories take a great interest in, and, after the late Sir John Macdonald had agreed with me to insert this clause in the Government Bill, great discontent was felt when it was found that the Senate excised the clause. What happened is this: When the Bill, having been printed with the clause embodying the provisions of a resolution I had on the paper was sent up to the Senate, it was referred to the Railway Committee. A large number of railway men being in that committee room, great interest was manifested in the clause by them, and the clause was struck out in the committee. When the Bill came down, I went up at once and spoke to a leading member of the Senate, and said: "How is this? The Government accepted my clause; it goes up to the Senate, and it comes back with that clause excised." I was then told that our own North-West senators had done this; and I went and saw my friend Mr. Perley, who, I understood, had moved in the committee that the clause should be dropped, and he told me that he had done so, and explained to me a much better scheme that he had for protection against prairie fires. That scheme I have not seen take shape anywhere, but when I went to Mr. Lougheed I found that he, instead of being opposed to the clause, was in favour of it, and he said that he had seen more interest taken in it by certain members of the Senate on that committee than he had ever noticed before. Now, Sir, I move this clause. It runs somewhat like this:

"Every railway in the North-West Territories shall have the right to enter upon uncultivated land within 200 feet on each side of the track for the purpose of ploughing a fire guard, and shall burn off the grass between the fire guard and the track. Every railway in the North-West Territories shall, not later than the 30th June in each year, through the uncultivated lands where the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may order or direct from time to time, plough a fire guard six feet wide on each side of the track parallel thereto, and not less than 200 feet distant therefrom, and, as far as practicable, burn off the prairie grass between such fire guard and the track: and every railway failing to comply with the order or direction of the Privy Council in this behalf shall be liable to a penalty of dollars, which shall be enforced before any judges of the Supreme Court in the Territories sitting without a jury."

Now, Sir, I want to urge on the Government's attention the importance of dealing with this question of prairie fires. I have no doubt whatever that objections will be made to this clause on behalf of the railways, and I grant that a railway—for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway—may very properly say: "This is not in our bond. We have a contract with you, we have fulfilled our contract, but where will you point out to us in our bond any obligation to make these fire guards which you require us to do now?" If the Government should come to the conclusion that this contention on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and other railways, is a just contention, then the Government should communicate with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let the Railway Committee of the Privy Council come to an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and other railways, as to what shall be their mutual obligations, and arrange some plan by which the dreadful scourge of prairie fires can be averted. The other clause is to the effect that:

"Every railway in the Dominion of Canada shall, on and after the 1st January, A.D. 1893, equip its freight cars with automatic brakes, and both freight and passenger cars with automatic couplers."

Now, Mr. Speaker, every member of this House will occasionally find a newspaper on his breakfast table announcing the death of a brakesman, and upon enquiry we will find that, in nine cases out of ten, it arises from the dangers attached to running freight cars with the present inefficient equipment. I may say that in some States of the Union laws have been passed compelling all railways running in those States to have, as a protection, automatic brakes and automatic couplers. The next clause is an amendment of clause 194 of the Railway Act. The only change really made in clause 194 of the Railway Act is this: that whereas that clause provides that railways shall build fences where the line runs through municipalities, the clause as I amend it will provide that it shall not only be bound to build fences on each side of the line where a railway runs through municipalities, but where it runs through any settled district. I do not apprehend, I may say, any objection to this clause from the railway interest, although they may possibly wish that we should define more clearly what a settled district may be. But after that has been defined it will be for the judge to say what a settled district is. Now, this clause does not merely relate to the value of cattle killed; it does not aim merely at estimating the damage done to some poor man in the North-West, whose cattle have strayed on to the line and have been destroyed by an engine or train coming along. I am not thinking merely of the damage done to these men, and when they come into court the counsel for the railway gets up and pleads that these cattle were trespassers. When I had time to practice law in the North-West one of the first cases I had was a brief from the Canadian Pacific Railway in a case of this kind, and I had the man non-suited at once. It was my duty to have him non-suited, hard as it was on him. But, Mr. Speaker, what I am thinking of is the danger to life. Every day we read in the papers of a train coming along where three or four cattle is on the track. The engine strikes against the cattle and is thrown off the track, and then what happens? Fifty or sixty persons are killed, and more are wounded. A case like this occurred only the other day; such cases occur constantly; and I am perfectly certain that railway magnates who show themselves, as we are glad to recognize and admire, so philanthropic, after they have piled up vast wealth, and so generous to every charity, will agree that more protection must be afforded. I have not the least doubt whatever that the dangers that arise from exposing valuable lives through cattle trespassing, as it is called, on the railway, will persuade them to take the same view of this question as I do. I may say that I have spoken to a prominent railway man—I have not his permission to give his name—in regard to that clause, and I do not anticipate any opposition on the part of the railways. I move for leave to introduce this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That Government Orders have precedence on Thursdays for the remainder of the session.

Motion agreed to.

INLAND REVENUE ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday next, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, and to provide that the person in whose name a license is granted to act as a compounder shall, upon receiving such license, pay to the Collector of Inland Revenue the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars.

Motion agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS BETWEEN CANADA, ONTARIO AND QUEBEC.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 99) respecting the settlement of accounts between the Dominion of Canada and the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and between the said provinces. He said: The accounts referred to in the title of the Bill have been in course of adjustment since the union of the provinces, and the difficulties which have arisen from time to time in the progress of that adjustment are pretty familiar to the House. It is very desirable, in the interest of Canada, as well as in the interest of the individual provinces concerned, perhaps more in the interest of Canada than in that of the provinces, that this subject should be brought to a conclusion. The Government of Canada are trustees of funds bearing a considerable, even a high rate of interest, and it is very desirable we should pay; but we are unable to pay until the accounts between the provinces in respect of these funds are adjusted. There is no established method by which these accounts are to be settled. Last autumn I had an opportunity to confer with a representative of the Province of Ontario and a representative of the Province of Quebec, and the conclusion arrived at was the scheme embodied in the present Bill. The scheme is simply this: These unsettled accounts shall be submitted to arbitration. The arbitrators shall be of judicial rank, and shall be agreed upon before being appointed by all of the parties; they shall be three in number, one being appointed by the Province of Quebec, one by the Province of Ontario, and one by the Dominion. They shall have the fullest power of arbitrators, in order that the settlement shall be complete, and shall leave nothing undetermined as regards these accounts. Inasmuch as we desire the settlement to be a complete and final one, we have clothed them with larger powers than judges possess in ordinary cases, and we make their decision final unless they shall decide on questions of law, and then they shall state the question of law and the decision shall be subject to review.

Mr. LAURIER. The object of the Bill is certainly a most desirable one. I suppose it has been brought forward after previous conference with the Governments of Ontario and Quebec. I suppose there is correspondence on the subject.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no correspondence on the subject, but I had personal communication, as I explained a few moments ago. We had a meeting at which both Ontario and Quebec were represented, and, in pursuance of the understanding arrived at there, those provinces have passed a similar Bill, and it only requires our assent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We shall all be very glad to see the matter settled; but I venture to hope that the arbitration may not take quite as long a time as other arbitrations we wot of—such, for example, as the arbitration between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We cannot, however, make any absolute provision for closing the arbitration at a certain date.

Mr. LANGELIER. A Bill was passed by the Legislature of Quebec at its last session, containing about the same provisions as are to be found in the Bill now before the House, and this Bill carries out the arrangement entered into between the Governments of Ontario and Quebec and the Dominion Government.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will this include the settlement of the Indian claims under the Robinson Treaty, with respect to lands on the north shore of Lake Huron?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; it will.

Mr. EDGAR. I observe that by this Bill only Canada is bound. I suppose the two provinces bound themselves by their own legislation?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to make an enquiry of the Minister of Justice. I see these gentlemen must all be judges. I suppose, however, it is not intended that they shall merely take up this arbitration during such intervals as their duties permit. If that is the case, it may go to a great length. It seems to me these gentlemen will have to give their time pretty much de die in diem until they get through, or some arrangement must be made to this effect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to enquire of the Minister of Justice whether the claims of the Mississaugas as to accrued interest will be included in the reference?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; they will be.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With regard to the question asked by the member for South Oxford, (Sir Richard Cartwright), there will be little difficulty in the arbitration being disposed of within a short time, quite within the period of an ordinary piece of litigation. A great deal of the account-taking has been done, and the duties which will devolve on the arbitrators will be mainly the deciding of legal questions. I do not think any long examination into details will be necessary.

Mr. EDGAR. I should like the Minister of Justice to explain what is meant by the term "judges." There is no definition of the word, and no statement as to what kind of judges is mentioned, and whether retired judges are included.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was considered desirable not to define the rank the judges shall be of, and therefore, if they come in any sense within the term "judges" the choice is free. I do not think retired judges would be considered judges, however. The hon. gentleman will see that it is provided that there shall be unanimous consent, although the selection in the first place is made by the Provincial Governments and by the Dominion Government respectively.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 12) to further amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships. He said: As I have already explained, this Bill is for the purpose of making regular the practice that has obtained since we have had a law concerning the granting of certificates to masters and mates, to have a distinction made by the department between the minor waters and the other waters of Canada. That practice seems not to be in strict accordance with the original statute, and this Bill will make its provisions more clear.

Mr. BURDETT. I desire to call the attention of the Minister to the necessity of having it distinctly enacted that certificates may be granted to masters to run vessels on these minor waters upon passing a very slight examination, as very slight, if any, knowledge of navigation is required in many cases. For instance, in the Bay of Quinté there are a number of small ferries which require very little knowledge of navigation on the part of the masters of these boats, and to subject the owners of these ferries to the necessity of having certified masters as well as engineers, renders it impossible to run such boats with any profit whatever. In fact, a case has occurred in which, in a suit at the instance of the Crown, judgment was given against two owners of such boats for a penalty of $500, because the boats were run without a certified master. The fact is, the owners cannot afford to pay for certified masters and engineers, and these small boats can be very well run without such certified officers. I understand that in the case I have referred to the judge, in giving judgment, recommended the remission of the penalty by the Minister on such terms as may be deemed just. There certainly should be a clause in this Bill to permit a certificate to be granted to masters of these minor ferry boats which ply on the inland waters, without their having to pass anything like a difficult examination.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the object of the provisions of the present Bill, and it was supposed to be the law until a recent date. However, it will be remedied by this measure.

Mr. BURDETT. I would suggest that the Minister should take power in this Bill to remit any penalties already incurred by reason of the violation of the law, if the violation has not been very serious.

Mr. LISTER. Is it the practice or the law at present, that a person obtaining a certificate must be a British subject?

Mr. TUPPER. That is the law at present.

Mr. EDGAR. Is it intended by this Bill that all steamers on the minor waters carrying loads of over ten tons shall require to be sailed by certified masters?

Mr. TUPPER. What kind of steamers?

Mr. EDGAR. Any steamship, not a pleasure yacht of over ten tons register.

Mr. TUPPER. The law will be the same with regard to that as hitherto. This Bill simply provides that the masters of small steamers, on the minor waters, shall have a less severe examination to pass. It makes a distinction between the certificates of masters of the larger steamers, on the greater inland waters, and the masters of small steamers on the minor waters.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BURDETT. I would call the attention of the Minister to a case of hardship which occurred on the Bay of Quinté, where the owner of a barge carrying a little over sixty tons was compelled to have two certified engineers. The barge was simply used for carrying stones from one point of the bay to the other; it was only used in the day time; there was no necessity for two engineers, and it cost the owner a great deal of money to have two certified engineers on the same barge at the same time. I think the Minister should have a clause inserted in this Bill which would make its provisions more elastic, so as to meet a case of this kind, and which would permit a steamboat to have only one engineer where a sufficient case is shown to this effect.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the interpretation of the Minister of the expression "inland and minor" waters. Take, for instance, the Gulf of Georgia or James' Bay. The inland waters as defined at present mean the St. Lawrence to a line drawn across at Father Point.

Mr. TUPPER. The division made in the section is that which has always obtained, and I felt it right to stick closely to it, because there has been no representation in favour of any other division.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the Hudson Bay be a minor water?

Mr. TUPPER. No; it is part of the ocean.

Mr. EDGAR. The Gulf of Georgia and James Bay are inland waters, but I do not know where they are defined as such—certainly not in the original Act, and they are not so defined in this Bill.

Mr. TUPPER. This Bill relates only to special certificates for navigating inland waters and minor waters. Then there are certificates for sea-going ships not confined to any particular waters, which would embrace all waters, whether inside of Canada or not.

Mr. EDGAR. Under this Bill the Gulf of Georgia and the James' Bay would be minor waters, because they are inland waters.

Mr. TUPPER. Navigation in the Gulf of Georgia would require a sea-going certificate.

Mr. EDGAR. The Gulf of Georgia is in Canada, between the Island of Vancouver and the mainland. Then, what about the navigation of the Fraser River up to Yale?

Mr. TUPPER. That would be included in the minor waters of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As I understand the Minister, he confines the words "inland waters" and "minor waters" to fresh waters, and embraces no part of the sea.

Mr. TUPPER. No part of the sea.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not stated in the Bill. By clause (h) he gives a definition of inland waters, which he makes to embrace the River St. Lawrence, and in clause (i) he says that the expression "minor waters of Canada" means all inland waters other than those stated. He uses the expression "inland waters" in two different senses in these two clauses.

Mr. TUPPER. One is the statutory definition, and in the other case the term is used in a general sense.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not made clear in the Bill. If the hon. gentleman means to confine inland waters to fresh waters the Bill should say so. I do not think that this measure ought to extend to such waters as the Gulf of Georgia, the Hudson Bay or James' Bay at all.

Mr. TUPPER. Perhaps I am wrong in saying that the expression "inland waters" refers only to fresh waters, because, of course, there is salt water at Father Point; but the line must be drawn somewhere, and I draw it there. I would not like to make a change in that respect, because there are sea-going certificates covering outside waters which are recognized by the Imperial Board of Trade. These rules have worked satisfactorily so far, and while not saying anything about salt or fresh water, I think we have drawn a line; and so far as that excludes other waters, then the sea-going certificates come in. If a master wants to go beyond the limits he can get the larger certificate. This is made simply in the interests of navigators and ship-owners, where the limited certificate means limited examination and limited knowledge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Take clause (i): the expression "minor waters" means all inland fresh waters of Canada other than Lake Ontario, and so on, leaving untouched the mouth of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. TUPPER. That is so, and you must draw the line. It is drawn at Father Point, and I will not disturb it unless some substantial reason is given for extending it. For years the line has been at Father Point, and the master who wishes to navigate a vessel outside of that will not get the benefit of these provisions unless he passes a severer examination.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The suggestion I make does not at all interfere with extending the expression "minor" as far as the navigation of the St. Lawrence to Father Point; but I call attention to this, that there are waters elsewhere—for instance, the Gulf of Georgia. The hon. gentleman does not say whether that is included or excluded.

Mr. TUPPER. That would depend whether it it was an inland water. Under our Bill it certainly is not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the point. If you use the term "fresh water" in clause (i), you make it perfectly clear that you do exclude it.

Mr. TUPPER. That would confuse us at Father Point, which is salt water.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is provided for in clause (h).

Mr. TUPPER. "All other inland waters."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would be other than those already provided for.

Mr. EDGAR. The difficulty is that this Bill, or the old Act, defines what is meant by inland waters. Clause (h) says that inland waters include the River St. Lawrence, but does not say what else. It would be better to have a complete definition than a partial one.

Mr. TUPPER. As the clause has been administered since 1869, the waters on the coast—for instance, the Gulf of Georgia—have been included in the sea-going certificate, and the only exceptions made to the general rules and regulations were for these limited waters; and it does appear to me, on reading the clause, after the observations made, it is clear what the Act means, because we have said we have drawn a line from Father Point, and then we have said inside of that are inland waters, and a minor water certificate can be given for all other inland waters other than Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron (including Georgian Bay) Superior and Winnipeg.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Evidently the Bill has been prepared to suit the Act of the old Parliament, where the inland waters are much more limited.

Mr. TUPPER. 1883 is the date of the Act we are now amending. The original Act may have been so.

Mr. EDGAR. Under which definition does the Fraser River, from the mouth up to Yale, which is navigable, come?

Mr. TUPPER. That certainly is inland water as a matter of fact, being within the boundaries of our own territory.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would certainly be advantageous if clauses (h) and (i) were reconsidered, because there are certainly parts of the law very much older than the Dominion, and altogether unsuited to the present day.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not think there is any practical difficulty. None has arisen so far. The clause will read as follows: "The expression minor waters of Canada means all other inland waters of Canada except Lakes Ontario, Erie and Huron, including Georgian Bay, Lakes Superior and Winnipeg."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman will see that it is very confusing. The term "inland waters" includes the River St. Lawrence, but he has given a definition. He says the expression "minor waters" includes all other inland waters. There cannot be any other inland waters. When the hon. gentleman gives a definition it ought to be broad enough to include everything. But it does not do that. He says the minor waters of Canada shall mean all other inland waters. How can that be?

Mr. TUPPER. I will let that clause stand, and go on with the rest.

Mr. BURDETT. The arms of inland waters would be minor waters. Across these there might be a ferry established for the convenience of the people, and I think it is not necessary to subject the master of the ferry boat to an examination. I think the Minister should have power to grant certificates, where a proper case is made out, for a ferry boat of that character.

Mr. EDGAR. Under the clause before us, Lake Ontario is not a minor water. That is clear. The Bay of Quinté is certainly part of Lake Ontario, and it is the Bay of Quinté that my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Burdett) wants to have declared a minor water.

Mr. TUPPER. We say "Lake Huron, including Georgian Bay," which shows that we do not include the Bay of Quinté in Lake Ontario, as it is not specially included.

Mr. EDGAR. The Georgian Bay is a large lake, and there are other large lakes, such as Lake Nepigon and Lake Simcoe. Is the Bay of Toronto part of Lake Ontario, or is it a minor water? If it is part of Lake Ontario it is not a minor water.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am sure the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) does not intend to speak seriously when he says that the Bay of Quinté is part of Lake Ontario. Every school child in the province is taught that the Bay of Quinté is a distinct water from Lake Ontario.

Mr. EDGAR. What about the Bay of Toronto?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That may be taught in Toronto, but it shows that the hon. gentleman has forgotten what he has learned when he contends that the Bay of Quinté is part of Lake Ontario. A comparison between the Bay of Toronto and the Bay of Quinté is about the same as a comparison between a mouse and an elephant.

Mr. MULOCK. You are at sea.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Certainly the Bay of Quinté is not a part of Lake Ontario.

Mr. BURDETT. There are certain arms of Lake Ontario which might well be considered minor waters, such as what are called the East and West Lakes. There was a boat running on the West Lake from Wellington to what is called the Sand Bank. No one would want a master for that boat who would be competent to manage a sea-going vessel, the distance being only a mile or two miles at the outside, and any man who was sober and in his right mind would be able to manage a vessel of that kind, with the assistance of a proper engineer. Of course, the Bay of Quinté cannot be considered part of Lake Ontario. You might as well say that the Atlantic Ocean is part of Lake Ontario because the waters of Lake Ontario flow into it.

Mr. BOWELL. The East Bay and the West Bay are parts of Lake Ontario, and the most dangerous part of navigation is in those places. It is true that, towards Weller's Bay, there was a sand bank, but it has been washed away, and now, as the hon. gentleman knows, the water is 15 to 20 feet deep. The crossing of these waters would not require a certified master in the ordinary way, but in a storm it is more dangerous to navigate there than in the middle of the lake, and requires masters who understand navigation more than if they were navigating from Toronto to Kingston.

Mr. BURDETT. I am only giving this as an example. I think the Minister of Marine should have power given by the statute to give certificates for a master for a particular place, and he should know the facts as to the dangerous nature of the water and grant the certificates accordingly. I think the Minister should have power to grant certificates according to the danger of the water.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I agree with the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) that the law should be more elastic, and that it should not be bound down by these expressions, which the Minister cannot change after this becomes law. The Minister should have the power to change the certificates according to the difficulty of navigating in East or West Lake, or in the Bay of Quinté, or in Lake Ontario or Lake Superior. All these Acts in regard to masters of vessels are being made too strict and iron-bound, and they prevent the Minister from making them applicable to different parts of the country. I agree with the hon. member for East Hastings in that respect.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think it is desirable to set up the Minister of Marine or the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) as an authority on geography for all time to come. We ought to settle this question here. The member for Frontenac says the Bay of Quinté is not a part of Lake Ontario.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Your friend from East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) says the same.

Mr. EDGAR. Then I should like to know if the harbour of Toronto, the harbour of Hamilton, and other harbours all along, are part of Lake Ontario or Lake Erie, or what they are? I think we should try to make an exception in this case, and make this not a minor water, but to have a certificate either of service or of competency of a higher grade for Lake Ontario, than, for example, Lake Simcoe. Let us, if we can, put in some clause which provides that the bays, arms and harbours on these lakes shall not be deemed to be part of such lakes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think we had better have a committee to make some geographical definitions. We seem to be very much at sea, and I must say that I think my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is a better authority on military matters than on naval matters, so far as he has spoken of naval matters to-day. The contention that an indentation or arm of a body of water, such as the Bay of Quinté, leading into Lake Ontario, is not a part of the water of that lake, seems to me to be rather absurd. It must be classed as a part of the water of Lake Ontario, as Thunder Bay is a part of the water of Lake Superior.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Then, on that theory, the River St. Lawrence, which flows into the Atlantic Ocean, is part of the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; it flows into the ocean in the same way. The Bay of Quinté runs 70 miles inland; it is a distinct and different body of water, and is not properly a part of Lake Ontario, as we usually mean when we speak of that lake.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Amazon is not a part of the Atlantic Ocean, the St. Lawrence is not a part of the Alantic Ocean, or a part of Lake Ontario. The St. Lawrence is a distinct strait or river connected with other larger bodies of water. But the Bay of Quinté does not connect Lake Ontario with some other body of water; it is simply an arm of Lake Ontario.

Mr. BOWELL. No; it empties into Lake Ontario.

Mr. FRASER. I do not see any necessity for an Act of this kind at all. It seems to me an absurd idea to go to the trouble of examining a man and giving him a certificate to sail on every little pond such as this Act is supposed to apply to. Coming from the sea coast as I do, I cannot understand it. I can see a smile on the face of the Minister himself. I think he has introduced this Act to satisfy the prejudices of people who live near lakes and ponds. We are spending a lot of time about an Act which should be withdrawn. For my own part, I can see no necessity for it. I should suppose that any person who wanted to sail on ponds of this kind; would be allowed to do so without a certificate.

Mr. TUPPER. I think we might go on with the rest of the Bill. The only change in the next section, as the Committee will see, relates to these minor or inland waters. I confess I did not give any critical examination to this clause, because I supposed it was based upon existing regulations.

Mr. LISTER. I would ask the Minister whether he intends that Lake St. Clair shall be considered one of the minor waters?

Mr. TUPPER. I am not going to constitute myself a court any longer.

Mr. LISTER. I want to say to my hon. friend from the sea (Mr. Fraser), that I have a great respect for him, but I cannot conceal the fact from myself that a great many of those gentlemen down by the sea are not acquainted with our inland seas up west. If he will come up west he will see ships that over-top the little craft they send out from Nova Scotia. These lakes up west are oceans.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member from Frontenac can tell us whether Lake St. Clair is an inland water or not.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. These inland waters have not been defined in the Act yet, I think?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes; in the two first clauses, (h) and (i), which have been taken out of the regulations. They have been in the regulations, but never in an Act of Parliament.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think, if my memory serves me right, you define in your regulations what minor waters are. You define the Bay of Quinté by a line drawn across Red Wolfe Island. In some certificates you define particularly what minor waters are, and you prevent any person, without a certificate, from sailing on Lake Ontario west of a certain line.

Mr. TUPPER. The only change is the words "on the minor waters."

Mr. EDGAR. I dare say it is a very good thing to require that persons should be domiciled in Canada for at least three years who intend to become masters or mates of sea-going ships, or perhaps of inland ships. But why is it necessary to apply that same rule to the masters and mates of these two-penny-ha'-penny little inland ferry boats on little bays or inland lakes?—for that is the way the Act is drawn.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the original Act.

Mr. EDGAR. No; it is an amendment.

Mr. TUPPER. It is in the original Act.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister applies the amendment concerning the minor waters to the original Act, which requires three years domicile in Canada for every master or mate. Now, I think that should not be made to apply to these small inland waters. It may be all right for sea-going ships.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I objected to this clause when it was first proposed by the late hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), and I see no reasons to support it now. It says that a party must be domiciled in Canada for three years before he can undergo his examination and engage in his particular business, although as a resident of a foreign country he may have pursued it for a greater portion of his life. Why should a Norwegian, for instance, who has sailed a vessel in his own country for a quarter of a century, and who becomes a resident of Canada, be required to reside three years in this country before he can pursue his ordinary occupation and means of livelihood, any more than a man who comes out here for the purpose of cultivating the soil? If you were to adopt such a rule, and say that a man must reside in this country three years before he can engage as a farm hand, before he can engage as a mechanic, or a labourer, why, you see at once the monstrous and absurd character of such a proposition. I say that in a democratic country like this we ought to know no distinction, we ought not to make any classification of the population in this way. We assume that a man who engages in any calling or profession, if he is honest, if he is industrious, ought to be regarded in the eye of the law as respectable as any other, and if a man may come here without any disability being imposed upon him as an ordinary labourer, as a farmer or a mechanic, why may he not engage as a master of a ship, if he is competent to undergo an examination and to take charge of a vessel? If it is his intention to become a British subject, or if he intends to remain in the country, I see no reason why this should not be the case. This attempt to create close corporations or guilds, with a view of excluding men from this, that or the other guild, for which they may be qualified, I think is a policy that ought to find no place in the legislation of this country, and the sooner we get rid of the influence of that spirit the better it will be for us. Why, Sir, I have known myself men coming from Germany, standing high in the medical profession of that country, being run out of this country and going to the neighbouring Republic, and taking hundreds with them, where they may have the liberty of practising their profession. It seems to me monstrous that we should adopt a policy of this sort. Every calling or profession should be free for every man to engage in who is qualified, and who can take his examination, and it is not our business to enquire how he obtained his knowledge, or how long he was in obtaining it; if he possesses it, that is sufficient for our purpose, and we should allow him to engage in whatever calling or employment he pleases.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says this proposition was brought forward by Mr. Colby last year. The Bill Mr. Colby had before the House related to steamboats; the principle is practically the same. This principle was adopted by this House as far back as 1883, and it is not a new suggestion. I merely threw it out to the Committee; of course, I expected the Committee would criticise it. It is not a proposition that affects any substantial change whatever. The Bill is long, and there are many suggestions that may occur in the direction of a reform of the present Act. But that is a matter by the way. There is a reason for maintaining the principle which the hon. gentleman criticises. The hon. gentleman says we should have practically free trade in these certificates, and that any one should be admitted to take charge of our vessels. In connection with the coasting trade, the hon. gentleman knows that the position is this: that each nation is very jealous in respect to the control of its coasting trade, and the only occasion on which this country has offered to reciprocate in these privileges or extend these privileges to foreigners is when foreigners extend them to us. We are situated in this position: that our neighbours to the south have regulations in regard to their inland waters, and they do not permit our citizens to go to their country and obtain certificates to command their ships, and until they do so I think the position we hold is quite proper, especially as they refuse to reciprocate with us in regard to coasting privileges. While they refuse to recognize our citizens, although properly qualified to obtain certificates, without becoming naturalized citizens, just so long will we maintain our rights, without offence to them, but with justice to our people. The large number of our own people who hold certificates, qualified by their citizenship, by their domicile, by their intention, and the fact of remaining in this country, have a right to the protection at our hands which this legislation affords them, and that, at all events, they shall not be called upon to meet the competition of citizens of a neighbouring country until they are at liberty to go into that neighbouring country and compete with them. That would be an entirely different position. Of course, there is much to be said, as there always is in these propositions, on both sides; but as this Bill is introduced for a simple purpose, it is desirable to adhere to the original proposition as far as possible.

Mr. FRASER. I see a good deal of force in what the Minister says. There is, however, a difficulty in regard to the three years. I know many young men who have gone to sea and been absent for some years, and yet such men on their return could not go up for examination.

Mr. TUPPER. If British subjects.

Mr. FRASER. The very fact that every master and mate must be a British subject should be sufficient, without this declaration as to three years. I know many cases of young men who have gone to sea and afterwards engaged in other employments. If they want to go up for examination they must remain home three years before they have an opportunity to secure a certificate. That is evidently unfair. While I see good reason for saying that a man who has just come into the country should not be allowed to come up for examination, still the fact that those obtaining certificates must be British subjects should be sufficient, and this provision respecting three years will exclude such young men as I have referred to.

Mr. TUPPER. No; a certain service is required, but so long as the service is shown to have been performed that is all that is necessary. Moreover, British subjects going abroad in foreign vessels, or domiciled for three years, are included.

Mr. FRASER. The wording is "present serving," not having served.

Mr. TUPPER. The provision does not say others shall not be, and British subjects serving on foreign vessels will be admitted. It means men having served. It will be deemed to cover not only men residing in Canada, but men who are British subjects sailing in any part of the world.

Mr. FRASER. The person must have served three years at some time. I submit this provision is too stringent.

Mr. TUPPER. That is a delicate question, on which I cannot give advice, for it is the result of rules framed by the Imperial Board of Trade. The moment we depart from the principle of those rules, and from the qualification on which certificates are given, that moment the understanding now had with the Imperial Board of Trade, under which they recognize our certificates, falls to the ground. We have been guided by their rule.

Mr. LISTER. I think the Minister of Marine misunderstood and misapprehended the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) when he spoke about free trade in certificates, and the Minister has not stated the position of affairs existing between the United States and Canada so far as masters' and mates' certificates are concerned. I may say to the hon. gentleman that a Canadian going to the United States and seeking the position of master on American vessels is entitled to one, on the declaration of his intention to become an American citizen. It is quite possible he may never complete what he commenced, and never become an American citizen. All that is required is that he should declare his intention to become such, and upon doing that, so far as the laws of the country are concerned, he is entitled to the position. I do not see why there should be this provision, this residence, before a man is entitled to hold a position or receive a master's certificate. I suppose our people can be protected as fully and as completely as it is necessary to protect them by simply declaring, as the law now declares, that before they receive certificates they shall be British subjects. There is no danger of Americans coming here and taking these positions, because they must be residents in this country for three years before they are entitled to certificates under this Act—that is, before they make themselves qualified to become British subjects. If foreigners, they must be resident in this country for three years before they are entitled to certificates. But this provision should not exist in regard to our own people. It should be sufficient if they are British subjects and resident in this country at the time.

Mr. TUPPER. There are local certificates, and it may well be that a candidate who receives a certificate for a certain locality, not having the high technical training required for general navigation, thus gives a guarantee of his knowledge of the locality, because he has been domiciled for three years. There may be that element.

Mr. LISTER. It is possible there may be that element, but this may be ground for refusing a certificate altogether.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have not been able to understand why the hon. gentleman should insist in every case upon the three years limit. I think the hon. gentleman is wrong in stating that a man cannot get employment as master or mate in the States unless he becomes an American citizen. As the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) states, if a person takes the oath of allegiance and passes the examination he is entitled, in the United States, to become a captain, mate or engineer, although, as a matter of fact, he does not become an American citizen. I know from my own experience that the Canadian law as it formerly stood has worked a great deal of injury in certain portions of Canada, and it will continue to work that injury if not amended. Last election, in the town of Goderich alone, I found no less than forty-five Canadians, some of whose residences are in that town, employed as captains, mates or engineers on American vessels. I am informed by them that all they require to do is to express their intention of becoming American citizens, take the oath of allegiance and pass the qualifying examination. I know, as a matter of fact, that some of those were offered employment on British bottoms in Canadian waters, but under the law as it formerly stood, and as the hon. Minister proposes to continue it, they could not present themselves for examination unless they had been three years in the country. This is a direct discouragement to our citizens who have gone to the United States to come back to Canada again, and if it is proposed to be continued it is not in the public interest. Many of these men never did pass an examination in Canada, but I have no doubt that they could well do so, and would prefer living in Canada, as their friends nearly all live here. If the hon. gentleman would strike out that clause providing for three years' residence it would effect a very good purpose; for, as far as I can see, the law provides that a man who goes up for examination must be a British subject, and if he is, whether he is in the country for six months or for three years cannot make any difference. To pass the law as it now stands would appear to me to be a great hardship.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the law now.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I know it is, but it is a bad law, and it has worked badly, and why should we not amend it?

Mr. TUPPER. It has not worked badly.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It has worked badly, and I have given an instance of this. I could give the names of several of my constituents in the town of Goderich who would be willing to come back to Canada, but the law stands in their way, and it is an obstacle to their coming back to Canada. If we passed a bad law ten, fifteen, or twenty years ago, it is no reason why we should not repeal it, and this is the time to make the law perfect, when it is proposed to consolidate and amend it. It is no argument to say that because we have passed a bad law that we should continue that bad law. Let the hon. gentleman now make the law perfect in this Bill.

Mr. TUPPER. Perhaps I have not made myself sufficiently explicit. The master or mate must, in addition to his qualification, have put in service, and we say that it must be service in a registered ship of Canada, or a British ship, or if he is a British subject his foreign service will count. For instance, when a citizen of this country goes to the United States and ships on a vessel there, and comes back to pass an examination here, he cannot count his foreign service on a foreign ship; he must have served on a British ship or on a Canadian ship. This is not altogether a matter of sentiment. I have alluded several times to the Imperial Board of Trade, and they only sanctioned our dealing with certificates in a direct way on the undertaking that we would maintain their principles and rules. This matter comes under the discipline and the regulations of British ships and of colonial ships regulated by the British Merchants Shipping Act, and by our own regulations in connection with the certificates to masters and mates, and it gives a better guarantee on behalf of the applicant for a certificate of having put in good service, and his vouchers are easier to trace, and the certificates of that service are safer to depend upon. I would hesitate, without the gravest consideration—and hon. gentlemen will see the reason of that hesitancy is well founded—to make such a radical change as that in the principle of the main Bill when we only propose now to make certain slight alterations. The proposition that has been made by the hon. gentleman would require the most careful consideration on the part of those concerned in the technical portion of this work in the Dominion, as to whether there could be sufficient safeguards placed around such a practice as the one proposed. It would not be right that a man might come from any foreign country in the world and say: I served on a ship and I can give you my word, or I am prepared to make an affidavit to that effect. We cannot trace the service of this man, and it stands to reason that on our own ships or on British ships we can do so much more safely, for we know and we have the guarantee that on these ships dicipline is maintained by virtue of rigid rules and regulations. Whatever can be said as to the ships of the United States—and we need not regard that country alone, for the principle is wide, and covers every foreign nation—we are unable to say whether there is that same rigid adherence to regulations and that careful regard to discipline on board these ships as is known to obtain on our own ships. This question of service comes in in that way. It is not merely that a man shall have lived three years in Canada—that is, domiciled in a British ship in Canada, or being a British subject on a foreign ship—but he must show, in addition to that, that he is able to answer questions on nautical subjects, and by the regulations he is required to prove service as well.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You don't rely on the service; you rely on the examination.

Mr. TUPPER. Partly on the service.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). A man has got to present himself and be examined.

Mr. TUPPER. Three years' service is absolutely obligatory, as well as the examination.

Mr. MULOCK. Where does that provision appear in the Act?

Mr. TUPPER. It appears in the rules and regulations under the main Act.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is confounding two distinct things in one section. Part of this clause deals with the examination.

Mr. TUPPER. Section 5 of the main Act says:

"The Governor in Council may, from time to time, make rules for the conduct of such examinations and as to the qualification of the applicants, and such rules shall be observed by all examiners."

Under this section regulations have been made.

Mr. MULOCK. If the section we have under consideration has to deal with the examination, then the rules which are made under this main Act meet the whole case. I quite agree as to the wisdom of the Government in insisting upon the candidate having an acquaintance with the waters in which he is supposed to sail, but here you are comfounding two things. As far as this section is concerned, if there is no subsequent legislation, or no regulation passed under subsequent legislation, then under this particular clause a man who has never set foot on a ship can go up for examination.

Mr. TUPPER. But the hon. gentleman will see that he must read this section of the Bill with the section of the main Act which I have just read. A man cannot pass his examination and get his certificate unless he has service and complies with the other sections of the same Act.

Mr. MULOCK. If the other section meets the case, you do not require this section in the Bill at all. If the other section determines the conditions to which a candidate for examination must be subject you do not require to say anything here about domicile at all. What you want by an examination is to see that the candidate is a proper person to receive a certificate. It does not follow because he is domiciled in Canada that he is fit for it, or because he is not domiciled in Canada that he is not fit for it. This is an unnecessary provision. You could meet the case quite as well by a regulation, and you would avoid having a statutory provision which might operate hardly. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has referred to the case of persons who live outside of Canada, having ceased to be domiciled in Canada, and who, under the provisions of the law at present, would not be able to come back and present themselves for examination for certificates. If you do not intend to exclude them, remove this provision, and then you will be free to deal with their cases by Order in Council.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. If those Canadians to whom the hon. member for Huron alluded were over three years in Canada they would be domiciled. The Act does not say that they must be domiciled for three years immediately preceding an examination.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister a short time ago argued in favour of this clause as a sort of protective measure to Canadian labour—to those who have remained in Canada, not to those who have turned their backs upon it. "Domiciled" means those who at the time of presenting themselves for examination are domiciled in Canada, and if a Canadian becomes domiciled in the United States he is not eligible for examination. If this provision is for the protection of Canadian labour let that labour be protected by some distinct proposition applicable to labour of all kinds. We know that people do not require to be domiciled in Canada for three years in order to enter the Civil Service; nor does a man require to be domiciled in Canada for three months in order to be eligible to a seat in Parliament if he is a British subject. You do not need this clause at all to secure what is aimed at—an efficient examination.

Mr. TUPPER. This has been the law since 1883, and the case mentioned by the hon. member for Huron is not in any degree affected by it. I am informed that ever since this has been the law there has not been a suggestion of any hardship from its working in respect to the question now raised, so that I do not see the necessity of changing it. A change might destroy the validity and value of our certificates, because not merely is three years' service required, but it is required under circumstances that will admit of no abuse under proper discipline, and under the supervision of the Board of Trade in England, and our own Marine Department in this country, and there is a great deal in that. It would be very dangerous to interfere with the safeguards of the certificates.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister says that under this Act a Canadian who has once been domiciled in Canada but has left the country may, without subsequent domicile come up for examination.

Mr. TUPPER. If he has put in his three years' service.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well. If he means that, I would suggest that he insert after "domiciled" the words "at any time," so as to remove any doubt.

Mr. TUPPER. I have just been reminded that last session this Parliament, after full investigation, took the very opposite view to that advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Colby, then acting for me, introduced a Bill to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, in which Parliament, after full discussion and consideration, specially provided with regard to an applicant for a certificate of steamboat engineer:

"Such applicant, if not a British subject, shall only be entitled to a certificate if, in addition to the qualifications required by this Act, he has been domiciled in Canada for at least three years. And service as engineer of any class upon any steamboat, ship or vessel registered in Great Britain or Canada shall be deemed to constitute a domicile in Canada while so serving."

Here we have the principle confirmed in 1890 which Parliament adopted in 1883.

Mr. MULOCK. Does that mean just prior to coming up for examination?

Mr. TUPPER. No; he must be able to show that he has been domiciled.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman must bear in mind that domicile does not mean residence.

Mr. TUPPER. I am quite aware of that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it could hardly be said that a person is domiciled in Canada who has his residence outside of Canada, or who intends to reside outside of Canada. The clause says the examination may be instituted in Canada for persons domiciled in Canada. Domiciled when? Why, at the time of the examination. Settled in Canada with the view of remaining in Canada? For what length of time? Evidently at least three years. Clearly, that refers to three years immediately preceding the examination, and cannot mean anything else. If the word "residence" were substituted for "domicile" the Minister might argue as he has done, but under the definition of domicile he will see it requires a residence, not at any indefinite period long passed, but at the time of the examination, and for three years immediately preceding, with the intention of remaining.

Mr. KENNY. We are legislating for Canadians and not Americans, and in the clause under discussion it is distinctly stated that domiciled means serving three years on board a British or a Canadian ship.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When?

Mr. KENNY. The hon. member for Guysborough, who referred to the minor waters of Canada, also told the Committee that we in the Maritime Provinces are concerned in such legislation in connection with the larger ships; and, as the Minister of Marine has said, it is desirable that our maritime population, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, who are engaged as sailors, should have opportunities of obtaining certificates within their own country, and it is necessary to keep up the standard of these certificates as well as their validity. I have listened most attentively, and with that respect which a layman should always pay to the arguments advanced by lawyers, on perhaps a technical question; but from the standpoint of the ship-owners, I think we are wasting a great deal of time in the further consideration of this clause.

Mr. LISTER. This matter only applies to inland waters.

Mr. KENNY. And to coasting.

Mr. LISTER. Well, coasters are small vessels that always keep in sight of the shore.

Mr. KENNY. Coasting means from Nova Scotia to British Columbia.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. Minister should expunge a portion of this section. If he will put it this way it would answer: "The examinations may be instituted for persons who intend to procure certificates"—eliminating from the word "domicile" to the word "who." Surely it can be of no consequence whether a man has been a resident or not, so far as the certificate is concerned, provided he is a British subject, and has served upon a Canadian, British or foreign vessel. If he has the proper qualifications, surely it will make no difference whether he has been a resident of this country or not. To be a British subject is all you require. So far as the seamen on the inland waters are concerned, if it were not for the employment they receive on American vessels the merchant marine in the inland waters would be very small indeed. Our purely Canadian shipping is comparatively small and the American is very large. The seamen who are adapted to become masters of vessels in nearly all instances become so adapted by service in American vessels. Still, if they have become qualified by such service and live in the United States, without ever having surrendered their allegiance to Great Britain, we should not prevent their coming back here and qualifying. It is a matter of no consequence what is being done in England, so far as our inland waters are concerned, because the men holding certificates on these waters are not entitled to sail ocean-going vessels. We are now legislating for the inland waters of Canada pure and simple, and that legislation should be such as to meet the necessities of the people principally interested.

Mr. EDGAR. I am rather surprised that the Minister of Marine should make such a strenuous fight in favour of the principle of domicile, when not very long ago he made an equally strenuous fight against that principle when it was proposed to attach it to the right to vote. However, let us assume for a moment that he has convinced himself, if not us, that it is right to maintain the three years domicile. I would draw his attention to the fact that either he or his draughtsmen have made a mistake in this clause. They have introduced the words "or service" into this clause. That makes the domicile of three years apply to examinations and to the granting of certificates of service.

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly.

Mr. EDGAR. That is a change in the law.

Mr. TUPPER. No.

Mr. EDGAR. Under the present Act, section 8 of the law, as it is to-day, provides that certificates of service may be given under special circumstances without any condition of domicile whatever. So, unless I read the Act altogether amiss, the Minister is introducing a very radical and serious change here which he did not know he was introducing.

Mr. TUPPER. No; I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. EDGAR. If the Minister can show the Committee that, under section 8 of the Revised Statutes affecting this matter, three years domicile is required, I shall be surprised.

Mr. TUPPER. It is not under section 8; but under section 5 the hon. gentleman will see that the regulations in regard to qualification, and so on, are provided for by Order in Council.

Mr. EDGAR. Very likely that is what the hon. Minister intended, but it is not what the Act says. The Act reads:

"The domicile for three years is necessary for certificates of competency or certificates of service, as hereinafter mentioned."

That means, "as hereinafter mentioned" in the main Act, and these certificates come under section 8 and nothing else, and there is no provision requiring domicile, so that, inadvertently, the draughtsman has included the words "or service," which should not appear here.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that the satisfactory service required must be on a British ship, and this section says that that constitutes a Canadian domicile. The hon. gentleman has not read that carefully. He will see that it does not make any difference whatever whether these words are there or not. Under section 8 the service must be the service laid down, that service must be satisfactory, and to be satisfactory it must be for three years, and that three years' service must be on a British ship. This Bill says precisely the same thing.

Mr. KING. What will the effect of this Bill be in regard to St. John River?

Mr. TUPPER. No change will take place as to the St. John River. I have been careful to avoid any changes. I have already impressed upon the House that one of the principal reasons for this Bill is to make valid what was supposed to be the law of 1883, but which has been administered on all the waters of Canada under rules and regulations when, on investigation, it appears an Act was required.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe that the principle established in this Bill requiring three years' domicile in Canada, without any reference to qualification, before a man can appear for examination, is a wrong principle. The Minister of Marine, some minutes ago, cited the example of the United States as a justification of the course taken by him on the present occasion. Whatever may be the example of the United States, whether the United States adopts the same principle as that which is adopted here or not, is, in my opinion, entirely foreign to the question. It is not customary for hon. gentlemen opposite to avow that they are following the example of the United States, although we know that they do follow their example. We see that they profess to have adopted this plan, they have adopted their fiscal policy, and they seem to be slavish imitators of the policy of the United States; but the policy of the United States is not what the hon. gentleman has stated in this matter. A seaman there has only to declare his intention to become a citizen, and, I believe, to take the oath of allegiance, before he can get a certificate; but domicile for a term of years is unnecessary. If he is living in the United States and declares his intention to become a citizen, if he passes the examination he can obtain his certificate. Our law is much more illiberal. According to our law, he must remain in this country for three years before he can pass an examination. The question of residence has nothing to do with his fitness for the position of master of a vessel. He may be a Norwegian, a Swede, a Dane, a Greek, or may come from any maritime state, and may be fully qualified to take charge of a vessel, and yet, unless he remains three years in this country, he cannot fill that position. The question which should govern the Government should not be, Where does the man come from, or whither is he going; what is his religion, his creed, his height or his colour? but, What are his qualifications—is he a safe man to entrust the care of a vessel to? If he has those qualifications it is absurd to say that he must have lived here for three years. I would suggest that this clause be amended by striking out the words "for at least three years," so that the clause will read:

"Examinations may be instituted in Canada for persons domiciled in Canada who intend to become masters or mates of ships, etc."

I knew a case of a Canadian by birth who was the master of a vessel which was sold by the owner about two years ago. This threw him out of employment, and he went across the line and became the master of an American vessel, which he sailed for one season. He had not left Canada, but when he came back here, having been the master of an American vessel he was unable to take a position similar to that which he had occupied here before. He had declared his intention to become an American citizen. He had probably taken the oath of allegiance, though he said he had not, but when he came here, having been the master of a Canadian vessel before, he could not become again the master of a Canadian vessel, unless he lived here for three years. That was a case of hardship. I am sure my hon. friend does not intend by this Bill to make it difficult, or even impossible, for Canadians who have gone to the United States to come back here and enter upon the same avocations which they previously pursued; but that would be the result in such a case. I think the Bill would be much more in consonance with fair principles and fair play, and more in the interests of the ship-owners, as it would give them a wider scope in the selection of their officers, if these words were eliminated as I propose.

Mr. KENNY. I would not like the Committee to be under a misunderstanding. I do not know what happens in the inland waters of Canada, but I know as a fact that Nova Scotians who sailed as masters, and who had formerly qualified and obtained a certificate entitling them to sail a ship as masters in Canada, have subsequently commanded American ships. I assume that when they did that they had to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. CHARLTON. Suppose they did, if they wanted to come back again.

Mr. KENNY. That has been done. These men came back to Canada, and had no difficulty in the world, on the production of their English certificate, in resuming command of an English ship; so that the argument as regards a foreign country, which the hon. gentleman has advanced, does not hold. I assure the hon. gentleman that it is not the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. I assure the hon. gentleman from Halifax that I know the circumstances of the case to which I alluded. It is true this captain got employment again, but the question as to whether he had taken the oath of allegiance was kept in abeyance, it was not examined into at all, and if it had been examined into, and if it had been found that this captain had taken an oath of allegiance, he could not have got a certificate. I know this.

Mr. KENNY. It is an imaginary case.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; it is an actual case. I know the owner of the vessel, I know the captain, I know the circumstances; I visited the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and know all about it.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will agree with the member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) in thinking that can be done.

Mr. FRASER. I can understand that the case mentioned by the member for Halifax might occur through ignorance, but not otherwise; because he knows very well that in such a case, if it was known that he was an American citizen, although he may have had an English certificate, if the ship was lost at sea the owner could not collect the insurance.

Mr. TUPPER. The Committee ought to understand that if we emasculate this Bill we leave as law all that hon. gentlemen are now opposing. That is the law of the land now, and if we cut off this clause we will fail to do what every ship-owner in Canada desire us to do, that is, to make the law what they have supposed it to be since 1883. That is one reason why I urge the Committee that we should not go so far afield and discuss general reforms, when all that was required was merely to make the present law more workable. The amendment suggested by the hon. gentleman will make this clause ridiculous. If we take out the words "for persons domiciled in Canada for at last three years," then the section reads, "Examinations may be instituted in Canada for persons who intend to become masters or mates," and so on.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; that is not what I suggest. My amendment is that the words "for at least three years" be struck out, and the clause then reads: "Examinations may be instituted in Canada for persons domiciled in Canada who intend to become masters."

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to say that if a Canadian goes over to the United States and declares his intention of becoming a resident, and applies for papers, they will be granted. Now, I do not think such is the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. I know it is the case.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that papers are only granted to men who are citizens of that country.

Mr. LISTER. Not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think I am correct. I have been so informed by vessel men, and I think I am right if I accept the statements of American gentlemen sailing vessels into our own ports. I think the statement of the hon. gentleman is not correct. The applicant must first be a citizen of that country.

Mr. LISTER. I can say to the hon. gentleman, that I speak of what I know when I say that sailors who go over to the other side can take charge of steam or sailing vessels upon a declaration of intention, and they are entitled to receive a certificate upon doing so.

Mr. CHARLTON. The statement I made was based upon an actual occurrence. I know a case where a Canadian captain, who the previous year had sailed a Canadian vessel, and for many years had sailed Canadian vessels, went to the city of Detroit to take the mastership of an American vessel, and after having declared his intention of becoming a citizen he sailed an American vessel as master for the last season, and then came back to Canada this year, wishing to resume his position as a Canadian captain, and he had the difficulties that I referred to. I recited this as an actual occurrence under the American law.

Mr. LISTER. In addition, I know a master who went from the County of Bruce, having sailed a Canadian steamer last year, and, upon going to the the States, declared his intention, and he is sailing an American vessel there this year.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the member for North Norfolk give the name of the gentleman he refers to ?

Mr. TUPPER. There seems to be a considerable difference of opinion on a very important point. My recollection of the United States law is that a man wishing to obtain a certificate as master has to sign a declaration of his intention to become a citizen. I am not positive, however, on that point, and I would suggest that this clause be allowed to stand over, and I will obtain information.

Mr. LISTER. That has no bearing upon this clause, because it is of no consequence whether it be declaration of intention, or whether papers for naturalization are actually issued.

Mr. TUPPER. It is the basis of the argument.

Mr. LISTER. Your Bill provides that the man shall be a British subject ; there is no declaration of intention. The law itself prescribes that the man shall be a British subject. It is only a question of residence here.

Mr. TUPPER. I will ask that that clause be allowed to stand.

Mr. BURDETT. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Marine ought to be adopted, as there seems to be a difference of opinion as to what the law is on the other side. I would ask him if he proposes to consider the two amendments I sent across the floor to him. I think they are just, and at least would do no harm. Cases have occurred in the County of Hastings that would be met by these amendments. Of course, it leaves power absolutely in the hands of the Minister. I understand that this Bill does not make any radical change in the existing law, but you are simply taking power to issue certificates.

Mr. TUPPER. As we have all alluded several times to the practice in the United States, I would ask the Committee to allow that clause to stand until we obtain definite information. I will be very glad to consider the amendments the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett) has sent to me. However, I think the first one would not properly come into this Bill at all ; that would come into the Steamboat Inspection Act. I will see whether any provision in that direction can be introduced as an amendment to the Steamboat Inspection Act, and on the Order paper now there is a proposed amendment to that Act. I think great objection can be taken to the other point taken by the hon. member. An extreme case was stated, and extreme cases can always be put in connection with the imposition of penalties. Perhaps a case may occur in which the offence may not be so severe as to come within the extreme provisions of the Act ; but the political head of the Department of Marine would be greatly embarrassed if appeals from judicial decisions were permitted. Such an appeal would be made in every case, and great difficulty would be experienced in dealing with it. The court would have dealt with the case, judgment would have been pronounced, and suspicion would always attach to the Minister in dealing with those cases. Pressure of all kinds would be brought on him to remit the penalty imposed by the judge, and the action taken by the Minister would, at all events, in this country, be liable to suspicion. I do not think it is safe to adopt that course. Another objection to that course is, that it would be making a very large departure from the present system. We have endeavoured to follow the principles laid down and sanctioned by the Imperial Board of Trade. We have adopted the results of their experience, and they do not interfere with decisions given by the courts. While cases may occur in which the penalty may seem too severe, the better course to adopt is to adhere to the Bill as it stands, and to leave the infliction of penalties in the hands of the court, and not in the hands of the Department of Marine.

Mr. BURDETT. I suggest that certain discretion should be left with the department in regard to remitting penalties in cases where it was recommended by the judge.

Mr. TUPPER. I will consider that point.

Mr. BURDETT. Under the criminal law as it now stands there are many cases where the judge allows a prisoner to go under suspended sentence, but under this Bill the penalties are set out, and no discretion is left to the court.

Mr. EDGAR. I hope, in considering this matter, the Minister will not make an appeal to himself from the judge's opinion. I would rather leave in the hands of the judge some discretionary power.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has changed the proposition from the one I dealt with, and it is now suggested that where a judge recommends that special circumstances deserve consideration as regards the punishment to be imposed, in those cases fines might be remitted by the department.

Committee rose and reported progress.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 97) to amend the Acts respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited).

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, considered in Committee and reported.

INDIAN LANDS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 100) for the settlement of certain questions between the Governments of Canada and Ontario respecting Indian lands (from the Senate).

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. EDGAR. I presume this has been arranged between the Governments?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; the agreement we have arrived at is embodied in the schedule.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose the Provincial Government passed legislation concurrently?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think so.

Mr. MULOCK. I would suggest this clause should stand over until the preamble of the Bill is discussed. The reason I suggest that is, that it gives power to the Government to sanction any stipulations that may hereafter be arrived at. It is rather a wide power to give.

Committee rose; and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 18) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Vancouver Dock and Ship Building Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 62) to enable the Victoria and North American Railway Company to run a Ferry between Becher Bay, in British Columbia, and a point on the Straits of Fuca, within the United States of America.—(Mr. Earle.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 107) to incorporate the Burrard Inlet and Westminster Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Corbould.)

SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 44) to amend chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the safety of Ships.

Mr. TUPPER.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. The inspectors of steamboats have been reporting to the department for some time that the dangerous practice is attempted of late of stowing away explosive materials, such as dynamite, nitro-glycerine, &c., and in some cases in large quantities, in passenger ships. Sometimes they are hidden in the life-boats, sometimes in the purser's cabin, and in other places. There is a law to prevent that, both in the United States and in Great Britain, but in Canada there is at present none. The object of this Bill is to prevent that practice, and in this clause I have named dynamite, nitro-glycerine and any other dangerous compounds. The Act of the United States defines a great many of these dangerous compounds, while the English Act is not quite so explicit, and we have followed more the lines of the English Act.

Mr. EDGAR. As far as I can see, the English legislation has been followed in regard to the marking of dangerous material, but I have been unable to find this clause. I do not say that it is bad because it is not in the English Act, but it seems to me it is going further than the English Act.

Mr. TUPPER. We adopted the English Act in regard to the marking of goods on freight boats, where they have to be marked and be stowed and taken care of in accordance with the provisions of the law, but the English Parliament went further, and prohibited the carrying of explosives on passenger ships entirely. In the United States passenger ships are only allowed to carry gunpowder and cartridges made of gunpowder, rockets, signals, blue lights, and so on, all for the purposes of navigation, for which we provide in the second subsection of this Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the effect of section 5

Mr. TUPPER. It is intended to prevent an attempt being made to put these goods on passenger ships by marking them. These sections are permissive, allowing ships, if they follow certain regulations, to carry these articles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman intend this to apply simply to Canadian registered ships sailing to and from ports in Canada?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was my impression, but the first section does not say to or from what port in the world these ships are sailing, and I presume he does not propose to legislate for vessels sailing from England to Brazil or between any foreign ports. I would suggest the insertion of the words "to and from any port in Canada."

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly this is intended only to affect ships clearing from our ports. I think these words will meet the hon. gentleman's point, "from any port in Canada."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes; but suppose you wanted to prevent her from carrying glycerine or other explosives to an English port?

Mr. TUPPER. That comes afterwards.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not with respect to a Canadian registered ship. The latter part of the section relates exclusively to ships not Canadian.

I think you will have to put in these words, "to and from any port."

Mr. TUPPER. I think the word "from" would be better there. Vessels coming into Canada could not clear from England or from the States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If it is your object to prevent them carrying it out of Canada, well and good. But suppose the vessel goes to one of the South American Republics and brings back a cargo composed partly of explosive materials, she would not be liable to any penalty.

Mr. EDGAR. The clause as it stands refers only to ships carrying passengers between any place in Canada, or from any place in Canada, to a place out of Canada. I suppose that is what is meant to be applied to ships of Canadian register.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether it is intended to apply these penalties to any one in command of the vessel, as well as to the shipper?

Mr. TUPPER. The penalty would apply to any person who sent: that is, the shipper, or to any person who carries.

Mr. MULOCK. You want it to apply to those in control of the ship, do you?

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly, both to the sender and to the carrier.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be better to add a few words, because, when you read the two lines as they stand to-day, it might be held that the only person liable is the shipper: "Every person who knowingly sends or attempts to send, or who carries or attempts to carry." I would, therefore, suggest that you put in, after the word "carries," the words "or permits to be carried," to make it applicable to the master or to whoever controls the freight of the vessel?

Mr. TUPPER. The master certainly carries. He takes the ship and carries the stuff.

Mr. MULOCK. I doubt it. That is limited to persons shipping.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the language of the English Act. It is pretty safe to follow it.

Mr. MULOCK. We are improving on the English Act.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not think we can improve on their drafting.

Bill reported.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 14), with respect to certain matters affecting the Administration of Justice.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That Bill stood over for the purpose of enabling me to draft a clause to make a portion of it retroactive. I propose to reconsider section 1, and I move that the following be section 1:—

The jurisdiction of every county court judge shall extend, and shall be deemed to have always extended, to any additional territory annexed by the Provincial Legislature to Canada, or to the district for which he was or is appointed, to the same extent as if he were originally appointed for the county or district including such additional territory; providing that nothing in this section contained shall in any way affect any litigation now pending in the course of which any question has been raised as to the jurisdiction of a judge beyond the limits of the county or district for which he was originally appointed. In the next clause I propose to insert the word "competent" instead of "it shall be the duty."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman mean to make it voluntary on the part of the county court judge?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that the word "competent" is adequate. The only question raised was, whether the Local Legislature had the power to tell a county court judge, who was appointed under commission for a particular county, to discharge the duties of a judge anywhere else. Mr. Adam Wilson, when Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, inclined to the opinion that the Local Legislature had such power. The present Chief Justice of Queen's Bench has taken the very opposite view, and I do not suppose this House will be disposed to go further than to declare that it shall be competent for a county court judge to discharge the duties in any county where he might be called on to exercise his functions as a judge. If we go further, and declare it shall be his duty to do so, we are really interfering with the function of the Local Legislature in constituting the court. It is for the Local Legislature to say what the function of the court shall be, the extent of the authority, and where that authority may be exercised. They can still appoint the judge to act where they please, so long as this Parliament says it shall be competent for him to exercise those duties.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). These judges of the county courts are appointed by this Government to discharge duties in given counties, and each judge so understands it when he is appointed. It was proposed by the present Bill as drawn, that the judges should be compelled to go elsewhere. I object to that proposition. It is not fair to the county court judges, whose salaries are not very large, and who in some counties have very important duties to discharge. It is, therefore, unfair to compel them to leave the counties to which they are respectively appointed and discharge judicial functions elsewhere. It should be left discretionary with the Government and made competent for the judges to go elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It strikes me differently. It seems to me that the object of the Bill will be defeated altogether if this suggestion is adopted. We do not attach any additional pay to the county court judge for discharging the additional duties which he is asked to perform, and if it is left open to him to perform them or not in nine cases out of ten he will respectfully decline. It may become a perfect farce to vest power in the Provincial Government to request county court judges to perform duties which must be discharged, and to leave it in the power of the judge to say that he declines to perform them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As I understand it, the case is this: Our County Court Act in Ontario, an Act passed by the Local Legislature, provides for the constitution of the court and the appointment of a judge for each particular county. The Governor, on the advice of his Ministers here, appoints the county court judge. The Local Legislature creates the court, but it has no power to make the appointment. The judge was appointed under the law which authorized him to discharge his duties as a judge in a particular county, and did not extend them beyond that county. So far as the jurisdiction of the county court judge, acting as a division court judge, is concerned, the courts have held that any other party may be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor. So he may discharge the duties of a division court judge in another county than the one to which he was appointed as county court judge. It has been held by some, that a county court judge cannot act as such, except in the county to which he has been allotted. What we should do here, is to amend the law so as to make it competent for the county court judge to do so. It is for the Local Legislature to say, by its legislation, whether he shall be under any obligation to act elsewhere than in the county to which he was appointed. We have gone as far as it is necessary to go when we say it shall be competent. It is for the Local Legislature, under the authority given by the Provincial Act, to say that a judge who has been appointed for one county shall, under special circumstances, be called upon to perform the duties of a judge in another county. It is the function of the Local Legislature to constitute the court. If, in the first instance, the Local Legislature provided that a county court judge appointed in any county shall, under certain circumstances, undertake to discharge the duties of a county court judge in any other county, I have no doubt in my own mind that it would be competent for it to do so; and that if a judge had been appointed to discharge the duties of a court so constituted his functions would have been limited by the provisions of the law in force at the time his appointment was made. But when the Legislature had provided for appointment to a particular county, and for the discharge of certain duties and for a certain jurisdiction in that county, and His Excellency the Governor General, upon the advice of his Ministers, appoints a judge in that county to discharge the duties marked out by the Local Legislature, I suppose it might be well doubted whether he could undertake the discharge of these duties anywhere else but where his patent would warrant it, and whether his proceedings as judge would be valid elsewhere. I think that when we say by this section that it shall be "competent" for any county court judge to do so, and the Legislature imposes that duty upon him, the defect in the law will be adequately met.

Mr. WELDON. I quite agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the Bill of the Minister of Justice will render very good service in settling a constitutional point of some nicety. In addition to the cases cited by the hon. member for Bothwell from the Province of Ontario, we had a case in the Province of Nova Scotia some years ago on the very point that underlies this Bill. The Supreme Court held, with some hesitancy however, that the provisions of a local Act which empowered a county court judge to go beyond the district named in his commission were competent as being within that clause of section 92 of the British North America Act which gives the local authorities power to deal with the administration of justice. But much doubt was expressed as to whether that other clause of the Act which gives to the federal authorities the power to appoint county court judges was not in conflict, and did not override this section of the Provincial Act. In the case I have referred to the court decided that the Act of the Local Legislature was valid, and that under the section I have alluded to the provisions of the County Court Act of the province were also valid. I remember, however, to have read somewhere the opinion of Mr. Edward Blake to the contrary. It was not expressed with perfect certainty, but it showed that the leanings of Mr. Blake's mind were strongly in the other direction, namely, that when any county court judge was commissioned by the federal authorities to try cases in a certain county, it was a part of the appointing power that he should be a judge in these counties, and if he went beyond these counties he was beyond his power. At all events, this seemed to be the leaning of Mr. Blake's mind: that the last section of the British North America Act, which gives to the Federal Government the appointing power, was the controlling section in this matter. I think the Bill of the Minister of Justice will do very good service, and will have the effect of placing this complicated question at rest. I quite agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that enough has been said when the word "competent" is used.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I quite acquiesce that the word "competent" is the proper word if the object of this Bill is solely to remove what is said to be a doubt as to the power of a county court judge to act judicially in another territorial district. I do not understand that to be the object of the Bill; I understood the object of the Bill to be to aim at the removal of a defect in the administration of justice. It may happen that if a county court judge dies, some judicial act will require to be done in another county, and the Lieutenant Governor of the province in Council seems to me to be the proper authority who might be authorized to require the county court judge to discharge these duties. The law provides that it will be competent for a county court judge to discharge the duty if he pleases, and I quite conceive that the hon. gentleman's argument is conclusive if the only object is to remove a doubt existing as to the power of the county court judge. If I remember well, the Minister of Justice, when acting as judge in the courts of Nova Scotia, explicitly decided this point the other way. There might have been doubt, and it is perfectly proper to remove that doubt, and so far as it is desirable to remove it the substitution of the word "competent" for "duty" would accomplish that object. If, however, the hon. gentleman has in view a higher and better object he fails to obtain it by eliminating the words "the duty of the county court judge," and substituting "the will of the county court judge."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman, if you insert the word "duty," are you not constituting a court of justice that is not within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature?

Mr. EDGAR. I agree that the word "competent" will meet the requirements of the case, but what I would like to know is: what necessity is there for the clause in this section requiring the order of the Governor in Council in addition to the request of the Lieutenant Governor. I think it could very properly be made an Order in Council of the Lieutenant Governor, and that you could leave out the provision requiring the order of the through that examination again if we had taken out our certificates some years ago and wanted it Governor in Council as well. It seems to me that when we are placing the matter in the hands of the provincial authorities to deal with, we need not bring in the roundabout machinery of the Ottawa Government to authorize this course. I would suggest, if the Minister of Justice does not see some reason against it, that the words in the fifth line of the second section, requiring an order of the Governor General in Council, should be struck out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In so far as we have jurisdiction to deal with this matter we are dealing with the appointing power, and providing that the appointing power shall be satisfied by certain things being done. I think it would not be becoming that we should entirely part with the control over that branch of the subject; but besides that, by giving the control altogether to the local authority we may be raising a new question, and that is, as to the validity of our own statute. If really the transfer of the judge from one county to the other is the appointing power we have no right under the British North America Act to say that the Lieutenant Governor of the province shall do so. I think it is safer to leave the provision as it is.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION IN CANADA.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 13) to provide for the exercise of Admiralty Jurisdiction within Canada in accordance 1890."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman intend to proceed with this Bill to-night? It is a very important one, and I should hope he would with "The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, not do so.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Some such Bill must be passed and assented to by the 1st of July, if possible, and I should like to make some progress with it to-night. If there are any sections which members desire to consider further, I would be willing to let them stand over.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) One or two of my hon. friends with myself have been considering this Bill very carefully——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will not ask the House to take the committee stage to-night.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 85) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. EDGAR. I think the definition of the word "passenger" here may have a very curious effect, because under it every person who happens to be out on a boat, unless it is expressly a pleasure yacht, is a passenger, and the boat that carries him is liable to all kinds of penalties. It is a very sweeping definition. I should think a passenger might be defined as a person who is carried on a boat for hire, or something like that.

Mr. TUPPER. We found, in the operation of the Steamboat Inspection Act, that it could be evaded, and was evaded to a most serious degree, in consequence of the very absence of a definition of a passenger. The instruction given was, that a passenger was a person carried for hire, as the hon. gentleman has suggested; but the difficulty of proving that was so excessively great, that, in several cases which came before the department, the law was successfully evaded. On examination, we found that the definition in this Bill is that contained in the Imperial Act and in the Acts of the different colonies, without exception. The case which the hon. gentleman puts, I think, will be covered by a subsequent provision of the Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. Why is this section of the Act repealed?

Mr. TUPPER. This is a re-enacted section, with the exception of the words which are necessary to exempt ships with a British register and holding outstanding certificates of inspection; in other words, so that we may not be compelled to enforce the Act in its strict terms where there is no necessity for it. Without this provision, we should be obliged to compel a British steamer engaged in our coasting trade to pay double inspection fees. She may have come from England with a Board of Trade certificate, and when she entered our port we would be obliged under the old Act to stop her, unless she went to a totally unnecessary inspection and paid double fees. That is at any rate the information that we have received.

On section 3,

Mr. TUPPER. This is to repeal an unnecessary clause, referring to an examination which it has been found does not exist.

On section 4,

Mr. TUPPER. In the original Act, there was no provision by which we could obtain the penalty for a steamboat going beyond the waters for which its certificate was granted, and this section is merely to supply that omission.

On section 5,

Mr. TUPPER. This is intended to give engineers some relief in the event of the board not sitting. The board of engineers, taken from the different parts of the country, cannot sit all the time, and though the applicant has passed the necessary examination and his papers are all satisfactory, it is impossible to give him other than an interim certificate. This is not satisfactory, and, as a rule, the engineers wait until there is a meeting of the board and they can get their regular certificate. I think the safeguard in that direction is ample to prevent any abuse.

On sub-section 6, section 42,

Mr. TUPPER. That sub-section has become unnecessary. Its object is included in the last amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. I dare say my hon. friend and myself might find it very difficult to pass our examination for admission to our own profession, and I think it would be a pity to call upon us to go exchanged for an inferior certificate. Under the old Act, those who had second class certificates could exchange them for third class without examination.

Mr. TUPPER. This is to guard against possible abuse. The parties may, through want of practice, have become unskilful in their work, as it is of a delicate nature and requires a good deal of experience. The examination they require to pass is only of a practical nature, excluding that in scholastic matters, such as mathematics, to which the engineers objected.

On sub-section 7,

Mr. TUPPER. We have found this difficulty: Notice comes to us that a steamer is running contrary to the Act and that there is danger to life, and we could not stop that steamer, in some of the unsettled districts west, unless we can utilize the services of customs officers. In many cases these could not be had on application, and we propose to give our inspector the power.

Mr. EDGAR. These words which are in the old Act are left out: "or by the inspector who has made such report," and the Minister thus takes the sole power himself.

Mr. TUPPER. I have no objection to inserting the words of the old Act: "or by the inspector who has made such report."

On sub-section 2, section 50,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is your idea of having two sub-sections?

Mr. TUPPER. That is the draughtsman's idea, and I think it reads better.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under one section the inspector cannot seize the steamer unless he is authorized by the Minister, but under the subsequent section the collector of customs can seize, whether he has the authority of the Minister or not. Why should this power be given to the collector of customs?

Mr. TUPPER. The collector is charged with the duty of seeing the law carried out, and he must stop any contravention of it, but when we send an inspector we give him special authority to seize.

Bill reported.

FISHERY BOUNTY.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient that an annual grant of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars be made to aid in the development of the sea fisheries and the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the condition of the fishermen.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. gentleman will take this occasion to explain why the increase has been asked for?

Mr. TUPPER. There is a necessity either for an increase such as is proposed or for a reduction in the amount received by the fisherman as at present given him, and the amount asked, $160,000 a year, is but $10,000 in excess of the present statutory provision, but it is by no means in excess of what has been actually paid to the fishermen notwithstanding that Act, and, consequently, my predecessors have had to come to Parliament on several occasions, and Parliament has not begrudged the grant of a supplementary vote. Instead of pursuing that course, it occurred to me that it would be better to make the provision a fair one, or a more generous one if you like, and the amount of $160,000 is very little in excess of the average that has been paid since we first commenced to make these payments. The total average per year has been $156,840.76, and consequently, as I have said, application has had to be made to Parliament from time to time for the over expenditure. The amount of $160,000 is not quite 4 per cent. on the principal upon which this payment was originally made. It will be remembered that the proposition to Parliament was based on the claim that the fishermen could fairly put forward to a share of the amount of $4,500,000 paid to this country for the use of the Atlantic fisheries during the time of the Washington Treaty. I will give a table to the House showing the basis of each year's distribution, and the House will see that we have endeavoured to keep the expenditure down as far as possible; but, fortunately, the increase of the earners of this bounty has gone on from year to year, and that is of course a very good thing for the country. The ships that now put to sea from our provinces are beyond comparison with those that went into this business before this bounty was paid. I do not attribute the improvements to the payment of the bounty altogether, but no one can dispute that that bounty has had a very healthy influence upon the labours of our fishermen, and that, together with the healthy rivalry with the splendid ships that set out from Gloucester, has produced such a state of things that there are many ports in our provinces which send out as fine ships as those which go to the Banks of Newfoundland and elsewhere from the New England ports. The basis on which the distribution has taken place is as follows:—

Year.	Vessels, half to Owner and half to Crew.	Boats.
1882	$2.00 per ton.....	$5 per man—one-fifth to owner and four-fifths to fishermen.
1883	$2.00 do	$2.50 per man—one-fifth to owner and four-fifths to fishermen.
1884	$2.00 do	14 to 18 ft. keel, $1 to $1.50; 18 to 25 ft. keel, $1 to $1.50; 25 ft. upwards, $2, and fishermen, $3 each.
1885	$2.00 do	Same as in 1884, except that boats of 13 ft. keel were admitted to participation.
1886	$2.00 do	Same as in 1885.
1887	$2.00 do	do
1888	$1.50 do	do
1889	$1.50 do	All boats at $1 each to owner, and fishermen, $3 apiece.
1890	$1.50 do	Same as in 1889.

If we were to be kept within the limits of the Act, the reduction would have to go on. I think we will be able to make the present appropriation cover all the legitimate claims. I may say that the strictest supervision is being maintained over the distribution of this bounty. It is open to a great deal of abuse. It is a most difficult thing to administer, and there have been complaints made in Parliament in regard to it, and I appreciate the force of those complaints because I know myself of attempts which have been made to claim this bounty when there was no right to it. In all cases where a fraud has been committed, or an irregularity attempted, I have done the utmost to bring the person to justice, and to have an example shown in order to prevent a recurrence of that practice. To that end, as was mentioned a short time ago, I asked advice from all quarters, and, I think, that, by strict supervision and by having these declarations of such a character as they are now, solemn declarations properly drawn up, and the enforcement of the criminal law where false statements are made, we will be able to keep the expenditure where it should be, for those who earn it by the exertions that our fishermen have to undergo.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am pleased to find that my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has conceded to the request to increase the bounty to our fishermen, and to add $10,000 to the original amount, as this resolution provides. This is very satisfactory and encouraging, and I contend the best expenditure, as respects the object, the Government could have made, as by it they are fostering, encouraging and promoting the greatest natural industry that Canada possesses—that of fishing. But I must say I would desire to see the amount still larger. When the bounty to fishermen was first mooted and encouraged, and an approach made the Government for a grant of money some years ago by the late member for Gaspé, myself and some few others, it was in view of the fact that a large number of fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, more particularly from Nova Scotia, were migrating to the United States to prosecute the industry of fishing in vessels belonging to Massachusetts, built of a superior class expressly for the business, and equipped and provisioned better than our own, This migratory movement had been going on previous to the treaty known as the Washington Treaty. During said treaty, and after the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty were abrogated, and to prevent that exodus, and to keep them at home and at the same time encourage two growing and important industries, that of shipbuilding and fishing, it was considered advisable to offer a bounty, to be divided equally—half to the owner of the vessel, and the other half to the fishermen. Recognition of the interests of the fishermen in this way, on the part of the Government, has been looked upon by the fishermen with very great favour, and has had a very salutary and beneficial effect throughout the Maritime Provinces, notably in the County of Lunenburg, which I have the honour to represent, where can be seen, as a result, the handsomest fishing fleet in the world, and, without exception, the bravest and best of fishermen. All the fishermen complain of is, that the sum or grant of money is too small, as it leaves when divided up—the apportionment—very little for each man. Hence the great pleasure I have in expressing my delight at seeing this $10,000, although small, added to the usual grant, and I sincerely hope that another year the hon. Minister may see his way clear to still further increase the amount, and thereby encourage this great and important industry so justly meriting our advocacy and attention.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I do not propose to open the question at all of the propriety of these bonuses given to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. I am quite aware that differences of opinion already exist as to whether as much material benefit is derived from the distribution of this money, as was imagined at one time would be derived. Those who are conversant with the facts know that a great deal of fraud is connected with the payments of these moneys in the elections, and when one considers the time wasted over the small bounty which is paid to an individual fisherman himself, the time wasted by him in obtaining it, the great expense to the country in the distribution, and the numerous frauds which seem to be inseparable from its payment, there is no use denying the fact that a question could be reasonably raised whether we receive the full value of our money, or whether the principle is a good or sound one. I am not going to raise it to-night, but I wish to remind the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that he need not congratulate the Minister upon any change of policy, or upon any increase of bounty, because such is not the fact. There is no increase of bounty to the individual fisherman, to the ship-builder, or to anyone engaged in the fisheries, nor is there an increase in the total amount supposed to be paid now over that which has been paid heretofore. The same amount will continue to be paid, and the Minister adopts this mode, as I understand it, of simplifying the authority for paying $160,000, and preventing the necessity of his coming down year by year and asking a supplementary grant. The amount of money paid in toto, and the actual sum paid to the fishermen individually, will continue to be the same heretofore as it has been in the past, and will not in any way be altered by the present resolution.

Mr. KAULBACH. The hon. member will see that the usual grant has been $150,000, and the increase of $10,000 is to be apportioned among the fishermen under the present arrangement. Therefore any amount that would be remaining over and above the cost of distribution, would certainly go to the fishermen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman surely heard the explanation of the Minister. He does not propose to increase the sum total granted, or the sum paid, to the individual fisherman, but inasmuch as his predecessor had to ask for a supplementary grant when making up the sum paid to the fishermen, he proposes to adopt this mode of paying them as the sum in toto and the sum individually.

Resolution reported.

TRINITY HOUSE, MONTREAL.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 95) further to amend the Act 36 Victoria, Chapter 61, respecting the Trinity House and Harbour Commission of Montreal.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. I may explain that this is a very harmless Bill. It is introduced in consequence of legislation abolishing tonnage dues on shipping in the port of Montreal, and I am venturing my hand on a gerrymander of a simple description. The present Bill substitutes the entry of tonnage, or clearances of tonnage, at the port, for the dues that were formerly paid. I may state to the House that this Bill has been submitted to the Board of Trade and Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and is approved of in this form.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

TRADE MARKS AND INDUSTRIAL DESIGNS.

Bill (No. 101) further to amend the Act respecting trade marks and industrial designs, was read the second time, considered in Committee, reported and read the third time and passed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 104) to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, 1890.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Would the Minister please explain the amendments to the Act?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are none of them very material; they are to remove certain defects in the Act of last year which was rather complicated as the hon. gentleman will remember. In the passage of that Bill through this House a number of amendments were made, and in the two or three cases which are mentioned in sections 1, 2, 3 and 4 the amendments which had been made in the Bill in some parts required amendments to be made in other parts and these were overlooked. That is the sole object of the first four sections of the Bill.

On section 5,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be remembered that the Bill as introduced altered the law as to the payment of a forged instrument if it were payable to order, and threw the burden of the loss on the drawer. That was, however, altered. The object of this sub-section is to preserve the right of recourse which the person paying the forged cheque has, and it puts him in the position of an innocent holder for value, which enables him, therefore, to exercise the right of recourse for the recovery back of the amount so paid from any endorser who has endorsed the same subsequent to the forged endorsement. This is right; because on the forged endorsement, by reason of its forgery, the title had been endorsed and guaranteed by the subsequent endorser, and, therefore, it is only right that the person who is thus deceived into paying should have due recourse against the person who by endorsing after the forgery guaranteed the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is on the principle that every endorser has guaranteed the genuineness of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It means simply that the bank, which in most cases is the place upon which the cheque is drawn, pays that cheque, and when it finds there is a forged endorsement, it has the right to recover against the person paying the cheque into the bank, or against any other endorser on the bill subsequent to the forged one. I approve of that. If it is necessary to give the bank that right by legislative enactment, it ought to be likewise necessary to go a little further and give the right to the endorser who has to repay the money to the bank—it should give a similar remedy against the person who endorsed to him. For instance: if A gets a cheque upon which there is a forged endorsement, and he transfers it to B, and B takes it to the bank, by this section when the bank discovers that one of the endorsements is forged it can make either B or A repay the money. Suppose they make B repay, what remedy has B got against A who endorsed it to him? He should have the same remedy against the previous endorser as the bank has against him. If it were not thought necessary to have this provision in the Bill I should imagine that he would have recourse under the common law, but if it is necessary to give this remedy to the bank, it must be equally necessary to give it to the endorser of the forged instrument.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it is only necessary in consequence of section 24 of the Act to which this is to be added.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). American courts have always held, and I suppose the same rule prevails here, that an endorser without recourse is always bound to guarantee the genuineness of the instrument he endorses. That rule, I think, is a sound one, and it ought to be made perfectly clear. If a party endorses a forged instrument and presents it to some one else, the first endorser ought to be liable.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is just the view of the law I hold myself; but if that is the law, then the drawee that pays the bill to the man who presents it has the common law remedy against him, because the man who gets the money endorses the bill and guarantees its genuineness. But if it is necessary to insert this clause and give the bank this right, then a fortiori it must be equally just to follow up the endorsers until you reach the man who first endorsed the bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will let the section stand, but I think the common law right is affected by the section itself.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—THE POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I expected that the hon. Finance Minister would give us an opportunity to-day of bringing before the House the question of which I gave notice yesterday. As he did not do so, may I hope that on Tuesday he may give that opportunity.

Mr. FOSTER. On Tuesday I intend to go on with the Budget.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has a good memory, and I understood that he told us he would give us the opportunity to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked the hon. gentleman if he had a motion in amendment to going into Committee of Supply. He said he would let me know if he had a motion, and added the remark: "I suppose you will go into Supply to-day?" I said, I supposed we would, and I expected a notice of his amendment, but we did not receive it.

Mr. LAURIER. I said I would take the opportunity to-day to bring that question before the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman did not state any question.

Mr. LAURIER. Oh, yes. When the hon. Minister of Public Works yesterday made a statement of the policy of the Government, I stated directly that I would take the first opportunity of discussing that matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman's statement was not like that. He said he had no doubt that the Government intended to pursue the policy of Sir John Macdonald, and that he would take an opportunity of discussing whether we were doing so or not. That is certainly not the usual intimation given across the House as to the kind of amendment to be brought up. It conveyed not the slightest conception to members on this side of the House what the nature of his amendment would be.

Mr. LAURIER. I thought my intimation was sufficient. I will try to be more explicit another time.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 22nd June, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE FARMERS' BANK OF RUSTICO.

Mr. WELDON moved that Bill (No. 40) respecting the Farmers' Bank of Rustico, be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration this day, immediately after Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY TO THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) to authorize the transfer of certain public property to the Provincial Governments. He said: This is substantially the Bill relating to the foreshores, which was introduced last session, with some modifications in the provisions.

Mr. AMYOT. Is there any correspondence about it between the Federal Government and the Provinces?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. Has it been laid before the House yet?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been no correspondence since last session, but there has been some consultation, at the meeting which I referred to, the other day.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VOTING IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 112) to amend the Act respecting the representation of the North-West Territories. He said: This Bill is intended to relieve the conscience of some voters in the North-West. We found in the last election that a man who had been out of the territories for a couple of weeks, thought he could not swear that he had been a resident of the territories for the twelve months preceding the day he was to vote; and this Bill changes the form of voting so that instead of a man's swearing that he has been a resident for twelve months, he swears that he is a resident of the North-West Territories, and that his domicile has been in the district for twelve months past. It will also provide that the members of the North-West Mounted Police shall not vote. The leading men on that force, and numbers of constables, have expressed to me a desire that they should be relieved of the privilege of voting, because in the last election, pressure was placed upon them to vote in a given way; some voted contrary to the course indicated, and a persistent attempt has been made to persecute them and oppress them.

Mr. BOWELL. A very serious charge.

Mr. DAVIN. It is very necessary. Officers have asked me to have them relieved from the privilege of voting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman having stated that a portion of this force having been persecuted by somebody to induce them to vote contrary to their consciences and convictions, he should not stop there but should tell the House who are the miscreants who committed so great a crime against the liberties of the subject.

Mr. DAVIN. I have no objection to tell the hon. gentleman. He is a gentleman in whom my hon. friend took a great interest, Commissioner Herchmer. Commissioner Herchmer got directions, and proper directions, from the Dominion Government, or more properly from Sir John Macdonald, that he was not to interfere one way or another; and the way he carried out these instructions was this: he sent a letter round to the officers of the posts in the constituency in which I stood as a candidate, saying: "The police are at liberty to vote (this is the very wording of the letter which was to be read out on parade to members of the force) how they please, but I am in favour of Mr. Tweed." Of course, with his enormous power and well-known character, it was equivalent to a menace.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has he been dismissed?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ALBION MINES SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce a Bill to continue the Acts respecting the Albion Mines Savings Bank. He said: This is a savings bank brought under the General Act of 1885. Its charter will expire on 1st July, 1891. The object of the Bill is to continue for a sufficient time the powers of the Local Legislature to enable the bank to continue its business so far as it can under the authority given by this Legislature. It is not a bank which issues any notes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How does this Bill happen to become a public Bill? I know several other Bills almost similar in character which were introduced as private Bills. Why has this Bill, which is essentially one dealing with a private corporation and asking for privileges which I have no doubt it is proper for the House to give, been introduced in this way? I call special attention to a Bill in which I am interested, and which comes from my province, a Bill for the extension of the Farmers' Bank of Rustico, which is as much a public institution as is the Albion Mines Savings Bank, and it was introduced as a private Bill, and the fees duly paid.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a quasi-public Bill. I think there are precedents for the introduction of such Bills by a Minister of the Crown. This Bill, however, is urgent, because the charter will expire on 1st July, and, unless legislation is had by that time, the bank will go out of existence. If I did not introduce the Bill in this way, it would have to go through the form of petition, &c., and it could not be introduced this session. I may say to my hon. friend that I had intended to take the same course in regard to the Bill to which he has referred, but, before I observed it, the Bill had already been introduced and all due notice given, and there were no forms to be waived.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With that statement coming from a Minister of the Crown, the fees unwittingly paid will be remitted?

Mr. FOSTER. That is for the House to determine.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I confess I do not understand on what ground the Minister has introduced this Bill as a private measure. Of course, a Minister may introduce a private Bill as any other member may do, but I do not know any reason why the fact that a Minister introduces a private Bill should make it a public Bill. This Bill, judging from the title, is in the nature of a private Bill, and the reason given by the Minister for introducing this as a public Bill, that the charter would expire if not introduced and hurried through Parliament, is one without force. It was a question for the directors of the corporation to consider, whether they would allow their charter to lapse through carelessness, in not giving proper notice. I do not think the explanation given by the Minister is at all satisfactory.

Mr. EDGAR. No doubt the proper course for the Minister to adopt was to introduce a petition, which would be considered by the Committee on Standing Orders, and if that committee chose to recommend that the notices be dispensed with in that particular case, it would be done. I do not know whether the Minister has done so or not. Other hon. members have to adopt that course, and this Bill should not be considered by the House in this way. It should be introduced as a private Bill, and go to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I really think it is entirely out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. If the House strongly objects to this course, I must submit. I had no idea except to facilitate the Bill being passed through the House and going into effect before 1st July. Probably the precedents I have mentioned, to which I have reference, are not on all fours with this case, although they have great similarity to this Bill. My error, if I have committed any, was committed in my wish to prevent the bank from being placed in an unfortunate position. If the objection is pressed, I withdraw my Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not object to the Bill, but to the very serious precedent which will be established. I do not for a moment see why a distinction should be made between Bills of a like character. As regards the present Bill, I would do anything to facilitate its passage through Committee, but it is a very serious step to establish a precedent to be acted on hereafter.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). There are precedents in regard to the chartered banks of the country. The extension of the bank charters was not made by means of a private Bill, but by a general Bill, and the private corporations stand in the same position. Another precedent is the extension of the charter of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank. In regard to a Bill of this kind, which only continues for a period of ten years, and where the Government intervenes and reduces the time, and where the operating of the institution is regulated by the Government, the time may be extended by a Government Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. The first point to determine is whether this Bill is a public or private Bill. No hon. member is at present able to form an opinion on that point, and Mr. Speaker alone is able to give us any information. If it is a private Bill, of course it has to comply with the standing rules of the House: but, I presume, if it is a private Bill and, therefore, cannot be so introduced, it will be quite possible for the Minister to introduce a public Bill having to do with all the banks generally, not naming this bank in particular, which will get over the difficulty. The first point to determine is, whether this is a private Bill.

Mr. LISTER. There is no difficulty about this matter. If it is a private Bill, it can go before the proper Committee and pass the House before 1st July. The difficulty is, that if a Minister is allowed to introduce a private Bill as a public Bill, simply because he is a Minister, the treasury will lose the amount of the fee.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to the principle of this Bill, but to the ground on which we have to deal with it, that of urgency. If it is not urgent, there is no precedent for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably the better way to settle it would be for me to withdraw this motion, and for the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McDougald) to move for leave to introduce the Bill. Then the rules of the House could be suspended, to which, I imagine, the House will consent.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 113) to continue the Acts respecting the Albion Mines Savings Bank, and that all rules in regard to private Bills be suspended so far as they relate to the said Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read first time.

THE POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving the adjournment of the House. I take this extreme course in order to bring to the attention of the House at once the discussion which the formation, the situation and the principles of the present Government naturally invite—not only invite, but even demand. I take this extreme course because I had expected, but found that I had vainly expected of the Government, that they would have afforded me an opportunity, at an early day, namely, on Friday last, of bringing this question before the House and testing the opinion of the House on the same in even a sharper manner than I can do so on the present occasion. The House is informed of what took place on Thursday last. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, crossed over at an early part of the sitting and asked me if I intended to move an amendment, on his moving the House into Committee of Supply on the following day. I told him I would be in a position to give him an answer in a few moments. At that time I thought the Government would lay before the House the policy which they intended to follow. And a few moments afterwards the hon. Minister of Public Works read a paper to the House stating what the policy of the new Administration would be; and thereupon I stated that I would take occasion on the following day to discuss the question before the House. In the innocence of my soul I thought that the hon. Minister of Finance had notice enough, when I made the statement which I did before the House; but it appears that I was mistaken, and that he expected that I would cross over and whisper in his ear what I had just stated. I must object to the hon. gentleman thus depreciating his own intellect, and I can come to no other conclusion than at that time the Government were averse to coming to close quarters on the question, and rallying their forces to support them. However, be this as it may, I will deem it advisable on future occasions, if my hon. friend comes to me to ascertain what my intentions are as to going into Committee of Supply, not to trust his understanding, but to confine myself to such notices only as are required by the rules of the House. Now, Sir, the House must agree that the new Government which we have before us to-day have been, from the first moment of their existence, very reticent as to the manner in which they came into life. They have been extremely parsimonious in giving information—so parsimonious, indeed, as to justify the belief that in their own estimation silence was gold, that the least said the better for them. The first statement they read to the House was as meagre, as empty as human ingenuity could make it. Only as much was said as was unavoidable, but a good deal was reserved that should have been said. Luckily, indeed, the statement then made has been supplemented since in various ways. It has been supplemented, first, by the statement read a few days afterwards as to the policy of the Government; it has been supplemented by the explanations given by the Prime Minister in the other branch of the Legislature; and last, though not least, it has been supplemented also by more suggestive communications made in the press from a member of the present and the last Administration,—and by articles no less suggestive, which have appeared in a newspaper published in the city of Montreal, which is not only a ministerial organ, but which is understood to be the personal organ, and, if I am correctly informed, to a large extent the personal property of the hon. Secretary of State. Thus, bit by bit, gradually and reluctantly, the present authorities have given us information which at last enables us to judge where we stand and to review the situation somewhat as it is. I was not astonished the other day when the hon. Minister of Public Works, speaking for himself and his colleagues, declared that the policy of the new Government would be to stand by the well-known policy of the Conservative party, or rather the policy of Sir John Macdonald—because the policy of Sir John Macdonald was the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. For this I was prepared, and I am further prepared to believe that it will be the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to endeavour to live as much as they can after the custom of their departed leader. I am prepared also to believe that to all the worst features of that policy they will adhere; but from the better and nobler features of the policy of Sir John Macdonald do I see a wide departure in the composition of the present Government. If there is one thing for which, in my judgment, the career of Sir John Macdonald especially deserves commendation, so far as I read the history of the last forty years, it is that he ever endeavoured to maintain an equilibrium between the different sections of this country, not only with respect to the passions and prejudices which struggle within the bosom of this young nation, but also with respect to the great powers which in a new community like this will rise, and have already risen, to gigantic proportions. In this respect I see already a wide departure from the policy of Sir John Macdonald. We have among us a huge corporation which has accumulated wealth already amounting to hundreds of millions, a creature of our own making, but which threatens to become stronger than its maker; I refer to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. To-day the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Government, the Prime Minister of Canada, is a man of well known and very great abilities; but it is also a well-known fact that the abilities of that hon. gentleman have been exercised for the last ten years or more, not in the service of the country, but in the service of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Mr. Abbott has been from the inception of the company its legal head, its adviser, its thinker. He has framed all its measures, all its laws, all its contracts, all its agreements; he has favoured all its schemes. He has been, I will not say the captain of the craft, but its pilot, and he has piloted it from the day it was launched to the present day. Now, this is the gentleman who to-day is the Premier of Canada. I will not say that in this the Government of the country has been handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I do not hesitate to say, and speak with a full knowledge of the responsibility attaching to my words, that, indeed, the Canadian Pacific Railway has been given an undue preponderance in the councils of the nation. I will be told that Mr. Abbott has no longer any connection with the company, that he has sold all his stock. But supposing he has. Suppose he has sold out all the pecuniary interests he had in that company, do you suppose he has thereby severed the moral interest he has always had in it? Do you suppose he has cut the strings of his heart, and that his heart has ceased to beat where it used to beat up to yesterday? It is admitted that the services of Mr. Abbott to the company have always been priceless. That fact has been stated, time and again, by presidents of the company, by directors of the company, and by its shareholders; and it is equally well known that his services have been paid for at fabulous prices. I do not mention this as a reproach, but simply to show that Mr. Abbott's services to the company were always of the greatest possible value in the eyes of the company itself. Yet, after he has severed his connection with it, and despite that fact, the stock of the company is to-day going up, and not down, in the markets of the world. What is the meaning of this? It is simply that every shareholder of the company, every investor, in the world at large, understands that though the Premier of Canada to-day has no pecuniary, no material interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway, still the fact that he is the First Minister of Canada, gives to that company a greater hold on the Government than it ever had before, and makes its stock all the more valuable. Suppose that, a few years ago, when the late Sir John Macdonald was head of the Government, Mr. Abbott, who was then the adviser of the company, had suddenly withdrawn his services from it and given them to another corporation, say, for instance, the Grand Trunk Railway Company, what would have been the result on the stock market? The result would have been that the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway would have gone down and the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway would have gone up. Now, however, though Mr. Abbott has severed his connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, though it is acknowledged that his services, when connected with it, were invaluable, the stock, instead of going down, goes up, showing that the danger to Canada, which may be the profit to the Canadian Pacific Railway, is really well understood by the public at large. I do not say this in any sense of hostility to the company; I will not say a word of disparagement of the company or of the unwise course they took, in my estimation, when they interfered in the last elections—for I hold that such companies are always of benefit to the country when their powers are exercised in their proper sphere—but the unanimous consensus of opinion has always been, with regard to such companies, keeping in view their immense wealth and the immense power they wield, that they should be kept strictly within the line inside of which they may be of benefit to the country and beyond which they may be a danger to the country. In so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, so strongly was this opinion held, at the time of the contract and of its organization, that it was made an organic disposition of our law, if I remember rightly, that no one connected with it could be a member of Parliament. This wise provision has been since removed, if I remember rightly, but at all events, as I said a moment ago, though the influence and power of the company, in Sir John's time, had assumed alarming proportions and tendencies, still the majority of the people believed the hand of the master was over it. Now, however, I do not hesitate to say, there is a feeling spread abroad that the hand of the company is over the Canadian Government; and we can well understand why the magnates of that company, during the last contest, put forward such efforts to favour the party then in power. Events have shown that they were wise in their generation. They foresaw that Sir John Macdonald could not live very long. He was not merely advanced in years, but in poor health, and therefore they foresaw the day when, after his death, there would be jealousy and turmoil among the rival factions fighting for rival claimants, and that then would be the moment when they could put into the scale the weight of services performed, and services expected. And so it proved to be the case. I am sorry that on this occasion, the rulers of our country did not go to the neighbouring Republic, where they could have found an example which they could have imitated with profit. In 1869, when General Grant formed his first Administration, he called to the Secretaryship of the Treasury, the celebrated New York merchant, Mr. A. T. Stewart. Mr. Stewart accepted the office, but the appointment was not ratified by the Senate. It was found there was an old law, dating from the first days of the Republic, which prohibited anyone connected with the importation of merchandize from being Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Stewart at once offered to put the whole of his immense business into the hands of trustees and to devote the whole revenues accruing from it to charitable purposes; but the good sense of the party then in power would not admit that, and they ruled, I believe, that such a removal from business, merely to qualify for office, though it might be within the letter of the law, would not be within its spirit. And so, I say, this withdrawal of Mr. Abbott from his connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, though it may satisfy the letter of the original law, cannot satisfy its spirit, and cannot satisfy the spirit of what ought to be the ruling principle in such a matter. Now, I look before me and see those who were the companions-in-arms of our late First Minister, those who fought his battles, not only on the floor of this House but all over the country, and I ask where, at that time, was the present First Minister of Canada? I ask, where was Mr. Abbott to be found in those days? Was he to be found standing by the side of Sir John Macdonald? Was he to be found fighting by the side of his party? Was he to be found attending to the business of the country? No; in those days Mr. Abbott was attending solely to the business of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and never gave to his country but the crumbs of his intelligence and energy. He was called to the Senate four years ago, and has been the leader of the Government in that Chamber since then—an important office, I admit; but still, after all, not a very onerous office. In fact, the complaint we always hear from the Senate is that there is nothing for that body to do, and the great source of the congratulations showered by them on Mr. Abbott lay in the fact that henceforth there would be more legislation in that body than there had been. In the days of which I speak, as soon as the session of the Senate was over, Mr. Abbott went back to the service of the company. Under the circumstances, is it to be presumed that Mr. Abbott will cease to be what he was hitherto, and that henceforth his energies will not be given to the company with which he has been associated so long and in the services of which he has amassed a large fortune? For my part, I do not believe it; and I believe there are men on the other side who think, as we do, that it was both improper and dangerous to place the supreme command in the hands of a man who never gave his best energies to the cause of his country, but devoted them to that of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, however, when we will have, as we are bound to have, important interests at stake in the country, affecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, we have reason to feel that on all occasions the scale will be turned in favour of the company, at the expense of the country. What is the reason, therefore, I ask, that Mr. Abbott was selected, and not some of the companions-in-arms of Sir John Macdonald? The reason is party exigencies. The situation was such that the country had to be sacrificed or the party, and the country was sacrificed. History repeats itself. When Alexander the Great was on his death-bed, he was asked to whom he intended to leave the great empire he had built up. His answer was: To the most worthy. Further than that he would not say; he would not say who was the most worthy to succeed him, of all the generals who had helped to conquer and build up the great empire which acknowledged his supremacy. Was it Antigonus? Was it Lysimachus? Was it Ptolemy or Seleucus? The rival factions which surrounded these men would not allow the question to be solved. The empire ceased, but the rival factions did not suffer anything. History repeats itself here again, Sir. Alexander the Great is dead, and the question arose, who was the most worthy of all his lieutenants to be his successor. There was a conference as to whether it should be Ptolemy or Lysimachus or Seleucus or Antigonus, but the rival factions between Antigonus, and Ptolemy, and Seleucus, and Lysimachus could not agree. So, Sir, Mr. Abbott was sent for. This is the why and wherefore of the appointment of Mr. Abbott, and I am justified in so saying because Mr. Abbott himself has acknowledged it. Speaking in the Senate a few days ago Mr. Abbott said that he was merely a compromise; a compromise of what, Sir? A compromise of principle was it? Surely these gentlemen will not say that they were already wrangling about principles. If not a compromise of principles, then, Sir, it was a compromise between rival claimants, and Mr. Abbott himself says so in so many words. This is his language:

"The position I occupy to-night is far beyond any hopes or aspirations I ever had, and I am free to confess beyond any merits I have. I am here because I am not particularly obnoxious to anyone, something on the same principle on which gentlemen are sometimes elected to the presidency of the United States, not because they are able, not because they are clever, but because they are harmless and have not made any enemies."

Now, the only objection which I have to the statement of Mr. Abbott is that it is altogether too modest. Mr. Abbott could not repute himself as one of those men to whom he has referred, but apart from that he certainly spoke the truth when he said he was the dark horse of the party. The party was in that condition which we have often seen in the case of a national convention of the United States, called to choose a candidate for the presidency. They agree upon the policy, they agree upon the principles, they agree upon the platform, but when it comes to the question: Who is to be the standard-bearer of that policy? Then the fight commences, and the rival factions of Antigonus, and Ptolemy, and Seleucus, and Lysimachus will not allow any one of the four candidates to come to the front; and so they selected Mr. Abbott as a compromise, as Mr. Abbott has himself informed us. With the internal dissensions of the Conservative party at large I have nothing to do, but what I complain of is that the House of Commons in this matter has not been dealt with in the same frankness that the other branch of the Legislature has been dealt with. The statement which was given to the House the other day of the policy of the Government was very meagre indeed. Thus it ran:

"It was felt by His Excellency that the state of public affairs did not necessitate the formation of a new Cabinet until the grave had closed over the late Premier and the last honours had been paid him."

Now, Sir, it seems to me that this statement is disingenuous in the extreme. I do not believe it is fair, I do not consider it fair either to this House or to His Excellency, for I am quite sure that unless there were reasons of state His Excellency would not have thought himself justified in waiting four or five days before calling a successor to Sir John A. Macdonald. That is not the practice followed in England. Her Majesty, when she lost the services of Palmerston, did not wait until after the funeral of Lord Palmerston to call his successor; but immediately, the very day after the death of Lord Palmerston, Her Majesty sent for Lord John Russell. I am sure His Excellency would have felt himself bound by such a precedent as this; but there may have been reasons of State to the contrary. Yet, His Excellency did not think himself justified in following that precedent, he felt himself justified rather in departing from it, and if there were reasons of state for this course, these reasons of state should have been given to the House. I do not put the blame upon His Excellency, not that I believe the King can do no wrong, but there are the advisers of His Excellency who say that His Excellency had good reason not to call immediately upon a successor to Sir John A. Macdonald; and if there were good reasons why His Excellency should not call immediately upon a successor to the late Premier, I call upon the advisers of His Excellency to state these reasons, and unless they state these reasons I believe they are not treating the House fairly, or in that manner in which the House has a right to be treated. Then the statement goes on to say:

"On the morning following the funeral, His Excellency, exercising his constitutional right, applied to the Hon. Sir John Thompson for his advice with respect to the steps which should be taken for the formation of a new Government."

Again, Sir, it seems to me that we have not been given the whole truth with regard to that statement. What are we to infer from the language which is given? We are simply to infer that His Excellency had just enough confidence in Sir John Thompson to call upon him to instruct him and advise him as to who should be his Prime Minister, but had not confidence enough in him, at the same time, to ask him to be his Prime Minister. His Excellency had just confidence enough in Sir John Thompson to call upon him as the best of all the Privy Councillors with whom he could consult, to give him the best advice as to who should advise him, but His Excellency there stopped short of confidence and would not have Sir John Thompson as his adviser upon anything else. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the construction that we should put upon the action of His Excellency. It is not, at all events, the construction which has been put upon the language of His Excellency by La Presse newspaper, the organ of the hon. gentleman opposite. La Presse says:

"From the statement furnished to the House the other day by Sir Hector Langevin in the name of the Prime Minister, it appears that Sir John Thompson was first called to form a Cabinet."

If that is so, we should know it, and if it is not so, let us hear it. But I object that any doubt should be cast upon this subject, I object that a repetition should take place of what did take place a few years ago when the Government of the day attempted to put the blame of their action upon His Excellency the Marquis of Lorne, who was then the Governor General of Canada. Mr. Speaker, what I complaint of is that we should not have in this matter a frank, and open, and candid statement, instead of something which is very ambiguous. If there were any difficulties within the Conservative party, the Conservative party should bear the blame, if blame there is, and not any other person. But there is more than this; there is reason to believe, and I invite the special attention of members on the other side of the House to this—there is reason to believe that we have not been given the whole truth with regard to the negotiations which took place in reference to the formation of a Government. There is reason to believe that something has been concealed from the House, and if anything has been concealed from the House, it is the duty of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches to stand up and tell us that these statements are untrue which we see in La Presse and elsewhere. Sir, not later than Monday, a week ago to-day, there was an interview published in the Montreal Herald between a reporter of that paper and a prominent member of the Administration, the Secretary of State, and Mr. Chapleau is reported to have spoken as follows:—

"Before Sir John Macdonald died he told me that he intended to resign his portfolio and that I should have it. Our beloved Premier is gone, but I remember his promise, and beyond that I also remember that, by seniority, I am entitled to the position of Minister of Railways and Canals and I must have my rights."

Mr. Chapleau says "he must have his rights." Then he was questioned by the reporter:

"When do you propose to return to Ottawa?

"I have had a carriage ordered and have made arrangements to be taken back to the Capital to-night, so that I shall be on hand to receive Mr. Abbott's answer to-morrow.

"Answer to what?

"To a question. I must be told my position at once; in fact, we must all know immediately what is going to be done."

Now, Sir, this is simply a newspaper article, and I would not attach much importance to it under ordinary circumstances; but I attach importance to it because it is known to men, and it is known to school boys as well, that the ambition of the Secretary of State for years has been to handle the portfolio of railways, and, therefore, this language is consistent with the language he has always held. But there is more. There is a newspaper which I have already quoted, La Presse, of Montreal, which is not only the organ of the Government, but is the personal organ of the Secretary of State, and in this newspaper we are told, not once or twice, but day after day, that the present arrangement is not the true one, but that there are other arrangements by which, at a later day not far off, the Secretary of State is to be made the Minister of Railways and that certain heads which now adorn the Treasury benches are to be cut off. In La Presse of the 17th June, we find this:

"The Hon. Mr. Drummond, Sir John Thompson and the Hon. Mr. Chapleau had together a long conference, the result of which has not been known definitely, but everywhere it is assured that the Conservatives of the district of Montreal and of the Province of Quebec generally have consented, for the sake of harmony, to tolerate for the moment a state of things which they deplore, but on this condition, formally stipulated, that Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron bind themselves in writing to hand in their resignation immediately after the present session."

Who says that? Is it the Globe newspaper? Is it any other organ of the Opposition? No, Sir, it is an organ of the Government, it is an organ of the Secretary of State, it is a Conservative newspaper. Well, it may not be true. I do not say it is. But still there are evidences that there is something in it, after all. The Prime Minister was questioned as to all this the other day in the Senate. What answer did he give? He would not answer at all. He spoke first of all in answer to Mr. Scott, and this is what he said:

"Of course, my hon. friend will understand that I have already mentioned to the House all the advice which the Ministry has thought proper to tender to His Excellency on the subject of the formation of his Cabinet, and what advice the Ministry may give in the future, I am unable to disclose."

Then the question was put by Mr. Scott:

"Then I assume that no pledge has been given to Mr. Chapleau that he will be Minister of Railways and Canals at a future period?"

Then, Sir, what would you imagine would be the answer, if there was nothing at all in these rumours published in La Presse and other newspapers? If those rumours were untrue, you would expect that the Prime Minister would give them a denial, but what was his answer to Mr. Scott? Mr. Abbott said:

"I have already told my hon. friend that I am unable to state what advice the Government will give to His Excellency on the subject."

Of course the Prime Minister was quite within his rights when he stated that his Cabinet had not come to a conclusion as to the advice to be given to His Excellency, but, on the other hand, if, as here stated, there had been an agreement made which was kept from His Excellency, kept from the House, I say it was the duty of the Prime Minister to state whether that agreement existed or did not exist. It did not become him to shield himself behind the rights of his position. The moment it was alleged that there was an agreement made, as we understand there was, it was the duty of the Prime Minister to say so or to deny it, and I call upon his colleagues here to say whether it is true that there is such an agreement and whether it is contemplated—nay, not contemplated but determined—that certain heads are to be cut off after this session and certain others promoted to these positions. I object to all this. This is not parliamentary government, it is not constitutional government. Our Government is to be carried on in the light of day. I do not appeal to the majority in this House. I know what party spirit is. I do not complain of it, but there are limits beyond which party spirit ought not to go. Party spirit ought not to tolerate any means whereby a powerful corporation may become more powerful, or by which any Star Chamber arrangements may be made which will not bear the light of day. Therefore it is for those who believe in true British parliamentary principles, to stand by them and condemn this conduct by vote, by action and by speech.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can assure the hon. leader of the Opposition that, if the remarks which he has made to the House this afternoon on the motion to adjourn have not been as loudly cheered on this side of the House as on his own, it is not for want of appreciation of the elegant diction in which he has addressed the House, or because we have had less pleasure in listening to him, but it is owing altogether to our regret that, in dealing with important matters of state, he is so frequently misinformed. Before discussing the various points to which the hon. gentleman called our notice, I want to direct attention to what is obviously a misunderstanding either on his part or on ours as to what took place on Friday afternoon, because I should exceedingly regret that the good understanding existing between the Government and the Opposition by which business is always facilitated, should be interrupted. Without any intentional want of courtesy on his part, I think that on Friday he failed to do that which he usually does. On the previous afternoon, after calling upon the Ministers to make a statement of the policy of the Government, he made the assertion that, while gentlemen on this side of the House had no doubt intended to carry out the policy of their late leader, they had departed from it in at least one point, and that he intended to call attention to that on the following day. That statement might indicate a resolution aimed at the policy of the past Government, at the general policy of this Government, or at the constitution of the new Government, or it might be aimed at any individual who sat on the Treasury benches. It was impossible to perceive what the scope or purport of his resolution would be, and we placed full reliance upon the conversation which took place between the leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Finance, when the leader of the Opposition intimated that on the following day he would indicate to the Minister of Finance the nature of his resolution. That may have been a misunderstanding on our part, but certainly we relied upon it, as we have been accustomed to rely upon the hon. gentleman's statements in the past. I will state briefly to the House, to prevent any misunderstanding, what the practice on this point has been. The Government are not called upon by parliamentary practice to announce, the evening before a Government day, what business they will take up on the following day. If we chose to treat the hon. gentlemen on the other side, when we are asked what business will come up on the following day, in the spirit indicated this afternoon, by the leader of the Opposition, we might simply state that we propose to take up the Government Orders, but that is a course we never adopt. We indicate what particular orders we propose to take up, and whether we intend to go into Committee of Supply or not. Surely, when hon. gentlemen opposite have received that information and intend to avail themselves of the right which parliamentary practice gives them, to move a resolution in amendment to the motion to go into Supply, they should, in like manner, indicate the scope of the resolution they intend to move. They have followed that practice with great courtesy, and it has facilitated the operations of this House during the last few years, at any rate ever since I had an opportunity of observing the practice of this Parliament; and I state here that if that practice should be discontinued, it will be the fault entirely of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and with no unwillingness on our part, with no indisposition on our part to give the Opposition the usual information, for there was no such intention on Friday last. What were we to infer from the observation which the hon. gentleman made on Thursday afternoon, that we had already made an important departure from the policy of Sir John Macdonald? Here was the occasion for him to have stated it. He claims that his notice was so explicit that we should have understood it on Friday afternoon. I claim it was so vague that we cannot understand it yet, although we have been listening to the hon. gentleman with delight, and waiting patiently for an hour for him to tell us wherein we had departed from that policy. If his intimation was vague on Thursday afternoon, we are lost in mystery now. The hon. gentleman's own indication this afternoon that we had departed from the policy of Sir John Macdonald, was the criticism that he put before this House with regard to the choice of Mr. Abbott as Prime Minister. I will answer the particulars of that charge in a moment; but when the hon. gentleman tells us that that is a departure from the policy of Sir John Macdonald, does he expect us to forget, if he is willing that his own followers should forget, that Sir John Macdonald made Mr. Abbott not only one of the Ministers, but leader of the Upper House, and entrusted him with most important governmental duties? I was rather struck with the change of attitude which the hon. gentleman assumed this afternoon. He accuses us of having deserted the policy of Sir John Macdonald. He has deserted his own policy, for he undertook to deplore this afternoon the alleged departure from the policy of a statesman whose policy he has steadily opposed ever since he came into public life. This new-found admiration of Sir John Macdonald's policy, this new alarm at the so-called departure from that policy which this Government has evinced, are created solely by the sight of the united ranks on this side of the House to sustain the policy which has been upheld by the people from one end of this country to the other, and which the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House were sent here to uphold, and intend to uphold. The hon. gentleman was astonished at Mr. Abbott having being made Prime Minister, not because he had a dollar of pecuniary interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, not because he held any office of trust or responsibility in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but, forsooth, because his "heart-strings," of which the hon. leader of the Opposition has a wonderful knowledge, are tied in some way to that great organization. Why, Sir, for four years, at least, Mr. Abbott has sat at the head of the Government benches in the Upper House; for four years he has led the business of that House unchallenged as to business ability or accuracy by the hon. gentleman's associates in that House; and with their compliments and plaudits at the close of every session, without a word of rebuke from the hon. gentleman or any of his followers, during that time it was not his heart-strings that tied him to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it was his ownership of shares, the sale of which, as the hon. gentleman has just said, has made him wealthy. He was more than a shareholder then: he was a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman could stand all that, but he cannot stand Mr. Abbott's heart-strings being tied to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, let us look at what this criticism involves. It is true, as the leader of the Opposition stated, that great corporations possess great influence in this country, and need the controlling hand of the Government to prevent possible encroachments. His proposition is, that a member of such a corporation may assist to guide the destinies of the Government, may assist in making the policy of the Government, but, after he ceases to be interested in the operation of the company, he shall be forever ineligible for any office in the Government. If it be improper that any person connected with an organization of that kind should be a member of the Government, or Prime Minister, how, forsooth, is he to rid himself of his interest and qualify himself to serve his country in any office to which his party, or the desire of his Sovereign, may call him? Surely any man of common sense, any man looking at the matter from a business point of view, would say, by ridding himself of his interest in the corporation, by immediately resigning any office which he holds there, and setting himself as free as the hon. gentleman and myself—for, I fancy, we are both free from the entanglements of riches of that kind—setting himself entirely as free as we are to serve his country, or to serve his Sovereign. But the doctrine which the hon. gentleman proposes that this House should affirm, is that there is no way in which he can set himself free if he has once put his hand to such an enterprise. Beneficial to the country though it may be, calculated to develop the resources and advance the material interests of the country, though it may be—he is forever incapacitated from serving his Sovereign, or his country, in the councils of the nation. Why, Sir, Parliament has taken a different view of the case in the very instance which the hon. gentleman put forward. What was that instance? There was a restriction, that, during a certain period, when this company was in the position of a contractor with the Government, none of its members were eligible to sit in this House. But, Sir, on a certain day Parliament passed an Act repealing that restriction. In vain, says the hon. gentleman, because, even if they have sold their stock their heart-strings are tied to the company still, and they ought never to be allowed to sit in this House. I can point him to that very action of Parliament repealing that restriction, as indicating that the time might come when even gentlemen possessing interests of that kind, might sit as members of this House, and sit in the other House, and as a consequence assist in controlling the affairs of the country as members of the Government. The hon. gentleman has put us to the disproof of a set of facts all of which are assumed in his own imagination, namely, that the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been affected by the choice of Mr. Abbott as Prime Minister of Canada. Where does he get that information? On what market did he learn it? What proof has he brought forward to support it? The hon. gentleman's proof is a series of interrogatories to us. He asks us why this increase? He says Mr. Abbott's influence, and his counsel, and his wealth were a great means of strength to the company. One would think, to have heard the hon. gentleman's statement of all that Mr. Abbott was to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that he was the company himself, that he was at least its president, and its solicitor, and leading director. But the fact is, that for some years past Mr. Abbott has been, it is true, a director of that company, not its president, not even its solicitor; and when he held that office, as I said before, he was far more disqualified than he is to-day for being a member of the Government, and to-day, when he assumes the head of the Government, he is absolutely free from any such disqualification. The hon. leader of the Opposition offers a great deal of sympathy with us who, he says, were the companions-in-arms of Sir John Macdonald. I appreciate highly—at its true value—the sympathy which laments that we have not higher office, but is accompanied by an attempt to drive us out of the offices we have. But let me say to him, that we who were the companions-in-arms of Sir John Macdonald have not been his companions-in-arms in vain. We followed his fortunes, and we endeavoured to the best of our humble abilities to fight by his side or in his ranks, because we believed in the policy which he upheld, and we learned this, both from his precept and example, that the welfare of this country was largely bound up in the success of the party which he led, and that the first duty of any man who sought either to lead or to follow that party was to abase his own interests and his own advantage for the common good and for the good of the country at large. The hon. gentleman tells us that something had to be sacrificed, and that the country was sacrificed. The hon. gentleman has failed to tell this House in what particular the interests of the country have been sacrificed or are in danger. The hon. gentleman goes so far as to tell us that on the stock market the danger to Canada is realized. Has the hon. gentleman indicated any way whatever in which the interests of the country were subverted to the interests of that company? Is there a single measure likely to come, or possible to come, which can receive the approval of the Government, and by which this country is in any way affected, which can be ratified with the assent and approval of this Parliament? It is here that every such measure must come, and when a measure comes here indicating that we have made an unfair surrender to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it will be time enough for the leader of the Opposition to tell us that somebody's heart-strings are tied to this company although somebody's purse is not. When he tells us that there were rival factions in the Conservative party, and when he points to a parallel, as he represents it, in Alexander's empire, he forgets two things, or is greatly misinformed upon them. One is that there were no rival factions within the Conservative party on Sir John Macdonald's death, and the other is, that there was no disposition to divide the empire, as he calls it. But I think that, without very strong eyesight, I can see a set of men who are not only skilled in the arts of faction but are ready to divide the empire at a moment's notice. It is true that in another place the leader of the Government made a statement which—I agree with the leader of the Opposition—was all too modest, when he said that he himself was not selected on account of his eminent talents or conspicuous public position, but rather that the choice was in the nature of a compromise. I am not aware why the modesty of Mr. Abbott impelled him to make this observation, but if his remark is to be understood, as the hon. leader of the Opposition understands it, as implying a compromise between rival aspirants to that office, rival claimants as he calls them, for once I must differ from my leader and tell him I do not agree with him, for among the ranks of his followers, and the hon. gentleman can cross-examine each or take us as a whole as he pleases, there was no rivalry between any of the members of this House who were connected with Sir John Macdonald, for the leadership of the party. If anything, there was a disposition on the part of those whose names might be mentioned, to avoid the serious toils and responsibilities which had broken down the greatest statesman this country ever possessed. But I agree with the leader of the Opposition that Mr. Abbott was altogether too modest in the statement of his own claims for promotion, and that he might have, perhaps, to his own advantage, assumed a very different position from that which he did take in the debate that afternoon. I find on looking through the record of that day's proceedings, when the transaction came fresh to the members of the other House, when it was not a question of asking across the House: what policy do you intend to adopt, and then giving a vague unmeaning indication of terror to come to-morrow, or of moving the adjournment of the House to raise an academic debate on the question, but, when the transaction was fresh before them, the trusty lieutenant, who is in the habit of speaking for the leader of the Opposition and his party in the Senate, used these words with respect to Mr. Abbott:

"I may be allowed to conclude with a few observations as to the hon. gentleman who has been made leader. As to that hon. gentleman's qualifications for the position to which he has been appointed, we here in the Senate have no question. The hon. gentleman has, during a long life, been tried in a great many different capacities. I do not propose to speak of any of them but one; but hon. gentlemen know that this Senate was led for many years with singular skill and ability by a gentleman of great natural talents, who passed half a lifetime in this House; and hon. gentlemen who were here when Sir Alexander Campbell left the Senate will remember that the general feeling amongst the members of this House was that they could get no one who would take Sir Alexander Campbell's place. I say that was the feeling. The hon. gentleman was not appointed immediately on the retirement of Sir Alexander Campbell; but within a few weeks after the appointment of the present leader of this House hon. gentlemen felt that they had been mistaken, and that a man had been found who was able, with a comparatively limited experience, to fill the position successfully which had been so long filled by Sir Alexander Campbell."

Was this—let me paraphrase the hon. gentleman's expressions—from the Empire? Was this from the Gazette? Was this from an organ of the Government? No; but it was from a gentleman chosen by hon. gentlemen opposite to speak for them in the other House. The hon. Senator continued:

"The hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Government is not a man who generally poses before the public to any very great extent; but he has done a great deal of valuable work, and has done it in a quiet and unostentatious way. We know him now; we did not know him before he came; and knowing him, we believe him capable of discharging the important duties of the office to which he is now appointed in such a way as will surprise the people of the country and will, I regret to say, delight the Conservative section of the community. People outside will in a little while begin to look upon the hon. leader of the Government much as we now look upon the leader of this House; and I may be allowed to express the belief, and also the hope, that as long as this country shall be afflicted by a Conservative Government—which I hope will not be very long—that undoubted evil may be mitigated by the fact that that Government will be led by the hon. gentleman——"

Wherever his heart-strings may be. There is a little more I desire to read. The hon. Senator continued:

"I wish to make a remark which is perhaps not altogether a remark to make on the floor of this House, but I think, with regard to the hon. gentleman himself, it must be gratifying to him to know that his appointment is so cordially received by those who know him best, and also—which is perhaps the most gratifying circumstance—that the appointment has come to him, not through any seeking or expectation of his own, but has come like Dian's kiss, "unasked, unsought"—the office has come to the man, the man has not sought the office; and that the hon. gentleman owes his appointment solely to the fact that those who knew him best knew he was the best man for the position."

We are not accustomed to applaud prophecy which comes from our opponents, because our experience of the past has not filled us with the utmost confidence in its realization. But, to the prophecy which I have just read, we say Amen, and we have full faith that the prophecy made there will be realized in a very short time. Mr. Abbott is Prime Minister of this country, not because there were rival factions which had to make a compromise, not because there were claimants whose claims had to be satisfied, but for the very reason that the hon. Senator from whose speech I have just read gave, namely, he was the best man for the position. Let me say this one word, and I would say more upon this subject of Mr. Abbott's relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway if I felt that my position and my office permitted me to say what, perhaps, is under the seal of confidence; but I am free to say this much: that in the experience I have had of Mr. Abbott as one of Her Majesty's Privy Councillors for Canada during the past four years, I have learned to esteem him, more than anything else, because he never allowed in the slightest degree, to the slightest extent, any measure touching an interest which affected his pecuniary fortune, to be discussed in his presence. If a feeling of that kind gave us confidence in him, we were no less impressed with the abilities which have been admired on the other side in the Senate Chamber, and, Sir, knowing that much of him I can feel that when he has rid himself of the shadow of a pecuniary interest in the great corporation to which the hon. gentleman has referred, I can trust his heart-strings, as I tried him and knew him at a time when, not his heart-strings only, but his whole fortune were involved in the success of that company. The hon. the leader of the Opposition has said a great deal about an interview which is alleged to have taken place in the city of Montreal, and the hon. gentleman has declared that we have not told the House the whole truth upon this subject. With what seemed to me to be singular inconsistency, the hon. gentleman stated that the hon. the leader of the Government had been far more candid to the Upper House than we had been to this House, but before he had finished reading the Premier's speech in the Senate, the hon. gentleman stopped to tell the House that Mr. Abbott did not tell the truth in the Upper House at all, and he attacked his veracity. The hon. gentleman based that singular comment upon a statement which appeared in La Presse. Without in the least degree disparaging the influence of the press, or its value as an auxiliary, I have this to say: For my own part, and I think I may say also for my colleagues, that we are not in any way bound by the statement which appeared in La Presse, or by the opinion, either, which appeared in that journal. I am not in the least degree bound by what appeared in La Presse. Although I esteem in the highest manner the gentleman who, I understand, conducts its editorial columns, I am not bound by what he may say on public affairs, and I may say that the Secretary of State is equally independent while he equally esteems that worthy gentleman. But when the hon. the leader of the Opposition undertook to read statements, and admissions, and confessions alleged to be made by the Secretary of State and published in a newspaper bitterly hostile to this party and to this Government, he forgot for the moment, or he would surely have stated it to this House, that the Secretary of State had publicly and distinctly repudiated that interview as false. I shall not detain the House longer than to refer to a few personal points to which the hon. gentleman made reference. The hon. gentleman was good enough to refer to myself, and to challenge the statement which appeared in La Presse, and in respect to which he thought that the leader of the Government had not been entirely candid in the Upper House. While, as I have said, I am not responsible for what appears in La Presse, I have no hesitation to avow and defend, if it should be impugned, the policy which I have pursued with regard to this subject since important responsibilities happened to be laid upon me, and I am not disposed to be at all uncandid to the House as to the feeling which I had with regard to them. I was honoured by His Excellency's request that I should advise him on the course which should be pursued as to the formation of an Administration to succeed that which had unfortunately been dissolved by the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, and I was honoured with His Excellency's request likewise, that I should undertake the task of forming an Administration. As I have stated to the House this afternoon, I believed that the best interests of this country were bound up in the success and permanence of the Liberal-Conservative party, and immediately, and without any attempt to take upon myself the responsibility of His Excellency's commands, I begged that His Excellency would lay his commands in more worthy and able hands than mine. The closeness with which, since I have been in this House, I have followed the policy of Sir John A. Macdonald, the closeness with which I have followed his fortunes and endeavoured in a humble way to assist in fighting his battles, taught me the great responsibilities and the great labours which will devolve upon any person who undertakes to conduct an Administration at this phase of public affairs, whichever party he may belong to. Reflecting upon the whole situation as I did, and knowing that while I might safely count upon the continued loyalty and united support of the Liberal-Conservative party, yet I believed in my heart that throughout this country there were many of the electors who would have more confidence in the leadership of a man who had been, not five or six years in the Federal politics of this country, but nearer forty years, a man who had, as the leader of the Opposition in the Senate said, served this country in many capacities and proved himself worthy in all, and who was my senior in many years by age, and my senior vastly in public experience and wisdom likewise. That is all that I have to say to the hon. gentleman with regard to my own position in the matter, and that is the answer which I have to make as to the deduction which he has drawn from the columns of La Presse. With regard, however, to the other point on which the hon. gentleman has challenged and demanded an answer, namely, as to whether there is not an agreement that certain members of the Government shall be decapitated at the close of the session and certain others promoted, I may tell him there was no such agreement ever entered into, or ever contemplated, except by the imaginative genius of a Grit editor. I tell the hon. gentleman that when the leader of the Government applied to his old colleagues to ask them if they would assist him in discharging the delicate and important task which His Excellency had laid upon him, the answer came from one and all to say: Yes, we will assist you either by serving under you or leaving your Government, whichever you prefer; and the leader of the Government knows that the men who sit with him around the Council Board to-day are just as ready as the day he made that appeal to us to serve him in office or out of office, just as ready as the men who sit on these benches are determined, in office or out of office, to sustain the policy they were sent here to sustain. There is just one other word. The hon. gentleman required that we should explain the delay which occurred in the formation of the Ministry. The hon. leader of the Opposition was inclined to think that there were some reasons of state which deferred the formation of a Ministry, and that Mr. Abbott had not been at all candid in giving to the senators as the reason, that a proper tribute of respect to the memory of the late leader required that the grave should close over him before his successor should be chosen. The hon. gentleman said that he would assume that His Excellency desired to be guided by English precedents in this connection; but, pointing to us, he declared in thrilling tones that he would hold His Excellency's advisers answerable. Well, I do not know that there is a great deal to answer for, because I do not know that any calamities have befallen the state in that short interval of mourning which was given to us. But I do know this, that the hon. gentleman will not hold His Excellency's advisers responsible, because during that period His Excellency had no advisers whatever.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if anything could show more clearly than another how very well justified my hon. friend was in demanding explanations from hon. gentlemen opposite, it has been the concluding paragraphs of the statement of the hon. Minister of Justice. That hon. gentleman has shown in the clearest possible way how correct my hon. friend was in saying that a very important detail had been kept from us: for this House has heard him state now, what was entirely omitted from any of the declarations made hitherto either in the other Chamber or in this, that he himself was originally called upon to form a Ministry, and declined the task. Now, Sir, I am not here to judge of the propriety of the hon. gentleman's action: but I am here to say that that important fact should, in my judgment, and in accordance with British precedents, as well as in accordance with all former practice in Canada, have been communicated to the House on the very first occasion when a statement was made by the nominal leader of this House in his place. The hon. gentleman has gone a good deal further than the present Premier did on the floor of the Senate, in declaring emphatically, as I understood him—and I desire if there is any misunderstanding that he should correct me—that there was no agreement, verbal or written, direct or implied, made with the hon. Secretary of State. He did not say, the House will note, that there was no demand by the Secretary of State, but that no agreement of any kind had been made with that hon. gentleman whereby he is to receive what it is perfectly well known to every member on both sides of this House he has long claimed and clamoured for, the post of Minister of Railways in the present Administration. That, the hon. gentleman tells us, was not promised; he does not tell us that it was not asked. Sir, I think in some important respects the remarks of the Minister of Justice are a little like the present condition of the hon. Secretary of State—they halt a good deal in places; there are hiatuses and omissions. We are told perhaps the general results which have been arrived at; but, as we have seen, a good many steps in the progress have been carefully concealed from us. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Justice thinks that the fact that our excellent friend Mr. Abbott—whom I have known longer than the hon. Minister of Justice, and whom, personally, I very greatly esteem, —has been for many a long year bound up in every conceivable shape with the fortunes and destinies of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that he has been their trusted adviser—that he has been until yesterday a director on their board—is no reason for supposing that the hon. gentleman's mind would be in any way biassed if a question came up affecting the interests of that great corporation in comparison with those of other great corporations. I say that is simply preposterous; it is absurd. On the contrary, it would be impossible under the circumstance for Mr. Abbott or for any man to hold the beam perfectly straight and fair between the Canadian Pacific Railway and—I will not say the interests of the country, but the interests of other parties which might come into contact with it—most of all, when it is known, as it is to every one of us, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company put forth to the uttermost its great power for the purpose of keeping these hon. gentlemen in their places—that its manager issued a mandate, for it was nothing less, warning every employé of the company at his peril to support the present Government; when it is known from one end of this country to the other that voters were brought in by tens of thousands to keep hon. gentlemen opposite in their places; and that, it is more than suspected, was not the only or the most substantial aid which was granted in the late struggle by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to sustain the present Government. And we are told that the man who guided that company through the greatest perils they ever encountered, the man who for many years was their chief solicitor and legal adviser, the man who, as I have said, till within the last few hours was a director on their board, is not likely to be in any way influenced by or to cast a favourable eye on the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, the hon. Minister of Justice asked my hon. friend for proof of the fact which he stated, that when it was known that their quondam solicitor and ex-director was Premier of Canada, the stock market showed how thoroughly the situation was appreciated in England and elsewhere by the immediate and considerable rise in the stock of the company. Sir, the proof is to be found on every stock exchange where Canadian Pacific Railway stock is sold. The proof is clear and patent; it is known to every hon. gentleman who has taken the pains to read the columns of the London Economist, or even the Montreal Gazette, for that matter. There was a shock and a drop in Canadian Pacific Railway securities for a few days; but that was all regained and more, the moment it was known that Mr. Abbott was to be the Premier of Canada, and everybody knew the reason why, if the hon. Minister of Justice did not. In that rise is seen the best proof of how the public at large regards the appointment of Mr. Abbott as Premier of this Dominion as likely to affect the fortunes of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, the hon. gentleman says he would like to know how it can affect them to know that they have a friend at court. Sir, before the Estimates are passed he will see that it may benefit them to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars, although, very likely, that benefit is not given in consideration of the appointment of Mr. Abbott as Premier, but for good, solid considerations formerly rendered by them, as evidenced by Mr. VanHorne's letter of a recent date, in the advancement of the interests of hon. gentlemen opposite in the last elections.

Mr. LISTER. The Postmaster General will tell all about it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He will do so, no doubt, when the Estimates come down.

An hon. MEMBER. And he can.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And he can. Sir, the hon. gentleman declares that there is no disposition on their side to divide the empire. Well, as regards the most of them, that is probably true enough. I think it is a case in which they find that it is as well for them to hang together as to hang separately, and so far I fancy their loyalty will not fail. Sir, unhappily we are not favoured here to-day with the presence of the hon. Secretary of State. I dare say, when he returns he will find or make an opportunity to reiterate for himself from his own place the emphatic contradiction which the hon. Minister of Justice tells us he gave —although I have not seen it, and the hon. Minister did not quote it or say where it is to be found—to parties who allege that he desired the fulfilment of Sir John Macdonald's written promise, which he claimed to have, that he should be Minister of Railways at a fitting time and place. When he comes, we will hear that, or we will endeavour at any rate to hear that. For the present, the hon. gentleman, I suppose, may be said, in imitation of the great Richelieu, to be nursing his wrath until a fitting opportunity, and I may remind some of those hon. gentlemen opposite that peradventure they may yet discover that, as in the case of Richelieu, the Secretary of State is never more dangerous than when he is temporarily withdrawn by illness from public affairs. However, be that as it may, I think, if there were some others present whose faces I miss, that we might have a little valuable light thrown on the causes which induced the Minister of Justice, after four or five days serious consideration——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I had not it under consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend is too modest, he must have known he was going to be sent for, and he must have had, in the privacy of his own mind, four or five good days and nights too, to consider the situation. The hon. gentleman must not allow us to suppose that he was utterly insensible to the position he holds and the services he has rendered to the other side. He must have known that he would be sent for, and must have considered the situation; but, as I said, we are unfortunate. There is the Secretary of State, by an unfortunate accident, unable to be present and assist at this explanation, and I miss another familiar face, the face of one who, unless we are greatly misinformed, could likewise shed a good deal of light on the reasons which led the Minister of Justice to deny himself the proud satisfaction of becoming the Premier of this country. I allude to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That hon. gentleman's powers of locomotion are excellent, unlike those of the Secretary of State, and I believe he is at this moment a thousand miles away from us, leaving his bantling—the North-West Territories—to shift for itself, and unable, doubtless to his great grief, to redeem the pledges made by him on every hustings, that, come weal or woe, whether it suited the Government or not, no matter how it might affect the party, he, the member for North Simcoe, would have right done to the people of the North-West. Sir, his Bill is here, but the gentleman himself is absent. For five and six times over, he has had the opportunity of moving it, and now, with rare self-denial, when the moving of it might be specially inconvenient to his hon. friends, and especially to his hon. friend the Minister of Justice, the hon. gentleman is absent on the other side of the Atlantic. As to the general results, which my hon. friend did not particularly allude to, of this shuffle, well, my hon. friend has done justice, as he ought, to the high position which the ex-director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and incidentally, the Canadian Pacific Railway, has attained in the councils of the Government. It may be permitted for me to sum up the results of the shuffle. Looking at them in a philosophical point of view, I may say that the general results of the late shuffle are these:—Maritime Provinces, first; Quebec, a very good second; and Ontario, nowhere. That, Sir, is the general result, and a result, I fancy, which is likely to predominate in the present state of affairs; and if it be true, as has been very currently reported, though I will not pledge my own individual knowledge of the matter, that the hon. member for North Simcoe saw this, and saw there was but one way of giving Ontario a fair show, and that was by making him the Premier of this country, and thereupon retreated; there is something to be said, after all, both for the proposition and the absence of the hon. member for North Simcoe. Now, as to the Premier, Mr. Abbott, I have known him, Sir, to the best of my recollection, about thirty-five years. Most assuredly, I have not always agreed with him, either as to his policy or methods, but I am perfectly well aware that Mr. Abbott is a decidedly able man. I agree entirely in that part of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and the remarks made in the other Chamber. I do think myself that his long connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway was and is a grave objection, indeed, to his being made Premier of this country; but his ability I have never disputed, and I never intend to dispute. More than that, he has other special qualifications. It is known to the House, that of that little band of able men who once, in 1849, signed a certain remarkable document, Mr. J. J. C. Abbott is the only surviving specimen, and the ultra-loyal party, which, on all occasions raises the cry of dismemberment of the Empire, selects him for its Premier. Now, I will do justice to Mr. Abbott. I say that he is just as good and fit a person to wave the old flag as high and as long as any five-and-thirty percenter of them all. I believe that Mr. Abbott is, and was when he signed that manifesto, just as loyal a man as any one among them. I believe Mr. Abbott is perfectly capable, just as capable as any of them, to discharge his duty, notwithstanding what he may have said upon that occasion; and, for my part, I hold that those hon. gentlemen on the other side, by their policy during the last twelve years, by their policy now, whether they know it or not—and I am willing to accept the excuse that they act in ignorance for the most part—have done more to wreck and ruin the prospects of erecting an allied nation to Great Britain in North America than any body of men that have ever existed in Canada—by no meaus exceptiug the annexationists of 1849. We may fairly, on the present occasion, have a word or two to say as to the personnel of the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman has told us that they continue the old policy. Well, that may be likely enough if they know exactly what it is, because Sir John Macdonald was not altogether prone to take them always into his confidence. What the old leader's policy was on a good many important questions, and not alone on the question as to how far he would go in favour of reciprocity, not one knows. But those hon. gentlemen have chosen to do one remarkable thing. The First Minister has chosen to retain all his colleagues in their old places. Notably, he has chosen to retain the Minister of Public Works in his office, and to continue him as leader of the House. Now, to that last I have no particular objection. If it pleases the Minister of Public Works to act as nominal leader of this House and to move the adjournment until such time as he may, peradventure, be called on to commit hari kari, when the summons arrives which will release him from the cares of office, I do not know that it very greatly concerns us, but, as I have said in my place before this Ministry was constituted, I believe it would have been far better for that hon. gentleman to have exchanged places with one of his colleagues until the present investigation was over, until his innocence was proved, or the reverse. And I think it was a grave error of judgment on the part of the Prime Minister and his colleagues not to have availed themselves, as they might well have done, of the present circumstances, to have relieved that gentleman temporarily, by an exchange of offices, and have placed him in a less awkward position than which he necessarily occupies to-day. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman may not serve a good purpose. I know it is convenient sometimes to have colleagues in office whose offices may not unreasonably be expected to become vacant, and I have known loyal patriots—and I think there are some loyal patriots on that side of the House—who are all the more likely to be kept loyal by knowing that a time may come when their services will find a reward; and it may be for the consolation of the Minister of Public Works to know that, when that time comes, he may not be alone, but others may keep him company on that occasion. On the whole, looking at the matter all around, I am inclined to regard the present composition of the Cabinet as a triumph on the part of the more respectable portion, comparatively speaking, of the Conservative party, and thereupon I felicitate them. Having the choice, to their credit be it said, that they have chosen the grey sheep instead of the black one, of whom they have their full and fair proportion. Now, as to the hon. Minister of Justice, I think I may say with some degree of truth that I am not given to indiscriminate laudation, or that, if I have erred in that direction, it has been unintentionally. Therefore, the hon. Minister of Justice may be assured that I am saying what I mean—neither less nor more—when I say that I am very glad to find he occupies a place in the reconstructed Ministry, and a very prominent and important place. I believe that, although his policy differs very materially from mine, he has conducted himself since he entered this House in a way that deserves our respect. I believe—and it is greatly to his credit, seeing the company he has kept——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Please withdraw the compliments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I believe that the hon. gentleman is really a man of clean life and clean hands, and I believe that the hon. gentleman will continue—at least I hope so—to deserve the encomium—and it is not a light encomium—that I have passed upon him just now. I believe that His Excellency did very well to send for that hon. gentleman. I think, for my part, that the hon. gentleman did well for his party at any rate, if not perhaps for his country, in declining to assume office, but it speaks very ill for the party jealousies which, despite his disclaimer, we know exist, that they should prevent him from accepting the task His Excellency imposed upon him. When the Secretary of State returns to his place, we may perhaps hear a little more of this matter. When we get the despatches from Washington, which I hope to receive, as the hon. gentleman tells me I shall, before 6 o'clock to-night, there is another very important part of their policy which it will be desirable to discuss a little longer. Meantime, I say to the hon. gentleman that, as far as he is concerned, and, I hope, as far as his colleagues are concerned, we trust that we shall be able to get on reasonably and amicably with them, and that the Minister of Justice, at all events, will pursue the same upright course which has, I think, distinguished him during the time that he has occupied that office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are not surprised to find that hon. gentlemen on the other side find fault with the selection of the Hon. Mr. Abbott as the Premier of this Government. I suppose that any other gentleman who would have been selected would have been subjected to the same criticism. The fact is that, in the opinion of those gentlemen, nothing good can come from this side of the House, though the people of this country, by large majorities in four general elections, have declared otherwise. The appointment of the Hon. Mr. Abbott, notwithstanding the criticism of hon. gentlemen, has been well received from one end of the country to the other. That appointment will be found to be a very good one. The hon. gentleman who has preceded me says he has known Mr. Abbott for at least thirty years. I think I have known the Hon. Mr. Abbott for at least that period and a little more, and I know that the hon. gentleman has always shown himself worthy of the support that he has received from the people and from Parliament at different periods. He has won certainly the high position he holds to-day, and, when Mr. Abbott came to me and asked me to join his Government, I told him that I would not hesitate to do so, though certain newspapers that the hon. the leader of the Opposition referred to had coupled my name with the leadership. I told him that, in a crisis of this kind, notwithstanding the desire of certain parties to promote one of their friends, to put him forward, he should not for a minute hesitate to stand by his party, to sacrifice his own ambition or claims, and to support the man selected by His Excellency to form the Government. For my part, I have been for over thirty years a member of the Liberal-Conservative party. I always stood by my party, and it was not at this period of my life that I was to desert them. I have never been traitor to my friends; I have never been a traitor to my party; and I say to all my friends, whether we have had differences amongst us at different periods of our political life or not, we must, when the party requires it, when the country requires it, stand together.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen on the other side know that. We must stand together. We never see them deserting their friends. They stand together, and we must do the same, and must stand shoulder to shoulder. Hon. gentlemen are trying just now to sow division in our ranks. It is the old story. They have tried that for twelve or fifteen years and they have not succeeded, and I am sure they will not succeed to-day. For example, the hon. gentleman there, in his very polite language, speaking of the powers in the Government, or the representatives of the different Provinces, says: "The Maritime Provinces first, Quebec a very good second, but Ontario nowhere." Well, Ontario is a great province; Ontario is a powerful province; Ontario is the most populated province of the Dominion; it is probably the wealthiest province in the Dominion, and it does not require even the advice of the hon. gentleman to take its own course. Ontario knows perfectly well its value, and, if Ontario had only one single member in the Cabinet, Ontario need not be afraid, because Ontario would know that the votes of Ontario are there and the power of Ontario is there also. As to Quebec, speaking for the Liberal-Conservatives of that province, Quebec will be true as always. We have always been true; we have stood by our leaders, and we will now. The hon. gentleman opposite has selected me for his criticism and his remarks, in a most unfriendly way. Of course, the hon. gentleman is not a friend of mine, but he is a colleague of mine, and has been so during several Parliaments. I do not complain of his criticism. He may call me a nominal leader. No matter what I may be, I am a member of this Government, and for twenty-four years I have been a member of previous Governments, and Parliament has supported me, though the hon. gentleman has always opposed me. Sir, the hon. gentleman has also taken upon himself to give me advice on the conduct I should have followed at the beginning of this session. I thank him for the advice, but I prefer to follow the advice of my hon. friends on this side of the House. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice has received compliments from the hon. gentleman. I do not know whether those compliments can be received by him any better than I can receive the remarks which the hon. gentleman has addressed to myself. At all events, whether those remarks about the Minister of Justice were sarcastic or not, we, on this side of the House, consider the Minister of Justice as one of those who have conferred the greatest honour on our party; and we consider that during the time he has been in this House he has shown himself a most able man, a most deserving Minister of the Crown, and one of those who have rendered the greatest service, not only to his party, but to this House and to the country. If that hon. gentleman is not to-day the First Minister of this country, we know, from what he said just now, that it was his own choice. He did not choose to undertake the task that was offered to him by His Excellency the Governor General, and it is not the first time that the same thing has been done in this country. Years ago I remember that an hon. gentleman was selected to form an Administration, and after considering the matter for twenty-four hours, he went back to the Governor and said: "No, I do not think I should undertake the task," and he recommended some one else. The Hon. Mr. Abbott, who is our leader, was a member of the Government of Sir John Macdonald, as you are aware. The hon. gentleman had been selected by Sir John Macdonald to form part of his Cabinet. When he was chosen he was a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway and a shareholder in that company, he was one of the leading men in that company. Did the hon. gentleman complain of that? Did he find fault with Sir John Macdonald for having selected Mr. Abbott as a member of the Government? No, Sir; but now when His Excellency the Governor General sends for him to form an Administration, after Mr. Abbott has resigned his directorship in the Canadian Pacific Railway, after he has sold his stock in that company and has therefore ceased to be a member of that company or to have anything to do with it, then the hon. gentleman begins to find fault, and says that the Canadian Pacific Railway is the real Government of the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, nobody will believe that. They say that we have taken a very important man from that company and have brought him into the councils of this country, that he is the head of the Government, and that it is a godsend to the company to have him Prime Minister of this country. Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice went over the various points that the leader of the Opposition tried to make against this appointment. I shall not attempt to go over them again, but I must say that the selection which has been made is one that does credit—I should not use the name of the Governor General—but it is a credit to this country, and every one of us is pleased to be under his leadership. Mr. Speaker, the policy of Sir John Macdonald is not departed from, as the leader of the Opposition has stated to-day. We maintain the same principles, we maintain the same policy, and as regards our financial policy, the Finance Minister to-morrow will probably disclose it to the House, and I have no doubt that that policy, if it does not meet with all the support we should expect on the other side of the House, at all events, it will meet with the support of the majority of this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Justice complained that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had stated that the Prime Minister in the other House did not disclose all the facts that transpired, or the negotiations that took place in the formation of the Government, but he himself, before he concluded the speech which he delivered a few moments ago, confirmed every observation in this particular addressed to the House by my hon. friend. The statement was that the hon. Minister of Justice had been sent for by His Excellency to advise him in reference to the formation of an Administration. That statement the Minister of Justice has shown was not strictly accurate. The Minister of Justice was sent for, not merely to advise His Excellency as to who should be called upon to form an Administration, but to assume that responsible duty himself. The Minister of Justice informs us that he declined the duty of forming an Administration, and that he advised His Excellency to call upon another party to undertake that responsible task. The Minister of Justice, however, did not inform us what steps he had taken to ascertain the feelings of his party, before he made His Excellency that answer, and it would have been an interesting fragment of present history if the hon. gentleman had taken the House so far into his confidence as to have imparted to us the information which, in this respect, he has intentionally withheld. My hon. friend beside me has spoken of a divided empire in the case of Alexander. Well, Sir, I do not think that the parallel was strictly on all fours, because it seemed to me that hon. gentlemen opposite became fully impressed with the notion that if there was anything approaching a division there would be no empire at all, and it was only by standing together that they would have even a hope of maintaining their position upon that side of the House. It was because they will not stand together that the Minister of Justice was compelled to forego any ambitious inclinations he might entertain for the position of First Minister and to accept a less prominent position in the Government, of the President of the Council. The Minister of Justice has complained of the argument of the Opposition. He said the Government have not in any degree departed from the policy marked out by the late Prime Minister, that it is the same Government, that they have made a little progress; they have got from the National Policy to the Old Policy, and if they keep on perhaps they will be able ultimately to get through the alphabet. But, however that may be, the hon. gentleman said they adhere to the policy marked out for the Administration by their leader, Sir John Macdonald. The leader of the Opposition pointed out in what particular they had departed from the policy of the late First Minister. We have not, as the Minister of Justice has intimated, come to the defence of the general policy of the Government of Sir John Macdonald. We differ from that policy. We never believed it was, taken as a whole, in the public interest; we have deprecated it, we have resisted it on the floor of this House, we have opposed it before the electors. But there was one feature of that policy to which we did subscribe, and that was the determination exhibited on his part not to give to any one of the great railway corporations a dominant influence over the Government of this country. The position taken by him was that this Government should remain master of the railway corporations and that the railway corporations should not become masters of the Government. My hon. friend has pointed out that, in this particular, a wide departure from the policy of Sir John Macdonald had been made, and I think that the statements advanced in defence of that proposition were ample and convincing. Who is at the head of the present Administration? My hon. friend has pointed out that it was a gentleman who was chief adviser, who marked out the policy, who took every step necessary for the protection of the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the man upon whom that corporation relied more than upon all others put together. It is not by withdrawing from the corporation, it is not by selling stock, it is not by divesting himself of all pecuniary interest in the corporation that the hon. gentleman can wholly disassociate himself in fact or in the public mind from that corporation, and that he is not so disassociated is proved by the fact referred to by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that there was a sensible advance in the stock of that corporation since the acceptance of the Premiership by the President of the Council. The hon. gentleman says he is not responsible for everything that may have been done prior to the acceptance of office by this Administration. The hon. gentleman has laid down a novel doctrine—a doctrine that has always been repudiated by the Ministers of the Crown in the United Kingdom, that there could be any moment of time, or any act of state done by the Crown for which the advisers of the Crown were not responsible. Let me refer to the dimissal of Lord Melbourne. Sir Robert Peel was travelling on the continent and was in the south of Europe at the time. When he was called on to form a Government he was a thousand miles away. On returning, some days elapsed before an Administration was formed. Did he, when the House met, say he was not responsible for what transpired during the interregnum? Not at all. He admitted that for every act done by the Crown he was responsible, and if he did not approve of the dismissal he would not have undertaken the task of forming a Government. So when the Minister of Justice says the present Administration is not responsible for what transpired between the dissolution of the Government of Sir John Macdonald and the formation of the Government by Mr. Abbott, he is laying down a doctrine wholly at variance with the principles recognized in the United Kingdom, and which necessarily must govern wherever parliamentary government is established. Then the hon. gentleman has evaded in a large degree the question as to whether any pledge was given to the Secretary of State or any other person with respect to any future change in the Administration. I hold that the Government have no constitutional right to give such a pledge. The hon. gentleman should have been in the position to state to this House that not only was no such pledge given, but no such pledge could be given. Let me recall the case that occurred under Lord Grenville's administration, when it was understood that the disabilities with respect to the holding of office by Roman Catholics were about to be removed and when the King withdrew from the position and recalled the assent he had given to the proposed legislation of his Cabinet. He asked as a condition of their retention in office—he asked Lord Howick and others—that they would give some pledge that at no future period they would advise the removal of the disabilities from Roman Catholics holding office. What was the answer of the Administration? It was this: "We have sworn to give the Crown what we believe to be on all occasions proper advice, and we cannot in advance give any pledge that we will give certain advice at a future period; we must be perfectly free at all times to give that advice which our oath of office requires." So if the hon. gentleman has made such stipulation and come to such an understanding with the Secretary of State, that he is at some future period, near or remote, to hold some other office in the Administration than that which he now occupies, the hon. gentleman has given a promise which is wholly at variance with the duties imposed on Ministers by the office which they hold. The Minister of Public Works has told the House that he is going to stand by his party, that he is always going to stand by his party. I think that is a perfectly sincere statement; I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman intends to stand by his party. What troubles the hon. gentleman most is whether his party is going to stand by him. There is not much doubt that it will be possible for the party to exist either on the right or left of the Speaker, but, if the hon. gentleman does not stand by his party, or if his party do not stand by him, I am afraid the hon. gentleman will be like the party who was too long at dinner, he will have no chance of standing at all. It is, I think, pretty clear that the Government and their supporters have not been the happy family that the Minister of Justice would have us believe them to be. See how we brethren dwell together in love, says the hon. gentleman. But if the hon. gentleman had been a little more candid and a little more full in the statement he made to the House, he would have been able to tell us that some of his heart-strings have been, after all, somewhat torn.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says "No." Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman is quite forgetting the past, he is forgetting the attempt made on his part to ascertain the feelings of his friends, and the purpose for which that enquiry was made;—those who call themselves Conservative; that diversified body so designated representing every different phase of political opinion from, I was going to say, extreme democracy to absolutism which were held together by the skill and ability of the late leader—the hon. gentleman found that this diversified body were not all disposed to stand by him. The Minister of Public Works did not seem altogether pleased with the commendable observations made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the expressions of esteem for the Minister of Justice. He did as much as to say: You have pronounced upon him your good opinion, but you have said nothing in my favour. I think I may say, that upon this side of the House generally we have a high opinion of the ability and fairness of the Minister of Justice, and we are only sorry that the hon. gentleman is not in as good company as he might be found in. I am speaking now with regard to his political principles and opinions. I remember hearing some years ago a lecture delivered by Mr. Barnum, and he told about a wealthy farmer in Australia who had left two sons between whom he divided an immense flock of sheep. One divided the flock and gave the other his choice, and in the division he put a pet sheep that belonged to his brother whom he thought was not quite so intent upon worldly possession as he was himself; and when the brother was making the choice he looked at the flock with the pet sheep in it, which was not quite up to the quality of the other, and he said: "Good-bye, Bill, I will never see you again, I must choose the other flock, and I am very sorry for the company in which you are." And so we say to the Minister of Justice: We are very sorry for the company in which he is, for we would be delighted to see him acting more in accordance with his convictions and less in accordance with the principles of the party with which he is at the present time associated.

Mr. TUPPER. After the two speeches to which the House has just listened, that of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and that of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), one would almost feel that instead of there being any danger of dissensions in the family on this side of the House, there is serious danger of desertion on the other side, because these two hon. gentlemen have been so droll, so humourous and so unlike themselves, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was so full of compliments and expressions of good wishes and good feeling, that the rather angry and exceedingly indignant speech of the leader of the Opposition stands out alone and unsupported. I have sympathy with the leader of the Opposition, who was compelled, through the supposed discourtesy of the members of this Government to bottle up for days, perhaps for over a week, that eloquent statement which he delivered in his usually pleasing, although somewhat unusually excited style to-day. We heard that a very serious question was before the House and before the country, and the leader of the Opposition took some pains to show that our minds were to be directed to a very grave question, indeed, connected with the constitution of this Parliament and this country. He dwelt for a considerable time upon the supposed great impropriety of the leader of the Government being placed in a position of at least terrible temptation, on account of a previous association with a great railway corporation of this country. He gave his attention seriously to the subject, and I must say that it is pleasing, considering the fears that he entertained, that his two colleagues, in an entirely different frame of mind from that which usually characterizes them, have treated the whole question as one of levity and an occasion for the interchange of pleasant sentiments. I cannot upbraid them for that, but at any rate these two gentlemen have taken a considerable weight off the shoulders of the people which had begun to listen and to expect an explanation of how far and to what extent the constitution of this country was imperilled. There is no doubt that some hon. gentlemen expected on the reassembling of Parliament that the Premier of this country was to be cursed, but judging from the remarks of the gentlemen to-day, he has been entirely blest. Such praise has seldom been heaped upon the leader of a great party in the country as has been bestowed on Mr. Abbott to-day, and I, as one member of the Conservative party, hail with pleasure the manner in which, taking it all around, encomiums have been heaped even in this House upon the head of that hon. gentleman, and with which he has already been favoured in the Senate Chamber. It must be gratifying to all of us to find that even the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has, as he says himself, a kindly sentiment and great esteem for the Premier of this country. A change has certainly come over the spirit of his dream, and I would be suspicious of this praise and of the complimentary sentiments expressed by some gentlemen on the other side, were it not that I find that throughout the whole country there is the same sentiment and that same high opinion entertained for the leader of this Government. In the Province by the sea, when the Minister of Justice who so worthily deserved the opinion expressed about him by the hon. gentlemen on the other side, whether sincerely or not;—when it was supposed in his native Province that the Minister of Justice had been selected by His Excellency to form an Administration and had accepted the trust and the great responsibility, all the more pain was produced, all the battle array was marshalled out, and the leading exponents of Liberal opinion in that Province proceeded to condemn the Minister of Justice at once. They criticized his appointment as injurious not only to the country but particularly to the Conservative or "Tory party," as they called them. The Halifax Morning Chronicle said that Mr. Abbott was the man who not only could hold the great Conservative party together, but Mr. Abbott was the man worthy, for instance, of the great esteem of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I must really call the attention of the House to the opinion of the leading Liberal organ of my native province in regard to the present condition of affairs. There is no great breach of the constitution in the minds of the friends of the Liberal party down by the sea, and there are so few from that province in this House who can speak for the Liberal party that I may be allowed to say a few words on their behalf so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. Let me tell them that they should not be discouraged by this long-considered and carefully-matured resolution which has been sprung upon us to-day in such a sudden manner. The Halifax Morning Chronicle says:

"The Montreal Gazette and other influential Tory newspapers favoured the selection of Hon. J. J. C. Abbott, and among all the leading Tories Mr. Abbott would have been the most judicious selection from a Tory standpoint, as he is a gentleman not only of ability and long parliamentary experience, but of considerable tact, the exercise of which might have enabled him to check for a time the discordant elements now plainly perceptible in the ranks of the Tories."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. "Hear, hear," say hon. gentlemen; and the hon. member for Bothwell says: "You are not a happy family." If these hon. gentlemen really thought we were, I think there would not have been this trouble about the political situation or this resolution, or this discussion which we have to-day. They think a chance has come to them at last of making a division in the Conservative ranks. They think the party is so weak, so broken, that by trading on petty jealousies of which they have had a great deal of experience in their own ranks for ten years past, and which they think have taken root in ours, they can suggest to this section of the Conservative party: "Would not this man have suited you better, or that man? Look how the Minister of Justice has been sat upon; you friends of the Minister of Justice should rush to join us, not out of sympathy for him, but for the real purpose of putting us on the Treasury benches, and putting the Minister of Justice out altogether." The Liberal-Conservative party are not altogether senseless. These hon. gentlemen, I grant you, have a poor opinion of that party; but their trouble seems to be that they cannot gain the sympathy in that respect of the majority of the electors of this country. The hon. member for Bothwell also deplores our departure from the policy of Sir John Macdonald, basing his argument on the statement that the present Cabinet has given a predominant influence to a great railway corporation. Why, in Sir John Macdonald's time the man whose name is now before the House, whose position is now under criticism, was a director of that great and powerful corporation, while to-day he has not one pennyworth of stock in the company and no connection with it. Certainly if it was right in Sir John Macdonald's time to take the leading gentleman from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and place him in the Cabinet, very little can be made of the argument that the hon. gentleman who is Premier and President of the Council to-day has no connection whatever with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But the financial genius of our friend the hon. member for South Oxford was brought forward, and it was hoped that it would serve a purpose in this debate; but it was somewhat discouraging, although the hon. leader of the Opposition gave him the cue, to find him pointing out that it was not only the Liberal party that was disturbed, but, forsooth, the stock markets of the world as well; and that called for our serious consideration. Now, there is very little argument in that. It appears that the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway of late has been fluctuating. It has been up to-day and down to-morrow; but though hon. gentlemen were plentiful in assertions, they did not state any specific facts on this point. While that argument was going on, I took the trouble to obtain the figures, and I find that on June 1, the stock in the London market stood at 78½; on June 2, at 79; on June 6, at 80½; on June 8, at 80½, and on June 16, at 81½.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. That proves the case, suggests the hon. member for Bothwell. He thinks that rise is extraordinary, showing that some influence must be at work on the public mind, and that these people on 'Change have high hopes of the influence of the Premier in the Government, or think that dishonest or dishonourable things may be done for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let me point out that in September, 1890, long before Sir John's Macdonald's death or Mr. Abbott's accession to the premiership, the stock reached 86 in the same market. I give that as one reason why the hon. member for South Oxford did not follow at any great length this suggested financial difficulty. Now, we have not only the encomium on the leader of the Government pronounced by the leading Liberal organ in Nova Scotia, but the leader of the Opposition in the Senate went out of his way——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it was Mr. Power.

Mr. TUPPER. Surely, you will not deny the Maritime Provinces the credit of claiming him as a leader in the Senate. Certainly, that gentleman believes himself to be one of the leaders, and, I think, the Opposition in the Senate have as much right to a leader by commission, as the Opposition in this House. The Opposition in this House is not a happy family. I recollect when there was as much difference of opinion as to who was leader of the Opposition, in this House, as there is in the Senate. But, certainly, one of the leaders of the Opposition in the Senate went out of his way to heap compliments on Mr. Abbott, and to testify the esteem in which he was held, not only by his own friends, but he believed he could speak in that regard for the people of Nova Scotia; and his opinion was the same as that of the Morning Chronicle. In addition to that we had the eulogium of the hon. member for South Oxford. Surely, then, the position of the Government is such that we ought to believe ourselves a happy family on this side of the House. Surely, no one in this House will deny that we were face to face with a crisis in the middle of an important session of Parliament. A great and extraordinary leader was lost to a great and powerful party in the country. It was a peculiarly trying position, and no people knew it better than the hon. gentlemen who sought, whether right or wrong, whether in good taste or bad taste, to snatch a great party triumph from the condition of affairs. But, notwithstanding that that master-hand was suddenly removed from the direction of the councils of this nation, so skilfully had he educated his party, that its members have learned to look to principles rather than to men. Greatly as they admired, honoured and loved him during his lifetime, you see to-day the finest testimony that could be given to the life-work of that great man. You see a united party—a party in which petty jealousies have never existed, or if they have, you see them utterly stamped out and suppressed. The Conservative party in this House stand together with a man at their head of whom every man can be proud—of whom the Senate is proud, and of whom, as a man, I believe every member of the House of Commons is proud. Yet we hear the miserable little insinuation made against that man with his splendid record, that his past connection with a great corporation may lead him to do something for it that will be against the interests of the country. Such opposition as this is pitiful, and it is hardly necessary for members on this side of the House to rush to the rescue of the hon. gentleman whose reputation is attacked, when the attack is carried on in this—if I may use the term—mealy-mouthed manner. Most of the arguments I have heard confirm the estimate of the Conservative party in the selection they made under trying circumstances. Now, it may not be in good taste to say anything unkind to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who has made such an extraordinarily good-natured speech to-day. It would be in bad taste to do that, and I wish to congratulate him. I want to qualify the statement I made a short time ago, when I said I never heard him say anything civil of an hon. member on this side of the House or on that. He has broken the record; he has been civil to a man who deserves his civility, and certainly, if necessary, could command it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am always civil to those who deserve it.

Mr. TUPPER. One word more. He alluded to a gentleman for whom he has great esteem, and referred to him as a gentleman who once signed an annexation manifesto. Perhaps that is one of the reasons for those kindly sentiments. He would be a fortunate man, and I would not begrudge him those years, if he could live for forty years and then truthfully say that it was forty years ago when he held annexationist sentiments. I do not think that the crisis the hon. gentlemen opposite hope to bring on will be reached to-night.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. member for South Oxford, in the speech which he made this evening, was complimented on the absence of that acerbity which usually characterizes his remarks in this House; but however just that compliment may have been, I have observed that in this, as in other speeches, no matter how much the hon. gentleman may endeavour to curb his natural propensity to evil speaking, he cannot help giving utterance to some sentiments of that kind. And so, in the remarks which he made with reference to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I am bound to say that, although I find no fault with him for making the observations he did, yet the tone of those observations and the manner in which they were made, justify the remarks I have just expressed. If the hon. gentleman thinks himself or desires to convey to the House or the country the impression that the hon. member for North Simcoe, or those who think with him on the question to which the hon. gentleman particularly referred, have any idea of departing from the position they have taken, he is altogether mistaken. The hon. member for North Simcoe has a right to deal with that question in the manner he deems most convenient and appropriate. That hon. gentleman is well able to take his own opportunity and to judge what are the best methods to carry out his own intentions; and I simply rise to state, lest there should be any misapprehension, that there is no intention on the part of the hon. member for North Simcoe, or of those who think with him, to depart from the course they have taken and the principles they have laid down, and should the necessity arise those principles will be advocated and pressed to their legitimate conclusion. But the hon. member for South Oxford says something about divisions on this side of the House. He does not seem to understand that a party can exist and yet have difference of opinion among its members. It would be indeed very extraordinary if in a great party, such as the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, there were not differences of opinion among its members. But no doubt what excites the surprise of the hon. gentleman is that there should be hon. gentlemen on this side who have honest convictions and are not afraid to express them, even though sometimes they may thereby cause inconvenience to their friends or be a source of danger or damage to the party. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the best way hon. gentlemen opposite can take to prevent those differences of opinion from causing any injury or mischief to the Administration, is to pursue the course they have been following during the past few years; and they will find, as long as they do, that the same results will follow which have resulted from their course during the last general election. The hon. gentleman and those who act with him will find that the hon. member for North Simcoe and his friends, however strongly they may feel upon matters which have been the subject of discussion during the last two or three years, yet are determined that they will not put themselves in such a position as to further the end of hon. gentlemen opposite, to the great detriment, not only of the commercial interests of this Dominion, but also of its position as a portion of the Empire. As long as hon. gentlemen opposite pursue a policy which would have such disastrous effects, they may be satisfied that whatever differences of opinion there may be on this side, we will be, as regards those questions on which our political existence and our commercial interests depend, in common accord.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The chivalry which has prompted the hon. gentleman from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) to defend his absent leader is only what we would have expected from him. On more than one occasion he has had the courage of his convictions, and I will do him the justice to say that I believe the convictions he entertains, whether shared by the majority of members on this side or not, are held by him honestly, and he has the courage to avow them. With regard to the absent leader, there are those on this side who entertain opinions in accord with those expressed by the hon. member for South Oxford, but we cannot complain if the hon. member takes this occasion, in a very few words, to defend his chief. With regard to this debate on the important question of the formation of a new Administration, there is this to be said: that the time we have spent has been well repaid by certain information we have obtained. We should have other information, which the Minister of Justice could give, but which for reasons of his own, he chooses to withhold, but even for small mercies let us be thankful. The House certainly ought to be thankful to the leader of the Opposition for obtaining from the Government for the first time that which the House should have been told at an early period of the session, namely, the true facts with regard to the formation of the Ministry. It is well understood in England and in this country that on the dissolution of a Ministry and the formation of a new Government, the House of Commons is entitled to be taken into the confidence of the new Administration. It is entitled to know if more than one gentleman was called on to form the new Administration, and who were called on. We are entitled to know if His Excellency called on a member of the House of Commons to perform that duty and what his name is, and the reason he failed to accomplish it, if he did fail. The custom in England is to take the House into the confidence of the Government with regard to the formation of a new Ministry and the circumstances under which it was formed. How was this House treated? We were given by the acting leader of the House, on Tuesday, the 16th of June, a written statement in which, among other statements, appears the following:

No doubt that contained the truth, but the gravamen of the charge made on this side of the House against the Ministry is that it did not contain the whole truth, that it withheld that which is the most essential part of the truth, and that, standing alone as it does, it not only fails to give a true relation of the facts, but contains a relation at variance with those facts. We know now, thanks to the frankness of the Minister of Justice—a frankness this House had the right to expect, and I am proud to see that the hon. Minister was equal to the occasion—that not only was he sent for by His Excellency to be consulted as to the formation of the Ministry, but also to be entrusted with the responsible duty of forming a Ministry. I would that that hon. gentleman had gone a little further; I think that this House is entitled to have him go a little further; I think the interests of the country required it, and the interests of good government required that he should have gone a little further. I think he should have told the House why he declined that offer. Was it that he declined it from any distrust of his own abilities? The compliments which have been showered upon him this evening from his own side of the House and from this would show the groundlessness of any such modesty on his part. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether it was in consequence of his interview with the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the leader of my hon. friend who spoke a little while ago, that he found he could not expect to receive the cordial support of that hon. gentleman and his followers, and whether it was in consequence of that that he announced to the Governor General that he was unable to form an Administration. The House is entitled to that information. It was common town talk, it was published in all the newspaper press, and it has not been denied, and that fact, published as it was in all the newspaper press, affecting as it did so important a member of the Ministry at such an important time as that when the interview between the Minister of Justice and the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) took place, may be assumed to be correct in the absence of any denial. Is it true that the hon. member for Simcoe not only aspired to lead the Government himself—and I do not say anything against his aspirations, which are perfectly legitimate—but that he also declined to follow any Government of which the hon. the Minister of Justice was the leader? I fear that there are motives existing among a section of those who sit on the other side of the House, which are not very creditable or honourable to that section. They are motives which I am proud to say are not shared in on this side of the House. Hon. gentlemen know well that, so far as the Liberal party are concerned, when they seek a leader, they seek not to know what his religious proclivities are; they only look for a man whose political policy they approve of, and in whom they have faith and confidence. The time has not long gone by when the great Liberal party, bereft for a time of one of its leaders, was called upon to choose another. The presence of my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Laurier) is the best proof that could be given to the country that the Liberal party is not animated by passion or prejudice, but proceeds on those broad political lines which alone can ensure welfare to the commonwealth. I would like to know—not from mere curiosity, but from a higher motive—whether the Minister of Justice was forced to deline the high and responsible honour with which he was entrusted by His Excellency. I had placed in my hands to-night a newspaper which I read at the time it was published, and which is said to be published under the auspices and to be the organ of one of the members for the County of St. John, N.B. We heard to-night from the Minister of Marine, in his ringing tones, statements in reference to the union which prevails in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. We heard that there was nothing in their ranks but loyalty to their chief, nothing but union, nothing but a desire to march forward shoulder to shoulder, with but one object, and that object the good of the country. Let me read the remarks of the organ of the member for St. John County, which were published at that critical moment in the history of Canada when the Minister of Justice was sent for to form a Cabinet. Was his position objected to on the ground of his want of experience? Was it objected to on the ground of his want of talent? Was it objected to on the ground of his want of tact? No, Sir; but that the House may be assured that I am not perverting the sense of the argument, I will read the words published in the St. John Gazette of 11th June:

"The situation might as well be fully understood now. The Protestant Conservatives of Canada will follow Sir Hector Langevin or any other Roman Catholic who may be selected to lead the party, provided that he was born in that communion, but they will not follow a man whose mind is of that cast, that after he has reached years of discretion, he abandoned Protestantism and joined the Roman Catholic Church."

These are the sentiments emanating from a newspaper said to be controlled by a gentleman sitting behind the Minister of Justice; and yet you tell me that party is united! I thank God that, on this side of the House, I have never yet discovered any such contemptible sentiment as that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that cheering from the other side to be taken as an approval of the sentiments, the expression of which I have just read? If so, I challenge any hon. gentleman there to rise in his place and assert it. I observe that the Minister of Customs is a little restless. I hope he does not share these odious sentiments which I have read from that paper, which is said to be controlled by the member for St. John County.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not desire to be disorderly, or to violate the Rules of the House by mentioning the names of the hon. members. I have twice referred to the member for the County of St. John, N.B. One word more. I say that the hon. gentleman should have taken the House into his confidence a step further, and that, when he says he was sent for, not, as the official statement says, to be consulted as to the steps to be taken to form the Ministry, but for himself to form a Government, he ought to have stated to the House why he found himself unable to accomplish the task confided to him, and if he did so he would do a great deal to bring about a true union of those who have the interests of this country at heart, although he might exclude a few fanatics. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries was very jubilant as to the present position of affairs, and he was ready to prove by a quotation from an organ of the Liberal party, and an able one too, that the present Ministry was approved of by the Opposition press. But what did it amount to? It amounted to what we all admit, that Mr. Abbott had ability, that he had tact, and that he had experience. Who denies that? That proves nothing more than we all admit and know, for no one could have sat in this House, as I have had the honour of doing, with the present leader of the Government, as well as in the Banking and Commerce Committee, without knowing that he had very great ability, and very great tact and experience. But what did the paragraph go on to say? After stating that Mr. Abbott is a gentleman of ability, experience and tact, it goes on:

"The exercise of which might have enabled him to check for a time the discordant elements now plainly perceptible in the ranks of the Tories."

That is what we all claim. We acknowledge his ability, his tact and his experience, and that ability, tact and experience, combined with the love of office which animates some, though of course not many, on the other side of the House, may postpone the disintegration for a few months, and that has been the talk around the corridors of the House, and the talk all over the Dominion, for some time. Sir, that was the charge made from this side of the House, not that the new leader of the Government lacked any of these qualities, not that he did not possess the kind of qualities which go to make up a successful leader, but that his position for the last eight or ten years as the leading spirit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, ought to have been sufficient to prevent him from assuming the position of Premier of Canada. There is no sensible and thinking man on either side of this House but knows, and in his calmer moments will acknowledge, that one of the evils and one of the dangers in the near future with which this country has to grapple, is the over-shadowing importance and power of the great corporations which are growing up around us. We know that, Sir; we feel it; it is acknowledged by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House; and now at this time above all others, when the Canadian Pacific Railway soars over this country and has it almost, I may say, in its grasp, to take from it one of its leading directors, the inspiring spirit which has advised and directed the action of that great corporation for years back, a director receiving large pay—the man who, above all, after the Vice-President Van Horne, was the incarnation of that company—to take him from the company and make him the leader of the Government, is a step, I submit, fraught with possible danger to this great commonwealth. That is the utmost that my hon. friend went, and that is the position which I reassert. But, says the hon. Minister, he has sold his shares. Supposing that he has. Nobody who knows Senator Abbott would doubt that he would assume, nobody who knows the Minister of Justice would doubt for a moment that he would permit him to assume, the Premiership while he held on to the shares. The thing would be too flagrant a violation of every rule of decency. What I want to ask is this: Has the sale of the shares divested him of that bias—an unconscious bias, if you will—which necessarily must be present in his mind, from the long and consistent relations he had with that corporation? I say it cannot. I remember well, some years ago, being engaged in a very important trial, and the counsel for the defendant objected to the judge trying it because he held shares in the corporation that was the defendant. The judge rose from the bench and said: I will soon dispose of that matter, I will sell my shares out; and he sold them out. The counsel for the defence asked him: Does your lordship imagine that because you have sold the few paltry shares you had in that corporation, that you have divested your mind of that unconscious bias which is there, and which prevents you from trying this case as a disinterested judge? And there was not a man in the court house but acknowledged that the question required no answer, for it answered itself. The Premier cannot divest himself, by selling his shares, of that bias acquired by the experience of eight or ten years, during which that close connection existed between him and that great corporation. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to pause and reflect. We know that at this very session—and as it is whispered about the corridors, owing to negotiations which were carried on before the late elections beween the Postmaster General and the Canadian Pacific Railway—it is said that this House will be called upon to vote large sums of public money to that corporation; and I ask hon. members, I care not on which side of the House they are, whether they think that a gentleman who was a director of the corporation at that time, acting in the interest of the company at that time, is now fit to propose to this House and to Parliament to vote a sum of money to that corporation of which he was a director at the time he became Premier. Sir, the thing is preposterous, and will not bear investigation for a moment. But I was more surprised in this debate than at anything else, at the silence concerning the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Public Works, whose claims to the position of the leader of the Government have been advanced very strongly by the press in his own province and out of it. Sir, he was here; and if he chose to submit to that indignity it was not for us to complain. But I wondered that the great lieutenant of the party, the man who has led them to victory on at least two occasions—it is true at an awful cost to the country—the man who twice has been telegraphed for and brought back from Europe to save this party from disintegration and destruction—I wondered that not a word, so far, has been heard on his behalf. I have not heard his name mentioned in the debate at all. "Yesterday he might have stood against the world, now none so poor as to do him reverence." Where is the High Commissioner? Where is the man that I am told the Maritime Provinces members, with but one exception, wished to become Premier? We have no detailed account of the steps which were taken—I do not mean to say by His Excellency, but by the party themselves, or by the gentlemen entrusted with the formation of a Ministry—to introduce the High Commissioner's name to His Excellency. Is it true that the revelations made in the debate which I am not at liberty to refer to, and which took place in this House a short time ago, had any effect in preventing that hon. gentleman from taking the position—a position, Sir, which we know he had a right to expect? Why, Sir, who was it that dragged the Tory party out of the mire in 1878? Who was it that for his efforts on that occasion was promised the reversion of the Premiership? Who was it that was silenced for the time being by the High Commissionership, and who it was understood should come back and take charge of the party when the old chieftain left? Now, Sir, he is treated with contumely and despised. Sir, I do not want to hear what the members of the Government think about this, but I want to hear what the rank and file think. We have not heard from them yet. We have not heard any of those hon. gentlemen who support the Government come forward and say they are thoroughly satisfied with the existing state of the Cabinet. Sir, it would be very satisfactory if we could find out their real feelings. I watched with some curiosity to see which of them were satisfied, at the period of the debate, before it was authoritatively announced that this was not a temporary arrangement but a permanent Government. There were those, I acknowledge, who were, perhaps, temporarily satisfied that that temporary arrangement should continue, but when it was announced by the hon. Minister of Justice that no agreement of any kind had been come to to decapitate the heads of even the smallest member of the Cabinet, and I thought, Sir, that I could see some very long faces drawn by hon. gentlemen who aspire to seats in the Cabinet. Why, Sir, there was the hon. member whose name has been so frequently mentioned, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). I do not know that he is going to take the floor to-night and tell us that he is thoroughly satisfied with the present state of affairs, now that the Government is announced to be not a temporary construction but a permanent one. Why, Sir, even the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), who aspires, and properly aspires—he has a right, I frankly say it, to aspire to a leading place in the Government—I do not know whether that hon. gentleman will rise in his place and express the same feelings as those which animate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope he will express his satisfaction with that particular phase of the speech of the Minister of Justice which tells him that this arrangement is permanent, and that none of the minor Ministers are to be decapitated. I shall be well pleased if he does so. Why, Sir, at an early stage of this debate, I noticed that the hon. and learned gentleman who sits for the nonce on this side of the House, because there does not happen to be an empty seat on the other side, crossed over and took the seat which he supposed to be his rightful place alongside the Minister of Justice, whence he beamed with complacency on this side of the House. He stood in the line of the Ministers. I was curious to know the effect upon him of this announcement from the Minister of Justice, and I watched the hon. gentleman leave his place and range himself on a bench beside the Minister of Customs. He felt the time had come. He had a right to aspire—I do not say it at all in joke—he had a perfect right. What man knows the North-West so well? What man is able so eloquently to expound the grievances of the settlers, or to press for the amelioration of their wrongs, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)? I wonder if he is satisfied. I do not think he is. Sir, he told us last Session that this Cabinet of antiques should be dissolved; I do not think they have grown any younger since then. And what about the proposed new Minister of Agriculture who sits in the front row, and whose place is vacant just now? He (Mr. Sproule) is at this moment sitting in the seat of the Minister of Customs. No doubt he has long deferred claims, and, as it is hope deferred that maketh the heart sick, are these hopes to be deferred still longer? Is the hon. gentleman to have no chance of sitting in that seat, when he could discharge the duties of the Minister so ably and effectively and ask for large appropriations? There is no end to their number and claims. And above all there is my genial friend from Toronto. I have heard it said, and I do not wonder at it, that the hon. gentleman affects to be an authority in matters of finance. I have learned from listening to his speeches that he has a knowledge of that abstruse subject, and it is said he too feels as it is felt by the vast majority of the citizens of Toronto that they are not represented in the Cabinet. Is he prepared to rise and express the sentiments of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that every one is satisfied, everything is serene, and that the present Administration, as now constituted, will go on satisfactorily? It will be most interesting to hear the declarations that will fall from those learned and hon. gentlemen, and as I do not desire to weary the House or deprive it of the eloquence now in store from these hon. gentlemen, I will now resume my seat.

Mr. COCKBURN. I request my hon. friend, who has challenged me to speak, to give me his attention while I try to remind him of some points with which he is at present apparently unacquainted. I must say that when the eloquent leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition rose to make his motion amid all the panoply and circumstance of parliamentary warfare, I did expect, before he finished, some grand discovery would have been made and given to the House which would have ended in the annihilation of the great Conservative party. When he was followed by the gallant knight from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and by my philosophical friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I must say the fears I had at first entertained gradually dwindled down to something like a sense of growing satisfaction, and before my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) had resumed his seat they became almost a sense of gratitude. For what was the accusation which these gentlemen were bringing against the great Conservative party? It was simply this: that we had selected a gentleman who, on their own confession, was without his peer in this House, as the leader of that party. I will not appeal to my hon. friends on this side of the House as to the character of the hon. gentleman who now leads the Conservative party. I read his character and obtain it from the mouths and speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) assured us that when all was dark and gloomy, when blue ruin seemed to be hanging over the country, when the prophecies indulged in by gentlemen opposite seemed to be in the act of being realized, when all had lost hope, when all who had promoted that great enterprise, the Canadian Pacific Railway, were in the deepest despair, there was found the one man able to shoulder the responsibilities, who became their pilot and led them into a haven of rest; and that is the man we have asked to lead us in the great struggle for constitutional liberty and the upholding of those principles which our dear departed leader impressed on us. This is the man we have chosen for the task. But it is not sufficient to know that he is a man of the transcendent ability such as hon. gentlemen opposite have described him to be. He may have all those talents and abilities and experience, but the great Conservative party demand that their leader shall not only be an eloquent and able man, but also an upright and honest man. I have heard this afternoon, for the first time during the five years I have sat in this House, a glowing tribute of praise wrung from the unwilling lips of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). As the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said he had broken the record for once, and it was only because of the peculiar circumstances existing that this unwilling praise fell from his lips, and he told us there was no more honourable man, no man of higher aspirations and character than the present First Minister. I ask, in the name of common sense, if we, the great Conservative party, have been able to obtain as our leader a man who by their own confession has the highest talents, who overtopped the leaders of that great enterprise, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and was the only man who was able to guide them, a man who is also of the highest moral and irreproachable character, are we to be blamed for placing such a man at our head as leader of the party? Or, do hon. gentlemen opposite say that we should have appointed a man who did not possess those high qualities? It cannot be so; because, I see in their own leader a man whom I respect from the bottom of my heart, a man who is also without reproach, and I can therefore judge what the ideal of hon. gentlemen opposite must be as to what a leader should be. But, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of the fact that they possess in their own leader a man of irreproachable character, to be consistent enough, at least not to be so uncharitable as not to be able to imagine that we cannot have the same aspirations and the same high ideals to guide us. We have been asked: What does Ontario say about this Administration? and we have been taunted in this regard. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said that the Maritime Provinces were a clear first, that Quebec was an easy second, but that Ontario was nowhere in the new Cabinet. He little knows Ontario if he thinks Ontario in any case can be nowhere. Ontario is fully conscious of its position. It knows that it pays more than half of every dollar contributed to the general fund.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. COCKBURN. Yes, I say. I say also that the district of Toronto, from which I come, contributes towards the inland revenue more than the whole of the Maritime Provinces, British Columbia and Manitoba combined. But in regard to the question as to who should guide the destinies of the country, we are not mere sectionalists. We do not consider this country is a mere federal union, but we regard it as a great Confederation, as a great Dominion, and so long as we find talent, industry, ability, integrity and honesty all combined in our hon. leader, we care not from what part of the Dominion he may come. These are our principles, and it would be well for the Opposition, if, instead of seeking to promote disunion and set province against province, they would follow the example and action of the great Conservative party, and try to realize that our conception is what their conception ought to be, a vast Dominion united and allied to the mother country, looking affectionately to the mother country as the source from which we sprang, and determined, if possible, to rivet more closely the bonds that bind us together, and to give no preference to any foreign country. We have been told that the election of Mr. Abbott as leader of the Conservative party was followed at once by the enhancement of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway; yet you have been shown here to-day that that enhancement had been only one per cent. Well, when we look at other stocks during that time, I find a much greater enhancement, and I am, therefore, entitled to come to the conclusion that, when Mr. Abbott was made Prime Minister of this country, it was felt on all hands that he would guide things so evenly that the Canadian Pacific Railway had no favours and nothing but bare justice to expect, and, accordingly, Canadian Pacific Railway stock went up only one per cent., while the other railway stocks, and the bank stocks, and the loan companies' stocks, appreciated to a much greater extent at the same time. If I am entitled to say that Mr. Abbott's election to the Premiership inspired such confidence in certain people that they were willing to pay one per cent. more for the Canadian Pacific Railway stock, what am I to say of the thousands of persons who were ready to pay 4 or 5 per cent. more for other stocks? Surely, I have a right to draw the conclusion, that such was the universal confidence in the ability, integrity and uprightness of this man, that the stocks of the different financial concerns of the Dominion appreciated by several millions of dollars. The hon. leader of the Opposition has referred at some length to the historical fact that the Empire of Alexander became disintegrated, owing to the quarrels of his four great generals who each claimed part of the mighty Empire he bequeathed at his death. But I read the moral in this way: That if there were four able and heroic generals who were unable to control their passions, and so broke up the mighty Empire of Alexander, then the leaders of the great Conservative party of Canada showed a wiser discretion, inasmuch as, instead of like Alexander's generals each claiming his part of the empire, they united together in choosing one who can hold their empire together and who will hold that empire intact as long as he remains the leader of the Conservative party. As to the newspaper rumours which have been referred to, I do not consider that it is the duty of this House, nor is it consistent with the dignity of Parliament or of Cabinet Ministers to pay heed to every rumour which may have been circulated, for all we know, by the Opposition themselves. It is difficult to understand what is the object of the motion which has been made this evening, but, as far as I can see, it was made with a view of spreading disintegration in the ranks of the Conservative party. If that was the intention its promoters must be sadly disappointed; for what has been the effect? It has called my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to his feet to explain to us the circumstances under which he acted. Knowing that hon. gentleman as we do, and loving him as we do, we were not surprised to learn the sacrifices which he made in what he considered to be the best interests of the party. It brought to his feet the able Minister of Public Works to explain his satisfaction with everything that had been done; and as my friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has alluded to Sir Charles Tupper, it brought to his feet that hon. gentleman's talented son who showed us at any rate that, so far as his father was concerned, his friends were perfectly satisfied with the present Premier. The only taunt left for hon. gentlemen on the other side was to ask: What does Ontario think of this? We have now heard the explanations from the Ministers, and I can tell the House that so long as the affairs of the country are well and carefully managed, consistently with the lines of the National Policy, and with that integrity and uprightness which has characterised the actions of the great Conservative party, so long will Ontario be content, and if at any time it is necessary for Ontario to rise in its might and to assert its rights you may rest assured that it is fully prepared and fully able to do so.

Mr. EDGAR. After the very direct challenge which was made by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) to the member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn), I thought that hon. gentleman would not have forgotten while he was on his feet to have given expression to his personal satisfaction with the present constitution of the Cabinet. But the hon. gentleman forgot all about that; he told us a great deal about Ontario being satisfied, and about Toronto being satisfied, but he did not say that the member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) was satisfied; and how could he be? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman almost made my blood boil as a citizen of Toronto, and as a constituent of his own, when he pointed out to this House the vast extent of the material resources and the wealth of the Queen City of the West, which, he says, paid more to the inland revenue of this country than all the Maritime, and North-West, and Pacific Provinces put together. Well, Sir, what could he have thought of the intellectual character of the people of Toronto, or at least the Conservative portion of them, if they were to be satisfied with the present constitution of the Cabinet? He talked about Ontario being satisfied; has he ever made the calculation that in the present Cabinet there is not a single elected representative of the Province of Ontario, west of Belleville, and that there are not less than sixty-eight members in this House of Commons representing constituencies in Ontario west of Belleville who have not one single representative in that Cabinet. There are more members sitting in this House from that central and western portion of Ontario than there are from the entire Province of Quebec, and yet they have no representative in the Cabinet. As a matter of fact at the last election there was only one Minister of the Crown who presented himself for election in a constituency west of Belleville, and that Minister was defeated. I wonder that my friend from Toronto is satisfied with Ontario's position. One would suppose from the self-congratulatory speeches that we have heard from the Government to-day that they had just returned as a triumphant Administration fresh from an appeal to the people. Why, Sir, is that the Cabinet that appealed to the people in March and which snatched a very doubtful victory at the polls? I say it was a very doubtful victory indeed, when the Administration, with all the power they had at their back and all the advantages in their favour, had to return to this Parliament in a distinct minority from the old Provinces of Canada. However, such as their victory was it was not won by this Administration. Was it Mr. Abbott who led that Government in March? Was it the Minister of Justice who led it? Was it the Minister of Finance? Why, the Minister of Finance does not know to-day, and he will not know until the election trial comes off, whether he was elected himself or not. Was it the Minister of Customs who gained the victory for the Government; a Minister whose majorities used to be in the thousands and which were at the last election down very low, indeed, in the hundreds? It certainly was not the Minister of Agriculture, the late member for London, who has not a seat in the House at at all now. There is no use disguising the fact, for we know it, and the country knows it, and the Ministers know it themselves, that what carried the last election was the name, and the prestige, and the power of their great leader who is gone. Now, Sir, the strength of the Cabinet that is left has had nothing added to it, and if to-day we want to find out what that strength is, it is not a sum in addition but a sum in subtraction which we must do. To find out their strength you have first to take from them the strength of Sir John Macdonald. That is a very large deduction to make, and what is left is the remnant of his cabinet such as it is. That the old Cabinet that went to the country was a complicated structure I admit, but it was bound together and supported by one great central beam; all the other members of the Cabinet leaned upon that. That beam has been taken away, and what has been put in its place? Absolutely nothing: not a single piece of new timber in the whole structure —not even a change in office. They are there, a remnant of the Cabinet that went to the country. As a Cabinet they are certainly no stronger; they are weaker. The only change is a rearrangement of one office. A gentleman who was leading in the Upper House is leading in the Upper House still; and he has taken an office in the Cabinet that was lost in the election. This is all the change that has been made. Looking at the Cabinet as a whole, it is no stronger. Looking at it in detail, it is a very marvellous structure. There is the hon. Minister of Public Works; he does not seem to hear me, for he is taking a little rest, as one of his colleagues, I believe, recommended that he should. The Minister of Public Works had, I admit, very strong claims, some of which he himself put before the House to-day, to the succession. He said some newspapers and friends had recommended a certain party for the position of First Minister, and he modestly refrained from telling us that that party was the Minister of Public Works. But he said that the party, however much he might feel his claims entitled to consideration, did not press them just now. Well, the hon. Minister of Public Works is the senior member of the Cabinet, the senior Privy Councillor, and he had great claims in that respect. He is also the successor of Sir George Cartier in the Province of Quebec, as he has often claimed to be; he is the leader of his race at any rate on the Conservative side of the House, and as such his claims were very strong. Then, if we look at his claims as an efficient departmental officer, just see how strong they are. He has been industrious—everybody will admit that; he has conducted the affairs of his department with very close attention. If anything has gone wrong there, he has known all about it. There were no tenders called for that he did not know all the particulars of; there were no contracts let that he was not perfectly familiar with; there were no extras allowed in any contracts that he did not scrutinize to the bottom; there were no changes made in contracts without his knowledge and consent. We will give him credit for that; everybody should. Then look at the great public works with which he has connected his name. Look at the great graving dock at Levis: his name is intimately associated with that great work. Then there are those extensive works in connection with the Quebec harbour with which his name is proudly associated; and in Ottawa we have the departmental block, which is called the Langevin block in his honour. Away off in British Columbia we have the Esquimalt graving dock, a very entensive work, for which the hon. gentleman no doubt takes a great deal of credit, as he knows all about it from beginning to end. There is also the Kingston dock, of which we have not heard much yet, but no doubt will hear more by-and-bye. There is another claim of his which I was forgetting. Some years ago, some of the leading members of his party, those contractors and others who came into most intimate relations with him in his department, subscribed to a testimonial fund to show their great appreciation of him as a Conservative leader; and why should that event be ignored on this occasion? Then, we know that he has taken an active part in legislation in this House in support of the Conservative party. I remember, when my hon. friend from L'Islet who formerly sat in front of me introduced session after session his Bill to prevent contractors contributing to election funds, the hon. Minister of Public Works consistently and patriotically opposed it on every occasion. Yet, Sir, in spite of all these efforts, which should have satisfied his party if anything could, we have lately seen it suggested by a colleague from his own province who knows him well that he would be better of a little rest. That is all the thanks he gets; and I think he will probably take the hint and take a rest before very long. Then, there is the hon. Minister of Customs; he is a senior in the Cabinet too. He fought in the days of the old guard on this side of the House; he has been fighting more or less ever since; and will anybody in this country deny that he has tremendously popularised the Department of Customs in this country? Does not everybody know that it is one of the most popular departments in the Government? Do we not know that he displeases nobody and pleases everybody who comes into communication with his department? I believe the importers are so fond of the playful ways of the Minister that they like it, as the eels are said, from habit, to quite like getting skinned. But there is this against the hon. Minister, we all know that he came into the Government as a specialist; he came in there as a famous rider of the Protestant horse. Well, some of his friends and dear brethren who sit behind him say, I believe, that his seat is getting a little unsteady on that horse, and that he should get off and let somebody else ride it; and so perhaps he will be asked to take a little rest too. I do not see the hon. Minister of the Interior in his seat; but I believe it is generally understood in this House that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) if very urgently pressed, might be persuaded to take that portfolio; and even the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), is evidently in training, and has very strong backing for the office. The hon. Minister of the Interior came here from Regina, where he had been exercising gubernatorial functions, and, they say, and I dare say it may be so, that we shall see him proceeding to take charge of Carey Castle in Victoria, as Governor of British Columbia between now and next session, so that he will probably be taking a rest too. Then there is the Postmaster General, who, I believe, considers himself a fair representative of the Ontario Conservatives, and I believe he is about right. I believe he will hang on to the mail bags until he is turned out. They say, however, that he requires rest, but as far as I have observed he takes a good deal of it where he is. I am sorry the Secretary of State is not here. He, I believe, has a lame leg from a recent political kick, in which he indulged. They say that when a boy he was trained in a football team, which accounts for his being so brilliant a kicker. We have not had any attempt, which is of record at any date, to rival his recent performances in that line, except a few years ago, when one of the members for Ottawa was running for the County of Russell, where, for a five dollar bill, he had a kicking match with Mrs. Macdonell.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. EDGAR. The older members of the House will quite understand my allusion without any explanation. They do say the Secretary of State requires a short rest, and then, when his leg is better, he will kick harder than ever. I do not know whether that is true. Some of his team say he kicks foul; but I believe, on the other hand, his friends say that is the only way he can get promotion on the team. The Minister of Marine, I must say, has one great advantage over the rest of his colleagues. He looks more innocent than all the rest put together, and I only hope he is half as innocent as he looks. I do not think he is going to retire for anybody unless perhaps for the High Commissioner, and then, no doubt, he would naturally take the vacant position in London, so that no good thing would go out of the family. Now, the Minister of Finance came into this House, very much like the Minister of Customs, as a specialist, and he came into the Cabinet as a specialist, but the nag he rode was the temperance nag. From what I have heard lately, he has put that nag out to grass somewhere in North Lanark. Now, it is rather a slow beast, but still not to be despised. The Minister of Finance is out of practice in riding that animal, and moreover, I understand, he has lately been looking very carefully into the figures, and he finds it would cost altogether too much to feed it on rye and malt. It would ruin the revenue of the country if we fed it on rye and malt, so he is going to let it stay out at grass awhile longer. Perhaps he will be dropped, to make room for another specialist, one of these days in his particular line. Another ornament of the Cabinet is also from New Brunswick, my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue. Everybody will admit that he is probably the most unassuming statesman in this House. He hides his light habitually under a bushel. We scarcely know what is in him, but I think an opportunity will come before long. I believe that in his department, while he has been doing a good deal in the direction of making a careful inspection of whiskey, he has altogether ignored the inspection of ale and beer. But no wonder; he has been very much handicapped by having in the same Cabinet the Minister of Agriculture, and when the Minister of Agriculture leaves the Cabinet, as he is expected to do shortly, the Minister of Inland Revenue will have the opportunity, which I hope he will take advantage of, of bringing in legislation for a more complete inspection of bottled ale, beer and porter. The enemies of the Minister of Inland Revenue say that he was "born tired," but whether he was or not, like the Postmaster General, he takes his rest as he goes along. Now, the Minister of Agriculture—I am giving the House with perfect freedom very briefly my opinion of the strength in detail of this Cabinet—the Minister of Agriculture has been raised to the peerage by the electors of London. They say he is waiting calmly for the Ontario governorship, and I have no doubt that he will make a very efficient Governor, and be able to discharge all the duties required of him in that position, and, besides, the Minister of Inland Revenue will then have a fine opportunity to look into the manufacture of ale and beer. Then there is the Minister of War. In Gilbert & Sullivan's opera of H. M's. S. "Pinafore," we know that the attorney's clerk rose, by his industry and thrift, to be the ruler of the Queen's Navee. In like manner, my hon. friend from the solicitor's office has risen, through his own exertions and brilliancy, to be commander in chief of all the land forces, fortresses, and munitions of war of Canada. His appearance, we know, is warlike; and if he had ever been to the front, I believe he would have killed somebody. However, like all great soldiers in time of peace, when they have given up slaughtering men, he becomes a lady killer. I have no doubt he will retreat in good order some of these days upon Spencer Wood, and fill the bill there as Lieutenant Governor, to his own satisfaction and that of the people of the city of Quebec. We have heard a good deal to-day of Mr. Abbott. All I have to say about him is this: that I do not think it is right he should, as leader of the Government, hold his seat in the other House. It has been pointed out, I know, that Lord Salisbury, to-day the First Minister of England, holds his seat in the House of Lords, but the case is vastly different there. Do you think, Sir, that public opinion in England would allow Lord Salisbury, or anyone in the House of Lords, to be Premier of England, if seven-eighths of that House of Lords had been nominated to their positions by himself or his political friends? No, Sir; the case is entirely different. Constitutionally, of course, he has the right to be there, but I say that the First Minister of Canada should not shield himself from the criticism of the representatives of the people behind the breast-work of his own nominees. Mr. Abbott, I fancy, thought it would be a very easy thing to take up the remnants of the old Cabinet and put them together again. It was the same old lock, stock and barrel. But, Mr. Speaker, he did not know it was loaded. In fact, he found, I believe, that it was Chapleauded. And, Sir, worse than all, it went off, and it wounded perhaps fatally the Minister of Public Works, and it very badly scared the Minister of Militia. Now we have the Minister of Justice. I must admit that he is the brains of the combination. I believe that the Minister of Justice will shape the policy of that combination, and I say that, that being the case, the Minister of Justice should have assumed the responsibility for that policy which he knows, and they all know, he will shape for them. Perhaps it was the stupid wing of his party that prevented his assuming that responsibility. All I can say is that he will have his revenge on that stupid wing before he gets through with them, and he knows it. He will dominate them as Disraeli dominated the country squires in England without their knowing it. I congratulate the Minister of Justice on his followers and I congratulate them on their master. On the whole, I do not think any such combination as I have hastily sketched can change my politics or make me vote for the new Ministry.

Mr. HAZEN. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the address which the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) delivered a short time ago. I always listen with pleasure to any of the utterances of that hon. gentleman, because he always speaks most eloquently and vigorously, and, in addition to those excellent qualities, the hon. gentleman possesses what is perhaps a still greater qualification for a debater, and that is a most vivid imagination. I understand that the hon. gentleman has been always vigorous in debate, no matter whether the subject at issue were great or small, important or unimportant. I believe, the same vigour has always characterized the speeches of the hon. gentleman, but, during the present session, as I am informed, the hon. gentleman has been outdoing himself in the vigour of his remarks, and no doubt that is due to the fact that his position in the present House is different to that which he held in the last Parliament. We know that for some years previously there was some question between the members representing the Maritime Provinces as to who was their leader. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) aspired to that position, but he was not allowed to take it unchallenged. There was another hon. member who is not now in the House, who then represented the County of Halifax, who claimed that he was the leader of the Liberals from the Maritime Provinces. There was also my predecessor from the City and County of St. John who also was understood to have some claim to the position The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has now come back as the undisputed leader of the Liberal party of the Maritime Provinces, depleted, decimated, thinned and reduced as their ranks have been in the election which took place in March last. Therefore it is, that the hon. gentleman has thrown into his remarks this session a vigour far greater than he did before. But he must not rest too secure in his ability to retain the leadership of that party, for, judging from the eloquent speeches which have been made since the session commenced by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), I think he may possibly dispute the title of leader with the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I would give the hon. gentleman this advice, that, when he and his followers undertake to make the same quotation from Shakespeare in reference to Sir Charles Tupper, they should compare notes beforehand, and should be satisfied as to what the quotation really is. They seemed to differ in regard to that quotation. The hon. member from Guysborough quoted as follows :—

"Sir Charles Tupper might have stood against the world, now lies he there and none so vain as do him homage."

The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) tonight thought that was an admirable quotation, and so rising to the heights of the dramatic art, with his eloquence and his magnificent manner, he said :

"But yesterday the word of Sir Charles Tupper stood against the world : now lies he there, and none so poor as do him reverence."

I would suggest to these gentlemen that, before quoting Shakespeare in regard to Sir Charles Tupper—and it is wonderful how they love to abuse Sir Charles Tupper on every occasion, though nothing in regard to him is before the House—they should compare notes. If they cannot find any copy of Shakespeare in the library, where there are many, they might get out a new edition of their own, which would no doubt be of great advantage in the literary education of the people and a valuable book of reference. On Thursday last, when the leader of the Liberal party, with that graceful eloquence of which he is a master, after the leader of the House had stated the policy of the Government, said there was a departure in one important particular from the policy of Sir John Macdonald and that he would show what that departure was on the following day, I almost felt that the prophecies which have been made in the press for thirteen years were about to be fulfilled, that the Government was tottering to its fall, and that the Opposition were going to sweep down on the Liberal-Conservative fold and rout us as completely as Sennacherib's army were annihilated and routed in years gone by. I thought that, perhaps, when that attack was made, the Liberal-Conservatives would have to "fold their tents like the Arabs and silently flit away" to the seats at your left.

Some hon. MEMBERS. "Steal away." Quote correctly.

Mr. HAZEN. But, when the hon. gentleman rose to-day, and when I thought we would hear that the Government had violated some great constitutional principle, that they had made some great departure from the policy laid down by the grand old chieftain whose memory will live forever in the minds of a thankful people, who was loved by the great mass of Canadians, and in regard to whom the words of Horace might be used :

"I have erected a monument more lasting than brass and more enduring than the lofty elevation of the pyramids. I shall not all die, but a great part of me will escape the goddess who presides over funerals——"

I began to think the party had made a great departure from the policy of the great old chieftain who had led us to victory time and time again. I thought it might be, at first, that the ground of attack would be that it was not proper or constitutional that the Premier should have a seat in the Senate, but when I remembered that in Great Britain the Premier of Her Majesty's Government sits in the House of Lords, I came to the conclusion that no constitutional objection could be raised on that line. I then thought there must be some other ground. Judge of my surprise, when I found that the great violation of the constitution consisted in the fact that Mr. Abbott had been a director and had been engaged and interested in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Now, while I would not for a single instant charge an hon. gentleman for whom I have such high respect as I have for the leader of the Opposition, with being insincere, it seems to me that when he made that a ground of attack against the Government and against the Premier, he could not have well considered the course that he was taking. Why, Sir, does he mean to lay down as a principle that no man is to be taken into the Administration, no matter how eligible he may be for the position, if he is connected with any public work that has for its object the advancement and the consolidation of the Dominion of Canada? Because that is practically what it amounts to. The hon. gentleman, it seems to me, should have reflected upon the harm such a course was likely to inflict upon his own party. Do hon. gentlemen opposite mean to say that a gentleman who is interested in the Canadian Pacific Railway has no right to a seat in the Government of this country, has no right to be the leader of a great party in this country? If they say so, then they must go to the Senate and remove from that body the leader of the Liberal party in the Senate, who is a paid official of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, I think if you will look into the records of Lord Salisbury, you will find that he to-day is a director in the University Life Insurance Company, one of the largest life insurance companies of Great Britain. More than that, it is fresh in the memory of all present that a gentleman who occupied a very distinguished position for years in the Liberal party of this country, and a gentleman whom the Liberals were at one time so anxious to make their leader, that, with undue haste, they deposed from that position the hon. gentleman who had led them in power and in opposition, in order that they might put their new leader in his place—we cannot forget that this gentleman whom they twice put forward as leader of their party, and whom they are fond of calling one of the leading statesmen of this continent, accepted from the Canadian Pacific Railway the largest retainer that has ever been received by any professional man in Canada. I say that these facts shows the insincerity of the hon. gentlemen opposite in objecting to Mr. Abbott's former connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway as incapacitating him from becoming Premier of this country. The hon. gentleman has taken that course, for the simple reason that he could find no better ground of objection against the appointof the Hon. Mr. Abbott as Premier of the Dominion and leader of the Liberal-Conservative party. Now, Sir, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who addressed the House this afternoon spoke, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has pointed out, in a very amiable manner, and I think he is to be congratulated on his change of tone. The hon. gentleman spoke of Mr. Abbott as a man of great ability; and I may here remark that both the hon. member for South Oxford and the leader of the Opposition have been furnishing His Excellency with admirable reasons for having selected Mr. Abbott as leader of the Government. I say that a gentleman who occupied so conspicuous a position in the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, whom the leader of the Opposition said had been the head of that corporation, the adviser of that corporation and the thinker of that corporation—I say a man who had from his ability occupied that position and carried through to a successful issue the great Canadian Pacific Railway, which to-day is the admiration of the civilized world, is just the man, in point of ability and in point of energy, whom we wish to lead the Liberal-Conservative party of this country, the National party of the Dominion of Canada. But I was going on to say that although the member for South Oxford spoke in high terms of Mr. Abbott's ability and character, yet the ruling passion was so strong in the hon. gentleman that he could not take his seat without attempting, as he has been doing for years past, since 1878, to arouse sectional feeling in this country. The hon. gentleman did not refer this time to "shreds, and patches, and ragged remnants," as he did before, but he said that in this present combination the Maritime Provinces stood first, Quebec a close second, and Ontario was practically left out in the cold. Now, there was only one object the hon. gentleman could have in making that remark—he wished to create discontent in that great and progressive Province of Ontario, in the liberal-minded Province of Ontario, where, in a marked degree, the people enjoy the advantages of wealth and education, and have made great progress in political matters; he wished to convince the people of that province that they were being ruled by the minority down by the sea, and that they had but an insignificant place in the Government. Sir, I think it is deplorable that in this age, and in this country, hon. members should be so anxious to create the impression that one part of the Dominion is favoured at the expense of another. That is not the feeling that should prevail, if we are going to become one great homogeneous whole, united by the bond of sympathy, and united by the bond of national unity. On the contrary we ought to encourage the feeling that we are all equally Canadians, whether we live down by the sea, whether we live in Ontario, or whether we live on the prairies, or in British Columbia. The hon. gentleman, in making that remark, was true to his own instincts, to the instincts of a portion of his party, and when the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) followed in the same line, I could not help feeling regret that so great a wit, that a man who had such a wonderful fund of humour, should be wasting it on this House. It struck me that the hon. gentleman had better turn his talents to the publication of a comic almanac, and that such an occupation would be more advantageous to him than occupying a seat on the Opposition benches of this House. If the hon. gentleman had been sitting on this side of the House with his Liberal friends in power, he would, no doubt, have been in a more contented frame of mind, because we remember that in 1874, after his forced retirement from this House, he went on a mission to British Columbia for his Liberal friends who were then in power, for which he was paid a very handsome sum of money. The hon. gentleman from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) then went further, and he contended not only that the Dominion should be broken up into provinces, but that these provinces should be again subdivided, and he complained, forsooth, that Ontario had no representatives in the Cabinet west of the city of Belleville; that is a lofty and high-minded position for a statesman to take. Sir, it is absurd, it is utter nonsense, to talk about this part of a province or that part of a province, this part of the Dominion or that part of the Dominion, having no representation in the Cabinet. The main thing to consider is: Do the members of the Government deal out fair-play and even-handed justice to the different portions of the Dominion? If they do, I say advisedly that it makes no difference what part of the Dominion these men come from, so long as they show justice and fair-play to the different sections and provinces of the Dominion. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford in a portion of his remarks was very much astonished that the Liberal-Conservative party should have chosen as their leader a gentleman who, in 1849, had signed an annexation manifesto. I can readily understand the hon. gentleman would be shocked at anything which contained the word "annexation." Sir, we are not apt, in this country, to trouble ourselves about the views of men expressed 40 years ago. I am not going to trouble myself about views expressed by an hon. gentleman before I was born, and before many members of this House were born. All we want to consider is what his views are at the present moment. Are they such views now as we approve? Are they views that we think are right and proper? We know that the hon. gentleman has abandoned the views which he held in his youth, because, I think, he was only twenty-eight years of age when he signed that manifesto. He has expressed regret at having done so. We know that that hon. gentleman ever since has been a loyal citizen to Canada, he has been loyal to our British connection and to our mother country. That being the case I think the members of this House and the people of this country will think very little of what his views may have been some forty years ago. But it strikes me as a very peculiar thing that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) of all men in the House, because the leader of the Opposition did not allude to it, should have referred to this matter. I am more concerned, and I think this House will be more concerned, with some remarks made by the hon. member for South Oxford less than twelve months ago, in the city of Boston. This hon. gentleman who exhibits so much surprise because Mr. Abbott signed an annexation manifesto some forty years ago, went to Boston only a few months ago and made a speech. He said:

"A line drawn from the north-east corner of Maine to Sault Ste. Marie, or to Duluth, would pass full 200 miles north of Toronto and Montreal, and nearly double that distance north of the southern portion of Ontario—in other words, not only is a large part of Canada absolutely imbedded in the United States, but the shortest routes from important portions of your territory to other important and growing sections lie directly across ours."

What Boston would gain by reciprocity with Canada was told by Sir Richard Cartwright in the following sentence:—

"In one word, given free trade with Canada, and you are with one stride from the position, in some respects, of a frontier city, with no great extent of trade territory secured to you, to that of a central entrepot, with the practical monopoly of a great region behind you, whose commerce no man can take away from you."

In other words, he told the men of Boston that all they had to do was to get unrestricted reciprocity with Canada, and Boston would take away from the cities of the Maritime Province, Halifax and St. John, and from the cities of Ontario and Quebec, the business they are now enjoying, and Boston would become the great entrepot of the Dominion of Canada. This subject has been referred to before, but it can be referred to again, because it is one that should be referred to when an hon. gentleman finds fault with and criticizes us because we are following a man who nearly half a century ago, signed an annexation manifesto in the heat of temporary excitement. It was no wonder that having delivered that great oration in Boston the gentleman presiding at the banquet should arise and say that the easiest way to bring about the result was for the hon. gentleman to deliver that speech as the senator from the State of Ontario. Then there was an hon. gentleman named Erastus Wiman, who is intimately connected with the leaders of the Liberal party. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Attorney-General for Nova Scotia, a leading Liberal of that province, who was the man who led the secessionist movement and wished to bring about the disunion of Canada, went about the country together with him and delivered speeches. We all remember the Quebec conference, held at the instance of Mr. Mercier, where it was decided that the whole constitution was to be broken into atoms, and we were to be provided with a new constitution, where it was decided that the Province of Quebec and other provinces were to get a large sum from the Dominion treasury. At that conference, attended by the leaders of the Liberal Governments of all the provinces, it was considered that the gathering would not be complete unless Mr. Wiman went there and addressed the conference on the beauties of commercial union. Commercial union, as we all remember, was not very popular. It did not sound well, so it was re-christened under the name of unrestricted reciprocity. Then Mr. Wiman and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told the Province of Ontario and the Dominion at large what benefits would accrue to them, and Mr. Wiman hurried across the border and told the people of the United States what great benefits would accrue to them. I find that Mr. Wiman in a speech delivered in Newark, New Jersey, said:

"The total trade is about $200,000,000; two-thirds of it, it is supposed, can be secured by the United States by simply lifting up the line that now runs through the middle of the continent and stretching it around the continent. This would not only admit to more than half the continent all American manufactures, but it would create in their favour in one part of the British Empire a discrimination against the manufactures of another part of the British Empire. Can anything be more attractive to the average American protectionist than this advantage over the pauper labour of Europe?"

On the eve of the election we find Mr. Wiman, the author of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, going down to the State of Kentucky and declaring that the Liberal party had been twice defeated and that another defeat would be fatal to it and perpetuate in force a party whose policy was inimical to the United States. Therefore, said Mr. Wiman, it is of the utmost importance that every effort should be put forward to place the Liberal party in power at the approaching elections. While some hon. gentlemen might, with all honesty, criticize the course of the Liberal-Conservative party in following a gentleman who 40 years ago signed an annexation manifesto, yet it did not lie in the mouth of the hon. member for South Oxford to do so, and he was the last man in the House, considering his own public utterances and the company he kept in junketing around the United States, to throw that reproach upon the Liberal-Conservative party. Something has been said by several speakers concerning the Minister of Justice and his position at the present time, and I deeply regret that the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has seen fit, without having any proof to substantiate his charge, to utter a gross slander, such as he has hurled against this side of the House, and to go out of his way to stir up in this House, and this country, feelings of religious intolerance. He in eloquent terms intimated, and he might have said it in so many words, that the reason why the Minister of Justice was not leader of the Liberal-Conservative party to-day was because the Conservative party would not support him in consequence of his religious faith. Standing here as one of the members of the Conservative party, I desire to say with all sincerity, and I think I voice the sentiments of every member of the party in this House, that if the Minister of Justice had accepted the position of Premier of this country, which was offered him by the Governor General, and which his modesty prevented him accepting, I, in common with every Liberal-Conservative in this House, would have given him our hearty, our loyal, our best support. The Liberal-Conservative party is not a party run on religious lines. It is a party that believes in national greatness, it is a party that believes that every man has equal rights, it is a party which believes that a man may worship God as he pleases; and if the Minister of Justice had accepted the position of Premier, which he might have accepted—and I do not think there are hon. gentlemen opposite who aspire to be leaders of public opinion who, under any circumstances, would have declined such a position if sent for by the Governor General—we would have given him our hearty, loyal and undivided support. We would have been proud of him as a leader; we would have admired his great ability, his great parliamentary knowledge, his ability as a parliamentary tactician, and, above all, his spotless character and unblemished political and public reputation. So I wish to hurl back to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) the base insinuation, the base charge which he made against the Liberal-Conservative party, and I wish to tell him that it does not lie in his mouth, belonging as he does to the Liberal party, to rise in his seat and say with such vigour that there were no divisions in the Liberal party, that they were united and rallying round their leader; and I am free to say that if that hon. gentleman happened to be a Conservative, on our side we would not be ashamed to rally round him either. But it does not sound well in the mouth of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to say such a thing as that. I would not have referred to this matter to-night had not the hon. member tried to persuade this House that I and my colleagues in the representation of the city and county of St. John were responsible for an article published in a St. John newspaper. I will deal with that question in a moment, but I desire to say that the hon. member for Queen's is the last man who should make such a remark as that, sitting as he does in the front row of the Liberal benches, and if he casts his eyes to his left he will find sitting beside him a gentleman posing as one of the leaders of the Liberal party who, not very long ago, wrote with his own hand a letter, of which this is a copy:

"With a French Catholic leader, and under the manipulation of such machine politicians as J. D. Edgar et al, I have not the utmost confidence in the immediate future of the Reform party. Excuse my delay in writing you. I have been away from home, and very busy most of the time."

An hon. MEMBER. Who wrote that?

Mr. HAZEN. It is signed by "Yours very truly, John Charlton." I ask the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) if he thinks it was a statesman-like course, if he thinks it was a dignified course, or if he thinks it was a course warranted by the facts, that he should stand up in this House and make that charge directly generally against the whole Conservative party, but more directly against two of the members from the City and County of St. John. The hon. gentleman read an article from the Gazette newspaper of the city of St. John, and he asserted with all his vehemence that it was the organ of two of the members from the City and County of St. John, and the two members from that constituency are Mr. Skinner and myself. The member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) went further than that, for in addition to saying that it was the organ of the two members from the City and County of St. John he said that the paper was controlled by these two members. As far as I am concerned, and I think my colleagues will give me authority to speak for them in this matter, I wish to state most distinctly and emphatically, so that there can be no mistaking the meaning of my words, that that paper is not my organ and is not the organ of either of the hon. gentlemen who are associated with me in the representation of that constituency. I wish to say, further, that this paper is not controlled by me, nor is it controlled by any of my colleagues, and I further say that that journal is not indebted to us for one single dollar beyond my annual subscription, and perhaps a little advertising which we may give it from time to time. I think my colleagues will bear me out in this statement. Therefore, when the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) says that it was the organ of two of the members from the City and County of St. John, and that it was controlled by these members, he was stating what was not warranted by the facts, and if the hon. gentleman pursues the proper course he will rise in this House and apologize to us for the slanderous statement he has made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to accept the hon. gentleman's statement unreservedly. As far as he is concerned, I never intended to indicate that he had any connection, directly or indirectly, with the newspaper in question.

An hon. MEMBER. But you said it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will you be kind enough to hold your tongue for a moment? If the hon. gentleman's colleagues will make the same statement I will make the same unreserved statement on my part.

Mr. McLEOD. I may say that, for my part, I have not the slightest interest, either directly or indirectly, in the paper referred to by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HAZEN. I am pleased that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has taken this accusation back; but I think it is an improper thing for a gentleman who has a place in the front ranks of his party to base such a charge upon a newspaper article. I frankly admit that the newspaper to which he referred supported me most heartily during the last campaign and I highly valued its support; it supported the Liberal-Conservative party then, and it supports that party to-day; and if the hon. gentleman's mind is susceptible to any impression I would ask him to read the columns of the Daily Sun of St. John, another Liberal-Conservative paper, which he may with equal justice accept as the views of the members from that province. I may state also that the Sun supported me during the last election, but I have no interest whatever in that newspaper. On the 12th June, 1891, we find the following, published in the Sun:—

"One word may be said in these columns in respect to the report that Sir John Thompson is to be called, and to the allegation that, being a Roman Catholic, he is practically ineligible. There are many other elements in the problem which must be considered, but in respect to the objection mentioned this journal has only to reaffirm the position taken on previous occasions. No man, because he belongs to a particular church, should be placed in a position which of right belongs to another, and no man should, because of his religious belief, be excluded from a position to which he would be otherwise fully entitled. This sound doctrine applies as well to the Premiership of Canada as to any position of less eminence."

Now, Sir, if it was fair for the hon. gentleman to say that that article in the St. John Gazette represented my views and the views of the Liberal-Conservatives of that city it would be equally fair for him to say that the views of the St. John Sun also represented the opinions held by the Liberal-Con servatives of St. John and by their representatives in this House. I desire to say most emphatically that so far as the representatives from the city of St. John are concerned, no narrow feelings of bigotry influence us, and I may also say that no member from the Province of New Brunswick would allow his religious views to interfere with his duty to his party for one moment, so far as regards the leadership of our party is concerned. If I recollect the political history of Prince Edward Island aright it occurs to me that the hon. member from Queen's (Mr. Davies) is probably the last man in this House who should stand up and talk about religious bigotry in the formation of a Government. Let me say, Sir, that I believe that in discussing this question hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have not been sincere in putting forward as a reason that it was because of the connection of Mr. Abbott with the Canadian Pacific Railway that he should not be Premier. It appears to me that the object of the party was to spread throughout the country the views which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has expressed in this House. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that the Conservative party was not a happy party, and that it was a diversified party. I admit with the hon. gentleman that to a certain extent the Conservative party is diversified. It is not like the Liberal party to-day, whose representatives nearly all come from two provinces of the Dominion; it is not like the Liberal party, which has not a single representative from British Columbia, which has only one representative from the Nort-West and Manitoba, which has only a corporal's guard from the Province of New Brunswick, and a few followers from Nova Scotia and four from Prince Edward Island. The Liberal party to-day is a diversified party in the sense that it represents every section of the Dominion of Canada, and while there may be diversified interests in it, yet the party is bound together by the strongest possible link, it is bound together by devotion to the party, devotion to the country and devotion to the best interests of the land in which we live. The hon. gentleman has referred to the harmony that prevails among the hon. members who occupy the Opposition benches. If we listened to all the statements made in newspaper articles, as hon. gentlemen opposite do, we would be led to believe that the hon. member for South Oxford was not entirely acceptable to his party, and that they were demanding a change. I can only say on behalf of the Liberal-Conservative party that we trust that the time is far, far distant when the hon. member for South Oxford will cease to occupy the high position he holds to-day of first lieutenant in Her Majesty's loyal Opposition.

Mr. FRASER. I congratulate the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) on the admirable speech he has made on behalf of his party. Did his words represent the real state of affairs the Conservative party might well congratulate themselves on the happiness that exists among them; but when I saw the feigned eloquence by which he endeavoured to show that which does not exist I came to the conclusion that his speech was for the occasion, and did not proceed from his own conviction. He speaks about the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) raising the question respecting the hon. Minister of Justice. Now, who raised that question? The papers and the followers of the Conservative party. Who were the first to speak of it, and who will be the last to speak of it? Those very gentlemen. I believe the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) told the truth unwittingly when he spoke of the hon. Minister of Justice making a sacrifice in the interest of his party. That sacrifice was made at the instance of such papers as the St. John Gazette; and while the hon. member for Queen's was wrong in saying that that paper was controlled by two members, he was not so very far wrong, because it is controlled, in part at least, by one of the members. Therefore, all the assumed indignation of the hon. member for St. John is simply play-acting. With regard to the hon. Minister of Justice having been called upon to form a Government, I am sure that no man in this House will say that he was not in a position to do so, so far as his influence and his ability are concerned; and if there is blame anywhere for his not being Premier that blame exists among hon. gentlemen opposite, and not in the Opposition. Now, who raised this point? The papers in the country, and the religious bodies, some of them controlled in the interest of the party opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FRASER. It is well for hon. gentlemen to say "no, no." Who were the first to send delegates to speak of the matter? Hon. gentlemen opposite know. If the hon. member for Queen's raised that point he raised it on the authority of the papers supporting the Government. Are we to be told, because an hon. gentleman assumes an indignation for the occasion, that we are not to refer to that question? Decidedly not. The hon. gentleman spoke of Mr. Blake accepting a retainer from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that Mr. Blake was not the leader of the Liberal party when he accepted that retainer; and if Senator Scott is retained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, then all I have to say is that that fact detracted somewhat from the high compliment he paid to the Premier; I suppose a fellow-feeling made him wondrous kind. Now, was it wrong for Mr. Blake to accept a retainer while he was a member of this House? Does the hon. gentleman see no difference between a private member of this House accepting a retainer from the company, and a gentleman who has been in the employ of that company for a certain time becoming Premier? Even if Mr. Blake had been leader of the Opposition he would not be in so bad a position, because he had no control over the finances of this country, and would not be in a position to make any grants to the company. All I have to say of the present Premier is this, and I speak only for myself, that I should have accepted him with much greater pleasure had he not sold out his shares. If he could lead the Government party in the Upper House for four years as the solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company it does seem to me to be a little thin that now, when he is only accepting the position he holds as a make-shift to put the Government over the present session, he should sell his shares and give up his retainer for all time. I submit that he would have suited just as well if he had not sold his shares. But the hon. gentleman speaks of the old chief and the grand old party. It did not seem to me that the hon. gentleman had forgotten the circumstances which were crowded into the few days during which his old and respected chief lay dying. Did the hon. gentleman think nothing of the cabalting which was going on for days before the late Premier was dead? Did he think nothing of the state of affairs which called forth that article in the Government organ in this city on indecent haste? Did he forget that that organ had to tell the party in plain words that the Conservative party can afford to be in opposition, but it cannot afford to strangle its principles or to sacrifice its honour simply to remain on the Treasury benches? Then it goes on to speak of the men who were seeking the position. Was it necessary to speak in such terms of men who were simply devoted to the old chieftain, and ready to accept anyone who might be called on to succeed him? We know as a matter of fact that these men have aspirations: they are worthy aspirations; nobody objects to them. But one reason why I oppose an arrangement like the present is, that it is a dual arrangement. There was a time when a triumvirate could exist in Rome, but this is no time for a diumvirate at Ottawa. Here is the way in which the Halifax Herald, the Conservative organ in that city, speaks of it:

"Political Situation--Much curiosity concerning the new Cabinet—Chapleau wants the Department of Railways—The nominal leadership in the Commons will doubtless be conceded to Sir Hector Langevin; but Nova Scotia's gifted son will be the actual and active leader of the party."

Now, is that a state of things that should exist in this country? Why, Japan did away with an anomalous state of things such as this in 1868. They had their Tycoon and their Mikado; but here we have the Mikado, the leader de jure, and the Tycoon, the leader de facto; and yet, were I a betting man, I would bet any money that the little Tycoon would get there before long. You cannot have two heads to any government; and when such a state of things was announced I thought: Oh for the man that this country has lost! Prospero's wand lies buried amidst the silence of Kingston. Two men are necessary now to do the work that he did, and then they cannot do it. That is why I object to the present arrangement. It will be found that just as at Rome, in the case of Cæsar and Bibulus, this dual arrangement will of necessity fall into the hands of one man. You will find that these two gentlemen, when they try to run the Government together, will find themselves in the position described in the verse:

"There was a young lady of Niger,
Went out for a ride on a tiger;
They returned from the ride,
The lady inside,
And a smile on the face of the tiger."

Who the young lady is and who the tiger I leave for events to demonstrate when they come to pass.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FRASER. I will make no explanations, as I would not willingly place these hon. gentlemen in a false position. The explanation might of course satisfy myself, but not them. Does the hon. gentleman think that because Mr. Charlton wrote a letter the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has nothing to say? Does it follow that because one man in a party writes a letter, the party is bound never again to allude to the question about which the letter was written? If so, I commend him to the articles written by the newspapers in this Dominion, said to be controlled by members of Parliament, to show that what has been published in the St. John Gazette is thought, at least by many members in the Province of Quebec representing the Conservative party, to be true. Would the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) not be allowed to rise and denounce that kind of thing because these papers say it? I am not going to accept the views of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on this occasion. I believe the Government, judging by the little they have shown us of their policy for the future, are not acting in the interests of the people; and, notwithstanding the grand style in which Sir John Thompson spoke about the elections, I believe if we would subtract the influences which were at work, and by which the many people were deceived into voting for the Government, you would find that the great mass of the people are opposed to it. I believe that the elements in the present Government will not coalesce, that like oil and water they cannot mix, and that this dual representation—this double-headed system—is bound to end in discord and failure. Before anything can be done the Mikado has to speak to the Tycoon, and you will have division of authority and, what is worse, men throwing the responsibility on each other. Believing this, I am of the opinion that the present Government is not entitled to the votes of this House. But, be that as it may, let me say to the hon. member for St. John, to whose brilliant speech I listened with great pleasure, that, perhaps, he will not repeat again the same speech, for he has already delivered it in part at the opening of the House; and if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not deign to answer the hon. gentleman now, as he did not before, the hon. gentleman should take the lesson and give us something new in the future. So far as the country's interest are concerned, the Liberal party are the true party in this Dominion. The people view with the greatest apprehension the fact that the man who was the consolidator of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the only man who could, as the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) said, lead it into a haven of rest, is the man in whose hands the destinies of the country are now placed. I do not believe in any power outside the people, and when any corporation, I care not how good their intentions—for the intentions of a soulless corporation are always in their own interest—has more than its legitimate influence, the country is bound to suffer. In the present instance of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the man who was bound to them by every tie of interest, is at the head of affairs, and that is a state of thing inimical to the best interests of the people. I believe in a Premier who has no friends to serve but the country: I believe in a Premier who can dare not to be friendly to any institution, be it ever so great or wealthy, even after it has reached its haven of rest, just because I feel certain that no effort of the present Premier to put aside his connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway can rid him of the desire to serve that company; I believe that the interest of the people will not be served by such a Premier, and, therefore, it is with pleasure I now support the resolution of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. KENNY. It will be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that in the remarkable correspondence of Mr. Edward Farrer, which took the loyal people of Canada by surprise a few months ago, it was very prominently stated that when, in the course of nature, the leader of the Conservative party should pass away, would come the disruption of the party and the annexation of Canada to the United States. Hon. gentlemen on both sides have marked their great sense of regret at the demise of Canada's great son, and hon. gentlemen opposite are very much surprised to find that the prediction of Mr. Farrer has not been verified, and that the Conservative party have not crumbled into pieces, and that there is not the slightest danger of the annexation of Canada to the United States. Instead of any disruption of the Conservative party, they stand firmly together, so firmly together that the hon. the leader of the Opposition has had to resort to the extreme course of bringing a motion of censure against the Government which has recently been formed, by moving the adjournment of the House. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) during the course of the speech he made this afternoon stated that the Conservative party had felt that it was only by standing shoulder to shoulder that they could hold the Government of the country. I quite admit the correctness of the hon. gentleman's statement, and I beg to assure him and every hon. gentleman opposite that the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House are determined to make everything subservient to Canadian unity and the integrity of the British Empire, to which we ought all be proud to belong. I have been almost amused at the references which hon. gentlemen opposite have made to newspaper articles. All the arguments advanced by hon. members opposite, including the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), have been based on newspaper articles. Now, if we are to incorporate into our discussion every newspaper article, if members of the Cabinet are to be catechised upon what appears in the public press, I must take the opportunity of asking the leader of the Opposition whether it is true that His Excellency the Governor General sent for him, because I assure that hon. gentleman such a statement has appeared in a paper supporting him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. KENNY. I quote from the Halifax Acadian Recorder. That newspaper may be published a long way from here, and may not be of much advantage to the hon. gentleman opposite and those who sit alongside him, who take every opportunity of belittling the people of the Maritime Provinces; but I assure the hon. gentleman it was so stated in one of the organs of opinion in the city of Halifax which supports the hon. gentleman's party. Therefore, if the time of Parliament is to be wasted at this season of the year in discussing what appears in the press, if Cabinet Ministers are to be catechised on these articles, we must be allowed to catechise hon. gentlemen opposite as to what has taken place in their ranks. As to any dissensions in the ranks of the Liberal-Conservative party, I say there never was more union amongst them than there is to-day, and they are simply following out the advice given to them by their lamented great leader when, speaking in Toronto some time ago, he said:

"I am satisfied that, whoever may be chosen as my successor, he and those who act with him will move in the same line, will be governed by the same principles and will be supported by the same party."

And, as the great son of Canada then spoke, it has been verified to-day. I have noticed that complimentary references have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to Mr. Abbott. I have never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Abbott in this House, and I think the majority of the members here now have not had that pleasure, but I have listened with pleasure to the great tributes which have been paid to his abilities by hon. gentlemen opposite. I noticed, however, that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—and I heard the same reference again from the other side of the House a few minutes ago—referred to a document which the Hon. Mr. Abbott signed more than forty years ago. I think that was before almost any member of this House had the honour of sitting here, but, while that transaction has been explained and condoned, and while we may forgive one transgression, it is hard for us to forgive an habitual sinner. I noticed, during the remarks of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that he referred in eloquent terms and very delicately, to his fear that the equilibrium —I think that was the term he used—that was established and preserved by the late leader of the Liberal-Conservative party, had been destroyed. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), referred, no doubt, to the same idea, and he termed it paltry prejudice, but the idea has been elaborated by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), who has insinuated that the Minister of Justice did not assume the position of Prime Minister, because, on religious grounds, he would not be acceptable to a number of the Conservative party. That statement has been contradicted and denied, and it will be contradicted by every member of the Conservative party in this House and the great mass of the Conservatives in the Dominion of Canada. That suggestion could hardly have been brought in here to influence the members of this House, for I take it that nowhere in the Dominion of Canada, could you find so many gentlemen free from religious bigotry as the members of this House of Commons. Our very avocation as politicians brings us in contact with all classes of our fellow-citizens, and all the rough edges of isolated and individual training are smoothed off by friction with all classes of our fellow-citizens. Therefore, this could not have been brought in to do service here, because, these hon. gentlemen knew that the only transgressor in that respect, as pointed out by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) sits on their side of the House. Therefore, this was not brought in to do service here, but, I suppose that, in the disappointed condition in which hon. gentlemen opposite find themselves, recognising that the Liberal-Conservative party, notwithstanding the terrible loss it has sustained, is strong in Parliament and stronger still in the affections of the people of Canada, having been endorsed so recently by the people of the country, they must resort to some extraordinary expedient to try to make party capital, and, therefore, it is that we have this religious cry raised, and I must say that I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should have so inconsiderately raised such an issue. Then we have had from two or three of the speakers on the other side the sectional issue raised, and an attempt has been made to show the members of this House or the people of the country that the Province of Ontario is not fairly represented in this Government. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen who pose as statesmen should attempt at the present day to raise such issues. I do not know what their standard of statesmanship may be. My own experience in politics is very short, but it appears that in some parts of the Dominion all that is necessary in order to be a statesman, in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, is to say something against the present Government. If you say anything against the Government or against Sir Charles Tupper, your reputation as a statesman is made forever. These gentlemen have raised the sectarian and sectional cry, which, I think, is exceedingly to be deplored in the present stage of our history. Reference has been made to the fact that Mr. Abbott was connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and hon. gentlemen have gone into elaborate calculations to show that, although Mr. Abbott has ceased to have any connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, his present connection with the Government of Canada has had the effect of raising the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's stock one per cent. in the markets of the world. Now, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Toronto, if hon. gentlemen had taken the trouble to examine the prices of other railway stocks, they would have found that a very great advance had taken place, and that these advances had been attributed to one common cause. It would have been paying Mr. Abbott, it would have been paying the Government of Canada, it would have been paying the Dominion of Canada, a great tribute to say that all that advance which took place recently on the Stock Exchange in London, had been due to the fact that Mr. Abbott had been made Prime Minister of Canada. Now, Sir, these gentlemen know better; they know what the cause was. One of them must, because he has financed for Canada in England—not very successfully always, but, at all events, in such a manner as to bring him en rapport with the financiers of that monetary centre. These hon. gentlemen know that, within a comparatively recent period, the Bank of England rate has fallen from 4 to 3 per cent.; therefore, money has become more plentiful on the Stock Exchange in London, and stocks have all advanced, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company included, and that is the solution of the wonderful theory which they build up for themselves, that this stock advance was due entirely to Mr. Abbott's being made Prime Minister of Canada. Now, Sir, the Minister of Justice has explained the circumstances under which he was sent for by the Governor General, who asked him to assume the responsibility of forming an Administration. The hon. gentleman has told us that he declined, for reasons which he has reserved to himself. We all recognize that hon. gentleman's very great modesty; it is a very attractive feature in his character; but we all know, those who sit behind him in this House at all events know, that if he had accepted that position he would have received the unanimous support of every member on this side of the House. I listened with great pleasure to the eulogies which were passed upon the Minister of Justice by hon. gentlemen opposite. I almost regretted his modesty as I listened to those hon. gentlemen praising the Minister of Justice. I regretted that his extreme modesty had induced him to decline the position. But hon. gentlemen of the Opposition who have sat for many years in this House, and who have watched the career of the representatives from Nova Scotia, must have recognized that they are all imbued with a strong sense of modesty, in fact, Sir, our extreme modesty not only retards our personal advancement, but actually impairs our public usefulness. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who is not in his place, referred to the fact that one member of the Cabinet, at least, was an innocent man. Well, I do not think that anybody in this House, after the remarkable speech that the member for West Ontario made, will ever accuse him of being an innocent man. The hon. gentleman says that certain members of the Cabinet were selected as specialists. Well, I think that forever after in this House, he will be known as a specialist, and if Barnum ever finds a successor, I should think he would be very much pleased to have such a specialist. Then, a tribute has been paid by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), to the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), but I will allow those hon. gentlemen to settle amongst themselves the statements he has made. I have been much amused at the astonishment that hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed that the Minister of Justice did not immediately accept the position of Premier of this great Dominion when it was offered to him by His Excellency the Governor General. As my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) has asked, I wonder really how many of those aspirants of the Opposition would have refused if they had been offered the position. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition invites this House to censure the Government which has recently been reorganized. I think that before he can expect any support from hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House he should give us better reasons than those that he has advanced to-day. We cannot forget that we have come fresh from the people; we cannot forget the importance of the issue which was then raised; we cannot forget that it has been recognized in this country and out of it, that the question on which the people of Canada expressed their opinion in March last, was the most important question upon which they have ever been called upon to express an opinion. Therefore, having come here to discharge our duties as members of this House, being actuated by a sincere and earnest desire to support the policy which was inaugurated by our lamented chieftain, we do not see much to fear from either the policy or the members of the Opposition.

Mr. AMYOT. I think we must be able to come to some conclusion as to the facts which have occurred only a few hours ago. There is a very important question at issue now, a question of fact, and we who sit here now in Parliament are expected by the people of this country to find out the truth, and to lay down the real basis of actual events for history. Is it or is it not true, as a matter of fact, that the best man on the other side of the House has been called upon to form an Administration and has refused, because he knew that he would not be accepted by a certain element? That is the question now before the country. There is no use trying to hide it. Is it or is it not the case?

Some hon. MEMBERS. It is not.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not expect that those who call themselves the Liberal-Conservative party will come before this House and before the country and say: Yes, we are guilty of that. I do not expect that they will say to the country at large: In our Liberal-Conservative party we are not liberal enough to allow a man to worship his God as he pleases; there are fanatics and bigots enough in our ranks to prevent the Liberal-Conservative party from choosing the best man on our side. I do not expect that. Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? Who was the oldest man in those ranks, who was the first man to be called from his age, from the number of years he had given to his country in the ranks of that party? It was the Minister of Public Works. He was not even called upon through politeness, he was not called upon as an old friend, he was entirely ignored. Some will say it is because there is an investigation going on affecting his reputation and his past record. But that has not been an objection to his being chosen as one of the Ministers under the actual Cabinet. Let us say for a moment that his old age precluded him from accepting the position to which his long services entitled him. Let us go to the next man who is looked upon, not only in this House but in the whole country, as the real debating power, as the lawyer, as the man really possessing the knowledge of history and of law and precedents in parliamentary practice, which was the Minister of Justice. There was not a stain on his name, there was no reproach on his character. Everybody said he was the best man in the ranks of his party. Was he called? Yes; he had conversations with certain parties who last year declared in this House that the French language must disappear, and after conversing with them, and as a consequence thereof, he had to say to the representative of Her Majesty the Queen that he could not form an Administration. His modesty makes him say that he was too young. Is the hon. Minister of Justice too young to rise at a critical moment, and, although he is not the old and ancient leader, to powerfully rise and defend his party in this House? Is he too young to give the real directions to his party upon any question, ? No. Is he too young to give himself and his talents, his reputation, his tactical ability and all those great qualities which entitled him to be called on by the Government to act in the position of Premier? He was competent, and yet he was not able to become Prime Minister of this Dominion. Why? I am not going to deal with newspapers, or with Mr. Farrer, or with the members of this House whose letters have been stolen and been published in the press. I take the solemn declaration of the leader of this Government. What does he say?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. Those who imitate the beasts should at least have their intelligence. The hon. leader says: "the honour came to me in the nature of a compromise." I address intelligent men, men who have gone to the country and been returned by majorities, and I ask them to explain that word "compromise." What does it mean? A compromise is when several parties do not agree together and they each give up part of their pretensions. What part of their pretensions have been given up? Some members, and this is most probable, and is in fact the only possible explanation, did not want one man because he was of a certain religion, or because he was a French Canadian, or because he was not from a certain province: and what was the compromise? It was a declaration that in this party with a majority of perhaps twenty-five votes, there was not one man fit to lead it, and the members were obliged to go into another chamber where the members are not responsible to the people, they made a compromise, and they said: Very well, we do not want a certain man because he is a Catholic, or because he is a Protestant, or because he is a French Canadian, or because he comes from a certain Province. Very well, they say, we submit to that humiliation: I give up my right as the oldest Privy Councillor, I give up my right as the best man in this House; we all submit to the humiliation because of the fanaticism and bigotry prevailing, but for the love of power, and not love of country, we will endeavour to keep our ranks together and retain power. That is the position. That is what the word "compromise" means in that case. It is said: Give me a written word from a man, and I will have him hanged. We have heard from the Minister of Justice to-day. It will be remembered that in his declaration before the Senate the present Premier declared that the Minister of Justice had been called upon for his advice. His Excellency the Governor General exercised his constitutional rights. I admit that theory, and when I speak of His Excellency it is only because I am obliged to name him, although he is under no responsibility to us, and I look to Mr. Abbott as being fully and entirely responsible for every public deed done by His Excellency since the demise of the late lamented Sir John Macdonald. Well, His Excellency, exercising his constitutional right, applied to Sir John Thompson for his advice with respect to the steps which should be taken for the formation of a new Government. He appealed to Sir John Thompson. He did not appeal to the Minister of Public Works. This is as if a man gave him a slap in the face, before the whole country. After that the hon. gentleman was afterwards asked whether he was prepared to sacrifice his own dignity and accept again his position as Minister of Public Works, and this after the Governor General had ignored the length of his service and had practically slapped him in the face, but the words were said: Come with me and be Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works forgetting the rights of age, of his length of service, and of those who had attached themselves to him, and who looked to him as personifying the dignity of the constituency he represented, forgetting all that, the hon. gentleman said: I will stand being snubbed and insulted, and the announcement being made that my influence does not equal my capacity, yet I will serve for the love of party and of power. And the Minister of Justice who was called, and no one has a higher personal admiration for him than I have, made a real sacrifice. We have indeed no positive proof of what we suspect, of what is demonstrated by all the presumptions possible, that he knew he was not able to form an Administration because of his religion, although he was the best man of the party in this House. But the hon. gentleman waits for his hour to come; for the moment he saves his party and says nothing about the matter, but gives his powerful assistance to the new leader who was selected when this hon. gentleman should have been selected. But will

hon. gentleman tell me why Mr. Abbott, when he gave explanations, did not give all the explanations necessary? Why did he not say in the Senate that Sir John Thompson had been called upon not to advise His Excellency but to form an Administration, with himself as Prime Minister? The reason must be this—and you will admit there is a strong presumption in favour of what I say—because he was under the impression that it would be a calamity for the party if the real state of things became known, and he did not declare all the truth. One hon. gentleman does not speak like the other. The Minister of Justice spoke to-night and Mr. Abbott spoke the other day. You will tell me that Mr. Abbott has been an annexationist. I do not care for that, it was 40 years ago. You will tell me that he took a great share in the Pacific scandal. I do not care for that; it was about 20 years ago, in 1873. You will tell me that he was attorney for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and made an immense amount of money. That is his own affair. You will tell me that he had great influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which committed the great wrong of throwing all the weight of influence in favour of one party, with a view to carry the late elections. That is a more serious matter. But there is one thing that cannot be denied, and that is that Mr. Abbott in one chamber, and the Minister of Justice in another chamber, did not make the same statements. Who is right and who is wrong? I prefer to accept the statement of the Minister of Justice, and I believe he was called upon, not to advise His Excellency but to form an Administration. And why has he not formed a Ministry? Because in the ranks of the Conservative party there is enough of fanaticism to prevent a Catholic from forming an Administration. I do not say that all the members of the Conservative party are actuated by these feelings; no, I know a great many of them who have got large ideas, and who understand what is freedom, and who respect the religious convictions of their neighbours, but there is fanaticism in that party, and that is the point I want to elucidate before the country, for it must be known, and it must be understood, and the facts are there. I do not expect that the Conservative party will make an admission of this, because its leading members are intelligent men. Well do we remember the fights we have already had on these very same questions, and to-day if I feel so much for the hardship of the position in which the hon. Minister of Justice is placed, it is because I know that he is the victim of his noble stand upon a question discussed here last year, which affected the future of this country. The Minister of Justice is now made a victim of this fanaticism, but if he suffers at the present time he will be great in the future, as he is great now in our hearts. I resent the treatment which he has received. I who am against him politically speaking, resent the wound which has been inflicted upon him as if it were inflicted upon one of my own brethren or upon myself. It is to be deplored that the Conservatives, the Liberal-Conservatives—by what right they call themselves Liberal-Conservatives has never been explained—but it is to be deplored that those who call themselves the Liberal-Conservative party have enough fanaticism and bigotry in their ranks to prevent the best man in Parliament from being Premier of this country. I prefer the party led by the Hon. Mr. Mowat in Ontario, who in the name of the constitution comes boldly forward and protects the rights of the minorities. I prefer that party which in this House selects to replace the Hon. Edward Blake, a French Canadian, because they look upon him with feelings free from all religious prejudices. What did we hear rumoured in this House but a short time ago? We heard it stated that there was not a man in this House able to lead the country and we heard that they were going to call in Mr. Meredith who is the exponent of bigotry and fanaticism in Ontario. Was not the atmosphere filled with these rumours which were boldly expressed but a few days since? Did we not hear an hon. Minister of the House, after having heard the admirable speech of our leader on a recent sad occasion which we all deplore, say: What a nice man Mr. Laurier is, I would follow him, only he is a French Canadian. Do not we know these sentiments exist here? I do not say they exist amongst all the members on the other side of the House, but there exists sufficient fanaticism in the ranks of the Conservative party to prevent the best man in this House from becoming the leader of the Government. Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel humiliated to see that the press which is looked upon as the organ of the French Canadian Ministers cannot be silenced. I am asked to believe that the hon. the Secretary of State, one of the greatest public speakers we have had in the Province of Quebec, says: I will support the Government, the Government will be good, its policy will be good, and I will devote all my energies for that Government, provided that I be Minister of Railways. I am asked to believe that a Minister of the Crown would lower his political ideas to that level. In what century are we living? Does the hon. gentleman say: I will build such and such a railway if I get that position. Does he say: If I get that office I will work such and such reform? No; but he is alleged to say: If I were in that position the country would be safe because I would have large patronage. I am asked to believe that, but I do not believe it. I do not believe there is a man with his head upon his shoulders who would say that. I do not believe a man of the ability and character of the Secretary of State would be guilty of such utterances, but I deplore that they cannot silence their press; the press that lives by them and which they feed every day. I deplore that this press should lower our French Canadian Ministers to that humiliation. What do we see occurring to-day? We see the Minister of Public Works, one of the oldest members of this House, ignored, put aside, slapped, punished, and after that they say to him: Come back we will endure you, you will prevent some of your supporters from kicking, come back humiliated, slapped in the face, come back to the Ministry, although you are openly and before the public, slapped, snubbed and injured. We are told that another of our Ministers is like a child who cries for a little piece of bread and sugar, and that a third one—his name has not been brought into the debate, and if I mentioned him this House might think I did so because of personal revenge. I will not speak of him now. There is no use in speaking of ourselves as a great united nation, for do you think seriously that the Province of Quebec will look upon the present Ministry as a Ministry which will properly represent it? No, Mr. Speaker, we must see the end of such a system; there must be a time coming when we will not have to fight continually against a position which humiliates the Province of Quebec so terribly as these recent events in the Administration have done. We speak of the word "union" and we should understand its meaning and import clearly, for some people seem to forget the real meaning of the Confederation. These people speak of the Canadian nation as if it should be a unity instead of a union, but there they make a mistake. The essence of the Confederation is that each province remains entirely distinct from the whole body; there must be a union of all parts of the Confederation in matters which concern the whole of the provinces, but it must be understood that you cannot ask unity, for each province must preserve its laws, its customs, its language and its religion. That is not my own idea, for I have read it in Dicey and Bourinot and all the great authorities of the day, and any one who knows the constitution of the United Utates, of the German Empire, or of the Swiss Confederation can understand that properly. If we want our Confederation to last and to continue to be one of the elements of the strength of Great Britain we must respect the language, the religion, and the customs of each province, and we must protect the minorities as well as majorities. In doing this we will prove really loyal to the Queen of England. I may say that so far as loyalty is concerned we are all loyal to Canada. To those who tell me that the Hon. Mr. Abbott is not loyal, because some forty years ago in his youth he thought that annexation would be better for this country, I answer, that is an old affair and we cannot judge him from that, but I laugh at those who tell us that the Liberal party or the National party in this House is not loyal. I say to them: Go on maintaining fanaticism and bigotry in your ranks; go on taking from the minority their rights and privileges, and you will prepare the way for annexation. Prevent us being happy and free under the constitution, and you will bring about incitements to some popular movements which might have the effect of cutting the tie which binds us to the mother country. But give full play to the magnificent constitutional system which we enjoy, and under which we have lived side by side with our English-speaking fellow-countrymen on this continent; give us liberty and progress; give us the best men we have to rule the country, and we shall always remain what we have always been in this country, true and loyal subjects of Her Majesty. When you have a good man do not prevent him occupying the position which is his by right of his abilities and his standing. Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that the love of power seemed to be the rallying ground for the forces. For my part I shall not be accused of working to reach the Treasury benches. I used to belong to the ministerial party, but I left them when I found that they wanted to persecute a minority. I was also a partisan of the Local Government, but when I found that it was willing to be a tool in their hands I fought it also. Therefore it is not with me a question of the Treasury benches, it is a question of principle. The real position of the present Government must be understood to-day; the bed in which it was born is soiled by fanaticism. Ab initio the Government of the party opposite cannot withstand public opinion, because, whatever may be the personal qualities of the Hon. Mr. Abbott, it owes its existence to a sentiment which its adherents dare not confess openly before the people of the country. Like their societies they do their work secretly.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentlemen opposite, having missed the opportunity which they had on Thursday of criticizing the formation of the Government when the announcement was made, and no doubt being urged on by the taunts and sneers of the party behind them, and the press throughout the country, undertake to do so to-day, on a most extraordinary motion, for which I venture to say they will hunt in vain for a precedent in the annals of parliamentary history in Great Britain or in Canada—a motion to adjourn the House. Generally a notice of a question of this kind is given, and an opportunity is afforded to the Government to consider the question before debating it. When the hon. leader of the Opposition made the motion and the statement which followed it, that there should be a vote of censure on the Government, because they had taken an hon. gentleman from the other Chamber who had been a director and a solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company before he became a member of the Government. I thought it was perhaps the most harmless thing I had ever heard proposed by a leader of the Opposition in this House. The statement was made in this House that he had resigned his position in that company, that he had sold his stock, and that he was now no longer connected with it, and therefore that objection was removed. The only thing remaining was the statement that his heart-strings still clung to the corporation which he had lately left. Now, Sir, I do not think that is a sufficiently serious accusation against any member either of the Senate or the House of Commons to prevent him accepting the honour of the position of Prime Minister. The other members of this Government were members of the Government of which Sir John Macdonald was the leader. But the true reason for raising this debate was revealed when the Thersites of the debate, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), got up and stated that Sir John Thompson was first called upon by His Excellency to form a Government. And let me say that the statement of the hon. Minister of Justice corroborates and is nearly the same as that of His Excellency which was presented to this House. When he was called on to form a Government, he then and there, as I understand, before going to consult his friends, refused to do so for the reasons he gave to this House, reasons which any hon. gentleman would accept as his true and only reasons; and Mr. Abbott was called on to form the Government. But the hon. member for Queen's has found another reason, namely, that it was on account of his religion, on account of the bigotry which the hon. gentleman who has just sat down charged against the Liberal-Conservative party throughout this country, that Sir John Thompson was prevented from forming a Government. I deny it as a member of the same Cabinet, for I know that I and every other member of that Cabinet would have given that hon. gentleman our most cordial support. I know also the feelings and opinions of the hon. members of this House who support the Government better than hon. gentlemen do, and I have not yet met a single member of the Liberal-Conservative party in this House who, if Sir John Thompson were called on to form a Government, would not have given him the most cordial support. Now, why was this question brought into the House? It has been asserted here that the question was raised by the papers supporting us throughout the country. Those hon. gentlemen do not say anything about the expressions of the strongest papers in their own party. Why has nobody quoted the observations made by the Montreal Witness when the hon. Minister of Justice was called on to form a Government? Has a Liberal-Conservative paper in the country voiced such an opinion on behalf of any member of this House? Not one. Things would come to a pretty pass in this country indeed if a man, on account of his religion, or because he worshipped at a certain altar which he chose to worship at, should not receive political preferment or any office in the gift of the country. There is no Conservative bigoted enough to refuse to support any hon. gentleman who, by his talents and his position in this country, is entitled to his support. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite: Is there a single charge which they have raised that has not been disproved? Is it wrong for Hon. Mr. Abbott to accept the premiership of this country, having resigned his position in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and ceased to have anything to do with it? Not at all. Well, what then becomes of the motion? It is only pushed before this House for the purpose of introducing here religious bigotry and prejudice. There is a giant come into this House with all the wisdom of Nestor and Ulysses, the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) who commenced first at one portion of the Cabinet and went along until he reached the other end. Where did he, how did he become possessed of these great powers of discernment which enable him to soar so placidly and serenely over the rest of this community and to pass opinions upon his brother members as to their capability to fill the positions they occupy? What has he ever done in this country which entitles him to make predictions or pass opinions upon others? I have heard of him as a successful poet. I have heard his remarks about the Finance Minister who, he says, has a horse put out to feed in the pastures of the hon. member for North Lanark, and I suppose the hon. gentleman will soon occupy the position which Byron the poet described when he spoke of Cæsar eulogizing an ass. After that we had the speech of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), who came armed like an Ajax to the battle, and who charged against the Government of the country that one of the members of the Cabinet, forsooth, would have so much influence in the councils of the country that he would be able to influence perhaps the First Minister. Is that a crime for any member of the Council even if it were true? I say that the hon. gentleman who is Premier stands on an equal position with his colleagues, and it would not be a fault in him even if colleagues of his were possessed of sufficient power and influence in the Cabinet to influence his decisions. It would, perhaps, be a credit to the person who had such influence in the Council, and no discredit to the hon. gentleman. What other charges have been made against us,—that Ontario is not sufficiently represented in the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, feels keenly upon that point. The Government of this country appeared to be just within the grasp of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it escaped their grasp, and the hon. gentleman is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, a little disappointed in not occupying your position, for which, it has been said, he had a strong inclination. Those disappointments are bound to occur to hon. gentlemen opposite so long as they pursue the policy they have pursued in the past. The arrangement of the Cabinet of this country is a matter with which the Governor General, Her Majesty's representative, and the Liberal-Conservative party, who are the majority in this House, have to do. We have gone to the country, we have fought the battle, vanquished our enemies, and are entitled to the position we occupy; and we intend, as we have been returned with a majority of thirty, to keep power until the people decide otherwise. We are a party without divisions in our ranks, because no member of the party would go against the mandate which he received from the people, and our policy will be continued so long as the people decide in its favour. The present motion, I suppose, amounts to a vote of want of confidence. Did you ever hear, Sir, of such a motion being proposed in such a shape—a motion to adjourn the House! And on what grounds? First, on the ground that Mr. Abbott has been taken from the Senate, the unpopular branch, to be First Minister. But that is no constitutional objection; it is an objection heard for the first time. And the other objection is that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was prevented from occupying the position of Premier owing to the intolerance and bigotry of the Conservative party. Now, I, as a colleague of the hon. gentleman voicing the opinions, as I know, of every man with whom I have had a conversation on the subject, declare that such a statement is utterly false. I declare that there is no man in this House or country belonging to the Conservative party, to whom the Conservative party of all shades of religion, would be more proud to give their support than the Minister of Justice. There have been no religious differences in the Conservative party on the subject of the Premiership; and with regard to Mr. Abbott, even if his position as director of the Canadian Pacific Railway were a disqualification—and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has stated it was no disqualification, but that he would rather have supported him all the more if he had not sold out his stock—Mr. Abbott has retired from the railway company and disposed of his interest in it. I repeat that the Liberal-Conservative party in this House feel proud of the leader they have chosen. We know he will lead us in the same path as we have followed in the past, we know that he will govern this country in the way it ought to be governed during the next five years, and we look with confidence at the end of that term to a reindorsement of our policy by the people.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will not detain the House very long, but I wish merely to call attention to the remarks which fell from the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) It has been said that bigotry lies on this side of the House, and I find it very strange that the threat which that hon. gentleman uttered here to-night should have passed unnoticed. He stated that there was no intention of abandoning the policy inaugurated by the hon.

member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy.) It is well to remember that all this warfare about which we have heard so much here to-night was not inaugurated on this side, but on the opposite side. Let me recall once more to the attention of this House the speech which was delivered by the hon. member for Simcoe in the town of Barrie during the campaign of 1887. At that time the hon. gentleman occupied a most prominent position in his party; he was then the president of the Conservative Union of Ontario, and, consequently, in harmony with his party. Well, what were the sentiments to which he then gave utterance? He said, after referring at considerable length to the French Canadian race: "The French Canadian race, there is the great danger to Confederation." He is the gentleman who has given utterance to the sentiment of which I complain, and he a prominent member of the opposite side of the House then and now, laid the basis of that lamentable spirit of warfare which has since unfortunately prevailed. We heard again to-night the hon. member for Muskoka tell us that although the hon. member for North Simcoe may be across the sea, still his spirit remains on that side of the House and not upon this, and we hear him state distinctly that it is the intention of every follower of the hon. member for North Simcoe to continue pursuing the policy he laid down. I suppose by that it is meant that the Catholic schools of the North-West Territories and the French language spoken there must soon become things of the past. Then I very little know the brave French Canadian members of this House, if they would ever tolerate this part of the policy of even a section of the Conservative party. I know that about a century ago a battle was fought, and that battle decided the fate of this country. Two heroes stood there face to face. We know they both fell on that field, fighting for their respective countries. We know the remarkable words uttered by those heroes when they fell. The one thanked God that his country was victorious; the other thanked God that he would not live to see the ruin of his nationality. If the latter could come here to-day he would see not 70,000, but over a million of French Canadians in this country, and yet we are to be told that the policy of exterminating that race, of closing their schools and putting an end to the language they speak is to be prosecuted, as we have been told by an hon. gentleman on the other side. I tell the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that he may come forward with his arguments and may stand up here with the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on his shoulders, and they will get from this side of the House, and, I believe, from the people of Canada, such an expression of opinion as will crush that policy now and forever. As to the selection of a Premier for this country, the statement read by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), was not his own, but was taken from a paper published in the interests of the other side and controlled, I believe, by an hon. member of the House. These words of bigotry and hatred were not found in the mouth of any member of the Opposition, but were quoted from an organ of the party which has thrived and lived upon the policy of bigotry and hatred.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. DEVLIN. There is no shame about it. If you had a heart you would have cried "shame" when your leader said the chief danger to Canada was the great French Canadian race. You would have cried "shame" when the war of race was raised by your leaders and when an attack was made upon the rights to which we lay claim, and the rights which we will fight for and maintain as long as we have a right to live in this country.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I very seldom trespass upon the time of the House, and I do not think the present occasion requires a very long speech from me or any great amount of argument to prove that the motion of the leader of the Opposition was uncalled for to-day. One thing has struck me in this debate, and must have struck every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, not only those who have sat here for many years past, but even those who were elected at the last election. It must have been gratifying to hon. gentlemen who sit on this side to see the great change which has come over the spirit of those who sit on the other side of the House. I have heard the question asked what this motion covered. Some believed that the complaint is that the policy of the Conservative party is not continued because the leader of the Government sits in the Senate. I do not interpret the language of the leader of the Opposition in that way. After having declared the other day, when the policy of the Government was announced by the leader of the House, that he expected that the policy of the late lamented Sir John Macdonald would be followed, but that he would call attention to the fact that it had not been followed, in at all events one respect, on the following day he did not do that, but has now made this singular motion, and he says this is the ground on which he bases the charge that we have departed from the policy of our late leader. If that is the only ground I do not think the country will believe there is much to fear. The policy followed by the Conservative party for many years has not been very acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite. It was not very much lauded by them, nor was our leader lauded by them before his death. It is a great satisfaction to gentlemen on this side, and it will be a great satisfaction to the Canadian people, to find that the hon. gentlemen who slandered him in his lifetime find themselves compelled to pay an honest tribute to his greatness now that he is dead. It is a compliment to that great leader and it is a compliment to us who followed him and supported him during his life. It is a justification of Sir John Macdonald, and it is a justification of those who supported him and of the electors who sustained him, notwithstanding the taunts of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who, when he failed, election after election, explained the defeat by stating that the success of the Government was due to a demoralised electorate. I think we have reason to congratulate ourselves that the motion comes in this feeble way that it does to-night. But there is something behind this. There is a new platform to be laid down. Hon. gentlemen have often been accused of having changed their policy, and with truth; but there is one plank in their platform which they have never changed, and that is to attempt to stir up strife amongst the people of this Dominion, to set province against province, creed against creed, and nationality against nationality. In that they are perfectly consistent, and as long as they pursue that policy they are likely to remain where they are.

Mr. LISTER. You are very sorry about that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not like some hon. gentleman I might name. When I am sorry I express my sorrow, and when I do not feel any sorrow I do not express any. During this debate some expressions have been used which show that there is something behind all this. A great deal of sympathy has been expressed for the Minister of Justice. All at once hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to vie with gentlemen on this side of the House in paying just tributes to that man's great ability. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who feels so deeply the injustice which has been done to the great ability of the Minister of Justice, gave as the only solution of the fact that the Minister of Justice did not form a Government that his religious principles were objected to by a wing of the Conservative party. Sir, which of the two gentlemen is this House and country to believe? The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has a policy in that he wishes to go to the people like some of his colleagues, and they would like to create the impression that the Conservative party has within it elements so bigoted, prejudices so strong, that notwithstanding the great ability of the Minister of Justice he cannot be accepted as Premier of this country on account of his religion. But in going to the country with that statement, it will be accompanied by the statement of the Minister of Justice himself, who denies that, who says there was nothing of the kind operating against him in the formation of a Cabinet. The member for Bellechasse says, and other gentlemen opposite have said, that the Minister of Justice was prevented from forming a Cabinet because of his religious belief. I say that that statement will have to stand side by side with the statement of the Minister of Justice himself, and reiterated by every member of the Conservative party who has spoken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) What was it?

Mr. COSTIGAN. He gave us his reason, and I do not wish to go beyond that. But I go further, and I say that the Minister of Justice is not of the calibre to stand anything like such an indignity, if it had been put upon him. He would have resented it, and I think there are gentlemen in this House who, if such an indignity had been put upon him, would sympathize with him and would also resent it. This is the cry that hon. gentlemen opposite wish to make in the bye-elections that are to come on. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) rose some moments ago in his seat and stated that he thanked God that no such prejudices existed in the Liberal party on that side of the House. Did he forget that I have sat here since Confederation, and I know the record of the Liberal party? Did he forget what has been the record of the Liberal party upon many occasions? Sir, I know all about the Liberal party professions, about their love for Catholicity, their love for the Irishman, their love for the Frenchmen. There are no men in the world more ready and more profuse in their professions when they are in opposition and their professions are worthless, but who are more niggardly of them when they are in power and have an opportunity of proving them. Do you want examples of it? Let the hon. gentleman opposite who is looking at me now recall the formation of Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet, when Sir John A. Macdonald resigned in 1873. Was there any prejudice on that side of the House at that time? Were there any prejudices in the Liberal representation from New Brunswick? Does the hon. gentleman want to know why the Hon. Mr. Anglin did not form part of Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet? He does not want me to tell him, because he knows; he knows that Mr. Anglin could not be accepted in that Cabinet because his Liberal supporters from New Brunswick declared that the province would be in a blaze if he were taken into it. We all know in this House that the Liberal party are to blame for fanning, in the past, religious strife in this country; they are full of professions in opposition, but they are niggardly of their relief when in power. Do they think I forget when I stood here struggling for separate schools in New Brunswick, the question to which the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) has referred, paying me a left-handed compliment? There is one thing certain, that as far as my abilities enabled me to do so, I represented the minority of New Brunswick on the schools question. The House knows that I represented that case during the time my friends were in power, and I remember the professions of hon. gentlemen opposite. I remember the assurances they gave to his Lordship Bishop Sweeney, who came here on that question. Why, they said, we could settle that matter in 15 minutes if we were in power, but in opposition we can only give you our sympathy; but let us come into power and we can settle it in a few minutes. Well, a change of Government took place; those gentlemen came into power, and what did they do? They reversed their vote of the session before, and voted that this Parliament should not deal with the subject, though the session before they had voted for the disallowance of the Local Acts. That is the contrast between the actions of those hon. gentlemen and their professions of sympathy for the much-persecuted Catholics, for the much-persecuted Irishmen, and the much-persecuted Frenchmen. It is all very fine when they are in opposition and they want to create a cry with which to go to the country, but when they come into power and have an opportunity of showing their sympathy for our people they fail to do so. But what did they do besides that? They all acknowledged that Mr. Anglin had contributed more to strengthen the Liberal party in the Maritime Provinces than any other man in that section of the country, and notwithstanding his great ability and his great services they excluded him from the Cabinet. But afterwards, at a very critical time, and for a particular purpose, they changed their minds enough to make him Speaker of this House. Why? Everybody knows that he and I were the only Catholics coming from that Province, and when they found that the abler half of the representation was against them on that particular question they utilized Mr. Anglin in order to strengthen themselves. And when he was in that position of neutrality, when it appeared that a majority would probably vote against the Mackenzie Administration on that question, they had to utilize the Speaker of that day to whip their friends into line and make them reverse their decision and vote my motion down.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did you make him a Privy Councillor? You love your Catholic friends and you showed it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I cannot love my Catholic friends, as much as the hon. gentleman professes to do. I may say to the hon. gentleman that, as an Irishman and a Catholic, I did feel on one occasion, with respect to religious matters and matters of nationality—I might have felt a little sorry to be an Irishman, and that was when the hon. gentleman was speaking upon that question and representing the Irish character.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I should think you would be ashamed; I knew you would feel ashamed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Well, if I do, then I am capable of what the hon. gentleman is not capable.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is your opinion.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I know the hon. gentleman does not like to hear that, but perhaps gentlemen who can appreciate the position as well as he can will be courteous enough to allow me to proceed without interruption. I do not trouble the House very often, and I avail myself of a privilege that no one can deny me, except the hon. gentleman who is making himself so officious just now. Then we had other proofs of the liberality of the Liberal party in the interest of our people. Mr. Anglin was defeated in New Brunswick. He was then induced to go to the great Province of Ontario, where that party is influential, and expected to come into power every day. His expectations, and the expectations of his friends whom he left behind him in St. John, were that he would get a constituency there. He never got a constituency. It is true they did tell him once they would provide a constituency, and when one was opened, and when the hon. member for South Oxford could find no other constituency, it was given to him as a pretty safe one. I believe the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who criticized the members of the Government all round, was unfortunate on one occasion in the elections. He was considered a very useful man to the party, and therefore a seat was found for him. No constituency could be found, however, for Mr. Anglin, except that of Simcoe, a Conservative stronghold. They were so liberal as to say to Mr. Anglin: You have done a great deal for the party and assisted materially in defeating the Conservative Government in 1873; we cannot recognize your services on account of the bigotry of our friends in New Brunswick, but we do not forget these services; we have not a safe constituency for you, like that provided for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), for the then hon. member for West Ontario, but there is up in Simcoe a regular Conservative stronghold; you can go there, and if you can take it you can have it. That was the action of the Liberal party towards one of their colleagues, towards the man who contributed more to their success in the Maritime Provinces than any man who came from those provinces. Therefore I say that hon. gentlemen opposite must not expect to make too much capital by throwing out insinuations such as they have been throwing out to-day. The Government has been formed, the policy has been announced, and that policy is consistent with the policy laid down at the general elections. The Conservatives in the country, and the members of Parliament in this House speaking for the Conservatives in the country, all appear to be satisfied with the present arrangement. It is true that hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied. Why? The day they have long expected has come, but the result they expected would follow has not yet followed. They have been looking forward for years—I do not desire to impute any improper motives to hon. gentlemen which might be thought offensive—to the death of Sir John Macdonald. That time has come, the sad event has taken place, when hon. gentlemen opposite expected to walk across the floor and take possession of the Treasury benches. They are not satisfied with the arrangement, with the reconstruction, with the Premier, with the policy. They profess now to admire the old policy so much that we must not depart from it one jot or one tittle. They are not satisfied with anything. We do not expect them to be satisfied, but we do expect that the policy laid down at the last election and previous elections, and adopted by the people—and it would be adopted by the people at the polls if we appealed to them again—will be carried out by the friends who follow in the steps of our late esteemed leader, and the gentleman who has been selected to form the Administration, and who is Premier to-day, will no doubt follow out the policy pursued by the late Sir John Macdonald. I have no desire to say more on the subject, but I thought these were two or three points deserving of a little attention.

Mr. LISTER. I scarcely thought that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat would have at so early a date sought to make secure popularity and strength for his party on the death of his late leader. The insinuations he made were ungenerous in the extreme, and I could scarcely believe that an hon. gentleman who professed to be such a hearty follower of the late leader of the Conservative party would at this early date have given utterance to the remarks he made. I have not been in this House since Confederation, but I have been in this House for the past nine years, and when I heard the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat give utterance to the ardent feelings of admiration for his late leader, expressions as if he were one of his most devoted followers, my mind carries me back over a very few years, and I very well remember that hon. gentleman leaving the seat he now occupies and taking a seat on the back benches. There are such times, no doubt, in the life of a public man, and one of those times was the occasion to which I refer. His leader was then alive. He was a Minister in Sir John Macdonald's Cabinet, and if I recollect well the feelings to which he has given utterance to to-night were not then to be found in his breast. After the night he was a kicker he was ready to leave the Cabinet, and had to be coaxed back to his former place, and the reason of his action has never been made public to this day. I say it was a shameful and shameless thing on the part of the Government now led by Sir John Thompson, nominally led by the Minister of Public Works, to have advised His Excellency to take Mr. Abbott into the Cabinet as Premier of the country. His relations with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the past fourteen years—even for the past seventeen years—were such as ought to have precluded the possibility of his being Prime Minister and de facto governor of this country. The Postmaster General addressed the House this evening. He told us that Mr. Abbott, having resigned the directorship and solicitorship of the Canadian Pacific Railway, having ceased to be counsel of that great corporation, having disposed of his stock, it was proper, right and unobjectionable that he should now be comethe leader of the Conservative party in this House and First Minister of this country. But looking at the record of Mr. Abbott, apart altogether from his annexation proclivities, which this country can well and fairly forget, looking at his associations with that great corporation from the moment it came into existence until the present, looking at the fact that he has been closely allied with it, that he has made enormous sums of money out of it, that he has been confidential adviser of the officers of that great corporation, that it has received untold wealth from the people, that it nas knocked at the doors of Parliament year after year for legislation—in view of all these facts it was highly improper that the hon. gentleman should have become Premier of this country. In view of the fact that many hon. gentlemen hold their seats to-day by reason of the power and influence alone of that great corporation, it is therefore disgraceful that this hon. gentleman should become Prime Minister. Is there a man living in Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific who believes that if the Canadian Pacific Railway had stood aside the Conservative party would have been defeated and the Government would have ceased to exist? There can be no more doubt of it than that I am speaking in this chamber to-night. They threw their great influence into that contest, a company that had received enormous subsidies from the people of the country, Reformers and Conservatives, a company that had received from the country money sufficient to fabulously enrich the men who were connected with it, men who would have remained in the ordinary walks of life except for the great favours they have received from the Government during the last 14 years. Those men not only exercised the influence which they possessed over the employés of that railway, and coerced them into supporting the Conservative party from Vancouver to the Atlantic coast, but I have no hesitation in saying that the company aided the Government in a more substantial way than that. If the Postmaster General would tell all he knows, if he would take this House into his confidence and tell us what took place between him and Mr. Van Horne immediately before that manifesto of Van Horne's was issued, we would understand how it is and why it is that these hon. gentlemen hold the Treasury benches to-day. They may thank that very corporation for it, and Mr. Abbott being a member of that corporation, a stockholder of that corporation, in its inner secrets, and knowing all that took place, I say that it is not decent that Mr. Abbott should occupy the position he does to-day. I say that in the case of a railway subsidized as that has been, one of its officers should never have been allowed to take a seat in this House until every transaction between it and the Government had been closed and ended. As has been stated in this House the men who now occupy the Treasury benches to-day are not the Government of this country, for the real Government of Canada is now the Canadian Pacific Railway. Upon the benches supporting the Ministry are to be found directors and men in the employ of that corporation in one way or the other. It was said that Mr. Abbott had qualified himself for his position by disposing of the stock which he held in that company, but will any sensible man admit that the disposal of his stock yesterday will qualify him to-day? Take the position that all men must admit, that if he were a stockholder in the company he should not have taken the position of Premier, and is it because he sold that stock yesterday that it is considered proper and right that he should occupy the position to-day? We know that the Postmaster General has not taken us into his confidence, for we are morally confident that the effect of the visit which he paid to Mr. Van Horne was a compact between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and a treaty to the effect: You support us and we will support you. The Government tried the same game with the Grand Trunk Railway; but because the Grand Trunk Railway refused to be a party to their schemes, and declined to become partisans in this contest, from that moment to the present time it has received the contumely and abuse of the Conservative party from the High Commissioner down to the most insignificant member in the ranks. It is of no consequence at all whether Mr. Abbott is an able man or not. Mr. Abbott's place was not the Premiership of Canada, because the man who was entitled to form the Government, and who ought to have formed the Government, was the gentleman whom the Governor General first called upon to do so, namely, Sir John Thompson. That gentleman not having formed an Administration we can only draw the inference that it was because of his persuasion, and because he was not satisfactory to a large number of the members of his party in this House. That can be the only solution that can be given of this matter, and because of that we have Mr. Abbott brought in as leader, and we are told that he has qualified himself because, forsooth, he has disposed of the stock he held in this company. That is an explanation which the people of this country will scarcely accept as correct. My hon. friend opposite says that his Government will hold the Treasury benches for the next five years. That will be the case, no doubt, because hon. gentlemen opposite feel that if this House were dissolved the Government would be defeated. They will hold on to the last minute of the last day, because they know if they again appeal to the country they will not be returned to power.

An hon. MEMBER. Chestnuts.

Mr. LISTER. Yes "chestnuts;" when I came into this House nine years ago the Government had 70 majority, in 1887 their majority was about 50, and in 1891 they have a majority of 23 or 24 and if it were not for McGreevyism, if it were not for the money they have received from the Canadian Pacific Railway, if it were not for the direct influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they would be in the minority to-day and they know that if Parliament were dissolved to-morrow the Liberal party in this country would be returned by at least 60 majority. Hon. gentlemen opposite will no doubt hold on to power, for self-preservation is the first law of nature, and so long as they can draw their sessional allowance for five years they will not do as the late Premier did, dissolve the House a year before the time, but they will hang on for five sessions. Gentlemen, get all you can out of it now, because you won't get very much more after this.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat closed his remarks with one of these prophecies which we have heard on so many occasions from the other side of the House, namely, if we could only have this House dissolved once more that would be the end of the Conservative party. It is not the first time that we have heard speeches of that kind not only in this House but throughout the length and breadth of the land. In fact, gentlemen on the other side have on more than one occasion deceived themselves to the extent that even after a general election was all over, and when we had what the hon. gentleman now says was a majority of 50, they claimed for themselves a majority of two. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman in that portion of his speech. He opened his remarks, however, by stating that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had, in the course of the few observations that he addressed to this House, sought to make capital out of the memory of the late great leader of the Conservative party. There is no need for any man who has followed that great leader in the past to seek to make capital out of his memory. That memory, the spirit of that great man is alive in this land. It is inspiring not only his followers, but it has extended its beneficent influence through every class of the people of the Dominion of Canada, and that memory is held sacred not merely by those who followed him, by the great majority of the people of this country, but that memory has been enshrined upon the other side of the ocean in the mother land, and Sir John A. Macdonald now ranks amongst the greatest men the British Empire has given to the world. It is not certainly in the mouths of gentlemen opposite that any such charge should be found, because if we have this motion before the House to-day it is not merely an attempt on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite to make capital out of the memory of that great statesman, but out of the policy of that great statesman, a policy which they steadily fought and condemned, a policy which they have stigmatized, a policy for which he and those who followed him were hounded down and described as the greatest enemies of their country during the lifetime of Sir John Macdonald. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, like many others, told us to-night that the solicitorship of the Canadian Pacific Railway had been resigned by the hon. leader of this Government and that he had sold his stock only a day or two ago in order the better to qualify himself for the position which he holds, and one hon. gentleman on the other side went so far as to say that even if Mr. Abbott still held that stock he would respect him more than because he disposed of it. We all know that it is not to-day or yesterday that the hon. the leader of this Government ceased his connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway as its solicitor. Four years ago, when he was asked by the citizens of Montreal to become the first magistrate of that city, he then resigned his position as solicitor of that company, the benefits of which amounted to something like $16,000 a year, and devoted his time, and energy, and talents to the service of that great city and all that concerned its prosperity; and after having occupied that position for two years, by the unanimous consent of the whole of his fellow-citizens, every man, whether French or English, Catholic or Protestant, holding up his hands for him, he once more assumed that honourable position. He finally retired from it, though solicited by everyone of his fellow-citizens to continue to occupy it. Yet we are told that he only resigned that solicitorship to accept the high position he now holds. Sir, this is on a par with all the charges made in this debate. But I wish to say that I extremely regret that my hon. friend the whip on the other side should have by any act of his interrupted the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin). Certainly that hon. gentleman did not stand up merely for the purpose of telling us something about the battle on the Plains of Abraham. My hon. friend certainly did not stand up to give us once more the quotation from the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He would probably have made still further quotations, and possibly, as an antidote to that quotation, or to equalize the case, knowing the hon. gentleman as I do to be a man of fair-play, he certainly would have offered this House something from the hon. gentleman who sits on his own side, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who has distinguished himself on many and many a platform in the admirable essays he has delivered, and the eloquent efforts he has made on exactly the same lines as the hon. member for North Simcoe. So that, if we have certain gentlemen on this side of the House who entertain views that are extremely distasteful to my hon. friend, let him, if he desires to undertake a propaganda, begin where he is likely to be successful, among his own friends on his own side of the House; and after he has converted those who are there walking the path of error, then it will be time enough for him to come over here and endeavour to convert those whom I and others have not yet succeeded in converting on this side of the House. Now, the main object of the motion we are now debating is, as has already been said, to cause a feeling of discontent, to create disunion among a people who have chosen Canada as their home. I say so advisedly. I do not hesitate to state that the motion which is brought here to-day has no other purpose than that of creating in the minds of the Catholic people throughout the Dominion the belief that the hon. Minister of Justice was deprived of the position of Prime Minister of Canada on account of his religious persuasion. That has been stated here openly, in order that it might go abroad among the co-religionists of that hon. gentleman; but I am here to state that I am convinced from my inmost soul that there is not one word of truth in the charge. There is no man in this House who mingles more among all sections of the members, or who is more intimate with the members on the Conservative side of this Chamber than I am, and I can truthfully say that from one and all, from the moment that the great chieftain was laid low, from the moment the grand old man had passed away, there was but one cry, but one sentiment, but one motto in the mouths of the members of that party—"we will treasure his memory, we will stand by his policy, we will keep up the traditions of his party, and as one man we will support whomsoever His Excellency sends for." That was the sentiment felt in every true Canadian heart, and expressed by the lips of every member of this party. Now, we see hon. gentlemen opposite seeking to implant the seeds of distrust in the hearts of the Catholic people of the Dominion with regard to a gentleman who, everyone knows, is losing double the amount of money he receives as his salary which he might earn in his profession. Does anyone believe that the hon. Minister of Justice, if he felt himself insulted or slighted, or if he felt for one instant that an attempt was being made to insult his co-religionists who kneel before the same altar, would consent for one instant longer to occupy a seat in this Government? Those hon. gentlemen talk about the esteem in which they hold the hon. Minister of Justice, his great learning, his magnificent career; and still they would have the people of Canada believe, from what is now proceeding in this House, that the hon. Minister of Justice is so craven-hearted, so mean-spirited, as to continue to occupy the position he does, after his people have been insulted and degraded as hon. gentlemen opposite allege. But more, we have the greatest commiseration expressed by these hon. gentlemen for the hon. Minister of Public Works. I am an old friend of that hon. gentleman; I have known, admired, respected and followed him, since the days of the late Sir George E. Cartier, when, as a boy of nineteen, I joined and fought for this party, which I have stood by ever since; and, Sir, if there is one thing that makes a man feel the hollowness of the pretensions of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is when they pretend to commiserate that hon. gentleman whose reputation they have sought to drag into the mire, whom they have held up as one not fit to occupy the position of Minister of Public Works of this country. A few short evenings ago in this House, they clamoured and clamoured that he should resign the position he holds. Such conduct was unworthy of parliamentary institutions, and, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that amongst those who now talk about insults offered to Catholics and to French Canadians, are the men who should have stood up then for the French Canadians. I admired the hon. Minister then; I believed in his purity then; I believe in his honesty and purity now; and all I have to say is that, if he is not the Premier of the Dominion, he has not so much to thank perhaps those who do not belong to his race as the men who are now raising a clamour in the name of French Canadianism, and who were the first to drag his name and reputation into the mire. I shall not say anything more upon that subject now, but will go back a little to the history of the past. The hon. Minister who spoke a few moments ago, told us something of that history, more particularly connected with his own Province, and he showed how those hon. gentlemen who are so loud-mouthed in their liberality while in Opposition, were equally scant of their liberality when in power. But I would like to ask, not merely with regard to one Province, but the whole Dominion, what has been the conduct of the Liberal party in the past? Who first raised in this new land the cry of bigotry and fanaticism? Who first strove to hunt down, in the Province of Ontario, the poor Catholics who to-day have so much sympathy from hon. gentlemen opposite? Do we not remember the efforts of the late Hon. George Brown, month after month and year after year? Do we not remember how our late leader had to fight him and the bigotry and the fanaticism which he sought to excite in the hearts of the people over whom he had influence? Had we not the testimony delivered only the other day in the Senate by the Hon. Mr. Scott, the leader of the Opposition there, that if the Catholic people of Ontario have any rights and privileges to-day, they owe them to the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald and the party he led? But it is not merely in Ontario that we have seen this state of things. Let us go down by the sea. Let us travel to that beautiful island where the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) once occupied the position of First Minister. And what do we find there? We find there what never was seen before, and I trust never will be seen again. With half of the population of that Island Catholics, we saw that hon. gentleman form an exclusively Protestant Government, because he and his friends had trodden down the poor Catholics who were clamouring for their rights on this very school question. That Government lasted from 1876 to 1878, when the hon. gentleman pushed the thing too far. He then tried to induce the whole of that Government to throw all their influence with the Liberal party, in order to secure a Grit triumph—and that was too much for four of his colleagues, and they withdrew. During the existence of that Government it was not merely a policy of no Catholic need apply, but every one of that persuasion was ostracised, not even a Catholic charwoman could get employment. The hon. gentleman lays claim to liberality to-day; if he has improved he has learned his lesson from the Conservative party in this Parliament. But we have not to travel so very far. My hon. friend from Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), who spoke so eloquently to-night in the short speech he delivered, and who spoke so eloquently upon another occasion, devoted himself almost exclusively to the terrible disasters which had been entailed upon the poor French Canadians and Catholics in Manitoba. Why, that is rather dangerous ground for the hon. gentleman to tread. I remember the time when Manitoba became a province of the Dominion. I remember its first Government, and the Government of Mr. Norquay, and I remember how this country looked upon that province with pride as one of those new lands where every man could enjoy his freedom and civil rights. During the whole course of Mr. Norquay's regime, was there one appeal made to prejudice or fanaticism? Was there one law against the French or English or Catholic schools or any man's rights? No; but the very moment these great Liberals, Messrs. Greenway and Martin, came in, then we had all the trouble. We know what they said in opposition. We know how they had flung out to the breeze the flag of liberality, and how, once they got into power, they showed the cloven hoof and trampled upon the rights of the people. It was then we had this brand of discord thrown, not merely into the Province of Manitoba, but among the whole population of the Dominion. It was then we had that province made the theatre of almost civil war; and we have had that war carried into every parish of the Province of Quebec. The fruits of that legislation are still apparent in the appeals of every kind to which it has given rise. And we have another proof, if it were necessary, of the utter hollowness and falsity of the professions of those gentlemen who have liberality on their lips and bigotry and fanaticism in their hearts. There is nothing for those hon. gentlemen but appeals of this kind. They went to the country before with a separate cry for each province, and they are now trying to divide the people of the Dominion into two sections. They are now seeking to make of this country two hostile camps by setting Catholic against Protestant and vice versa. We all know, those of us especially who read the other day the interview with the Hon. Mr. Blake, who is now on the Pacific coast, that the salvation of this country depends on the existence and maintenance of good feeling, harmony, and good fellowship among the people who occupy it. We all know that, with our enormous extent of country and sparse population, if we have that population divided, if we have our people thrown into sectional and religious strife, there can be no prosperity for this land; and yet those hon. gentlemen who profess to be patriotic, who profess to love their country and to have its interests at heart, do not hesitate to trample upon all parliamentary precedent, and to spring upon the country to-day, when they hope the members on this side would not all be present, this motion, in order, if possible, to snap a verdict from the House. And they do all this for a mere party purpose. For that purpose they are prepared to have this country divided. The people of Canada have, however, frowned them down before, and will frown them down again. The people felt that the policy of the Liberal party is one of destruction to Canada, and condemned it at the polls. But now, on the threshold of a new Parliament, the Opposition come here again, not with a generous or a practical policy, but with one calculated to do mischief beyond all computation. And I feel that I would be wanting in my duty if I did not stand up here, and wherever my voice can reach or my words may be read with interest or with respect by any man in the Dominion of Canada, and place upon record the belief, as I do place upon record the belief, that the hon. Minister of Justice would not occupy the position he does in the Government to-day if the Catholic people of the Dominion of Canada had been insulted. I want to put it upon record that the Conservative party were ready to follow him if he had assumed the charge placed upon his shoulders by the Governor General of Canada. And, further, I say that if the day should come when that hon. gentleman should no longer feel that modesty which characterizes him, and which I hope he will overcome, and should accept that charge, the Conservative party from the Atlantic to the Pacific will rally around him, because he will hold in his hand the banner which has been so often carried to victory, and which, with him as the leader, will be carried to victory again. The people of the Dominion of Canada will frown down all efforts to create sectarianism in the politics of this country, and will record at the earliest opportunity, at the bye-elections, how thoroughly they disapprove of the attempt which has been made by the leader of the Opposition on this occasion.

Mr. SPROULE. The threatened wave has arisen; the rumblings of the thunder and the gathering of the storm have been coming gradually nearer; at last the lightning's flash is seen and the storm has struck the ship of State which, strange to say, rides on as calmly to-day on the billows as if nothing had happened. The hon. gentlemen who had been announcing to the country what great an event was going to take place soon, who had been marshalling their forces for this event, have forced on this storm. The cyclone has burst, and it has resulted in a motion for the adjournment of the House on the ground that the present Government have departed from the policy of their predecessors. In what particular have they departed from that policy? We expected to hear of some violation of the constitution or of some violation of principle followed by the late leader. In what respect has the policy been changed? Has it been changed in regard to the formation of a Ministry? Has it been changed because the Premier of to-day was taken from the Upper House? Is there no precedent in English history for that? Is it not the fact that the Premier in England to-day sits in the House of Lords in the same way as does the Premier for Canada? Is it not true that the leader of the Government in the House of Commons in England holds his position there in the same way as the leader of this House does here? Then we supposed that it might be shown that some change of policy had taken place because the representative of the Throne saw fit, after calling one gentleman to form a Government, and receiving the advice of that gentleman to send for another, to select another hon. gentleman to form the Administration. Have we not many incidents of the same character in English history? Have we not precedents to justify that in every respect? Then, it was thought that the accusation might be that the policy of the present Government was changed. How was it changed? Was it not announced in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session, before the death of our late leader, what the policy of the Government was? Was any attempt made to change the policy foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne? Is not the great National Policy carried out as before? Is it in regard to the commercial policy? We have had no indication of any change in that. Is it in relation to the financial policy of the Government? The Minister of Finance will announce that later on. But up to the present time there was no justification for the leader of the Opposition saying that there was any change in the policy of the Government. Was it a change in the foreign policy or in the domestic policy? In none of these have we been able to remark any change in the policy of the Government. Was it any change when the Premier surrounded himself with the men he believed best able to carry on the policy of the country? There could not be any change there because he surrounded himself with the men who composed the Cabinet of the late lamented Sir John Macdonald. It was not on that ground that the leader of the Opposition justified a vote of censure. The same men are there who were there in Sir John Macdonald's time, and the same policy is there. What was the reason given not only by the leader of the Opposition but by his colleagues and supporters in the House to justify the motion he made to-night? It was because they believed there was discontent in the rank and file of the Conservative party. Did they get that information from any reliable source? They got it from their own papers representing their own views. There was an attempt made to prove that there is discontent in the Conservative ranks, that they are a disunited party, and are not to be compared to the Conservative party of the past for cohesion. If there was anything the leaders of the Opposition would welcome to-night, it would be the existence of differences in the Conservative party, because then they would hope to cross to these seats for which they have so long been anxious. Their wish is father to the thought, and they endeavour to convince the House, or rather the country, for they cannot hope to convince this House, that there are discordant elements in our party. They have endeavoured to show from their own press that there are dissensions in the Liberal-Conservative party. They could give us the Globe, the Ottawa Free Press, the Montreal Herald, or the Montreal Witness, but are they authorities which are respected on this side of the House? Those papers are only voicing the sentiments hon. gentlemen would like to see exist, but which do not exist amongst us. One hon. gentleman I must refer to especially, because I find that he has referred to me. It is said that on this side of the House there are many kickers. Among the number a representation has been made that the hon. member for East Grey, who is now addressing you, is one. I am told, though I have not read it, that the Free Press states, as the Globe newspaper did the other day, that the hon. member for East Grey had protested against the Minister of Justice being called upon to form a Government in this country. I may say, and this is the first time I have spoken since the statement was made, that there was not a single, solitary word of truth in that. Neither is there in the assertion that is made to-night that the member for East Grey was at any time in the past, or is at present, a kicker or a dissentient in the Conservative ranks. I may say that those with whom I have conversed, coming not only from Ontario but from the other provinces, are all unanimous. I have failed to find a single hon. gentleman who is not prepared to-day, strongly and willingly, to support, not only the hon. gentleman who has formed the Government, but they would have supported just as strongly and as willingly the Minister of Justice if he had attempted to form a Government. Although it may be said there are dissentients in the ranks, I think hon. gentlemen always find out, when it comes to a vote, that these dissentients fail to materialize. Now, we are treated to-night with an anomalous resolution, a resolution to adjourn the House. It does not indicate any line of policy that the Opposition are going to propound to the country, and upon which they ask the House to censure the Government. It does not refer to any new policy, or any divergence from the past policy of the Conservative party. I do not think they will have the courage to ask for a division of the House after the debate is over, and I expect that they will ask to have the resolution withdrawn. But if they ask for a division, the leader of the Opposition will find that instead of trouble in the Conservative ranks, there is as great a unity to-day as there ever has been in the history of that party for the last twelve years. Now, the whole trend of the discussion to-night by hon. gentlemen opposite has been for the purpose of raising religious strife in this country. Scarcely a man has spoken on that side of the House who has not endeavoured, in a greater or lesser degree, to fan the flames. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), have used frenzied language regarding what they are pleased to call some interference with the rights of the Roman Catholic religion. Speaker after speaker on the other side has endeavoured to make it appear that some great wrong was being perpetrated upon the Roman Catholic minority of this country. But has the history of the Conservative party in the past justified that contention? No, Sir; we have always endeavoured to allay what might cause a conflict between the different elements of this country, what might be called differences regarding religious views, or different nationalities. The history of the Conservative party has always been one of conciliation, of an endeavour to bring these refractory elements together, to give fair-play to all. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) suggested that if they could only appeal to the country to-day, the two parties would change sides in this House. We have heard that prediction very often. We heard it in 1879, in 1881, in 1887, in 1891, but the Conservative party always came back with a respectable majority to control the destinies of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very much like weather prophets—they are unreliable and most uncertain in their predictions. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), in a very facetious manner, referred to the merits of the different members of the Cabinet. It is only a short time ago that he was known as the poet laureate of Ontario, when he gave vent to those very significant lines in which he endeavoured to raise sectional feeling, to inflame the passions of the people against our French-Canadian compatriots, when he gave to the world those beautiful lines:

> "The despot's heel is on thy shore,
> Ontario, Ontario.
> Her torch is at thy temple door,
> Ontario, Ontario."

Now he is singing a different song, because he has a different purpose to serve. I dare say the remnant of that song may be found in his desk to-day, or, if not there, it may be found in Toronto. He is not endeavouring to inflame the passions of the people on that line to-day, but he is endeavouring, in a most ignoble manner, to inflame the religious passions of the people. It is unworthy of the hon. gentleman, who has sat as a representative of the people for so many years. I think he should be engaged in a better cause, and be employed in a nobler work. Now, I believe that when this storm is over and the cyclone has burst, the ship of state will be found riding on the top of the waves as calmly as it did before the elements gave signs of the cyclone that was approaching, and the same party will still wield the destinies of this country. The Conservative party will still continue in the endeavour to develop the resources of this country, to harmonize the conflicting elements of this country, to cement together the various provinces in one national unity, imbuing them with a national sentiment, carrying them on to a national goal, and building up a great country on this continent which shall be the right arm of the British Empire, a part and parcel of the British Empire, a party that will continue to educate the people, and inculcate a national sentiment, a sentiment of loyalty which will never allow traitors to pull down the flag that has so long braved the battle and the breeze, with which we are connected so gloriously to-day, as we always have been in the past.

Mr. SKINNER. I acknowledge I was not in the Chamber to-night when the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) addressed the House, and consequently when I was asked to rise and say whether I was connected with a newspaper in St. John I did not at the time understand what was the point of the enquiry. I understand that during his expression of the opinion he stated that the representatives from St. John, some or all of them, were either connected with a newspaper or owned property in a newspaper in the city of St. John, that had opposed the elevation of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the Premiership of this Government. In reply to the member for Queen's, I think he must have drawn entirely upon his imagination. I do not think that he had any such information as would warrant him in making that statement. As a rule, such things are not stated unless they have some foundation—that is to say, such information is not given unless it has something upon which it can be based. Now, so far as relates to the newspaper referred to, I have neither a money interest in it, nor any connection with it in any way; therefore, so far as I am concerned, the statement is made entirely without any foundation, or even a shadow of foundation. I do not make this statement because I want to repudiate that newspaper, or make any comments upon it further than I shall make presently. That newspaper, I believe, is an entirely independent paper, conducted entirely by the editor who writes for it, and he is not responsible to any one except the parties who might employ him, and those parties are not in politics at all, so far as I know. In fact the whole of the newspapers published in St. John on the Conservative side are entirely independent of all gentlemen who are in politics, and they are conducted from the standpoint of their managers and express entirely their sentiments. The paper to which I particularly refer, and concerning which it was stated that I was part owner and exercised control, did make statements with respect to the elevation of the Minister of Justice to the position of Prime Minister, concerning which I state fully and frankly I do not approve. I will never be a party, so long as I am in public life, and I will retire from it rather than be a party to it, to the principle that religion or anything of the kind should ever enter into the consideration as to who should hold positions, whether that of Premier or any other position in the gift of the country or in connection with the Government. I say, and I speak the sentiments of the two representatives from St. John, who have already spoken on this matter, that had Sir John Thompson tried to form a Government and become leader of the party here, we would have given him our most hearty support and never asked as to his religion or anything of the kind. I make this statement, having understood what was charged with respect to myself, in order that there may be no mistake about it. I may say more. I happened to be in St. John at the time the Government was formed, and I believe it was the common sentiment of the Conservative party in the City and County of St. John, when it was telegraphed down that Sir John Thompson was forming, or was about to form a Government, or was taking part in the formation of a Government, that he should receive the unanimous and most loyal support that any party could give. I hope the statement I have made is full and explicit, and I am sorry that the member for Queen's (P.E.I.) made the remarks he did, for I think they were wholly without foundation in his own mind, and merely due to his political imagination, which stands so high in this House.

Mr. DALY. It was not my intention to have taken part in this discussion, and I would not have done so except for the religious phase introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire to say, as a member coming from the western portion of the Dominion, that so far as I am personally concerned I would be perfectly willing to follow the leadership of Sir John Thompson. Speaking for my colleagues on this side of the House from the Province of Manitoba and members from the North-West Territories and British Columbia, with whom I have conversed on the subject, I may say that every one of them would have been only too proud to follow the leadership of the Minister of Justice. I am glad to say that in the great country from which I come, where everything is of great proportion, we do not look on religious subjects and discuss them in the same manner as do the people in other provinces, particularly in Ontario. In Manitoba religious toleration has existed from the inception of the province. In that province we have a university which sets an example to the people of the Dominion. We have as its Chancellor, the Lord Bishop of Rupert's Land, as vice chancellor, Mr. Bernier, a Roman Catholic Frenchman, and upon the board of management we have representatives of the Roman Catholic Church, Methodist Church, Baptist Church, Presbyterian Church, and Church of England, and these men sit together, and they have sat together since 1871, when the university was established, to endeavour to educate the young in what I contend is one of the grandest principles, and that is religious toleration. It was not until the unfortunate occurrence took place in this House a few years ago, when the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) introduced a motion in regard to the Jesuit question that the subject of religious toleration ever arose in public discussion in Manitoba. The remark made by the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) did not come with very good grace from him, for he must recollect the position of the Liberal party in Manitoba on the school question. He must remember that the Roman Catholics in Manitoba have enjoyed the right to separate schools since 1871, and that until 1891 the question as to their right to enjoy those schools under the Manitoba Act had never come into question and had never been discussed. It was left to a Liberal Government, at the head of which is Mr. Greenway, a gentleman who supported hon. gentlemen in this House before he went to Manitoba, who obtained the influence of hon. gentlemen opposite and who was supported by the sole and only Liberal representative west of Lake Superior, and for Mr. Martin, who was my opponent in the last election, to introduce the first and only question of religion ever brought into public matters in that province. I regret to say that although the Roman Catholics have enjoyed separate schools from 1871 until 1891, Mr. Martin saw fit, regardless of the rights those people have enjoyed and regardless of the fact that those were constitutional rights, to act in a very harsh and uncalled for manner. He did not wait to consult the people and ask their opinion. There was not a single petition laid on the Table of the House in regard to this question of separate schools; but, in order to carry out his own ideas and those of his colleagues, he introduced an Act to abolish separate schools. The consequence is that the Roman Catholics have taken up this question, and it is now before the Supreme Court, and no doubt judgment will be given on the matter in due time. Probably it is not becoming to discuss this question, as it is now before the courts; but I could not refrain from expressing my views, which are those of the people I represent, because on every platform Mr. Martin, my opponent, had as his chief plank this question of separate schools. He declared on several occasions in my hearing that if Mr. Laurier was returned—and he referred to the statement made by Mr. Rochon in the County of Ottawa that he had it from Mr. Laurier, that if he came into power he would disallow the Manitoba Act regarding separate schools and also the Act doing away with the dual language—and Mr. Laurier adopted such measures, he would go into Opposition. I do not know a greater calamity that could befall the Conservative party than that Mr. Martin should become connected with it; but I am satisfied that so far as the Liberal-Conservatives in Manitoba and the North West Territories and British Columbia are concerned, a true spirit of toleration prevails. Although I am a Protestant, I was taught to permit Roman Catholics to worship God according to their own views. I have endeavoured to educate my children in that spirit, and that spirit permeates our people. I ask hon. gentlemen who come from Prince Edward Island, whose minds have not been enlarged, to come to our western country and have their minds broadened on this and other subjects, and they will find prevailing there that spirit of toleration which should exist. I regret indeed that the leader of the Opposition has not adduced facts to bolster up his motion of want of confidence in the Government. The only charge against the Government is that Mr. Abbott, the present leader, was lately a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I understand the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pursued in this case a different policy from that which he generally pursues, and he acknowledged, as well as other leading gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the integrity and honour of Mr. Abbott is beyond reproach. It seems to me very inconsistent that the rank and file of the party behind these leaders should have attacked Mr. Abbott when the prominent men of the party have acknowledged that he is a man of integrity and honour If he is a man of integrity and honour, as we believe him to be and as was stated by Mr. Power in the Senate, does it not follow that although he was a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway he can easily disassociate himself in every way from the company? I am glad to say that I have the honour of that gentleman's acquaintance ever since my infancy, and I rejoice to know from the press and from correspondence with my constituents that the people of Manitoba are well pleased in every way with the selection which His Excellency has made. I can say also to the Minister of Justice that if he had seen fit to comply with His Excellency's request and had formed a Government that hon. and respected gentleman would have received the same support from myself and my colleagues from the Province of Manitoba and west of Lake Superior as they will now accord to the Hon. Mr. Abbott. I will not take the time of the House further than to say that, so far as I and my colleagues from the west of Lake Superior are concerned, we will stand by the policy of our late revered leader, Sir John A. Macdonald. I want my friends on the other side of the House to understand that the Conservative members west of Lake Superior—and I take the liberty of speaking for them—have no dissensions in their ranks. They are not men seeking for office, and they are ready to stand firmly by the great principles of the Conservative party. They will stand by Mr. Abbott as leader of the Conservative party and if he should choose to come down from the high position which he now holds, and if the Minister of Justice should assume the responsibility of that office I tender to that hon. gentleman the same hearty support as we gave to the right hon. gentleman who is departed from our midst, but whose spirit and whose policy remain with us.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not intend to say anything in this debate had it not been, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) has said, that the religious phase of the question was introduced by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. But coming as I do, and coming almost alone as I do, from one of the greater portions of the Province of Ontario, I wish to say a few words, and these few words will be for the purpose of telling my French and Catholic fellow-citizens, and my fellow-members in this House, that the stigma which is sought by any member or members to be placed upon the Conservative Protestants of Ontario is as untrue as it is undignified, and as unnational as it is unkind. I come from a portion of the Province of Ontario which, at the present time, I am sorry to say, is largely represented in this House by gentlemen who see fit to hold political views different from those entertained on this side of the House. The population of that district is largely a Protestant population. It is true we have a large number of Catholics in the district, but the Protestant population is in the great majority, and coming from that district, and having had communication with a large number of the leading Conservatives, some of the most prominent Conservatives in the Province of Ontario, I may say to the House to-night, and I believe they will accept my word upon that point, that I have written assurances in my desk and under my hand from these leading Conservatives, that had either a French Canadian leader or an English Catholic leader been chosen to form the Government of this country, there would have been no more loyal supporters of him in the whole Dominion of Canada than those men who, although differing from such a leader in matters of church, would still look upon him and regard him for his ability and patriotism and for his position as a statesman of this country. I have no hesitation in saying that we are not bigots, I have no hesitation in saying that we are as broad-minded, that we are as liberal, and that we are as fair-spirited as

hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I re-echo the sentiments as expressed by both sides of the House, the hope that the day has not come and I hope the day never will come in these ranks which followed once the great leader who is now gone, when we will reject any man because he happens to worship at another altar than that at which the majority of the people of Ontario worship at the present time. I do not intend to enter into a lengthy discussion on this question, but, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, coming as I do almost alone from that section of Ontario which is largely a Protestant section, I say that it is not the man or it is not the church that we consider, but it is the principles of public policy which he holds, it is his ability, it is his respectable character, and it is his eminence and his standing as a Canadian which will cause us to accept the leader of the Government in the present or in the future. I state here that whether the man chosen to lead the Government of this country be Sir Hector Langevin or Sir John Thompson or the Hon. Mr. Abbott, be he fitted for the place as these men and others are, we will rally around him to preserve that policy which the old man who has gone inaugurated and which I trust this country will pursue for many years to come.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take the floor on this question; but the language used by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue with respect to the Liberal party of 1872 and 1873, and the ingratitude which he shows for the support which he got from the Liberal party at that time, make me raise my voice in protestation in face of the accusation which he brings against the Liberal party, of having held in the matter of the rights of the minority, while in Opposition, certain opinions which they repudiated when in power. Let us see what took place in 1872 and 1873, about this question of the New Brunswick schools? In 1872 the hon. member for Victoria, who later became and still is the Minister of Inland Revenue, made efforts to bring about the disallowance of the law which deprived the Catholics of New Brunswick of their separate schools. In this work he was helped by the most eminent men of the Opposition. In 1873, a motion was moved which was adopted by the House. This motion was to the effect that the law officers of the Crown in England, having given as their opinion that the Act passed by the New Brunswick Legislature was within the attributes of that Legislature, it was proper that a decision of the Privy Council should be secured, and that in the meanwhile the Bill should be disallowed in order that the two parties may seek the courts to have the validity of the Act decided upon. Who were those who supported the hon. member for Victoria on that occasion? All the chiefs and almost all the members of the Liberal party. And who were those who opposed him? The members of the Conservative Government then in power and a part of their supporters. The motion asking for the disallowance was adopted, and the Liberal party would have been ready to go further, had they not been stopped by the hon. member for Victoria (the present Minister of Inland Revenue); he had gone to Fredericton, I believe, and had succeeded in convincing the bishops that it was in the interest of Confederation itself that the Bill should not be disallowed. Everybody knows what took place at that time, and I do not need to quote any higher authority than that of the Bishop of Three Rivers, who, in a letter recently written to the hon. Secretary of State, said that it is in the name of the federal pact that the abolition of the separate schools was confirmed in New Brunswick, and that the bishops did not accept the offer of the Catholic Ministers to resign, and permitted that that unjust law should not be disallowed. Here is a translation of the language of Bishop Lafleche:

"It was in the name of the Confederation Act that the abolition of separate schools was confirmed in New Brunswick a few years ago, and although Catholic Ministers who then formed part of the Federal Government, told the bishops that they would resign on this question, out of respect for the autonomy of the provinces, this unjust law was tolerated."

What was substituted for this disallowance which the House was ready to vote? A vote of $5,000 to carry the question to the Privy Council. This was accepted by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue as well as by all the members who were sitting on the other side of the House. But when, in consequence of the Pacific scandal, a change of Government took place, the solution of the question, which had satisfied the hon. member for Victoria, while his party was in power, ceased to be satisfactory to him. It was no more the carrying of the question to the Privy Council, or a vote of $5,000 for that purpose, that was wanted. After having given up disallowance, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) wanted an amendment to the constitution; after having abandoned a prompt, immediate, efficient means of obtaining justice which was offered him by the constitution and the majority of the House, he wanted to have recourse to ultra constitutional remedies. But his position was so false that he withdrew his motion, and did not even request a division of the House. To complete his inconsistency, the hon. Minister entered and remains in a Government composed of the men who supported the oppressive measures of which he so justly complained! Any serious man who will study the history of the Confederation will necessarily reach this conclusion: That in Canada, as in England, the Liberal party has shown itself to be the friend, the protector, the defender of the rights of the minorities; that this party alone has taken in hand the defence of the oppressed, alone has remained on constitutional ground. On another hand, the student of history will find that all the attacks directed against the national and religious rights of the minority, came from the Conservative camp; that all the measures of oppression and tyranny taken against the minority were promoted and defended by the Conservative party, save few honourable personal exceptions. In view of these facts, there is in the language of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, more than ingratitude; there is a crying injustice against which I think it my duty to enter an energetic protest.

Mr. SAVARD. (Translation.) In taking the floor at this late hour of the evening, it is useless to say that I do not intend to make a speech; but under the circumstances, I believe it to be my duty to my county and to the country, to give an explanation of the vote which I am to cast on this motion. Mr. Speaker, if the motion now before the House had not raised any discussion; if we had simply been called upon to vote on the adjournment of the House, it is useless to say that I would have voted against the motion, for I consider that it would be inopportune to adjourn the House to-day; but after the discussion I see, with all the House, that this motion has a special object. The debate showed that the object was to record a solemn protest before the House and before the country against the formation of the Cabinet. Mr. Speaker, I have always been a Conservative, and I am a Conservative in principles, although my election was carried against one of Sir John A. Macdonald's Ministers. No political question was raised by me in my county during the election; I never attacked the policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. I only contended that it behooved the county to choose one of its inhabitants to represent it in Parliament. These are the circumstances under which I was elected. Since I have the honour of sitting in this House, I have so far taken the most independent position I could take; I have given no partizan vote on the questions brought before the House; each of my votes was given from principle and conviction. But to-night I have a declaration to make and will make it. I consider that the circumstances which have surrounded and followed the formation of the present Administration have been extremely unfortunate for the Province of Quebec, and especially for the French Canadian nationality. Mr. Speaker, if I rise to speak to-night, it is in order to protest against the injustice which was done not only to one but to two members of the Cabinet. There was in Sir John Macdonald's Cabinet a man who commanded the attention of the public and who deserved to occupy the important position of Prime Minister. I was expecting, and it was said in the whole country, that the one who should be called upon to become heir to the late Premier was the hon. Minister of Public Works. There is no man in this House, at least on the ministerial side, who had such a service record. He was Sir John Macdonald's first lieutenant; he had followed him in all and everywhere; he had been the leader of the Government whenever the chief of the Cabinet was absent. He was the one who commanded the attention, and who, according to my mind, should have been called upon to form a Cabinet. But past services, seniority, and constitutional usages were put aside, and there was preferred to him a man who is not responsible to the people. If the hon. Minister of Public Works, or the hon. Minister of Justice, had been chosen, either of them would have given satisfaction to the Dominion, because with either we would have had a constitutional Premier, a Prime Minister responsible to the people, while now we have Hon. Mr. Abbott, a man whom I am willing to regard as perfectly honest, perfectly respectable and able, but, nevertheless, a man whom I do not know, and whom many of us do not know, for his political career has not been as brilliant as that of the hon. Minister of Public Works or of the hon. Minister of Justice. Mr. Speaker, if I took the floor, it was only, I repeat it, in order to protest in the name of my county, in the name of the Province of Quebec, and in the name of the Dominion of Canada, against the injustice which I hold has been done to the House of Commons in the choice of another than a member of this House, and in the ignoring of one of the oldest members of the Cabinet as successor to Sir John A. Macdonald.

House divided on motion to adjourn (Mr. Laurier):

Mr. DEWDNEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to-morrow, to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient further to amend the Act forty-second Victoria, chapter four, intituled: "An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in land to certain Railway Companies," and to provide that Dominion lands may be granted to the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company to an extent not exceeding six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the said company's railway, either from Cheadle Station on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to its terminus at a point in or near Township twenty-nine, Range twenty-three, west of the 4th Meridian, a distance of about fifty-five miles, or from the Town of Calgary, in the District of Alberta, in the North-West Territories, to its said terminus in Township twenty-nine, Range twenty-three, west of the 4th Meridian, a distance of about seventy-five miles.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means to consider of the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty, I desire to ask the indulgence of the members present for a very short time while I make a very brief, I hope a plain and pertinent statement with respect to the finances of the country, the operations of the past and present years, so far as the present year has gone, and some estimates with respect to the succeeding year. It may be stated that in two particulars Canada has not in the past years we have under review been so fortunate as we could have desired her to have been. The harvest, which gave good promise in the opening of the last year, did not fulfil the prospects which were formed with respect to it, and was, therefore, not so abundant as could have been wished, and not so abundant as we have had in some former years. The lumber interest of the country finds itself handicapped to a certain extent in the British markets, chiefly by the overcrowding and overstocking of that market, and to a certain extent as well in the South American markets, owing to the general disturbances which have taken place in some of those countries which were large customers for certain classes of lumber, as a result of
