House of Commons Debates.

FIRST SESSION—SEVENTH PARLIAMENT.

The SIXTH PARLIAMENT of the DOMINION, which had been prorogued from the 16th day of May, 1890, and thence from time to time, was dissolved by Proclamation on the 3rd day of February, 1891, and, Writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the Despatch of Business, on Wednesday, the 29th day of April, 1891, and did accordingly meet on that day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 29th April, 1891.

On which day, being the first day of the meeting of the First Session of the SEVENTH PARLIAMENT, for the Despatch of Business,—JOHN G. BOURINOT, Esquire, Clerk of the House of Commons, DONALD WILLIAM MACDONELL, FRANÇOIS FORTUNAT ROULEAU, and HENRY HARTNEY, Esquires, Commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the Oath to Members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty;—SAMUEL E. ST. O. CHAPLEAU, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said JOHN G. BOURINOT a book containing a List of the Names of the Members returned to serve in this Parliament.

The aforesaid Commissioners did administer the Oath to the Members who were present, which being done and the Members having subscribed the Roll containing the Oath, they repaired to their seats.

A Message was delivered by Réné Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

Gentlemen:

The Honourable Sir WILLIAM JOHNSTONE RITCHIE, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Honourable Sir WILLIAM JOHNSTONE RITCHIE, Deputy Governor, does not see fit to declare the causes of summoning the present Parliament until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but to-morrow, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the causes of calling this Parliament will be declared.

And the House being returned,

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. BOURINOT, I rise to move:

That PETER WHITE, Esquire, the member representing the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Renfrew, do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

To those hon. members who have sat in previous Parliaments I need not say one single word as to the merits of Mr. White, or as to his fitness to perform the duties of this office, this high and important office, with due dignity, and not only with dignity of manner but with impartiality and ability. Mr. White has been in Parliament for fourteen or fifteen years, and from the time he first entered it he took a very considerable position, even when a very young man; and we all know the assiduity and ability with which he performed his part and his duties as a member of the House of Commons of Canada. He was always in his place, always ready for his work, enjoying and earning at a very early period the respect and esteem, and, I may say, the friendship of his associates in Parliament, whether sitting on the right or left of the Speaker; and he vindicated the judgment of his constituents in electing him as their representative, for we all know how well he performed his duties as a member of this House. I do not know on either side of the House any hon. member who would prove, from his demeanour, conduct and ability, more acceptable, without reference to political questions, than my friend the member for the North Riding of Renfrew. Without further remark, I move the resolution, seconded by Sir Hector Langevin.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. BOURINOT, it is the privilege of the Administration, at the opening of every new Parliament, to suggest a member whom they believe to be worthy of presiding over the deliberations of this House and competent to discharge the important duties of the office of Speaker. It is not unnatural to expect that the Administration, in seeking for such a person, will look exclusively into the ranks of their own followers, however attenuated, diminished, decreased, thinned or decimated they may have been by the verdict of the people. It would be the right, nay, it would be the duty also, of the Opposition, if the person thus offered to the House did not meet with their approbation, to express their dissent by their words, and, if necessary, by their votes. In the present circumstances, I cannot say that I am altogether disappointed at the choice of the right hon. gentleman, and, for reasons obvious, I am rather disposed to agree with his choice. But the right hon. gentleman has developed of late such a sense of loyalty to British institutions, such a deference for British precedents, that I supposed he would be glad to agree to come back to British practice and to follow British precedents, by suggesting to this House the continuation of the late Speaker as the present Speaker of this Parliament. The right hon. gentleman is aware, and more aware than I am myself, that, according to British precedents, my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet), who was the incumbent of the office of Speaker during the last Parliament, should be the choice of the House on the present occasion. But, Sir, I knew before to-day that Conservative loyalty to British institutions shines and glows at election times, and when the elections are over it is put under a bushel to serve again when the occasion arises. If, however, British precedents are to be discarded, I would have suggested that with great propriety my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood), who was Deputy Speaker for the last Parliament, and who had discharged the duties of the office with admirable skill, as everyone will agree, would have been worthy of the honour of being Speaker of this House. I do not say this, Mr. BOURINOT, with any intention of impugning the qualifications of the hon. gentleman who is now suggested to the House as the future Speaker. I am disposed to say on behalf of the Opposition—of the Loyal Opposition of Her Majesty: loyal, Sir, in every sense of the word, loyal to the Crown, loyal to the people, loyal to this House; even loyal to the majority of this House, and ever ready to accept a good suggestion from the majority when on the few and rare occasions a good suggestion comes from them—I am disposed to agree with everything that has been said by my right hon. friend in reference to the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), the nominee for the office of Speaker. Everything the right hon. gentleman has said is fully endorsed by his colleagues in this House. From past experience of the hon. gentleman (Mr. White) I am sure that he is endowed with a thorough knowledge of the practice and business of this House, and we know from experience that he is also endowed with a sound judgment, a firm spirit, and I should say, a great independence of character. My hon. friend will pardon me, I hope, if I remind him that perfection is not of this world. He would not be of the human race if he did not allow me to tell with perfect candour that he cannot be altogether free from fault. I must, however, say that the only fault I have ever found with him was that I believe that he is endued, nay saturated, with a certain political heresy which at one time was very prevalent in this country, but which under the lessons of a sad experience is now fast disappearing, and which will be long remembered by a long-suffering people as the National Policy. I am glad to say that I am sure that this heresy which would impair the usefulness of the hon. member on the floor of this House, if he had a seat in common with all of us, will not affect him at all while he is sitting in the Speaker's chair. I am sure that when he ascends to the chair he will leave aside all party proclivities and all political professions, and that in the high station to which he shall be called by the unanimous choice of the House he will stand upright and impartial, holding the scales evenly between contending parties without fear of any one, with favour to none, and with fair play to all.

The motion being put to the House,

Mr. BOURINOT declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente; and PETER WHITE, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of North Renfrew, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Mr. WHITE was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's Chair by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Hector Langevin.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. SPEAKER ELECT. I have to tender my grateful acknowledgment to this House for the high honour it has conferred upon me in electing me to the position of Speaker. It will always be my earnest hope to deserve the confidence that has been reposed in me, and I shall endeavour to discharge the duties of the high position to which you have elected me, with firmness and impartiality. I am fully sensible of my unfitness for the position, but I shall rely upon the co-operation of the hon. gentlemen upon both sides of the House to assist me in maintaining our Rules and Orders, in vindicating our rights and privileges, and in preserving the freedom and dignity of debate according to established usages.

The Serjeant-at-Arms then placed the Mace on the Table of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to: and House adjourned at 3.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 30th April, 1891.

The SPEAKER Elect having taken the Chair,

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

MR. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the HONOURABLE PETER WHITE, SPEAKER ELECT, said:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their QUEEN and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of Speech in their Debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable consideration.

The Honourable the SPEAKER of the Senate then said:

MR. SPEAKER,—

I am commanded by His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's Person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow, their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you, that the Commons shall have access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned,

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to state that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen on me, and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House a judgment bearing date the 8th November, 1890, of the Hon. Mr. Justice Armour, one of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, in the matter of the election petition for the Electoral District of the County of Halton, by which the then sitting member was declared duly elected.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS OF OFFICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

Bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform this House that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I am glad to welcome you to the duties of the first Session of a new Parliament, which I hope will be memorable for wise deliberations, and for measures adapted to the progress and development of the Dominion.

The season in which you are assembled has opened auspiciously for the industries of our people. Let us hope that their labours may be crowned with fruitful returns from land and sea, and that the great resources of Canada may continue to reward the toil and enterprise of its inhabitants.

My advisers, availing themselves of opportunities which were presented in the closing months of last year, caused the Administration of the United States to be reminded of the willingness of the Government of Canada to join in making efforts for the extension and development of the trade between the Republic and the Dominion, as well as for the friendly adjustment of those matters of an international character which remain unsettled. I am pleased to say that these representations have resulted in an assurance that, in October next, the Government of the United States will be prepared to enter on a Conference to consider the best means of arriving at a practical solution of these important questions. The papers relating to this subject will be laid before you.

Under these circumstances, and in the hope that the proposed Conference may result in arrangements beneficial to both countries, you will be called upon to consider the expediency of extending, for the present season, the principal provisions of the protocol annexed to the Washington Treaty, 1888, known as the Modus Vivendi.

A disposition having been manifested in the United Kingdom to impose on sea-going ships engaged in the cattle trade increased safeguards for life and greater restrictions against improper treatment, a careful enquiry has been made as to the incidents of that trade, in so far as this country is concerned. The evidence elicited on this enquiry will be laid before you. While I am glad to learn that our shipping is free from reproach in that regard, your attention will be invited to a measure which will remove all reasonable apprehensions of abuses arising in the future in connection with so important a branch of our commerce.

The early coming into force of the Imperial Statute relating to the Vice-Admiralty Courts of the Empire has made it necessary to revise the laws in force in Canada respecting our Courts of Maritime Jurisdiction, and a measure will therefore be laid before you, designed to reorganize those tribunals.

A Code of the Criminal Law has been prepared in order that this branch of our jurisprudence may be simplified and improved, to which your best attention is invited.

Measures relating to the Foreshores of the Dominion and to the obstruction of its navigable waters, will be submitted to you, and you will also be asked to consider amendments to the Acts relating to the North-West Territories, to the Exchequer Court Act, and to the Acts relating to Trade Marks.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Accounts for the past year will be submitted to you. The Revenue, after providing for the services to which you appropriated it, has left a surplus for the works which you designed to be carried on by Capital expenditure.

The Estimates for the coming year will be laid before you at an early date.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I pray that in the consideration of these matters, and in the performance of all the labours which will devolve on you, your deliberations may be Divinely aided, and that your wisdom and patriotism may enlarge the prosperity of the Dominion, and promote in every way the well-being of its people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections; 2. On Expiring Laws; 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills; 5. On Standing Orders; 6. On Printing; 7. On Public Accounts; 8. On Banking and Commerce; 9. On Immigration and Colonization:—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Special Committee of seven members be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House this day, and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir John Thompson, and Messrs. Bowell, Laurier and Mills (Bothwell) do compose the said Committee.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

REPRESENTATION OF CHICOUTIMI.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the Government to the fact that the returning officer for the County of Chicoutimi has not yet made his report to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the present member elect, Mr. Savard, is deprived of his seat. The election took place on the 5th of March, and there can be no reason why the report should not have been in a long time ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Clerk informs me that it is on its way. It has been telegraphed for. I do not know the cause of the delay.

Motion agreed to: and House adjourned at 3.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 1st May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of PAUL VILMOND SAVARD for the Electoral District of Chicoutimi and Saguenay.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. BOWELL. With the consent of the House, I desire, before the Orders of the Day are called, to move the usual motion for the appointment of a Joint Committee to supervise the Report of the Debates. There are but few changes. I propose to substitute Mr. LaRivière for Mr. Vanasse and Dr. Cameron of Inverness for Mr. Tupper, who wishes to be relieved of the duties pertaining to this committee, and to place Mr. Skinner on the committee instead of Mr. Ellis. The motion is as follows:—

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Reports of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time; to be composed of Messrs. Béchard, Cameron (Inverness), Charlton, Davin, Desjardins (Hochelaga), Innes, LaRivière, Prior, Scriver, Skinner, Somerville, Taylor, Weldon, and White (Cardwell).

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to mention this matter to me, and at the moment I saw no objection to the names he proposed, but, on hearing the changes he proposes, I find that the proportion of the two parties on this committee is somewhat altered from the proportion last year. I find that the Opposition has one member less on the committee than it had last year, and it seems to me that if any change were made, it ought to be made in the other direction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would, therefore, suggest that the motion should be left over until to-morrow.

Motion postponed.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. HAZEN. In rising to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne with which His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to open the First Session of the Seventh Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, I feel that, as a young member of the House, and as a member without experience in parliamentary matters, I may well be pardoned if I follow in the well-worn footsteps of gentlemen who, in previous Sessions, have preceded me in this duty, and pursue the time-honoured custom of asking the kind indulgence of the House in the remarks which I am about to make. It is well understood that the formality of a Speech from the Throne—a formality which, like many of our institutions, is derived from the mother country—is intended to enable a brief reference to be made to matters of administration and to convey to Parliament an idea of the important measures which will be submitted for their consideration, and though, in the Speech with which His Excellency opened this Parliament yesterday, the subjects referred to were not very numerous, they have yet, I feel, so important a bearing and so comprehensive a view in regard to the welfare of this country of ours that of this Speech it cannot be said, as has been said in criticism of others in the past, that it is more remarkable for its omissions than for what it contains. With the two first paragraphs of that Speech I feel satisfied that hon. members of this House, sitting on either side of your Honour, will agree, and that the sentiments expressed in them will strike a responsive chord in the hearts of all who have heard them. It is very important indeed in all legislative bodies that the deliberations should be carried on wisely, harmoniously and in a spirit of fairness, and it is especially important in a young country like this Canada of ours, standing, as I may say, on the very threshold of its career of welfare and prosperity, that the legislation should be not only of a progressive character, but should be along the lines which have characterized the legislation of this country for the past twelve years, and which have resulted in the development of its industries and natural resources and the amelioration and the betterment of its people. It is pleasing to know that the season which has just opened has opened so auspiciously for the interests and industries of the people of this country. It is pleasing to hear the reports made from every part of this Dominion, from the north and the south, from the east and the west, that there is every prospect that the farmers and the husbandmen of Canada will have their labours abundantly rewarded by the yield of a splendid harvest. With us in this country, as in every other country where agriculture is the mainstay of the population and the true basis of the nation's wealth, the quality of the harvest is the guarantee of the wealth of the people, and it is of the utmost importance that the crops should be successful. It is, therefore, to be hoped that this season will justify the hopes expressed by His Excellency, and that its result will be as beneficial as its opening is auspicious. We will all agree, no matter on what side of the House our fortune, or our misfortune, may have placed us, in the wish that the labours of the manufacturers, the farmers, the fishermen, the miners and the lumberers of our country, the men whose labour and toil really make the country and produce its prosperity, may have their labours crowned with success, and that their endeavours may generously rewarded. The policy by which the North-West Territories were acquired by this Dominion and were subsequently opened up by the building of a splendid line of railway extending from ocean to ocean, has been the means of allowing civilization to spread its beneficent arms over the great West, and has added vastly to the area of our agricultural and settlement lands and has added very much to the greatness and the prestige which this country enjoys to-day in the eyes of the world. In view of this, I think that the visit of the tenant farmers to this country, whose admirable reports have been printed and published throughout England and Scotland, will be of great benefit to this country, as these practical men who came here to view the country for themselves and to give the result of their examination to the people of the country in which they live, will have the result—they being practical men and known to be such, and their reports being scattered broadcast amongst the people—of doing great service to Canada, and their visit will do more good than a hundred paid immigration agents, and, I think, will prove to be no small factor in attracting to our shores the population of the old world who are thinking of making for themselves a prosperous home in the new. I think we will find, as the result of this visit, our great western country peopled by men of good means, and becoming, as it ought to be, the happy home of many millions of prosperous freemen in the near future. I have read the pamphlets which have been cast broadcast on this subject, and I have read them with a great deal of pleasure. There is one report written by Mr. J. T. Wood, a tenant farmer who lives near Liverpool in Great Britain, and this is a sample of what he finds as illustrating what energy and intelligence can accomplish in this great Dominion. He says :

"One of the best managed farms in the neighbourhood of Brandon is that of Mr. Sandison; and although his success must be taken as much above the average, it nevertheless shows what is possible in a good district when a farmer is thoroughly master of his work, and understands the management of the soil. It is Mr. Sandison's pride to relate how, in 1884, he, as a farm labourer, entered the North-West, hiring himself as a servant at Carberry, and saving money until he was in a position to gradually and quietly acquire land; how, in 1886, he commenced farming on a half-section (320 acres), and being fortunate with each succeeding crop, has added annually to his area, until in 1890 he has 2,000 acres under cultivation, the purchase price of which is nearly all paid; he has 70 men who are housed and fed on the premises, and during the harvest season just completed had 40 horses and 14 self-binding machines. Mr. Sandison's crop of wheat, oats and barley (principally wheat), aggregated 60,000 bushels, and he estimates the value of his present property at £10,000, giving quite as much credit to the wonderful soil and climate as to his own pluck and clear head. Mr. Sandison maintains that Manitoba compares more than favourably with Dakota, and that its superior advantages will soon be universally recognized.

In the face of these facts can we have the slightest doubt about the prosperity and the success which will, in the near future, attend the western part of this Canada of ours? It was, I think, most expedient and very proper that the advisers of His Excellency, late last year, should have reminded the Government of the great Republic to the south, of our willingness to join with them in developing the trade between the two countries. In doing this the Government of the day were simply following out the policy which we have pursued in this country ever since the year 1879, when they caused that policy to be embodied in an Act which was then placed upon our Statute-book. Now, Sir, it must also be very gratifying to this House to know that, our Government having reminded the Government of the United States of their willingness to treat with them, a time has been fixed in the month of October next for holding a conference for the purpose, not only of considering trade matters, but for the purpose, also, if possible, of arriving at an amicable settlement of all matters in dispute between the two countries, including the fishery quesion and the Behring Sea dispute. That conference, I believe, will be watched with very great interest by the people of the whole of this North American Continent. The relations and the interests of the people of the two countries which compose the northern part of this continent, are, in a commercial way, in a social way, and in a friendly way, closely interwoven in many respects, and I believe that if a fair reciprocity treaty can be effected along the lines of the old Treaty of 1854, it will be of considerable benefit to both countries, and that it will meet with favour from all parties in the Dominion of Canada. But while I say that, and while I believe that the people of this Dominion are willing to go a considerable distance for the purpose of negotiating a reciprocity treaty on terms fair and honourable to Canada, and on terms fair and honourable to the United States, at the same time I think I am voicing the sentiments of a great majority of the electors of Canada, as was shown by the recent election, when I say that so long as we maintain our British connection—as I trust we will continue to do for all time to come—as long as we continue under the protecting ægis of the British flag, as we have been for the past 200 years, as long as we have the strong right arm of England at our back, and enjoy the protection of her army and navy—as long as that is the case, I think, as I said before, that the people of this great Dominion will not approve of an arrangement which would hand over the control of our tariff to the American Congress at Washington, and which would discriminate against the mother land in favour of a foreign country, however much we may esteem the people of that country. As this conference is to consider, not only the trade relations between the two countries, but the other outstanding difficulties between them as well, it is only fit and proper that the provisions of the modus vivendi should be continued in operation for another year. That modus vivendi, as, of course, the hon. members of the House all know, was agreed upon for the purpose of giving the Senate of the United States time to ratify the Treaty of 1888. That treaty, as we know, Sir, has not been ratified by the Senate of the United States; but I feel that at the present time, in view of this conference to be held at Washington, nothing should occur which would in the slightest degree cause any friction, or which would mar in any way the friendly relations existing between the two countries. Therefore, I think that hon. members on both sides of the House, seeing that this conference will shortly take place, will appreciate the importance of continuing the operations of the modus vivendi for another year, in order to prevent the possibility of anything occurring which would mar the friendly relations which at present exist between the two countries, or which would present any increased difficulty to the representatives of the two countries when they meet at Washington to consider the different matters that are in dispute. A consideration of the modus vivendi reminds me of the question affecting the fisheries of this country; and as I come from a maritime constituency in which there are many hardy fishermen, I know that the House will excuse me for devoting a few moments to that subject. We, living in the Maritime Provinces, probably appreciate the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada more highly than do the people of the western Provinces. These fisheries are of great importance, and are a great source of employment to a very large number of men, and yield to this country every year the sum of—in round numbers, I believe—about 17 million dollars. Now, it is only right and proper that we should in every way protect and preserve for our own people that magnificent heritage which Providence has placed upon our shores and in the sea surrounding our country. It is of the utmost importance that the people of a foreign country should not be allowed to come into our waters and take our fish unless they pay an equivalent, or give something in return for the privilege of doing so. It is, moreover, it seems to me, the duty especially of the Marine and Fisheries Department of this country, so to watch over and protect those fisheries that there may be no danger of their being lessened at any time, and that they may continue to yield the magnificent return, the magnificent harvest, if I may say so, which they have yielded in the past. In this connection, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a condition of things which exists, as I am informed by fishermen in my own locality, in regard to the herring fishery in the Bay of Fundy. Along the islands in Charlotte County, in the Province of New Brunswick, in Grand Manan, Campobello and other islands, and along the coast, large weirs, called brush weirs, are erected for the purpose of catching small fish, which are then taken across to Eastport, in the State of Maine, and sold there to sardine factories for the purpose of being manufactured into sardines. I am told by the fishermen along that part of the coast, that this practice is doing great injury to the herring fishery in the Bay of Fundy, that this wholesale destruction of small fish is not only endangering the herring fishery, but is also injuring the larger fish, the cod, haddock and hake, which follow these small fish and live upon them as food. In this way, the practice which I have referred to is doing an injury to the general fisheries of the Bay of Fundy, and I wish, on this occasion, to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to these facts, and to ask that they may receive, in the future, his most careful consideration. The next matter which is referred to in the Speech of His Excellency, is one of very deep interest to the people of the Maritime Provinces and to all those in Canada who are interested in the shipping of our country; it refers to what may be called the load-line legislation of the Imperial Parliament in the year 1890; and as there are some hon. gentlemen here who may, perhaps, not thoroughly understand this question, I may take a few moments to explain the legislation now existing on that subject. In 1890 a Bill was introduced into the Imperial Parliament to amend the Merchants' Shipping Act regarding load-lines, which Act was passed in 1876. That legislation provided for a compulsory load-line, to be arbitrarily fixed for all vessels sailing the British flag by the Board of Trade, either by their own officers or by the officers or surveyors of any other corporation—such, for instance, as Lloyds. It is felt in the Maritime Provinces especially that that legislation would militate against the interest of our ship-owners. Our tonnage in Canada is made up principally of wooden vessels, entirely different in model and construction from the iron and steel vessels which make up the tonnage of Great Britain. Our vessels are shorter, of deeper hold and broader beam, and better dead weight carriers, and few, if any, casualties have ever occurred to them from over-loading, and it was felt that they were likely to be affected, prejudiciously, by any load-line arbitrarily fixed by the surveyors of the Board of Trade or of Lloyds, who would apply to them the same rule that they apply in fixing the load line on the steam and iron ships of Great Britain; and so great injury would be done to the shipping interest of the Maritime Provinces. Consequently, petitions were sent up from all the principal ports in the Maritime Provinces—from Halifax, Pictou, St. John and other places, asking the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to endeavour to have that legislation changed in the interest of the ship-owners of Canada. The Minister of Marine corresponded with the High Commissioner, the High Commissioner corresponded with the British Government, and after considerable correspondence between the High Commissioner and the British Government, and between the High Commissioner and the Minister of Marine, as a concession to Canada a clause was inserted in the Bill providing that if in any British possession enactments were framed for the marking, fixing and registering of the load-line on vessels owned and registered in such British possession, such legislation would be satisfactory to the Board of Trade, providing the enactments were based upon the same principle as was the enactment contained in the Imperial Act. In consequence of such condition of affairs, a Bill will be submitted for our consideration during the present Session, providing for the fixing of a load line on our Canadian vessels; and I confidently hope and expect that such legislation will be so framed as not to prejudicially interfere with our vessels or place them at a disadvantage in competition with the soft-wood vessels sailing under the flags of other countries which have no such restriction, because, if they were placed at a disadvantage in that regard there would be danger that our vessels might be forced under the flags of nations where no such restriction exists. So, coming from a constituency where many of the people are interested in vessels employed in the coasting trade, I desire to express the hope that, in the load-line legislation to be submitted, our vessels engaged in that trade will be exempt from its provisions. Hand in hand with the legislation concerning the load-line is the legislation concerning the Admiralty Courts of the country. This legislation becomes necesary in consequence of Imperial legislation. On 25th July, 1890, a Bill became law in Great Britain, entitled "An Act to amend the law respecting the exercise of Admiralty Jurisdiction in Her Majesty's Dominions and elsewhere, out of the United Kingdom." Clause 3 proves as follows :—

"(3). The Legislature of a British possession may by any Colonial law—

"(a.) Declare any court of unlimited civil jurisdiction, whether original or appellate, in that possession, to be a Colonial Court of Admiralty, and provide for the exercise of such court of its jurisdiction under this Act, and limit, territorially or otherwise, the extent of such jurisdiction; and

"(b.) Confer upon any inferior or subordinate court in that possession such partial or limited Admiralty jurisdiction under such regulations and with such appeal (if any) as may seem fit:

"Provided that any such Colonial law shall not confer any jurisdiction which is not by this Act conferred upon a Colonial Court of Admiralty."

Under these conditions of the Imperial Act a Bill will be introduced into this House conferring jurisdiction on certain of our courts which will act as Courts of Admiralty and try suits arising out of collisions and otherwise, which are now dealt with by the Vice-Admiralty Courts of the country. At present there is an appeal from the Vice-Admiralty Court to the Privy Council. Under the Bill to be introduced there will be an appeal from the Admiralty Court to our appellate courts and also to the Privy Council; and I trust, in framing the Bill, due regard will be had to the convenience of the different localities in which the Vice-Admiralty Courts are situated at present, and in which the shipping interests are centred. Another piece of legislation of importance that will come before the House is a Bill for the codification of the Criminal Laws of the Dominion. The codification will be along the lines of the Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's Code, which has given such great satisfaction to the members of the bench and the bar, and all interested in criminal matters in Great Britain. It will contain the common law relating to criminal law and procedure, as well as the provisions of existing statutes. This will be a matter of very great importance to the community, and will act very beneficially in like manner as the consolidation of the different Acts relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes which took place last Session, and we know what great convenience has resulted from that Act in its present form. I do not wish in any way to anticipate the remarks which the hon. the Minister of Finance will address to this House when he comes to deliver his Budget Speech, and, therefore, as regards the finances of the country, I will content myself by simply expressing the opinion that when the accounts for the past year are laid before the House it will be found that the finances of the Dominion are in an exceedingly healthy condition. It will be found, among other things, that during the year the revenue of the country has been ample to meet the ordinary expenditures, and also to carry over a large amount to capital account as well; that during 1890 we paid in interest $8,904,944.61 as against $9,192,995.44 paid in 1889; and also that during the year ending 1st July, 1890, we paid in interest a sum less than in any of the four preceding years. It will be gratifying to the House to know that the average rate of interest for the past year was 3·75 per cent., or a less rate than has been paid by this country since the days of Confederation. It must be a matter of supreme pleasure to hon. members to find that the credit of the country stands so high in the money markets of the world, that we are able to borrow money at a less rate than ever before, and our credit, placed side by side with that of other countries of the world, does not suffer by comparison. Concerning the finances of the current year, I will confine myself to stating that it will be found that the trade of the country has been well maintained, that the credit of the country has been sustained, that the various services have been generously supplied, that the different sources of revenue have provided not only for the ordinary expenditures but have furnished a handsome surplus to be carried to capital account. Now that the great trunk lines of railway have been completed, now that the canal system has been almost completed, now that the greatest expenditures for public works necessary to be undertaken for more than half a century have been made, we may congratulate ourselves that the addition to our permanent debt from year to year will not be a large amount, at least not more than we may reasonably expect in years to come, with our increased population, to be able to bear without burdening the tax-payers of the country. There is a matter outside of the four corners of the Address to which I wish to refer before I take my seat. It may not be the usual course to follow, but, coming from a constituency of the Maritime Provinces, which have been most grossly and most unjustly assailed by an hon. gentleman who occupies a high position in this House, and a leading place in the councils of his party, I feel, as a representative of the Maritime Provinces, I should not be doing my duty to the people I represent did I not, on the floor of Parliament, take the first opportunity afforded me of denying and resenting the statements which that hon. gentleman hurled broadcast through the country, to the discredit of the people of the Maritime Provinces. In a letter addressed to his constituents by that hon. gentleman, who for many years has occupied a conspicuous place in the political history of the country, in an address signed by the hon. gentleman and sent broadcast throughout the Dominion by means of the newspapers, as the clouds of the recent election were clearing away, I find the people of the Maritime Provinces have been most grossly insulted and most unfairly dealt with. In that letter, written by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the following appears :—

"Our opponents' array, on the other hand, is mostly, literally, a thing of shreds and patches, made up of ragged remnants from half a dozen minor Provinces, the great majority of whom do not even pretend to be actuated by any principle save that of securing a good slice of boodle for themselves and the sections or constituencies they respectively represent, and who know besides that popular feeling in those very provinces is strongly and distinctly in favour of our policy, though actual cash in hand or in the shape of railway subsidies has proved too much for the virtue of a majority of the voting population in many instances."

The hon. gentleman nods his head in assent to that statement. I might have made excuses for the hon. gentleman, considering the state of his feelings just after the recent elections, for we know that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and I, for one, would be glad to know that in his cooler moments he should be ready to repudiate such a gross slander on the people of the Maritime Provinces. When I first read that address, had I not known that the hon. gentleman was a man of education, and a man who understood the full force and meaning of his language, I would have believed he could not have understood the full import, the full meaning, and the full insult to the people, that are contained in the paragraph I have just read. I wish now to say from my seat in this House, that the people in the Maritime Provinces—the Province of New Brunswick for whom I specially speak—have just as much regard for principle, just as much regard for the right, and just as much respect for what is honourable in political matters as the hon. gentleman, who speaks of them as if they were dirt beneath his knightly feet, himself has for those principles. During the recent elections in the Province of New Brunswick there was never a mention made of a railway subsidy, from one end of the country to the other. I speak with special reference to the Province from which I come, and I speak for the largest and most important constituency in that Province, the City and County of St. John, which I have the honour to represent. In the recent contest in that constituency there was, from beginning to end, but one question discussed before the electors on the public platform, by the different candidates and in the public press, and that question was: Is unrestricted reciprocity, as defined by the hon. gentleman himself, as defined by the hon. leader of the Opposition, as defined by the leaders of the Liberal party, and as defined by Mr. Wiman in the North American Review, is that policy of unrestricted reciprocity in the best interests of the country, or is it not? That, Sir, was the sole question at issue. We asked the electors: Are you in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, when the logical results of such a policy must be as they are defined to be by its authors; or are you in favour of attempting to obtain a modified form of reciprocity while still cherishing our British connection? That was the one question discussed on every platform and in the columns of every newspaper in the Province of New Brunswick. I venture to say that the gentlemen who were our opponents in the constituency during the recent contests—one of whom is a gentleman who was for many years in this House, and who held the esteem and personal good-will of the hon. members on both sides of the House—I say that our opponents in that contest will not contend that there was a single side issue introduced; they will not say that the constituency was bribed; they will not say that the people had cash in hand or promises of railway subsidies, but they will admit that the contest was fought fairly and squarely on the question before the electorate, even though their votes were contrary to the wishes of our opponents. In the City and County of St. John the majority for the successful candidates was so large that it is simply idle talk to speak about cash in hand and railway subsidies. In the county represented by the hon. member on my right (Mr. Wood, Westmoreland), who came back with a majority of nearly 2,000 votes, it is idle to speak about the offer of bribes and railway subsidies. Taking the Province as a whole, the popular majority, fairly and freely given by the people, amounted to over 5,000 votes, the largest popular majority ever obtained in the Province by any political party. In view of these facts, I need say but little in repudiation of the slanderous statement the hon. gentleman has published in the other provinces concerning the Province of New Brunswick. In order that I may show the proper lesson to be drawn from the result of the election in the Maritime Provinces, I wish to read a statement of a leading Liberal in my constituency: the statement of a gentleman who is a personal friend of my own, but who, I regret to say, does not see eye to eye with me on political questions,—I speak of Mr. Allan Jack, the Recorder of the city of St. John. That gentleman was one of our strongest opponents on the platform during the recent campaign, and on the 27th day of March, he wrote a letter to the Toronto Week giving his views on the elections in the Maritime Provinces. That letter concluded as follows:—

> "Upon the whole, and entirely outside of party considerations, the result of the elections in the Maritime Provinces may be regarded as significant proof that the various sections of Canada are becoming more consolidated, and that some description of British connection with the Dominion is strongly desired."

That, Sir, is the fair opinion of a gentleman who was one of our most active, vigorous and able opponents in the campaign. I ask you to place it side by side with the letter addressed to his constituents by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and to take your choice as to which statement you will approve of. Now, Sir, I feel I have taken up the time of the House for too long a time in dealing with this matter, for it may be considered outside the four corners of the Address, but I feel it my duty as one of the representatives of the Maritime Provinces to avail myself of the first opportunity to show how actually destitute of foundation in fact is this statement which has been circulated by the hon. gentleman in the Province of Ontario. As a young man coming to this House, desirous of forming right ideas on the models of the leaders of parties, I did regret to find that a man who aspires to be the leader of a great party in this country, instead of attempting to solidify the different Provinces of the Dominion, instead of attempting to draw us all together and to make us feel, as we do feel in the Province of New Brunswick, that we are the people of a common country,—I regretted to find that he should endeavour to raise sectional cries and to make reference to certain provinces of this great Dominion, repudiating us and insinuating that those provinces have not the same rights as a part of this Dominion, which our larger provinces have. It appears to me, that true statesmanship in this country should be directed along the lines of healing up any differences that might have existed at the time of Confederation, and of enabling our people (whether we belong to the wealthy Province of Ontario, to the historic and populous Province of Quebec, to the Prairie Provinces, to the Maritime Provinces, or to British Columbia), to be able to say with heart and soul upon all occasions, that we are citizens of this our common country, and that we are proud of the distinction of being Canadians. I am glad to say, Sir, that this is the spirit which is actuating the young men of the Province of New Brunswick to-day; the young men to whom we owe the recent great victory at the polls. These young men are forgetting the battle of Confederation, they are forgetting the differences of the past, and they are realizing that they are citizens of a country of which they are proud, and a country of which they will be prouder in the future, as it prospers and grows great, along the lines of nationality within the British Empire of which we form a part. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to thank the members of the House for the very attentive and patient hearing they have given me. I desire on my own behalf, and on behalf of my constituency, and especially on behalf of the young men of that constituency, to thank the Government for having done me the honour of asking me to move the Address to-day. That Address is moved by one who represents a constituency, the boundaries of which are washed by the blue waves of the Atlantic Ocean, and it will be seconded by an hon. gentleman who represents a constituency 4,000 miles away on the shores of the peaceful Pacific. Could any greater demonstration be afforded, could anything more clearly show the vast extent, the vast resources, and the vast capabilities of the Dominion of Canada? In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I think I may be allowed to quote the concluding paragraph of His Excellency's Address, and to express the hope that our "deliberations may be Divinely aided, and that our wisdom and patriotism may enlarge the prosperity of the Dominion and promote in every way the well-being of its people."

Mr. CORBOULD. Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I fully appreciate the honour which the right hon. the First Minister has conferred upon me in requesting me to do so. I am fully aware of my unfitness and inability to perform that important duty, and I must, therefore, crave the indulgence of the hon. members of this House, and depend upon their generosity in extending to me that kindly consideration which is usually shown to new and inexperienced members. I observe in the Speech from the Throne that His Excellency has caused the Administration of the United States to be reminded that the Government of Canada are willing to open negotiations for the extension of our trade relations with that country. Canada for the last thirty-six years has been trying to obtain a satisfactory trade treaty with the United States. I am aware, Sir, that Canada was very prosperous under the Treaty of 1854—so much so that the United States Government thought proper to do away with that treaty. Since that time Canada has always been willing to enter into a treaty based upon the terms similar to those set forth in the Treaty of 1854, but all her efforts have met with refusal upon some pretext or pretension on the part of the Washington Government. I think, Sir, we may congratulate ourselves upon the firm stand our Government has taken on this question; for although Canada has always been willing to enter into a reciprocity treaty with the United States, still the Government of Canada has not been willing to barter away our political independence and our British connection to obtain it. I am sure, Sir, that both sides of this House will read with pleasure that part of His Excellency's Speech in which it is stated that the differences of an international character between Canada and the United States are to be speedily settled. As to the Behring Sea question, it is one in which the province in which I have the pleasure to reside is, perhaps, more interested than any other province in the Dominion. A larger amount of capital has been invested in the sailing fleet of British Columbia, and it is somewhat hard for the gentlemen engaged in that business to stand by and see their ships, their furs and their all seized and taken from them without the slightest cause by a foreign power upon the high seas, and not resort to force to maintain their rights. This House and the people of this Dominion ought to give great credit to those hardy sailors for the good sense they have shown and the patience and forbearance they have exercised, in waiting for an amicable settlement of this question. I may, therefore, venture to hope, Sir, that with the prospect of a speedy settlement of this question in view, this House may see proper to adopt the measures to be brought forward dealing with it. Whatever measure is brought before us relative to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, I hope, with the honourable mover of the Address, that due regard will be shown to the various circumstances existing in the different provinces. I am also particularly glad to see that the Government intend to bring down a measure to simplify and improve the criminal law of Canada. There have been many miscarriages of justice, particularly in connection with proceedings before justices of the peace, and any measure that will simplify the law in this direction will be welcomed by those people who have charge of the administration of justice in country places, where books and legal advice are hard to obtain. One of the most important measures promised in His Excellency's Speech is that relating to the foreshores of the Dominion. I hope to see the property in these foreshores vested in the provinces, so that they may have the control and management of the surveys which it will be absolutely necessary to make in the near future. Unless those foreshores are placed in charge of the provinces, I am sure that a great deal of litigation will arise, and the decisions given may not always be satisfactory. I notice that His Excellency has made mention of proposed amendments to the Acts relating to the North-West Territories. It is to be hoped that the promised measure will effectually deal with the liquor question, for I think it is of vital importance to the people residing in those territories, surrounded as they are by Indians, that effective legislation should be at once adopted on this question. I have no doubt that the proposed amendments will also deal with the question of the dual languages, upon which a resolution was passed by the late Parliament last Session, and I venture to hope that that question will be dealt with in a manner satisfactory not only to those territories, but to the country at large. I would like, Sir, to say a few words relative to the Province of British Columbia. I would like to see the members of the Government pay more frequent visits to that Province. I would like to see every member of this House pay a visit to British Columbia. It requires a personal knowledge of that province to realize its beauties and its richness, and to understand what a prize the Dominion of Canada secured when British Columbia came into the Confederation. I think I may safely say that that province is to-day the most prosperous in the Dominion. Our lumber business, our coal mines, our fishing and agricultural industries, are all in a flourishing condition, and year by year are increasing in prosperity. The people of my own district would particularly welcome a visit from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, so that he might obtain personal knowledge of the salmon-canning industry, and judge for himself what rules and regulations are necessary to govern that important business. It has been said by the Opposition press that the Government is losing power in this country. I think that remark does not apply to the Province of British Columbia, for out of the six representatives returned by that Province to this honourable House, two were returned by acclamation, the opponents of three lost their deposits, and the sixth was opposed by a Conservative. I think that British Columbia did her duty, and she will be prepared to do it again when the occasion arises. I have much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in seconding this motion.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the resolution, Mr. Speaker, now in your hands, might well have dispensed with claiming the indulgence of the House, because they certainly stood in no need of it. The hon. the mover of the resolution, though young in years, displayed all the art, and, I might perhaps add, all the agressiveness of an old stager, and I have much pleasure in extending to him, as well as to the seconder of the Address, my very hearty congratulations on the manner in which they have both discharged the duties they undertook. The "manner," I say advisedly. The language, the delivery, the patriotic effusions with which their remarks were suffused, were all very enjoyable and thoroughly enjoyed by the House. I am sorry, however, that I cannot extend the same encomium on the matter of their speeches or the facts—rather what were given and accepted by the other side as facts—and the arguments drawn from those facts, or rather the long stretches of imagination which supplied the place of arguments and facts. I do not say this in any spirit of disparagement—far from it. It seems to me the hon. gentlemen deserve great credit for the manner in which they contrived to build upon such slender material; I appeal to the right hon. gentleman to admit, as I am sure—if he has not lost all sense of right—he must admit, that this verbose document, known as the Speech from the Throne upon the present occasion, is a very dry skeleton. The right hon. gentleman, on a former occasion, characterized the Speech from the Throne as shining in omissions. I think if there ever was a Speech which shone by omissions, it is the present one. It is literally bristling with omissions. I fail, for instance, to see in it any reference to the causes of the dissolution of the late Parliament. So far, we have never had any explanation from a responsible Minister, why Parliament was dissolved, and we naturally expected that, at least on the present occasion, this omission would be supplied, and some of the reasons given which were urged upon His Excellency as excuses for dissolving the late Parliament. I submit to the House, that this keeping the country in ignorance as to why Parliament was dissolved, is a breach of the constitutional law. I fail likewise to see any reference to the repeal of the Franchise Act, the uselessness of which has been thoroughly demonstrated, since it has been made clear that an election can take place without an annual revision. I fail likewise to see any reference to an amendment of the electoral law, which would prevent a recurrence of outrages such as those which have disgraced the late election. I fail likewise to see any reference to the conveyance of mails from this country to Europe. For the last forty years until now, the mails have been carried from this colony to the mother land in Canadian bottoms. Two years ago the Minister of Finance told us that this system was antiquated, and that he was about to provide us with a better system—with a system as good as any then in existence—and the result of his efforts has been that the antiquated system has ceased but has not been replaced by any system at all. Would the House believe it, the hon. the Postmaster General is today sending the mails of this loyal country, this country bristling with sentiments of loyalty, to the mother land, through the United States viâ the port of New York. I denounce the Postmaster General as a traitor, whether veiled or unveiled I shall not say, for I am not sufficiently posted in the ethics of loyalty, as they are understood by the Conservative party to do so; but, according to my blunt judgment, and according to the views laid down by hon. gentlemen themselves, the Postmaster General is a traitor whom I denounce to the indignation of the loyal men and true who stand around him. By way of compensation, however, we are promised measures—for what? For the transfer of the jurisdiction formerly belonging to the Vice-Admiralty Court to some other court; for the codification of the Criminal laws; for legislation concerning the foreshores of the Dominion, the North-West Territories, the Exchequer Court and Trade Marks. Well, with the exception of the Bill relating to the North-West Territories, which is a very important measure indeed, all the other measures are very dry bones; and it would be almost useless for the right hon. gentleman, as it was useless for the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address, to clothe with flesh, sinews and veins such bones as these and to breathe into them the breath of life. But the hon. gentlemen early took the opportunity to depart from the four corners of the Speech, as was said by one of them, and to launch at once into the sea of Conservative exultation and Conservative laudation. When the debate was opened, I was prepared for much, but I did not expect that the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Hazen) would have had the courage to boast of the continued confidence of the country in the present Administration as exhibited in the late election. The continued confidence of the country in the present Administration—where is it?

Mr. WELDON. Right here.

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly not in this House. When this House last met the Ministerial ranks were not only filled up on the opposite side but also on this, so as hardly to leave us a small corner. But where are now the serried ranks of the Ministerial party? Where are they? Battered, shattered, crushed, simply from their contact with the will, the mind, and the heart of the people. Why, it seemed to me, when I heard the paean of the hon. the mover of the Address in praise of the Conservative triumph, that he must have felt, as did King Pyrrhus, when congratulated on a victory by his troops over the legions of Rome, and could say with him: Another such victory and we are undone. Hon. gentlemen opposite may applaud any reference to the continued confidence of the people in the present Administration, but they know full well, every man of them, that such boasting is simply sound and nothing else. Why, there is not a supporter of the Government who would dare to lay the policy of his party—that hazy, misty, undulating, fluctuating, shifting mass of contradiction, which constitutes the policy of the Conservative party—before the people, unless the people had been in advance gagged, as gagged they were in the last election—yes, gagged, shackled and manacled—gagged, shackled and manacled by iniquitous laws—gagged, shackled and manacled by laws which have mutilated the boundaries of counties so as to swamp the voice of the people therein, by laws which left the preparation of the lists of voters in the hands of the Government, by laws which left the printing of the lists in the hands of the Government, by laws which have allowed the Government to appoint the revising officers of those lists, by laws which allowed the Government to appoint most unblushing partizans to that office, by laws which allowed them to perpetrate the most disgraceful frauds in favour of the Government from whom they have received their appointments. The hon. gentlemen speak of the continued confidence of the country in the Government. That confidence to which they refer is only expressed by the aids of such iniquitous measures as those to which I refer, supplemented by other iniquitous modes of bribing constituencies, worse than ever known in any country, and that is what they call receiving the continued confidence of the people, but they have never received the continued confidence of the people of the country. If the hon. gentleman is sincere in his belief that he had at the late elections the continued confidence of the people of the country, let him repeal these iniquitous Acts,—let him repeal the Gerrymander Act, let him repeal the Franchise Act, and then dissolve Parliament, and we will meet him face to face before the country on even ground, and then, I venture to say, his majority of to-day will be wiped out and not even enough will be left to form a corporal's guard. Then again, I ask, why was there a dissolution? The power of dissolution is one which should at all times be sparingly exercised, and should only be exercised for cause. The duration of Parliament is fixed by law, and, while the power to dissolve Parliament is certainly left to the Crown, it is not left to the whim or the caprice of the Crown, but has to be exercised on the advice of the Ministers, and those Ministers are responsible to the people of this country. The reasons which are given to His Excellency, advising him to dissolve Parliament, should be communicated at once to Parliament. That is the spirit of the Constitution; that is the spirit of the British Constitution for which hon. gentlemen opposite profess so much admiration, and to which they profess so much devotion, but they never hesitate to stab it if, by stabbing it, they can gain a party advantage. But I ask, of all the reasons which were urged upon the Governor General to induce him to dissolve Parliament, did we ever hear any reason given to Parliament, did we ever hear any reason coming from the lips of a Minister of the Crown? Never, to this day. It is true that we have had some reference made to it in the Ministerial press. For instance, in the month of February last, the Montreal Gazette, one of the leading organs of the Administration, had this despatch, which was evidently inspired from Ottawa:

"Ottawa, February 2nd.—The Sixth Parliament of Canada is at an end. Acting on the advice of his responsible Ministers, His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to dissolve the House of Commons and issue his writs for a new Parliament. Nominations will take place on Thursday, February 26, polling on Thursday, March 5. The writs are to be dated February 4, and made returnable on April 25.

"In view of the foregoing important statement the question will naturally be asked, what are the reasons which has induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present time? It is understood that the Dominion Government had, through Her Majesty's Government, made certain proposals to the United States for negotiations looking to an extension of her commerce with that country. The proposals have been submitted to the President for his consideration, and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that if the negotiations are to result in a treaty, which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient that the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House."

We have some reason to believe, though everything stated here is not true, that the bulk of the statement is true, and that the advice tendered to His Excellency to dissolve Parliament was because the Government desired to obtain power in order to obtain a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. We have also been favoured with a communication which consists of the correspondence between His Excellency the Governor General and the Imperial authorities, and we find there a document dated the 13th December last, as follows:

"Government House,
Ottawa, 13th Dec., 1890.

"My Lord,—I have the honour to send to your lordship to-day a telegraphic despatch in cipher of which the following is the substance:

"With reference to my telegram of the 10th inst., the Government is desirous to propose a joint commission, to deal without limitation and to prepare a treaty representing the following subjects:

"(1) Renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854."

But even if the reason urged upon His Excellency for dissolving the existing Parliament was this, we find immediately that there was a change of front, because, a few days afterwards, the hon. gentleman issued a manifesto to the people of Canada, and in that manifesto there is not a word to be found in regard to that reciprocity treaty. I have the manifesto here, and this is the first part of it:—

"To the Electors of Canada:

"Gentlemen,—The momentous questions now engaging public attention having, in the opinion of the Ministry, reached that stage when it is desirable that an opportunity should be given to the people of expressing at the polls their views thereon, the Governor General has been advised to terminate the existence of the present House of Commons and to issue writs summoning a new Parliament."

Sir, you will see that not a word from the first to the last, if you read that manifesto through, is used about any conference with regard to obtaining a new reciprocity treaty, how limited soever it might be. What was the reason given to His Excellency for dissolving Parliament? It is stated that it was to negotiate a treaty, and yet, in the manifesto, not a word was said of the treaty, but the whole argument to which the hon. gentleman devoted himself was one of favour of the continuance of the National Policy. The reason for this is clear and obvious. There are two principal classes in the Dominion of Canada. There are farmers on the one side and manufacturers on the other. The hon. gentleman will pardon me for the simile which I am about to use, of the bat who one day fell among the birds and the other day fell among the rats. When he fell among the birds he said: Look at my wings, I am one of your tribe. When, the next day, he fell among the rats he said: Look at my claws, I am one of your tribe. So the hon. gentleman says, when he is among the farmers: I want to soar like the birds to reciprocity—here is the correspondence which I have brought down. But when he gets among the manufacturers, and particularly among the monopolists, he says: Look at my claws, I am one of your tribe; and, like you, I have still the people of this country to prey upon. There was another argument produced in the manifesto of the hon. gentleman. In that he appealed to the people of this country on their prejudices, and on the worst prejudices that could possibly be used against an Opposition. The only plea, the only argument he had was to say, that the policy of the Opposition was a disloyal policy, that it was likely to lead to annexation, and it was hostile to Great Britain. Loyalty? I am reminded here of the words of Madame Roland when she was led to the scaffold. She was one who had contributed to the French Revolution, and she fell a victim to the passions she had aroused but could not control. When she was led to the scaffold and was compelled to bow to the statue of Liberty, she exclaimed: "Oh, liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name?" We in Canada have to ask how many crimes are committed in the name of loyalty. But, if the reason given to His Excellency for dissolving Parliament was the reason given in the ministerial press, namely, to obtain power from the people to initiate a new treaty on the grounds of the Treaty of 1854, that was merely a pretence and nothing else. It was certainly no good reason. There never was a minute since the year 1866, when the late treaty was terminated, when every Government in this country had not ample power to negotiate another such a treaty. There never was a public man in this country, whether on that side of the House or on this side, who was not prepared at any moment to negotiate a treaty on that line. Yes; there was one exception, the late President of the Council, Mr. Colby, who has just paid the penalty for such unpatriotic opinions. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is more than that. The National Policy even was a means to an end, that end being the renewal of the reciprocity treaty. The resolution has been quoted more than once in this House, but the memory of hon. gentlemen opposite is so treacherous, it is so defective, that I feel bound to repeat the language of the right hon. gentleman himself. The famous motion upon which the appeal to the country was made in 1877, after having recited what the National Policy would do, went on as follows:—

"That this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of the National Policy which."——

And so on. And then it states:

"In moving as it ought to do in the direction of a reciprocity of tariff with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually, a reciprocity of trade."

It has been contended by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that this policy had been endorsed three times over by the people of Canada—in 1878, 1882 and 1887. If that is the case, was it not simple mockery, was it not an insult to the Crown, to ask for power to dissolve Parliament on that issue, when the policy of the Government had been endorsed again and again, and affirming the necessity of such a treaty? Sir, it was a mere pretence. The true reason was that the policy of the Opposition was gaining ground and the Government took fright. The only reason was that the sense of what the country needs is developing in this country in favour of greater freedom of trade, in favour of the view that however satisfactory unrestricted reciprocity might have been at one time, it would be more satisfactory at the present time. Sir, the right hon. gentleman is a good judge of weather; he can scan the political horizon as well, and perhaps better, than any man living. He foresaw that the tide was rising, impetuous, irresistible, in favour of greater freedom of trade. He saw that his only hope of reaching port, if he wanted to reach port again, was to put to sea at once, for if he were to wait till the tide had reached its height, he knew very well that his leaky craft would be shattered to pieces under the surging indignation of a long, long-suffering people. I say that is the reason, and the only reason. Sir, I do not give my own statement alone on this point, I have the authority of hon. gentlemen opposite. I speak by the book, because I speak after Sir Charles Tupper himself. In an interview with the London correspondent of the Toronto Globe had lately with Sir Charles Tupper, that hon. gentleman was reported to have made the following statement:—

"If the Liberal party in Canada had adhered to Mr. Blake's Malvern speech, and the election had been postponed for another year, the Liberals would have gained a majority in the House of Commons. The Government had triumphed from their opponents' blunders."

You have it here stated by Sir Charles himself, that if the election had been postponed for another year the Liberals would have triumphed. It is true that Sir Charles Tupper stated immediately afterwards that the Government triumphed through the blunders of their opponents; but I think we all know Sir Charles Tupper sufficiently well to understand that when he speaks of the blunders of his opponents, he means exactly the reverse. The Opposition blundered, but still it was necessary to prevent these blunders from having their effect upon the country, but if the Government had allowed the Opposition to blunder one year longer, the former were undone, and it was to prevent the effect of the Opposition's blunders that the Government charitably came to their rescue and ordered the elections at once. Sir, if the Opposition were blundering, what shall we say of the policy of the hon. gentleman who, with all the blundering of the Opposition, with the iniquitous Franchise law at his disposal, only triumphed by the skin of his teeth? I would not object to a dissolution in itself. If I object to this dissolution, it is simply because there was no fair play in the dissolution at that time. A dissolution would have been welcomed at any time, but there was treachery in the dissolution at the time it took place. More than that, not only was there treachery in the dissolution, but I have no hesitation in saying that, coming as it did, it was an outrage, nay, a crime against the dignity of the Crown, against the rights of the people. It was an outrage against the dignity of the Crown, because we had had the pledge of the Crown that no election would take place until the lists had been revised according to law. Sir, if there is one thing which ought to be sacred, and is sacred to-day, it is the pledge of the Crown to the people of the country. The hon. gentleman knows better than I do that if there was one thing more than another which alienated from King James II the heart of his subjects, it was the duplicity with which, again and again, he broke his word to the people; and since the flight of James, the word of the Sovereign of Great Britain has always been held to be as immovable as the rocks upon which the Island of Great Britain rests. That is true in England to-day, but it is no longer true in Canada: it is not true in Canada so long as the word of the Crown is in the keeping of the present Ministers of the Crown. Sir, we have a Franchise Act and it is not a jewel; on the contrary, it is a monster. That Act was framed and revised for the benefit and advantage of the Conservative party, but although it was framed for the benefit of the Conservative party, it is so cumbrous, it is so expensive, that it has been a nightmare to every member of the Conservative party. Everyone wants to get rid of the annual revision of the list, because it is so cumbrous and so expensive: and last year the hon. gentleman anticipated the wish of his followers, and he proposed a measure to dispense with the annual revision of the list. The measure was in the hands of the Secretary of State, and I will remind the House of the language he used on that occasion:

"Nobody will deny that a revision devolves a great deal of anxiety, trouble and expense, both to the members already representing constituencies and to the would-be candidates for those constituencies. If we had a revision this year it must be admitted that it would take place in very unfavourable circumstances * * * * * But is there no other reason why that revision should not take place? We have not yet reached the end of this Parliament: according to law this Parliament will cease in the beginning of 1892."

Then the hon. gentleman goes on to speak about the census, which is taking place now:

"If in July, 1891, the census shows that the representation must be changed it will become necessary to have new elections soon after the census; and those elections should take place at the beginning of 1892, by the natural death of this Parliament according to the constitution. The question which presented itself to me was this: By the experience of the past, could a revision beginning in June, 1891, be satisfactorily made, and would it be ready for the eventuality of elections in 1892. There is no reason to doubt it."

Here is, therefore, the pledge of the Crown that there would be no election till the list had been revised in the present year, according to the terms of the law. Of course we know very well that it is always open to the Crown to advise a dissolution, and I do not suppose that at that time the hon. gentleman contemplated a dissolution; therefore, I saw that it was his duty at that time to say: "Gentlemen, remember that there may be a dissolution at any time, therefore you must be ready to take the consequences." If the hon. gentleman had used that language of course every man would have said: "There must be a revision of the list at once, because we must have a perfect electorate." When the hon. gentleman introduced that Bill and carried it with the sanction of the Crown, it was a pledge to the people that there would be no election until the list had been perfected. But six months afterwards the Government decided to have an election, and they did not scruple to trample upon the dignity of the Crown in order to gain party advantage over their opponents. But the elections have taken place. And now I ask, what is the policy of the Government with respect to the main issue of the double issue which was submitted to the people of the country? If the elections meant anything, they meant this: that a delegation, an official delegation, was to go to Washington immediately after the elections. Yet nothing of the kind has been done, because I count for nothing the officious, not the official delegation, which visited Washington, comprising two important members of the Administration, chaperoned by Sir Charles Tupper. Like Cæsar they went, they saw; but, unlike Cæsar, they did not conquer. They came back without having achieved anything. It has been asserted in some quarters that those gentlemen were treated with discourtesy by the American authorities. I do not believe it, and hon. gentlemen opposite have taken care to say that the delegation were received with every courtesy; but I do not hesitate to say that, even if they had met rebuffs, those gentlemen would only have received the treatment for which they seemed to be yearning, because nothing could be so offensive to international courtesy as the language used by some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I am sorry to say that in this respect the right hon. gentleman, who is usually cautious and prudent in matters of international import, set his followers a very bad example. The language used by that hon. gentleman in a speech delivered at Halifax last fall was unpardonable. Speaking of our relations with the Republic to the south of us, the right hon. gentleman said:

"It is a great country, and will be greater, but like all young countries it will have its vicissitudes, its reverses and its revolutions. Do not we see already from the mass of foreign ignorance and foreign vice that has poured into the United States, how uneasily the working population move in the great labour centres? Do not you see communism, and socialism and atheism, and every other ism there? That the United States will rise superior, and out of these heterogeneous particles form one great people, I have no doubt."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I commend the hon. gentleman for that charitable sentiment; but listen to what follows. The hon. gentleman continues:

"But depend upon it they are going to have their revolutions and upheavals, while we shall sit calmly under the protecting flag of Great Britain and enjoy the magnificent country that God has given us and look with philosophic eyes at the struggles of a fierce and discordant democracy."

Nothing could be more contrary to the amity which we owe to the neighbouring Republic. There was hostility in this, as there was hostility in the relations of the Canadian Government towards the American authorities during the Civil War. At that time also we looked with "philosophic eyes at the struggles of a fierce and discordant democracy" and the result was that we lost the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, and we wish to Heaven that our similar action now will not cost us another treaty. But after all that has taken place we should have been told in the Speech from the Throne not only that the Government is about to send commissioners to Washington, but the basis on which they are going to treat with our neighbours. Will it be unrestricted reciprocity, will it be restricted reciprocity, or reciprocity at all; or will the negotiations be confined only to the fishery question, whether in Behring Sea or the Atlantic? We do not know, and, if I speak my own mind, I do not believe at the present moment hon. gentlemen opposite know their own minds on this subject. They may agree on the question of retaining office, but when they come to deliberate on this question, confusion worse confounded will arise in their councils. A confusion of tongue will prevail, because we have heard all sorts of language from members of the Administration on this subject. We have heard the Secretary of State at one election speak of unrestricted reciprocity in a manner which cheered and delighted the heart of every patriotic Canadian. We have heard the Minister of Finance upon the floor of this House declare that the only policy of the Government was the National Policy: and, as regards the Prime Minister, sometimes he advanced and then receded, then he advanced again and again receded. We know, for instance, that during last summer he offered reciprocity in coal, but, at the remonstrance of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he had to swallow that offer; and if members of the Administration cannot agree even on an offer of reciprocity in coal, it is not surprising that they should fail to agree upon any programme to be submitted to their Commissioners. But whatever may be the policy of the present Government upon this question, I assert that the people of Canada to-day want a change, and a change there must be. In 1878 the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), in the most emphatic manner denounced the Government of my hon. friend to my left, because at that time there were 500,000 Canadians in the United States. He declared it was a shame, a burning shame, that with our good climate, equitable laws and fertile soil, the Government could not retain our own people. I believe the hon. gentleman on that occasion did not speak mere empty, idle, unmeaning words. I hold that he spoke the sentiment of his heart, and if he was not speaking simply as an intellectual device, I wish him to look at the record of his work for the last ten years and see whether it has borne good fruits or not. The evil of which he complained then has been intensified tenfold. Sir, we must have a change, and it must be in the direction of greater freedom of trade. This is admitted on all sides, by all parties, and it is admitted even by the staunchest of all Tories—the Imperial Federationists. While they commit the mistake of basing their trade policy upon uniformity of allegiance and a mere sentiment, we of the Liberal party maintain that the policy of this country must be based not upon sentiment but upon business principles; and, fresh as we come from the people, I say that the only policy which will benefit this country is unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade. Sir Charles Tupper says in an article published a few days ago in the North American Review, that the delusion, as he calls it, of unrestricted reciprocity was dead and buried. Dead and buried! I am as good an authority on this subject as is Sir Charles Tupper, and I say it is more alive than ever. I am prepared to say much more. I am prepared to say that when Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington a few days ago, in company with the Minister of Justice and Minister of Finance, he was ready to offer the American Government unrestricted reciprocity. Sir, I am going to break the hearts of men who are loyal and true, who have been led to believe that the Liberal party want to give up this country to the Americans by carrying out a policy of unrestricted reciprocity; but they must be prepared for a greater shock still, because this abomination of desolation has entered the holy of holies. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) shook his head a moment ago when I said Sir Charles Tupper was ready to offer unrestricted reciprocity. Does the hon. gentleman not read the Montreal Gazette? I read it every day. On 10th April, the Gazette published an article, in answer to the Globe, which had asserted that the visit to Washington had been a failure. The Gazette, the organ of the hon. gentleman opposite, spoke as follows:—

"The Toronto Globe speaks of the failure at Washington as though the Canadian delegates were in some unexplained way responsible for it, and asks: 'How could the Canadian Ministers hope to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with the Washington Administration?' But the failure was on the part of Mr. Blaine. No negotiations were afloat; the matter had not yet reached that stage. Indeed, Mr. Blaine flatly objected to the appointment of a formal Commission until he learned upon what basis the Canadians proposed to treat, and it was to assure the American Secretary of State that the Canadian Government is willing to discuss the question on the broadest lines, even on the basis of unrestricted reciprocity, that Sir Charles Tupper returned to Washington with Sir John Thompson and Hon. Mr. Foster."

Have the pure fallen from grace? Here is treason rampant, and who is to indict the traitors when the Minister of Justice himself is either a traitor or connives at treason? Reciprocity dead and buried! It is only three years ago since we commenced this agitation, and already we have triumphed in the two leading provinces of the Dominion. Already we have the fact that many American statesmen are prepared to treat with us upon that basis. We have the opinion of Mr. Blaine, we have the opinion of Senator Sherman, we have the opinion of Mr. Hitt, and we have the endorsation of the Boards of Trade of New York city, of Boston city, of Chicago city, and of several others of the northern cities in the United States. Reciprocity dead and buried! Why, Sir, we never yet have been met with arguments from the Government against reciprocity. The right hon. gentleman has never himself dared to offer any argument against us. In the manifesto which he issued he never discussed the question, but simply appealed to the prejudices and passions of the people. He appealed to their prejudices and passions, and he stated that unrestricted reciprocity would lead to annexation. I deny that proposition. Of course, Sir, I know very well that there are men in this country who believe, and who honestly believe, that, perhaps, unrestricted reciprocity would be the first step towards annexation. I do not dispute any man's conviction; but I ask these men to exert their reason. If we have reciprocity at any time, as we shall have it, I believe, before very long, these men will not then be denied the right of suffrage, for they will have the right to vote against annexation, if annexation is proposed by any person, the same as they would have the right to vote against annexation, if it were proposed to-day. Shall we be so diffident of our manhood that we dare not do what we think best for our interests, because, forsooth, some one might be dragged away from his allegiance to his country in favour of American citizenship? Whatever may be the fears of the Conservative party on this question, I have no fears for the Liberals of Canada. We do not boast of our loyalty, but we have it in our hearts, and not upon our lips as the hon. gentlemen opposite have it, and we do not fear that we shall be seduced away from what we believe to be right in principle. The right hon. gentleman said that this policy was hostile to Great Britain. Again I deny it; but, Sir, I am free to admit, that I, for one, when I made up my mind in favour of this policy, looked up first and last to the interest of Canada and not to the interest of England. I am a British subject and I never forgot it yet; but while I am a British subject I remember that I am also a Canadian and I sit in the Canadian Parliament. Let the British subject who sits in the British Parliament look after the interests of England. When this Confederation was organized (and no one knows it better than the right hon. gentleman himself), it was organized with a view of forming a nation of this United Canada. The hon. gentleman must have foreseen, since this was to be a nation, that some day or other the interest of this young nation would come in contact with the interest of the motherland. It is absurd to suppose that, situated as we are, the interest of Canada will always be identical with the interest of Great Britain. Some day must come when these interests will clash, and whatever the hon. gentleman may be, for my part whenever it comes to that, and, however much I must regret the necessity, I will stand by my native land. Let me ask, Sir, why did your ancestors, and why did my ancestors, leave their native land? Nothing is so dear to the heart of man as the land where he first saw the light of the world, the land which is associated with his family ties; but, Sir, did your ancestors leave their motherland in Great Britain and Ireland, and did my ancestors leave France, because they loved their motherland less? No, Sir: the truth is they were not satisfied with the condition of their own country, and, therefore, to make their condition better, and for the happiness and comfort of their families, they parted from their native land, not because they loved it less, but because they loved Canada more. Now, Sir, we are agitating, and we have agitated this policy of unrestricted reciprocity, because we believe it is in the best interests of the country, and not because we love England less, but because we love Canada more. I have again and again affirmed for my part that I am as fondly attached to British institutions as any man of English blood, but I have never hesitated to say, and I again repeat, that whether for ill or for good, whether for my condemnation or my justification, whether for right or for wrong, as long as there is in me the breath of life, my guiding star, and my only guiding star, shall be: Canada first, Canada last, and Canada forever.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speech of my hon. friend. It has much of his eloquence, much of his facility of language and much of his happiness of expression, but it has a tone of bitterness and a tone of exasperation which is not usual in the speeches of the hon. gentleman. I can, however, quite pardon the feeling which has induced and prompted that speech. If there ever was a party disappointed, and if there ever was an hon. member or a public man disappointed in the result of the late election, it is my hon. friend. The certainty which he had in his own breast, the confidence which he had that the country was with him—a confidence in which his party all joined—was so great, that the disappointment must have been dreadful. The hon. gentleman went to bed on the night of the 4th of March confidently believing that he would be sent for in a few days to form a Government, but the illusion disappeared by nine o'clock on the following morning. I can pardon, therefore, the feeling the hon. gentleman has, and the only thing that I feel personally aggrieved at is his assertion that there was on the part of the Government a dishonourable abandonment of the statement in this House on the subject of dissolution. It was known by everybody, it was stated by myself, it was stated by my colleagues, that we had no intention of dissolving—that to all appearances Parliament would last for its whole term; and, therefore the postponement of revising the lists was announced. But, if the hon. gentleman will follow up the debate, he will find that, after my hon. friend the Secretary of State made his speech, I stated distinctly to the House, that I would make no pledge that there would not be a dissolution; I stated that it would be unconstitutional to make any such pledge. One thing, however, is clear, that the hon. gentleman and his friends did not like the dissolution: and it is strange that they should not like it when he was so confident that the result would be a triumph of his party, and the defeat forever of the Liberal-Conservative clique that had so long misgoverned the country. But the hon. gentleman, perhaps, has not the advantage, or the happiness rather, of bringing all his friends with him. I think the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated on two separate occasions that he had no objections to a dissolution, because the voters' lists were all on his side. Is it not so that that statement was made? And it is the fact, Mr. Speaker, that if either party has suffered from the delay in the revision of the voters' lists, it is the party of which I have the honour just now to be the leader. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have won; it is a Pyrrhic victory to be sure: it is the forerunner of defeat, so the hon. gentleman says. Well, I think my friends and the country can put up with a prognostication of that kind, which is to be fulfilled five years hence unless there is to be another dissolution. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, because I can see that he has been looking into the authorities, that it is quite understood among public men that the propriety or impropriety of a dissolution is not discussed in Parliament: the prerogative of the Crown is admitted. While a dissolution is threatened, if Parliament is sitting, there can be remonstrance against the proposed dissolution, but when once it is granted, the prerogative of the Crown is admitted, and admitted without a remark.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Legally?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As Todd says:

"By general consent the alternatives of resignation of office or of dissolution of Parliament are now left to the discretion and responsibility of Ministers,"—

And so on. The whole tenor of modern parliamentary decisions is this: that an appeal to the people is always in order. The hon. gentleman says he does not say that the country was taken by surprise, but I say this, that if any party were taken by surprise, it was the Conservative party: because they never had any intimation, or an inkling of any kind from any member of the Government that there would be a dissolution. But according to my hon. friend, we were going to postpone the dissolution to the Greek calends. He says there ought not to have been a dissolution until the Franchise Act was repealed. That Franchise Act was an Act of the Canadian Parliament, and does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there should be no dissolution until the party in power, the party having the majority, should repeal the Act which they themselves laid before the country, and which Parliament and the country have approved of? Then the hon. gentleman says there should have been no dissolution until the law respecting the elections was altered, and until the frauds, the disgraceful frauds, which were practised under that law were made impossible. Who passed those laws, Mr. Speaker? It was the Government of Mr. Mackenzie; and if there were any frauds under them, those frauds were in consequence of the imperfections of the Act introduced for the purpose of preventing the occurrence of any such frauds. Now the hon. gentleman is very much pleased to ring the changes upon the word "loyalty." He says we are very loyal men in phrase, but look what we do: We have actually sent the mails by way of New York. We have, utterly regardless of our position as British subjects, utterly regardless of our oaths of allegiance, utterly regardless of our pretension of being the loyal party—and we do pretend and contend that we are the loyal party—forgetful of all our pretensions, we have sent the mails by way of New York. Well, the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the lines running from Canada are rather antiquated; they are too conservative in their practice: and the Government of Canada have spared no pains, and have run some risk in asking Parliament to vote half a million of money, in order to get a line to run from the St. Lawrence in summer and the Maritime Provinces in winter that will equal in every respect those lines which are the glory and the pride of New York; and if we have failed in carrying out that arrangement it is not our fault. We did make a provisional arrangement, but the state of the money market in England has been such that we have hitherto not been able to succeed in getting a contract. But that is going to be, I hope and believe, of very short continuance: and with the vote that Parliament has already given us, I hope and believe—I might almost say I know, although that is too strong a word—but I hope, and believe, and trust, that we shall have a line of which we may be proud, and which will relieve us of the charge of disloyalty brought by the hon. gentleman. The fact is that the steamers, which were originally equal to any of the lines which ploughed the Atlantic, have become antiquated, and the owners of those steamers did not feel themselves able to undertake the work of competing with the lines running into New York. The consequence is that for some time a large proportion, somewhere near two-thirds of the mail matter, going from Canada and coming to Canada, went viâ New York, and we were actually throwing away the money which we had been paying year by year to the Allan line, because it did not, and was unable from its lack of speed to perform the duties for which it was originally subsidized. That, Mr. Speaker, is our disloyalty. But, returning for a moment to the question of dissolution, the hon. gentleman says that we never announced what our policy was, and he says that our policy is a shifting policy. If ever there was a permanent and fixed policy it is that of the party of which I, for the present, am the leader. We went to the country, Mr. Speaker, on that policy,—the old flag, the old policy, aye, and the old chief. And with all my sins of omission and commission of twenty years, the country responded to the call. The hon. gentleman says that we are a minority in the larger Provinces. We are not a minority in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. LAURIER. Not much to boast of.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the Province of Ontario, of which I am a representative in this Parliament and in the Government, we are in a majority; and if some of my friends—and I regret, deeply regret the fact—have fallen in the field of battle, most of them believe and know that they will have a joyful resurrection. The hon. gentleman says that in my manifesto I did not say a word about unrestricted reciprocity. Why, there was no necessity for me to say a word about it. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said enough about it. The whole country knew that the attention of the next session of Parliament would be absorbed in the consideration of that great question. Hon. gentlemen opposite travelled from one end of the Dominion to the other announcing unrestricted reciprocity as their policy. They called the attention of the country to the necessity of an immediate change to save this country from ruin and all the rest of it. They announced from every hustings, on every platform, on every stump they could find to stand upon, that unrestricted reciprocity was a matter to be considered in Parliament and in the next session of Parliament. And, Mr. Speaker, we knew that; and we knew also that a door had been opened for a friendly series of communications with the American Government on that subject, and that, for the first time in many years, we would have an opportunity of discussing the various questions—not only the trade questions but the various other questions which disturb the harmony between the United States and Canada. So long ago as November last we had the first intimation; and upon that—trying to open communication and knowing that all those communications would be fruitless if held in the last days of the last Parliament—we took the course of appealing to the people, and the people responded to our appeal. It is true that in some of the constituencies of Canada we have been defeated—not by the National Policy, but by the McKinley Bill. Some of our agricultural friends were naturally alarmed at the exclusion of their products from the American market; and through their not being fully instructed on this question, we, and not hon. gentlemen opposite, lost by the dissolution. Some of our agricultural friends fancied that in consequence of the McKinley Bill they would suffer greatly in the sale of their agricultural products; and it is said that in one or two places, the day after the elections, when the defeat of unrestricted reciprocity was assured, some of the farmers hurried across the boundary with their hay and other products in the belief that they could sell them free of the McKinley duty. The hon. gentleman denied—and from his point of view, I dare say he was right in denying, as far as his intention is concerned—that unrestricted reciprocity will cause any political change in Canada. He therein differs from his late great leader, Mr. Blake, the gentleman whom he followed most—I was going to say blindly—but most completely and without any shadow of dissent, without any appearance of variance of opinion until that gentleman resigned the leadership. Mr. Blake held a different opinion and consequently deserted the party. He retired from public life, of which he was an ornament, and retired, apparently forever, into private life, because he could not follow a course which he believed, in its logical consequence, to use the expression of my hon. friend, must lead to annexation to the United States. The hon. gentleman talks about our shifting policy. Why, he will find, if he ever comes to press his policy in the manner he has announced just now it is his intention to press it, supported as it will be by the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, that it will not receive the support of all those who are nominally the supporters of the hon. gentleman, and really his supporters on most questions, but certainly not on that. The hon. gentleman says we ought not to have had any dissolution until we repealed the Gerrymander Act. Why, what would have become of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) if there had been no Gerrymander Act. He would have been non-existent; he would have been wiped out of existence. But even in the benighted riding he represents, believed to be hopelessly Grit—so hopelessly Grit that it was charged against the Government that it was made a Grit hive—even there the light has begun to penetrate; and the majority of the hon. gentleman is but half what it was at the last election. So you see, Mr. Speaker, even in the darkest localities, the deepest dens of Grit—I was going to say ignorance—Grit obstinacy, the light is beginning to penetrate. We have achieved a Pyrrhic victory which will last five years. The hon. gentleman had better take care that the Pyrrhic victory in South Oxford will not become a defeat at the end of that period. The hon. gentleman did, in the first portion of his speech, rather sail around the question of unrestricted reciprocity; but at last he mustered his courage up. I could see he had to stiffen his nerves when he came out with the expression that he was in favour of continental free trade. That is another term for unrestricted reciprocity. He did not like even to use the expression "unrestricted reciprocity." He knew it was unpopular. He knew it was unpopular in this House and in the country. He knew he could not stand up with any hope of carrying the country if he acted upon the term in its naked deformity of unrestricted reciprocity. So he calls it "continental free trade." Very well. That policy, the shifting policy which the hon. gentleman attributed to us, I can cast across the floor to him. Now, in regard to "commercial union," which is the term they have used as they have used "unrestricted reciprocity," and lastly "continental free trade." After all, no matter what name you give it, it is merely, as Mr. Farrar said, hiding behind a mask—it all means annexation to the United States, as we all know. The three names with which they have adorned their policy will not conceal or hide what the policy is, and the fact of their changing the name so frequently reminds me of the fellows who are brought up in the police court and are found to have a number of aliases; so the hon. gentlemen have a great many aliases. The hon. gentleman has stated that my language at Halifax was unfriendly and impolitic, with reference to the Government of the United States. I adhere to every word I said then. I said then, as I say now, that the United States is a great nation and will be a greater nation, that there is no limit to its future greatness, but I spoke in the same sense as the best and the ablest and the most patriotic citizens of the United States now speak. Look at any of the writings of their political men; look at the writings of their literati; look at the opinions expressed by all those men who ought to be more than they are, I am sorry to say, leaders of public opinion in the United States, and you will find that they have all the one cry of the approaching danger to the United States from the various circumstances to which I very shortly alluded. But I said I knew that country would overcome all those difficulties. Was it not a patriotic and also a common-sense expression of opinion of mine that, if history is of any value, if history is anything more than a mere almanac, the United States, like all democracy, must pass through the perturbances which are incidental to all democracies. Look at the history of the world, and you will see that all democracies have had to pass through a period of perturbance. I believe that, with the manliness of the vast majority of the races who inhabit the United States, they will overcome all their difficulties, but my common-sense statement was this: Why should we who are free from these dangers, why should we who have not the same causes of apprehension as the people of the United States have, why should we who are as yet free not only from the cause of socialism brought from Europe, anarchy brought from Europe, atheism brought from Europe, mix ourselves up in these questions—above all, why should we mix ourselves up in the consequences of the negro question, to which I did not allude at that time? All their writers agree that they are in great danger, and they are using their best intellects to see how they are to avoid the great dangers which are so imminent, and from which, under the flag of England, we have been free. We have no Carbonari here, we have no Mafia here, we have no sewerage from European countries, we have not here the hordes from Europe who fly from the majesty of the law; we have not the Hungarian, who is semi-civilized, though he belongs to a fine race. While we find these men convulsing the whole of the United States, we do not find them coming to Canada as yet, and, if they do, I hope they will come in small numbers and under strict supervision and investigation as to their previous character. I have nothing to take back of the language I used at Halifax, and I could tell the hon. gentleman that I have had sympathy and support from great men in the United States in regard to the expressions I then used. There is one other statement of the hon. gentleman to which I object. He stated that there was a great hostility in Canada to the Northern States during the civil war. I say there never was a more unfounded statement made. I say there is no evidence of hostility to the United States. So far as our population went, it was proved by the fact that from 20,000, at the minimum, to, as some say, 40,000 men went from Canada to fight the battle of the North. Some few men, some way or other, got through the Northern States and joined the South, but from 20,000 to 40,000 Canadians joined the ranks, and fought and fell and died in the ranks of the Northern Army: and I undertake, now that the statement has been made, to bring down to the House and to show to Parliament the repeated thanks which the United States Government gave for the way in which Canada behaved during that war. Secretary Seward said Canada had behaved well, and he wished to God that the mother country had behaved half as well as Canada. I can say that Canada was painfully anxious to perform her duties and to preserve her neutrality during that unhappy war. I can show that we went beyond the obligations imposed by the law of nations. We had to spend our money in order to prevent Canada from being made the basis of operations along the frontier. We had 10,000 volunteers watching the frontier in warlike array, men taken from their homes for months and months, and we cannot be charged with having been neglectful of our duties. I speak with knowledge on this subject, and I know that we, members of the Government, were determined, that by no action or sympathy on the part of Canada should the mother country be brought into a conflict, or into a hostile or semi-hostile position with regard to the United States. That I avow, and that I can prove. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can only say, with respect to the statement that it is a disastrous victory, that we are satisfied. I ought to be satisfied, because at the end of this present Parliament, if it lives, I shall be some eighty-two years of age: and I can say that we are going to last that time, unless we dissolve. I tell my friends and I tell my foes: J'y suis, j'y reste. We are going to stay here, and it will take more than the power of the hon. gentleman, with all the phalanx behind him, to disturb us or to shove us from our pedestal. I omitted to make the usual compliment to the mover and seconder of these resolutions. There is no necessity for my doing so. They have at once stamped themselves as men that this House will be proud of—men that have a great political future.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed when the First Minister took the floor, that he would at least, as a matter of common parliamentary etiquette, have deemed it right to give something like an intelligible and satisfactory answer to the objections which were raised by my hon. friend to the very extraordinary use of the prerogative which led to the dissolution of the last Parliament and the assembling of the present one. I certainly expected, still more, that the hon. gentleman who devoted the one important paragraph of his speech to a description of the hopes which the Government entertain of a speedy settlement of the question that so long engaged the attention of the country, the hope of obtaining extended trade relations between Canada and the United States—the hon. gentleman who has deemed it right through the mouth of His Excellency, to congratulate us on the fact that six months from the present date, or thereabouts, an audience will be accorded to the Ambassadors of Canada, if they go to Washington, would have been kind enough to have shed a little light on a certain recent trip which was made by prominent members of his Cabinet to the same city of Washington—or possibly it may be, Sir, that in the mind of the hon. gentleman, trips to Washington are so associated with treason of the extremest dye, that he is afraid to tell the House that two distinguished members of his Cabinet made a trip to Washington—an officious, not an official visit as my hon. friend will say; that they went one thousand miles down to interview these pestilent Yankees, and returned the next day, one thousand miles from Washington to Ottawa. Sir, I think that under the circumstances it was the duty, and is the duty, of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, to tell us why and wherefore this visit was planned and made. To the best of my recollection the hon. gentleman did not even allude to the fact with which all Canada was ringing, with which all North America was ringing, that a few days ago he sent two members of his Cabinet and my Lord the High Commissioner down to Washington, and that these hon. gentlemen were obliged to return here, having achieved and effected—what?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Nothing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, yes, they did. Let not my hon. friend take away from them what they did. They achieved and effected an appointment six months hence, or an interview, an informal interview, apparently, with the hon. Secretary of State of the United States. Sir, I think the hon. gentleman owes it to the House to state the nature of the circumstances and how these things came about. I was surprised, for my part, to find that the hon. gentleman steered entirely clear of that subject. We understand the hon. gentleman's position. We understand that he stands between three fires on this question. We know quite well that the hon. gentleman found it very hard indeed, after sending that mission to Washington, to account to his taskmasters and paymasters of the "Red Parlour," and to explain what he was doing at Washington with his ambassadors. Why, Sir, we know it was reported, from one end of this country to the other, that Sir Charles Tupper had rushed in fiery haste from Ottawa to Washington—had bulldozed the Cabinet, and had taken with him two of his trusted friends and gone back to Washington—and we know enough of Sir Charles Tupper's previous action, we know enough of what occurred in this House: we know enough of the reasons which severed him from his colleagues on a certain memorable occasion, to know that Sir Charles Tupper—and I say it to his credit and not to his discredit—was determined, if he went down to Washington, not to return with empty hands, manufactures or no manufacturers. But these gentlemen were suspicious, as well they might be, as soon as they knew of the approaching mission to Washington, and there was a flight of vultures from all parts of the Dominion, there was a flight of those gentlemen here to tell the Government that they brought them in—no, Sir, they bought them in—and they were not disposed to be deprived of their pound of flesh; that they knew their interests were imperilled, and that if the Government receded from enforcing the sacred right of taxing the people of Canada to the bare bone, then they would have to account to the men who put them there, and I may say to the honest votes of the people of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh!

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had another very important reason for not dealing with the question. The hon. gentleman has had his lesson, and I hope it was not entirely thrown away upon him; he knew right well that it would be a very perilous thing indeed for him to give an account, or to make the pretence, of the negotiations going on at Washington, which may not have squared strictly and exactly with the facts. The hon. gentleman knows, and the House knows, how certain extraordinary statements made—if not by himself, at any rate on his authority, and through his subsidized press—were dealt with almost immediately on their delivery by some of the authorities at Washington. The hon. gentleman knew in the third place, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House know, that it would be an extremely dangerous thing for him to allow it to be understood, after what had passed during the late elections, after the promises which were made by many of the hon. gentleman's supporters, after the statements made by his press—it would be an extremely dangerous thing for him, on the other hand, to state honestly and candidly to these men—what he knows perfectly well in spite of all his gasconade—that if free trade with the United States or extended trade relations with the United States, are to be obtained at all by the people of Canada, it is only on the lines laid down by my hon. friend—as laid down by the Liberal party of Canada. All those things the right hon. gentleman knew right well, and, therefore, although he knows, and none better, how earnestly the people of Canada are looking for a distinct and plain exposition of what the Government meant by their recent trip to Washington, of what the Government meant and propose to do on their return to Washington a few months hence, the hon. gentleman took right good care to indulge in a few specious generalities, and, as usual when hard pressed, to take refuge in assertions about his loyalty and his devotion to British connection. Well, Sir, I have designated the value of the hon. gentleman's loyalty on other occasions. His is the loyalty that pays, and so long as it pays Her Majesty Queen Victoria will have no more faithful subject than the right hon. gentleman. But I can recollect, aye, I have seen in old times communications from the hon. gentleman which show that when he sat on the Treasury benches his loyalty was, to say the least of it, of a very much cooler description than it is at present. The hon. gentleman talks and has talked elsewhere of the Liberal party of Canada as the party of annexationists, and elsewhere I have told the hon. gentleman, as now on the floor of the Parliament of Canada I tell him, that his chosen friends from his youth up have each and everyone been annexationists. Never in all his life did this super-loyal gentleman form a Cabinet, and he has formed many Cabinets, in which he did not have one, but usually two or three specimens of the annexationists foremost in the ranks of the Cabinet; and even at this day, forty or fifty years afterwards, he possesses one or two still. The hon. gentleman says my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is a disappointed man. My hon. friend stands in the proud position that for the first time I believe since Confederation, he, the Liberal leader, stands at the head of a Liberal majority from the Province of Quebec. As regards the Province of Ontario, the right hon. gentleman did succeed in obtaining a bare majority by as many votes as you can count on the fingers of one hand, and as many individual votes as you can count on the fingers of one hand to form the right hon. gentleman's majority. But did he secure a popular majority? Not a bit of it: the records go to prove that there was a clear popular majority of all the voters of the great Province of Ontario arrayed behind my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), and on behalf of free trade with the United States. The right hon. gentleman declares that a door was opened in November last for friendly communications with the United States. There is a difference of opinion on that point, which I will come to presently. Certain men as likely to know what the opinions of the United States are, certain men at least as well advised as the First Minister of Canada is, as to the views of President Harrison and his Cabinet, have expressed an opinion which I think the hon. gentleman will find very hard indeed to reconcile with that statement. But he brings it as a charge against my hon. friend beside me that he differs from his former leader, Mr. Blake. Now I have noticed, and I dare say the House has noticed, that as soon as it comes to pass that a Liberal leader, whether my hon. friend who usually sits beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) or Mr. Blake or any other hon. gentleman is dead and gone or practically away from the political arena, then all at once the right hon. gentleman discovers great virtues in him: then all at once the right hon. gentleman is prepared to say to those of us who remain alive supporting the Liberal party: Well, these men have fallen away from the high and lofty principles which their leaders in former times possessed. Such is the kindness of the hon. gentleman that I verily believe if I myself were translated from this sphere he would not hesitate to canonize me, always providing I was well out of his way and I could not do any mischief. If the hon. gentleman and his friends desire to know what Mr. Blake thinks about the causes which may lead to the annexation of Canada I recommend him to read certain pregnant and powerful paragraphs in the letter which has been quoted, in which Mr. Blake shows with the greatest possible perspicuity that the continuous corruption, misgovernment and mismanagement of the right hon. gentleman and his Government have all but rendered it absolutely impossible to carry on government in Canada. It may be that our friend put a a little too strongly his view of the case; but I commend to my hon. friends around me these paragraphs, and I suggest, and I hope they will act on the suggestion, that on all occasions when hon. gentlemen opposite choose to allude to opinions as those of Mr. Blake, but which he says he did not express on this subject, will give them in extenso the full benefit of the valuable and true facts which Mr. Blake has set forth touching the corruption and misconduct of hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. gentleman goes on to declare that he adheres to his language used at Halifax. The hon. gentleman, however, went on to apologize for it, after a fashion. I am very sorry, indeed, for his sake, and for the sake of the people of Canada, that the hon. gentleman did not take this opportunity at once, and manfully to apologize for, and retract, the extremely indiscreet and mischievous language he was guilty of using on that occasion. I have no doubt whatever that the language used by the First Minister has had a very prejudicial effect in the United States and on the Government of the United States. It is not in accordance with international comity, it is not in accordance with common prudence and discretion, for the chief Minister of a friendly power to declare that the people of Canada, forsooth, will "look with philosophic eyes at the struggles of a fierce and discordant democracy." Does not the First Minister know that to-day in the United States there are more than 1,000,000 of the best blood of Canada to be found? Does not the hon. gentleman know that in almost every portion of Canada there is hardly a family to be found which has not a son, brother, or near relative in some portion of the United States? And can the First Minister tell us that we can look with philosophic eyes on revolutions which will tear and convulse the United States? I have a better doctrine to preach than that. I tell the hon. gentleman this, and every true Canadian, whether of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party, will endorse my sentiment, that the prosperity of the United States is, and ought to be, next to that of our own country, dear to every true Canadian, for the reason I have stated: and I tell him more, and hon. gentlemen beside me know it well, that no great misfortune can overtake the people of the United States, circumstanced as the two countries are to one another, without greatly injuring the general prosperity of the people of Canada, too. I suppose the hon. gentleman is sincere, although I am not certain, looking at his acts and the language used by his followers, in saying that he and his Government desire the prosperity and success of the people of the United States: but they have taken a very curious way of showing it.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, before the House rose I had taken occasion of calling attention to the very remarkable omission on the part of the leader of the Government to offer an explanation to this House of the reason which had induced him to send several prominent members of his Government to Washington. I had intimated some of the difficulties which appeared to my mind to have presented themselves to the hon. gentleman and which probably prevented his giving these frank explanations to the House of the reason of that remarkable mission, which no doubt he would otherwise have been glad to do. I may say that for my own part it appears to me utterly and absolutely impossible: I cannot for one moment believe, I refuse for my part to believe, unless there be positive documentary evidence in the hands of the Government to the contrary, that these hon. gentlemen went to Washington, under the circumstances which I have described, on the invitation of the American Government: I cannot believe that such a thing is possible. I would be very loth indeed to think that any Government, much less the Government of the United States of America, should have invited a deputation from our Government to confer on important matters, and who on their arrival found it utterly impossible to obtain any audience on the subject-matter for which they were invited to go to Washington. It appears to me that these hon. gentlemen must, to say the least of it, have gone there self-invited: and, further, it appears to me, when we come to consider certain correspondence which we have seen, that if they were invited at all they had been invited to stay away, unless they were prepared to discuss the subject on certain conditions, by no manner of means obscurely intimated to them, or to the British ambassador either, by the American authorities. I take it that the real position of the matter was this: the Government, as was admitted by the First Minister during his speech, and as was stated by his press, had committed themselves to the assertion that they had good reason to believe that they would be allowed to enter into negotiations with the Government of the United States. For that assertion I am sorry to say there appears to have been no warrant whatever. Nevertheless, having made the assertion, having to a very considerable extent conducted their campaign on the assumption that they were warranted in declaring that they were prepared to deal with the American Government, it was impossible for them to face Parliament, under these circumstances, without having made some attempt to show that these assertions of theirs were justified. It appears to me very much indeed as if these hon. gentlemen had hoped to entrap the Government of the United States into a discussion which would give an excuse for saying to the people of Canada and to the Parliament of Canada that, as there were negotiations going on with the United States, it would be highly inexpedient for us to discuss the question of the trade relations on which these negotiations in future were mainly to turn. Here is the statement which these hon. gentlemen are good enough to make to the House and to invite the House to acquiesce in:

"We are pleased to be informed" —

They ask us to say——"that His Excellency's advisers, availing themselves of opportunities which were presented in the closing months of last year, caused the Administration of the United States to be reminded of the willingness of the Government of Canada to join in making efforts for the extension and development of the trade between the Republic and the Dominion, as well as for the friendly adjustment of those matters of an international character which remain unsettled. I am pleased to say that these representations have resulted in an assurance that, in October next, the Government of the United States will be prepared to enter on a Conference to consider the best means of arriving at a practical solution of these important questions."

Sir, it does appear to me that the hon. gentlemen are to be commended upon one point: it appears to me that taking into consideration the character of their utterances as to the Government and the people of the United States during the late campaign, and on many other occasions, they are to be commended for having shown such a cheerful disposition to acquiesce in the treatment which they seem to have received at Washington. I shall give them as much credit as they deserve, but I have got to say this: A new question, and an important question, is opened for us in consequence of this identical mission to Washington. My hon. friend beside me told the House, and he told it truly, that the Ministers themselves, in their proper persons, had utterly and wholly failed to assign any substantial reason of any kind whatever for the dissolution of Parliament. Although the Ministers may not in so many words have said so, there is no doubt whatever that they communicated to their subsidized press throughout the country a statement in which, and by means of which, they endeavoured to induce their supporters all over the Dominion to believe that they had entered into negotiations with the United States; that they had ground to believe that these negotiations would result favourably, and that if only their hands were strengthened, if only the people would give them a reasonably strong mandate, there was every reason to believe that they would succeed in coming to satisfactory terms with the United States. What they stated was as follows,—and they stated this, be it remembered, on the very day, I believe, on which the dissolution was announced:—

"Sir John Macdonald's Government not long ago, made a definite proposal to the Washington authorities for the settlement of all existing differences between the two countries on a basis of an extension of the trade between the two countries. It involves partial reciprocity, the enumerated articles to include quite a number of natural products. But the proposition discards any idea of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Moreover, these propositions were invited and suggested by the Washington authorities. Commissioners from Canada and Great Britain will start for Washington on 4th March the date of the opening of the new Congress."

The House will observe that these proceedings, according to this communication, had gone so far that the British Government were to send commissioners along with ours; and they were to start on the 4th of March—

"The result of the Canadian elections will be known on 6th March, the day the commissioners reach Washington. In order that this commission may have no uncertain sound, Sir John Macdonald has decided to appeal to the country and ask for judgment on these proposals of his to the Washington authorities."

He had made definite proposals, of which not one person outside of his Cabinet, either friend or foe, knew one word; and he had decided to ask the opinion of the electors on these proposals, which they could neither approve nor condemn, because none of us had the slightest idea of what they were. Well, Sir, unfortunately, communication is quick, and communication is free as yet after a fashion between Canada and the United States: and these statements having been circulated in the United States, had, as was natural, attracted considerable attention there; and whereas the First Minister told us to-night that a door for friendly communication had been opened as far back as November last, I notice that a person, who presumably knows as much as he does about the intentions of the United States Government, writes in the following fashion to a member of the United States Congress:—

"DEAR MR. BAKER,—I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be assured no such scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion, confined to natural products, will be entertained by this Government. We know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper's coming to Washington.

"Very truly yours,
"JAMES G. BLAINE,
"Secretary of State for the United States."

Now, Sir, which is to be believed, the statement that we have heard that there was a door of friendly communication opened as far back as November last, or the assurance of Mr. Blaine over his own signature that there are no negotiations whatever on foot with Canada? Let the hon. gentlemen reconcile these two statements as best they may. Let them, if they dare, either the hon. First Minister or his colleagues, singly or collectively, contradict the statement of Mr. Blaine. Let them dare on the floor of this Parliament to state that the Secretary of State of the United States put his name to a false declaration. Sir, in view of the fact that the statement, which was the only reason assigned for the dissolution, has been flatly contradicted by the highest authority in the United States, it appears to me that there can be hardly any room for doubt that a very grave fraud was committed both on the people of Canada and on His Excellency if he was induced to grant the dissolution on the grounds set forth in the memorandum I have just read. As to the people, we who took part in the last election all know that, whatever may have been done in certain individual cities, in scores and scores of constituencies the argument was used that if the people would only sustain the First Minister on the present occasion, he had the best possible reasons for believing that he would negotiate a treaty with the United States, and obtain, in particular, a repeal of the obnoxious clauses of the McKinley tariff. I say this dissolution was obtained on false pretences. There were strong reasons against it, plain and palpable on the surface. There is no doubt that the House, when it refused a revision of the voters' lists last year, did so on the implied understanding that there was no reasonable chance or prospect of a dissolution being had until there was an opportunity to revise those lists. Then, it was perfectly well known that the census of this country must be taken at or about the 1st of April this year. It was known that under our constitutional act, if there is to be any material change in the representation to be given to the several Provinces, there is the strongest possible ground for requiring a new election to be had in order that the people may be properly represented. It was known perfectly well to the hon. gentleman, and to every member of the House, that the lists on which we voted were notoriously defective, many of them being based on assessment rolls three or four years old. It was known that many of the young men of this country, probably one-eighth, and certainly one-tenth of all the electors, would be disfranchised by the use of those lists. The Government, we were told, desired to obtain a full, free and unequivocal expression of the opinion of the people, and they undertook to obtain it under circumstances that made it physically impossible that all of the people should vote, and under circumstances which rendered it certain that there would be found on those lists an enormous proportion of men who had quitted this country, and who if brought back would have ceased to feel any vital interest in the good government of Canada. Neither is it a trifling consideration that it was well known, too, that there was at least one Minister of the Crown resting under grave suspicion, and liable when Parliament met to be indicted for grave malversation in office: and there was pretty good reason on the part of the hon. First Minister and his colleagues, at any rate, for striving to avoid incurring an expression of the opinion of the House on the conduct of that hon. gentleman. And lastly, Sir, and this goes to the root of the whole matter, it is notorious that there was a serious division in the Cabinet. It is notorious that one member was opposed to reciprocity, even in natural products, and to do him justice, I regard his position as the only logical and consistent position of the whole of them; while it is equally well known that another member of the Cabinet belonging to the same Province, believed that it was in the highest degree in the interest of the country, and especially of his own Province, to obtain reciprocity in those same natural products. How was the country, under these circumstances, to ascertain what the position of the Government was on this question? Sir, if ever there should have been another Session of Parliament, and if ever the Government should declare distinctly where they stood on these questions, and should give us an opportunity to appeal to the people at a time when their will could be clearly expressed, it was under the circumstances which existed at the time this dissolution took place. Now, I say that, in this condition of things, only in case of downright overpowering necessity could a dissolution be granted at all. What was the overpowering necessity? It was, according to the statement made at the time, that these hon. gentlemen should go to Washington on the 6th of March, in order to confer with the British Ambassador and the American Government. But the fact is, not only did they not go on the 6th of March, but there is not the least chance of their obtaining an audience with the American Government at all until late in the autumn. We cannot refrain from believing that His Excellency was very grievously deceived by his advisers, and that a most gross abuse of his prerogative took place when he granted a dissolution without any better reason than has been assigned either by the First Minister or the press which usually supports him. More, I say that the conduct of the Government in sending this embassy or delegation, or whatever you please to call it, to Washington, requires a pretty considerable deal of explanation. The Government had been notified expressly of what the United States Government would not accept. They knew perfectly well that if they went to Washington to offer reciprocity in natural products only they would not obtain a hearing. Now, if those hon. gentlemen adhere to the position, whatever it was, they originally laid down; if they adhere to the position laid down by Mr. Colby last Session on the floor of this House, and which I understood the right hon. gentleman to indicate this afternoon he is disposed to maintain; if they have no intention of offering to the United States anything but that meagre limited reciprocity which the United States Government have declared they will not entertain, then to send delegates to Washington to confer with the United States Government was a piece of mockery, under the circumstances, little short of a deliberate and premeditated farce. But if, on the other hand, they have altered their position; if, as there is considerable reason to believe, they found themselves compelled to abandon that, and made up their minds to propose a wider measure of reciprocity, then what grounds have these hon. gentlemen for attacking and slandering hon. gentlemen on this side of the House for proposing to do precisely what the Government knew they would have to do if they wanted to obtain anything at all? What have these hon. gentlemen done? To all practical intents and purposes they have succeeded only in making themselves the laughing-stock of the United States. Two of those hon. gentlemen who went to Washington are present. The other, for satisfactory reasons, I fancy, has found it convenient to retreat on London, where, by-the-bye, I am rather pleased to hear he is getting the warm reception such as some of his conduct and speeches deserve. Let these gentlemen, however, who are here, explain why it was they went to Washington. Various pretexts have been put forward by their press to explain the reception they met. One day we were told, forsooth, that a message postponing the conference was, by some inexplicable misunderstanding, or owing to some unaccountable confusion or delay, not telegraphed from Washington or not received here in time. Then we were told that this was precisely what the Government desired—that they did not want to meet at all; that all they wanted was to have an excuse to prevent discussion on the floor of this House. And I saw some conjectures, both in a portion of the United States press and our own, that the treatment accorded to the Canadian envoys was dictated by a desire of Mr. President Harrison to snub Mr. Blaine. It reminded me of the custom we are told existed in the olden days, when a whipping-boy was always provided for royalty who would receive on his person the castigation for the offences committed by the youthful prince, and thus the ends of justice would be served and the privileged skin of the original offender saved. If it be true that the cause of this somewhat unceremonious reception and the retirement of our commissioners was due to the fact that President Harrison wanted to snub Mr. Blaine, I congratulate our delegates on the lofty and elevated position which they attained. I notice another explanation, so ingenious that it really deserves a word of passing attention. We are told that the whole business was a collusion, a put-up job between Mr. Blaine and our High Commissioner. Our High Commissioner was wanted in London to deal with these rebellious Newfoundlanders; and it was intimated to Mr. Blaine that it would be highly convenient to our High Commissioner to bring the business to an abrupt termination, so that he might be enabled to transfer himself to London and there protect the interests of Canada against the Newfoundlanders. I say it is time for us to consider the situation, which is a grave one. I cannot accept, for my part, either the silence of the right hon. the leader of the House or the excuses made by his friends and supporters. What has happened, to my mind, is this: The Government of Canada have been told emphatically, in a way no man can pretend not to understand, and to which it is idle for us to affect to shut our eyes, that they are not wanted at Washington. And they have been told more; they have been told that they will have to learn their own minds, that they will have to learn to submit a reasonable and fitting proposal before they are likely to meet with any consideration at all. In looking at the way in which this business has been conducted, we are obliged to consider what has been the conduct of the Government of Canada with regard to its relations to the United States. The Government have told us, through the mouth of His Excellency, that they have caused the Administration of the United States to be reminded of the willingness of the Government of Canada to join in making efforts for the extension and development of the trade between the American Republic and the Dominion. That is a most extraordinary statement. It will sound very extraordinary, indeed, in the minds and the ears of those who have paid the slightest attention to the conduct and policy of this Government during the last five years. What has been their course ever since 1885? I am not going to enter to-night into a discussion of the technical merits of their conduct in respect of the fisheries, but I have to say that, whether that conduct was right or wrong, if they had any desire or the slightest hope or intention of making any friendly reciprocity with the United States, their conduct in 1886 was ill-advised to a degree. We know, from the testimony of their own colleagues and the Ministers themselves, that it had the effect of exciting and annoying the whole people of the United States to an extreme degree. It had the effect, according to Sir Charles Tupper himself, of bringing us to the verge of non-intercourse with the United States—of bringing us within a few hours of commercial war with that country. And one would have thought that the knowledge that Canada had escaped so great a peril and injury would have brought these men to a better mind. But how did these men, who have dared to tell us that the Government of Canada have reminded the United States of their willingness to treat with them, meet the proposition from this side of the House, inviting, begging, praying the Government to endeavour to ascertain on what terms we could obtain reciprocity with the United States? How was this proposition met? Why, in 1888, I myself moved that it was highly expedient we should enter into negotiations with the United States. It was open to these gentlemen, if they thought my proposal too broad, to have amended it. Did they commence negotiations with the United States to see what could be done? Did they raise their little finger or make the slightest exertion to obtain reciprocity? No; they met us with the explicit declaration that they would have no reciprocity with the United States unless the interests of the small minority of protected manufacturers were first considered. That was their sine qua non—to protect our good friends the monopolists and the combines. Do not let our paymasters be disturbed. Do not let those worthy gentlemen who supply the funds for election purposes in disputed counties be disturbed. We must be sure that these worthy gentlemen are not in the slightest degree to be interfered with. Then there is also our policy as enunciated in 1889. They met us at that time with a blunt negative, and they backed up that negative by even refusing to entertain our proposition that we should have a representative of our own at Washington who might save us from such intolerable and disgraceful fiascoes as those in which those hon. gentlemen have taken part lately. In 1890 what did they do when I brought forward for the third and last time a proposition of that kind? They voted it down, and they appended to their vote a declaration which was made on the floor of the House by Mr. Colby, the President of the Council, who appeared as the spokesman of the Government, for whose utterances they are responsible, for they did not disown them—a statement made by him that reciprocity in natural products would be the greatest misfortune that could befall the people of Canada. These are the evidences of the desire of the Government of Canada to develop our trade relations with the United States. I ask this House, I ask especially hon. gentlemen who have not had seats in this House before—for those of us who have had seats before do not need to be told—to look at the records of the debates of the past few years and then to look at the tone of the speeches and at the language used by Ministers and by their supporters. They will find that, all through their speeches, there was, to say the least of it, a tone of veiled hostility towards reciprocity with the United States, that they considered it in any case a matter of insignificance for the people of this country, that it was almost unnatural, if not wicked and disloyal, for us to trade with a people whose boundary line runs for three thousand miles along our own. What was their attitude when the McKinley Tariff Bill was introduced, which they profess to deplore? They were warned from this side as to the result. They were told that there was a party in the United States opposed to the provisions of that Bill. They were told that, if they chose at that moment to inflict increased taxation on agricultural products coming into this country, they would destroy all chance of that party succeeding in ameliorating the terms of that Bill and would simply rivet the chains on the people of Canada. What was the result? Before the Bill became law, more than six months before that Bill received the President's sanction, our Minister of Finance, our Government, and our Parliment, enacted a tariff inflicting very heavy duties on large quantities of American produce which previously had come into Canada at moderate rates or free, and by that act they told all the friends of moderate tariffs in the United States that they could not count upon them for assistance, and they rendered it impossible for that party in the American Republic to obtain any modification of that McKinley Bill. If that Bill is on the United States Statute-book to-day, if any of the people of Canada suffer from its provisions to-day, they have more reason to thank the Government of Canada for that result than any other cause. This action was taken against repeated warnings which were given to the Government from this side of the House. Everyone knows how the English Government responded to the assurances that these hon. gentlemen had not feared to give to us that they were in perfect line with them in the action they took in regard to the fisheries. We know very well why Mr. Chamberlain was sent across the Atlantic, and we know very well what he did on the commission to which he was appointed. He made it evident that his instructions were that, coûte que coûte, whether the Canadian Government chose, or whether it did not, some such measure was to be adopted as was indicated in the modus vivendi which was put in force. I do not object to the modus vivendi; I never did object to the modus vivendi; but, if it was proper for the Government to accept that, and it involved no loss to the people of Canada, then the conduct of this Government in 1886 was most impolitic and unstatesmanlike. It is only necessary to call the attention of the House to what their own High Commissioner had to tell us as to the action of these hon. gentlemen who, mind you, have always been anxious to cultivate trade relations with the United States. Here is what Sir Charles Tupper had to say in regard to his worthy colleagues:

"I would like to draw the attention of the House to what has been accomplished by this (Fisheries) Treaty. I told you in what position Canada stood in with regard to the United States of America before the initiation of these proceedings. I told you that we stood face to face with an enactment which had been put on the Statute-book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feelings and intercourse between the two countries, but that it involved much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war. * * *

"Yesterday we stood face to face with a non-intercourse Bill sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained, with few exceptions, by a prejudiced, irritated and exasperated people of sixty millions lying on our borders."

There is the testimony of their own colleague, their own trusted colleague, the man who, to do him justice, twice saved them from ruin, as to what these wise statesmen who desire free intercourse with the United States brought on this country a few years ago. One would have thought that an experience of this kind would have deterred those hon. gentlemen from the foolish and mistaken policy which they have since followed; but what was their whole policy and conduct and argument during the elections? It consisted of one prolonged series of slander of the Liberal party as being traitors to their country, and the First Minister himself was not ashamed to declare to many public audiences that it was not possible for any man to advocate free trade with the United States without desiring to obtain political separation from the mother country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I find his friends here are willing to endorse that. I wish him and I wish them joy of it. I find they went further; I find that in State papers these hon. gentlemen used language very nearly as improper, very nearly as unfounded and unwarranted, as they chose to use during the campaign. Now, I am willing to make reasonable allowances for words which are used in the heat of a political contest, but when I find in grave despatches from the Privy Council statements like these, which appear to have been made no longer ago than the 9th December:

"The McKinley Tariff Bill is in force and is avowed to be designed to teach Canadians that they cannot avail themselves of the markets of the United States while they continue their allegiance as British subjects."

When I find them repeating:

"That this would be a most effectual method of impressing on the minds of the Canadian people the lesson that they cannot be British subjects and enjoy the American markets."

When I find them further going on to say:

"That the Confederation which was effected in accordance with the strong desire of Her Majesty's Government in 1867 had always been viewed with unfriendly feelings by a large portion of the people of the United States, who continue, with great reason, to regard it as a means of consolidating British power in North America."

When I find statements of that sort made in a State paper, statements for which these hon. gentlemen have no sort of foundation, statements which are made absolutely and entirely, I believe, without one particle of basis—when I find statements like that, I cannot fail to see that all this is part of a premeditated plan on the part of these gentlemen—a premeditated scheme and design on their part, entirely to conceal from the people of Canada the real position in which they stand, and to prevent, so far as misrepresentation can prevent it, an honest verdict being given by the people on the questions which are really at issue before them. Now, Sir, what has all this effected for these hon. gentlemen? Well, I will tell them. In the first place, if they have any sense of self-respect left they must feel humiliated and disgraced by the reception they experienced lately, and by the knowledge that they have deserved it. But they have done worse than that; they have been inflicting great injury upon Canada, and have prejudiced the success of future negotiations by the course they have been ill-advised enough to pursue. Incidentally I may observe that in this, as in other cases which have come recently to our notice, there appears to me to be the clearest proof of the wisdom of the proposition long ago advanced by the Liberal party, that the time had come in the interests of Canada when we should have a resident of our own at Washington responsible to Canada, responsible to the Canadian Government, who should keep them advised of the changes and mutations of American sentiment, who should be able to keep them in touch, as they ought to be kept in touch, with what is going on in that great country beside us. I tell the hon. gentleman that, until and unless that is done, it is idle for them to expect to maintain such friendly relations as ought to be maintained between ourselves and our neighbours on the other side of the line. Now, I say there is only one way for these gentlemen to get out of their difficulty. I say their language, and notably the language used by the First Minister in the speech quoted by my hon. friend—and which was only one of a very considerable number of similar expressions used by himself and others in the course of the campaign—I say that, as these words contain, in my judgment, a public insult to the United States, it was his duty who had made them—and he admitted making them this afternoon—it was his duty to have retracted them as publicly as he made them. But what do we find him doing? We find him justifying, defending them, maintaining that there was nothing in the slightest degree out of the common course in the Minister of a friendly state daring to express the hope—because it amounted to that—that the United States, that fierce democracy, would be torn by revolution, while we would sit looking philosophically on. Then his second duty, and a very important duty it is, in my opinion, was to state clearly and distinctly to the House what they proposed to do with the Government at Washington. I do not ask for minute details, but we have most assuredly a right to know the general lines of their policy, what they propose to do on this mission, what they propose to do in any mission they may hereafter send to Washington. So far, the policy of the Government is only one mass of contradictions. We find one policy was announced in one Province, that even one policy was preached in one part of one Province and another policy preached in another part of the same Province. We have the President of the Council, formally and publicly, in the most emphatic manner, in reply to my own speech on the question, saying that he was opposed to reciprocity in natural products. We had the Secretary of State, a very influential member of the Government, also coming from the same Province, on the public hustings, severing himself from his colleagues and declaring that the McKinley tariff was a calamity to our country, declaring strongly in favour of reciprocity in natural products, and I believe he went further, and declared that if that could not be got in any other way, he was prepared to consider a proposition for the freest possible trade. Then we had the First Minister himself, aye, the First Minister, venturing to hold friendly communication with American citizens; we had him addressing a private letter to an American citizen, desiring this private American citizen to lobby individual members of Congress on this behalf, desiring him to tell them that the Canadian Government were prepared —I will read what he said:

"That the Canadian Government is fully assured that the Parliament of Canada would be ready to take off all Customs duty of coal, ores and lumber imported from the United States, whenever Congress makes those articles free of duty."

Now, Sir, we have a very pleasing proof of the harmony which prevails among the Cabinet, of the permanent and fixed character of their policy—that is what the hon. gentleman calls it. We have the Minister of Marine taking the First Minister to task publicly, and declaring that he was bound to reconstruct him, and that he would teach him not to trifle with the great interest of coal. Apparently the Minister of Marine did reconstruct him, for apparently the Minister is still in the Cabinet. Sir, we know perfectly well all over this country that there were private assurances made to men in almost every rural constituency, that the Government desired reciprocity. I have pointed out the language which was used in the press, and I have pointed to the excuse which was made by the Government for dissolving Parliament. We find them giving private assurances to certain men that they desired reciprocity, and making other private assurances to other gentlemen that they did not want reciprocity at all. We have the word of a gentleman well known to my hon. friends here, it was Mr. Cockshutt, I believe, of Brantford, who stated in my presence that he had assurances from six Cabinet Ministers that the Government would not have a reciprocity treaty at any price. Then we had statements made that the United States would not treat. Why, Sir, I suppose on twenty hustings I was interrogated to know whether there was any chance that the United States would treat. I was told by the friends and supporters of the hon. gentleman that there was no chance whatever of obtaining a treaty on any terms with the United States; yet these gentlemen declare that they dissolved the House in order that they might treat with the United States. We were told by some of these hon. gentlemen that they were sure to get the McKinley tariff repealed. I have seen that assertion made in at least a score of the Conservative newspapers. And we were told by others, and, I think, we were told on the floor of the House, that the McKinley tariff was the best possible thing for Canada, that it would teach our people self-reliance, that it would open new markets, markets in the West Indies more particularly, and it was likely to redound in the highest degree to the benefit of this country. Lastly, we were told by the First Minister on several occasions that he was determined to stand by the old policy; and yet at the same time the aforesaid First Minister sends an embassy to Washington, which I have repeatedly stated will be an outrage, farce and mockery, if he is going to stand by his old policy. Then there is another result of this attitude which I commend to the attention of hon. gentlemen. The First Minister declared over and over again that all persons who favoured free trade with the United States were annexationists, he would make no exceptions whatever; no one could oppose his policy, no one could oppose him, I suppose, without incurring the pains and penalties of high treason. I recollect that the First Minister was good enough to intimate at Toronto that he was about to bring to trial certain persons who had presumed to contravene or interfere with the policy he was about to carry out; but the hon. gentleman did not find it convenient or expedient to carry that threat into execution. I called his attention to the matter on more than one occasion, but I fear he did not read my speeches with the attention they deserved, and the references escaped him. But what is the result? According to the First Minister all who favoured unrestricted reciprocity are annexationists. Well, if that be correct, the hon. gentleman knows that to-day a decisive majority in the Province of Quebec favour unrestricted reciprocity and support my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), and, consequently, they are annexationists. If he will take the trouble to add the figures of the returns of the Province of Ontario, he will find a clear popular majority of the people of Ontario supported unrestricted reciprocity, and, therefore, according to the hon. gentleman's showing, they are annexationists. So, according to the hon. gentleman's logic and theory, he has brought things to this pass: that in the two great Provinces which constituted Old Canada, there is, to-day, a clear majority of annexationists. Now, I have this to say: I have probably quite as great objection to altering our form of government for the American form as has the First Minister; but if annexation should unhappily become a live issue, if annexation should become a question in the politics of this country, it is just such ill-advised language, such reproaches shamefully flung against others quite as good as ourselves, which may, and I should regret it extremely if it does, give life and substance in Canada to any such movement. I always felt, and I felt it from the first when the hon. gentleman and his friends adopted a slavish copy of the American high-protective system, that they had gone a long way to create an annexation feeling in this country; and I say this, if there be one mode more likely than another to prevent such a result coming about, if there be one mode to remove any temptation existing on the part of some persons to unite ourselves politically with the United States, it is by adopting just such a policy as we on this side of the House advocate, which might give us, what we have a right to ask and to obtain if we can secure it, the advantage of free commercial intercourse with the United States, without in any way disturbing or altering our own form of government. There is another act which the hon. gentleman did, but which no hon. gentleman with the slightest respect for British institutions would have presumed to do. What is the ground work on which the hon. gentleman bases his support of the National Policy, under which various vile monopolies were empowered to tax the people for their own private and individual benefit? The hon. gentleman has dared to trail the British flag in the dust and to flaunt the British flag as the flag under which these same monopolists are protected. If there is one thing settled in the United Kingdom more than another it is that they shall have free trade. That is a settled part of British policy; I may say it is almost part of the British Constitution, and all leaders of the great parties without exception have declared again and again that so far as Great Britain is concerned the policy of free trade is fixed and will remain forever. But, unfortunately, there are no doubt among us, as there are elsewhere, ignorant men who may be led to connect the protection of these vile monopolies with allegiance to the British flag, and if in the future evil consequences should result they will be due to this cause more than any other that the First Minister sought to use as a justification for maintaining a policy which is as un-British as it is possible to conceive the improper allegation that it was in the interest of Great Britain that this policy which has enormously reduced British imports, that this policy which was deliberately designed to prevent British merchants having free intercourse to our markets is, forsooth, necessary in order to maintain our connection with the mother country. The hon. gentleman is face to face with the fact that he has made no progress whatever in his negotiations with the United States. The hon. gentleman cannot even get an audience with the United States Government. What suggestion has he or his friends to make? They know right well that the people of this country at the present moment are suffering very materially from the effects of this same McKinley tariff to which I have alluded, and for which we have largely to thank the present Government. What do they propose? They propose simply this: To maintain these monopolies, to impose more taxes on the people, to further burden the farming and other producing classes; and having done so, and having driven hundreds of thousands out of the country, then, perchance, they will endeavour to negotiate what they are pleased to call fair extended trade relations with the United States. Our duty is clear. It is first and foremost to unmask these deceptions, to show to the people of Canada how utterly false were the pretences on which the late decision was given. We are also bound to make the people of Canada understand the situation, to make them see clearly and distinctly that it is utterly impossible, and the Government know it is utterly impossible, to obtain material modifications in our present strained relations with the United States, except on a vastly wider basis than the hon. gentlemen appear in the least degree disposed to offer. If the hon. gentleman is disposed to adopt the policy which we, on this side of the House, have advocated, I can assure him we will support him in carrying out such a proposition. He has nothing to fear from this side of the House, if he only comes out and declares boldly and frankly that, having found that there is no possibility of obtaining reciprocal trade relations with the United States, except on the basis I have indicated, he feels it his duty in the interest of the country to accept it. We do not care whether the hon. gentleman remains in office for three, or four, or five, or six years longer; but we do care a great deal that the policy we have advocated, and which we believe to be the sole and only policy which can really relieve the people of this country, should become the law of the land. Now, Sir, it is idle talk about interrupting negotiations; there are no negotiations to interrupt; there have been no negotiations to interrupt, and I tell the hon. gentleman that, so far as the trade policy is concerned, there will be no negotiations to interrupt, unless and until he is prepared to accept the policy which is laid down from this side of the House. However this may be, I maintain that the country at any rate has the clearest right to know where these gentlemen really stand on this question. Our position is plain enough; our position has been thrice defined and thrice enforced by vote on the floor of this Parliament. The hon. gentleman knows it: the hon. gentleman has had the assurance of the leader of the Opposition and as it was so it is to-day; but where are the Government? Are the Government to be found with my hon. friend the President of the Council; are they determined to have no reciprocity at all; are they disposed to declare as he does that reciprocity in natural products is the worst thing that could happen to the farmers of Canada; are they with the Secretary of State, who declares that he is disposed to go to the very utmost limits for the purpose of obtaining a repeal of the McKinley tariff; are they with the First Minister in his offer to exchange free coal, or are they with the Minister of Marine in his declaration that no such thing shall be done, First Minister or not to the contrary notwithstanding. Are they with Sir Charles Tupper, who, according to his own statement, was willing to make an unrestricted offer of reciprocity to Mr. Bayard, as long as four years ago, and who could not be induced, although he was Minister of Finance at the time, to appear in this House and argue for one moment against the proposition which I brought forward in 1888. Are they with him, or where in the world are they? This I have got to point out to the Government. If they really only desire reciprocity in natural products; if that is their policy, if they are not prepared to include manufactures, then what business have they sending embassies to Washington at all? They have had the emphatic declaration of Mr. Blaine that the present Government of the United States will not listen and have not the slightest intention of listening to any proposition for reciprocity in natural products only. That has been reinforced by the authoritative declaration of Senator Carlisle, who, the First Minister well knows, is a very prominent leader of the Democratic party which now control the House of Representatives. For the matter of that, Sir, if time permitted me to quote, I have the authority of the First Minister himself, announced several years ago, that he was perfectly well aware that there was no use, no chance, and no hope for negotiating a treaty for reciprocity in natural products with the United States. I repeat that if the hon. gentlemen are ready to include manufactured goods, if that is part of their policy—and without that it is idle and useless for them to go to Washington to discuss trade relations—then, Sir, how dare they presume to attack us, who from the first, seeing and knowing the necessity of this, have had the courage of our convictions, and have told the people of Canada that if they wished to have reciprocity with the United States they must perforce and by necessity include all United States manufactures. If the hon. gentlemen, at this present moment, find themselves in an unhappy position, if they find that the United States Government entertain very great distrust of their proposals, if they find that even their own supporters entertain a great distrust of their proposals, who on earth have they to blame, when hardly two of their own selves can be found at one and the same time making the same statement on this important question? I desire the House to consider the position. It is perfectly idle to imagine that we can stand still in our present situation; it is perfectly idle to imagine that we will be able to remain as we are now. One of two things is certain to occur: Either on the one hand you will have free trade with the United States, you will have free trade all over this continent, or, on the other hand, what Sir Charles Tupper has predicted is extremely likely to occur, and you will have, sooner or later, in one form or another, a practical suspension of intercourse between this country and the United States. We know well on what terms the first great boon can be obtained by the people of this country, and we have the right, I think, to ask a plain "yes" or "no." That is all we demand as to the policy of the Government of Canada on this question. There can be no doubt whatever, for it is plain to every man who has bestowed a second thought on the question—no man knows it better than the First Minister himself—that if you want to have free trade relations or extended trade relations with the United States you must be prepared to admit their manufactures free. Unless you are prepared and ready to do this it is worse than waste of time, it is merely exposing Canada to needless humiliation and disgrace to send messengers to Washington who are known to be predestined to fail. The manufacturers of this country—at any rate the protected manufacturers—know this just as well as we do, the Government know it, their parliamentary supporters know it, and it will be our business and our duty on the floor of Parliament, through the public press, on the hustings, and in every possible shape and way, to take care that from this time out the people of Canada are also made aware of the real facts of the case; that they shall know how, and how only, reciprocity with the United States can be obtained; that they shall know how, and how only, they can be relieved from the extreme pressure which is now being inflicted on many parts of the country by the injudicious McKinley tariff to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. I must say that I can conceive no reason nor no ground why hon. gentlemen should shift and evade on this question. Most assuredly they will not escape discussion in this House, most assuredly we will take care that whether they like it or not so soon as the forms of this House will permit they will be compelled to make some sort of an explanation, they will be compelled to make some definition, if it only be a negative one, of their position on this question. They certainly will not conciliate the United States by their present conduct, nor will they conciliate their own followers. If the issue were one less important, if there were any less grave questions at stake, I would say that the whole position and attitude of the Government was simply a subject for ridicule, but as it is I must admit that it is a matter for profound regret to me, profound regret to every member of this House who cares for the dignity and honour of Canada, to see the position in which we have been placed by the lack of straightforwardness and the lack of statesmanship exhibited by these gentlemen. At this present moment there can be no doubt whatever that the position of our country in the eyes of the people of the United States is very far indeed from what it should be. Our self-respect is very gravely injured by such proceedings as these to which the hon. gentlemen have recently been parties. More than that, Sir, they did material injury to a cause which might, by proper management on their part, have been in a fair way to be redressed, and this injury is likely to be perpetuated for a very unnecessarily long time. So far as it is possible for us to judge, from their own recorded declarations, and from the statements they have made in various places throughout the country, what the Government are now doing is continually wavering and halting between two opinions. One day the High Commissioner gets the better of the situation and succeeds in persuading the Government to send envoys to Washington: the next day a representation from the "Red Parlour" convinces the First Minister that of two dangers or evils he had better choose what he considers the least, and continue to support those gentlemen to whom he owes his position here; and, finally, we find that when those hon. gentlemen do go down to Washington, they are to all intents and purposes denied an audience. We find that they are even told to go and learn their own mind, and within six months afterwards when they have made up their minds what they are going to propose, they may, perchance, be permitted to state it to the Secretary of State of the United States. I have never been blind, Sir, to the difficulties of carrying out such a measure as this; I know that they are neither few nor slight; but I am bound to say that however difficult the position may be, in my judgment it will be infinitely more difficult of remedy unless the Government of Canada are prepared to make up their mind to accept the only terms on which it is possible for them to obtain relief for the people of this country. One thing I must say, and that is this: If it were the object of the Government of Canada during the last five years to destroy all chance of a reasonable settlement or of making a fair treaty with the United States, I cannot conceive that they could have acted in any other way than they have done. I cannot conceive that they could have taken any other steps to prevent the people of the United States from accepting the propositions made by them other than they have seen fit to take. Twice, Sir, within the last four years, they have brought things to such a pass that we have been in imminent peril of seeing our intercourse with the United States practically suspended. Twice they have been warned very emphatically of the danger of the course they have been pursuing. I would be glad to believe, even at this hour, that the hon. gentlemen had awakened to the real sense of the situation, and were prepared to take the only step which, as I have said, can be taken with any reasonable chance of success for the purpose of doing what they declare in the Speech from the Throne they have always been desirous of doing, namely, establishing our relations with the United States on such a footing that they are not likely hereafter to be disturbed, There can be no doubt whatever that the line which the hon. gentlemen have chosen to pursue, through their press and their advocates in Parliament, is of all others the one most calculated to destroy all chance and opportunity of obtaining such a treaty. They all know right well that the people and the Government of the United States are singularly well informed of all that occurs on this side of the line. Our language is the same; our press is freely exchanged with theirs; they have a whole army of consular agents in this country; and I can tell them that every jingo speech, every jingo article, every foolish sneer by the hon. gentleman or his friends at the people of the United States, is of necessity re-echoed in the press of that country, and will of necessity exercise a most prejudicial influence on any negotiations which he or others may originate. I hold any man in this country, be his place or position what it may, who chooses to foster that foolish and silly prejudice which exists in the minds of some portion of our people against our kinsmen in the United States, is in the highest degree a traitor—a traitor to Canada, a traitor to the British Empire, a traitor to the British race. Those are my opinions on that subject, and I think I have a far better ground for stigmatizing as traitors those who for the last few years have been for their own party purposes creating bad blood between the people of this country and the people of the United States, than those hon. gentlemen have had to so stigmatize myself and my hon. friends on this side of the House because, forsooth, we desire to trade freely with our neighbours, and to bring back as far as we can the people of the United States into that friendly and cordial union with Canada and the British Empire, on the furtherance of which object I venture to say the best hopes of humanity depend. That is my view of the relation that ought to exist between the two countries. I have said for the last twenty years that there is but one real and important service which Canadian statesmen can render to the British Empire, and that is in every possible shape and way they can to bridge over the gulf which for the last hundred years has unfortunately subsisted between the two great divisions of the English race. Sir, I believe that if the hon. gentleman even now were to apply himself to that noble end he might, in spite of all he has done in the other direction, in spite of all the mistakes he has made and the foolish language in which he and his friends have indulged, establish a much better claim than he has ever done to the thanks of his country and the thanks of the people of the British Empire whom he professes a desire to consolidate; and I commend to him and his Government the consideration I now offer, whether there is or can be any one step which he or any man can suggest which is more likely to bring about that desirable result than the policy which the Liberal party, through my hon. friend and myself, has often propounded, namely, the fullest, freest and most friendly relations that can be obtained with the people of the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has given us the intimation very early in the session that whatever may be the wishes or the thoughts of members on this side of the House, we are not going to escape full discussion. I think the speech of the hon. gentleman, and the discussion upon the Address, which has taken place upon that side of the House to-day, is sufficient evidence of that without an express declaration in so many words. But if the discussion to which we are to be treated throughout the length of this session, be it long or short, is to be so discursive and iterative as the speech of the hon. gentleman for the last hour has been, I think we shall not be very heavily hit or very badly hurt thereby. I have listened to the hon. gentleman when he has been happy in his remarks —I mean happy from his point of view—strong, crisp, connected and terse; but the boundless iteration, the going round and round and the coming back to the only three points he has urged in the two or three hours he has been speaking, has been somewhat surprising, and has shown that the labours and toils of the election have not yet been fully recovered from. Well, Sir, what has been the burden of the two speeches we have heard from the other side? First, that the Government and their party have been badly shattered; secondly, that we—that is the Opposition—have been beaten; thirdly, that we have been beaten unfairly; fourthly, that the proposed negotiations have been a sham from beginning to end, His Excellency has been imposed upon, the people of Canada have been treated to a fraud, and that there is only one way out of this humiliation which the Government have brought upon themselves in Canada, and that is by adopting "our" policy; and, Sir, I leave it to the members of this House who have listened to the hon. gentleman's long speech to say whether he has by any one sentence intimated cleary and definitely what is the policy which he invites us to adopt—what are its main essentials; what are even its principles? With regard to the statement that the Government have come back badly shattered, any way we are here, and if hon. gentlemen will turn up the records of the election of 1887, they will find that the Government to-day has come stronger out of the last contest than it did out of the election of 1887. And I think they will also find—although this is a little in the line of prophecy—that as the years roll on, the same process will be repeated from 1891 to 1895, which had place from 1887 to 1891: and the only basis on which I rest that prediction at present is this, that the grounds hon. gentlemen opposite have for appealing to the people are not a whit stronger to-day than they were in 1887, but, on the contrary, are weaker. The hon. the leader of the Opposition declared that his party was beaten by unfair tactics. He bewailed the fact that dissolution took place. He has bewailed that fact ever since the order went forth for an election, on every platform where he has taken his stand. He has attributed his defeat to the enactment known as the Gerrymander Act. Is that the case? There has been no Gerrymander Act passed since 1882. The very same Act is on the Statute-book to-day defining the limits of the various electoral districts which was on the Statute-book in 1882 and 1887.

Mr. MULOCK. Was that a fair one?

Mr. FOSTER. From 1882 to the present there has not been a day in which political speeches have not been made by hon. gentlemen opposite challenging us to go before the people, and in no case did they insist on a previous repeal of the Gerrymander Act. But the astounding fact is this, that the very places in which they have been most badly routed are those sections of the Dominion—shreds and patches some may call them, but integral and important parts as I think—where the Gerrymander Act of 1882 has no footing. How do the Opposition account for their overwhelming defeat in British Columbia, the North-West and Manitoba? How do they account for the break made in their hitherto solid ranks in the little Island of Prince Edward? How do they account for the thirteen to three which New Brunswick sends up against them? How do they account for the strong contingent which Nova Scotia has sent against them? Can they account for all this by the Gerrymander Act? Not at all, because that Act had no force or effect in those sections. This, Sir, is simply a pretence to break their fall, to enable them to ease down, if possible, before the country the defeat which they experienced, instead of the triumph they so confidently asserted they would achieve at the polls. No, Mr. Speaker, you are not to look to the Gerrymander Act for the cause of their defeat. It lies deeper than that. You have to con their policy for the last five or ten years; you have to look to their so-called statesmanship; you have to consider their vacillating, wavering policy from 1878 to the present; you have to consider the stone which they vainly offered to the people instead of bread. These, and not the Gerrymander Act, are the causes of their defeat at the polls. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken have given as another reason of their defeat that the lists were not revised. Why, if any are entitled to complain of that they are the Conservative members. It is well known that the Conservatives had not attended to the lists, and if there was one cause for the boasted confidence of the Opposition before the elections it was, as they openly stated, that the lists were in their favour. Neither were they taken at any disadvantage. In 1887 they began their propaganda; and from 1887 to the time of the election not a month rolled by which did not find their members at work, in which their pamphlets were not circulated throughout the country, in which their orators were not holding forth on the stump, and in which their friends on the other side of the line were not keeping them provided with sinews of war. Taken at a disadvantage! Why, the hon. member for South Oxford was busy running through this country from one end of it to the other, six months before the election, and assuring his friends in the cities, as he came back from one country constituency after another, that there was a revolution abroad, that the whole people were up in arms against the Government policy, and that all the Liberal party had to do was to stand together and they were certain of victory. Let the Government, he said, bring on the elections as soon as they please. Well, the elections were brought on, and the hopes of hon. gentlemen opposite have faded away; and now they seek for some paltry excuses to tone down their defeat. Well, I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that so long as they cling to those methods they will not meet with success. I can tell them that until they meet in solemn, sensible conclave, and decide on a rational policy to lay before the people, a policy which will have the flavour of common sense and Canadian independence, they will remain where they are. Another ground of attack to-night on the Government has been the Washington negotiations. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has not scrupled to say deliberately that a fraud was perpetrated upon His Excellency the Governor General and the Canadian people. On what does he base that charge? When you come to think of it, Sir, is it not one of the most absurd spectacles that could be imagined? My hon. friend is a statesman of many years' standing and of long experience, and, when he speaks, he is supposed to speak for his party. It is a historic party, a party which has a future before it of one kind or another, and you would think, Sir, that the hon. gentleman, before committing himself to so serious a public statement, would have had some definite information on which to base it. But what is the information on which he speaks? Mere suppositions, a bundle of extracts from various newspapers. Hour after hour he consumed in concocting possibilities, in devising imaginings, in seizing what this one and that has said, when, in the Speech from the Throne, there is the promise that if he will wait a day or two he will have the very papers and documents which will make all this matter plain. Is the hon. gentleman afraid of his case? Was he afraid that if he waited three or four days until these papers came down he would not be able to make the speech he has just made, and so decided to forestall the papers and get his surmises spread throughout the country before they could have a chance of being confronted by documentary truth. It does seem to me that a statesman of the experience of my hon. friend, a leader of his party, should have contained himself for a day or two until the documents were before him, when he could read them and base his criticisms on truth, and not on surmises and rumours gathered here and there. This he neglected to do, but rather of all possible odds and ends he has concocted a very nice theory, and he has come to the conclusion that we were all wrong, that we had no invitation to Washington, that we were kicked out, that we were humiliated, that we have prejudiced Canada in the face of the United States, and that, as I said before, nothing is left for us but to take his policy; and he is so kind and considerate as not to overwhelm us with any definite statement as to what that policy really is. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will say to him that it would be well for him to cultivate some faith in Canada and in the Canadian people. I know there is no man on the floor of this House, I do not think there is a man in public life in Canada to-day, who has said harder things of the yeomanry of Canada than that hon. gentleman. He distrusts them. He has no faith in their intelligence. He has no confidence in their virtues. He distrusts them altogether, and he is not content with distrusting them, but he flaunts his distrust in the face of the people of Canada. Consequently, when there is an alternative, when the Minister of Justice makes a solemn statement in Toronto, when he gives official utterance, speaking as a Minister of the Crown, as to how these negotiations were commenced and how they were carried on, and on the other hand there is a letter sent by Mr. Blaine to a Mr. Baker saying some things that were true and not stating others, the hon. gentleman says: "I believe Mr. Blaine and not the Minister." A similar statement was made in the city of St. John by a late colleague of the hon. gentleman who is no longer in this House, who referred to the same matter and said, I prefer to believe Mr. Blaine. He believed Mr. Blaine, and he stays home with a majority of nearly a thousand against him. I think, if my hon. friend will allow me to tell him so, it would be well for him to trust the Canadian people a little more, and even to trust the Canadian Ministers when they make grave statements on their responsibilities as Ministers of the Crown. The position of the Government is consistent throughout. My hon. friend may go back in the history of trade negotiations with the United States from earliest times, and he will find that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party has been entirely consistent. There has been no period when the Conservative Government has not been in favour of a fair and equitable reciprocity treaty, such, for instance, as we believe the treaty of 1854 to have been. We stand still on that platform. Attempt after attempt has been made to obtain such a fair and equitable arrangement. Since the abrogation of that treaty of 1854 attempts have been made—I suppose half a dozen of them—to get the United States to discuss with us the question of trade relations on the ground of what we believed to be fair and equitable. With the exception of the George Brown Reciprocity Draft, which met with an ignoble fate in the Senate of the United States, from that time to the present the United States Government has not intimated any desire to make arrangements of a satisfactory nature for trade relations with the people of Canada. In 1887-88, when the plenipotentiaries were in Washington to negotiate a treaty in regard to the fisheries, the proposal was made by Sir Charles Tupper to settle all difficulties on the basis of an equitable trade arrangement, and it was rejected. The papers will show that last November an opportunity did arise, a door was opened, no matter what my hon. friend has said to-night to the contrary, by which Canada had the opportunity to remind the United States, not simply that it was in favour of reciprocity, but that it always had been in favour of reciprocity, and that it had not changed its mind; and, if my hon. friend had studied the official papers as he seems to have studied the emanations from the party press, he would have seen a document passed by the Government of Canada, the Order in Council which was sent home to Great Britain, which was sent by Great Britain to the United States Government, which was the basis upon which we proposed to enter upon the negotiations for trade arrangements. I think that has appeared in almost every newspaper in the country.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CHARLTON. When was that document laid before the United States Government?

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will contain himself a little, he will get still more information than he has now, and which, if he follows the lines followed by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) this evening, he seems to be in need of. That document embodies the basis upon which the Government of Canada proposes to enter upon negotiations with the United States. That has been before the Government of the United States for months, and upon that have followed the other steps in the negotiations. I wish to say, without going into particulars as to what the papers will show, that, notwithstanding all the pleasantries of my hon. friend, we did not go down to Washington without invitation, but we went on the very day and at the very hour when we were invited to go there by the Secretary of State himself. Whatever may have arisen afterwards, however it may have been thought desirable to postpone the negotiations to the 12th October or any other date, the Canadian Government is not responsible for that and the Liberal-Conservative party cannot be blamed for it. The Government showed itself consistent, in the first place, by declaring that there was a door open for negotiations, and that a delegation would be sent to Washington after the 4th March, and, furthermore, by sending a delegation and being prepared to go again on the 12th October to do what no Canadian Government has been asked to do from 1866 to the present time, that is, to talk over the trade matters and relations existing between this country and the United States, with a view to their better and final settlement. This statement which I make will be borne out by the papers, and I cannot see where we have been inconsistent or where we have prejudiced the interests of Canada or have done aught which any Government in favour of reciprocity ought not to have done. Wherever the door has been opened we have entered it. If the negotiations have not progressed so far as to show tangible results, the Government is not at fault. There may be some reasons behind, which may be brought out later, why such negotiations have not been more quickly brought to a successful conclusion. Now, my hon. friend evidently had before his mind the fact that a large number of the members of this House are here for the first time, and he also appears to remember that they had probably never read one of his speeches, and consequently he thought it was his duty to-night to retail the better parts of some four or five speeches that he had made in this House in order to fortify their minds. These have been answered, it is not necessary to answer them again. He has taken up the course of Canada with reference to the United States, and has striven to show from his standpoint, from his place of grave utterance, from his position which commands the attention of the people here and of people in the United States and in other parts of the world—he has tried to show that Canada, that the Canadian Government, has been the aggressor, has been in fault, has tried to prejudice the relations between the United States and Canada, and has done so almost with malice prepense and aforethought, and has by that means made it impossible for the United States to meet us in negotiations for trade relations on anything like terms that can have a successful issue. Sir, the doings in 1866, in which I had some share, and the doings from 1866, in which other members of this Government have had more nearly a share than myself, have been plain and patent to this House and to the country. Not only in discussions here, but in public documents and through the press, they have been patent and open to the observation of all. Sir, I stand here to make the assertion to-night that no unprejudiced man can study the course of negotiations and the dealings of the Canadian Government regarding them, without coming to the conclusion that the British Government came to, and came to heartily, that in all these things Canada had done her simple duty, and had not exceeded her rights and responsibilities, and the duty which, under those rights and responsibilities, she owes to herself. It was no evidence of animus against the United States that we allowed them one season's free fishing, and gave it to them cordially for the sake of the prospect of an agreement upon this matter. All through that issue, and in the protection of the fishery rights guaranteed to us by the treaty of 1818, the care and forethought, the spirit of courtesy and forbearance, and the general lack, on so long a coast and over so wide an area, of any acts which ought fairly to irritate or to annoy, are evidences of the spirit with which this Government carried out its dealings in that critical and important time, so that, while not abating anything of the rights of our country, and keeping that for the country which was justly its due, she has not given any reasonable cause for irritation to the great country to the south of us. Now, Sir, there has been a good deal of criticism of the Government's policy. May I just go back and ask a question in return? Will the Opposition be kind enough to tell us what their policy is? We are anxious to learn. If there is only one way out, we want to know what it is. If you have got that way do not lock it up and keep it, but let us have it, and let us have it in all its plainness and fulness of detail. A good deal has been said about divisions on the question in the Conservative ranks. Is there no division in the ranks of the Opposition? My hon. friend has stated that that policy should be unrestricted reciprocity, free trade with the United States, involving discrimination against every other country. He does not deny it to-night. My hon. friend who sits a little behind him and who is just now coming to his seat (Mr. Scriver), declares in a public assembly before the electors in his county that if it means discrimination against Great Britain, he for one does not believe in that policy. Is there not a chance for a friendly conference between the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the leader of the Opposition, and the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) to know what shall be the outcome, and how they are going to bring this thing out exactly? Sir, they talk about changes and shifting in the canvass. I know what took place in the Maritime Provinces, I know what took place in the city of St. John. I know that in the city of St. John, before the contest had been three days on, the candidates, in Opposition, were going about from store to store, from place of business to place of business, saying to the affrighted merchants "don't be frightened, we don't believe that all those fellows up there say, you are not going to be hurt, we will look after your interests, and there is to be no discrimination against Great Britain." You will find Mr. Weldon's statements in point. He declared over and over again that the party did not intend to discriminate against Great Britain, and if he had not done it, and if the leaders in the Province of New Brunswick had not put out several different planks for their followers to stand upon, they would not have sent back here even their corporal's guard from the Province of New Brunswick. That same thing is true in the Province of Nova Scotia, I have not the least doubt. But, Sir, we are told that they have a majority from the Province of Quebec. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, they have a majority from that Province, and they have well up to a majority, but not quite, in the Province of Ontario; they have a majority in the Province of Prince Edward Island, and that ends it. But will they consider the facts and say whether in any Dominion contest that has ever taken place since Confederation, the Dominion Government had such an aggregation and combination of powers, as it had to deal with in the Province of Quebec and in the Province of Ontario? Has it ever been known before that the Premier of one of the strongest Provinces unites hands with the Premier of the second strongest Province, and that they were leagued with the Premiers in two other Provinces, and these all together, with their immense political patronage, united in a sworn endeavour to oust the Dominion Government and put their friends in power? It is well that their former leader is not here to-night, if he were he would certainly rise in his seat and condemn the degenerate remnants of his party who have gone so far back on his teachings, when he pleaded most eloquently, when he argued most cogently and laboriously against the iniquity and against the wrong of Provincial Governments and Dominion parties uniting together in Dominion contests. Yet, Sir, you find what? A majority in Quebec, got at what expense? An alliance with the Premier of the Province of Quebec who, if he be noted for many other things, is not noted for his economy in public expenditure; a Premier who, wishing to float a loan of ten millions, wanted a leverage to do it with; and when the Dominion elections were announced, was happy to believe that he had found the leverage with which he could go over to Europe and float the loan, and tell the financiers that he had whipped the Liberal-Conservative party and got a promise from my hon. friend opposite for an addition of $400,000 a year subsidy, and so he could go to the money markets of Europe and show how he expected to meet the interest on his new loan. And yet the leader of the Opposition boasts of a majority from the Province of Quebec. I would not boast of that if I were the leader of an Opposition, who has inveighed during all these years of opposition against the extravagance of the Dominion Government against piling up the debt, who has bemoaned the burdens of the tax-payer, and who has promised his best endeavours for a tunnel in one Province and an increased equalized subsidy in all the Provinces, if he got back into power, terms which, if carried out, would have entailed millions of dollars of interest upon this country, many millions of permanent debt, and would have weighed down the country, and, worse than all, would have been a perpetual mandement and promise to the Premier of the Province of Quebec to go on with lavish expenditure to whatever extent he pleased, and when it was piled up too high to make a combination with a Dominion party and get it saddled on the General Government. If a majority of four or five in a Province had been obtained at such a terrible expense of consistency and right I would not have the face to stand in Parliament and boast of such a majority and so unworthily obtained. I think I have occupied all the time that is necessary, although I might take up other points and make remarks upon them. For instance, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) assails the manufacturers. He has always called them monopolists: he has learned another term, and now he calls them vile monopolists, and he declares it is un-British to have a protective policy in Canada, the result of which is to foster those vile monopolists. And yet he has been urging throughout the length and breadth of the country a tariff twice as high, which will breed vile monopolists twice as large and numerous. It is said to be un-British to have a tariff of 30 per cent. which does not discriminate against British manufacturers an iota——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER—but it is thoroughly British when you allow the United States manufacturer in free and raise the tariff up to 40 or 50 per cent. against Britain. The British manufacturer now makes woollen goods and brings them to Quebec, where he pays a certain duty upon them; and the American manufacturer, making the same grade of goods, brings them to Montreal and pays precisely the same duty on them. There is no discrimination. But there is a discrimination which is mischievous, which is unnatural besides being un-British, when you allow the American manufacturer free ingress, and place against the British manufacturers' duties of 40, 50 or 60 per cent. There are some great difficulties for hon. gentlemen opposite to reconcile before we can take their policy of unrestricted reciprocity plus continental free trade. They have to show us where the revenue is to come from. They have never done so. They have to show what kind of a tariff we are to have, and who are to make it. They have never shown that either. They have to show us whether or not the inevitable tendency of such a state of things would not be to drift us into political union with the United States. I give my opinion diffidently on that point. But Mr. Blake says that a rift commenced between him and his party in 1887, and it rapidly widened year by year until after repeated admonitions, when the elections were ordered on, he thought it his duty to give vent to his feelings and to express his views, but from the sympathy he had with the old men of the party who had worked with him and acted under his leadership, he left the performance of what he considered to be his duty to his country until he should see whether his party carried the elections or not. Then his statement appeared, and these three points to which I have referred were made by Mr. Edward Blake with a terseness and force which has not been answered and cannot be answered by hon. gentlemen opposite. So they have to reconcile these difficulties. These have to be cleared away before they can hope that the people or hon. members on this side of the House will accept their nostrum of unrestricted reciprocity and continental free trade. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to know what the Government will not do or will do, I can tell them in a few words. The Government will not negotiate a reciprocity treaty with any country, which treaty would shut us out from every other country in the world, Great Britain included. The Government will not negotiate a treaty which would place the framing of its tariff in the hands of a more powerful and greater country, and would enable that country to place upon us a tariff entirely inordinate and entirely unfitted to our needs. But as regards the people of the United States and their institutions, together with the continuance of the peace, the prosperity and progress of the American people, no member on this side of the House who thinks, and we all think on this side of the House, has any other hope or wish than that they may become consolidated and stable as a people, that their prosperity may be great, and that they may continue to thrive and grow and become an increasing factor in aid to the general civilization of the world. But alongside of that wish is the thought of hon. members on this side of the House, and of the people of the country largely, that we are now in too strong a position, that we have sacrificed too much to gain it, and have too great prospects in the future, to be willing to prejudice it, and, moreover, that we are not in a position to necessitate a choice as between Canada and Great Britain and the interests of each, but in a position where the best interests of Canada can be most wisely and constitutionally maintained in connection with the best interests of the mother land.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not my intention to closely follow the observations addressed to the House by the hon. Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman has discussed a number of topics that can more appropriately be discussed at a later period of the session, and these I propose to pass by this evening. The hon. gentleman has complained of a combination between a Local Government and the Liberal party in this House. I am not aware any such combination existed. But I do remember that a short time ago the hon. gentleman's predecessor, who was a member from the same Province as himself, took an active part in the provincial elections in another Province. That course, I think, no other hon. member of this House, much less an hon. gentleman while a member of the Government, ventured to pursue. The Minister of Finance says the Government are here. I dare say the Government as a corporate body are present in this Parliament, but I think there were two colleagues of the hon. gentleman who sat in the House of Commons in the last Parliament, immediately before dissolution, who are not present this evening, and it was hardly in good taste on the part of the Minister of Finance to indulge in the boasting which characterized a very considerable portion of his speech. The hon. gentleman has told us that it is true the Government may not be quite so strong at the present time as it was in the Parliament that immediately preceded this one, and he invites us to wait and see how strong the Government may become. The hon. gentleman predicts that four or five years hence the Government will become quite a strong one. In that respect we will let the future speak for itself. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I do not attach much faith to his predictions, for I think I have often heard him in this House indulge in predictions which have not been verified. The hon. gentleman says that we are asking for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and that this is the chief plank of our platform. He says that we are asking the support and confidence of the country upon that ground, and yet after that declaration he tells us that he does not know what our policy is, and he asks us to define for his information the policy to which we adhere. He says the country is against our policy, but he does not know what it is. The hon. gentleman told us that, a few years ago, Sir Charles Tupper made an attempt to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with the United States, and that Mr. Bayard, the predecessor of Mr. Blaine in office, refused to entertain any proposition for negotiation. I do not think that the hon. gentleman in making that statement was quite candid with the House. The hon. gentleman knows very well that when Sir Charles Tupper proposed what he called an unrestricted offer of reciprocity, he proposed it as part of a scheme for the settlement of the dispute with regard to our fisheries, with regard to the extent of these fisheries and the interest that the American people had a right to claim under the Convention of 1818. The Government of the United States on that occasion informed him, as we all well understood, that they would not undertake the negotiation of any commercial arrangement in connection with any part of that settlement instead of dealing directly with the question, and interpreting by mutual agreement if possible, the right of the respective Governments under the Treaty of 1818. That was a wholly different proposition from the one which the hon. gentleman would lead us to suppose that Mr. Bayard had made. Mr. Bayard did not say that he would not undertake negotiations with regard to the commercial arrangements between the two countries, but he did say that he would not undertake them as the means of putting in abeyance a dispute between the two countries with reference to the fisheries. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman has told us that we have not faith in the future of Canada and that this is one of the reasons of our failure. That is not the fact. We have faith in the future of this country; we think it a great misfortune that the affairs of our country have not been in more competent hands; we believe that the condition of the country shows what it has suffered in this particular, but it is not a want of faith in the country we have exhibited, it is a want of faith in the gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, a want of faith in the capacity and zeal and fitness of the hon. gentlemen for the positions which they hold. The hon. gentleman has said that we have bewailed the dissolution. We have not done so. We have said that the dissolution of Parliament was a gross violation of the principles and conventions of the constitution. We still adhere to that proposition, and I think there will be very little difficulty in showing to this House, and in convincing the country, that when hon. gentlemen advised His Excellency to dissolve Parliament they advised a course which was entirely at variance with the spirit of the constitution under which we live. We have only to look at the 50th article of the British North America Act to see that it is declared that the Commons of Canada shall be elected for a period of five years. It is true that this is subject to the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve Parliament; it is subject to a power which in its terms is absolute, but the power of dissolution is not arbitrary; it is a power that is to be exercised according to the rules and principles of our constitution. The hon. gentleman knows that in this respect it does not differ from any other prerogative possessed by the Crown. It is in the power of the Crown to refuse assent to, or to reserve for the assent of Her Majesty, every measure that is carried through this House, but if His Excellency the Governor General, acting under the powers conferred upon him as representative of the Crown under the 55th article of the British North America Act, should disallow every Act or reserve every Act that is carried through this Parliament, every one knows that if such a course were adopted it would be a gross violation of our constitutional rights and privileges, although it would be in strict accordance with the letter of the constitution. When we look at the provisions of our constitutional system and the practices that have occurred under it, we find that the power of dissolution is a harmonizing power. It is conferred for a special purpose. It is conferred for the purpose of bringing into harmony the different powers of the State when the powers of the State differ from each other. Take, for instance, the differences which may arise between the Crown and the House of Commons. If differences should arise the power of dissolution may be exercised for the purpose of bringing the advisers of the Crown and the House of Commons into harmony again. But I would ask any hon. gentleman upon the Treasury benches to mention in the whole history of England where there has been a single case of an Administration dissolving Parliament when that Administration enjoyed the confidence of the House of Commons and when no conflict had arisen between the two Houses of Parliament. Let us take the instances which have occurred in English parliamentary history. In 1784 the Crown, upon the advice of Mr. Pitt the younger, dissolved Parliament. Under what circumstances was Parliament dissolved? Pitt did so when the House of Commons refused supplies, when the India Bill was defeated, and when a large number of the House had again and again voted against him, but when he was defeated by a majority of one he appealed to the country and the country sustained the dissolution. There was in this case a difference of opinion between the advisers of the Crown and the House of Commons, and it was for the purpose of bringing these two into harmony again that the dissolution took place. Take again the case of 1834 when William IV dismissed the Melbourne Administration and formed a Government under Peel. A dissolution took place then, and why? Because the Government that the King had constituted was in a minority and did not enjoy the confidence of Parliament. The election was brought about for the purpose of bringing the House of Commons into harmony with the Administration for the time being. We find in every case that the prerogative of dissolution is exercised for this purpose. It is not a fact that the Crown has an arbitrary discretion in this matter. It is true that if the Crown dissolves Parliament upon the advice of the Administration the Administration is responsible for the dissolution, the constitution makes that dissolution effective, but it is not the less a violation of the principle of the constitution when the Crown is so advised, if there is no difference between the House of Commons and the Government of the day. Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman was not defeated in the last Parliament. He had not proposed any measure which he had failed to carry; there was nothing which he had suggested or asked at the hands of that Parliament which he could not have succeeded in carrying. Then, I say that there was no precedent for the course the hon. gentleman took. It is true, in 1859 the Government of Lord Derby dissolved Parliament, and he appealed to the country, not for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the country on any legislative or administrative measure of the Government, but he had been called into office by Her Majesty. He formed a Government which existed by forbearance; and he gave as a reason for dissolution that if he resigned his opponents would be unable to form an administration that would command the majority of the House. So he appealed to the country, asking the country, under the existing circumstances, to give to Her Majesty an administration which might be able to carry on the government effectively. Sir, the principles upon which Parliament may be dissolved and an appeal had to the country are very well set out by Professor Dicey in his recent work on the English constitution. I will read a paragraph or two from that work, the effect of which is this: That in every instance where a dissolution is had, it is for the purpose of harmonizing differences that exist between the Government and the House of Commons—a condition of things that did not exist in the circumstances of this country when the recent dissolution took place. Professor Dicey says:

"The discretionary power of the Crown occasionally may be, and according to constitutional precedents sometimes ought to be, used to strip an existing House of Commons of its authority."

Assuming that the House of Commons may have so far gone wrong—may have so far exhibited a spirit contrary to the best interests of the country, and so much at variance with the popular sentiment, as to justify the Crown in its dissolution—

"But the reason why the House can in accordance with the constitution be deprived of power and of existence is that an occasion has arisen on which there is fair reason to suppose that the opinion of the House is not the opinion of the electors."

Do the Government say that that was the case here, that the late House of Commons did not fairly support the policy or opinion of the Administration or reflect the popular sentiment, and that they dissolved the House for the purpose of ascertaining what the popular sentiment really was, and for the purpose of fairly and honestly giving expression to that popular sentiment in a new House? That I apprehend the hon. gentleman cannot fairly argue. Prof. Dicey goes on to say:

"A dissolution is, in its essence, an appeal from the legal to the political sovereign. A dissolution is allowable or necessary whenever the wishes of the legislature are, or may fairly be presumed to be, different from the wishes of the nation."

Did the hon. First Minister ever argue that, according to his view, the opinions and sentiments of the recent House of Commons were at variance with the sentiments and opinions of the nation, and that on that ground the dissolution took place? Professor Dicey again says:

"Admit that the electors are the political sovereigns of the state, and the result appears naturally to follow that an appeal to them by means of a dissolution is constitutional, whenever there is valid and reasonable ground for supposing that their parliamentary representatives have ceased to represent their wishes."

Now, who has argued that the late House of Commons ceased to represent the wishes and sentiments of the people of this country? And if the Government did not think so, it ought not to have dissolved; it had no constitutional right or authority for advising dissolution: and I say that in the political history of England it will be found in every instance that differences had arisen between the two Houses, or the House of Commons and the Government, and the dissolution was for the purpose of correcting those variances, and once more restoring harmony between the House of Commons and the Administration. Let me next read an observation made on this subject by Sir Robert Peel, whom the hon. gentleman will admit to be a high constitutional authority. No one in his day knew better what the principles and spirit of the constitution were, and perhaps no one in his day adhered more strictly to what he believed to be the principles and the spirit of the constitution than he did. Now, Sir Robert Peel says with regard to the advice to be given to the Crown on the subject of a dissolution:

"We have advised Her Majesty to accept our resignation at once without adopting that alternative to which we might have resorted, namely, recommending to the Crown the exercise of its prerogative and the dissolution of the present Parliament. I do not hesitate to avow, speaking with a frankness that I trust will offend no one, that if Her Majesty's Government had failed in carrying, in all their integrity, the main measures of commercial policy which it was my duty to recommend, that there is no exertion that I would not have made—no sacrifice that I would not have incurred—in order to ensure the ultimate success of those measures, or at any rate to give the country an opportunity of pronouncing its opinion on the subject. For such a purpose, I should have felt justified in advising dissolution: because I think the continuance of doubt and uncertainty on such important matters, would have been a greater evil than the resort to a constitutional mode of ascertaining the opinion of the nation. But there has been fortunately no necessity for a dissolution of Parliament upon that ground. Those who dissented most strongly from our commercial policy, withdrew all factious and unseemly opposition, and, protesting against our measures, they have finally allowed them to pass. Those measures having thus become the law, I do not feel that we should be justified, for any subordinate considerations, for the mere interests of Government or party, in advising the exercise of the prerogative to which I have referred, and the dissolution of Parliament. I feel very strongly that no Administration is justified in advising the exercise of that prerogative, unless there be a reasonable presumption, a strong moral conviction indeed, that after dissolution they would be enabled to administer the affairs of the country through the support of a party sufficiently powerful to carry their measures."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but what is the point of the whole speech? That the Government make this appeal because in the existing House of Commons they cannot get on, and because they believe the sentiment of the country differs from the sentiment of the House. It is for the purpose of reconciling the variation that exists between two powers in the State, here between the Government and the House of Commons, and for no other purpose whatever. There is no instance in English history of a dissolution such as that which the Government advised on this occasion, and no misuse of the prerogative could be more gross than that under which that dissolution took place. Sir Robert Peel goes on to say :

"I do not think a dissolution justifiable for the purpose merely of strengthening a party. The power of dissolution is a great instrument in the hands of the Crown; and it would have a tendency to blunt the instrument if it were employed without grave necessity. If the purpose were to enable the country to decide whether ministers had been justified in proposing the measures of commercial policy brought forward at the beginning of the session, those measures having passed into a law, I do not think such a purpose alone would be a sufficient ground for a dissolution. There ought also to be a strong presumption that after a new election there would be returned to this House a party with strength sufficient to enable the Government, by their support, to carry that system of public policy of which it approved."

Now, some years later, another dissolution took place, a dissolution under the Government of Lord Derby; and on that occasion, Lord John Russell expressed his opinion upon the subject of that dissolution. Lord Derby's Government had been defeated. The dissolution was not for the purpose of simply strengthening his party but for the purpose of restoring harmony between the Administration and the House of Commons. The House of Commons had defeated a weak Administration; it had defeated the Government of Lord Derby, and he said that as his political opponents were divided it was impossible to constitute a government in a House so divided, which could be assured of the continued support of the Commons, and so a dissolution took place for the purpose of furnishing Her Majesty with a government and a House of Commons whose sentiments would be in accord. Lord John Russell on that occasion made this statement :

"It appears that the right hon. gentleman told his constituents that if a majority of this House had voted a censure upon Her Majesty's Government they would have to defend their opinions upon the hustings. Now, I beg leave to remind the House what have been the maxims on this subject of other statesmen while possessing the confidence of the Crown. They have thought where there was a great question depending, upon which no satisfactory conclusion would be obtained in this House—when the House and the Ministers of the Crown were decidedly at variance, such as was the case upon the Great India Bill of 1784, upon the Reform Bill of 1831, upon the question of free trade in 1841—that the solution of any such question should be sought in an appeal to the electors of the United Kingdom. But it is quite another matter when the question is whether a particular prime-minister, or a particular party should remain in office. And when Sir Robert Peel in 1846, explained his conduct in this House on resigning office, he stated that he had declined to propose to, or to advise Her Majesty to dissolve this House, because it was his opinion that that was a most delicate and sacred prerogative of the Crown, and ought not to be exercised for the purpose of any individual who might be at the head of affairs or for the purpose of any party. Now that entirely agrees with my opinion, and when I offered my resignation to Her Majesty in 1852 I declined to offer any advice to Her Majesty to dissolve the then Parliament. But there seems to be an opinion acquiring weight, which I am sorry to observe, that upon any occasion when a ministry has not a majority he may have recourse to that which Burke called, and I think truly called, a penal dissolution that is to say, he may not only put the members of this House to the great trouble and expense of an election, but may expose them to the dangers of any misrepresentation to which they may be subject in the performance of their duty. Now that, I think, ought not to be the relation between the Crown and the members of the House of Commons."

It appears that the right hon. gentleman told his constituents that if a majority voted a censure upon Her Majesty's Government they would have to defend their opinions on the hustings. Now, I beg leave to remind the House what have been the maxims on this subject of other statesmen while possessing the confidence of the Crown. They have thought when there was a great question depending, upon which no satisfactory conclusion could be obtained in this House, when the House and the Ministers of the Crown were decidedly at variance, such as was the case upon the great India Bill of 1784, or when the House of Lords defeats the measures supported by the House of Commons, as upon the Reform Bill. The House will see by this quotation that Lord John Russell, on that occasion, assumed that even then dissolution would only be advised in case a difference had arisen between the majority in the House of Commons and the Administration. I have already alluded to the circumstances under which Lord Derby advised the dissolution of Parliament in 1859 upon the defeat of his Administration on the proposed Reform Bill : and lest it might be supposed that the sentiments which he expressed in any way support the Government here on this occasion, I will read a sentence or two from his speech in the House of Lords, in defence of the advice he had given, and also a sentence or two from the speech of Mr. Disraeli, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader for the Government in the House of Commons. It will be seen from both these extracts that neither Minister supposed for a moment, that there could be any advice given pointing to a dissolution except there was a difference between the Government and the majority in the House of Commons, which made it impossible that the work of administration and legislation could be sucessfully carried on. Lord Derby, on the occasion I have referred to, said this:

"We do not appeal to the country on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, still less do we appeal to the country on the particular provisions of that Bill. We appeal to the country on a much larger and broader question, whether the present state of the House of Commons, split up as it is into hundreds of petty parties, any one of which is unable to conduct the business of the country, but which are able by combining together, to obstruct any Government that may be formed, shall receive the continued support and countenance of the people of England. We appeal to them as men who have endeavoured faithfully to discharge the duties of our office, who have endeavoured to deserve the confidence which the House of Commons has withheld and the confidence which our Sovereign has been pleased to renew to us."

That was the ground upon which Lord Derby, in 1859, based his appeal to the country, and defended the advice in favour of the dissolution which he gave Her Majesty on that occasion. And Mr. Disraeli, in speaking to the House of Commons on the same occasion, said :

"Believing that this state of affairs is prejudicial to the repute of Parliament and injurious to the best interests of the country, and believing, too, that it is of the utmost importance at this moment that the authority of the Government should be supported by the authority of Parliament, and not being conscious that during the time we have exercised power we have done anything to forfeit the good opinion of our fellow-countrymen, we have thought it our duty to advise Her Majesty to exercise her prerogative and to dissolve this Parliament."

Here you see again the ground of dissolution is a difference which existed between the House of Commons and the Administration for the time being. In 1868, the Government of Mr. Disraeli was defeated upon Mr. Gladstone's motion for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church; and on that occasion Mr. Disraeli intimated to Parliament that he would advise the dissolution of the House. Mr. Gladstone, in speaking against the proposition of dissolution, said that there was a majority of sixty or sixty-five against the Administration on the two motions upon which they had been defeated, and that, in the face of so large a majority, it was, in his opinion, contrary to constitutional practice to advise Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament. He also went on to state the circumstances under which he thought an Administration would be justified in advising the Crown to dissolve. He expressed his opinion as follows:—

"There are two conditions, as it appears to me, which are necessary in order to make an appeal to the country by a Government whose existence is menaced, a legitimate appeal. The first of them is that there should be an adequate cause of public policy; and the second of them is that there should be a rational prospect of a reversal of the vote of the House of Commons."

The Government must be menaced—that is his first proposition. Was the Government of Canada menaced here? What measure did the Government propose to the late Parliament which they felt assured they could not carry? Upon what question were they here defeated? The Government were not menaced and there was not a rational prospect of a reversal of the vote of the House of Commons, because there was no question of difference between the House of Commons and the Administration. I say, then, that there is not a particle of ground for the course the Government have taken. There is no constitutional precedent. There was nothing whatever to warrant the Administration in advising His Excellency to dissolve the late Parliament. The law says that Parliament shall last for five years. The law has entrusted to the Administration a great power—a power which, in their hands, is a great trust. They have the power of shortening that period of five years when the necessity arises. What is that necessity? The principles, the practices and the maxims of parliamentary government point out when that necessity arises and when that advice may be constitutionally given. It may be given when the Government are defeated in the House of Commons. It may be given when they find it impossible to get on in the House of Commons. It may be given to obtain from the political Sovereign a mandate to the Upper House when it has stood in the way of necessary legislation. But that was not the condition of the Administration here, and the dissolution of Parliament on their part was a most unwarranted exercise of power. It is not to be supposed that because certain power is vested in the Crown, there is no restraint upon the exercise of that power. Every power possessed by the Crown is to be exercised in a particular way. We know perfectly well under what circumstances the power of disallowance will be employed. We know perfectly well what measures are likely to be reserved for the consideration of the Imperial authorities. The power is not limited in point of law, but it is limited in point of convention, and in this country the conventions are as forcible as the law itself. What does our constitution begin with? It begins by declaring that we have a constitution similar in principle to the constitution of the United Kingdom. If, therefore, there is anything in the constitution of Canada which agrees with the constitution of the United Kingdom, the strength and binding character of the rule is in favour of our constitution, because the preamble gives the force of law to the conventions themselves, and this makes it less excusable to depart from the well-settled principles here than it would in the United Kingdom. Look at the well-settled conventions in regard to the Government itself. I find that by law each department has for its head a particular Minister who is appointed by commission under the Great Seal, whose duties are specified by law, and who is sworn to discharge those duties. Yet we know that he is interfered with by his colleagues. We know that the Prime Minister may override his judgment, or he may be interfered with in Council, and his opinions may have to give way to those of his colleagues in office. That is not from the force of any law; but the conventions of the constitution make it so, and those conventions rule. The hon. gentleman himself fills the office of First Minister, but that is an office not under the law. His office is unknown to the law. The hon. gentleman assents to that proposition. Yet he knows that his power is paramount to that of his colleagues. He may dismiss anyone of his colleagues, or he may advise the Crown to do so. If anyone of his colleagues resigns, that does not break up his Government; but if he resigns the Ministry is at an end. According to law each of his colleagues is as much an adviser of the Crown as he is, but the conventions arrange the matter so that his power is superior to theirs. There is no convention or rule by which the Crown can dissolve Parliament under the circumstances which existed under which our dissolution took place. The hon. gentleman said he was appealing to the people for the purpose of ascertaining their opinions, upon what? I listened to his speech and I could not ascertain. I listened to the observations addressed to the House by the Minister of Finance, and he did not tell us. It was not for the purpose of condemning our policy, for he did not know what it was, and, if he did, that would be irrelevant to the issue. It was not to sanction the negotiation of a scheme between the United States and this country, because we do not know to this hour what that scheme is, or what negotiations have taken place. But he says that this House is summoned to decide on the policy, the papers in reference to which are to be submitted a few days hence. The hon. gentleman assents to that statement. But that policy and the papers were as much concealed from the country as from us. Then what did the elections take place for? The hon. gentleman has always held it to be a most unconstitutional proceeding to dissolve Parliament in order to decide upon a question which is in the future. Does he remember what he said in 1874, in regard to Mr. Gladstone's appeal to the country? Does he remember reading and approving an article from the Spectator which accused Mr. Gladstone of having proposed a bribe to the country by proposing a change of taxation, and declared that it was improper to ask the public to decide, not in regard to the past but in regard to the future? Does he remember that he did not appeal to the country in regard to our present constitution on the ground that there was then a Parliament that had no mandate from the people? Does he remember that the question of the Union of the Provinces was never submitted to the people in any shape? It is true that on that question many eminent English statesmen have differed from the ground taken by the hon. gentleman. It was on different ground that important changes in the constitution ought not to be made without popular sanction, that Mr. Disraeli justified the dissolution of Parliament on the question of the Separation of Church and

State in Ireland. I have in my hand an extract from a speech of Mr. Disraeli on that occasion, maintaining that Parliament had not a right to deal with this question without an appeal to the country, because, he said, you might change the whole constitution or the whole basis of society without an appeal to the people at all. These are his words:

"This is one of the gravest questions which can be brought before the consideration of public men. You are public men; you are men all of great intelligence and many of you of eminence. You make a Senate that the world speaks of with pride, while it recognizes your attributes with consciousness that your conduct elevates the general character of human nature. But remember that you are something more than Senators. You are representatives of a nation, and of an ancient nation, and I deny your moral competence to come to a decision such as that which the hon. member for Birmingham has recommended, and such as the right hon. gentleman, the member for South Lancashire, is prepared practically to carry out—I deny your moral competence to do that without an appeal to the nation. I say it is a question upon which the country can alone decide, particularly under the circumstances at which we have now arrived. You cannot come on a sudden, and without the country being the least informed of your intention, to a decision that will alter the character of England and her institutions."

That was a declaration in reference to radical changes in the constitution, in reference to altering the constitution which had stood for centuries, and in regard to an appeal for obtaining the sanction of the nation to a change of very grave and great importance. There was nothing of that sort here. There was no great proposition submitted by one party and opposed by another, which the hon. gentleman was not able to carry through the House of Commons, and upon which he thought it necessary to take the opinion of the country. And so there is not in the whole history of England, in the whole history of parliamentary government in England, a single precedent for the course which the hon. gentleman has taken. Why, if any one will look at Professor Hearne's book on the English system of Government, he will find there a chapter on the means provided under the English constitution for harmonizing the different powers of the State. Now, he deals with this subject of dissolution in that chapter, and he makes the exercise of the power of dissolution subservient to one purpose, that is, the purpose of bringing the House of Commons into harmony with the advisers of the Crown, or with the Crown itself, or with the House of Lords where that body has rejected an important measure; and when a difference has arisen we can see a rational reason for the exercise of that power. But what reason was there for a dissolution here? Why, Sir, simply the reasons assigned by my hon. friend to my left—the Government saw that the current of public opinion was setting in against the policy which they had advocated, and they thought to anticipate it and obtain a verdict from the country before opinion was formed irretrievably against them. The hon. the Minister of Finance has referred to negotiations that he stated were begun in November. Why, Sir, we remember a visit of the hon. gentleman in November to Halifax. We remember the hon. Minister of Justice was feeling his way in the Province of Nova Scotia, and when the Minister of Finance visited the Province of New Brunswick, many of us anticipated a violation of the constitution by a dissolution of Parliament. The Government were feeling their way. The documents to which the hon. gentleman referred, and which I have no doubt, as he says they existed, did exist, were documents prepared with a view to dissolution, as an excuse or pretext for dissolution. The dissolution was not for the purpose of seeing whether the people approved what the documents contained, but they were prepared to assist the Government in successfully appealing to the country, if it was thought safe to make the appeal at all. The Government seem to have changed their minds, to have given up the idea of dissolution. Their intention was to call Parliament together again, but many things had transpired to further alarm them, and instead of calling Parliament together they reverted to the original proposition and issued a new manifesto, which the hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has read here to-night, and appealed to the country. All the time they were hesitating between the question of the National Policy and the question of reciprocity—whether they should support reciprocity or whether they should support the National Policy. They were not very sure. The right hon. gentleman asked that the old flag, and the old policy, and the old gentleman himself, should be supported. Now we understand all that. That was not reciprocity, that was the National Policy, it was the adherence to the old policy: that was the appeal made. But when the hon. gentleman and his friends came amongst the electors, they found that that was a very unsafe ground upon which to stand, and so they issued a new proposition and reciprocity was added. The hon. gentleman's policy reminds me of the cartoons that appeared years ago in Punch. I think it was in 1851 or 1852, in which Disraeli was represented as a chameleon upon whom free trade and protection were written, but written so intermixed that it was impossible to tell whether it spelled free trade or whether it spelled protection. And so it became impossible in many constituencies to say whether the right hon. gentleman and his friends were in favour of reciprocity or whether they were in favour of the National Policy. That they could not favour both, everybody can understand. The hon. gentleman says that he is in favour of free trade in coal. Why, I learn in the west that he has also made a proposition in favour of free trade in petroleum.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not yet.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is one of the things that is to come.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will see.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, we shall no doubt see precisely what the policy of the Government will be. An hon. friend near me says the country will have no opportunity of passing upon the policy. The Government do not intend that they should. We do not know, the Government do not know, what their policy will be. They tell us now they will know some time after the 12th October, and so when we meet here again, if the Government survive until that time, then we on this side, and the hon. gentlemen on that side who support the Administration, will be able to tell what the policy of the Administration upon the industrial and fiscal affairs of this country will really be. At present no one knows. Ministers cannot say; yet we are told the country has given a verdict in favour of this unknown thing. Now, the hon. gentleman has said that he is in favour of a measure of reciprocity. He is in favour of free trade in natural products, and, perhaps, plus X. He thinks that will not endanger British connection, but he thinks if we have free trade in manufactured articles, it would endanger British connection, it would interfere with our political relations with our neighbours to the south and with the mother country. Why, then, was the mission to Washington undertaken? The hon. gentleman says that you may raise a horse and sell him to an American, you may send him across the border, and the institutions of this country, as British institutions, will not be impaired: but if you manufacture a harness and put it on that horse and send the horse and harness together across the border, without either being taxed, there is danger of the constitution being pulled down. You may send a hide across the border and no political injury will follow, but if you convert that hide into leather and send it across the border irreparable mischief will be the consequence. You may send wool and no harm is done, but if it is spun and manufactured into cloth and sent across the border, what?—it will wear down the constitution. That is the argument that the hon. gentleman, with a good deal of vehemence, addressed to the electors of this country, and he seriously asks this House to accept it as conclusive on this question of our political relations with our neighbours. Sir, I do not hold the right hon. gentleman's views. I have greater faith in the common sense of the people of this country. I say that from the course the Government have pursued during the last twelve years, property has greatly depreciated in value, the income of the population has largely diminished, the people have become discontented, and, in my opinion, poverty and discontent are more powerful contributors towards revolutionary changes than are any of those important fiscal changes which we have spoken of from this side of the House. The hon. gentleman knows that one-fifth of the population of this country has crossed the boundary line, and so far as they are concerned, annexation is an accomplished fact. They have not taken the territory, but they have taken what is more valuable than territory, they have taken the brains, and the muscle, and the sinew, and the energies which would serve to build up and contribute to the greatness of this country; they have taken them abroad and made them a part and parcel of a neighbouring nation. The hon. gentleman should also bear in mind another thing that flows from what has taken place: he should bear in mind that when you have one-fifth of those born in Canada on the American side who have become citizens of the United States, you have done a great deal towards making the two peoples one people: you have associated them in personal interest, as they are associated in personal affection and in all those feelings that relationship creates. It is of all the more consequence, and the impression is growing stronger in this country that it is of great consequence, that we should become commercially, as far as possible, one people, as we have become one in blood, and in kin, and in domestic association. Then there is another thing that should be borne in mind: that while commercial relations, extended as they would be under a system of free trade, would do a great deal towards the abolition of ill-feeling and national rivalry between this country and the United States, and would so far contribute towards union, they also, by increasing the prosperity of our people, would contribute to their contentment, and contentment is never a powerful instrument in the production of revolutionary changes. When the people are more contented revolutionary changes are more difficult. We are far less likely to alter our political relations if we become more prosperous in consequence of our more intimate relations with the United States, than we would by remaining in a condition of isolation and a condition of poverty. There is much force in the observation made some years ago by Prof. Goldwin Smith, that Canada was, to some extent, the ragged edge cut off from the American Republic. We are not a continuous country as is the United States; we are of very much less depth; the chances of our people east and west trading with one another are far less than are the chances of their trading with the people of the United States in their own immediate vicinity, if no impediment were placed in the way of trade. The assiduous attempts made during the past ten years to prevent trade between the two countries, so far from creating in this country a distinct nationality, have tended to create discontent and to favour those conditions which must contribute towards those political changes which the hon. gentleman thinks are not desirable. I believe our constitutional system, fairly carried out, is a more satisfactory system of government than theirs, but I should like a more satisfactory Administration than has been given during the past twelve years. I do not think the First Minister has made the best impression that could be made in favour of our political system; but if he wishes that system to be maintained, he should not desire to impose on the people a condition of perpetual inferiority, of poverty and isolation. The people will follow their material interests, and those who contribute to the creation of a state of prosperity for the people, will do most to bring about political contentment, and place an impediment in the way of great and radical changes. For these reasons, I am opposed to the policy which the First Minister has seen proper hitherto to pursue, and I think the proposition made by my hon. friend near me should be accepted as the easiest way out of the difficulty, and the one most conducive to the public interests. It may be one humiliating for the Government to adopt, but that is their fault, and their fault should not be made a public misfortune. It is of the first importance to this country, that we should have extensive trade relations with the neighbouring Republic, and we can only have them on the condition of granting free trade. I do not believe that the question of revenue is such a difficult one as the Minister of Finance endeavours to make it appear. I say this: that if he finds it impossible to promote the best interests of the country in this way, he must give place to those who can, for if hon. gentlemen on this side of the House cross to the Treasury benches, I can promise there will be no difficulty whatever in meeting the ordinary requirements of the country, and at the same time establishing unrestricted trade with the neighbouring Republic.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Laurier), whether it is the intention to divide the House on the motion?

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is aware that we have not moved an amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am quite aware of that.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.05 .m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 4th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. CHARLTON. A trifle over three months ago the country was startled by a proclamation dissolving the Sixth Parliament of Canada, we are here to-day in the First Session of the Seventh Parliament of Canada, and we are considering just now why we are called here in that capacity. The dissolution was a very sudden one, a contest was precipitated upon the country without a moment's warning; it was a very bitter contest, and we are now assembled here at about the date when we should have been dispersing for our various homes, engaging in a Session which promises to last during the last of the spring months and possibly—probably, indeed—during the three summer months, a time of the year very inconvenient to all the members assembled here; and unless there is some reason for the action the Government has taken, in prematurely dissolving the Sixth Parliament and calling the Seventh Parliament together at this unseasonable season of the year, it is natural, at least for the members of the Opposition, to entertain feeling towards the Government the reverse of complimentary or grateful. The reasons assigned by the Government for this dissolution, in my opinion, will hardly, upon investigation, prove satisfactory to the country.

On the third day of February the Government organ, the Toronto Empire, contained the following:—

"REASONS OF THE APPEAL.

"In view of the foregoing important statement,"—

That is, the statement of dissolution—

—"the question will naturally be asked: What are the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present time? It is understood that the Dominion Government have through Her Majesty's Government made certain proposals to the United States for negotiation looking to an extension of our commerce with that country. These proposals have been submitted to the President for his consideration, and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that if the negotiations are to result in a treaty which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient that the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House."

"A CANADIAN COMMISSION.

"It is understood that Canada will send a delegation to Washington after March 4, the date on which the life of the present Congress expires, for the purpose of discussing informally the question of the extension and development of the trade between the United States and Canada and the settlement of all questions of difference between the two countries. This delegation will visit the United States, it is said, as the result of a friendly suggestion from Washington."

And on the following day, in the same journal, we have additional reasons given for this step which the Government of Canada thought fit to take on the third day of February last.

"NATURE OF THE GOVERNMENT'S PROPOSALS—WHY THEY WERE MADE.

"In view of the importance of the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present moment, the Empire was privileged to publish a copy of the despatch from His Excellency the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, showing the nature of the Government's proposals to the United States, and indicating the earnest desire of the Administration for the development of trade between the United States and Canada. The despatch is as follows:—

"'GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
"'OTTAWA, 13th December, 1890.

"'MY LORD,—I have the honour to send to Your Lordship to-day a telegraphic message in cipher of which the following is the substance:—

"'With reference to my telegram of the 10th instant, this Government is desirous of proposing a joint commission, such as that of 1871, with authority to deal without limitation, and to prepare a treaty respecting the following subjects:—

"'1. Renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, with the modifications required by the altered circumstances of both countries, and with the extensions deemed by the commission to be in the interests of Canada and the United States.

"'2. Reconsideration of the treaty of 1888 with respect to the Atlantic fisheries, with the aim of securing the free admission into the United States markets of Canadian fishery products, in return for facilities to be granted to United States fishermen to buy bait and supplies and to transship cargoes in Canada, all such privileges to be mutual.

"'3. Protection of mackerel and other fisheries on the Atlantic Ocean and in inland waters: also

"'4. Relaxation of seaboard coasting laws of the two countries.

"'5. Relaxation of the coasting laws of the two countries on the inland waters dividing Canada from the United States.

"'6. Mutual salvage and saving of wrecked vessels.

"'7. Arrangements for settling boundary between Canada and Alaska.

"'The treaty would, of course, be ad referendum.'"

And then the Government organ at Toronto proceeded to show the nature of the proposed treaty, the proposed movement, and the reasons for undertaking it. It proceeded to draw a contrast between the arrangements the Government proposed to make, and the Brown draft treaty of 1874, and asserted that the purpose of the Government was to negotiate a treaty upon the lines of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, in natural products only; and concluded:

"An offer of this kind is as different as the poles asunder from the unrestricted arrangements which the Grits are advocating, as seemingly they are anxious to hand Canada over, body and bones, to the United States. The result of their policy, as well-known reformers like Mr. E. W. Thomson admit, would inevitably lead to direct taxation, which this country never would submit to. The Government's offer differs also from the one made by the Hon. George Brown in 1874, the proposals embracing, in addition to natural products, agricultural implements and thirty-seven branches of manufactures. It will, therefore, be seen that the position that the Government takes is entirely borne out by the speech made by Sir John Macdonald in Toronto last week, when he said that the Government would stand by the policy introduced by the Conservative party in 1878. It is believed, however, that it is possible for a fair reciprocal arrangement to be arrived at which might be conducive to, not subversive of, the interests of our manufacturers."

Now, Sir, subsequent events, I think, point clearly to the fact that the Government were not actuated, in the dissolution of this House in February last, by any such motives as they claim. I think, when we come to examine the facts, we will see that the dissolution of the last House, even in view of the initiation of reciprocity negotiations, was entirely unnecessary. The Government tell us that they intended to appoint a commission to proceed to Washington, and their organ makes a statement of the fact that Congress ceased to exist on 4th March last, and it wished to send a delegation to Washington for the purpose of an informal conference with the American authorities. Now, Sir, this dissolution took place one year in advance of the time that the life of this Parliament would expire, and more. The Government, on three successive occasions, has trampled upon the constitutional rights of this House in cutting short the life of Parliament. The last three Parliaments have aggregated a period of twelve years, when they should have aggregated a period of fifteen years, and the Government, on these three occasions, has allowed political expediency to override the constitutional privileges of the people. Its action upon the last occasion was peculiarly aggravated, for the reason that the constitution provides that at the end of every decennial census there shall be a redistribution of seats in this House, and if this House had been allowed to run its natural term of days the Government could have held a session last winter, they could have held a short session after the population returns were received from the census now being taken, they could have assembled the House and have made a redistribution of seats, and then dissolved the House, and still they would have been in ample time for the negotiations at Washington; because the term of the last Congress ceased on 4th March last, and the next session of Congress will meet on the first Monday of December next, and during all the coming summer and autumn the Government could have pursued its informal negotiations with the Government at Washington. The submission or ratification of a treaty could not be proceeded with, or even formal negotiations entered upon, before Congress assembles, for the President of the United States has not the power to appoint commissioners without the consent of Congress, and only after Congress met on the first Monday of December would the President be able to appoint commissioners to meet our commissioners, and after a treaty had been negotiated it would have to be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification, as well as to the Canadian Parliament, so that, months after the meeting of Congress, we would have had an opportunity of passing upon a treaty with a new Parliament elected according to the constitution, and after the expiration of the time of the old Parliament, which was cut short of its life by the action of the Government.

The reason, then, assigned by the Government for this dissolution is not the true reason. It is an insult to the intelligence of the country to tell the people that Parliament was dissolved in order to have a Parliament elected that could deal with reciprocal arrangements, in view of the fact that nothing could be formally done until after the meeting of Congress next December and the appointment of commissioners by the United States. Subsequent events strengthened this conclusion. The elections were held on 5th March. The House met here on 29th April. In the meantime commissioners had been sent to Washington. They did not proceed there exactly in an official character, at all events they were not received in an official capacity; they could not have been received in an official capacity. Of course, they might go there and talk over matters informally with Mr. Blaine, or with anyone they chose to talk with in Washington; but they could not act as formal plenipotentiaries, as commissioners charged with negotiating a treaty with the representatives of the United States. They were powerless to do so and had no such function. So this was merely a by-play, another act in this drama of sham for the purpose of convincing the country that the Government meant something when it dissolved Parliament; that it was for the purpose of appealing to the people on this question of reciprocity and laying the result of its negotiations before a Parliament that was not a moribund Parliament. No, Sir; the object of this dissolution was simply to forestall public opinion. We had in Canada a question of momentous importance under discussion. It was being considered by the people, the people were interested in the discussion, it was a matter of vast importance to the people. And if the Government of the day had had due care for the interests of the people, if it had desired to promote their interests and consult their will, it would have allowed full time to consider definitely and fully the important proposition before them. But the Government chose not to permit the people of Canada to examine into the arguments pro and con with respect to this policy that it was proposed to adopt to further the interests of the Dominion; on the contrary it proceeded to dissolve Parliament abruptly, and appealed to the people for the purpose of securing a snap judgment, and for the purpose, as I have said, of forestalling public opinion.

So now we are here to consider this question; we are here if possible to probe this matter to the bottom, to examine as to what the actual motives of the Government were, and to ask the Government what it intends to do in the premises. Those hon. gentlemen have pretended to be in favour of reciprocity and have gone to the country on the question. On this side of the House there are a certain number of gentlemen in favour of reciprocity, elected as favourable to reciprocity—reciprocity of the unrestricted character. On that side of the House there are a number of members elected on a sort of quasi-reciprocity platform. They adopted that platform, and they led their constituents to believe that the Government meant to obtain reciprocity, that the Government was honest in its desire to obtain reciprocity, and that if elected, the Government were as likely to obtain it as would be the Opposition if they were placed in power; and thus in this House there is a great majority of members elected either directly as supporters of reciprocity or as supporters of the Government and who yet favour reciprocity. I do not doubt that the Government is in favour of reciprocity of a certain kind. Those hon. gentlemen have been in favour of a kind of reciprocity for a great number of years: it is only fair to admit that such is the case. The question is: What kind of reciprocal treaty can the Government obtain? If the Government is only in favour of a certain kind of reciprocity, if it will stop short in the negotiations on the ground that beyond that point reciprocity will not be acceptable, then the question before the people is this: Is that kind of reciprocity which the Government will not accept of that character which they should agree to accept in the interests of the country rather than fail to secure any treaty whatever? The Government will find, in my opinion, that if they are ever successful in any negotiations, they will have to come to the position occupied by the Liberal party. They can get a treaty of reciprocity—we shall be glad to aid them in getting it—simply on the terms the Liberal party propose and on no other terms; and if they are not willing to accept the terms we have outlined, they may try to secure a treaty, but they will fail. There is no reason for believing that a treaty can be obtained on any other grounds than those set forth by the Liberal party.

Mr. BOWELL. Tell us what they are.

Mr. CHARLTON. It might not be complimentary, and I will not do so. I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are themselves agreed as to what they are willing to accept. The Secretary of State is more advanced in opinion than is the Minister of Customs, and no doubt there are different phases of opinion in the Cabinet, so that perhaps the Government is fishing just now for information. I am inclined to think they will know their opinion better after they receive returns to their circular sent to the manufacturing establishments all over the country, asking how far free trade with the United States would affect their particular lines of goods.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps you will say what you are.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will tell the hon. gentleman what we are before I get through, but he may not believe it. I assure the hon. gentleman and the hon. Minister of Finance that they will find on this side of the House an honest desire to aid in securing any kind of a treaty that will improve our commercial relations with the United States. We will be glad to aid the Minister of Finance. We will sink party and all considerations of party advantage to aid him in securing that which is best for the interests of the country; but we will ask the hon. gentleman to meet us in a like spirit, to forget party predilections and be governed by the same consideration we profess to be governed by, namely, that of advancing the best interests of the country. We ask him to secure a reciprocity treaty, and if he is unable to do so on his own ground, to make concessions and compromises, to go beyond that point where he considers he should stop, for the purpose of securing for this great country the almost inestimable privilege of free trade relations with the nation to the south of us.

This being the case, our disposition being to help forward this work, I think, perhaps, we had better look over the ground and take stock and see where we stand, see what can be done, deliberate in a friendly spirit what is best to be done, as to how far we can go, and as to the point where we must stop. The hon. Minister of Finance told us in his speech the other night, a very able speech made almost impromptu, an energetic speech in which the hon. gentleman brought out his points very well and made a good defence of his side of the case, that this Government has at all times been in favour of a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. There is not a sane man in Canada who would not have been in favour of a renewal of that treaty; but there is another party that is not in favour of its renewal. While we are in favour of it, the United States Government have been opposed to its provisions, and are now opposed to a renewal of it. So we cannot meet on common ground in regard to that treaty. When this Government declared to the country, time and again, that they favoured a renewal of the Treaty of 1854, they were simply deluding the people, for they knew that the United States would not grant them a renewal; and so we might just as well dismiss that part of the case, for there is no use talking about anything impracticable. We may be willing to take something we cannot get, but if we cannot get it it is folly for us to talk about it. The Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 was abrogated by the American Government in 1866 for reasons which they considered quite sufficient. During the twelve years that treaty was in operation we sold to the Americans $246,000,000, in round numbers, worth of free goods, and they sold to us $125,000,000, in round numbers, worth of free goods. In that list was included the raw cotton and the raw tobacco which we bought of them, and which we never dreamt of taxing. The Americans seeing this, said: "This treaty is not working advantageously to us; it is neither a reasonable nor a just treaty for us; it gives you the opportunity to sell to us everything you have to sell, but it deprives us of selling to you many articles which we desire to sell; we receive from you twice as many free goods as we sell to Canada." The Americans saw this and they consequently abrogated the Treaty of 1854. Now, Sir, have we reason to suppose that the American Government will accede to the proposal the Canadian Government intends to make, for reciprocity in natural products only? Let us for a moment look at the facts of the case. We sell to them such natural products as barley, horses, cattle, sheep, potatoes, hay, wool, pease, eggs, beans, lumber and a hundred other articles, not one of which they sell to us in return. This trade is, therefore, all in the one direction. They do not sell to us the kind of articles they buy from us, and consequently a treaty in natural products only, is not only not advantageous to the United States but it is, in their estimation, disadvantageous to them. The Americans ask that we shall have a truly reciprocal treaty and that they shall buy from us all the products of our labour, which are largely natural products, while we shall buy from them the products of their labour, including manufactured goods. They ask that we shall exchange the products of our labour for the products of their labour on just and equitable terms, and unless we make such a treaty as that we will never make one at all. When my hon. friend talks about reciprocity in natural products he is talking nonsense; he is deceiving the country, and although probably he is not deceiving himself, yet such talk is calculated and designed to deceive the people. We have before us very satisfactory evidence as to what the Government of the United States will consent to in this direction.

My hon. friend, in the course of his speech the other night, said: "Mr. Blaine said a little and left a great deal unsaid." Let us examine for a moment what Mr. Blaine did say on the subject, and although the letter which I am about to read has been quoted before, it will be necessary to read it again. Mr. Baker, a member of the House of Representatives from a district close upon the border, in which Rochester is situated, wrote as follows to Mr. Blaine on the 29th January, 1891, just three or four days before the dissolution of our House:

"MY DEAR MR. BLAINE,—It is reported in the newspapers of Canada and along the northern border of my State, where my constituents are deeply interested in the subject, that negotiations are going on between this country and Great Britain with a view to partial reciprocity with Canada, including natural products only and not manufactures, and it is stated that Sir Charles Tupper is on his way here as a commissioner to negotiate for such modifications of our tariff. I should be very glad if you would enable me to answer my constituents.

"Very truly yours,

(Signed) "CHAS. S. BAKER."

Mr. Blaine was kind enough to enable Mr. Baker to answer his constituents and wrote him upon the same day the following answer:—

"WASHINGTON, D. C., 29th Jan., 1891.

"DEAR MR. BAKER,—I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be assured no such scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion confined to natural products will be entertained by this Government. We know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper's coming to Washington.

"Very truly, &c.,

(Signed) "JAS. G. BLAINE."

My hon. friend stated that Mr. Blaine said a little, but he said enough to cover the ground. He told Mr. Baker that there were no negotiations whatever on foot between the two Governments—a statement which does not square very well with the assertions made by the Canadian Government that negotiations had been opened and that they wanted to get a new Parliament, as they did not wish to refer the legislation on these negotiations to what they called a moribund Parliament. Mr. Blaine distinctly states, in opposition to this assertion of the Canadian Government, that no such thing was the case, and he says further, that the Government of Washington will not entertain any proposition for reciprocity in natural products only. If the Canadian Government do not intend to go further than reciprocity in natural products, what is the use of their fooling the people; if they are not going further than such reciprocity they might as well keep their commissioners at home, for it is unnecessary to go to Washington on the 12th October next, and it is unnecessary to make a single move in the matter other than those they have already made. Then, Sir, when the news of the dissolution of this House reached Washington, we have the statement made of the position occupied by the other political party in the United States. The letter to Mr. Baker announces the position of the Republican party and the Government of the United States. In the action taken by the Hon. Mr. Carlisle, leader of the Democratic party in the Senate of the United States, we have a declaration of the policy of that party. For the purpose of understanding thoroughly the ground upon which we stand, I shall read to the House a resolution introduced into the United States Senate on the 29th day of December by Mr. Carlisle, and which is as follows:—

"Whereas there are existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Dominion of Canada, certain controversies with reference to their trade and commerce and concerning the interpretation of treaty stipulations; and, whereas, it is desirable that the most friendly relations should obtain between the people of the two countries, and that a more extended trade and commerce be established and promoted by such friendly legislation by both countries as will remove all causes of irritation and every obstacle to the healthful growth and development of such trade and commerce between them; now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that for the purpose of carrying out the spirit and intent embodied in the foregoing preamble the President of the United States be and is hereby authorized and directed to invite the Government of the Dominion of Canada to appoint three commissioners to meet a like number of commissioners to be appointed by him on behalf of the United States.

"Such joint commission shall consider all questions relating to the commercial relations of the two countries under existing treaties, concurrent legislation or otherwise, and agree upon and recommend to their respective Governments such legislation as will settle all differences and controversies between the two countries, and which will, in the judgment of said joint commission, best tend to promote the growth of trade and commerce between the United States and said Dominion of Canada."

This resolution, as I have said, was moved by Senator Carlisle upon the 29th day of December, and on the 4th day of February, when the news was received at Washington of the dissolution of the Canadian House of Commons and of the pretension of the Government of this country that they had in fact instituted negotiations for a treaty in natural products on the lines of the Treaty of 1854, Mr. Carlisle thought it proper and necessary to further define the position of the Democratic party upon this question. We see that Mr. Blaine had already defined the position of the Government on the 29th January, and on the 4th day of February, Mr. Carlisle, as leader of the Democratic party, defines the position of his party on the question by moving this amendment to his resolution:

"Such joint commission shall consider all questions affecting the commercial relations of the two countries under existing treaties and statutes, and agree upon and recommend to their respective Governments such reciprocal legislation as will settle all differences and controversies between the two countries, and in the judgment of said joint commission best tend to promote the speedy and permanent establishment of unrestricted commercial reciprocity between the United States and the said Dominion of Canada."

We have, therefore, the position of both political parties in the United States clearly defined. Mr. Blaine, for the Government of the United States, says he will entertain no proposition for reciprocity in natural products only, and the position of the Democratic party, which controls the incoming House, is defined in the amendment of Mr. Carlisle to his resolution which proposes to empower the President of the United States to appoint commissioners to treat with Canada for unrestricted commercial reciprocity only. In view of all these facts, Sir, it is sheer nonsense to talk about the negotiation of a treaty which shall be in conformity with the policy of the Government as it existed in 1878, which shall leave the National Policy untouched, which shall not permit the United States to import manufactured goods into this country free of duty in return for the privilege we ask of importing the natural products of Canada into the United States free of duty.

Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance tells us that last November a door was opened for negotiations. Well, I doubt whether it was the kind of door St. Paul refers to when he speaks of a great and effectual door being opened. I do not think it is a very effectual door. I would like to see what kind of door it is that has opened for the negotiation of a treaty with the United States on the line of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. The hon. gentleman did not tell us what that door was, and I think we shall have to look for it with a microscope. I do not believe there is any prospect or possibility of such a treaty. I do not think the Government have any assurance upon which they can base a hope of negotiating such a treaty with the United States.

The other night when the hon. Minister of Finance was speaking of the Order in Council of the 13th of December last which had been sent to Lord Knutsford, I asked him whether at the time Mr. Blaine wrote the letter of the 29th of January, that proposal had been received at Washington. I would like to ask that question now: Whether the proposals sent by this Government to the Colonial Secretary to be forwarded to Washington had at that time been received there? We will assume that they were not received at the time the Government dissolved this House, and that the Government were guilty of an act of gross deception on the people of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you take the responsibility of that assumption?

Mr. CHARLTON. I take the responsibility of saying I imagine that is the case, and I think I have reason for supposing it to be the case, from the silence of the Government when I asked them to assure me that that proposition was in the hands of the authorities at Washington at the time of the dissolution of this House. Well, the upshot of it all is that the Government decided to dissolve Parliament for purely party reasons of the most selfish character, and, having carried out their purpose, they next proceeded to exercise much ingenuity in finding plausible reasons for the course taken. It need hardly be said that they have not succeeded in finding good reasons up to the present day. We had this contest sprung upon us; and what kind of a contest was it? One of the Government's first acts was to call into requisition sneak thieves to steal correspondence, which they paraded before the country in their organs for party purposes. I think that was a kind of conduct beneath honourable men. Then we had charges of treason and disloyalty; we had a wholesale resort to calumny and detraction; we had a river of gall and malignity—all these things characterize this contest, which had been sprung on the country by this Government in order to stifle a fair expression of popular opinion on questions of paramount importance—in order to snatch a verdict before the people, after an investigation of these matters, would have been prepared to give an intelligent verdict upon them. Then, we had many personal charges. We had personal charges against my hon. friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He is said to have gone to Washington. Well, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance once went to Washington. The hon. Minister of Justice went to Washington. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance went to Washington. In the one case it is treason; what is it in the other case? I was charged with going to Washington, and I stand up to-day to admit that the charge was true. I went to Washington very much in the same capacity that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance went there. I went on official business, as Chairman of the Mining Commission of Ontario, to visit the Geological Survey Department and the Smithsonian Institute. We went further; we actually penetrated to the South, visiting Birmingham, Alabama, to examine a process in operation there for the reduction of phosphoric and sulphureous iron into steel; and we also visited Cleveland, Pittsburg and other places. We were very disloyal, if travelling about that country is a disloyal act. On another occasion since then, when I went to New York on business, having a few days' leisure I visited Washington to renew old acquaintance, to see the capital of a great country, to witness mighty interests contending for the mastery, and to feel the pulse beat of a great nation of 65,000,000; there is something inspiring in it. Now, I did not imagine that it was treason to go there. I do not think much of that feeling that considers it a crime for Canadians to make the acquaintance of American statesmen or to talk over with them the mutual relations of the two countries. I was treated in Washington as a member of any foreign legislature, Canadian or otherwise, would have been treated—with the greatest courtesy. I would like to see more members of this House visit Washington. I would like to see American congressmen come here; I would like to see the people of the two countries make the acquaintance of each other. I do not think any evil results would happen from the better acquaintance of the members of this House with the members of the United States Congress.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries asserted at St. John that I had modelled and passed the McKinley Bill. Well, it is rather a large amount of power to ascribe to one man; but I can assure the hon. gentleman that I have not the influence in the United States that would enable me to control their legislation. I presume he made that statement as an election story; but if he meant anything serious by it, this is the occasion on which to repudiate it.

On Friday afternoon we had the pleasure of hearing the old chieftain, the leader who went to the country with the old flag, the old policy and the old voters' list; and he was called to account by my hon. friend at my right for certain injudicious language which he had used at Halifax, and which had had a very irritating effect in the United States; and to my great regret, and I believe to the regret of everyone in this House who desires to see the establishment of friendly relations between these two countries, he refused to retract that language, and I fear he actually put his foot in it deeper. Now, in view of the fact that public men of Canada have been branded as disloyal and traitors because they have visited the capital of the United States, such language as that held by the First Minister of the Crown, must have a very unfavourable influence upon the minds of the American people. The Americans will ask: "Well, what kind of a jaundiced, malignant, dyspeptic, jealous creature is the Canadian Tory, who would not permit a Canadian citizen to visit the United States without charging him with treason?" Such language as that used by the hon. First Minister in his Halifax speech, in which he characterized the American people as a fierce democracy, was not flattering to that people; and worse than that, it was not just. The Americans are a peaceable people; they are not a very fierce democracy. That fact was well shown on the occasion of the rebellion in that country. A very bitter feeling existed in the United States towards England on account of the Alabama depredations, and the United States had, at the close of the rebellion, a million soldiers under arms and the most powerful navy in the world.

Mr. BOWELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, because just at that period the change was made from wooden vessels to ironclads, and the United States had then a very powerful navy; and both France and England were behind her in efficiency of their navies. At that juncture the United States had a million trained soldiers under arms and the most powerful navy in the world. The proposition was made that the Federal troops should attack Canada and thus punish England by seizing her greatest colonial possessions, but the proposition was not entertained by the better portion of the people, and utterly failed. Among other charges he made against the people of the United States, the right hon. gentleman, while he charged them with being a fierce democracy, made representations reflecting on the foreign portion of that population. Why, Sir, we have been spending in our Immigration Department large sums annually to secure the introduction of the very class of people whom the right hon. the First Minister talks of as being a menace to the institutions of the United States. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) shakes his head, but what is the character of the American nation? Since 1820, the United States have received over 14,500,000 immigrants, the great majority of whom are Scotch, German, Scandinavian, English and Irish. It is only during recent years that Hungarians and Italians have been added to the population in any considerable number. In addition to all these, there are in the United States, forming a part of the choicest portion of their population, 1,000,000 Canadians, the very best of our people, the enterprising, the young, and the vigorous. Of the foreign element of the population of the United States, eight out of ten belong to the desirable class; and when the right hon. the First Minister spoke of that population as he did, he insulted the English, the Irish, the Scotch, the German and the Canadian foreign residents of the United States. There are not in the United States, at the present moment, probably over 7,000,000 of these foreign-born immigrants out of the 65,000,000 inhabitants, or but a small proportion relatively of the entire population.

The First Minister then went on to fill the role of a political Jeremiah, and predicted that the United States would in the near future suffer from revolution. All republics, he said, in the past had been subjected to revolutions from time to time, and a like fate awaited the United States; and he felicitated himself on the fact that we, in Canada, would dwell in peace in the midst of all these revolutions and dissensions which would shatter, or at least imperil, the institutions of the United States. Now, the United States have passed through some trying difficulties. They passed through a fierce struggle when the two irreconcilable principles of slavery and freedom were brought face to face, and one or the other had to be overcome; but I do not see any reason why further revolutions or troubles should occur in the near future. The federal system is the most elastic system in existence, a system never tried by any nation before, and the best authorities believe that the practical results of its operation will be to give stability to the institutions of the great country governed by it. I do not know if we can felicitate ourselves here on being entirely removed from all danger of internal trouble. We have not had, it is true, a revolution yet, but we have the discordant elements likely to create trouble in the future. We have the North-West troubles, which are not yet ended; we have the infamous policy of a bad Government; we have the Gerrymander Act, the Franchise Act; we have the revising barristers practically controlling the elections of the country, and a Government with power to exercise, in connection with the elections, any kind of rascality they please. We have our Senate not representing the country at all; we have fraudulent returning officers; we have corruption. In fact, we have, in the political elements of Canada, the materials for an explosion; and I do not think it is wise to felicitate ourselves on our total exemption from all danger in the future and to indulge in offensive predictions with regard to our neighbours.

The hon. the Finance Minister took exception to the expression "vile monopolies," used by my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); but, when my hon. friend spoke of vile monopolies, he did not refer to the individuals belonging to monopolies, but to the system—that system which has been built and fostered by the tariff of this country. The system is a vile one, and it is a fortunate thing that the life of that system is drawing to a close, and that the National Policy cannot be maintained very much longer in Canada. With regard to the attitude of our manufacturers, it need not be denied that they control this Government, and that the Government is, at this moment, endeavouring to ascertain whether the manufacturers will permit it to proceed further in negotiating for reciprocity than reciprocity in natural products. This need not be denied. The manufacturing association of this country practically controls this Government. It exercises a dangerous power, it entrenches itself behind its privileges, and now probably will dictate to the Government that the masses of this country are not to be permitted to enjoy the advantages which will result from free trade with the United States, because, forsooth, such advantages may diminish the profits of that small clique which fattens on the millions of this country. So, I repeat, the manufacturers control this Government, and my hon. friend, in speaking of their monopoly as a vile monopoly was quite within the mark. I have nothing against the manufacturer further than this, that I do not wish him to have exclusive privileges. I desire that he should succeed and prosper, but I do not want him to enjoy greater privileges than the farmer, the lumberman, the fisherman and the miner. Let each prosecute his industry, relying on his own economy, industry and foresight, and work out his way to prosperity without the aid of Government and without special privileges. I believe the people of this country will denounce this system, which makes all these great interests tributary to the manufacturing interest, when it is brought properly before them again.

With regard to the manufacturer there is one feature of the burdens imposed upon the people of this country in consequence of the policy conceived in the interest of that class, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. In the investigation made by the Hon. Robert J. Walker, the Hon. Wm. Burchard and the Hon. Wm. Springer, three high authorities in the United States, they gave, as the outcome of their inquiries, this result: that the incidental taxation in the United States—that is the increased cost of domestic goods in consequence of the increased duty as compared with the cost of these goods laid down if no duty existed—is fourteen as compared with five. That is for every five dollars of duty levied under the protective system, there are fourteen dollars of indirect taxation, in the shape of enhanced cost of the domestic product which the consumer has to pay; so that for every five dollars duty the Government collected, the consumer had to pay an extra fourteen dollars to the manufacturer. That has been shown by a very interesting table made up by Mr. Springer. He took twelve classes of goods, and showed that the importations in one year amounted to the sum of $433,173,000, the duty on which amounted to $194,464,000. The domestic manufacture of these goods in the United States amounted to $2,440,502,000; the hands employed numbered 1,327,000; the wages paid $463,606,000; and the increased cost of these goods, in consequence of protection, was $556,938,000; so that this incidental tax or the increased cost over the entire amount of wages paid in the production of these goods was $93,322,000. Now, if we take the production of domestic goods in Canada and attempt to arrive at a conclusion as to what the incidental tax is, we will find that the burdens placed upon the people of Canada by the customs duty is small as compared with that placed upon them by the enhanced cost or the incidental taxation. From the year 1881 to the year 1889-90 the customs taxation amounted to $213,510,000. If the American tables are to be relied upon we will find that an enormous amount has been contributed by the Canadian consumer in the shape of incidental taxes paid the manufacturer. We will suppose the amount, as compared with the customs duties paid, to be two to one instead of fourteen to five, and the result will be that we have had to pay during those years from 1881 to 1890, $213,510,000 in customs duties, and our incidental taxation has amounted to $427,000,000. We paid over $213,000,000 in duties, and over $427,000,000 in enhanced cost more than the goods could have been laid down for in Canada if the duties were abolished. That is to say, that there has been an average for a population of 4,500,000 of $47.44 per capita for customs duties, and for incidental duties of $94.89, or a total of $143.33, making an average of $14.24 per capita per annum. Is it any wonder that we have hard times? Is it any wonder that we have depression in this country? Is it any wonder that trusts and combines exercise great power upon this Government? I suppose they were brought up to the point when they were ready to contribute in the first place by my right hon. friend, who is said to have met a deputation of these gentlemen in the "Red Parlour," and he said he required some funds, but the amount asked for was rather large.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think that was in the year 1882. The manufacturers told him that his demands were unreasonable, and that they could not contribute so large a sum. The reply of Sir John was that the Government had fixed the duties to suit them and now they must respond. Why, gentlemen, said he, you remind me of a drove of hogs under the trees picking up apples: each hog desiring to have more than the other hog, and none of them having sense enough to look up and see the beneficent hand above that shakes the apples down to them; you contribute and I will shake the apples, but if you don't put up I will quit shaking down: and ever since these gentlemen have been agreed with the First Minister, and have put up upon demand, and the apples have been shaken down in great abundance.

In the course of the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I find that he has taken up certain stock objections to the policy of the Liberal party of Canada, and the first objection which he advances is to accuse my hon. friend on my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) of advocating a policy which would leave us under the control of the American Government in the arrangement of tariff, and double our rate of duties. The American customs duties are less per capita than our own, but the hon. gentleman's statement shows an entire misconception of our policy. It is not proposed that our tariff against foreign countries shall be regulated by the American Government. That is not the policy of the Liberal party. The policy of the Liberal party is the free admission of the products of the United States into Canada, and the free admission of the products of Canada into the United States, but we propose, while admitting all American products free, to impose such a tariff as we choose on the products of any other country. We propose to be our own master in that respect, and to retain our power to impose such duty as we may see fit on every importation from any other country. The argument of my hon. friend the Finance Minister is founded on a false assumption. Canada will not negotiate any treaty which puts our tariff under the control of any other power. That is his statement and in that he is perfectly correct. We do not propose to negotiate any such treaty. Even if we were to adopt commercial union, we would not negotiate any such treaty, because we would not enter into commercial union without having all the features of the scheme definitely settled. In that scheme we would decide what the common tariff should be, and, unless we could agree as to the features of that common tariff, and the mode of making changes, we would not enter into that arrangement and would not give to the United States the power to make a tariff for us. The duty upon every article would have to be consented to by the commissioners appointed by Canada before it became law, and, if it were not consented to, the negotiation would fall to the ground. So, even under a possible treaty of commercial union, it cannot be assumed that Canada would allow any other country to make her tariff.

Then the hon. gentleman says it has never been shown where the revenue would come from if we adopted unrestricted reciprocity. One thing is certain, that a salutary degree of economy would be imperatively necessary, and it is certain that that would be a benefit to this country whenever it was adopted. It might be as well to devote a few moments to the consideration of the statement that the revenue cannot be provided if we were to adopt unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Our expenditure is upon a ridiculously extravagant scale for a country of our population. The United States in 1840, when it had a population of 17,000,000, had an expenditure of $24,000,000. In 1850, when it had a population of 23,000,000, its expenditure was $41,000,000. Our expenditure, with about 5,000,000 inhabitants in 1890, less than a quarter of theirs in 1850, was $36,000,000. If we adopt unrestricted reciprocity, the first thing we have to face is the loss of revenue on goods imported from the United States. Taking the returns of last year, the duties on American imports amounted to $8,220,000. Can that deficiency be made up by provisions made in other directions, by the exercise of proper economy and by a diminution of our expenditure? To meet that loss of revenue, we have last year a surplus of $3,885,000. In other words, we extracted from the pockets of the tax-payers of Canada that amount more than we required to pay our expenses, so we have that amount to apply to the loss of $8,220,000. Then, if we scan the controllable expenditure we find that, under the Administration of my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), the controllable expenditure was actually reduced by over $1,700,000 during his Administration. That can be done again, and more than that can be done if we have as honest and economical a man as the hon. member for East York controlling our affairs. In 1874, the cost of Civil Government was $883,000; in 1878, it was $60,000 less, or $823,000; last year, it was $1,308,000. If we adopted the plan of making our civil service employés do a day's work for a day's pay in the same way as the farmer and the artizan and the merchant have to do, that expense could be reduced by $300,000. Then there is an expenditure for the supervision of fisheries. In 1875, it was $108,000; in 1878, $82,000; and in 1890, $328,000. For the militia, there was an expenditure in 1873-74 of $1,122,000; in 1878, $618,000; and in 1890-91, $1,287,000. Now, when we have reciprocity with the United States we shall have friendly relations; we shall have no need of a standing army to keep them in order: we can cut down our militia expenses largely, to the extent of at least $500,000. In respect to public works a very large reduction was made during the Mackenzie Administration—from $1,800,000 to $998,000; we can reduce that amount, which last year was $1,972,000, by the sum of $750,000. We can readjust the sugar duties, without having sugar cost the consumer any more, by adjusting the duties so that the money would go into the pockets of the Government instead of the maws of the refiners, and we can save a million and a quarter more on that article: we can save $150,000 in the cost of the excise. The Intercolonial Railway was run last year at a loss of $553,000, and the Prince Edward Island Railway was run at a loss of $105,000—we can make those roads pay their running expenses surely. Of the $2,358,000 capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway last year, we can fairly assume over half a million of that is chargeable to working expenses; we should save that amount, and we can, it is believed, save, by the economical management of these roads, $250,000 more. These items sum up $8,543,000, to meet the loss of revenue from the taking off of American duties to the amount of $8,222,000. Now, there might be —there probably would be—temporary derangements in case of a great fiscal change, such as unrestricted reciprocity would involve. We might have a temporary deficiency of revenue; we might be under the necessity of meeting a deficit for one or two years. We have known what that was before. Since 1884 we have had deficits to the amount of $8,840,000. We must remember that this policy is to confer great benefits upon the people of this country, is to give them free access to the American markets for all their natural products, is to permit them to import free from the United States, goods which now pay $8,200,000 of a duty. I say that this great advantage would be secured cheaply, if it was secured at the cost, for a year or two, of slight deficits. But, Sir, a great and rapid increase of prosperity would give greatly increased tax-paying resources to the people of this country, and any deficiencies that might occur would be only temporary, and the policy that increased the wealth, increased the population, increased the resources of Canada vastly more rapidly than they have been increased heretofore, would be a policy that would adjust the revenue difficulty very speedily indeed.

Then, Sir, the Minister of Finance tells us that unrestricted reciprocity, plus continental free trade, leads to annexation. Well, Sir, why does it do so? I see the hon. gentleman has enlarged upon that point a little. Has not the hon. gentleman conceded more in making that assertion than he would wish to acknowledge? Could a policy lead to annexation with the United States that did not make the people of this country desire still more intimate relations with them? If a policy did not result in great benefits to Canada, if it did not increase our population, our wealth and our resources, how would it lead to annexation with the United States? When my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, asserts that unrestricted reciprocity will lead to annexation, he concedes the principle that unrestricted reciprocity will confer great benefits upon Canada, so great as to enamour Canadians of American institutions, so that they would desire to enjoy more of them. Now, I do not know but what my hon. friend may have been looking over the annexation question. He may, perhaps, have had his mind impressed with some of the arguments used by annexationists; he may have looked into the future and imagined that the benefits that Canada would derive from the breaking down of the barriers between the two countries, from the cessation of all danger of collision, or tariff war, from the necessity of maintaining armies and armaments no longer existing because the continent was under one flag—he might have looked forward and imagined that these were reasons that would induce this country to desire annexation. But I cannot see why reciprocity with the United States should have the influence upon the sentiments of this country that the hon. gentleman imagines. I do not see anything in the experience of this country from 1854 to 1866 to warrant such a conclusion. We had an annexation party in Canada in 1849, and, as my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, the leader of this Government has shown his approval of that sentiment by taking care never to have a Cabinet without having one or more signers of that manifesto in his Cabinet. We had, I say, an annexation party in 1849, but did reciprocity, which began in 1854, encourage that sentiment and make annexationists more numerous? On the contrary, we lost sight of annexation sentiments entirely. When we got the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, the annexation party ceased to exist and never gave evidence of life during the continuance of that treaty; and so I believe it would be now. I believe that the reason why the people of Canada desire annexation is simply because they desire to have the advantage of free access to the American markets. Can we suppose that the average Canadian is enamoured of American institutions, that he considers their laws better than ours, their school system better than ours, their form of government better than ours? No, Sir; none of these things. These points do not enter into the thoughts of the annexationist. He is merely an annexationist because he wishes free access to the American market, wishes to see the barriers broken down that separate the two countries. Give him that free access, and what inducement is there for him to continue to be an annexationist? He has got all he wants. There are no reasons for supposing that the adoption of this policy would lead to annexation, and there is no warrant for saying that intimate commercial relations and distinct political autonomy are incompatible with each other. Why, Sir, the various members of the American Confederacy lived together on terms of commercial union from the organization of that Government down to 1860. But did commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, with intimate commercial relations, bind the two sections of the American people together? On the contrary, they were just as distinct in their sentiments, just as distinct in their views and aspirations when the rebellion broke out in 1861, as they were when the United States Constitution was framed in 1789. It had no influence, no effect in bringing these two sections of the United States together and making them one political autonomy although the commercial union of the two sections was perfect and complete for well-nigh seventy-five years. And so perhaps it would be with us. We may have intimate commercial relations with the United States, but they need not tend to break down our political autonomy, or our desire to maintain the political autonomy of the provinces of this Dominion. At all events, Sir, we do not need to drag in the question of annexation; what we want is greater commercial freedom—unimpeded access to the markets of our own continent—peace, good-will and friendly relations with our brethren to the south of us, and a marked and desirable improvement in our own condition. The political union question is probably not a practical question of our generation. We do not need to trouble our minds about it, and we may safely leave it to take care of itself and give our attention to the question of great, immediate and practical importance—the question of free access to our national markets,

Then, Sir, another objection that is raised is that unrestricted reciprocity will ruin our manufacturers. Well, I suppose that when the hon. gentleman gets all the circulars that have been addressed to the manufacturers, he will know better what they think about that. I have conversed with many manufacturers and I do not believe it will have any such result; but even if it did, are the great masses of the people of this country to submit to exactions, to submit to undue taxation, to submit to the loss of their natural market, because the giving to the great producing classes of this country greater prosperity may prove a little detrimental to the small manufacturing classes? We might say the manufacturers are ruining us, but whether our policy would be calculated to promote their interests or not—and I believe it will promote their interests in the main—but whether it did so or not, still I am in favour of a policy that will benefit ninety-nine hundredths of the population of this country.

My hon. friend the First Minister, in the course of his speech, made reference to a recent letter from the Hon. Edward Blake, and he quoted certain sentiments advanced by that hon. gentleman, who recently held a seat in this House, with very great approval. I wish to read to the First Minister something Mr. Blake said which is applicable to himself and to his party. He says in that letter:

"The Canadian Conservative policy has failed to accomplish the predictions of its promoters."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have heard it before.

Mr. CHARLTON. The House has not; and, if it has, the House shall hear it again. Their admiration for Mr. Blake, I am sure, will lead hon. gentlemen opposite to desire that his words with respect to themselves shall be given again. I am really afraid the hon. First Minister has not read that portion of Mr. Blake's letter to which I am about to call attention. Mr. Blake says:

"Its real tendency has been as foretold twelve years ago, towards disintegration and annexation, instead of consolidation and the maintenance of that British connection of which they claim to be the special guardians. It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration and a North-West empty still; with enormous additions to our public debt and yearly charge, an extravagant system of expenditure, and an unjust and expensive tariff; with restricted markets for our needs, whether to buy or to sell, and all the host of evils (greatly intensified by our special conditions) thence arising; with trade diverted from its natural into forced and therefore less profitable channels, and with unfriendly relations and frowning tariff walls, even more and more estranging us from the mighty English-speaking nation to the South, our neighbours and relations, with whom we ought to be, as it was promised we should be, living in generous amity and liberal intercourse. Worse, far worse. It has left us with lowered standards of public virtue and death-like apathy in public opinion; with racial, religious and provincial animosities rather inflamed than soothed; with a subservient Parliament, an autocratic executive, debauched constituencies and corrupted and corrupting classes; with lessened self-reliance and increased dependence on the public chest and on Legislative aids, and possesses withal by a boastful jingo spirit far enough removed from true manliness, loudly proclaiming unreal conditions and exaggerated sentiments, while actual facts and genuine opinions are suppressed. It has left us with our hands tied, our future compromised, and in such a plight that, whether we stand or move, we must run some risks which else we might have either declined or encountered with greater promise of success."

That is what the hon. gentleman for whom the First Minister has so much admiration says of himself and his Government. Let us hear what Mr. Blake says with respect to the policy which the Liberal party has been advocating during two or three years past, the policy on which the Liberal party went to the country and the policy which they are advocating at this moment:

"While that free market which the United Kingdom, on a just conception of its own interest, opens permanently with all the world is to us of very great value, and while every prudent effort should be made to enlarge our exports there and elsewhere beyond the seas, yet the results of all such efforts must be far below those to overflow from a free market throughout our own continent.

"The United States tariff will, (and indeed unless high sugar duties be reimposed, must) for a long time remain, like our own, decidedly protective; still there is a fair expectation, based on the last election there, that sounder economic views than those of the sitting Congress will very soon prevail, and that their tariff will be readjusted on a basis much more moderate and favourable to the consumer than that which preceded the McKinley Bill; and eventually approach what is known as a revenue tariff, incidentally, though still substantially, protective.

"Having regard to this expectation, unrestricted free trade with the United States, secured for a long term of years, would (even though accompanied by higher duties against the rest of the world than I for one admire) give us in practice the great blessing of a measure of free trade, much larger than we now enjoy or can otherwise attain; it would greatly advance our most material interests, and help our natural, our largest, most substantial and most promising industries; it would create an influx of population and capital, and promote a rapid development of forces and materials now almost unused; in three words, it would give us men, money and markets.

"Thus it would emphatically be for the general and lasting good. And this, although it would produce, as all great changes do, temporary derangement of business and local losses, would strike hard some spindling and exotic industries, wholly tariff born, tariff bred and tariff fed, and would put upon their mettle a good many manufacturers unaccustomed to the keen breath of competition, and others who would be obliged to adopt the specialization, and the improved methods of production and distribution, which, to the signal advantage of the general consuming public, a large market allows and demands."

These, Mr. Speaker, are the sentiments of the Hon. Edward Blake—first, with respect to the Government of the day; second, with respect to the results likely to follow the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and from neither of these points dwelt upon by the late leader of the Opposition can members on the Government benches, in my opinion, draw any satisfaction.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did he not support your policy?

Mr. CHARLTON. You hear his words, and you can account for the matter yourself. The hon. gentleman has asked a question, and the hon. gentleman can answer it himself. It is not my business to say why Mr. Blake did not support the policy of our party; he certainly did not support the policy of the Government.

I notice in the North American Review for this month an article written by the High Commissioner for Canada, entitled "The Wiman Conspiracy." I am at a loss to understand how a movement entered upon and advocated publicly, both in the press and on the platform, how a policy that became the policy of a great party and commanded that degree of support in Canada which this policy did command, can be characterized as a conspiracy.

The High Commissioner evidently seeks to placate American opinion. He says, in effect, to the Americans: Have nothing to do with the naughty Grits; they have condemned the Government for their liberal conduct towards you on the fishery question; they have taken the Government to task on every occasion when they have made concessions to the United States; they are not your friends, we are your friends, give your confidence to the Conservatives and have nothing to do with the Grits. The article of the High Commissioner is calculated to produce very little result. I repeat that the charge that unrestricted reciprocity is a conspiracy movement is essentially false. It has not a single character of a conspiracy. It was discussed year after year, it was deliberately adopted by the Liberal party as the platform upon which the party should appeal to the people of Canada. It is the policy on which the Liberal party stands to-day; it is the policy upon which the Liberal party will yet achieve victory. It is not a conspiracy, but it is a general movement in the interests of the great mass of the people, with a view to secure better relations between all English-speaking peoples on this continent. The characterization of this movement as a conspiracy is sheer nonsense.

Then, we have in the same review an article from a late Governor General of the Dominion—the Marquis of Lorne; and the Marquis tells us that the result of the election proves that Canada desires to pursue her own path. Although a very humble individual, I take leave to differ with His Lordship the Marquis. I think the result of the last election in Canada proves the power of slander, the power of misrepresentation, the power of gerrymander, the power of the revising barrister, the power of the Printing Bureau in the hands of the Government, with the power to stuff the voters' lists, the power of the decision to give insufficient time for the consideration of a great public question. This is what the result of the last election contest proves; all these things were factors to produce the result in that election.

Mr. IVES. The power of greenbacks.

Mr. CHARLTON. If any man insinuates that we have had any aid from Texas cattle ranches, or from Montana cattle ranches, or from American railways, or from any other influences in the United States, he asserts that which is false; but we were confronted by a Government which controls a great railway which ran special trains to carry its voters to the polls, and which threw the whole weight of its influence in favour of the Government. We were confronted with a Government which commands vast corruption funds through agencies it would not be fit for me to speak of upon the floor of this House. We stood face to face with a political party which controlled these elections by influences, the reverse of what are fair, and honourable, and patriotic; while the Liberal party fought the battle upon its own resources, and with its own means, and to the best of its own ability. We may have had the sympathy of some people in the United States as men advocating a broad policy and liberal, but further than their sympathy we had no aid.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Canadian people in the United States sympathized with us; not the cattle ranchers in Texas.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, that is so. Now let me come back for one brief moment to the question of reciprocity. The First Minister and the Minister of Finance, and, so far as I have heard, every other Minister of the Government, express themselves in a spirit of undisguised and bitter hostility to the only form of reciprocity obtainable with the United States. I may do my hon. friend the Finance Minister an injustice, but I take it from his speech the other night that he still proposes to stigmatize the advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity as treason, and that he had not the slightest idea of accepting a treaty upon the basis of unrestricted reciprocity. Let me tell him that if he proceeds upon any other lines than those of unrestricted reciprocity he will, in my opinion, inevitably fail, and I shall regret, in the interest of this country, if the opinions expressed by the Minister of Finance represent the opinions upon which the Government propose to act. I shall regret if the Government refuse to modify in any degree the position which the Finance Minister states they occupy.

I will give the hon. gentleman the credit of having made an effort to provide us with a substitute for this great boon which the Liberal party of Canada seeks to obtain for this country. I do not know to what extent the hon. gentleman may have supposed that this substitute he sought to obtain would answer the purpose of an actual substitute for the American trade, but he did go last fall to the West Indies, and the result of his mission can hardly be called very brilliant. We find that the desire for reciprocity with the United States is so potent that Guiana and other dependencies of the Crown will have nothing to do with our proposal for reciprocity, as they wish to get admitted to the American market under the provisions of the McKinley Bill. I suppose this West Indian trade must be considered important; far more important than it would seem to be from any statistics which I have been able to obtain. I am rather surprised indeed at the slender amount of our business relations with these countries. The Minister of Finance is perhaps aware—although he might have been before he went on his mission to the West Indies—that the average mulatto or black of the West Indies is a being whose wants are few and easily supplied. I understand that about five yards of cotton is all the clothing he requires in a year, and that a quarter acre patch of bananas, which only requires renewing once in five years will support a family, while during the interval the darky can swing in his hammock. These individuals do not want our barley, they do not want our horses, or cattle, or sheep, or potatoes, or wool, or hides, or eggs, and they have no money to buy them if they did want them.

Mr. FOSTER. They eat cotton down there.

Mr. CHARLTON. They do not have a great deal of it to eat after having supplied themselves with five yards for clothing, if the returns for their labour are as small as represented. I thought I would look up the records to see how much the trade was with these countries, and what the probability was as to the capacity for developing that trade, and I find that last year we sent to the West Indies, including the British, Danish, French and Spanish Islands, and Hayti, agricultural exports to the value of $229,882 and to South America $27,452 worth. Our exports of agricultural products to all other countries, except to the United States, Great Britain and Newfoundland, amounted to $236,919. With the exceptions I have referred to the export of our agricultural products to all the rest of the world amounted to $494,193, while to the United States alone we sent $7,519,000 worth of agricultural products, or over fifteen-fold more than we sent to all the rest of the world excepting Great Britain and Newfoundland. I find that in animals and their products, we exported to all the West Indies $23,382 worth, to South America $843 worth, and to all other countries except the United States, Great Britain and Newfoundland, $260,920. This gives us a total export in animals and their products of $285,145 to all the world with the exceptions of the countries I have named, while we exported to the United States animals and their products to the value of $5,966,000, or twenty-one-fold as much as we sent to all the world with the exception of Great Britain and Newfoundland. Even in manufactured goods we exported to the United States $2,667,282, or nearly 47 per cent. of all the manufactured goods we exported to all the world. Our export of manufactures to the United States exceeded our export to all the world except Great Britain by the sum of $686,000. How are you going to provide a substitute for that trade? It cannot be done. Even with the restrictions existing at present, by which every effort is being made by the Governments of both countries to kill the trade between Canada and the United States stone dead, the United States furnishes us with a market which we cannot dispense with.

There is a great deal of talk about discriminating against England, but what troubles me is the danger of discriminating against ourselves. We have carefully avoided submitting to the imposition of taxes in this country for the benefit of England. We pay nothing except the salary of the Governor General, and we would not allow England to impose upon us tribute in any shape, either stamp duty, customs duty or income tax. We would not pay a dollar of such taxation. We would revolt before we would submit to give England power to tax us in any way, and yet we talk about discriminating against England. We talk about depriving ourselves of advantageous markets, we talk about adopting a policy which injures ourselves, injures our growth and our prosperity. We talk about doing this because it is going to injure somebody else. We are charged with the duty of taking care of Canadian interests: it is our duty to promote the prosperity of Canada, and England can take care of herself. We must take care of ourselves, and if we can secure vast advantages by a trade treaty with the United States, it is our duty and our privilege to do so.

We have a political Jeremiah in the person of my hon. friend the First Minister, who gives us lugubrious predictions as to revolutions in the United States, and so forth, and we have a political Pharisee in the person of my hon. friend the Finance Minister. A great many years ago there was a man who thanked God he was not as other men were; and the hon. Finance Minister, the other night, in effect, took to himself great credit for not being as bad as these Grits. He said he would advise the gentlemen on this side of the House to cultivate some faith in Canada, some faith in things Canadian. Why, Sir, we have faith in Canada; we have faith in things Canadian. We desire to promote Canada's interest; we desire to make things Canadian present a better appearance to the world than they present to-day; and in the promotion of this desire we take the liberty to point out mistakes that have been made. Is there anything wrong in that? We take the liberty to condemn blunders that have been perpetrated. Is there anything wrong in that? We take the liberty to denounce the recklessness of this Government, in piling up our debt and raising the scale of our expenditure to such a point as to tie our hands and prevent the country expanding and developing as it should. We lament and denounce the bad government of this country; and in doing all these things we do what the interests of this country demand should be done by an honest and faithful Opposition. We do these things through loyalty to Canada, through a desire to have things Canadian brought into a more prosperous condition than they are to-day; and when my hon. friend stands up as the exponent of all that is true, and just, and honest, and advises us to have more regard for things Canadian, and more faith in Canada, we cast back the advice in his teeth, and we advise him and his colleagues to adopt a policy that will make things Canadian more prosperous, and conducive to the best interests of this country in every way. In pursuance of this desire to promote the interests of Canada, we think we have discovered, and we point the people of this country to a new road to prosperity. We may be mistaken; we do not claim infallibility; but we do claim that our motivesare good. Now, let us for a moment examine our ground, and if we are mistaken let it be shown; but if we have reason to believe that we are not mistaken, it is our duty to give the reasons.

In dealing with reciprocity, we are not dealing with a question which belongs purely and entirely to the realm of speculation and theory, but with a question of which we have practical knowledge. This country at one time had reciprocity, partial reciprocity, for twelve years, though not the full measure of benefit was derived from it that would be derived from unlimited reciprocity. We commenced the first year with exports from all the Provinces which constitute this Dominion amounting to $10,473,000; in the last year they had increased to $39,950,000, an increase of $29,027,000 in twelve years. Since the abrogation of that treaty twenty-four years have elapsed, and last year the exports from the same provinces of Canada to the United States amounted to $40,522,000, an increase over 1866 of only $572,000. While we had an average annual increase under reciprocity of $2,418,000, we had an average annual increase without reciprocity during the twenty-four years from 1866 to 1890 of only $23,800; or the increase of our exports under reciprocity were one hundred-fold greater than they have been since reciprocity has been denied to this country. You cannot get over that argument. If our exports had continued to increase in the same ratio that they did from 1854 to 1866, they would be to-day $98,000,000, instead of $40,000,000; and, under the new order of things which have been brought about by the McKinley Bill on the other side, and the policy of restriction adopted on this side, we are likely to find our exports to the United States falling below the limit of 1866; we are likely to have a smaller export of our productions to that great country of 65,000,000 inhabitants than we had in 1866, when it had only 35,000,000 inhabitants.

Now, let me ask the question: Would unrestricted reciprocity be desirable? I might combine that with the question: Would tariff lines between all the provinces of this Dominion be desirable? Would it be desirable to have a tariff line between Ontario and Quebec, another between Quebec and New Brunswick, another between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia? No man of common sense would say so; every man would say no. Well, if the United States, when they became a nation, had divided their country into groups of states and had established tariff lines between those groups, would the development of that country have been as great as it has been? Suppose the New England States, the Southern States and the Western States had all been formed into groups of states with tariff lines separating them, no man would suppose that that country would have attained the greatness it has. Well, I would ask what difference would there be in nature, in geography, in commerce, between tariff lines drawn between the various provinces of this Dominion and a tariff line between these provinces and the United States? What difference is there between a tariff line between Ontario and Quebec and one between Ontario and New York? This difference: that the tariff line between Ontario and New York is twenty times more disastrous than would such a line be between Ontario and Quebec, because the market of New York is twenty times more important to us than the market of Quebec. If we group the provinces of this Dominion, we shall find that the different groups show geographical and business affinities with groups of states. The natural market of the Maritime Provinces is with New England and the seaboard states, and any policy that deprives these countries of free intercourse with each other is disastrous to both. We find that Ontario and Quebec naturally belong commercially to the New England and the Middle States group, and any policy that prevents them freely trading with each other is disastrous to both. So Manitoba and the North-West Territories are naturally a part of the Mississippi Valley, and anything that impedes free intercourse between those sections is disastrous to both. British Columbia on the west and the States of the Pacific slope naturally constitute a geographical group, and any restriction in trade between those sections is disastrous to either section. Therefore I maintain, and the Liberal party maintain, that if free trade between forty-four commonwealths works well, it will work better if extended to fifty-one commonwealths; it will confer equal advantages on the seven provinces of Canada than it has conferred upon the forty-four States of the American Union. I might go on to expand this subject still further, but I forbear, because I have already consumed a great deal of time.

Now, what is the issue before the people of this country to-day? It is an issue between protection and dry-rot on a small scale on the one hand, and enlarged continental free trade between all the English-speaking commonwealths in America on the other hand. That is the issue, Sir, and I wish to impress, if I could do so, upon the mind of the hon. Minister of Finance the vast importance to Canada of obtaining free access to these great markets of 65,000,000 people, with 6,000,000 congregated in cities almost at our door, for the supply of which we possess advantages superior to those of the North-Western States. We are at the parting of the ways. I remember, Sir, reading of a certain custom which the Chinese have of trying to prevent the dragon from swallowing the moon, at the time of an eclipse, by beating gongs, shouting, and yelling; and our friends opposite have adopted the Chinese method in this question of reciprocity. Here we are standing at the roadway that leads to greater trade and prosperity, and the proposition to follow that road is met with a fusillade of yells and howls of disloyalty, veiled treason, annexation; and appeals to the prejudices and passions of the masses for the purpose of preventing the dragon from swallowing the people, for the purpose of preventing the people of this country from adopting that policy which is most conducive to their interests. Is it disloyal to seek for growth? Is it disloyal to labour for the prosperity of Canada? Is it disloyal to endeavour to obtain for Canada expansion? Is it disloyal to wish to confer upon the people of this country greater wealth, greater development for their resources, and to make them more powerful and wealthy? If these objects are disloyal, then the Liberal party is disloyal to a man. Is it loyal to sow the dragon teeth of discord? Is it loyal to plunder the millions for the benefit of the few? Is it loyal to lend the aid of the law to further the designs and purposes of monopolies? Is it loyal to deny the people of this country access to their best markets because that may interfere with the prosperity of a comparatively few individuals? Is it loyal to imperil the peace of England and America by senseless jingoism, and to blast the future of this young country? If it is, then, on that side of the House, sits the loyal party, for they are doing all these things, and they have every prospect of accomplishing them. Sir, we on this side are loyal to Canada. Why? Because we wish to promote the best interests of Canada, because we wish to bring back to Canada scores of thousands of her sons who have left her; because we wish to draw to Canada the better class of immigration of the Old World; because we wish to open the lock to Canada's treasures in her fields, her forests, her mines, her seas, because we wish to dot her prairies with farms and towns and cities. We are loyal to Canada because we wish to make of her the power she is capable of becoming. We are loyal to Canada because we wish to develop her resources, and we believe we are advocating the policy which will lead to that result. We assert fearlessly that we are loyal to Canada. Sir, we are loyal also to England. We wish to promote that policy of amity and goodwill which will bind the commonwealths belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race together. We wish to sweep away all those difficulties that threaten the peace of these two great nations; we wish to smooth away every cause of friction that threatens the peace of England and America from any cause originating in Canada. And if our policy can be adopted, if this Dominion and the great Republic to the south can be brought into more friendly relations, if these vexed questions can be settled and an era of unrestricted trade be inaugurated, the party which will accomplish that result is a party thoroughly loyal to England and to England's interests. And we are loyal to the whole English-speaking race, because whatever tends to make the relations between the Dominion and the United States more cordial and friendly, is a policy which will benefit every English commonwealth, either in the Eastern or the Western hemispheres. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the world to-day there are a hundred and ten million people who speak the English tongue; and that race has in its possession more than half the wealth of the civilized world. It has three-fifths of the world's commerce; it has three-fifths of the world's shipping; it manufactures three-fifths of the world's iron; it manufactures three-fifths of the world's steel; it manufactures 65 per cent. of the world's manufactures; and any policy which is calculated to sow dissension among any of the branches of this race is a policy every man should condemn. Dissension means disaster; union and friendship will confer peace and safety.

Europe bristles with armaments; her soil echoes with the measured tread of great armies; and sooner or later a contest will be precipitated more bloody than any of the wars of the past. The Anglo-Saxon commonwealths have interests in common, and any policy which binds together the various Anglo-Saxon countries of the world is a policy conceived in the best interests of civilization, and a policy that a great danger may at any moment force upon these commonwealths. The Liberal party of Canada has a mission, and that mission is to promote more cordial, more friendly relations between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family upon this continent; and that party believes and knows that unrestricted reciprocity is the talisman which will bring peace and amity upon this continent and prove a powerful factor in producing the same results among all the Anglo-Saxon commonwealths upon the face of the globe.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 2), to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is it the same Bill as that of last year?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, with some modifications. The Bill is substantially the same as that introduced last Session. It was then introduced at a late day, not with the intention of pressing it at the time, but that the members of the House and the country at large might become acquainted with the provisions of the Bill. Some modifications are made in the present Bill in the direction of greater freedom for the operation of railways. I do not think it necessary to enter into a discussion on the merits of the Bill until it is printed and in the hands of members.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, Chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The provisions of this Bill will be best understood by reading them. They are as follows:—

"Section eighty-four of the Dominion Elections Act, chapter eight of the Revised Statutes, is hereby amended by adding the following paragraph thereto immediately after the paragraph lettered (e):

"(f.) Every candidate who, either by himself or by his agent, at any time during an election, promises that the Government will make, or will be solicited by him to make, any grant of money for any railway, road, bridge, harbour, pier, public building, or other public work, to be expended within the bounds of, or for the benefit of, the constituency for which he is a candidate, such promise being calculated to influence the result of the election in his favour:

"2. Any promise of a grant of money, made by any Cabinet Minister or any official in the employ of the Government for any railway or public work or building within any constituency where an election contest is pending at the time of the making of such promise, and calculated to influence the result of such election in the interest of any candidate, is a corrupt practice within the meaning of the said Act.

"3. Any indirect or inferred promise, made by any Department of the Government sending engineers to make a survey for a railway or public work of any kind, not under contract, and for which a grant of public money has not previously been made, within any constituency where an election is pending, or within two months of the time of issuing the writs for an election in such constituency—the impression being thereby created that such railway or public work is to be proceeded with, and the result of the election being thereby influenced in the interest of any candidate—is a corrupt practice within the meaning of the said Act."

Mr. IVES. I would like to ask the hon. member, whether he provides for the case of a provincial Premier threatening to discontinue the construction of a railway unless a certain candidate were elected?

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) will be at liberty, at the proper time, to suggest any amendment to this Bill which he may desire.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend if he will add to his Bill a clause providing the same penalties against any candidate who says if he succeeds in his election, and if his party succeeds in coming into power, they will assist railways by subsidies?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no objection to make the Bill more stringent in its provisions. When the Bill comes under discussion, I will be most happy to receive the suggestion of the hon. the leader of the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has attached to his Bill certain penalties on account of promises, when they emanate from members of the Cabinet. Very high officials of the Government are employed to make these promises, and I would suggest that the names of these officials be included.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is provided for by the Bill.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would the provisions of this Bill refer to the High Commissioner? I think it would be very necessary to have a clause especially referring to that gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think you will need to have a special Act, pure and simple, for the benefit of the High Commissioner.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. EDGAR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. He said: Whether we decide to retain the present Dominion Franchise law or whether we decide to abandon it, as I hope we shall, I propose to test the feeling of the House upon introducing the principle of a franchise based upon "one man one vote." Of course, if Parliament decides to abandon the Dominion Franchise Act we shall, at least so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, have this principle in operation in that Province. I think the members of the Local Assembly in the Province of Ontario, on both sides, are very well satisfied, indeed, with the practical character of that system of voting. Not discussing it any further, I beg leave to move the first reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The Bill proposes to amend the Act in two particulars—first, as regards the oath of qualification. At present, as I construe the law, a person living in the United States can very well, though an American citizen, take the oath that he is a British subject by birth, and thus become a voter in this country. I propose, therefore, to amend the second paragraph of the oath of qualification in such a way as to require the voter to swear that, in addition to being a British subject, he is not a subject of any foreign power. The other particular in which the Bill proposes to amend the Act is, to my mind, very important. The instructions given to deputy returning officers in the 45th and 46th sections of the Act are clear enough; but the rules given in the schedule for the guidance of voters at elections, to which, I think, deputy returning officers pay more attention, are so confusing that I do not hesitate to say that any deputy returning officer who is not a lawyer or a law student might very well make the mistake, which many deputy returning officers made in the last election, of putting the number as well as his initials on the back of the ballot paper. The two sections which I have mentioned make it very plain that the deputy returning officer shall number the counterfoil and place his initials on the back of the ballot paper; but the instructions contained in form "M" of the first schedule state:

"The voter will then fold the ballot, so as to show a portion of the back only, with the number and the initials of the deputy returning officer."

I submit that any lawyer reading these words might make the mistake which many deputy returning officers made in the last election. I would ask the Government, on the second reading of this Bill, to refer it to a special committee, in order that anything else which may be found confusing in the Act may be done away with. We must not forget that the Act provides for a very large number of polling sub-divisions—I think thirty or forty would be the average in a constituency—thus necessitating a very large number of officials. It is impossible to get lawyers or people versed in the law to act as revising officers; we are compelled to ask farmers' sons, clerks and others to undertake that work; and I think both sides of the House will agree that it is our duty to make the provisions of the Act as clear as possible.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, in case a deputy returning officer fails to place his initials on the back of the ballot and the number on the counterfoil, his conduct should affect the seat of the member?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I should be glad to receive any suggestion from the hon. member when the Act comes to its second reading, because my only object is to make the Act as clear as possible.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ALIEN LABOUR ACT.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contracts or agreement to perform labour in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to amend the Militia Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to make it lawful for officers of the Militia of Canada to be appointed to the position of Officer Commanding Her Majesty's Forces in Canada—in other words, to remove the disqualification imposed upon them in the present Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPEAL OF ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to repeal Chapter 5 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled: An Act respecting the Electoral Franchise, and all amendments thereto. He said: This is not a Bill to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. That Act cannot be amended. It is vicious in principle, and it is bad in detail, and all the powers of this Parliament cannot amend it. I propose to deal more summarily and effectually with it: I propose to abolish it, lock, stock, and barrel.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to amend the Acts respecting the election of members of the House of Commons. He said: The Bill is not a very long one, and does not contain many clauses; but in my estimation it is an important Bill. The first clause goes back to the old system that we had before the Government, in my judgment with a high hand, assumed the responsibility of appointing returning officers. I go back to the English rule—I believe in English precedents and English rule—and make the sheriffs ex-officio returning officers in the various constituencies: and, where there are subdivisions of a county, the sheriff and registrar are returning officers ex-officio, and if there are more than two sub-divisions, then I give the Government power to appoint a person to act as returning officer. The second clause of the Bill deals largely with corrupt practices. Acts which do not now come under the law, I make corrupt practices by this Bill, and I punish every corrupt act by imprisonment or fine, or both, imprisonment to the extent of two years and a fine of $500. Then I endeavour to surround with every possible safeguard the ballot boxes while in the hands of deputy returning officers and returning officers; and I deal with a species of bribery largely prevalent during elections—that is betting as to how a man shall vote or that he shall not vote, or as to the majority in a parish or community, or the aggregate majority all over the Dominion—more effectually than it is now dealt with. I also deal not only with members of the Government, although they are the principal sinners, but with any private individual, who shall hold out, as an inducement for its support, to a constituency indebted or under obligations to the Government, that if it will support any particular candidate or party such indebtedness or obligation shall be discharged. I also make provision that no person, be he member of the Government or not, be he high functionary of the Government or other employee or other individual, shall use any influence with any public body or corporation in order to coerce that corporation into forcing their employees to vote for or against any candidate. I also make the bribee as well as the briber punishable by fine or imprisonment. I also make every violation of the election law by Government officials a misdemeanour punishable by fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for two years, at the discretion of the judge, and in the case of those who are not officials, by six months in jail or a fine of $500. I also endeavour to prevent a practice, which I am sorry to see prevails to some extent, namely, the swopping of election petitions. If a man files an election petition, he ought to be compelled to go on with it, as a good many petitions now filed are no doubt purely speculative: and I propose that no swopping of petitions be allowed except under the sanction of the court, which sanction must be based on the affidavit of every party to the petition, both solicitors and agents. And then, Sir, I hold out a little bit of comfort, a little balm of Gilead to the First Minister, the Finance Minister, the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of the Interior, and, I believe, another Minister who had the misfortune to have a petition against him for misconduct in the last election. Under the law, as it now stands, a man may be unseated for an isolated act of corruption. A candidate may endeavour to conduct his political campaign with clean hands. He may instruct his agents to conduct it with clean hands. He may do his level best to have a pure election: and yet some over-zealous friend may spend a dollar bill in corrupt practices, and the candidate will be unseated, and saddled with all the costs: or perhaps some secret enemy may do something that will constitute him an agent of the member elect, and commit an act of corruption which may cause the sitting member to be unseated. I adopt the English law, and, to some extent, the law of Ontario, by providing that, in the case of trifling and unimportant acts, although proved before the courts, unless the acts were of an extensive character affecting to some extent the whole constituency, the member shall not be unseated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the Bill retroactive?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No: but if the Minister of Finance desires it I am prepared to make it so. The next question I deal with is the question of the time for presenting petitions against sitting members. As the law now stands, a petition has to be presented within thirty days after the member is gazetted. Sometimes the gazetting is irregular. I do not blame the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, for I think he has done his duty in that respect; but I do blame the returning officers, wherever they, within thirty days, get their instructions, for the irregular manner in which the returns are made. I provide that every petition shall be presented within thirty days after the polling day. That will put members on both sides upon a footing of perfect equality, and surely the Government cannot want more than that. I also provide that any counter petition shall be presented within fifteen days after the presenting of the petition. These are the main features of my Bill, and I hope they will commend themselves to the approval of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHING VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) respecting fishing vessels of the United States of America. He said: It will be recollected that, in pursuance of the protocol annexed to the draft of the Treaty of Washington of 1888, legislation was enacted in this Parliament, under which American fishing vessels were permitted, during two years, the time proposed to be required for the consideration of that treaty, to obtain certain privileges in Canadian ports, granted them under the provisions of the Treaty of 1818. That Act having expired in 1889, Parliament, for special reasons, re-enacted last year the main provisions of the Act of 1888, and continued these privileges to the fishing vessels. In December that term expired, and, as mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, it has been deemed expedient and wise to re-enact those provisions for this year, and for this year only, in view particularly of the conference which has been arranged to take place at Washington for the discussion and consideration of matters and questions between this country and the United States. The Bill I ask leave to introduce is substantially the Bill of last year, known as an Act respecting fishing vessels of the United States.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. BOWELL. After consultation with hon. gentlemen opposite, we have come to the decision that the committee should remain as it is, with the addition of Mr. Beausoleil. I, therefore, move:

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time: to be composed of Messrs. Béchard, Beausoleil, Cameron (Iverness), Charlton, Davin, Desjardins (Hochelaga), Innes, LaRivière, Prior, Scriver, Skinner, Somerville, Taylor, Weldon, and White (Cardwell).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had requested that two names should be added from this side of the House. As far as I can see, the proportion now is an unreasonable one. There appear to be nine or ten hon. gentlemen from the other side of the House to five or six from this side.

Mr. BOWELL. The proportions are the same as they were last year. The objection made was to the substitution of a supporter of the Government for Mr. Ellis, and I understood that the addition of one name from the Opposition would be satisfactory. That is simply adding one from each side of the House, making the committee fifteen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the proportion is according to the proportion in the House, but, if the hon. gentleman came to such an arrangement with the leader of the Opposition, I shall not offer any objection to it, though I must say that I do not admit the correctness of the proportion at all.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not make the arrangement with the leader of the Opposition myself, but I was informed that the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) had made the arrangement.

Mr. SCRIVER. I spoke with the leader of the Opposition on this subject last evening, and he consented to the arrangement suggested.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I desire to ask if it is the intention of the Government to adjourn from to-morrow until next Monday? I believe it is the wish of a very large number of members on both sides of the House that that should be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Sundry representations have been made in favour of an adjournment from Wednesday night until Monday, on the ground that Thursday is a holiday, and that, in the present state of the business of the House, this being in the beginning of the session, there will be very little business on Friday, and that for those hon. gentlemen who can get away it would be an advantage, while there would be no substantial loss of time. That is the representation made to the Government. The Government are, of course, in the hands of the House, and will do whatever appears to be the wish of the majority in that regard.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I respectfully suggest to the Government that this adjournment should not take place. We have hardly been sitting here a week, and it is impossible, as experience has shown, that any progress of a marked character can be made with the public business during the first week of the session, but it is expected that during the second week we should make some progress. We have been called together at a late period of the year, at a period very inconvenient to a large majority of the House, and I suppose, irrespective of politics, there is no member of this House who does not desire to get through the business as quickly as proper attention to his parliamentary duties will permit. I, therefore, look upon this proposed adjournment for a week as being a prolongation of the session for that length of time. I have seen this same proposition made on other occasions with the same results.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Of course, hon. gentlemen who come from short distances desire to have the opportunity of returning to their homes. That is quite reasonable. But it is not reasonable that hon. gentlemen who come from a distance of 1,000 or 1,200 miles should be asked to consent to such an adjournment, and to kick their heels around here doing nothing. It means that, when the 1st July approaches, this session will be prolonged a week longer, to the infinite loss of so many members. There is no reason why we should adjourn over a week. I hope the Government will not agree to adopt this course. Not one of the Maritime Provinces members would be in favour of it, and I am confident that it will not promote, but will rather retard the progress of public business.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If an adjournment is made as proposed, I trust it will be until Tuesday, because it would be inconvenient for those who go away and cannot get here again on Monday morning if the adjournment were simply till Monday.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Monday.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Monday will, of course, suit those who live near here, but we from a distance cannot get back by Monday.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I venture to state, for the members from the Maritime Provinces supporting the Government, or the majority of them, that they are in favour of an adjournment until Monday.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the public business mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is not ready, we will lose nothing by the adjournment, for we will be doing nothing whether we are here or away; but if the Government are ready to go on with the public business, if the Minister of Finance can make his Budget statement, I think we should make the most of our time. However, the Government has the responsibility for an adjournment if it takes place. It is a prolongation of the session, and they must be held responsible for it.

Mr. CHARLTON. If an adjournment is to take place, it is to be regretted that the Government did not call Parliament together next week instead of last week. I agree with the expression of opinion of my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), that it appears to be unreasonable to members from a distance that this adjournment should be insisted upon, and I think it is selfish on the part of those who insist upon it, having regard to the interests of those who come from a distance. If the Government can meet the House with any business, we ought to go on and not adjourn.

Mr. TROW. There seems to be a general feeling on the part of members that the House should adjourn till Monday, for their own convenience. I am surprised that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), should remark that a week would be lost, because Thursday and Saturday being holidays, only one day could possibly be lost.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move, with the consent, of course, of the House, that when this House adjourns on Wednesday, it stands adjourned till Monday at 3 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, G.C.B., Minister of Railways and Canals, the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, K.C.M.G., Minister of Public Works, the Hon. John Costigan, Minister of Inland Revenue, and the Hon. George Eulas Foster, Minister of Finance, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 1st May, 1891.

TIMBER CUT ON INDIAN RESERVE No. 6.

Mr. BARRON asked, What quantity of timber or other wood has been returned to the Government of Canada as having been cut up to the present time from off Indian Reserve No. 6, of the Robinson Treaty, by the licensees or vendees of the Government of the timber thereon, since the sale thereof to Mr. Honoré Robillard? What amount of revenue or amount in dues has been paid to the Government, since the sale thereof, from the vendees or licensees, on account of timber or other woods cut thereon?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In answer to the first portion of the hon. member's question, I beg to say, that 474 cords of cord wood, 5,046,319 feet board measure, and 369,390 feet cubic measure, were cut, all of pine timber; the amount of revenue being $13,992.99 for ground rent, renewal fees and timber dues.

GAZETTING MEMBER OF BELLECHASSE ELECTION.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Why the receipt of the return to the writ of election for the County of Bellechasse was not gazetted until the 11th April? If the delay be due to the fact that the returning officer, Solyme Forgues, Esq., did not sooner transmit his return to the writ of election to him addressed, what reason does he give? In how many Dominion elections has the said Solyme Forgues already acted as returning officer?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The reason why the return of the writ of the election for the County of Bellechasse was not gazetted until the 11th day of April, was because the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery did not receive it until the 6th of that month. The reason offered by the returning officer for not declaring it sooner than he did who was the elected member for the county, was the absence of the required statement on the part of the deputy returning officer for polling division No. 10, giving the number of votes cast for each candidate, the production of which caused some delay. Solyme Forgues, who was the returning officer for the County of Bellechasse at the last election, was also returning officer for the county at the general elections in 1878, 1882 and 1887.

TIME WITHIN WHICH ELECTIONS MAY BE CONTROVERTED.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure to render uniform time within which elections may be controverted, and to deprive returning officers of the power of extending that time at pleasure by neglecting to make returns to the writs of election to them addressed?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is no such intention at present on the part of the Government.

VALIDITY OF PROVINCIAL ACTS.

Mr. WATSON asked, Has the Government, directly or indirectly, paid or agreed to pay any costs of expenses incurred in testing in the courts the constitutionality or validity of any Acts passed by any Legislative Assembly? If so, what Act or Acts are thus being contested? Is it the intention of the Government to bear the costs, or any portion thereof, or to be incurred, in obtaining a final judicial opinion as to the constitutionality of the Act of the Manitoba Legislature, passed in 1890, relating to Public Schools?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In answer to the first question—Yes. As the second portion seems to call for a statement of the Acts, the validity of which may be indirectly as well as directly affected by the contestations going forward, I give the hon. gentleman a list as follows:— "For Ontario—Statutes, 51 Victoria, chapter 5, 'An Act respecting the Executive Administration of the Laws of this Province.' Revised Statutes, 1887, Chapter 32, 'An Act to regulate the Fisheries of this Province and amendments. Chapter 124, 'An Act respecting Assignments and Preferences by Insolvent Persons.' For Quebec—52 Victoria, Chapter 12, 'An Act respecting the Executive Administration of the Laws of this Province.' Revised Statutes, 1374 to 1378, inclusive, relating to Fisheries in non-navigable rivers and lakes, and amendments. Articles 5952 to 5965, inclusive. NEWFOUNDLAND BAIT ACT.

Mr. KAULBACH asked, What measures have been taken to induce the Government of Newfoundland to suspend the operation of the Newfoundland Bait Act against our Canadian fishermen during the present fishing season, pending the answer of the Colonial Office through the delegation now in London?

Mr. TUPPER. I shall have to ask my hon. friend the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) not to press this question or the one standing next on the Order Paper in his name. The subject alluded to, which my hon. friend has constantly pressed on my attention on behalf of the fishermen of Nova Scotia, is a large one, and to answer the question on the paper satisfactory would require the preparation of a return. I may say to my hon. friend that I will accept these questions as notices of motions, or as motions for the papers, and returns will be prepared and laid on the Table as soon as possible.

CROSS POINT AND PASPEBIAC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. JONCAS asked, What is the name of the contractor entrusted with the carrying of the mail between Cross Point and Paspebiac, in the County of Bonaventure? What is the amount paid yearly to the said contractor? At what date does his contract terminate?

Mr. HAGGART. The name of the contractor entrusted with the carrying of the mails between Cross Point and Paspebiac, in the County of Bonaventure, is Mrs. Annie Searle. The amount paid yearly to the said contractor is $3,880. The contract terminates at the pleasure of the Postmaster General.

CROSS POINT AND GASPÉ BASIN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. JONCAS asked, What is the sum paid yearly by the Government for the carriage of the mails by land between Cross Point and Gaspé Basin? What is the total amount received from the several post offices between Cross Point and Gaspé, including the receipts from the said two offices?

Mr. HAGGART. The sum paid yearly by the Government for the carriage of the mails by land between Cross Point and Gaspé Basin is $8,880. The total amount received from the several post offices between Cross Point and Gaspé, including the receipts from the said two offices, is $6,695.70.

Mr. JONCAS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take the necessary steps, this year, to secure a better mail service between Cross Point, in the County of Bonaventure, and Gaspé Basin?

Mr. HAGGART. The Department is at present considering the advisability of making the change suggested.

AMERICAN CHEESE SHIPPED THROUGH CANADIAN PORTS.

Mr. MARSHALL asked, Have any steps been taken by the Government during last Session or since that time to prevent American cheese being shipped through or from Canadian ports, and branded as Canadian? If so, what are now the instructions to the proper authorities or preventive officers?

Mr. BOWELL. I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow this question to stand as a notice of motion, or I will accept it as a motion, and will bring down the papers. There is a good deal of correspondence, and the preparation of a return will be necessary in order to make the answer intelligible.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN MANITOBA.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, memorials and any other documents submitted to the Privy Council, in connection with the abolition of the official use of the French language in the Province of Manitoba by the Legislature of that Province; also copies of reports to, or Orders in Council thereon; also copies of the Act or Acts relating thereto.

He said: The constitution of the Province of Manitoba is somewhat similar to that of the Province of Quebec in regard to the use of the two languages, English and French. When the Manitoba Act was passed it was provided by section 23, as follows:

"Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the House of the Legislature, and both those languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person, or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under the British North America Act, 1867, or in or from all or any of the courts of the provinces. The Acts of the Legislature shall be printed and published in both those languages."

This is the constitution of Manitoba. The Act passed by this Parliament in 1870 was subsequently confirmed by an Imperial Act; so that neither the Province of Manitoba, through its Legislature, nor this Parliament, has the power to amend the constitution, unless authorized so to do by the Imperial Parliament. In spite of this clause of the constitution an Act has been passed by the Manitoba Legislature doing away with the official use of the French language in that province, and ever since the passing of that Act, the statutes, the records of the House, the official Gazette and all other official notices which hitherto had been printed in both languages, are not now printed in the French language. I am aware that petitions and memorials have been forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General in Council calling attention to these facts, and my intention in moving for the papers is to place the House in a position to know the true state of affairs with regard to this question. I do not propose at this stage to discuss the merits or non-merits of the action of the Local Legislature; but when the House is in possession of full knowledge of the question from the papers which will be brought down, hon. members will be better prepared to listen to any motion which may be made at a subsequent period.

Motion agreed to.

ABOLITION OF SEPARATE SCHOOLS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, memorials, briefs and factums, and of any other documents submitted to the Privy Council in connection with the abolition of Separate Schools in the Province of Manitoba by the Legislature of that Province; also copies of reports to, and Orders in Council thereon; also copies of any Act or Acts of said Legislature abolishing said Separate Schools or modifying in any way the system existing prior to 1890.

He said: The remarks I have made on the question of the dual language might apply as well to the question of the schools; but the House is more concerned, perhaps, in this than the other question, because, in reading the clauses of the Manitoba Act respecting education, I find the following as section 22:—

"In and for the Province the said Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the said following provision:

"(1.) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the Province at the Union.

"(2.) An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the Legislature of the Province or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

"(3.) In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council or any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authorities in that behalf, then, as in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section."

When Manitoba existed as a colony, before it had a Legislature, a system of separate schools was in existence, and when the Manitoba Act was passed it was contemplated that this system of separate schools should be continued in the new Province of Manitoba as it existed already in the older provinces. This clause was, therefore, inserted into the Constitutional Act, but I regret to say that with regard to this question of education, and its kindred question of the dual language, the Manitoba Legislature has ignored both the letter and spirit of the constitution, and since the passing of a new Act by the Legislature repealing the separate school law, proceedings have been taken in the court to test the constitutionality of this new Act. I shall not detain the House even with a synopsis of what has since taken place, or of the judgments which have been rendered by the courts, but in this motion I am asking for a copy of all the documents, memorials and briefs and factums of the courts, so that this House, when sooner or later it may be called upon to pass a remedial law as provided by the constitution, shall be in full possession of the facts of the case and shall be in a position to give a just and proper verdict on the question. This is a delicate question I admit, but it is one of these questions this House will have to deal with liberally and so as to protect the minority in the Province of Manitoba, whose rights I claim have been attacked and ignored by the legislation I have referred to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, whether the judgment of the court is to be included in his motion?

Mr. LARIVIÈRE. I understand that the factum of the court will cover that.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA SCHOOL ACT.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for:

Copy of all petitions presented to His Excellency with reference to the School Acts of Manitoba; and all memorials, reports, Orders in Council and correspondence in connection with the same.

He said: The motion which I propose making is somewhat the same as that which has just been moved by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière); still, it is of such importance that it may be well to offer as briefly as possible the reasons which induce me to present this motion. Considering the variety of views and the disparity of opinions held upon the subject of the Manitoba School Act, the severe denunciation it has received in certain quarters and the strong favour obtained in others, a suspicion might be entertained by hon. gentlemen that in introducing a subject so delicate it is our desire to create fresh difficulties for the Government. That is not the case; we are actuated solely by a sense of duty arising from a conviction that by the allowance of this measure an unjust and indefensible Act has virtually received the sanction and concurrence of the Dominion Government. We are prepared to wait for the correspondence, documents, memorials, reports and orders relating to this subject before introducing a direct and well-merited motion of censure—a motion, Sir, that will enable us to protest with all our strength against a violation of what we consider a sacred right, against a statute embodying the very first principle of oppression, and fraught with danger to the best interests of our commonwealth; against a blow to the constitution of our country—a blow which should have been resisted by those whose first and sworn duty it is to shield from injury that written and thoroughly understood compact by which we are governed. While upon this subject it may not be unwise either, to draw attention in a few words to the agitation which is going on; an agitation which, in our opinion, is full of danger and full of gravity, and may be followed by very serious consequences. Assuredly, Sir, we have not only had in the Province of Manitoba legislation of the most astounding nature, but even in the great, prosperous and enlightened Province of Ontario, men of no mean eminence in the political world have attempted to climb into power and place over the ruins of a system of education which proved thoroughly acceptable to the people of that Province. Fortunately, Sir, their design was frustrated: a great wrong was prevented; because the patriotic spirit of the people of Ontario refused to countenance the destruction of what it had taken years to build. However, Sir, the nature of recent events has excited a feeling of widespread alarm among a very great proportion of the population of the province from which I have the honour to come. I would be very proud indeed to-day, when I have the pleasure of addressing this House for the first time, were it possible for me to say to my co-religionists: "You are wrong when you suspect that there is ground for uneasiness; your rights and liberties shall be respected and maintained." But, Sir, in presence of the agitation now going on, in presence of the evident determination to wipe out the language of a large proportion of the population and to close up the separate schools, is it possible to give them this assurance? I am told that we have in the Cabinet gentlemen who will represent us and look after our schools and the interests of parents in the matter of education. Ah, Mr. Speaker, when I remember the manly stand taken a few years ago by the Cabinet representative of the nationality to which I belong, and compare that stand with the position he occupies in this matter, I am forced to exclaim, with the great Latin poet, quantum mutatus ab illo—how changed our champion! True, he was then a mere member of this House: to-day he is a member of the Government. Must the change in sentiment be accounted for by the change in position? Mr. Speaker, when we remember that upon more than one platform in the Province of Quebec, always, of course, in the exciting time of an election, the very eloquent Secretary of State and the very punctilious Minister of Public Works called Heaven to witness their devotion to the principles which had been attacked by this measure, and when we contrast their utterances and professions with their deeds, have we not reason to suspect that the mantle of office is capable of producing a very remarkable effect and tempting men, otherwise upright, from the usually beaten path? You are aware that during the last election not a little was said on the subject of annexation. Now, I believe the annexation was altogether on the opposite side of the House. For instance, take the hon. Minister of Customs whose views are pretty well known on the subject of which I am treating: have we not reason to believe that in a moment of fraternal effervescence he admitted to his embrace and succeeded in annexing the hon. Minister of Justice, the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Minister of Public Works? The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy), encouraged by this success, went a step further and actually captured our Minister of War. I would be the last man to hurt the feelings or wound the susceptibilities of any hon. member, the last man to bring up a subject which might possibly engender strife between man and man, between race and race, or between creed and creed. As much as any member of this House am I anxious that peace should prevail in our country, because as strongly as any member am I attached to this country, proud of its extent, proud of its resources, proud of its institutions, and proud of its form of government. There is no land under the face of the sun so dear to me, for in our eyes it is a land of beauty, virtue and valour—a land whose lakes and streams and forests, whose mineral and agricultural capabilities compare with those of any other country—a land which has in it every element of national greatness and every element of national strength, provided the element of national unity can be preserved. It has a history peculiarly characteristic of the chivalry of its race—a history which reflects the greatest possible credit upon the schools which have been attacked in Manitoba, and upon the church which fosters and protects those schools. Ah, Sir, the more we study that history, the more reason have we to feel proud of the wonderful and heroic achievements of those who first came into this country and planted on the shores of the St. Lawrence the emblem of christianity, and introduced here the great language of France, rendered immortal by the oratory of Bossuet and the poetry of Racine. To do away with the French tongue, you must wipe from the pages of history the names of Champlain, Montcalm, and many others: you will have to go further, and demolish the monuments which commemorate the deeds of many brave Frenchmen: you will, if you wish to succeed, have to go still further, and destroy the entire French Canadian race. You must not leave a man, because so long as there is in this country a French Canadian possessed of some heart and attached to the land which was discovered, opened and settled by his fathers, so long will his beautiful language be spoken, cherished and defended against all attacks. Step by step has our country risen from the condition of a small colony to a position of importance which cannot be over-estimated. It has a system of railways which we must all admire: its vessels reach the most distant ports: on more than one occasion has Canada proved to the world that the national heart is sound to the core: and when Canada's flag required it, Canada's sword slept not in a sluggish scabbard, but promptly responded to the call of duty. Yet, it cannot be stated that the picture is all brightness: far from it. We may be told that there is no ground for uneasiness. Let me draw the attention of this House to the pastoral recently issued by the archbishops and bishops of the ecclesiastical provinces of Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa, and addressed to the clergy, secular and regular, and all the faithful of these provinces, in which we find the following passages:—

"Consequently, it is with great surprise and profound grief we learn that, even here in our own country where religious liberty is loudly proclaimed, legalized attempts have been made to introduce that censurable and censured system of unsectarian schools, in order to deprive the church of a right which is inseparable from the free exercise of Catholic worship, guaranteed by the faith of the treaties. In another province of this land, inhabited by Catholics, they are trying once more an underhand and satanic persecution against the sacred rights of the Church. It was with emotion of heart we heard the Venerable Archbishop of St. Boniface raise his voice once more against this iniquity. In a pastoral letter, dated the 15th of last August, the illustrious prelate makes known this perfidious stratagem for perverting youth, forewarns his flock against it, and lets them see how odious it is.

"A trial of a novel kind has come upon us. In a land where freedom of religion is so loudly proclaimed, fetters have been placed on that liberty. Our social and political institutions warranted protection to all our rights, and now, behold the same rights trampled upon by the very persons who should safeguard them. Here you are exposed to persecution—not a bloody persecution which attacks the body or external life, but a persecution most cunningly masked, which attacks the intellect, hinders it from being enlightened by Christian light and guided by the reflections of its divine splendours."

Now, even since then we know that the attention of the Government has been drawn to this matter by the French press of the country, notably by the Courrier du Canada, the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works, which in more than one brilliant article sounded the note of alarm. The attention of the Government has also been called by La Minerve, La Presse, and many other French Conservative organs of importance to this question, but all in vain: and ever since the expiration of the time when disallowance might have been applied for, a stronger feeling of indignation has prevailed. I could give you, in a few words, an expression of that opinion, which is certainly strong:

"It seems evident that the Manitoba Acts will not be disallowed.

"It is a misfortune, and a greater misfortune than it is perhaps believed.

"Not only does the sanction of the injustice perpetrated by the odious Martin deprive our compatriots and co-religionists of the use of their language, and of the right to have their children educated in Catholic schools, but it violently shakes Confederation.

"The compact of 1867 cannot for a long time stand such shocks.

"French Canadians and Catholics, who have always been the most faithful observers and the most constant supporters of the British North America Act, will know henceforth how little the constitution protects their most sacred rights, since a fanatical majority may trample upon them with impunity.

"The results may not immediately be felt. The people's feelings are somewhat blunted presently. People undergo the reaction of the violent crisis which they have had to go through of late. The weak and undignified stand of their natural leaders has disconcerted and discouraged them."

That is pretty strong language, but it is taken from a Conservative organ. Strong though it be, it is none the less, I believe, a faithful presentation of the sentiments entertained by the great majority of the population of the Province of Quebec. I can speak with certainty and positive assurance of the feeling in the County of Ottawa which I have the honour to represent—one of the largest, perhaps the most populous divisions, and certainly the wealthiest and finest electoral division in the Dominion. I know the feeling of my own constituents, both Catholic and Protestant. They keenly deplore this agitation. They feel that a great wrong has been inflicted; and I promised them, I candidly confess, during the campaign, that I certainly would bring up this subject at the very first opportunity, and it is my determination to keep it before the House as long as the injustice is allowed to continue. To-day it is the turn of our brethren in Manitoba to suffer; to-morrow it may be ours. The declaration of war is made all along the line. Do you doubt it, Sir? I refer, not to the senseless language, senseless literature and senseless pamphlets with which this country has been inundated, nor to the idle threats made by hundreds of speakers from many hundreds of platforms in Ontario; but when we hear a man stating in a prominent Legislature like that of Ontario that the agitation for the abolition of those schools is not a thing of the past: when we know that Mr. McCleary stated, about a month ago, in that Legislature:

"It is not dead or dying, but it is as alive and vigorous to-day as ever it was, and it will live and grow until every school that exists in the Province of Ontario is owned and governed and controlled by the State and by the State only."

When, Mr. Speaker, we see the London Free Press, and especially the Toronto Empire, with which the right hon. the First Minister must be acquainted—and whose articles he, probably, occasionally reads before they are printed—proclaiming these ideas as excellent, and going into a veritable ecstacy over the gentleman who made the speech to which I refer, can we be expected to remain perfectly patient and cool? I said a moment ago that I did not intend to refer to the persistent warfare urged against us by a certain ill-guided press, that press which has said Confederation would have to be smashed into its original fragments and the battle of the Plains of Abraham would have to be fought over again. For our part, when such threats are made, we are not seriously disturbed unless immediate consequences follow; and we firmly believe that if ever the battle of the Plains of Abraham must be fought over again—which God forbid—our Ministers, who represent us especially, will be down there and will fight more valiantly on the Plains of Abraham than they did on the Plains of Manitoba. The source of the attack is rendered more serious because of its importance. We know that this policy of aggression is not confined to one Province. Last year much of the time of the House was taken up with a discussion regarding the suppresion of the official use of the French language in the North-West Territories. I had not the honour then to have a seat on the floor of this House, but was the proud possessor of one in the gallery, and I cannot charge my memory with all the incidents of this debate; but I know that owing to the very weak policy pursued on that occassion, the friends of one language have become so emboldened that they have introduced, and introduced successfully, a similar measure in the Province of Manitoba. The nature of that measure is so destructive and oppressive, and its consequences may prove so far-reaching, that I fear we have not seen the end of it. We certainly have not, if we may judge from the resolutions introduced into the Ontario Legislature a few nights ago, and which are as follows:—

"1. That legislation respecting denominational schools in Upper Canada was adopted by the Parliament of the late Provinces of Canada at a time when Upper and Lower Canada were joined in a legislative union.

"2. That this legislation was adopted by the Parliament of Canada against the wishes and opinion of a large majority of the representatives of Upper Canada in the Legislative Assembly.

"3. That by the passage of the British North America Act, 1867, the Imperial Parliament imposed on certain Provincial Legislatures restrictions in dealing with education.

"4. That in consequence of these restrictions the people of Ontario are not free to make such laws respecting education as they may from time to time deem necessary and prudent.

"5. That these restrictions are contrary to the principles of proper responsible government as conferred on the Dominion of Canada and on the several provinces composing it, and to the autonomous powers which were in other respects granted to the Provincial Legislatures.

"6. That the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec are the only provinces of the Dominion of Canada which are so restricted.

"7. That, in the opinion of this House, the interests of the country require such changes in the British North America Act of 1867 as will place education under the jurisdiction of the Ontario Legislature completely, as the various subjects assigned to provincial jurisdiction under section 91 of that Act.

"8. That an humble Address be presented by this House to Her Most Gracious Majesty embodying the foregoing resolutions and praying that she will be pleased to have them brought to the notice of the Houses of Parliament with a view of securing the changes desired."

I know perfectly well that I might be told that we enjoy in Quebec, where we are in the majority, the power of retaliation. As a Liberal, I protest against the idea of retaliating. As an Irish-Canadian, I cannot possibly sanction the idea that the rights of any people should be invaded. As a Catholic, I would condemn any proposals that might bear heavily and unjustly upon my Protestant fellow citizens, and, were those rights attacked, I would be the first to go into the fight to defend them. We do not anticipate retaliation in the Province of Quebec, and why? Because the people of the Province of Quebec are actuated by broad and generous sentiments. On more than one occasion they have given not only an idea of what justice they can deal out, but even what generosity can be offered by them. We remember that last Session an announcement was received in this House with sorrow, with anguish and with feelings of distress—the announcement of the conflagration which carried away Toronto's pride, that famous institution of learning where so many of Ontario's sons received the highest education in arts, in medicine and in law. The Legislature of the Province of Quebec, representing the people of that Province, then passed a most practical resolution of sympathy which took the form of a gift of $10,000. I know myself that, in the great Catholic University of Laval in Quebec, two Protestant gentlemen, Drs. Jackson and Sewell, occupied, I think up to the time of their death, the chairs of medicine, and that both gentlemen were members of the Council of this Catholic University. It is well to bring these facts to the notice of the country as well as to the notice of the House, because they constitute the best testimony to the generosity and liberality of an enlightened people. We can go further and show that, in the great city of Montreal, where the large majority is Catholic, and in the city of Quebec where the majority is also Catholic, the chief positions in the gift of the people—the mayoralty, for instance—have often been bestowed upon Protestant gentlemen. In the County of Ottawa, from which I come, the population being about 70,000, three-fourths of this large population being Catholic and principally French-Canadian, the same thing is evident. Take the city of Hull, whose population is 12,000—a city the most thoroughly Catholic and French in the Province of Quebec—and its mayor to-day is a Protestant gentleman, Mr. Mayor Eddy. The wardenship of the county has been also held by a Protestant gentleman for years. That Catholic and French county is represented in the Senate by a Protestant gentleman, it is represented in the Legislative Council of Quebec by a Protestant gentleman, and it was represented on the floor of this House for a great number of years by a Protestant gentleman. I am the first Catholic returned for that county to this Legislature, my justly popular predecessor, Mr. Alonzo Wright, having occupied the seat in Parliament for 29 years. What does this mean? We do not ask what are your religious views, but what is your political opinion, and the answer given to that question enables us to render our verdict. If the spirit of justice should be practiced in other portions of this Dominion in the same way, much of the agitation now existing would be dispelled, and we would have peace and prosperity in this country. It is time that the storm signal should be hoisted: it is time that the Canadian nation should be warned of the danger which threatens it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. It is very well for certain gentlemen to cry "hear, hear." Perhaps in a few moments they will not be in such a hurry to cry "hear, hear." It takes but a spark to start a flame which may easily be fanned into a huge conflagration, and it is only realized how great the danger is when it is too late. We may be warned of the approaching flood and heed it not, but, when the storm descends, when our property is destroyed and we have lost those who are dearest to us, then it is too late to stem the flood. But what are the calamities caused by the action of nature compared to those which are aroused by the letting loose of the passions of the people? We have only to go back about a century and we have before us the horrors of the French Revolution. We have only to cross to the south of our boundary to see the effect of the great civil war when brother's blood was shed by brother, when State fought against State, and when the existence of the great Republic was threatened. And there are those now sitting in this House who remember the days of 1837 and 1838—those sad days for Canada—when this country went through the agony of civil war. The heroes of those days sleep in their graves, but, though I may stand here on the floor of the House, I assert that they are not considered as the graves of traitors but as the graves of patriots. You cannot with impunity trample upon the proud spirit of a proud race. You cannot insult a people without receiving in return the insult you tender, and I am afraid that there are those who do not consider the effect of their speeches and of the appeals which they make to passion and prejudice. I believe that much of the agitation which has been aroused is due to the course of the hon. member for Simcoe. Had he the approval of his leader in the course he pursued? I know not. Did his chieftain encourage him? It is difficult to say. But what we do know is that, when he occupied a very prominent place in the Conservative party, when he was the leader of that party in Ontario, when he was the president of the Liberal-Conservative Association of Ontario in 1887, he spoke as follows in the town of Barrie:—

"And don't we find the French to-day in the Province of Quebec more French than they were when they were conquered by Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham? Do they mix with us, assimilate with us, intermarry with us; do they read our literature or learn our laws? No; everything with them is conducted on a French model, and, while we may admire members of that race as individuals, yet as members of the body politic, I say, they are the great danger to our confederacy."

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is pretty strong language. Yet it was the campaign document of 1887. We are reaping to-day the fruits of such ideas. The first shot was fired at us in the Jesuit storm, the second was distinctly heard in the last local campaign in Ontario, and now the firing is going on all around. The separate school must go, the French language must go. I think the great danger to Confederation lies, not in the French race, or the French language, or the separate school, it lies in the policy pursued by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and, perhaps, receiving the approbation of others who do not dare to declare openly their approbation of that policy. This crusade will have a most unfortunate effect, because it will lessen the confidence which we might have in the institutions which govern us, and also in the protection which is supposed to be extended to minorities. We know what sacrifices have been made for the development of the North-West. For it was built the Canadian Pacific Railway, for it was created the great national debt which rests so heavily upon this country. To the money which was expended there, the Catholic contributed as well as the Protestant; each to-day has to bear, in proportion to his means, in proportion to the population, some amount of the taxation. Sir, I ask in view of the legislation which has been passed: Is the door of the North-West not virtually closed, is the door of Manitoba not virtually closed, against Catholic emigrants who might intend going there? Can we encourage them to-day to go into that province? Not as long as the legislation exists which it was in the power of hon. gentlemen opposite, occupying the ministerial benches, to disallow, and which the people of the Province of Quebec thought they would disallow before the 5th March. We will be told, of course, in very fine technical language, we will even be told, perhaps, in subtle arguments, by the Minister of Justice, that the matter is before another tribunal and receiving the attention of that tribunal. Well, notwithstanding this assurance, we will still believe that the tribunal which should have pronounced upon it is before us: the constitution and laws of our country render that tribunal competent to pronounce, but policy, but expediency, but the desire of not displeasing the member for Simcoe and such other strong powers render this tribunal incompetent. That was the trouble. What should we think, if a fire was to start in this House, and if we were gravely informed that we must not take a pail of water to quench it, although we might have one at our hands, but that a page must be summoned, who, in his turn, will be sent to the caretaker, who, in his turn, will summon the city brigade, and, by the time this brigade would reach us, the whole building would be destroyed? That is about the amount and force of the argument of the Government with regard to this measure of the Manitoba schools. There is no wonder at all that the hon. member for Simcoe feels perfectly satisfied with the course pursued by the Government. In a speech delivered a short time ago at Collingwood he expressed his satisfaction, he expressed his entire pleasure, at the course pursued by the Government in this matter; and although we had been informed on more than one platform in the Province of Quebec that he had been expelled from his party, we did not believe it. We knew perfectly well that the people received one course of instruction in Ontario, while those specially deputed to fight us were informed by the chieftain of that party that he alone was the true defender of the faith. The Government sent its emissaries into the Province of Quebec to teach and preach that our policy meant annexation, that annexation meant the destruction of the Catholic religion, and would lead also to the ruin and destruction of the French language, and the laws, customs and institutions of the Province of Quebec. However, notwithstanding all these events, we have the consolation of knowing that it is not in the power of the Government of Manitoba to close the door of the separate schools—it is not in the power of any Government, of any agitator, to close the separate schools, because as long as a Catholic can earn a dollar in this country, he will gladly give that dollar to the end in view. We may be harassed, laws may be passed compelling us to support schools not our own, entirely out of sympathy with our religious view; we may even be forced to support them by taxation; and still, notwithstanding all the measures which may be passed against us in this respect, we will have our separate schools; so long as we enjoy the free exercise of our faith and religious opinions, so long will we have our separate schools. We all know, Mr. Speaker, the result of the policy pursued with respect to education in Ireland; we know that all the power of English statesmanship, all the glitter of English gold, that all human and inhuman devices were employed, in order to prevent the people of that country from receiving an education through Catholic channels. And still, what is the result? The result is stamped upon every page of history, showing that the Catholic Church has triumphed; and to-day the problem is how to destroy what was erected, and how to erect again what was destroyed. We know that to-day the heart of England has been touched, and an effort is being made, seriously and earnestly, to remedy the evil which existed, and to redress the wrong of centuries. We ask simply that we may be allowed to enjoy the privileges guaranteed to us by the constitution of our country; and one of the privileges before 1870, the year in which Manitoba entered Confederation, was that Catholics should have their separate schools, and from 1870 up to 1890 in Manitoba the Catholic school has existed, but last year it was closed. The right to have these schools is one which we are bound to keep, and it is a right which we will never cease to bring under the notice of this House.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I believe this information was furnished to the House last session; but if there is anything called for by this motion which has not already been brought down, I shall be very happy to bring down the additional information required.

Motion agreed to.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell), for Mr. LAURIER, moved for:

Copy of all correspondence between the Government or the Postmaster General's Department with Mr. Andrew Allan or any other parties, for the conveyance of the mails between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is to be regretted that the Postmaster General or the Government have allowed us to come to this state of affairs when our mails have to pass from Canada to the United Kingdom through a foreign country. Two years ago the Government obtained permission from this House to offer a subsidy of $500,000 a year for a period of ten years as a subsidy for a line of steamships between Canada, the United Kingdom and France. For some reason that subsidy was not taken advantage of, and after the Government had for about a year dallied with it, we were told last year that the expected contractors, Anderson & Co., had withdrawn from the negotiations. That left Canada with the old line of steamships as before, which had in fact been condemned by public opinion, and by the Government in this House so far as they represent the public opinion of the day. The Postmaster General last Session asked for a grant of $125,000 as a temporary subsidy to provide for the carrying of the mails by the Canadian route for one year. He knew that the arrangement would terminate in 1891, for he told us last year that the contract was for one year from April, 1890. It has, therefore, happened that, although the Government had a year's notice, we are now without a line of our own by which to send our mails to Great Britain. We have by the action of the Government in this respect condemned the Canadian lines, we have declared them unsuitable for the purpose of carrying the Canadian mails; perhaps they are, and I think this is generally conceded. But how does it arise that when the people of Canada are willing to give such vast sums of money towards the improvement of the service, two years have passed and we are now in a worse position than at the commencement? The Government have not only allowed the mail service to be diverted to a foreign country, but traffic, both passenger and freight, has also been diverted. In view of the great triumph just accomplished, whereby mails and passengers have been carried from Yokohama to the Atlantic shore in 14 days, I think every possible effort should be made by the Government to complete the triumph and bring us into direct communication through our own lines, if possible, with Great Britain and Europe. The country, I am sure, has not been penurious in the past in entrusting to the Government money for the purpose in question, nor is there any reason to suppose that the people will refuse to complete the system which has so far been carried to perfection. I, as a Canadian, rejoice at the triumph which has been recently accomplished in the direction I have mentioned, and I am sure the whole of Canada will endorse every movement that will improve and perfect our mail service. I should have regretted if this motion had passed in silence. I think there should be some information given by the Administration. How long are we to remain in the present condition? Are there any negotiations on foot? Has the Government anything in view? They have at present a pledge of half a million dollars for ten years from the people; has the Minister of Finance abandoned the scheme? I think it is due to the House that at this particular moment we should have information on the subject.

Mr. KENNY. I listened with pleasure to the remarks which fell from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). Hon. gentlemen who sat in the last Parliament will remember that on more than one occasion I drew the attention of the House and of the Government to the necessity which then existed for an improved trans-Atlantic mail service. I think, Sir, it is very much to be regretted that the efforts which the Government made to secure a better service have not been more successful, but at the same time I must say, my individual opinion is—and I think it is shared by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House—that the subsidy which was paid to the steamers which performed the service during the past two years had better cease, than that we should continue a service which was so generally unsatisfactory to the country. I was glad to read recently in an English newspaper, an extract from a Canadian paper, which first met my eyes in the English journal, and which stated that a company had been formed recently in England, composed of the owners of the Allan Line steamers, of the Naval and Armament Construction Company of Barrow-in-Furness, of which the Marquis of Hartington is the president, the company which constructed the fine steamers which the hon. member for North York has so pleasantly referred to, and of other English capitalists, who have joined together for the purpose of acquiring all the present steamers of the Allan line to be used as freight ships, and also for the purpose of constructing four fast steamships to be engaged in the Canadian trans-Atlantic mail service. I share the hope expressed by the hon. member for North York that the Government will be able to give the House some assurance at an early date that there is a probability of Canada having a first-class trans-Atlantic mail service. I am glad to hear from hon. gentlemen opposite that they are of opinion we ought to endeavour to secure an efficient trans-Atlantic mail service, for the reason that the passenger and freight traffic will necessarily follow the mail service. That was my contention in reference to the West Indian steamship service, but I regret to say that during the two years I called the attention of the last House to that matter, I never received much support from the hon. gentlemen opposite. Thanks are due to the Government for having established the West Indian mail service for the very reason that the hon. gentleman for North York urges in favour of the trans-Atlantic mail service, namely, that the passenger and freight and general commercial traffic will necessarily go with the mails. I share the hope expressed by the hon. gentleman, that, before this session closes, the Government will be in a position to inform the House that the efforts which they have made and are making to secure an improved trans-Atlantic service have been successful.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think any fault can be found with my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) for pressing for some information with reference to this question; an important question, as he himself has very truly stated. The House will remember that the Act which authorized the Government to expend half a million dollars to obtain a fast mail service across the Atlantic between this country and France and Great Britain, also contained the authority for the expenditure of a certain amount of money for a fast and first-class line of vessels on the Pacific. It contemplated also, and made provision to a certain extent, to bring about the establishment of a line of mail steamers between Canada and Australia. The Act authorized a scheme which involved these three distinct proposals. The Government went to work with reference to these three schemes, and up to the present time one of them has been accomplished, and accomplished in a way which is very much to the credit of Canada, and of which we all feel justly proud. We now have on the Pacific Ocean, in the great route of travel from the extreme east across this continent to Europe, the finest inter-continental service that can be found in the world, and with the exception of the trans-Atlantic service it may be said to be perfect. All companies are not like the one which undertook the building, and is now running the vessels on the Pacific, and running them under such successful auspices. Although the Government has spent as much, and I think I may say a great deal more time, and given more attention to the successful accomplishment, if possible, of the Atlantic service, it has not been so successful in bringing it to a termination on account of various causes. The reasons which have hitherto prevailed for this delay in bringing the Atlantic service to a success have been given last Parliament. Since the Messrs. Anderson gave up the project the Government has been in negotiation with other companies and other corporations, but several things have intervened to make it impossible for the Government to say that the scheme has been successfully realized. Negotiations have been going on, however, with certain English companies, and they had progressed to a very favourable extent when certain circumstances arose which caused delay. In the first place, Mr. Bryce-Douglas, who came here, and with whom the Government had personal, and I may say satisfactory communication, has suddenly passed away. As my hon. friend knows, Mr. Bryce-Douglas was a leading spirit in the company which built the Pacific line of steamers which are now running so successfully. In addition to this, certain financial difficulties arose in London which made it imprudent, for a certain time at least, to attempt to float so large a concern as was contemplated with reference to this service, because the scheme contemplated not only the establishment of a first-class line of steamers between Canada and the old country, but also the establishment of a first-class service between Canada and Australia, thus taking up and carrying to fulfilment the other two branches of the general proposal which was made two years ago. These circumstances militated against the bringing of this scheme to a successful completion. I may say that negotiations are still going on, and that the Government have not omitted any reasonable effort to bring them to a successful conclusion: and before the session terminates, I hope the Government will be in a position to give more definite information and a more favourable intimation than we are able to do at present. This much I say, and I think the House will take it in the spirit in which it is said, that we realize the great importance of having a first-class service from Canada to the old country as good as any that crosses the Atlantic, and the very generous grant given by Parliament to the Government has been used, so far as inducements went, with that end in view.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to state that I propose to adopt the rule, and adhere rigidly to it, that, in case a member is not present at the proper time to move any motion which stands in his name, it must be dropped, unless it stands at the request of the Administration.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS.

Annual Report of the Minister of Justice on Penitentiaries.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Annual Report of the Department of Fisheries.—(Mr. Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 11) to enable an accused person to give evidence on his own behalf.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

FISHERY BOUNTY CHEQUES.

Mr. FLINT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in future, to have the fishery bounty cheques issued and in course of distribution previous to the 5th day of March, in each year?

Mr. TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to have the bounty distributed before the 5th day of March in each year.

ANIMALS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to allow the entry into Canada free of duty of animals from the United States, for the purpose of their being slaughtered at Three Rivers or at any other place in the Dominion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That subject is now engaging the attention of the Government.

KAMINISTIQUIA RIVER—DREDGING.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, Whether any dredging has been done on the Bar or in the Kaministiquia River, Thunder Bay, since July, 1890; if so, were tenders invited for such work; how many tenders were received; what was the amount of the highest and lowest tender; was the lowest tender accepted; if not, why not? To whom was the contract awarded, and what was the amount of the successful tender? What progress has been made with the work, and what amount has been paid on account of said contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The answer to this question will require documents to be read, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to put it in the form of a notice of motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. With the consent of the House, I would ask to let the question stand as a motion.

TWO CENT LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. SOMERVILLE) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce letter postage to two cents?

Mr. HAGGART. That matter is at present under the consideration of the Government.

P. E. I. BREAKWATERS.

Mr. PERRY asked, What amount of wharfage dues has been collected at Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island, during the year 1890?

Mr. TUPPER. No return of the wharfage dues collected for the year 1890 has yet reached the Department.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether tenders have been asked for, for new works at Miminigash breakwater, Prince Edward Island? If so, is the contract let? And to whom, and for what amount? When is the contract to be completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Tenders were asked for by public advertisement, dated the 10th of December, 1890, for extending and strengthening the south pier. The contract has been awarded to Alexander Macdonald for $2,000, and it is to be completed within seven months from the date of the contract.

Mr. PERRY asked, What amount of money has been expended repairing Miminigash breakwater, Prince Edward Island, during the year 1890? Who was the inspector? What amount was he paid for his services?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount expended during the year was $550.71. The foreman was Michael McElroy. The amount paid him was $65.

THE DOMINION CENSUS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, How soon does the Government expect to receive returns of the number of the inhabitants of the Dominion?

Mr. HAGGART. The enumeration in connection with the census of 1881 commenced on the 4th of April of that year, and the result as to population was announced at the end of July of the same year. It is probable that the information asked for will be obtained this year at about the same time.

FISHERY INSPECTOR, DISTRICT No. 3, N.S.

Mr. FLINT asked, Whether the Inspector of Fisheries for District No. 3, in the Province of Nova Scotia, did, previously to the 5th day of March last, resign that office? If so, the date of such resignation; and whether the vacancy created by such resignation has yet been filled? If so, the name of the appointee and the date of his appointment?

Mr. TUPPER. The Inspector of Fisheries for that district did resign his office on the 25th of February, 1891. The vacancy created by that resignation has been filled. The name of the appointee is J. R. Pinhey. The date of his appointment was the 26th of March, 1891.

NEW SAFE IN FINANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What is the entire cost of the new safe put in the Finance Department, including putting it in? Were tenders asked for? How many tenders were sent in? Whose tender was the lowest? How much did Messrs. Goldie & McCulloch, Galt, get for the safe?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The entire cost the new vault in the Finance Department, includin the stone foundation, the cutting of the floors, etc., was $44,468. Tenders were asked on the 14th of November, 1889. Three tenders were received. The tender of Goldie & McCulloch, of Galt, Ontario, was the lowest, the amount being $29,750. The amounts paid to Goldie & McCulloch were: for erection and supply of vault, $29,750; and iron and steel boxes for each side of the vault, $3,627.40; making altogether $33,377.40. The other two tenders were those made by F. Toms, Ottawa, $36,850, and J. & J. Taylor, of Toronto, $37,942, both of which were higher than the accepted tender, with boxes included.

IMPERIAL POSTAL UNION.

Mr. DENISON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to approach the Imperial authorities with a view to establish a uniform Imperial two cent postage rate between all parts of the Empire?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government are at present engaged in considering the subject to which the hon. gentleman's question refers.

ELECTION RETURNS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

Return giving the date of the declaration in every riding during the recent General Election. If adjournments or enlargements were made, in any case, from the time fixed at the nominations, stating where, when, how often and for what reason, and giving the name and address of the returning officer where such occurred: also, giving the name, occupation and post office address of every returning officer: showing the date of return by returning officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the date of receipt of each by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery; together with the name of the electoral district and the member elected thereto, and the date of publication of his return in the Canada Gazette.

He said: Before the motion is put, I desire in a few words to state my reasons for making it. It has become notorious that irregularities have crept into the method of holding our elections, and that delays have occurred without good and sufficient reasons. In the election just passed the returning officer in the riding which I have the honour to represent announced that the declaration would be made a week after the election had taken place. I think, in the riding of East Bruce the declaration took place on the Monday following the election. In East Grey, I believe, it took place on the Monday following the election, and in North Grey on the Thursday following, a week after, as in my own case. In North Bruce it took place on the following Monday, and I notice also that in the gazetting, although the declaration in East Bruce took place at the same date as in North Bruce, the member for North Bruce was gazetted one week before the member for East Bruce; and in the case of North Grey, where the declaration took place at the same date as it did in South Grey, the member for North Grey was gazetted one week before the member for South Grey. And in the cases of North Bruce, North Grey and East Grey, the gazetting of three members took place on the 14th March, nine days after the election, and in one case two days after the declaration. I do not know whether this is according to law or not, but I want to enquire into the matter. If it is, the law should be remedied so that justice and fair-play may prevail. It is very desirable, if there is any advantage to be gained, that all should enjoy it in common; and if there are any disadvantages arising out of the system let them be removed. All parties should unite in obtaining fair-play in the conduct of elections and in the gazetting. I do not know why my election should be gazetted one week after the election in East Grey, when in reality my returning officer lives nearer Ottawa than the returning officer for East Grey. It does seem to me very peculiar that such a system should prevail, and that the Government should allow it to continue. We are here in a British colony where fair-play should be the rule. If the law allows the Government to take unfair advantage, the law should be altered. It does not make much difference to me whether I am gazetted earlier or later, but it is desirable that justice should be dealt out to all in the same measure. I want to find out how this is done, and for that reason I make this motion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this subject is entitled to some consideration. I notice that in a large number of instances considerable delay occurred between the day of election and the day of declaration. In some cases, no doubt, that is due to the fact that the returning officers undertook to make the most out of the elections, and instructed their deputies to retain the ballot boxes until they were called for instead of sending them in at once. In my own constituency the declaration was made a week after the day of the election, whereas in other constituencies, quite as large, it was made the third or fourth day after the election. The law requires that:

"The returning officer shall, immediately after the sixth day after the final addition by him, unless before that time he receives notice that he is required to attend before a judge for the purpose of a final addition or recount by such judge of the votes given at the election, transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery."

Now, I know in the County of Bothwell that was not done. The election was held on the 5th of March, and the declaration was made on the 12th March, and the returning officer, instead of making his return immediately after the expiration of the sixth day, waited until the eleventh day, and made his return after the Saturday had gone by on which the Canada Gazette is published. He made his return upon the Monday following, knowing that another week would have to elapse before publication in the Gazette could take place. That is a gross abuse on the part of the returning officer of the duty imposed upon him by law. Under the 105th section of the Election Act it is provided:

"That every officer and clerk who is guilty of any wilful misfeasance or any wilful act or omission in violation of this Act shall forfeit to any person aggrieved by such misfeasance, act or omission, a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, in addition to the amount of actual damages thereby occasioned to such persons."

I know that in the case I mentioned in my constituency the returning officer has made himself liable to that provision of the law, but what is the use of bringing an action against a man who has nothing? The House should see that it is not in the power of the Administration to appoint any man as returning officer who is not a responsible man and from whom the penalties imposed by law cannot be collected. Certainly this House owes it to every member to see that the law is honestly and fairly carried out. In many cases it has been violated in the way I have mentioned. After the elections of 1887 we had the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery keeping back the returns, contrary to law. That has not been repeated on this occasion, but a different course has been pursued. It is the returning officer who has kept back the returns now, and so the same mischief which was inflicted in 1887 by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has been inflicted in the present instance upon many members of this House by the returning officers. I think that this is a gross abuse, and one which ought not to be tolerated. If there is any law which ought to be fairly administered, it is the law relating to elections ; and I am satisfied that hon. members on this side of the House have great reason to complain of the course pursued by persons appointed as returning officers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Every returning officer must be held responsible for any irregularity or impropriety in the performance of his duty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But if he is worth nothing ?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We can alter that. "If he has not goods to find, he may have a pledge to bind," as the saying is. It does not at all follow that because returns do not come in the same day or by the same mail that there has been any impropriety. Hon. gentlemen know there are very many cases of delay. I have no objection that the law should be altered, if necessary, to prevent any misuse or abuse of the powers conferred on the returning officers. There was no abuse in my case. The returning officer was a personal friend of mine, and a political friend of mine, but he was the sheriff of the county, and therefore would be acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite. That he was a political friend of mine is not my fault, because he was elected at one time as a supporter of mine from the County of Frontenac. Still, there was a delay in my return, though I was elected, and possibly my return ought to have been announced in the first Gazette. I do not know why that was not done. I know that I have had the pleasure of having a protest served upon me, and, if I had appeared in the first Gazette, I might have been saved that pleasure. No doubt there was some reason for the delay, and no doubt other returning officers may have had equally good reasons. It may be that deputy returning officers have not made up their returns in proper time, or the delay may be caused by some other irregularities. I quite agree with the mover of this resolution and with my hon. friend who has just spoken, that all possible means should be taken to provide that there should be equal fair-play to both sides. When the return is made, we will be able to see better than we can now what the reasons are which are assigned for the delays and alleged irregularities in sending to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the return of the returning officer. There is a plethora of motions connected not only with the franchise, but also with the whole electoral system, on the paper, and I have no doubt that, before the session is over, we will be able to consider this subject and arrive at means to cure it beyond the possibility of abuse.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is true, as the First Minister informs us, that returns cannot always come in at the same time and by the same mail. Circumstances will necessarily occur to delay the returns in many cases. He suggests that we may look to the returning officers for a redress of our grievances, but there is a suspicion in the minds of many members that some returning officers have been acting—not necessarily in collusion with the Government——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not.

Mr. CHARLTON—but in collusion with the party to which they belong. The return from the north riding of Norfolk, which I represent, was made on the 9th March, and the return from the south riding of the same county on the 12th March. I received my certificate on the 16th March, and my return was gazetted on the 4th April, while the return of the supporter of the Government from South Norfolk was not gazetted until a week afterwards.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a very suspicious circumstance, I admit.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is said that the returning officer was sick at the time, but he was able to make the return, at all events. Whether the delay was inadvertent or by purpose, I do not know, but it took place. I am happy to hear my hon. friend the First Minister state that he will take measures to rectify these abuses and to see that they do not occur again.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know professionally that the returning officer for North Norfolk was very sick indeed. The papers were given to his clerk, and, through some inadvertence, I suppose, on the part of the clerk, they were not sent at once ; but I know that the returning officer was not only confined to his bed, but was very seriously ill at that time.

Mr. AMYOT. I think that, some few years ago, the Minister of Justice proposed to bring down a measure to fix the period of delay within which an election could be protested. That is the only cure for this evil. When there are 215 returning officers there will necessarily be some mistakes made and some faults. It would be better to cure the fault from which this arises. The Government has in its hands a very good means of curing this trouble, at least partially—that would be that they should decide not to contest the elections which have been protested within the last week.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in regard to my promise to bring down a measure.

Mr. AMYOT. We will consult the Hansard next time.

Mr. McMULLEN. The election took place on the 5th March. I was gazetted on the 4th or 5th April, a month after, but I have no fault to find with the returning officer in my riding, because there were six of the deputy returning officers who had neglected to sign the returns, and he had to adjourn for a week. Then there was a severe snow storm which shut up the roads. I mention this as I would not like any reflection to be cast upon the returning officer in my riding, because I think he did what he could to carry out the law.

Mr. MULOCK. I have no complaint to make against my returning officer. In fact, I have never had any ground to complain about the manner in which the officials in my riding have carried out their duties. The riding which I represent is inhabited by a very intelligent people, as you may observe, and they are an incorruptible people. If that were not so I might not be here now. I believe there was no delay on the part of my returning officer, or, if there were any, it was not his fault. I desire to move in amendment, with the consent of my hon. friend, to add the following to the motion :—

Also copies of all letters written by or on behalf of any member of the Government, to any member-elect or to any other person or persons, suggesting that any returning officer be asked to delay making his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery."

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the report of the Special Committee appointed to report on the list of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) to further amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships. He said: The Bill is rather a long one, but the amendment proposed can be explained very briefly and only affects the present Act to a small extent. Ever since the Act regulating the granting of certificates to masters and mates has been in force, the practice has been to distinguish in the certificates granted between the great lakes and the minor inland waters, and there has also been a distinction under the rules carried out by the Department in certificates granted for "fore-and-aft rigged" vessels and "square rigged" vessels. The practice in that connection has never been challenged, nor has it been found at all improper; but on a strict reading of the Act as it now stands it does not appear that these rules and regulations are technically regular. The object of this Bill is to make legal and proper the rules and regulations under which the certificates have been granted in the past.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION WITHIN CANADA.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to provide for the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction within Canada in accordance with "The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890." He said: By an Act of the Imperial Parliament, passed during last year, the vice-admiralty courts in the various British possessions were abolished and power was given to the Parliament of each possession to establish vice-admiralty courts of its own. This Bill is intended to make provision for the circumstances which arise under that Imperial statute. The scheme of the Bill is to invest in the Exchequer Court of Canada the jurisdiction which has hitherto been exercised by the vice-admiralty courts of Canada, and by the maritime courts. It also contemplates the vesting in that court of additional jurisdiction of an admiralty character which was not previously vested in the vice-admiralty courts of this country, and which the Imperial statute allows us to confer upon any court in the country. In order to prevent the inconvenience from centralization through the jurisdiction being exercised exclusively by the Exchequer Court in Ottawa, it is provided in the Bill that the Governor in Council shall have power to declare from time to time, the existence of a territorial division, called the admiralty division. Until such regulations are made by the Governor in Council each province is to be the admiralty division, and is to have the local judge of the Exchequer Court for the administration of admiralty jurisdiction. There is to be an appeal from that judge to the Exchequer Court, and from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 14) with respect to certain matters affecting the Administration of Justice. He said: The Bill which I propose to introduce, with leave of the House, is with reference to certain matters connected with the administration of justice in the different provinces. The principal clause relates to the administration of justice by the county court judges. The first section is to provide that the jurisdiction of a county court judge shall extend to a county or district, notwithstanding any territorial modifications which have been made in the original division for which he was appointed. Another section provides that the Governor General in Council, at the request of the Lieutenant Governor of a province, may direct any county court judge of the province to exercise his jurisdiction in any other county of the province. Another section is to enable the Governor General in Council to call upon any retired county judge of the province to perform any judicial duties in the county courts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMBINATIONS IN TRADE.

Mr. WALLACE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) to amend the Act for the prevention and suppression of combinations in restraint of trade. He said: The object of this Bill is similar to the Bill I introduced last year. It is proposed to strike out the word "unduly" in paragraphs (a) (c) (d), and to strike out the word "unreasonably" in paragraph (c) of the Act. Another clause provides that this Act shall not in any way be applicable to the restriction of "Trades Unions."

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CHICOUTIMI ELECTION RETURN.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. SAVARD) asked, Why the election return for Chicoutimi and Saguenay was not published in the Canada Gazette until the 2nd May instant? Is the said delay due to the fact that the returning officer did not sooner transmit his return? If so, what reasons does he allege therefor?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Because the letter with the return of the election was not received sooner by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. In fact, publication of the election of the member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay was made and a certificate given to him by the returning officer, and the regular return to the writ was only received on the 7th inst. In transmitting his report of the proceedings, the returning officer states that in view of the fact that he had given a certificate of the election to the member elected, he did not think there was any necessity of transmitting the election documents to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until the opening of Parliament.

IMPORTS OF COTTON SAIL DUCK.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne) asked, How many yards of cotton sail duck have been imported at Halifax, N.S., from the 30th day of June, 1889, to 30th June, 1890, and from 30th June, 1890, to 30th December, 1890, and the value of such importation respectively?

Mr. BOWELL. I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow that question to stand as a notice of motion for papers, as it is impossible to bring down the papers required by way of an answer to a question.

LATE GENERAL ELECTION—RECOUNTS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether a recount took place in any constituency since the general election, after the member had been gazetted? If so, where, and was it regular; if not, is it necessary for the member to be re-gazetted?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Government have nothing to do with that, and have no knowledge of it except what they get from the newspapers.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If a recount is made, the return is made to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the Government have to do with him.

LICENSES FOR POUND NETS.

Mr. LISTER asked, How many pound nets were licensed in the year 1885, between Goderich and Blue Point? And how many of these were double and treble headers? How many pound nets have been licensed between the same points for the year 1891? And how many are double and treble headers?

Mr. TUPPER. Nine pound nets were licensed in the year 1885 between Goderich and Blue Point. None of these were double or treble headers. No pound nets have yet been licensed between the same points for 1891.

Mr. LISTER asked, How many pound net licenses have been issued for Lake St. Clair for the year 1891?

Mr. TUPPER. Four.

CORN MEAL.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Whether corn meal is to be placed upon the free list this Session?

Mr. FOSTER. I shall have to ask my hon. friend to wait for that information until the Budget is brought down.

REGISTERED LETTER FEE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether it is intended to reduce the fee now charged for registering letters? If not, is it intended to guarantee the safe delivery of all registered letters and their contents?

Mr. HAGGART. The subject is being considered by the Government.

LIVERPOOL AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY.

Mr. FORBES asked, Whether such sums will be placed in the Estimates to be submitted at the present session of Parliament, as will be sufficient to complete the subsidy to the whole line of railway from Liverpool to Annapolis?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That question cannot be answered until the measure respecting railways is brought down.

DOMINION ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to order a revision of the Dominion electoral lists in 1891, at the period fixed by law? If so, have instructions to that effect been transmitted to the revising officers, and on what date?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. A revision of the electoral lists is ordered by law, and it is not the intention of the Government to propose a Bill this session to prevent that revision. No special instructions have to be sent to the revising officers unless there is need of such in the routine of the work.

FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to continue the system of fishing licenses inaugurated in 1888, in the counties surrounding Lake St. Peter? Have they instructed the fishery overseers to require such licenses? If so, when were such instructions issued?

Mr. TUPPER. It is the intention to continue the system of issuing fishing licenses inaugurated in 1888, and instructions to that effect were sent in the month of March—I think about the 23rd; I can give the hon. gentleman the exact date later if he desires it.

PROHIBITION—LEGISLATION.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, In view of the very large number of petitions presented to this House in favour of prohibition, and in view of the fact that any legislation meeting, in whole or in part, the prayer therein contained should emanate from the Government, as the revenue of the country will be affected thereby, is it the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation this session to meet to any extent the prayer of those petitions?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That matter is under the consideration of the Government.

MERCANTILE AGENCIES.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce an Act during the present session to regulate mercantile agencies and to make them responsible for any losses sustained by persons giving credit on the reports of said agencies?

Mr. FOSTER. That matter has not yet been considered by the Government.

DIRECTORS OF TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce during this session an Act to amend the Act respecting Telegraph Companies so as to compel the directors of said companies to reside in Canada?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That matter has not yet been under the consideration of the Government.

H. E. HARTLEY—DISMISSAL.

Mr. CHRISTIE moved for:

Correspondence between any Department of the Government and H. E. Hartley, late Lockmaster on the Carillon and Grenville Canal, in reference to his retirement from the Civil Service, and any report to Council or Order in Council upon the same subject.

He said: I desire to read a letter which I received from Mr. Hartley in connection with this matter:

"CHUTE À BLONDEAU, 11th March, 1891.

"SIR,—I beg respectfully to submit the following: On the 4th July, 1890, I received word from Mr. Simpson, superintendent, by the order of Mr. Stark, that my services were no longer required as lockmaster at Chute à Blondeau as that lock was obliterated and that I had better get something else to do, no mention being made of superannuating me whatever. I claim that my discharge was not legal and that Mr. Stark had not the power to dismiss me in the manner he did. I have not received any pay since last 4th July, 1890, up to the present date, a period of eight months, and I think that I am entitled to my pay until I get my superannuation. I have a large family to support, and I cannot keep them on nothing. I have been twenty-three years in the service and have been paying into the superannuation fund ever since it began, a period of twenty years. I would beg to solicit your influence in procuring me that to which I am entitled to, that is superannuation allowance, or allow me to stay at Chute à Blondeau in the position I had before, that is lockmaster. Superintendent Simpson informed me that the Government did not want to discharge me, and that he (Simpson) would put me in my place immediately if he had a vacancy. There seems something very strange about it. I would like very much if you would take my case in hand, for I know that you will see justice done to me. I offered to light the lamps if they would let me have a boy and I would pay him myself, as I could not go up that height on account of dizziness in the head. They would not accept my offer, but Mr. Stark sent me my discharge, a copy of which I enclose in this letter."

It would appear from this letter that Mr. Hartley has been rather hardly dealt with. He has been employed for twenty-three years on the canal, and, so far, as I know, discharged his duty faithfully and well. I have not heard of any complaints being lodged against him. He paid into the superannuation fund ever since it was organized, twenty years ago, and he supposed he had in that way made provision for his family should he become incapacitated for work. About ten months ago he was summarily dismissed, the alleged reason being that his services were no longer required, as the particular lock on which he was engaged had been obliterated—wiped out, I suppose, by the construction of the Carillon dam. It will be remembered, however, that that took place several years ago, and since then Mr. Hartley has been employed in different capacities. He took charge of the locks formerly operated by the late Mr. Cummings, and has discharged other duties besides. Since his dismissal he applied to be reinstated or to be placed on the superannuation list; but up to the present he has not received a cent from that fund. All this may be strictly according to law, but, if so, it appears to me that the law should be amended. It does appear a great hardship that an old employé, a man who has laboured faithfully twenty-three years in the service and paid into the fund for twenty years, should now be denied all participation in the fund and his family left in a state of embarrassment. I beg, therefore, to move for the papers in this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will answer no good purpose to enter into a discussion of this matter until the papers are brought down. I would ask that there be added to the motion: "And all papers in connection with the dismissal of Mr. Hartley."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. TARTE (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to rise to a question of privilege. A few days ago, I gave notice to the Minister of Public Works and to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) of my intention to move on this matter. I would much prefer to address the House in the language in which I am most familiar, but I believe the great majority of my colleagues are not familiar with the French language, and although it is with great difficulty that I speak their own language, I feel it my duty to use it in the present occasion. After the hon. members of both sides of the House have read the correspondence I happen to have in my hands, they will have to decide and the country will have to decide with them, whether, being in possession of such a voluminous correspondence, I would have been warranted to keep silent.

Mr. Speaker, before reading the motion I intend to put before you, I may be allowed to offer a few remarks, and to express, first, my deep sorrow at beginning my political career in this Parliament by accusations, by grave accusations, against old and important members of this House. Were it not that I am convinced I am performing a great public duty, I would not be in this seat to-day. I believe, Sir, I have every reason to believe, that I am in a position to prove, by documentary evidence and verbal evidence, every statement contained in the motion I am going to place in your hands; and those statements are to the effect that, since 1882 or 1883, the secrets of the Department of Public Works have been penetrated and divulged, for money considerations, to public contractors, by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy), who, according to the evidence I have in my hand, has been paid year by year, contract after contract, large sums of money; that, during that period of time, he has used his influence, as a member of this Parliament and as a member of the Quebec Harbour Commission, against the public interest on numerous and important occasions. Perhaps you will remember that at the end of the last session of Parliament your attention was called to some statements published by me in the public press. That publication had been preceded by steps that it is no breach of discretion, I presume, to recall. Papers and documents had come into my hands, impeaching, in my opinion, the character of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) and the integrity of the Department of Public Works. These documents were put into my hands without any endeavour on my part to obtain them. Under advice of very important members of the Conservative party, I thought it was my duty to show these papers to the right hon. the Prime Minister. At his request, I left some of those papers with him; a few days afterwards he gave them back to me stating, with his usual kindness, that he had seen the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) and had received from him positive assurances that there was no truth whatever in those documents; and that he had also received from the Minister of Public Works the same assurances. Then again, under the advice of the very same important members of the Conservative party, I published the statements of Messrs. O. E. Murphy and Robert H. McGreevy, the former a close friend for a number of years of the member for Quebec West, as the correspondence will show; and the latter named gentleman a brother of the member for Quebec West, and his confidential agent for twenty years past. In taking the risk and peril of that publication I had made up my mind that there was no other course left open to me, or left open to the friends who were in sympathy with me, if we would put a stop, as we desired to do, to the malversations and frauds that have been going on for a long number of years; we decided that no other way was left open to us but to appeal to public opinion through the powerful agency of the press. It was admitted on all hands in Quebec that something wrong and rotten was going on in the Public Works Department and in the harbour works of Quebec. For years and years this Parliament had voted large sums of money, millions of dollars, but very little useful progress had been made. However, nobody could get at safe evidence against the suspected parties. Look, Sir, at the well planned arrangements that surrounded and covered the doings of our Canadian Tammany Hall. The member for Quebec West was a very important member of this House, and he was at the same time a member of the Quebec Harbour Commission. Mr. Perley was the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, and at the same time he was the chief engineer of the Quebec Harbour Works. The hon. member for Quebec West was known to every public man in Canada to be a very close friend of the hon. Minister of Public Works. The Quebec Harbour Commission contained an employé of the hon. member for Quebec West—I have no desire to accuse that man, but I wish to state that fact here. As an assistent engineer, we had then and we have still, a son of the hon. Minister of Public Works, although he has never been an engineer in his life. And, Sir, that strong combination of men was backed up by a strong company of contractors, belonging to both political parties. The head of the firm was Mr. Larkin—I think, a well-known Liberal. Mr. Robert H. McGreevy was known, and is still known, in Quebec, as a strong Conservative, and, as I said before, is a brother of the hon. member for Quebec West. The other three members of the firm were, and still are—I may be permitted to call your attention immediately to this fact—three American citizens, who have had, I think, a large experience in the United States. That organization had, and has still, subsidized organs, and those who dared resist them, or their political associates, were accused of treason to the old party, to the old leader and to the old flag. Ministers of the Crown whom I have the honour to see on the Treasury benches now, have been, to my knowledge, many times made the target and object of the mischievous intrigues of these men. As a matter of fact, this enquiry, which will be a complete one, I have no doubt, will bear out my statements; as a matter of fact, they have, for the last eight or ten years, controlled the direction and organization of the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec. Is it surprising, Mr. Speaker, that our old party has been for a long time losing ground in that old Conservative stronghold, the Province of Quebec? In vain did we complain, in vain did we come up here to Ottawa and set forth the evils which I have mentioned. With other influential friends of the party, I have been more than once delegated to make representations here. The power behind the throne was too strong for us, as we did not know the real nature of the influences against which we had to contend. Mr. Speaker, I need the assistance of both sides of the House. My appeal to you will be better understood after you have read the correspondence which I hold in my hand. It will show that we as a Parliament have to deal with men, some of whom are of a very desperate character, if we are to judge them by letters they have written and means they have employed. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) has stated elsewhere that he gave to the Conservative party the money he obtained from those men. As well for my friends of the Conservative party as for this Parliament, I must state a fact, which is a well-known one, especially in the Conservative party in Quebec. The hon. Minister of Public Works, who is the official leader of the Quebec Conservative party in this Parliament, appointed, or if I may be allowed to say so, imposed on the Conservative party the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) as the treasurer of the party; and in the name of the friends with whom I have worked for the last twenty years, I must repudiate in the strongest possible terms the idea that any one of us can be held responsible before this Parliament, because we may have been sent to a man appointed by the official leader of our party in the Province of Quebec. Among many others, I have been accused of betraying the old flag and the Conservative party, because I have thought proper to take the course I have adopted here. I may be allowed to state that I was elected as an independent Liberal-Conservative. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, whom we all regret not to see in his seat, has never asked me to repudiate my past. I would not have done so. He never asked me to give up any of my principles. Again I say I would not have done so. He never asked anything else than this. He said:

"I feel you are performing a great public duty; I extend to you my help." There never was any other agreement between him and me than the honourable agreement that I am now stating to the House. I believe there is no occasion to make a long speech, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will now proceed to read the motion, which is as follows:—

That J. Israël Tarte, Esq., the member representing the Electoral District of Montmorency in this House, having declared from his seat in the House that he is credibly informed and that he believes he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence that,

In 1882 the sum of $375,000 having been voted by the Parliament of Canada to carry out the works of the Harbour of Quebec, the Quebec Harbour Commissioners called for tenders for dredging in connection with the said works.

That Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. tendered and were awarded the contract for the said dredging.

That in order to secure the influence of the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, then and now a member of the Parliament of Canada, and a member of the Quebec Harbour Commission by appointment of the Government of Canada, the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., with the knowledge of the said Thomas McGreevy, took as a partner Robert H. McGreevy, his brother, giving him an interest of 30 per cent. in the firm.

That the said Thomas McGreevy consented to his brother becoming a member of the firm, and stated that he had first consulted the hon. Minister of Public Works, Sir Hector L. Langevin, and secured his consent.

That the said contract, signed on the 25th of September, 1882, stipulated that the works thereunder were to be finished by the 1st of November, 1884, but that the said Larkin, Connolly & Co. continued to perform the work of dredging under the scale of prices therein mentioned up to the close of the season of 1886.

That in order to help Larkin, Connolly & Co. to secure the said dredging contract, the said Hon. Thomas McGreevy agreed to give and did give, in an undue manner, his help as Harbour Commissioner to Larkin, Connolly & Co.

That the said contract was approved and ratified by an Order in Council based on a report of the Hon. the Minister of Public Works.

That up to the year 1883 aforesaid, Messrs. Kinipple and Morris, of London, England, had acted as Engineers to the Quebec Harbour Commission, and that their resident Engineer for carrying out of the works was Mr. Woodford Pilkington.

That in concert with Larkin, Connolly & Co. the said Thomas McGreevy undertook to secure the removal of Messrs. Kinipple, Morris and Pilkington from their positions, and that they were in fact so removed in 1883, and replaced by Mr. Henry F. Perley and Mr. John Edward Boyd, with the consent of the hon. Minister of Public Works.

That in the same year, 1883, tenders were called for a cross-wall and lock in connection with the harbour works at Quebec in accordance with plans and specifications prepared in the Department of Public Works under the direction of Henry F. Perley, Esq.

That several tenders were made, and amongst others who tendered were Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co.

That before tendering, and in order to secure the influence of the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, then and now a member of the Parliament of Canada, and a member of the Quebec Harbour Board by appointment of the Government, Larkin, Connolly & Co. took into partnership with themselves Robert H. McGreevy, a brother of the said Hon. Thomas McGreevy, giving him a 30 per cent. interest in the firm, and this with the knowledge and consent of the said Hon. Thomas McGreevy.

That among the parties tendering were a contractor named George Beaucage and one John Gallagher.

That it was on the suggestion of the said Hon. Thomas McGreevy that Beaucage consented to make a tender.

That with the knowledge of the said Thomas McGreevy, the three tenders of Larkin, Connolly & Co., of Beaucage, and of Gallagher, were prepared by the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., Beaucage being throughout deceived by the said Hon. Thomas McGreevy as to his position in the matter, as he alleges in an action recently entered by him against the said Thomas McGreevy in relation to the said contract in the Superior Court of Montreal.

That the said tenders were transmitted to the Department of Public Works of Canada for examination and extension.

That while all the tenders were being examined and the quantities applied in the Department of Public Works of Canada, the said Hon. Thomas McGreevy, then and now a member of the Parliament of Canada, and a member of the Quebec Harbour Commission by appointment of the Government, promised to obtain and did obtain from the Department of Public Works of Canada, and from officials of that Department, in relation to the said tenders, to figures in connection therewith, and to the amounts thereof, information which he offered to communicate before the result was officially known, and which he did communicate to the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and to certain members of the said firm individually.

That to the knowledge of the said Thomas McGreevy, the tenders of Messrs. Gallagher and Beaucage were lower than those of Larkin, Connolly & Co., but that in consideration of the promise of the sum of $25,000 to be to him paid, he, the said Thomas McGreevy, agreed to secure the acceptance of the tenders of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and that he suggested to that firm and to certain members thereof individually, to make arrangements in connection with the said Gallagher and Beaucage and to so manipulate matters as to render the tenders of those two parties higher than those of the said firm, or at all events to secure the contract for Larkin, Connolly & Co., and that said arrangements and manipulations were carried out as suggested by him.

That in consequence of the said arrangement and manipulations wherein the said Thomas McGreevy directly participated, the contract for the cross-wall and lock in connection with the Quebec Harbour works was awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co., on a report to Council made by the hon. Minister of Public Works, under date 26th May, 1883.

That a few days thereafter the sum of $25,000 was, in fulfilment of the corrupt arrangement above stated, paid to the said Thomas McGreevy in promissory notes signed by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., which said notes were duly paid.

That about the same date, namely, the 4th June, 1883, a sum of $1,000 was paid by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. towards "the Langevin Testimonial Fund"—a fund destined to be given to Sir Hector Langevin.

That in the course of the carrying out of the works, the said Thomas McGreevy caused changes contrary to the public interest to be made in the conditions of the said contract.

That in 1884, Thomas McGreevy, then and now a member of the Parliament of Canada and a member of the Quebec Harbour Commission by appointment of the Government, agreed with the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and certain members thereof individually, to secure for them a contract for the completion of the Graving Dock of Lévis, one of the conditions of the agreement being that he, Thomas McGreevy, should receive any excess over the sum of $50,000 in the contract price.

That to the detriment of public interest, a contract was signed in or about the month of June, 1884, for the performance of the said works, and that subsequently the said Thomas McGreevy received the price stipulated in the corrupt arrangement above mentioned, namely, $22,000.

That in 1883 and 1884, tenders were asked for by the Government of Canada for the completion of the Graving Dock at Esquimalt, B.C.

That the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. were among those who tendered, and that the contract was awarded to them in pursuance of a Report to Council, dated 24th October, 1884, and signed by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

That before tendering, the said Larkin, Connolly & Co. had with Thomas McGreevy, then and now a member of the Parliament of Canada, communications and interviews wherein they secured his services to assist them in dealing with the Department of Public Works, in order to secure the said contract.

That he agreed to help them, and that he did in fact help them in divers ways, and, amongst others, by obtaining from the Department of Public Works information, figures and calculations which he communicated to them.

That to the knowledge and with the consent of the said Thomas McGreevy, and for the purpose of securing for themselves his influence, Larkin, Connolly & Co. took into partnership with themselves his brother, Robert H. McGreevy, giving him a 20 per cent. interest in their firm.

That during the execution of the said contract, the said Thomas McGreevy was the agent, or one of the agents, in the pay of Larkin, Connolly & Co., in dealing with the Department of Public Works; that he endeavoured to obtain, and did obtain, for them, at their request, important alterations in the works, and more favourable conditions.

That the said more favourable conditions and the said alterations enabled them to realize, to the detriment of the public interests, very large profits.

That during the execution of the works, large sums were paid by Larkin, Connolly & Co. to Thomas McGreevy for his services in dealing with the Minister of Public Works, with the officers of the Department, and, generally, for his influence as a member of the Parliament of Canada.

That in consideration of the sums of money so received by him and of the promises to him made, the said Thomas McGreevy furnished to Larkin, Connolly & Co. a great deal of information; strove to procure, and did procure, to be made by the Department and the hon. Minister of Public Works, in the plans of the Graving Dock and in the execution of the works, alterations which have cost large sums of money to the public treasury.

That he himself took steps to induce certain members of the Parliament of Canada to assist him, the said Thomas McGreevy, in his efforts, in concert with Larkin, Connolly & Co., to obtain alterations and additional works, for which large sums of money were offered to him by the members of the firm.

That on his suggestion members of the Parliament of Canada were approached by members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co.

That certain members of the said firm have declared that the said members of the Canadian Parliament on being so approached, had asked for a certain sum of money for exerting their influence in favour of Larkin, Connolly & Co. with the Minister of Public Works, and that Larkin, Connolly & Co. had agreed to give them money for that purpose.

That Thomas McGreevy, acting in concert with Larkin, Connolly & Co., did at their request corruptly endeavour to procure the dismissal from office, of certain public officers employed in connection with the works of the Graving Dock at Esquimalt in order to have them replaced by others who would suit Larkin, Connolly & Co., the former having for a time incurred the ill-will of Larkin, Connolly & Co., because they then compelled them to carry out the works in conformity with the specifications and contract, and prepared their estimates according to the terms of the said contract.

That during the winter of 1886-87 the said Thomas McGreevy proposed to and made with the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., through certain members of the said firm, an arrangement whereby the said firm undertook to pay to him the sum of $25,000 on condition that he would obtain for the firm the sum of 35 cents per cubic yard for the dredging of 800,000 cubic yards in area of the Wet Basin in the harbour of Quebec.

That dredging of the same kind, and even more difficult, had previously and up to that time, and to the knowledge of the said Thomas McGreevy, been executed for the sum of 27 cents per cubic yard, and even less in the same works.

That the said Thomas McGreevy used his influence as a member of this House with the Department of Public Works, and in particular with Henry F. Perley, Esq., to induce him to report to the Quebec Harbour Commission in favour of the payment of the said sum of 35 cents per cubic yard.

That the correspondence on this subject between Henry F. Perley and Larkin, Connolly & Co., before the Quebec Harbour Commissioners were consulted, took place at the suggestion of the said Thomas McGreevy, and was conducted with his knowledge and participation in such a manner as to conceal from the eyes of Parliament and of the public, the corrupt character of the contract, in connection with which he had received $27,000

That Larkin, Connolly & Co. paid in money to the said Thomas McGreevy the sum of $20,000 in fulfilment of the arrangement above mentioned, and that at his own request a sum of $5,000 was left, to secure the election of the said Thomas McGreevy to the House of Commons at the general election of 1887, in the hands of one of the members of the firm, who, finding that sum insufficient, had to add thereto the sum of $2,000.

That on the 23rd May, 1887, in fulfilment of the arrangement above mentioned, and through the effort, the influence and the intervention of the said Thomas McGreevy, and without any public tender having been called for, a contract was made between the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and Larkin, Connolly & Co. for all the necessary dredging and removal of material in the Wet Basin of the Quebec Harbour Works.

That in the execution of the works of this contract extensive frauds were perpetrated to the detriment of the public treasury, and sums of money were paid corruptly to officials under the control and direction of Henry F. Perley and appointed by the Quebec Harbour Commission.

That by an Order in Council dated 10th May, 1888, the Government of Canada decided to pay a sum of $12,500 yearly during five years to Mr. Julien Chabot, on the condition of his causing the steamer Admiral to ply between Dalhousie and Gaspé, forming a connection with the Intercolonial Railway.

That the said sum of $12,500 has since been paid in the manner prescribed in the Order in Council and the contract made thereunder.

That the said Julien Chabot was merely a screen for the benefit of the said Thomas McGreevy, who then was and continued to be for a long time thereafter the proprietor of the Admiral in whole or at least in great part.

That previous to the 10th of May, 1888, to wit, since 1883 or 1884, the same subsidy of $12,500 was paid for the said steamer Admiral then also owned by men representing the said Thomas McGreevy.

That the said Thomas McGreevy received in that connection a sum of about $120,000, while being a member of the Parliament of Canada.

That in 1886, tenders were asked for by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners for the construction of a work called the "South Wall" or "Retaining Wall."

That Mr. Thomas McGreevy procured from public officials the tenders received, and showed them to Messrs. O. E. Murphy, Connolly, and R. H. McGreevy, for whom he was acting, in order to give them an undue advantage over their competitors.

That they had the said tenders in their possession during several hours, after which they were returned to Henry F. Perley, then in Quebec, by the said Thomas McGreevy.

That the contract was awarded to one John Gallagher, a mere figure head for the said Murphy, Connolly and R. H. McGreevy, who did the work for their own profit and advantage.

That changes detrimental to the public interest, but of a nature to secure great profits to the contractors, were made in the plans and the carrying out of the works, and in the conditions and securities set out in the contract, through the influence and intervention of the said Thomas McGreevy.

That from the year 1883 to 1890, both inclusive, the said Thomas McGreevy received from Larkin, Connolly & Co. and from his brother, R. H. McGreevy, for the considerations above indicated, a sum of about $200,000.

That during the period aforesaid he was the agent and paid representative of Larkin, Connolly & Co. on the Quebec Harbour Board of Commissioners, in Parliament, and in connection with the Department of Public Works.

That the said Thomas McGreevy exacted and received out of the subsidies voted by Parliament for the construction of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, a sum of over $40,000.

That the moneys expended in connection with the works mentioned in the present motion are moneys voted by the Parliament of Canada, and amount to about $5,000,000.

That the said Thomas McGreevy on several occasions demanded in the name of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and received from Larkin, Connolly & Co., sums of money.

That from 1882 to the present session, the said Thomas McGreevy has always lived in Ottawa in the same house as the hon. Minister of Public Works, and that he seems to have done so in order to put in the mind of Larkin, Connolly & Co. the impression that he had over said hon. Minister an absolute control and that he was acting as his representative in his corrupt transactions with them.

That in fact on many occasions he used the name of the hon. Minister of Public Works in his dealings with them, undertaking to obtain his co-operation or declaring that he had secured it.

That before the board of Quebec Harbour Commissioners he often also used the name of the said Minister.

That certain members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. paid and caused to be paid large sums of money to the hon. Minister of Public Works out of the proceeds of the said contracts, and that entries of the said sums were made in the books of that firm.

A select committee be appointed to enquire fully into the said allegations, and specially, but without limiting the scope of such enquiry, to investigate all circumstances connected with the several tenders, contracts and changes therein, and the payments and other matters mentioned in the statements hereinbefore made, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and that the committee do report in full the evidence taken before them, and all other proceedings on the reference, and the result of their enquiries, and that Rule 78 of this House as to the selection of committees be suspended, and that said committee be composed of Messrs. Davies, Edgar, Kirkpatrick, Mills (Bothwell), Ouimet, Prior, Tarte, Weldon and Wood (Brockville).

Although I have thought proper to suggest the names of certain members of this House, I am entirely in the hands of the House. I read with great pleasure, and the House will no doubt hear with the same pleasure, a very important statement made in February last in Halifax by the hon. Minister of Justice, in whom I have the fullest confidence, to this effect:

"Let me put in half a dozen sentences the facts of the case. Mr. McGreevy is member for the city of Quebec, but was never member of the Government of Canada. He had a quarrel with a brother about some money matters and his brother has been pursuing him since and has published some letters which might perhaps have the effect of driving his brother out of Parliament. I will not be Mr. McGreevy's defender until he has defended himself from the aspersions cast upon his character which those documents contain, nor will any member of the Liberal-Conservative Government of Canada. But let me tell you that while Mr. Robert McGreevy, the brother, has been dragging this correspondence out weeks after weeks and months after months, nothing has been disclosed to show that the slightest suspicion rests upon any member of the Government of the Dominion of Canada. But because charges have been insinuated that one member of the Government has been to some extent cognisant of what was going on, though that turns only upon some evidence that one or two clerks in his Department may have known something of it, that is enough, and when Parliament meets an investigation will take place and it will take place upon the motion of a member of the Government. [Applause.] What I have to say in conclusion is, that nothing with regard to the general policy of the Government, nor with regard to those scandals will the electorate of Canada be in any way deceived."

As I said a moment ago, if the hon. Minister of Justice or the Government think it is better in the public interest that my suggestion of a select committee be not adopted, I am in the hands of the House. I have been elected, Sir, to put this motion before you, and in doing so I believe I am performing a great public duty. I verily believe, unless I am face to face with a long succession of forgeries, which to my mind is not possible, that I shall have the painful duty to prove every statement I have just made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter being a matter of privilege, we have a standing committee appointed by the House—the Committee on Privileges and Elections—which has to deal with matters of privilege, and this matter should be sent to that committee. My intention from the beginning had been to make the motion myself, but I understood that the hon. the mover of this motion had other matters to bring before the House than those which were published in the press, and I thought it therefore but fair to leave the hon. gentleman to take his own course and bring the subject as fully before the House as he might deem it his duty to do. As my name is connected with this question by the hon. gentleman, I think it my duty to make a statement to the House. That statement I now make as follows:—I never communicated, in any way, to any one tenders or prices of tenders, or relative positions of tenders, or names of tenderers at any time, before the contract was allotted and signed and the work in progress, the only persons having the same information being the members of the Privy Council and such of the officers of my department as were entrusted with the opening of tenders after the period fixed for their reception. I never found or knew any such or other officers of my department to be guilty of any indiscretion or breach of trust in connection with any tender or contract. Tenders accepted have been and are so accepted, according to law. If the parties named in the motion as having contributed to a testimonial presented to me some eight or ten years ago have so contributed to it I never asked them to do so, and up to this moment I never knew them to have done so. Directly or indirectly I never asked the contractors named in the motion for money, cheques or notes, nor did I receive any such money, cheques or notes from them for my use, profit or advantage. I have no reason to suspect specially Mr. Perley of having done wrong in this matter. If he has done so, it is without my knowledge; and having known him for so many years as a faithful officer of my department, I cannot make up my mind to believe that he has done wrong, that he has violated his trust and rendered himself liable to be punished by the Government. In so far as the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) is concerned, he is in his place, and, of course, it is for him to say what he has to say. For my part, when the Committee on Privileges and Elections meet, I will be there ready to give any information in my power and to answer any questions put to me.

Mr. McGREEVY. Last year when this matter was brought before the House I was absent, but I left a statement with my hon. friend the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) to be read by him to the House. That statement was read by him in my absence. I adhere to that statement, and I state to the House to-day that the whole charge is false and untrue from beginning to end. It is a foul conspiracy concocted by a clique to damage me for their own benefit, because I would not be their tool and instrument to obtain for them what they wanted. They used my name on more than one occasion, not only by writing letters in my name, but even by forging my name. I am prepared to prove that there are letters written in the department in my name which I never signed. They made these statements because I would not do the work they wanted me to do. I am very glad this charge has been made, and I hope a speedy investigation will take place. I am prepared to defend myself, and the result will be that the whole thing will be proved a conspiracy and false from beginning to end. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), who takes up the case for those two parties whom I might call his associates, because the hon. gentleman has associated himself with them, has made statements and taken a position out of which I think he will have some difficulty in getting. I am prepared for a speedy and thorough investigation.

Mr. TARTE. I have only one word to add. I never associated myself——

Mr. McGREEVY. You have been always their associate.

Mr. TARTE. I never associated myself, never have been associated with the men who are named in the motion I have placed, Mr. Speaker, in your hands. My wish, my sincere wish, is that the words used by the hon. gentleman a moment ago may be found to be quite true, as I suppose he believes them to be. He speaks of forgery. Mr.

Speaker, if the letters signed in the hon. gentleman's name are proved to be forgeries, I will not only apologize to the House but I will have no other treatment to expect from this Parliament than to go out of it, and that very quickly.

Mr. EDGAR. As the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution has intimated that he would be quite satisfied if it went before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and as the hon. Minister of Public Works has suggested that it should go there, I beg to move an amendment to that effect. I move that the last paragraph of the said motion be expunged and the following substituted :—

That it be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to enquire fully into the said allegations, and especially, but without limiting the scope of such enquiry, to investigate all circumstances connected with the several tenders, contracts and changes therein, and the payments and other matters mentioned in the statements hereinbefore made, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation; and that the committee do report in full the evidence taken before them, and all their proceedings on the reference, and the result of their enquiries.

Amendment agreed to, and motion as amended agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. BERGERON moved :

That the time for the presentation of Private Bills be extended to Friday, 29th inst., in accordance with the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That a Select Committee, composed of Sir Adolphe Caron and Messieurs Amyot, Cockburn, Davies, Davin, Desjardins (Hochelaga), Desjardins (L'Islet), Edgar, Fraser, Kirkpatrick, Laurier, McNeill, Mills (Bothwell), O'Brien, Rinfret, Scriver, Weldon and White (Shelburne), be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That a Message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz.: Messieurs Amyot, Bergin, Bourassa, Caron (Sir Adolphe), Chapleau, Charlton, Davin, Desjardins (L'Islet), Grandbois, Innes, Kaulbach, Landerkin, Mackintosh, McLean, McMullen, Putnam, Rider, Somerville, Taylor, Tisdale and Trow, will act as members on the part of the House on said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

CODIFICATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 32) to codify the Criminal Law of Canada. He said : The object of this Bill is fully expressed by its title. It is intended to be a codification of the Criminal Law as well as of the Statutes relating to the Criminal Law of Canada, and it has been prepared principally on the model of the Imperial codification.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would enquire from the hon. Minister of Justice, whether he proposes to introduce any alterations, more or less, of the existing Criminal Law in this Bill, or whether it is to be confined wholly and entirely to the codification of the law as it now stands ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Bill includes a number of changes in the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are they changes of any considerable importance, because this is a matter of general interest?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are only of the nature of such amendments as will be made in the shape of a Bill to amend the Criminal Law generally. Fundamental changes such as have been discussed in the press during the last few months are not touched on by this Bill, because it is deemed better that they should form the subject of discussion during the progress of the Bill, or of other Bills which may be introduced. The scope of this Bill is confined to the codification of the laws, with ordinary and subordinate amendments.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the Minister of Justice whether the distinction between "misdemeanours" and "felonies" are preserved in the Bill, and if so, is there any change in that particular?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is proposed to abolish that distinction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If in this Bill the hon. gentleman has introduced a large number of necessary amendments to the existing law, it will be hardly possible, in view of the voluminous character of the Bill, to give it full consideration this session. I suppose the intention of the hon. gentleman is to print the Bill and to submit it for consideration, but that it will hardly go further than its second reading during the present session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Such is my intention. I propose the Bill should be read a second time, and I may then take the opportunity of stating briefly what the amendments are. It is desirable that a Bill of this extensive character should be circulated through the country and be very generally discussed. On the second reading of the Bill I will state briefly what were the changes, and ask the direction of the House whether it will be proceeded with further or deferred until next session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOCUMENTS PROMISED IN SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called I ask the Minister of Public Works, in the absence of the First Minister, where are the documents promised us in the Speech from the Throne, and which I understood the First Minister to say a week since, would be forthcoming on the earliest possible day?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the First Minister were here he could answer the hon. gentleman. I will take a note of the question and submit it to him.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. FLINT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government (Her Majesty's birthday this year falling upon Sunday) to fix by proclamation, the 25th day of May inst., or any other day for the celebration of the birthday of Her Majesty?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The day following the 24th May, is expected to be proclaimed as the day on which the Queen's birthday will be celebrated.

REVENUE FROM REGISTRATION.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What revenue has been derived from the sale of registration stamps by the Post Office Department during each year since 1882?

Mr. HAGGART. The revenue derived from the sale of registration stamps by the Post Office Department during each year since 1882 was as follows: In 1883, $61,769.50; 1884, $66,311.00; 1885, $66,444.50; 1886, $72,123.50; 1887, $74,032.50; 1888, $68,573.00; 1889, $73,310.00; 1890, $104,526.00.

WHARF AT CACOUNA, &c.

Mr. DELISLE (for Mr. CARROLL) asked, 1st. Whether the Government sent, during the course of last winter, instructions to George Lebel, farmer, of Cacouna, authorizing him to purchase timber to continue the work on the wharf at Cacouna, during the coming summer? 2nd. What is the date of these instructions? 3rd. What quantity of timber was he authorized to buy, and what was the price that he should have paid for it? 4th. What is the amount of expenditure up to date, on the dredging of the Du Loup River, in the County of Témiscouata? 5th. The names of the person or persons to whom this sum was paid?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 1st. No instructions were sent to George Lebel, of Cacouna, authorizing him to purchase timber. 2nd. Instructions were sent to Mr. Assistant Engineer Michaud on the 12th February. The amount was limited to $600. 3rd. Expended on dredging the River du Loup, $4,486.75 up to date. 4th. The dredging was done by day labour, and consisted of the removal of sand bars and obstructions, men being engaged by the day for the work as required, and their names and time returned on regular pay-lists.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Return giving the date at which the steamer Stanley commenced running between Prince Edward Island and the mainland in the fall of 1890, how many trips made, date of each trip, the number of passengers and the amount of freight taken to and from Prince Edward Island; the amount of money collected on account of passengers and the amount of freight; also the expenses of working said steamer during the winter of 1891, and the date at which said steamer stopped running from Prince Edward Island to the mainland.

He said: In connection with this motion I desire to say a few words, and they will be very few, because I am almost tired of bringing year after year before the notice of the Government and the House generally, the shameful way in which the passenger and mail service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland is being performed. We might reasonably expect that the service would be improved, but it has gone back fifty years. Last winter it was shamefully neglected; it was no better than the service of forty or fifty years ago, when we used the old-fashioned ice boats. This is not a mere Grit complaint, but it is one made by the friends of the Government. One of their own organs, a paper which is patronized by the Government to the amount of over $2,000 a year, complains bitterly of the neglect of the Government of Canada towards the people of Prince Edward Island; and when that is the case, you must come to the conclusion that the neglect was very serious. Last fall navigation closed a little earlier than usual, and when we might have expected that the boat would be waiting for the weather, and not the weather for the boat, at the time the steam navigation company's boats stopped, the Stanley was at Pictou. She was then ordered to Charlottetown, and by the time she made her first trip ten days had elapsed from the time the steamers stopped crossing, and all that time the people of the Island were without communication with the mainland. Does that look like Prince Edward Island being part of the Confederation? No; it looks more like exclusion. But I suppose the Government at that time did not anticipate an election; and as there were six representatives from the Island on the Opposition side, I suppose they came to the conclusion that it was not even a political sin to punish the people in that way. Now I am going to read an extract, not from a Grit paper, but from a Conservative paper published in Summerside, and well known to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Minister of Public Works, the right hon. leader of the Government, and in fact to every member of the Cabinet, because I see they are all getting that paper in the Departments, and are paying its publisher over $2,000 a year. Here is what the Summerside Journal said on the 11th of December, 1890:

"The steamer Stanley arrived at Charlottetown, from Pictou, about noon on Sunday last, but did not begin work for the season until yesterday, when she left Charlottetown for Pictou. The Island boats being laid up, we have had no mail here since Monday morning, when we received St. John papers of Friday and Halifax papers of Saturday. This is not a remarkably rapid mail service for this season of the year."

This is the first complaint that any paper supporting the Government in Prince Edward Island has made, and it is not half as strong as it should be. Unfortunately, I have no scraps cut from any Grit papers, and if I had I would be afraid that hon. gentlemen opposite would doubt the veracity of any statements I might read from a Grit paper complaining of the gross neglect of the Government of Canada towards Prince Edward Island. I find that the same paper, a short time afterwards, made the following statement:—

"Once upon a time the people of this province had mail communication with the outside world, and received their mail matter with tolerable regularity, even in winter. This custom, however, seems to have gone the way of many other old customs, and is rapidly becoming obsolete."

That puts me in mind of the policy of "Old Tomorrow" very much—

"We have, in a great measure, grown used to doing without foreign mails, and have learned to make the best of our environments. The days of Rip Van Winkle have apparently returned to us, and we are philosophically setting ourselves to forget all about the outside world, though we fear that there is still here and there some heretically inclined malcontent who sighs for the good old days when there was regular mail communication with our sister provinces."

Now, that is a sad complaint, and I am sure no one on the opposite side of the House will question the veracity of this statement, published as it is by a good Tory paper which has received over $2,000 from the Government the last year, for doing what I do not know. But in the Auditor General's Report it will be found that that paper was paid over $2,000, and it is not said what for—

"Never, in the history of Prince Edward Island, have our mail arrangements been so badly managed as they were during the month of December, which has just closed. Between the Island boats, the Stanley, and the ice-boats, each of which three lines was called into requisition during the month, we had little better than a weekly mail. But the very worst mismanagement, bungling, or whatever word best describes the condition of affairs, occurred at the latter end of last week. On Friday evening 150 bags of mail were at Cape Tormentine. These, instead of being brought over on Saturday by the ice-boats, which could easily have been done, were ordered back to Pictou, the Stanley having resumed work on Friday. The steamer left Georgetown for Pictou on Saturday afternoon, and returned on Sunday. By the time she left Pictou on that day, however, the mails that had been ordered around from Cape Tormentine had not reached Pictou, and the Stanley, instead of bringing over about 220 bags of mail, brought only about forty, or a single day's mail, and the delayed bags did not reach the Island until her next trip, on Wednesday. Is it any wonder that the people are indignant? The mail arrangement with this province seems to be growing worse year by year, and we believe that such an instance as that above alluded to has no parallel in our history. The only satisfactory winter route for the mails is that between the Capes, and for Heaven's sake let them be left on that route."

That goes to show there must be some great neglect somewhere. In my opinion there is too much red tape used. There are two departments connected with the carrying of the mails to Prince Edward Island; and it appears to me that nothing can be done either by the Inspector of Post Offices in Charlottetown or the Marine Agent there—not even the smallest action—without a direct order from the departments at Ottawa. If anything is required by either, he has to send his red tape to Ottawa to the Minister of Marine, and the Minister of Marine has to get more red tape, and I have no doubt the charges for red tape to and from Prince Edward Island will be enormous. The red tape has to come back, and when it comes back it has to go to Cape Tormentine and two or three other places. The one officer does not understand the other, the one contradicts the other, and through the mismanagement and neglect of the department at Ottawa—for I charge the whole business to the Minister of Marine himself—the people of the Island are ill-used and suffer. The hon. the Minister of Marine knows that, last fall, application was made by the merchants at Summerside to have the Stanley come up there and open the harbour, as there was just enough keen ice to keep back a dozen of sailing vessels. The merchants of Summerside put their heads together, and asked the Minister of Marine to allow the Stanley to go up the river. The Minister, after consideration, telegraphed that he would, provided the merchants would pay five hundred dollars for the use of the steamer. I am not going to argue the point whether it was right to charge that five hundred dollars, but I believe it was not. I believe, in lieu of being charged five hundred dollars, the merchants should have received encouragement, because we know this amount does not come directly out of the pockets of the merchants of Summerside, but out of the pockets of the farmers who grow the potatoes and other articles of export. The merchants of Summerside, however, were willing to pay the five hundred dollars, and notified the Agent of Marine and Fisheries at Charlottetown to that effect; but when they looked for the steamer, where was she? In lieu of being in Charlottetown ready to commence operations, she was in Pictou, and the merchants were told that there was not water enough in Shediac harbour to allow the steamer to go there. The Minister of Marine knows better than that. He knows very well that the Lansdowne, which draws more water than the Stanley, has been several times in Shediac and met with no impediment, but made her trips regularly and safely. Why not, therefore, have allowed the steamer Stanley to open up the harbour of Summerside, in order to set free those twelve vessels and their cargoes? What was the result of not sending the Stanley there? There was one thousand dollars expenses inflicted on the people of Summerside. They had hauled their produce to the wharf and loaded up the vessels, and were then obliged to unload their potatoes and barley and other products from the vessels and replace them in their granaries and cellars; and all this because they were misled by the telegram from the Minister that the steamer would be sent up. Thus, instead of helping these people to sell their products and enabling them to meet their bills at the banks, the people were obliged, at heavy expense, to unload their products and replace them in their granaries and cellars, and then meet their bills, I suppose, by borrowing at 7½ per cent. That is the way the people of my county are used. Is it any wonder then that the people of Prince County will not send a member here to support the Government? It is not necessary for a Grit candidate to canvass in Prince County. It is in every one's mouth, even the mouths of those too young to be entitled to vote, that the people of Prince County are wronged, that their interests are overlooked by the Government of Canada, as is shown by the articles I have read. We find further that the High Commissioner at London had a great notion of coming across to the Island, just about the time of the elections. He went all the way to Pictou, where I dare say his presence was required, but when he got there he found the steamer was not crossing, and he telegraphed to Mr. Ferguson of Charlottetown, the Government candidate and a very busy candidate, a strong canvasser and an able man, who, I should not wonder, will be rewarded in a day or two, as there is now a vacancy in the Chamber reserved for starving politicians. He sent Mr. Ferguson the following telegram:—

"I regret deeply it is impossible for me to go to the Island, as the Stanley cannot cross and I dare not attempt the Capes."

The High Commissioner says he dares not attempt the Capes. Well, I have to attempt them, and even the Minister of Marine, if he came there, would have to attempt them. These gentlemen do not know what troubles we have to contend against. They are here quite satisfied, drawing their $8,000 a year, without having to cross the Straits, and without having to work very hard. Their travelling expenses are paid, even their cab-hire is paid; and they have no sympathy with the poor people of the Island whose money is extracted from them to enable the Government to pay these nonsensical expenses. The High Commissioner says: "I have satisfied myself that the tunnel can be made for $6,000,000 and you may rely upon all the aid I can give to the completion of that important work." We have the assurance of the High Commissioner in all his dignity, in all his importance, in all his grandeur, that he will induce the Government to expend $6,000,000 to build that tunnel. We had a telegram the other day from—I do not know whether to call him Senator—I suppose he is the ex-Senator—he resigned his Senatorship to run during the last elections and he was not elected—I do not know that he has been re-appointed—I do not think he has—if I am mistaken, he may be a Senator still, but I will not believe it, unless a Minister of the Crown gets up and says so—so I will speak of him as ex-Senator Howlan—and he said that $5,000,000 was the estimate made for the building of that tunnel by Mr. Fox. Mr. Fox says that a tunnel of sixteen-feet diameter will cost $10,000,000, and one of eighteen feet $11,000,000. I can hardly reconcile these different statements, but I am not an engineer, and I do not know whether a twelve-foot tunnel is sufficient to keep up communication between the Island and the mainland. I leave that to the Government and to Mr. Fox. If Mr. Fox says it is sufficient, I am satisfied, and if the Government is told by Mr. Fox that a sufficient tunnel can be be built for $5,000,000, I say they cannot back down from their pledge. The right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government has repeatedly stated that he would at once commence operations on that tunnel, if the cost were within reason. In February last, the High Commissioner stated what I have read, and we have the promise of the leader of the Opposition that he will back him up, and I am sure that every member here will back up the present Government, if they have the manliness and courage to proceed with this work; but, in the name of common sense, do not go on humbugging about it and keeping it off till the next election. I am satisfied that, without that tunnel, or some other means of communication, the Dominion Government will not have redeemed their solemn pledge, their solemn promise, their solemn compact, entered into with the people of Prince Edward Island at the time of the Union. The terms were, that they would maintain continuous and efficient means of communication between the Island and the mainland both in winter and in summer. First of all, they put on the Northern Light. That was run down by the Conservative Dominion Government, but that vessel never did worse during the winters she ran than the Stanley did last winter. We have here statements from newspapers showing that, if the Stanley could do no better than she did last winter, it would be throwing away $150,000 of the people's money. When the Government saw that the Stanley could not carry on that communication, they should have had their mails carried by the Capes, but they did not, and for a month or six weeks we had a mail only once in about ten days, instead of a mail every day. I do not wonder so much at the Government using the people of Prince Edward Island in that way, when we remember the manner in which they dealt with the vessel that was stranded near Cape Tormentine last fall. That vessel was stranded about a mile from the shore, and if one of the Government ice-boats had been got at the time, the lives of the people could have been saved. I am not going to make a direct charge against the Minister of Marine for the loss of the lives of these people, but I say that, if they had proper officers, the three or four lives might have been saved. The assertion made at that time has never been contradicted—that, when that vessel struck, a hardy son of Neptune started from the shore with a small dory and managed to get near the vessel, but had to return. The Government officials had to telegraph to Charlottetown to Mr. Lord for the use of a Government boat, and by that time the storm had increased and night had set in, and they could not get out to the stranded vessel. The result was that three or four lives were lost. It is no wonder, then, that the same or worse takes place in regard to the people of Prince Edward Island. If the Government are honest—and I have grave doubts as to whether they are—they will at once go to work and cause these estimates to be brought to Ottawa and submitted to Parliament, and then Parliament can allow the Government to build the tunnel, that being, as I am convinced, the only means by which it is possible to redeem the agreement made with Prince Edward Island at the time of the Union. Some years ago the Government were told by the Colonial Minister at home that it was their duty to carry out that agreement, that there only remained that link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, with the exception of Newfoundland, to complete the Confederation; and, until they do that, they will not have completed the promises and pledges they have made. I think the House will readily understand that the people of Prince Edward Island have been badly used, and we know that on the eve of the election they were in a fuss about that. We know that Mr. Howlan resigned his seat, and came down to Prince County to run the election, but the people did not elect him. I do not know whether they elected as good men, but the people have every right to elect whom they please. There is no doubt that a great deal of influence was brought to bear on the electors, but the electors of Prince County are an exception to the general rule as far as honesty and sincerity are concerned. I can say that there is no use in sending the money bags or in making misrepresentations, or in holding out the bait as to what is going to be done, to seduce the people of that county. The fact is, that the people have got sick of false promises, and any bird who will go flying among those people with these promises will find himself deceived. I would give a piece of advice to the Minister of Marine, and that is, that next winter he should let the steamer Stanley not remain on exhibition at Pictou, that he should allow the steamer to wait for the weather and not expect the weather to be waiting for the steamer. Although these gentlemen told us a few years ago that they had power over the elements, I do not believe they have. The winter will come whether they like it or no, and they have no right to leave that boat at Pictou on exhibition when she ought to be crossing the Straits. Our merchants and farmers hold back their produce as late as possible, to take advantage of the prices. They hold their produce back until the price rises, and then when they want to carry it across they are denied that privilege by the Minister of Marine. He says he gave orders to others, but I hold that he is himself to blame and nobody else; and I tell him now that I hope the time has come when he will repair the harm he has committed against the people of Prince Edward Island. I intend to press this question before the Government. I intend to know what they intend to do about it; I intend to know officially if they have received the estimates made by their engineer, and I intend to know officially from them if they intend to carry out the work according to his estimate. I intend to know from them what they intend to do. It is time that we should have an answer, yes or no; it is time to do away with this humbugging business; it is time the people should know where they are; it is time the people should know whether we have a Government in Ottawa or not. Sir, it is time that they should pronounce themselves in this matter, it is full time that we should know who the Government are. The Government will be asked what they are going to do, and they will have to answer it. If the Government are not prepared to build a tunnel, if the estimated cost is too large to warrant them in undertaking the work, then I shall ask the Government to give a yearly amount of compensation to the Island to meet the claim they had since 1873. And how has their claim been met? We sent delegates from the Island in 1885; the Conservative Government sent delegates, who laid at the foot of the Throne their claim for $5,000,000. Do the Government mean to say that they can make the people of Prince Edward Island accountable for the $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 spent in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, in building these branches in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? The Government will know best for what purpose they were built. I do not see why we should have three lines of railway there to compete with one another. And the Ship Railway—is there any article of Confederation, or any agreement, that would bind the Government to build that Chignecto Ship Railway? I want to ask the members of the Government if they are prepared to come forward and redeem the pledge which some of them signed with their own hands? I believe the Minister of Public Works is one of the men who took his pen and signed these terms; I think the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government is another who signed that paper. I do not see how these men can stand up before the members of Prince Edward Island without blushing when we make our just complaints. I think they were born without the ability to blush. I will now drop this subject till another time, and when the House goes into Supply by-and-bye, I will have another whack at the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not intend to make a speech on this matter, but I want to say a word or two before the Minister of Marine replies. I endorse a great deal of what my hon. friend (Mr. Perry) has said with reference to the treatment the Island has received. I wish to confine my complaint chiefly to the action of the Marine Department and the Post Office Department in the carriage of the mails, and in conducting that service at the critical period of the year when the summer ends and the winter begins. I have taken occasion more than once to offer my congratulations to the Government on having provided such an excellent boat as we have now, to perform the service there. I have no complaint whatever to make about the boat. In such ice as she has encountered during the last two years, she has done most remarkably well, and I indulge the hope, although it is only a hope, that even when she meets with larger ice, she may prove a successful venture. I have talked with a good many of those who are good judges, and I think the universal opinion is that she is an excellent boat. Now, what complaint have we got to make with reference to the management of the boat? In the first place, the boat having been built for the service of Prince Edward Island, I think the Minister would have been well advised had he left that boat ready prepared to begin the service in the harbour of Georgetown, or Charlottetown, instead of on the mainland in the town of Pictou. I think that has been the incipient mistake the hon. gentleman has made. Secondly, he made a graver mistake in not having her ready for sea when the time came that she should put out to sea, and the consequence was that both the mercantile public of the Island and the agricultural people of the Island sustained very grave and serious loss at this particular period of the year when it is absolutely essential to them that there should be steady communication. Hon. gentlemen know that we are situated in that peculiar way that we have to do all our shipping in three or four weeks in the fall of the year, and it is absolutely essential for the proper carrying out of the commerce of the country that during that period, and especially at that period, if at all practicable and possible, daily communication should be preserved. Just at that period when it was required, the hon. gentleman had his boat laid up in the town of Pictou, unprepared to go to sea, and there she remained nine or ten days during which time we had no service at all. Now, I cannot attempt to go into the figures of the loss which the Island sustained by reason of this interruption of communication. I know the Board of Trade complained most bitterly about it. I know I attended a meeting of that Board of Trade and I pointed out the steps that I had taken from year to year in this matter, and I ventured to point out where I thought the error lay. From year to year I have pointed out one remedy. What is that remedy? It is the appointment of some agent on the Island, or in the vesting in one of the agents now appointed there, of sufficient authority to control the running of that boat. The agent of the Minister of Marine and the Postmaster of the Island have no authority to act except under orders from Ottawa. Every order, whether it is to lay the boat up, or whether it is to hire men to start the boat, or for incurring a dollar's expense, must be communicated first by the agent to Ottawa, and afterwards orders must be sent down. Therefore, there passes a lot of red tape telegrams between the agents and deputies of the Post Office and Marine Departments, and after the Board of Trade have intervened, and after an immense deal of friction and great deal of trouble and irritation, the machinery is got to work. That should not be so. The Minister of Marine has a gentleman there as his agent in whom he has, or ought to have, great confidence. I want to ask him why authority is not given to that agent to control, in conjunction with the captain of the boat—who is a remarkably able and experienced seaman, one in whom, I think, the whole public have great confidence—why, in conjunction with the captain, the Minister of Marine has not given the necessary authority to this agent? I have proposed that every year. It is the one weakness from which emanates all the trouble, or nearly all, and I do not know how it is that the mails cannot be sent by the Stanley. The postmaster in the Island has not the authority to send them by way of the Capes or the Stanley as the circumstances may require.

Mr. HAGGART. He has.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I waited on him, in company with other gentlemen, last autumn, and he said he could not send them by the Capes unless he obtained authority from Ottawa. The Deputy of the Minister of Marine also said he had no authority to do so unless he received instructions from Ottawa. I understand the Deputy of the Minister of Marine went down there subsequently—I was sick at the time—and had an interview with the Board of Trade, and a circular was issued by him promising better things in the future. I wish to point out that I am not complaining of the boat, for she is a good boat, and I believe we have a fairly good service at the Capes—I have no complaint to make in that regard at all; but I do complain of the departmental management, which results in the Island being deprived, during ten of the most critical days, of the daily mail service which the people had a right to possess. I think the Minister is very much to blame in not putting the Stanley into commission in Charlottetown or Georgetown instead of at Pictou. No doubt the hon. gentleman could give some little patronage to his supporters at Pictou, but he could only do so at the expense of the service, and I maintain he did so when he tied up the boat and left it, as was done. It is not possible to blame the officers of the boat; I never heard any complaints against them yet, for they are good men. Mr. Finlayson has had ten years' experience—twelve years, my hon. friend tells me—and he is an excellent officer. The boat is a good boat, and if she were placed in the best possible condition no loss of time would be necessary. I will not enter for even one moment upon the very large and important question of the construction of the tunnel, which my hon. friend has raised. I will not enter into it for one or two reasons. First, we have the solemn pledge in writing given by the leader of the Government, that if it can be shown by scientific men that a tunnel is capable of being built for a reasonable sum, the Government will bring down the estimate, and that the right hon. gentleman will use his influence to induce the House to pass it. We have the further pledge of the High Commissioner, who was the responsible Government authority in the Maritime Provinces at the last election, over his own signature, that he had examined into the matter thoroughly and satisfied himself that a tunnel could be built for six or seven millions, and the construction of it would have his earnest, energetic and constant support. I cannot doubt, at all events at this stage of the session I will not doubt, that with the pledge given by the leader of the Government and the other pledge given by the High Commissioner, the project will be carried out, and so I will refrain at present from discussing it. Perhaps the hon. Minister will state to the House whether Mr. Douglas Fox has sent any figures or estimates as to the cost of the tunnel. If the hon. gentleman can answer this enquiry, it may avoid the necessity of placing a question on the Notice paper.

Mr. TUPPER. I desire, before the motion is carried, to add, with the consent of the mover, the words, "together with the report of the Deputy Minister of Marine, dated 5th March, 1891, touching the steamer." It would have been well, I think, if the hon. gentleman who moved the motion had waited until the House was placed in possession of the facts connected with the stoppage of the running on several occasions of the Stanley during the past extraordinarily severe winter. No one regretted more than I did that communication between the Island and the mainland was stopped on several occasions during that season, sometimes for quite a long period. Owing to that stoppage great inconvenience was suffered by the people as regards both trade and correspondence; but notwithstanding the speeches delivered to-day in connection with the supposed maladministration of my office, the report of the Deputy and the facts of the case will show that my Department and I, if the hon. gentleman prefers it, can only be held responsible for a delay of three days during the whole season. It is for that reason I regret that the hon. gentleman, previous to the official statements being brought before the House, should have occupied so much time of this body by alluding to what I fear he hoped the facts would show, that I had been guilty of great negligence in the management of this great and important service. The hon. gentleman entirely neglected to allude to the satisfactory service performed during the previous winter, when the Stanley was tried for the first time. In fact, the hon. gentleman had very little to do in the last House after the service had been made so satisfactory. I am not aware that he tendered his compliments to myself or the Government during last session for having brought about such a state of things that almost uninterrupted communication was had between the mainland and the Island; he has forgotten entirely to give credit where credit is due, but he has sought, as I think, to fasten on my Department a charge, which it is impossible, when the facts of the case are known, to lay at the door of that Department. I may say briefly, in anticipation of that report, that the whole trouble occurred through the ship's captain and officers having filled the boilers with salt water instead of having taken in fresh water at the beginning of the season, and that necessitated the ship lying up at Charlottetown for three days after the Island boats had ceased running, instead of the boat beginning, as the Department had hoped, at the very instant those boats had stopped running. Hon. members from the Island will recollect that the custom had been, and the custom had not been complained of during the last season, for the Government steamer not to go on the route until the regular boats had stopped running, and the Department was to watch for the occasion, and be ready promptly to place their steamer on the route. There was no fixed date for the Government steamer to go on the route, the idea being, I suppose, not to compete with the owners of the private vessels which do the service during the season, unfairly or unduly by a Government boat; and no request, so far as I am aware, has ever been made to the Department or to the Government that the Government boat should go and compete with the private vessels for the business that comes over that route. The people of the Island had not asked the country in general to support two services at the same time, they had not desired that we shoul l keep the Cape service in operation and also the Stanley at work. The system was that the Capes boat service should not go into operation until the Stanley was unable to make a passage. At the beginning of the season we commenced with the practice that had worked so well during the previous season, and the great difficulties met with were not anticipated in the slightest degree. But so anxious was I that no inconvenience should be suffered by the people of the Island, that the moment the Stanley came off the Fisheries Protection service, I gave orders that no steps should be left untaken to fit out the vessel so that the moment the Island vessels stopped running, she should proceed and do the work as well as it was possible to be done. These instructions were clear and distinct, they were sent to the ship, which was ordered not to be laid up at Pictou, but which came off duty at Pictou. It was considered, and I still consider it the most convenient thing as far as the public is concerned, to have the vessel ready on the mainland to carry the orders and instructions from the mainland and to begin the service from the mainland to Prince Edward Island. I take it that, even in the opinion of the people of Prince Edward Island, that is the smallest question connected with this matter. These instructions were given to the officers of the ship, and no one in the House will imagine that it should have been considered necessary for me to state distinctly and clearly that fresh water instead of salt water, was to be used for the boilers of that steamer. No specific directions on that head were given. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) testified to the ability and to the good service of the captain of that ship—and I am not condemning the captain now. I had every reason, therefore, to suppose that these instructions to a captain who had managed that service for so long a time, in poor boats as well as in this good steamer, would cause him to take all the measures necessary to properly carry out the service. He was trammelled in no respect by instructions to do anything which would involve delay, but the facts are, that having taken the salt water, and it not being safe for the ship or good for the boilers, he found himself in Charlottetown during a sudden spell of cold weather, the regular boat was stopped, and consequently it took him three days to get ready for the regular service. I have to apologise to the hon. gentlemen, under these circumstances, for the delay caused, and for the inconvenience which I know they suffered, but I am glad to say that when this report is brought down it will show that the other delay occurred through a leak in the steam pipe. The official report of Mr. Stevens, Inspector of Boilers and Steamboats, which is now in the Department, states that this was an accident which could not have been foreseen, and that it was an extraordinary thing that the leak was discovered in such seasonable time. For this there can be no responsibility attaching to the Department. For the exceptionally severe weather, even the most violent politician—not excepting my hon. friend the mover of this motion—will not attempt to hold me responsible. So far as that unfortunate occurrence at Cape Tormentine is concerned, I am glad to know from the officers who have reported on the matter, that had the keeper of that boat exercised ordinary intelligence and used the boat instantly he thought it was needed, the boat could have rendered no service whatever. I trust that this report is correct, for I would be sorry to think that the hesitation of an officer under such circumstances, should contribute to the loss of life. If the hon. gentleman is anxious to see these papers and moves for them, he will find that no one connected with the Department of Marine can be held responsible for the sad event that occurred. Now, in reference to the tunnel. I do not think that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) considers that this matter is under my particular charge. The name of the High Commissioner was mentioned as having given a strong assurance upon that subject, but the hon. gentleman knows very well that the hon. the leader of the Opposition, who sits very close to him, and who, I regret to say, is absent to-day on account of ill-health, sent him a message which gave him some pleasing assurances during that same election. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Queen's having the assurance of the High Commissioner, and the assurance of the leader of the Opposition, that the tunnel shall be built at the earliest possible moment, will, after consideration, admit that it would be superfluous for me to add my assurance to such weighty assurances as these.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope, nevertheless, that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will give us his assistance in this matter.

Mr. TUPPER. I have no doubt that if I could get rid of the annual motions connected with the Stanley and the communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and that if all my hon. friends, both members of the Opposition and those supporting the Government, would be happy and silent upon these questions, it would be well worth my while to support it. I cannot, of course, anticipate what the information on this subject will be, but when the Government is in a position to have the information, I hope it will be such as to enable the Government to deal with the question in the direction which the hon. members representing Prince Edward Island so much desire. I suppose the hon. gentleman will consent to the addition of the words "including the report of the Deputy Minister of Marine, dated the 5th day of March, 1890, touching on this subject."

Mr. PERRY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the hon. Minister to include in this amendment, "the correspondence, telegrams and representations made to the Post Office and Marine Departments, touching the mail and steamboat service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland," which preceded the visit of the Deputy Minister and which went to make up that report.

Mr. TUPPER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In justification of the amendment which I have suggested, I may say that representations were made to the Post Office and Marine Departments by the Board of Trade on this subject, and it was owing to these representations that the Deputy Minister of Marine paid his official visit to the Island and conducted the investigation which resulted in the report which the Minister now wishes to bring down. I desire to recall the attention of the House to the fact, that while the Minister of Marine has made a lengthy defence of himself and his Department on this occasion, he has not thought fit to answer the only complaint I made, and the only question I asked him. I ask again, is he prepared to recommend or appoint an officer in the Island who will have authority to deal in some measure with this much vexed question? The House complains, though not very bitterly, that this is an annual complaint, that it is perennial, and that we are never done talking about it; but we must complain about it until the evil is remedied. If the Minister will appoint an officer, having his confidence, who will have authority to deal with the question as to whether the boat shall leave or shall not leave, and as by what means the mail shall be forwarded, he will, I think, find that these difficulties will cease. I believe I have a right to ask an assurance from the hon. gentleman that he will do that.

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly. I have no intention to pass by any point which the hon. gentleman wishes to press. I have no reason, and the papers will show no reason, for any arrangement in connection with the management of the Stanley or of the Marine service of Prince Edward Island, other than obtains all over Canada. The hon. gentleman must know that my predecessors, both in the Liberal Administration and the present Administration, from Confederation down, have found it impossible to conduct the business of the Department, concerned as it is with interests in every Province and every part of every Province, without an agent or representative in these different districts. The papers will show, as I believe I have already pointed out, that no matter what arrangement had been in force, whether we had given greater responsibility to the representative of the Department in Prince Edward Island than we would think of giving to a representative of the Department in any other place, all that did happen would have happened. The delay that gave rise to the cause of complaint was not due to any trouble connected with the agent, nor to any want of authority on the part of the agent at Charlottetown, but to the fact that the mistake was made of putting salt water into the ship when they should have taken fresh water, and because the instructions, which were so distinct, and which ordered the doing of everything necessary to have that ship ready for sea and ready for the service the moment the other ships went off the route, were not properly interpreted. Under any arrangement, or under any division of control which the hon. gentleman can conceive, how is it possible that this would have been avoided when, as I say, the instructions from the head office were of that character, giving the responsible men, the men immediately concerned in the ship, not only the discretion, but commanding and directing them to do everything necessary to fit the ship for sea and to make her ready for service. I think that is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman's suggestion. The time has not yet come when any different arrangement can be made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand from the hon. gentleman that he does not see fit to change the existing arrangements. Of course I shall have to be satisfied with that explanation, and he will have to be satisfied with the responsibility of having made it.

Mr. TUPPER. Until we get the tunnel.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, we will see. I wish I could get the assurance of the hon. gentleman that in Council he would back up the High Commissioner and the First Minister and do what he could to forward it. He has not yet said that he will. If he has any sympathy with the project, I would be glad to hear him say so now; it is a very good opportunity. But, Sir, in relation to the Stanley the hon. gentleman, in throwing upon the officers instead of upon the Department the responsibility for the delay—he says three days, but I say nine days—is hardly dealing fairly with his officer, for he knows that fresh water could not be obtained at Pictou.

Mr. TUPPER. I know nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As a matter of fact, it was not obtained.

Mr. TUPPER. It was not, but could have been.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am instructed that it could not be. As a matter of fact, the boat had to go to Charlottetown to get fresh water, and that is where she should have been at first; and if the Minister had given the proper order, the service would have been carried on, everyone would have been satisfied, and we would not be wearying this House with this complaint. But he chooses to say that he will not change the present system, which causes so much annoyance, inconvenience and loss to the people of the Island, and imposes on their representatives the necessity of bringing the matter up constantly in this House until we get it remedied.

Mr. HAGGART. The debate has taken a wider range than seemed to be necessary from the motion before the House. There was nothing in the motion to lead anyone to expect that there would be any reference to the Post Office authorities, or I would have had the papers here for the purpose of answering the hon. gentleman. He states that certain complaints made by the Board of Trade to the Post Office Department have not been attended to, and that if they had been attended to, and the officers in Prince Edward Island had had the powers they ought to have had, there would have been none of the delays and annoyance resulting from the non-delivery of the mails. I may state that on receiving representations, I do not remember whether from the hon. gentleman or from the Board of Trade, that powers should be given to an officer of the Department for the purpose of getting the mails across the Strait, my memory is that I gave instructions that the officer on the Island should have full power to have the mails sent across in the most convenient and expeditious manner. With regard to postal matters on the Island, let me draw your attention to one or two facts. The total amount of the postal receipts from the Island are in the neighbourhood of $22,000, which, when the amount paid for commissions, &c., is deducted, is reduced to a little less than $19,000. On the other hand, we pay for the transport of the mails on the Island $13,000, and for carrying the mails on the railroad $17,577, independent of supplies which are sent to every post office throughout the Dominion. That is the cost to the Dominion, independent of the amount charged to the postal authorities for the transport of the mails across the strait by the Stanley. Whether the service is efficiently performed or not, the postal receipts from Prince Edward Island are the smallest in proportion to population of any part of the Dominion. We are expending a good deal more than double what we receive in the shape of postal revenue, for the purpose of accommodating the people of the Island with post offices and providing for the proper delivery of their postal matter.

Mr. PERRY. The hon. the Postmaster General has made a very feeble attempt to defend the Government. In fact, if that is the line of policy the Government wish to pursue, why not shut up the Intercolonial and the Prince Edward Island railways altogether?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why not shut up every canal in the Dominion, on which is lost $200,000 a year?

Mr. PERRY. Why not cut off British Columbia for the same reason? The hon. Minister says that the receipts from Prince Edward Island do not meet the expenditure. Show me one place in the Dominion where the receipts meet the expenditure. It is a preposterous argument; he must think we are fools to be influenced by such a statement as that—because the revenue does not meet the expenditure, we will close the mails, we will shut up the railway, we will give them no steam communication! Sir, I hope the hon. gentleman will never look for a constituency in Prince Edward Island; I hope he will go somewhere else; he will get none there; he would be laughed at by the boys of Prince Edward Island. It is shameful. No wonder the hon. gentleman puts his hands before his face. Is that the policy the Government are going to carry out—that because the postal revenue of Prince Edward Island does not meet the expenditure, because the revenue from the piers and breakwaters and wharves does not meet the expenditure, we are to have no grants of money for these objects; because the Intercolonial Railway sinks $500,000 or $600,000 a year for political accommodation, to take voters from Dalhousie to Moncton and from Moncton to somewhere else to cast their votes for the Government, they are going to give it up! That railway is a political engine for the Government, and so is the Prince Edward Island Railway. Hundreds of dollars were spent to carry people on that railway during the last election to vote for the Government, and I believe that money has been recouped by the Government; I will find that out one of these days if I can get to the bottom of the bag. It is time that members from Prince Edward Island should begin to look for their rights. The hon. Postmaster General ought to know that the people of Prince Edward Island are paying interest on $7,000,000 for building the Canadian Pacific Railway through the Province of Ontario, and for branch railways and other public works which we have not got on the Island. We are paying interest on one-fortieth of the debt of Canada, and what share of justice have we got? And here is a man, a Minister of the Crown who dares stand up and say: We will starve you! Prince Edward Island. Thank Heaven, he cannot do that. We have plenty of potatoes, pork and beef; and he may thank his penurious policy for the high tariff Bill which it incited McKinley to introduce; but, thank Heaven, we have plenty of eggs yet.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER AT STE. CROIX.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council, letters, correspondence, and documents of every nature respecting the resignation of James Thurber, Esq., Lieut-Colonel of the Sedentary Militia, in the County of Lotbinière ; the appointment of his son, Mr. William Thurber, as lighthouse keeper in the Parish of Ste. Croix ; and the refusal of the Government to grant to the said James Thurber, Esq., the amount claimed by him as his superannuation allowance.

He said : In introducing this motion, I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks and give some explanations which might be of use to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the preparation of the Estimates. Lt.-Col. Thurber resigned his position of keeper of a lighthouse in the Parish of Ste. Croix, in the month of September, 1878, through the agency of Hon. Mr. Joly, then Premier of the Province of Quebec, who was in Ottawa at the time. In offering this resignation, Hon. Mr. Joly asked for the appointment of Lt.-Col. Thurber's son in his father's stead. On Mr. Joly's request the appointment was made by the Department. It was natural that in resigning, Mr. Thurber, who had been thirty-one years in the service of the Government, should expect to receive the pension to which he was entitled. However, during the twelve years which followed no pension was paid him. In March, 1881, Lt.-Col. Thurber applied to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to obtain redress, and the hon. Minister answered him that he had referred the question to the Council, and that he was almost sure to get his pension allowed. However, Mr. Speaker, two or three months later, instead of the money which he expected as his pension, he received a letter from the Department, in which he was informed that the Government could not grant him this pension because the Hon. Mr. Joly had waived it for him in asking for his son's appointment, and that as he was no more a member of the Civil Service it was too late for him to ask for such a pension. There was evidently a misunderstanding in connection with this question, for Lt.-Col. Thurber, before resigning his office, had addressed to the Department of Marine and Fisheries a letter in which he formally stated that he did not want to forego his pension. In fact here is a copy of that letter :

"I have the honour to inform you that I am forced to resign my position as lighthouse keeper in the Parish of Ste. Croix, in the County of Lotbinière, which I have held ever since 1842. You would do me a great favour, and, I believe, would do me justice, by appointing in my stead my son, John Thurber, who has all the necessary qualifications for the position. I have always paid the percentage required by your Department to entitle me to superannuation, and I feel sure that my two requests, viz., my son's appointment and the granting of my pension will meet with no obstacle."

In the face of this letter, which bears the date of 14th September, 1878, and which was received in the Department before the acceptation of Lt.-Col. Thurber's resignation and the appointment of his son, William Thurber, the Department holds that Lt.-Col. Thurber has no right to a pension because Mr. Joly is said to have agreed to his waiving it, although Mr. Joly does not remember any such transaction. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the least that can be said, is, that there has been a misunderstanding somewhere. It will be possible to find the error when the documents shall have been put before us, and it is my intention to bring up the question when the House is better informed about the facts. But one thing is perfectly certain, that is, that if some error has been made, Lt.-Col. Thurber should in all justice receive his pension, after having been thirty-two years in the Government's service, and resigned at the age of seventy-one on account of ill-health. In any event, if there were any irregularities in connection with his resignation, I hope that the Government will overlook them, and that it will grant him this pension to which he is certainly entitled. Mr. Speaker, I leave this motion in your hands, and I hope the Government will take it into serious consideration.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no objection, so far as I am aware, to the motion. The subject to which the hon. gentleman alludes is rather ancient, and I do not think it has ever come before me, but when the papers are brought down the hon. gentleman will see how the matter stands.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing how many yards of cotton sail duck have been imported at Halifax, Nova Scotia, from the 30th June, 1889, to 30th June, 1890, and from 30th June, 1890, to 30th December, 1890, and the value of such importation respectively.—(Mr. White, Shelburne.)

ADJOURNMENT—STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. EDGAR. I would ask the leader of the Government, when the Standing Committees will be called together for organization. While there is not any work for some, there is for others—the Standing Orders Committee and the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Standing Orders Committee has been called, and the others we will arrange in the morning.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 33) to amend the North-West Territories Act. He said : The Bill needs but little explanation, at least one portion of it, when one remembers the long discussion which took place with reference to this subject at the last session of the last Parliament. I would only say now, that the object I have in view is to repeal the clause with reference to the dual language in the North-West Territories, and I do so because I am convinced that the direction in the North-West Territories Act that there shall be two official languages in the country is calculated to perpetuate race distinctions which it ought to be, and which I hope it is, the object of this House to do away with. I believe I was able to show that, however some hon. gentlemen thought the measure was a harsh one, it was at all events in the right direction so far as these North-West Territories are concerned. It is, of course, well to remember that this Bill merely deals with the North-West Territories and that the right to the dual language is one based upon the British North America Act, and is to be found in that enactment alone. It is not a right conferred upon our French Canadian subjects at the time of the cession of the old Province of Quebec to the British Crown, and is not to be found earlier than the date of the British North America Act, and in that it is limited to the proceedings of this House, the proceedings of the Senate, and the proceedings of the Assembly of the Province of Quebec. No one who has given any attention to this subject can be otherwise than convinced that the perpetuation of these race distinctions is not in the public interest, and that nothing is more calculated to prevent the growth of the common nationality of the people of the Dominion than the encouragement of the additional language in the French tongue. I do not desire to interfere with the right which everyone has to speak in any language which seems right to him, but I desire to prevent anything which will foster race distinctions in our North-West without warrant, and, as I believe, without public object or public benefit. This Bill, however, goes further than that of last Session, in that it purports to deal with the school question. According to the genius of our constitution, as defined in the British North America Act, the subject of education is one belonging exclusively to the Provinces, is one of local concern to be dealt with by the Provinces. It is true that, owing to difficulties which existed in the old Province of Canada, there are certain limitations and restrictions in regard to school matters imposed upon the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but these restrictions end there, and I know no good reason why the people in the North-West Territories should be limited or restricted in the matter of education. As the law now stands, separate schools are made imperative. Wherever there are two religious communities, there is the right to have separate schools. I propose not to interfere with that, but simply to give to the people of the North-West the right to deal with the question of education as to them seems fit. My Bill is, perhaps, not so objectionable in another respect as the one of last year, because I omit the preamble, which to some of my friends, was a stumbling block. I have found that hon. gentlemen who were quite willing to adopt the enacting part of the Bill, hesitated somewhat at the wide terms of the preamble. That preamble, of course, was unnecessary for the purposes of the enacting clause, and as I have no desire to increase the difficulties, already sufficiently great, that I have before me in order to repeal this particular clause, I have left out the preamble in this short Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NEW CANAL—NORTH SIDE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. McLENNAN asked, Whether an Order in Council has been made authorizing the construction of a canal on the north side of the River St. Lawrence, in the County of Soulanges, Province of Quebec; and if so, at what date has said Order been passed? Has a survey been made? How much has been already paid for survey and other expenses connected therewith; the probable estimated cost of said canal; and whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed at an early date with its construction?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. An Order in Council was passed on the 7th February, 1891. A survey has been made, and there has been paid for the survey and other expenses connected with it, $28,151. The probable cost of the canal is $4,800,000. It is the intention of the Government to proceed at an early date with its construction.

Did he hold the office of High Commissioner during the time he acted as electioneering agent for the Government at the recent elections? If not, who held the office? Was any salary or travelling allowance granted him during the time he was engaged in the elections, either as High Commissioner or as election agent? If so, how much? Was it by the direction of the Government that he canvassed the County of Essex in conjunction with Mr. Solomon White, an avowed annexationist?

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to say that Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, did not receive from the people of Canada in the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1890, the sums mentioned, amounting in all to $25,970.04. Sir Charles Tupper has held the office of High Commissioner continuously from the time of his last appointment, shortly after his resignation of the Finance Ministership of this Government. There are two other questions which, while asking partly for information, contain allegations of facts, so I shall not answer them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Minister indicates that I have stated facts in the question?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not state that they were facts, but that they were allegations of facts—quite different.

LATE GENERAL ELECTION—RECOUNTS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether a recount took place in any constituency since the general election, after the member had been gazetted? If so, where, and was it regular; if not, is it necessary for the member to be re-gazetted?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes, in the constituencies of North Bruce and East Grey. Both members were gazetted on the 14th March, although a recount of votes took place on the 17th in the former, and on the 19th in the latter constituency. The return to the writ of the election of North Bruce was received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 11th March, and that of East Grey on the 13th, and as the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery must, upon the receipt of the return of the member elected, give notice at the next issue of the Canada Gazette, he accordingly gave the necessary notice. The balance of the question is a matter which has to be decided by another tribunal, that is to say, it is a matter of law, as to whether it is legal or not. I may, perhaps, tell the hon. gentleman that as the recount has not changed the return, and as the return in the Gazette is only the announcement of the return of the member, and not the number of votes, it may not be necessary to be re-gazetted.

ACCIDENT AT ST. JOSEPH DE LÉVIS.

Mr. CARROLL moved for:

Copies of all letters, documents, &c., between the officials of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton and the Department of Railways in relation to the accident at St. Joseph de Lévis, on the 18th December, 1890.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to this motion, but the hon. gentleman cannot expect a confidential report.

Motion agreed to.

CAPE BRETON AND N. S. RY. ACCOMMODATION.

Mr. FRASER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence since 1st July, A.D. 1890, from the New Glasgow Board of Trade and other boards or persons, respecting the through train from Sydney, C.B., to Oxford, Cumberland County, via the Short Line Railway. Also, copies of all correspondence during said time from any person or persons, asking for better railway accommodation between Pictou and New Glasgow, to and from Halifax.

He said: I may state briefly that my object in making this motion is to obtain better railway facilities between New Glasgow, Pictou and Halifax. Now that the Short Line has been completed and a railway has been constructed in Cape Breton, it is of the greatest importance that the train for Sydney should take the Short Line at Oxford, and thus give an independent train from New Glasgow to Halifax. Hitherto our accommodation has been very bad. For example, on going one hundred miles, from New Glasgow to Halifax, we have to remain nearly four hours at Truro, a sufficient time to take us to Halifax. This interferes very materially with business men, and as the condition of railway travel in Nova Scotia has always been such as to pay the Government to run the railway, differing in this respect from the matter to which the hon. Postmaster General referred yesterday, we can ask for this change to be made and hope to obtain it. The Eastern Extension has always paid, and if the road were operated so that the through trains took the Short Line, we could have an independent route for the great County of Pictou and the eastern counties. This question affects one-third of the population of Nova Scotia, and I will, no doubt, have the support of the representatives from the Province, and particularly from the eastern part of Nova Scotia, for my motion. I am not taking this action to embarrass the Government, but to call their attention to the present state of affairs, and I trust the Railway Department will deal effectively with this matter outside of influences which at present seem to control the railway traffic.

Mr. STAIRS. Before the motion is put to the House, I would like to say that I fully indorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). Halifax is as much interested in the question he referred to as the eastern counties of the Province, and I trust the result of this motion will be that the attention of the Government and the Minister of Railways will be called to it, and that the time table of the railway will be so arranged, at all events for the summer, that the present inconvenience will not be continued. As the hon. member for Guysboro' has stated, a delay of four hours is now suffered by every passenger, from all points, on the Pictou line going east to Truro, on the journey going and coming from Halifax. This has a very serious effect on the interests of the railway, and it is on that account, as well as in the interests of the people, that I call the attention of the Government to the situation. The statement of my hon. friend from Guysboro', that one-third of the people of the Province are interested in this subject, is also correct. It is in the interest of the railway itself that travel between the centres of population and the provincial capital should be stimulated to the utmost extent, and I therefore trust this inconvenience will be remedied by the Government, and the time table so arranged that it will be possible for passengers to go from Pictou to Halifax and from Halifax to Pictou and return on the same day. I trust this will be arranged, not only for the summer, but for both the winter and summer.

Motion agreed to.

OWNERSHIP OF THE FORESHORES.

Mr. FLINT moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Governments of the various Provinces and the Dominion, with reference to the title and ownership of the Foreshores of the Dominion and of the beds of Harbours and Rivers: together with all Reports of the Department of Justice and Orders in Council on the above subject.

He said: Probably no subject referred to by His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament was received with more general satisfaction by members from the Maritime Provinces than the announcement that measures relating to the foreshores of the Dominion would be submitted for consideration. If the proposal be similar to that of the last session upon the same subject, which for some reason was not proceeded with, I feel safe in assuming that correspondence of a valuable and learned character between the Governments has taken place in the interim. A study of that correspondence will be of great importance to the members of this House, in anticipation of the introduction of the Bill by the hon. Minister of Justice, notice of which has been already given. In 1888 correspondence of a very interesting nature, an exhaustive and learned review of some phases of this question, took place between the Attorneys-General of Ontario and Quebec and the Minister of Justice. The comments of the hon. Minister I have not seen, and for an intelligent understanding of the scope and relation of the proposed legislation it is almost absolutely essential that the publication of his doubtless very full and complete review of the matter should be had. It may not be advisable to republish the returns which were brought down at the last session of this House, but still even a repetition of that at this juncture, together with more recent correspondence, would permit of a more complete history of the negotiations and opinions of the Provincial and Dominion Governments in convenient form. The subject is a large one, very interesting to a numerous body of persons in several of the provinces who may be affected by any legislation on the subject. I therefore trust that before the Government Bill comes up for debate, this correspondence and the discussions referred to may be in the possession of the Houses.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must ask the hon. gentleman to be good enough to amend his motion by adding after the word "correspondence" the words "not already brought down," because a large part of the correspondence has been already brought down.

Mr. FLINT. Very well.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the hon. gentleman assents to that. As the hon. gentleman has referred to the Bill of last session, I may explain that that Bill contained the conditions which this Government thought should be embodied in any transfer of these properties to the Provincial Government. It was ascertained before the Bill reached its second reading that the conditions were not acceptable to the Provincial Government which had raised the controversy and was principally interested in it. It was, therefore, deemed futile to proceed with the Bill, as that Government was unprepared to accept its conditions, and, consequently, the transfer could not be made. It was considered advisable to reconsider the conditions, and consultation with the Provincial Government to which I refer has taken place upon that subject, which I hope will lead to an early understanding being arrived at which will enable the Bill to be proceeded with.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

FISHERY BOUNTY CHEQUES.

Mr. FLINT moved for:

Return of the costs and expenses of adjusting the amounts claimed for fishery bounties and of preparing and distributing the fishery bounty cheques in each year since 1883, and also the names of the persons authorized to distribute the bounty cheques in the Province of Nova Scotia during the years 1889, 1890 and 1891.

He said: In referring to this subject I desire to congratulate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Department over which he presides, for the extraordinary energy and diligence with which the fishery bounty cheques were distributed early in this present year of grace 1891. It is possible that the pending election had as much to do with stimulating the activity of the Minister of Marine and his subordinates as the profound sympathy they have always professed for the hardy fishermen. We have a phrase in Nova Scotia which signifies the difficulty of getting along in the early spring months. It is called "Getting up March Hill." The Government may have felt that they had a "March hill" to climb, and consequently called to their assistance the breezy and assiduous labours of the local fishery officers, backed by the powerful aid of the bounty cheques. Hitherto, if I am not very much mistaken, fishery bounty cheques have been distributed much later in the year, and I was pleased to learn recently from the Government that it was their intention in the future that these cheques would be distributed about the 1st March in each year henceforward. With this scheme I am in entire sympathy. I think that about the month of March is the most appropriate portion of the year in which to confer on the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces this boon which has been so much spoken of by members on the Conservative benches. At the same time, and in connection with this matter, there are suspicious circumstances connected with the change of face on the part of the Administration, which probably may be explained as having resulted from correspondence with their deputies and officials in various portions of the country, as well as from political stress of weather. It is indeed strange that until the year 1891 it had never occurred to the Administration to distribute the bounty cheques among the hard-working and laborious fishermen of the Maritime Provinces during the winter season, when these men needed that help most and the bulk of them were at their homes. This idea of distribution of the bounty cheques early in the year occurred to the Administration in the spring of 1891, and the activity—almost feverish activity—of the Fisheries Department to provide for the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces must have been very gratifying to them, as well as to the friends of good government and the admirers of an energetic administration of affairs. There are, however, questions in connection with this subject of the distribution of the fisheries bounties which, I think, ought to be settled upon some other principle than that of the exigencies of the Administration on the eve of an election, or, for that matter, at any future time. In my opinion this matter should in some way be arranged by statute or otherwise fixed by law, and the distribution of the bounty funds should be so controlled that the Government or its subordinates could not make a political machine of it. Of course I will not accuse the hon. Minister of Fisheries of harbouring any such design, but I must state in truth that the bounty cheques were this year made a part of the political machinery of the country, by his agents and supporters, at any rate in Nova Scotia. We distribute from $150,000 to $170,000 among thirty or forty thousand men in the various portions of the Maritime Provinces each year, and it is certainly very advisable that this distribution should be made entirely without possibility of partizan effect. It should be remembered that this money belongs to the people of the whole country and not to any political party. It is admitted by gentlemen on both sides of the House that this distribution of fisheries bounties is right in principle; there has never been any opposition to the grant from this side of the House, except the general complaint that the whole fund at the disposal of the Government has not been distributed in its entirety as it should have been, to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. We look upon this fund as a sacred trust, and why the whole amount available, by the calculation of the interest that must have accrued upon the sum placed at the disposal of the Administration in 1879, has not been distributed, has never yet been satisfactorily explained. I wish to call the attention of the House to another circumstance which took place in the constituency I have the honour to represent. To what extent the Government itself was cognizant of this matter I am not aware, but in the minds of independent and thoughtful people it reached to the dimensions of almost a public scandal. At the time Parliament was dissolved there was not a whisper from any corner that the fishery bounty cheques were about to be issued; but as the time for the election approached we found that the fishery bounty cheques had arrived from Ottawa and were being industriously distributed throughout the constituency by the active friends of the Government candidate. I presume the same was done in every other constituency in the Maritime Provinces by the officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. These gentlemen may have distributed the money in a manner above suspicion, they may not have made any observations or remarks to the recipients of the bounty, but at the same time we know that it is almost too much to expect from human nature, that the friends and agents of the Administration with the $150,000 in their hands would not make as much use of such a position and influence as is customary in cases where funds of this kind are placed in the hands of that class of men. Another peculiar circumstance presented itself in the constituency which I represent, and to this matter I also desire to call the attention of the House. Upon the face of it there may not be anything improper, but the circumstances themselves go to show that there was not that care and prudence exercised which is necessary for sustaining the high moral and independent position which the civil servants should occupy before the electors of this country at the time of an election. We found a leading supporter of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, after a conference with his superior officer, resigning his position a few days previous to the election; we found that he was nominated as a candidate by a convention of his own party, and that his office remained unfilled until several weeks after the election. But his subordinates were busy enough. We found that from $9,000 to $10,000 of fishery bounty cheques arrived in that constituency to be distributed—principally by the fishery inspector, who was then a candidate running for a seat in the House of Commons—in the interest of the Conservative party, and in his own interest throughout the constituency. I presume that the same thing must have taken place under somewhat similar circumstances throughout the Province of Nova Scotia and in the Maritime Provinces generally. I believe that the Conservatives of the rest of the Maritime Provinces are devoted to their party, and as much disposed to make use of this patronage to further political ends, as they are in the County of Yarmouth; but, at the same time, I express my conviction that it is not consistent with the position the Civil Service should occupy toward the people, that the money of the Dominion should be disposed of by political agents at election times for political purposes. I have also seen in the public press (although I am not prepared now to quote my authority), that so anxious was the Department of Marine and Fisheries that the interest of this trust fund should be distributed with great activity, and as promptly as possible previous to the election, that an extra sum of public money was appropriated for the purpose of employing extra clerks and extra labour in the Department, in order that these cheques should reach the people at that very particular season of the year. If this is the case, I trust that this course will be continued in off years when there is no election, and that we shall find these bounty cheques in the hands of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces each year before the middle of March.

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I was a little afraid, during the first part of the hon. gentleman's speech, that he was attacking the early distribution of the bounty, and I am glad that towards the end of his remarks, after having denounced the course I adopted this year, he expressed the hope that I would repeat that course during the years to come. That disposes, I think, of a considerable part of the charge that has been preferred against me. However, I will very frankly tell the House the circumstances under which I was enabled to do what the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) must be glad I have succeeded in doing, namely, distribute the bounty due to the fishermen who had earned it at the earliest possible period of the year since 1883, when the distribution was first undertaken. I may say that instead of its being a new departure, it happens to be a coincidence that in the year 1891 the distribution of the bounty was at a time very close to the day fixed for a general election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. But those hon. gentlemen who say "hear, hear," are evidently not familiar with the fact, better known to the hon. mover of the resolution, that that season is about the time the fishermen are fitting out for sea and preparing for their annual fishing venture, and that is the time when they most require, and in fact have demanded that this bounty shall be paid. Before I assumed the responsibility of the position I now hold, I was asked, I was even besought, by fishermen and representatives of fishing districts, to see whether this bounty could not be made more beneficial to those for whom it was intended than it could possibly be when paid to them at a season of the year when it came to them as a mere addition to their earnings from their fishing ventures; and long before any general election was anticipated, immediately on my accession to office, I undertook the work I was asked to do, and the first distribution following was, up to that date, the earliest that had up to that time been reached. For that I received the thanks of the fishermen; I received them through the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, which, about two years ago—at any rate, over a year ago—asked me to make an effort to distribute the bounty still earlier in the season: and if my memory serves me aright, the distribution previous to the year to which I refer was made in the month of May and almost completed before June. But the great point pressed upon me constantly and unremittingly was that the distribution should take place before the fishermen went to their season's work. Now, I may tell the House and all interested in this subject that there were great difficulties in the way. By the regulations contained in the Order in Council, the fishermen are allowed till the 31st of December, after their season's work is ended, to prepare in due form their applications and their vouchers in support of those applications. The work of distribution is enormous, there being from 30,000 to 40,000 applicants, and the claims being small, the average payment being only $4 out of an aggregate amount of from $150,000 to $160,000 a year; so that the House will perceive the clerical work is very great indeed. Separate cheques are made out for all these amounts, and lists and vouchers prepared for the banks through which the money is paid and for the Auditor General's office; in addition, every claim has to be minutely examined, and every solemn declaration supporting it critically perused; and it seemed almost impossible that arrangements could be made for distributing the bounty before March, which was the month in which I was endeavouring to arrange to have the distribution made. I have already stated across the floor of the House, in answer to the hon. gentleman who has made this motion, that it was not an arrangement for the year 1889 to which reference had been made, but that my efforts and the efforts of my officers have been rewarded, and we are able now to say that it is the intention of the Government to distribute this bounty annually at the time when the fishermen need it so very much, that is, before the month of March. I may explain to the hon. gentleman how we are able to do that. He knows that we began the distribution in 1883—I forget, at the moment, the exact date; and the experience we have obtained since then has enabled us to arrange the distribution at this early period. Heretofore the accounts were examined and the claims investigated by clerks employed specially for that purpose and only so long as the examination lasted, and in addition the regular clerks of the Department were employed and paid extra for their extra time by the direct sanction of this House every year, a vote having been taken not only to cover the payments to the extra clerks, but to authorize, contrary to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, the payment of the regular employés of the Department extra amounts for their extra services. I was not satisfied with the working of this system under which we were employing for the bounty work officers whose work during office hours was sufficiently onerous, especially during the session. I, therefore, increased the number of the temporary clerks for this work and stopped the regular officers of the Department doing it, because I found that, being employed after their office hours, some of them did not work as hard or as enthusiastically as they might have done, and it was impossible to so check the work and to drive it on as to accomplish our object. However, I found, after the experience I had gained and after the experience of officers of the Department, that it was possible—and I ask the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution to mark this—without exceeding the appropriation authorized by Parliament, even to the extent of one dollar, to accomplish this year the annual distribution of the bounty by using a limited number of temporary clerks and by arranging to give the regular clerks, not so much per hour, but a payment, as it were, based on a reward; that is, if they could accomplish within a certain time the work given them, they should be paid a certain figure, not exceeding what they would have earned at the rate previously fixed, of 30 cents per hour. With that incentive they accomplished what we much desired, and that is to be the principle which I intend to carry out in the work of distributing the bounty. I am not going to deceive the House by expressing any sorrow or disappointment that during this year there happened to be a general election, and that a large part of the bounty happened to be distributed before election day. I have reason to feel gratified, just as any hon. member may feel gratified when his efforts on behalf of his constituents or the people generally have been such as to merit their approval. Undoubtedly the hon. gentleman knows that this was a popular measure among the fishermen. It was an act which could not be denounced: it was an action taken at their express desire: and I may say that the same gentleman who thanked me through the Reform press of Nova Scotia for the work with which the hon. gentleman seems to reproach me, has again this year expressed his gratification at the result of my efforts, and that gentleman belongs to the same political party as the hon. member for Yarmouth. There remains for me but one other point to notice, and that is the resignation of the fishery inspector. It is perfectly true that the inspector, after I had left the capital to visit my constituents and render them an account of my conduct in Parliament and in office, did resign. I was not spoken to upon the subject; I was not asked by him for permission to do so; and I would ask the hon. gentleman what he would have done under the circumstances? I did not even receive the resignation; it was sent to the Department at Ottawa; he had the right to resign, and he did so and ran his election: and I could not by any interference have prevented that event. No harm has resulted. The hon. gentleman is not able to cite a single instance of any matter requiring attention at the hands of the Department in his county having been overlooked or neglected during that short interregnum. But after that gentleman had run his election, I do not know that, no harm having been done in the meanwhile, it was a very flagrant act to re-appoint him when he solicited office. Those are the facts. Very little can be made out of them, and in the community from which the hon. gentleman comes, I take it there was no great excitement over the matter. At any rate it was not the first case in which such a course of conduct has been pursued, and instances, I have no doubt, may be given to the hon. gentleman which will constitute very good precedents for that action. Now the hon. gentleman attacked in a very general way, without giving any special illustrations of the grounds for that attack, the system by which it is necessary for the Government to distribute this bounty; and I take it, the ground for that attack lies in the fact that when the work is well done credit is given. Well, this Government and every other Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, stand in that position in reference to the administration of the affairs of the country, that the manner of their administration makes them either popular or unpopular; and it would have been a great deal more to the point if my hon. friend had taken the House into his confidence, and shown that since 1883 we had distributed $150,000 to $160,000 every year, under the direction of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and no instances could be given of abuses having occurred.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Instances have been given every year.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island comes to the rescue, but is not more specific, and can only make a general charge. He says that every year instances have been given. I can tell the hon. gentleman that an hon. gentleman more careful than he in making charges of that kind, and who is not now in the House, did bring up cases, and having got my explanation and ascertained the facts, was so well satisfied that during the two sessions following he never opened his mouth upon the subject either in this House or elsewhere, as far as I am aware. I say again, it would be well if the hon. gentleman would bring forward charges showing that during that considerable period since 1883, abuses had occurred in the administration of the fund, that it had been diverted from its proper purposes and paid regardless of the rules and regulations prescribed under Order in Council. If he can find an instance where an officer of the Department has disobeyed the instructions given and based upon Order in Council, it will not be well for that officer. I take the responsibility of challenging the hon. gentleman to show wherein I have departed from the regulations of the Order in Council in the administration of the fund. I shall be happy to bring down the information connected with the subject, and I hope I will not be deemed insincere in saying that the fullest explanation will be a source of gratification to myself and those interested in the distribution of this fund since 1883.

Mr. PERRY. I am glad the hon. member behind me has brought up this matter. There are complaints not only from Nova Scotia but also from Prince Edward Island, and especially from Prince County, more particularly from Tignish, where I live. I am well aware that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a very active man. I will give him credit for that; and whether he anticipated what was going to take place or not, he made preparations, he says, to have the fishery bounty paid in March. I can tell the hon. gentleman that nearly every Conservative fisherman in Tignish had his fishery bounty paid him in February. But there happen to be two regulations in the hon. gentleman's Department. There happen to be one regulation for Conservatives and another regulation for Grits. I can tell that hon. gentleman that to this day there are several Grit fishermen in my neighbourhood who are well entitled to their fishery bounty for 1890, but who have not yet got it. I am not the hon. member to whom my hon. friend says he gave some explanations a few years ago, and I am quite satisfied if that hon. gentleman were here he would have a different statement to make. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that in 1887, 1889 and 1890, I had occasion to urge the Department several times to remedy certain grievances which his subordinates were inflicting on the fishermen around Tignish. Some of them got their money and many of them did not, and I would like to know if these unfortunate Grits around Tignish are going to get the money this year or not. I must see the list of names. There is no fisherman there I do not know. I know everyone within twenty-five or thirty miles of my residence who is entitled to a bounty, and I know those who are not entitled to it, and I know some to whom my friend the Minister of Marine has ordered the fishery bounty to be paid, who are not entitled to it.

Mr. TUPPER. Name them.

Mr. PERRY. They know nothing about fishing. They could no more catch a mackerel than my hon. friend the Minister. What do the hon. Minister's subordinates care about it? They are paid so much a year, and that is all they care. He tells us he has so many men on the staff. I tell my hon. friend that his mismanagement of this affair has cost nearly as much money as the whole of the fishery bounty. In the first place, his subordinates below charge so much for signing a certificate. In the next place, he has so many officials here who have to be paid and a number down below, and, when you pay the expenses, you will find they will very near come up to the amount of the fishing bounty, and I am afraid, if my hon. friend follows the principle laid down by the Postmaster General, we are going to have a nice time, and the poor fishermen are going to get very little. If they are going to get $3 a year and their expenses come to $3.15, they will have to pay 15 cents, and that will not be much benefit to them. However, I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine is different from the Postmaster General, and I want to speak to him in earnest. I say that he ought to consult the members who represent those localities. It is no reason because they happen to be Liberals, that their information should be disrespected. If there is a case of dispute, who knows better, who feels more interested than the representative of the people? I say I have a right to be consulted, and I know as much about the fisheries as the Minister of Marine and his deputy. But I am not consulted. I have endeavoured to show plainly, honestly and fairly, that certain parties were entitled to certain bounties, and I was refused. The inspector or commissioner of fisheries down there says this person is not entitled to the bounty, and his word is taken in preference to mine. I tell the hon. gentleman that many of the fishery wardens never go to the shore during the whole summer unless they want to get a lobster or a fresh mackerel. They get their pay and that is all they care about it. He says that if any officer broke the rules, he would know what would happen. We often find the rules broken by these men, but the Department has not enough backbone to dismiss them. They are allowed to do as they like, and the word of the man who is sent here by the people is not looked upon as equal to that of an official of the Department. In fact, it is almost a farce to send members here from certain counties who do not happen to think politically with the Government. Their word is not believed. They can get nothing. They cannot get a post office. They cannot get redress for a poor fisherman who has been robbed —I do not say by the Minister of Marine, but by subordinates in consequence of some hard feelings between man and man. The member is not able to get redress for these people or to get a post office. He is able to get nothing. I think that is a poor thing to do, especially to members from Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL RETURN FOR BELLECHASSE.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all letters and correspondence between the Government or any member thereof, or any Public Department, and Mr. Solyme Forgues, of St. Michel de Bellechasse, Returning Officer, in relation to the last Dominion election in the electoral district of Bellechasse.

He said: On the 5th May I enquired:

"Why the receipt of the return for the writ of election for the County of Bellechasse was not gazetted until the 11th April?"

I was answered by the Secretary of State as follows:—

"The reason why the return of the writ of election for the County of Bellechasse was not gazetted until the 11th April was because the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery did not receive it until the 6th of that month."

This first statement of course I took as being perfectly true. The second part of my question was this:

"If the delay be due to the fact that the Returning Officer, Solyme Forgues, Esq., did not sooner transmit his return to the writ of election to him addressed, what reason does he give?"

The answer is this:

"The reason offered by the Returning Officer for not declaring sooner than he did who was the elected member for the county was the absence of the required statement on the part of the Deputy Returning Officer for polling division No. 10, giving the number of votes cast for each candidate, the production of which caused some delay."

I would have let that incident pass without noticing it, but as it attacks another officer than the returning officer himself, and as it is entirely false and an insult to this Parliament, I have to notice it. I received about the 10th March last a notice from Mr. Forgues, telling me that on the 12th March he would add up the number of votes given for each candidate at St. Michel at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. It appears that then one of the certificates of a deputy returning officer was not signed. This was the returning officer for poll No. 10, who lives three or four acres from the residence of the returning officer. He was informed on the next day, or the 14th, and he went immediately to the returning officer and signed the certificate, his signature being the only thing missing in the document. On the 16th March I received the following letter from the returning officer, which I will translate:—

"St. Michel, 16th March, 1891.

"Quebec.

"Dear Sir,—Enclosed please find statement of the votation of Bellechasse, and the certificate establishing your election for your division." * * *

And then he asked me to publish the statement which was enclosed, and I hold here a duplicate of the certificate annexed to the writ of election. This was on the 16th March. Everything was then complete, and, when the returning officer comes here and says the reason for the delay of three weeks was the neglect of a deputy returning officer, he deliberately says what is false and commits a gross contempt of this Parliament. I never knew of an officer of this Parliament insulting Parliament in this way. I am not the custodian of the honour of this House, but I inform the House of the facts. I say, that the report put into the mouth of the Secretary of State concerning the deputy returning officer of poll No. 10, contains statements contrary to the facts, and I wish to protest against it. It shows how much respect some of the returning officers have for this Parliament and for their duty, that which they have sworn to perform faithfully. This is another instance which illustrates the urgent necessity there is that this House should change the law and not to leave the conduct of the elections in the hands of such unscrupulous fellows.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not know whether there is any correspondence with regard to the returns of the election for Bellechasse, other than what I quoted the other day, which was in the letter forwarded by the returning officer of Bellechasse to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. I am not going to reply to the observations and accusations made by the hon. member for Bellechasse against the returning officer other than to say that I think they are somewhat too violent at this stage of the proceedings, because the papers, if there are any, are not yet before the House. He makes grave accusations against a man who had been a long time his friend and whom he knows to be an honest man. I have not seen this correspondence, and it may contain some things which I do not know. Perhaps the hon. gentleman had no occasion to know that after the election was over difficulties occurred which may have prevented the return of the election by the returning officer. I cannot speak without having before me the papers which may be in the Department, but I hope these papers will show, I hope the enquiry will show, that my hon. friend was not justified in using the language he did against that public officer.

Mr. AMYOT. I cannot be mistaken when I hold the duplicate of the certificate annexed to the writ of the election, which has not been changed since; I cannot be mistaken when I hold the detailed statement of the votes cast at each poll; I cannot be mistaken when I hold the letter of the returning officer. I am not going to quote private letters which would confirm the position I take. I do not throw any blame upon the members of the Government. I know it is not their fault, although it is very extraordinary that a returning officer who has served in the local as well as the federal elections, since 1878, should commit such gross breach of duty. I have spoken in order to protect the reputation of the deputy returning officer who is attacked, and in order to show this House that one of its officers is guilty of contempt towards this House, and to show the necessity of changing the law so as to take away from the returning officers the tremendous power they have now.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return giving the names of all persons in the County of Guysboro' fined for violation of the fishery laws, since the 1st day of January, A.D. 1890: the amount of each fine and costs; the sum collected of each; the names of the parties whose fines have been remitted, with the reason for such remission; the names of parties in said county against whom fines are still outstanding, with the amount of each and costs.—(Mr. Fraser.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 17) respecting the River St. Clair Railway Bridge and Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

Bill (No. 18) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

Bill (No. 25) to amend the Act to incorporate the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Pembroke Lumber Company.—Mr. Ferguson (Renfrew).

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate the Montreal and Atlantic Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Ives.)

CANADA AND MICHIGAN TUNNEL CO.

Mr. MONTAGUE moved that Bill (No. 19) respecting the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Company, be read the second time. He said: This Bill which has been placed in my hands, is simply to extend the time for the construction of this work.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ST. LAWRENCE AND OTTAWA RY. CO.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved that Bill (No. 20) respecting the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company, be read the second time. He said: This Bill relates to some land in the city of Ottawa which the company wish to sell in order to relieve it from the mortgages upon it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

C. P. R. CO.'S TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved second reading of Bill (No. 21) to confer certain powers on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in connection with its telegraph business, and for other purposes. He said: This Bill is for the purpose of conferring on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company certain powers with respect to its telegraph lines which are possessed by other telegraph companies, but which are not included in the Act of incorporation of the railway company. The object is to make the service more effective, and the clauses are adapted from those contained in the charters of other telegraph companies.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

LONDON AND CANADIAN LOAN AND AGENCY COMPANY.

Mr. COCKBURN moved second reading of Bill (No. 27) to authorize the London and Canadian Loan and Agency Company (Limited) to issue debenture stock. He said: The object of the Bill is simply to give to this company powers similar to those already possessed by the Canada Permanent Loan Company, the privilege of issuing permanent debenture stock instead of mere debentures. This power has been granted to other companies already.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think Parliament has granted those powers to other companies generally.

Mr. COCKBURN. I did not say generally—I mentioned the Canada Permanent Company.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is a very dangerous and objectionable power to give, the power to create a permanent mortgage on its assets.

Mr. COCKBURN. I suppose the House considered the question when it was brought up in connection with the Canada Permanent and other companies, and I suppose the same principles that guided the House then will guide it now, unless some extraordinary light has been vouchsafed to hon. members since that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be: but it is exceedingly desirable that one line of action should be followed in regard to all these companies. We framed a good many years ago, with some pains and care, a general Act under which all these companies were to be administered. I am quite prepared to consider any suggestion the hon. gentleman has to make as to enlarge powers which should be conferred on this company, and if he makes out a good case, I will consider it. But I submit to the Government that this is a matter which in the public interest they ought to take up. I think it should be done by an amendment to the general Act rather than by special legislation proposed from time to time, and which results in this: that so soon as a precedent is established in favour of one company, under very special circumstances, all the other companies sooner or later come to Parliament, or a great many of them come to Parliament, to obtain like privileges, and the whole object which the general Act is intended to serve is pro tanto destroyed.

Mr. MULOCK. I think there is great force in the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The loan companies have been invested with very large powers by the Local Legislature. In the Province of Ontario, for example, they are authorized to invest trust funds, and trustees, unless forbidden by the instrument creating the trust, are entitled to invest those funds in the purchase of the debentures of those companies. If I understand rightly the scheme of the Bill now under consideration it is this: that the company in question may issue permanent debenture stock, which will become, to the extent of the interest, a charge on the earnings of the company, and to that extent a mortgage on the earnings and assets of the company, and to that extent will rank with other liabilities, and therefore with the moneys owing to trustees and creditors generally. It seems to me risky financeering for any company as well as for any individual, to be bound for all time to come, to pay a certain sum of money annually on what it may borrow. Interest may fall, interest may rise: and I think no prudent individual would bind himself or his estate for an indefinite period, to pay a certain rate of interest, and, therefore, if the present Bill is of the character which I should judge it is by the remarks of the mover, I think it would be wiser for the Government to deal with the whole question. If a mistake has been made, let us not repeat it. The loan companies to-day represent an enormous amount of capital, of borrowed capital especially, which it is specially the duty of Parliament to guard. Those who choose to invest their money as shareholders take their chance in one way, but the public who invest their money in debentures, who invest trust funds in debentures, are entitled to special consideration at the hands of Parliament. The amount of capital of that character invested in these companies, borrowed capital of one kind and another, is sufficient to warrant the interference of the Government, and the adoption by the Government of a policy before any further powers are granted to such companies.

Mr. COCKBURN. The Bill, no doubt, will be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, which will deal with it. I am sure that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down will, with his large experience in financial matters, when he comes to investigate the matter more fully, decide that the same powers that have been granted to the Canada Permanent Loan Company may safely be intrusted to the London and Canadian Loan and Agency Company, and that he will give the same vote.

Mr. MULOCK. I never voted to give that power to the Canada Permanent Company.

Mr. COCKBURN. I was not aware that any opposition was raised to the proposal by any hon. gentleman. With respect to his fear that the granting of this power might affect the position of other debenture holders, I have no doubt his fears will be relieved on that score when the Bill is fully debated before the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

EMPIRE PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO.

Mr. COCKBURN moved second reading of Bill (No. 28) to amend the Act to incorporate the Empire Printing and Publishing Company (Limited).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Explain.

Mr. COCKBURN. The explanation is very simple; it is merely to increase the number of directors. The business of the Empire newspaper has been enlarged so greatly that it has been found necessary to have a larger board of directors to manage the affairs of so growing an institution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ADJOURNMENT—ENQUIRY FOR PAPERS, &c.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know when will the hon. gentleman be able to cause the various Standing Committees to be called together?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is to have the Clerk call the committees together to-morrow, for Friday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are those papers which we are promised—I mean, more particularly, the papers relating to the negotiations at Washington?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The papers connected with that subject include a number of documents the production of which requires the assent of Her Majesty's Government and of the authorities at Washington. Until that assent is obtained we must necessarily look upon them as confidential. If there is any considerable delay in obtaining that consent, the papers which are available will be brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As these documents are referred to in the Speech from the Throne, it strikes me that this consent should have been applied for a little earlier.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was applied for as early as possible, but the correspondence continued up to a very short time ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the Minister of Finance tell us when he will be likely to introduce his Estimates?

Mr. FOSTER. I hope to introduce the Estimates on Friday of this week, or it may be on Monday of next week.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the Minister of Finance introduces his Estimates, I would like to bring a matter to his notice, in the hope that he will be able to make an appropriation for it in the Estimates. The House will remember that some time ago a serious conflagration took place in the city of St. John, and Parliament deemed it its duty to contribute public money to the relief of the sufferers. A similar worthy motive actuated the House when on the occasion of the two conflagrations in the city of Hull, Parliament voted $10,000. Recently the Province of Ontario has been visited by a similar disaster, which caused great loss to the people of Alliston. I understand that on the 8th day of this month a serious fire took place in that town, destroying all the buildings in five or six blocks, including the Government buildings, and causing widespread suffering and loss to hundreds of people who are homeless and houseless to-day. The Empire in describing the fire spoke of the town as almost entirely wiped out—the whole of the business portion destroyed, as well as the market hall, the town hall, the stores and other places of business. Appeals have been made throughout the Dominion for assistance, and I think it a fitting occasion for the people of the whole Dominion to contribute towards the relief of the sufferers. I trust that the Minister of Finance will make provision for this worthy object in the Estimates.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I am pleased that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has seen fit to call the attention of the House to this disastrous fire which has taken place in the county which I have the honour to represent. During the past few days I have drawn the attention of the Government to the matter, and as early as Monday last I appealed directly to the hon. Minister of Public Works for assistance. I have in my desk at the present time a memorial to the House asking for aid, which I intend to present to-morrow. I am pleased to find that my hon. friend takes such an interest in the county I represent, and I am pleased that he and his friends on the opposite side of the House will approve of any grant that may be made by the Government to assist the people of Alliston. I am also pleased to find that I have such a strong ally in the cause which I have so much at heart, and which I took the earliest opportunity of drawing the attention of the Government to.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 14th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RAYERS.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. FLINT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 34) to amend the Canada Temperance Amendment Act, 1888. He said: In response to the request for an explanation of this Bill, I may say that it is proposed for the purpose of amending, in the direction of greater restriction, clause 11 of the Act referred to. In all particulars except as to spirituous liquors and alcohol, specified in that section, that measure is unaffected. It will be remembered that at the time of the introduction of this clause in 1888, the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), and the then hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) objected quite strongly to some of the features of this clause number 11. The amendment which I propose does not substantially alter the clause except in the above particulars. It removes from the schedule of general exemptions, permitted to physicians and druggists by that clause, spirituous liquors and alcohol, and places them in a schedule by themselves, permitting their sale under certain clear and well defined restrictions. The terms of the restrictions I have introduced are conformed, as far as they can be, to the terms of the restriction imposed under the Canada Temperance Act against the sale of those articles, and which are now the law of the land where the Scott Act is in operation. It will be recollected that the objections then taken were, that by exempting druggists and chemists in the matter of the sale of alcoholic liquors, the Act was virtually emasculated and became ineffective for all practical purposes, and the primary object of the law destroyed. By placing chemists and druggists under the clause which I propose to add, I believe the amendment of 1888 will be brought into harmony with the Canada Temperance Act; and that Act, instead of being practically a nullity in those counties where it is in operation, as regards the sale of alcoholic liquors, will become as effective as in the nature of things this restrictive legislation can make it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. LAVERGNE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 35) in further amendment of the Canada Temperance Act. He said: This Bill was introduced last year, but too late during the session to become law. Its only object is to amend the section in the Act concerning procedure in prosecutions. I desire to give the power to two justices of the peace, when the magistrate before whom the prosecution is brought is absent, to adjourn the case. We have suffered many inconveniences in certain districts owing to the rigidity of the law in this respect. In many instances, when magistrates have failed to be present, cases entered for trial have had to be dropped. I desire also to amend section 107, which provides that every offence against the second part of the Act may be prosecuted in the manner directed by the "Act respecting Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace." The 48th section of the Summary Convictions Act provides that no adjournment by a justice of the peace, before or during the hearing of any information or complaint, shall be for more than one week. The object of my amendment is to give power to the sitting magistrate to adjourn for at least one month, and not more than six weeks. In certain districts these cases are always brought before the district magistrate, who sits monthly, and if a case happens to be not ready to be proceeded with, it has to be dropped unless the magistrate can sit again within a week to try it. To make these two amendments is the object of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATIONS.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to continue the operation of the law preventing cultivators from manufacturing into cut tobacco or cigars, tobacco required for their personal use?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is the intention of the Government to continue the operation of the law in this respect.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce this session a measure for the purpose of relieving merchants and others using weights and measures, from the payment of fees for the inspection thereof?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As the merchants bear only a portion of the cost of the inspection, it is not the intention of the Government to amend the law so as to throw the whole burden on the public.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. BURDETT (for Mr. BARRON) asked, Whether the Trent Valley Canal Commission have reported in favour of the completion of the scheme? If so, does the Government intend to ask Parliament this session for a grant for that purpose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The commissioners appointed by the Government have reported. I am not in a position to state the contents of the report, which, of course, will speak for itself. The Government have as yet given no decision on this subject.

Mr. BURDETT. I submit that I have received no answer to the question. The Government either do or do not know whether the report is favourable to the scheme.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I gave the answer of the Government.

WEST INDIA STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, How many trips were made by the steamers subsidized to carry on the steam service between the Maritime Provinces and the West India ports, during the year 1890? What were the dates of such trips? What amounts were paid for each trip? What person or company is carrying out that service for the present year? Has any contract been entered into for such service this year, and what rates are being paid therefor and to whom?

Mr. FOSTER. This question involves rather a lengthy answer, and as I notice that my hon. friend has a motion on the Order paper in reference to the West India service, if, when the time comes for him to move that, which will probably be very soon, he will add this as an amendment, the whole of the papers will be brought down together. I am preparing them now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I submit that the hon. gentleman should give me an answer to the question. I gave the notice of motion because I thought he could not give me the information it refers to if I put it in the form of a question; but this question does not require more than a categorical answer or figures.

Mr. FOSTER. It requires a good deal of compilation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I submit that I am entitled to an answer. The Government cannot refuse to answer a plain, simple question as to what has been paid for a simple service, to whom payment has been made, and what is paid now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There cannot be any discussion on this question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I shall be obliged to move the adjournment of the House in order to discuss my right to obtain the information. I submit that the hon. gentleman is treating me most unfairly.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I am not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I intend to conclude with a motion: that is the customary practice.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, I think not. When the hon. gentleman proposes to move the adjournment of the House, the motion should be made before he discusses the question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well, then; I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not desire to detain the House, and I resort to this method of putting my complaint before the House very reluctantly, because it is calculated to delay proceedings. The hon. gentleman remembers that he and I had some discussion last year on the subject of this steam communication between the Maritime Provinces and the West India ports. In complying with a motion made by the then member for St. John, he brought down towards the close of the session papers which gave us some information as to the amount of subsidy paid to those steamers. I understood from those papers that the contract expired at the end of the year, and I learn from information that is common to everybody that another line of steamers is plying on that same route this year. I want to know whether this service is being carried on at the same rate per trip and under the same conditions as appears by the return brought down last year in answer to Mr. Ellis' motion with regard to the lines subsidized? The hon. gentleman can have no difficulty whatever in telling me how many trips were made by the steamer subsidized during the year 1890 to carry on the same service. He can tell me in five minutes, or the information can be obtained in his Department. Why does he not answer how many trips there are, and the dates. He must know, since he told us last year that these steamers, under the terms of the contract, had to return their manifests to his Department. I have no means of knowing except by putting this question. I do not want to be delayed five or six weeks as I might be, if I made a notice of motion, while the hon. gentleman would be getting ready a voluminous mass of papers which I do not require. I only want to know what is paid for each trip and what persons are carrying on the service. The hon. gentleman must know with what company or persons he has entered into a contract. I venture to say the hon. gentleman could obtain all the information I ask for in an hour's time, from one of the officials of his Department. I submit this House is not being treated, nor am I being treated, with the ordinary courtesy we have a right to expect from a Minister when we ask for official information. I am not seeking a favour, but am asking for public information which I have the right to obtain; and the hon. gentleman has not the right to obstruct me by stating he will not answer, but that, if I move for papers, he will bring them down. Why not answer at once? There can be nothing detrimental to the public service in giving the information at once. He has entered into a contract with some persons for the subsidizing of a line of steamers to the West Indies. This House does not know how much he is paying them. We have a right to know with whom he entered into the contract and what amount he is paying. I want to know further, what the result of the new contract is, but as it will take some time to furnish that information, I have asked for it in the form of a motion for papers. The hon. gentleman is not treating me with ordinary courtesy, but is seeking to evade a part of the duty he is paid to discharge, which is the imparting to this House legitimate information with respect to public contracts and the expenditure of public money in his Department. The hon. gentleman may refuse to answer, but I do not think he is going to facilitate the progress of business very much at this early stage by adopting that course.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has tried hard to work up a grievance against myself and the Government in this matter. I do not think there was any cause for that. I certainly intended no disrespect to my hon. friend, nor had I the least intention of keeping from him or this House any information which it is his right or the right of the House to have. If the hon. gentleman will reflect for a moment, he will remember that I said he would have the information in a couple of days. The information is not so short as he fancies. In the first place, we have three services from the Maritime Provinces to the West Indies. These three services have all their different dates of sailing, and the hon. gentleman is asking me to answer categorically a question which calls for the date of sailing and return of every one of the vessels on these three routes. I submit that, generally, it has not been the practice to ask for detailed information by question, and to give it in answer to a question. I told the hon. gentleman that I would accept this as an amendment to the motion he has on the Table, and that the information will be brought down in a very short notice. I have no intention of keeping him waiting for a week, but will engage to have all this information on the Table within twenty-four hours of the passing of the motion.

Mr. BURDETT. I think I have been treated with scant courtesy by the Minister of Public Works in refusing to answer my question. It is well known that the Trent Valley matter has been dangling before the public for nearly half a century, being resurrected periodically before each general election and then quietly assigned again to the tomb after the elections are over. A commission was appointed and made a report, and the simple question asked by me in the absence of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) is whether that report is favourable or not to the work. I can easily understand why the hon. gentleman does not give a plain yes or no. No doubt it is because a certain telegram passed from the Premier just prior to the elections, relating to the construction of this work. If the hon. Minister does not know whether the report is favourable or unfavourable, he ought to say so. If there is anything to conceal, and he refuses to answer, let him state that he refuses. I am entitled to a plain answer to a plain question. Is the report favourable or unfavourable? If unfavourable, the Government must abandon this work; if favourable, they ought in all fairness to complete it. I submit there is no excuse for refusing to answer this question. I may be told to read the report, but I may put one interpretation on it and the Government another. It is their interpretation which will prevail, and it is it that I am entitled to have.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I wish to remove the impression the hon. gentleman is under as regards my answer. The hon. gentleman must know that the answer I have given was that which should have come from the Minister of Railways and Canals. It was the one given to me to convey to the House. I have not seen the report, and therefore am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman the information he asks. But the report will speak for itself; and I thought the hon. gentleman would have asked for the report.

Mr. BURDETT. Then let the question stand until the Minister of Railways is present.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have given the hon. gentleman his answer, and if the hon. gentleman thinks well, he may ask for the report.

Motion to adjourn, withdrawn.

SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, Whether the Government is aware of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refusing to operate the L'Avenir branch of their line, formerly known as the "South-Eastern Railway," and removing the rails from that portion of the said road, which railway has been subsidized by the County of Drummond and the Legislature of Quebec, and has been declared by this Parliament to be a work for the general advantage of Canada? Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any action in the matter?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to let this question stand on the Order paper until the First Minister is in his seat.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS IN THE EASTERN TOWNSHIPS.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to order geological exploratory surveys to be made with respect to asbestos and other minerals, in the Eastern Townships, especially in the Counties of Beauce, Megantic, Richmond and Wolfe; and of these surveys to make a report, in order that foreign capitalists may gain sufficient confidence to place their capital within the Province of Quebec?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The whole district has been thoroughly explored, mapped and reported on, and the reports are to be found in volumes 2, 3 and 4 of the Geological Survey Report.

1st REGIMENT OF CAVALRY—SADDLERY.

Mr. HYMAN asked, When is it intended to make a new issue of saddlery to the 1st Regiment of Cavalry, in lieu of that condemned by the board of officers appointed for the purpose of examining the same?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The contract has been given out for the manufacture of saddles, some of which are expected to be furnished in a few days. As soon as the saddles will have been received in the Military Stores, the question of supplying them to the 1st Regiment of Cavalry will be taken up.

POUND-NET LICENSES—LAKE ST. CLAIR.

Mr. LISTER asked, When were pound-net licenses first issued for Lake St. Clair; what number were issued for the year 1890; what are the names and residences of the persons to whom pound-net licenses were issued for the year 1891?

Mr. TUPPER. Pound-net licenses were first issued for Lake St. Clair in 1884. Four licenses were issued for the year 1890. The following are the names and residences of the persons to whom pound-net licenses were issued for the year 1891:—Isa Drouillard, of Tecumseh; C. W. Gauthier, of Windsor; Gilbert Labutte, of Tecumseh, and Eli Labutte, of Tecumseh.

MENNONITE RESERVE IN MANITOBA.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to further extend the time fixed for the reserve of land made for the Mennonites, in the Province of Manitoba, when the time expires in June next?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Nearly all the lands in the Mennonite reserves have either been purchased or entered for by Mennonites; and, in regard to the remainder, the Minister of Agriculture is, and always has been, of the opinion that good faith with the Mennonites requires that the reservation should be continued until such time as the lands still available can be acquired by the younger portion of the Mennonite population. It is, therefore, proposed to continue the reservation for some little time longer.

ORGANIZATION OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire whether any notices of the calling together of the several Standing Committees have yet been issued? I have received none, and none of my friends around me have received any. I understood, from the conversation which took place yesterday, that these notices were to be issued to-day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They are being issued to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Including the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Including all.

TRANSLATION OF THE VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation). Mr. Speaker, before the House passes to the Orders of the Day, I wish to draw your attention and the attention of the House to the manner in which the Votes and Proceedings and the reports of the proceedings in the House generally are translated. I do not frequently have occasion to take the floor in this House, but in looking over the translations of the propositions I may have offered or of the speeches I may have delivered here, I always found that they did not render the idea I intended to convey in the original. I always endeavoured to use the language of the majority in order to be better understood, but the translations of my words had no sense, and if those translations were to be sent to anyone knowing a little French, I would be made ridiculous by being supposed to have uttered such things in my own language. Now, to give an example of such translation, I will take the question I was putting to-day. I was asking "Whether the Government is aware of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refusing to operate the L'Avenir Branch of their line, formerly known as the South-Eastern Railway." The words "L'Avenir Branch of their line," were translated by "l'embranchement sur l'Avenir de sa ligne." Well, Mr. Speaker, this is simply ridiculous. And it is not the first time I notice such blunders. I might say that at no time during the last Parliament, when I had occasion to put a simple question to the Government, was a proper translation made of it. Let us now glance at the Speech from the Throne. The first paragraph said: "The Honourable Sir William Johnstone Ritchie, Deputy Governor, does not see fit to declare the causes of summoning the present Parliament until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law." This is translated as follows: "L'honorable Sir William Johnstone Ritchie, député gouverneur, ne juge pas à propos de déclarer les raisons pour les quelles il a convoqué" (the reasons for which he has summoned) "le présent parlement de la Puissance du Canada." So that the Deputy Governor is made to say that it is he who summoned the present Parliament. This is a gross misrepresentation. As I said before, were these accidental occurrences they could be overlooked; but such things happen at almost every sitting of the House, and are to be found in almost every report of our proceedings. Mr. Speaker, my remarks are directed against no person in particular. I must say that I do not know who has the supervision of these translations, nor who writes them. But I think it is proper for me to draw the attention of the House to the matter, in order to secure a better translation in future, and avoid ridicule.

ALIEN LABOUR.

The Order being read for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada,

Mr. TAYLOR. Before proceeding with that Bill, I would like to enquire what correspondence has taken place between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States in reference to this subject? We had a special committee who reported, after taking evidence, last year, that a Bill should be introduced at the next session dealing with this question, if some amicable arrangement had not previously been arrived at between the two Governments. I have not learned, nor did I make enquiry, as to what, if any, correspondence had taken place, although I have seen in the press lately that the United States Government are relaxing to a very large extent the enforcement of the Alien Labour Act. I would also like to know if it is the intention of the Government to make this one of the questions to be discussed at the conference to be held this fall between the Canadian Government and the American Government? If it is one of the questions then to be discussed, perhaps it would be as well to allow this Bill to stand over till next session. However, I have introduced it, and it is on the Order paper, but before proceeding with it, I would like to know the views of the Government on the question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In deference to the report of the committee adopted last session, some representations have been made upon the subject to the authorities at Washington—I think through the Department of Agriculture. I am not prepared to say, of course, that the amelioration which has taken place, and to which the hon. gentleman has referred, has been the result of that correspondence; it may have been rather with a view to the better administration of the Act itself relating to the importation of alien labour into the United States. I think, under all the circumstances, it would be unwise to proceed with the Bill, at any rate at present, especially in view of the circumstance which the hon. gentleman himself has mentioned, that negotiations covering practically all the questions between this country and the neighbouring country are fairly on the way to discussion next autumn. For that reason I think it would be very desirable that the hon. gentleman should not press the passage of this Bill, at any rate at the present time. I am hardly in a position to assure the hon. gentleman that it will be one of the subjects of discussion at Washington; because that could only be done with the concurrence of the Washington authorities. Of course it is in their power to say that any particular subject shall not be one of the subjects of discussion at the conference which is expected to take place. But I can say, and I feel bound to say, out of deference to the report which was adopted last session, that the subject it dealt with will be certainly presented for the consideration of the authorities at Washington, with a view either to the amendment of the Act itself, or, at any rate, a more reasonable execution of the Act, than that which was brought to the notice of the committee last year.

Mr. TAYLOR. After the remarks of the Minister of Justice, I beg to move that the Order for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada, be discharged.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

BALLOT BOXES.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

Report of Mr. J. R. Arnoldi, Engineer of the Mechanical Department of Public Works, to the Special Committee on Ballot Boxes last session.

He said: I understand the engineer made a report last session, which was not brought down to the House. I am not personally aware that such is the case, but I am so informed, and I move this motion for the purpose of having this report brought down.

Motion agreed to.

BUREAU OF LABOUR STATISTICS.

Mr. LEPINE (Translation) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Workingmen's Associations of Canada and the Minister of Agriculture, with reference to the establishment of the Bureau of Labour Statistics for the Dominion.

He said: In offering this motion, Mr. Speaker, I beg to be allowed to give a few words of explanation. I take a great interest in the establishment of a bureau of labour statistics, not only because I consider such an institution as of high importance and great advantage for the labouring classes of the Dominion, but also because I know that it will be a benefit to industry and commerce. I take an interest in it because it will be useful to the whole of the population. However, as the establishment of this bureau is to be more especially useful to the working classes, and as the constituency which I represent is largely composed of working people, it behooves me to be watchful of this measure. After many entreaties, Parliament passed last year a Bill for the creation of a bureau of labour statistics, and voted a sum of $10,000 for the organization of such a bureau, following in this the example of several other countries where similar bureaus are in existence and rendering signal services. Vainly did some hon. members of this House ask to postpone until another session the consideration of this Bill; the question was thought to be pressing and upon no pretext was it allowed to stand. The establishment of such a bureau was held to be absolutely necessary, in order to obtain reliable data on the material and moral condition of the working classes, and with the help of such information to secure more thorough labour legislation. I was one of those, Mr. Speaker, who strongly urged the passing of that Bill which was known to everybody, and which the workingmen were anxiously expecting. Long enough had the consideration of that Bill been deferred. Well, the Bill passed, and the money necessary for the organization of this bureau was voted. Since then nothing has been heard of it. The bureau of labour statistics seems only to exist on the Statute-book. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think I am justified in asking the Government for what reason they have delayed establishing the institution, which was acknowledged to be so necessary and so indispensable to the working classes? The Department of Agriculture must have had grave reasons for postponing the endowing of the working people of this country with an institution the creation of which had been voted by Parliament. The House has a right to information in regard to this. The people also have a right to know why this bureau of labour statistics has not yet been put in operation. Such are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, which have induced me to ask for the correspondence between the workingmen's associations and the Department of Agriculture in this connection. If this delay in the carrying out of the law is due to a lack of sufficient power or money, I hope the House will, during the present session, provide the necessary means of immediately organizing this institution.

Mr. HAGGART. Some time will be required to prepare the papers, which are very lengthy documents, and as soon as prepared they will be brought down. When brought down, I will discuss the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman, which I am not fully prepared to do at present.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AND DOMINION SAVINGS BANKS DEPOSITS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return showing the amount deposited in each of the Post Office and Dominion Savings Banks in the Dominion on the 1st of May last.

Mr. HAGGART. I desire to ask whether the hon. gentleman desires to obtain the amount deposited in each of the Post Office savings banks, or the total amount in the Post Office savings banks in the Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want the amount deposited in the several Dominion savings banks and the Post Office savings banks in the Dominion.

Mr. HAGGART. My officers inform me that it would be impossible to obtain this information, with the whole staff in the office, within from six to nine months, and at a cost of from five to six thousand dollars.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there not an annual return of the amounts deposited in the several Post Office savings banks?

Mr. HAGGART. No. There are over four hundred thousand depositors in these banks throughout the country. All these accounts would have to be examined in order to prepare such a report as is desired. I can give the hon. gentleman the total amount on deposit—of course, he can find it in the Canada Gazette—but I can tell him at once the amount on deposit in the Post Office savings banks on 1st May last.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the hon. gentleman misunderstands my motion. I do not ask for a return of the entire amount deposited by the depositors in the several savings banks, but I only want the gross sum deposited at each point.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand perfectly well the motion. The hon. gentleman wants the amount deposited, for example, in Ottawa, Perth, London or Kingston. The accounts are not kept so as to show the amount in the different towns or cities, but they are kept in the shape of deposit accounts, and the whole of these accounts would have to be gone into, the amounts in the different places added together, and a return prepared for each place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it not the case that each particular town is credited with a certain amount, and that this appears in the Public Accounts?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am merely speaking from recollection, and I cannot contradict the hon. gentleman. I would be very glad if my hon. friend would see his way to amend his motion so as to obtain from the Department a statement of the total of the sums below $400 in the hands of the Government in the Post Office Department. If, however, this were likely to delay the return asked for by my hon. friend, I would not wish to press such an amendment.

Mr. HAGGART. There might be new instructions given to the Department to make up these returns as they go on during the year. The hon. gentleman can see at once the impossibility of going through all these accounts and the expense involved in getting such a return now. If the hon. gentleman will let the matter wait until to-morrow, I will bring him a full explanation from the head of the Money Order Department, and the reasons given why it would be impossible to give this return now.

Mr. McMULLEN. Let it stand.

Motion postponed.

ANALYSIS OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. CURRAN moved for:

Return of all petitions addressed to the Government, praying for the analysis of intoxicating liquors manufactured or offered for sale, by wholesale or retail, in the Dominion of Canada.

He said: I make this motion, in the first place, for the purpose of discharging a public duty, and secondly, to fulfil a promise I made on the 1st October last when, as the House is aware, in every English-speaking community all over the world there was a series of celebrations commemorating the centenary of the birth of the Rev. Theobald Mathew, the great Apostle of Temperance. In the city of Montreal this celebration was conducted under the auspices of the Convention of Catholic Temperance Societies composed of the various total abstinence organizations, which associations have adopted a platform I have had the honor of reading before this House on more than one occasion. Amongst other reforms proposed by these temperance societies, they ask that a law be enacted for the analysis of intoxicating liquors manufactured or sold in the Dominion, either by wholesale or retail. On the occasion of the celebration to which I have referred many eloquent addresses and practical speeches were made, perhaps none more so than that delivered by the Rev. Father McCallen, of St. Patrick's Church, Montreal, who is the Apostle of Temperance in my own city. In the course of an able and eloquent address the reverend gentleman said:

"If a butcher sold tainted meat, a druggist compounded an injurious prescription, a baker adulterated his food product, they were pounced upon by the law; but those who send men to their homes, intellectual, physical and moral wrecks through the sale of adulterated beverages, which so quickly affect the brain, shatter the health, bring disease to the body and create an irresistible craving in the drunkard for still greater potations, did so with an impunity which is simply appalling to contemplate. We should, therefore, demand a law for the analysis of all alcoholic drinks, and see that it be rigidly enforced, not only by heavy fines but by imprisonment."

I took occasion, at the lay celebration of Father Mathew's centenary, to point out to those who are agitating for this reform, that, under the Revised Statutes of the Dominion of Canada, the Adulteration Act, 49 Victoria, chapter 107, section 17, the law did actually provide for such analysis of liquids; and it provided further as to what should constitute adulteration, by referring in the schedule of the Act to ingredients which are held to be drugs and injurious to health when used in conjunction with these beverages. It was shown further, that, whilst under the operation of that Act our blue-books contained the results of the investigation of the officers of the Government with regard to articles of food, even down to pepper and other commodities which are offered for sale by grocers and others, there was no such return with regard to any analysis having been made of intoxicating liquors. The physicians who delivered addresses on the occasion to which I refer pointed out, that, years ago, when pure intoxicating liquors were sold, there was comparatively little delirium tremens in the country, whereas, under the present state of things, that disease is very prevalent: and that it took but a very few years to reduce a man to the sad condition so eloquently described by Father McCallen in the extract from his speech which I have just read. I believe that the officers of the Government are being instructed to analyze liquors issued from compounderies and distilleries, but I am not aware that any such steps are to be taken with regard to places where liquors are sold by retail. In these places the great injury is really done, and I believe that every one will feel that it would be a very great improvement if the officers were instructed to make analysis of liquor sold by retail. Even if heavy fines and penalties and imprisonment were not imposed, as asked to be, upon those who sold adulterated beverages, as provided for in the law, the very fact that the name of a person so disposing of adulterated liquors would appear in the blue-books would be a great protection to the public, would have a very deterrent effect, and act as a warning to those who are in the habit of indulging in intoxicating liquors. I do not wish to detain the House longer, for I think it is only necessary to point out to the Government, and to the hon. Minister who is in charge of the Department which controls this matter, the wish of these temperance organizations which have done so much good as the offshoots of the work of Father Mathew. I, therefore, leave the matter in the hands of the Government, satisfied that steps will be promptly taken to carry into effect the desire of these worthy organizations.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There can be no objection to bringing down the papers at my disposal. I may state, with regard to the Excise law, that its operation gives thorough security to the public so far as the outcome from the distilleries is concerned. The requirements of the law and the regulations of the Department make it impossible for any spirits to emanate from the distilleries except in a pure condition. With regard to liquors sold by retailers, I agree with the mover of the address that there is the greatest necessity for inspection, but it involves great difficulty. When my hon. friend says that while analyses have been made of different items of food and drugs, none have been made of liquors, he is not, perhaps, aware that officers in the chief analyses branch of the Department have collected very large numbers of samples in different cities throughout the Dominion with the view of ascertaining the condition of the liquors sold by retailers. In many cases they have been proved to be not up to the standard; but it is very difficult to get at the real quantity of liquors sold in this way, because persons can easily furnish a sample of passable liquor when they know the purpose of the officer sent to collect samples, and in that way avoid having the real character of the liquor which they sell tested. Of course it is of great interest that every effort should be made to have some check imposed upon the retail trade, not only in cities, but in country places; and, so far as the Department is concerned, I am quite sure that everything possible within the means at its disposal will be done in the direction of meeting the views of my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of correspondence, papers, and all documents respecting steps taken by the Government during last session, or since that time, to prevent American cheese being shipped through or from Canadian ports, and branded as Canadian: also copies of the instructions now given to the proper authorities or preventive officers on the subject.—(Mr. Marshall.)

An abstract copy or copies of the manifest of the cargoes carried by the steamships subsidized to run between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies, on each voyage during the present year 1891; showing the character and value of the cargoes carried and the port or ports of landing and discharge of such cargoes, with an abstract of any other information given in such manifest; also how many trips were made by the steamer subsidized to carry on the steam service between the Maritime Provinces and the West India ports during the year 1890; what were the dates of such trips, what amounts were paid for each trip, what person or company is carrying out that service for the present year: also, what contracts have been entered into for such service this year, and what sums have been paid therefor.—(Mr. Davies, P.E.I.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 15th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No 39) respecting the Maritime Chemical Pulp Company (Limited), and to change the name thereof to "The Maritime Sulphite Fibre Company (Limited)."—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 40) respecting the Farmers' Bank of Rustico.—(Mr. Macdonald.)

Bill (No. 41) respecting the Canadian Power Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 42) to prevent frauds on farmers in the sale of seed grain and other articles.—(Mr. Burdett.)

UNITED STATES FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 10) respecting fishing vessels of the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this simply an extension of the modus vivendi for the current year?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes, in the same terms precisely as the Act of last year.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, and reported.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

On the Order being called for second reading of Bill (No. 8) to repeal the Act respecting the Electoral Franchise.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman let this Bill stand for to-day?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am quite willing to let it stand for to-day. The hon. gentleman is to understand, however, that we will not stand on the Order paper all session. I hope to move the second reading on Monday or Tuesday next.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might say Wednesday next, as Tuesday is Government day.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The Government does not appear to have any business ready, and I might be allowed to take the matter upon Tuesday. It is just as important as a Government measure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman can take Tuesday, provided it comes up after Government measures.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to move the second reading on Monday?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There are a number of members away on Monday.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am as anxious to have a full House as the hon. gentleman. If the House is full I shall move it on Monday, if I can; but, in any event, I will move it on Wednesday. Will the hon. gentleman make it the first Order for Monday?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That would not be fair to the other members having notices on the paper for Monday, but I have no doubt that it will be reached in its order.

LAKEPORT (ONT.) HARBOUR.

Mr. HARGRAFT asked, Whether the Government or House of Commons ever received a petition asking that a harbour of refuge be constructed at the village of Lakeport, in the County of Northumberland, on Lake Ontario? Did the Government ever despatch officers or engineers to investigate the work referred to in such petition? If so, on what date were they sent, and at whose request; and if taken from the work, when were they so taken? For what reasons? And is it the intention of the Government to go on with the work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It appears that a petition was presented in March, 1889, but I cannot lay my hands on it now. A survey was undertaken in 1891, on a promise that had been made by me to the predecessor of the hon. gentleman, that a survey would take place before the session. The order was given, and an engineer was sent on 17th February to examine and report. He worked about two weeks, but the report has not yet been laid before the Government.

DEEPENING OF THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. DELISLE (Translation) asked, What sums of money have been paid out since 1887, for the deepening of the River St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal? To whom were the said sums paid?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to answer the hon. member that from the 1st of February, 1887, to the 30th of June, 1889, the Montreal Harbour Commission have been paid $438,334.28. Different persons were paid from the 1st of July, 1889, to the 15th of May, 1891, $226,554.87; a total of $664,889.15. The works of the channel between the Quebec harbour and Montreal were resumed by the Department of Public Works in January, 1889, in conformity with the law. I cannot give the names of the persons to whom the different sums were paid; those names appear on the pay lists and on the vouchers, and it would probably require three weeks for their copying.

REVISING OFFICERS.

Mr. DELISLE (Translation) asked, Whether the Government is aware that several revising officers, charged with the duty of preparing the electoral lists, in the Province of Quebec, have during the late general elections taken a part in the contest, at the hustings? Is it aware, more especially, that Mr. Lacoursière, revising officer for the County of Portneuf, did in the manner aforesaid engage in the contest on the Government side? Has the Government any intention of putting an end to such abuses?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State, I beg to state that the information asked for has not been transmitted to the Government.

PUBLIC WORKS IN HASTINGS COUNTY.

Mr. BURDETT asked, Whether the Government intend to make any improvements in the navigation of the Bay of Quinté, between Belleville and Deseronto, during this season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Governement has not yet come to any decision on this subject.

Mr. BURDETT asked, Whether the Government intend to erect public buildings in the town of Deseronto or village of Tweed and Madoc during the next fiscal year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not yet considered these matters.

BRAE HARBOUR, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have tenders been asked for, for works on wharf or breakwater at the Brae Harbour, Prince County, Prince Edward Island? If so, is the contract let; to whom, and for what amount?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Tenders have been asked for works at the Brae Harbour. The contract has been awarded to Hugh McFee for $850.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND TUNNEL.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether the Government have received from Sir Douglas Fox, either by telegraph or mail, estimates of the cost of building a tunnel across the Straits of Northumberland, from Prince Edward Island to the mainland? If so, at what amount does he estimate the cost?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government has received from Sir Douglas Fox by mail, estimates of the cost of building a tunnel across the Straits of Northumberland from Prince Edward Island to the mainland. The estimated cost from shaft to shaft, with land tunnel and contingencies, is as follows: For a tunnel 11 feet in diameter, £1,075,200; 16 feet diameter, £1,971,800; 18 feet diameter, £2,252,500.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask without notice, whether it is the intention of the Government to construct that work?

Mr. FOSTER. Put that on the Notice paper.

ILLEGAL SEIZURE OF LIQUOR.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Has the Government been informed that Eugène Hammond, an alleged officer of Customs, at Montmagny, has illegally seized and confiscated a certain quantity of liquor belonging to F. X. Lamonde, tavern keeper at Montmagny; and that after having sent it up to Quebec, he was afterwards obliged to give it back to the said Lamonde, inasmuch as the duty upon it had been paid in due form? If the Government is aware of the facts of the above case, does it propose to reimburse the said Lamonde for the expenses which this illegal act has put him to, and for the damage which he has suffered? Does the Government propose to remove this officer?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government has no knowledge or report of any seizure of the kind referred to having been made.

CLAIM FOR INDEMNITY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay to Miss Lea Caron, of St. Roch de Québec, a sufferer by the accident which happened on the Intercolonial Railway, in December last, at St. Joseph de Lévis, an indemnity, and the amount of doctor's fee of some $40?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sorry to say that we cannot answer that question definitely at the present time. The matter is, I understand, in litigation, and until that is concluded it is impossible to say what can be done.

STANDARD TIME.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved for:

Copies of all letters, communications and reports in the possession of the Government, relating to the fixing of a standard of time and the legalization thereof.

He said: Owing to the great extent of the Dominion there is great diversity throughout the country in the reckoning of time, and it is desirable, I think, that some steps should be taken to fix a standard of time for different parts of the country. At present our time is reckoned by railway time, but there is no authority for that. The consequence is that many duties are performed illegally or incorrectly; for instance, the opening and closing of the polls for the election of members of Parliament, the closing of banks, the protesting of notes, etc., are all done according to railway time, which is not the solar or local time. This may give rise to some difficulty. Of late a great deal of attention has been given to the subject of the proper method of reckoning time, and I have lately read a very interesting article in the Engineering Magazine, which states that some very valuable communications on this subject have been sent to the various colonial Governments, asking their opinions on the subject. I think it is desirable that we should know whether any of these communications have been received by the Government, and if so, that they should be brought down, and that at the same time the Government should have an opportunity of saying whether they intend to legalize the standard of time which has been adoptod, but for which, as I have said, no legal authority at present exists.

Mr. TUPPER. I may say that there are in my Department some very interesting papers touching this subject, including an interesting report from the director of the Meteorological Service, occasioned by the communication referred to by the hon. gentleman, which was sent by the Imperial Government as a circular letter to the colonial Governments on the subject of fixing a standard of time. All these papers I shall have prepared and brought down. I may say that the question of introducing legislation in conformity with that report and those representations, is now under consideration.

Motion agreed to.

SAVINGS BANKS DEPOSITS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return showing the amount deposited in each of the Post Office and Dominion Savings Banks in the Dominion on the 1st of May last.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no objection to bringing down the return now asked for and having it ready for the 30th June, 1891, as the extra expense will be very slight. But to prepare the information asked for in the first instance would be almost impossible, as it would entail an examination of 450,000 accounts and the copying and verifying of 110,000 balances—a labour which, under the statute, is only done once a year.

DISMISSAL—J. R. GRAHAM.

Mr. BARRON moved for:

Return of all papers, letters and documents in any way whatever relating to the dispensing with the services of J. R. Graham, of Fenelon Falls, as Fishery Inspector or Overseer within the County of Victoria, and of all communications with or representations to the Government, or any member thereof, or any officer or clerk in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, relating to the said J. R. Graham and the performance of his duties prior to dispensing with his services: and of all new rules and regulations (if any) for the appointment of Fishery Inspectors in said county and the performance of their duties.

He said: While it is my desire to have these papers brought down, my chief desire, I confess, is to draw attention to what I conceive to be improper conduct on the part of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in regard to the dismissal of J. R. Graham. It appears to have been the practice, prior to the recent elections, to threaten all officers of Departments with dismissal unless they chose to support candidates running in the Government interest. Now, the gentleman whose name is mentioned in this motion had been for many years a Conservative and a supporter of the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite; but recently, believing in his wisdom that the policy of the Liberal party was in the general interests of the country, he decided to support the gentleman who now has the honour to address the House, in preference to his opponent. The consequence was his actions were watched, and communications were written to him with the view of drawing him into some correspondence with the Department and finding some fault with him in the discharge of his duties. And with what result? Quite lately, for no reason whatever except that he chose to support me, that gentleman was dismissed and cast upon the world utterly destitute, without means to support himself and family. It appears strange that the Government should feel themselves so hard pressed at election times that they should resort to such unfair means and endeavour to coerce, by threats of dismissal, officials into supporting them. Mr. Graham was aware of the whip being held over his shoulders, but nevertheless thought it was his duty to support the Liberal party and did so, with the result that he has recently been discharged on that ground alone. No word has ever been heard against the manner in which he performed his duty. So far as I have learned, and I have made enquiries, he has always been considered a good officer who did his work faithfully and well. I have no doubt whatever that if all the papers are brought down, we will find some peculiar underhand work has been going on, at the instance, no doubt, of my opponent, with the view of getting this gentleman discharged from the office which he filled until recently with satisfaction to the public and some emolument to himself. I place this motion in your hands, Sir, and hope all the papers will be brought down, not only the communications had with the Department by my late opponent, but which passed between him and Mr. Gordon of the Department, because I believe—in fact my opponent has made a boast of it—that he is the gentleman who got Mr. Graham discharged.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no objection to this motion, but I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would have been better and would have saved a good deal of the time of the House had he refrained from making the serious statement he has just made until he could see by the papers whether there are any grounds for it. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Graham was threatened, before the elections, with dismissal, if he should support the hon. gentleman. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman meant to convey to the House that such a threat was communicated, directly or indirectly, from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but I desire to say that no such threats were ever heard of by myself, nor am I aware that any were made. The hon. gentleman says this poor man has been thrown on the world destitute. I suppose he was in receipt of the not very handsome salary which the fishery officers generally obtain, about $150 per year; but it may give the hon. gentleman some pleasure to know that Mr. Graham is not dismissed. I am not aware that he has been thrown upon the world starving, or that his pay has been stopped: but I am aware that very serious charges have been preferred against this man, and I have gone into a most thorough investigation, the end of which has not been reached; but when the papers are brought down I am sure the hon. gentleman will be induced to take back the insinuations he has cast across the House in advance of the information asked for. This information, I submit, should be before us before any such criticism as that which the hon. gentleman has made, should be addressed to the House.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTY PAYMENTS.

Mr. FLINT moved for:

A comparative statement for the years 1882 to 1891, inclusive, (by Provinces) of: (a.) Total number of bounty claims received by Department: (b.) Total number paid; (c.) Number of vessels, tonnage, and number of men entitled to bounty in each year; (d.) Number of boats among which bounty was distributed, and number of men engaged in boat-fishing receiving bounty: (e.) Total number of men receiving bounty; (f.) Total annual payments of fishing bounty.

Mr. FORBES. I would like to ask the House, with the consent of the mover, to allow me to propose that the words "and by counties" be added to the motion.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. member and the hon. mover of the motion will find that all the information in detail which the mover has asked for, and also the information as to the returns by counties which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) desires, are to be found in the report now in their hands on page 18 in Appendix No. 2. I had the statement carefully prepared.

Mr. BARRON.

Mr. FLINT. Are the returns there for 1891?

Mr. TUPPER. I forgot to add, that it is impossible to give the returns for the year 1891 until the end of the year.

Mr. FLINT. Does the statement in the report include all the items I have asked for here?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes; if there is any one item in the motion which is omitted, another motion will at once bring the information.

Motion withdrawn.

COUNTY OF HASTINGS MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BURDETT moved for:

Return of all petitions, reports and papers in reference to the carrying of the mail between Reed Post Office and Shannonville, in the County of Hastings.

He said: This is somewhat similar to a motion made last year in respect to the same matter. I am not aware, although that motion passed, that any return has been made, but, if a return has been made, I only ask now for papers which have been received by the Department since that return. After my stating the causes of complaint last year, the Postmaster General was good enough to say that he would see, by making enquiry, if the present system was satisfactory, and if it was not he would make the necessary change. I trust he has been able to inform himself on the subject in the meantime, and I am certain that, if he has received honest information, he will come to the conclusion that a change should be made. The post office at Melrose lies between Shannonville on the south and Reed on the north, and in justice to the people, and in view of the efficiency of the mail service, the mail should start from Reed each morning, going to Melrose by way of Blessington, and then to Shannonville, to meet the noon train, returning that evening. By that means the people of Melrose, Blessington and Reed would be placed in communication both with the east and the west. As it is at present, the mail starts from Melrose in the morning, goes to Shannonville, receives the mail, goes back to Melrose, and then, by way of Blessington to Reed, and goes back to Melrose in the evening. Thus the people of Blessington and Reed have no opportunity to read and answer their correspondence upon the same day. If the mails were delivered in the evening and taken away in the morning, those people would have all the evening and part of the next morning to open, peruse and answer their mail matter. It is a matter of great importance to these people, who live in an old-settled and populous part of the country, where a considerable amount of business is done. There is another reason for the change which I consider important. Considerable sums of money are almost daily sent from these places to Belleville and Napanee to meet bills incurred in that vicinity. Under the present system the money has to remain over at Melrose. The Post Office Department has not provided proper accommodation there, and at any time the mail may be destroyed by fire or taken by other means. I am not for a moment attacking the integrity or efficiency of the postmasters or mail carriers. On the contrary, I believe they perform their duties efficiently, according to their contract with the Government. I am simply asking for expedition, safety and efficiency in the service, and nothing more. Contrary to the opinion expressed by the Postmaster General the other day, I conceive that it is of the greatest importance to carry the mails efficiently, even if the cost of carrying them should be greater than the income. I understand that a great number of the hon. gentleman's friends, and supporters as well as opponents of the Government, are interested in this matter and are desirous to have the change made; and I think the Postmaster General should make the change even if it should be necessary to pay the mail carrier a little more for this service. All I ask is efficiency, expedition and safety in the conduct of this mail, and that the service should be performed in the interest of the people. I think if the Postmaster General takes the proper steps to inform himself on this subject, he will cause the change I have indicated to be made.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman I may state, as I stated last session, that when I let the contract I acted upon the best advice I was in possession of; and, as I then told the hon. gentleman, the contract was let on trial for a year to see how it would work. I have had no communication that I am aware of from any one in that section of the country, since last session, in reference to it. As the hon. gentleman states, I made enquiries myself to find out whether there could be an improvement, with very little expense, on the present manner of carrying the mails. I find out by the report of my inspector that the route could be improved, perhaps, in the direction indicated by the hon. gentleman, and it is my intention, at some time soon, to give notice to the contractor that I intend to terminate the contract and make such arrangements as I think will be acceptable to the people of that neighbourhood.

Mr. BURDETT. I am well satisfied with the statements of the Postmaster General. I understood from a resident there that a petition had been sent down to the Post Office Department, and that is the reason I made the motion; but on the assurance of the Postmaster General—I know he will keep his word— I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAGGART. I am not certain that there was no petition, but in all the papers I have in my possession at present, there is no petition—but there may be one.

Mr. BURDETT. I do not desire to give the hon. Minister any unnecessary trouble; his word that he will look into the matter is quite sufficient.

Motion withdrawn.

STATEMENTS OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Return giving comparative statement of Receipts and Expenditures from 1st July, 1890, to 10th May, 1891, and from 1st July, 1889, to 10th May, 1890.

He said: I would just say to the Minister of Finance that it would save him and myself some little trouble if he would kindly give us these ten days' statements during the ensuing month, to be laid on the Table as a matter of course, without further notice, as he knows that, preparatory to a Budget discourse, it is well that we should be advised up to the latest moment how the expenditures stand. In the meantime I will move this motion, and would be glad if he would undertake to let us have, on the last of the month, these statements as soon as convenient after the dates arrive.

Mr. FOSTER. I will have that done.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 16) to amend the Acts relating to the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Lake Temiscamingue Colonization Railway Company.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

Bill (No. 23) respecting the E. B. Eddy Manufacturing Company, and to change its name to The E. B. Eddy Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the McKay Milling Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

ADJOURNMENT—THE ESTIMATES—TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that the Minister of Finance has not brought down the Estimates. I would be glad if he would tell us when he expects to present them, and give us some idea when he is likely to make his Budget statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid my hon. friend has not exercised his memory well. I think I said the other day that I would bring down the Estimates on Friday or Monday. As they have not been brought down on Friday, I shall have to ask for the extension of time that I gave myself, until Monday, when I hope to have them down. In reference to the Budget speech, I hope to deliver it in about a week after the production of the Estimates, and I will give further notice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman knows that it is a matter of convenience to all of us to know when that will be done. The hon. gentleman will not be in a position to deliver it next week?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. BARRON. Before the House adjourns I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that last session the First Minister promised that the report of the Trent Valley Canal Commission should be, during the recess between the two sessions, placed in the hands of hon. members. He also promised, though, perhaps, it was a conditional promise, that the evidence upon which the commissioners arrived at their conclusion, should also be printed and distributed, in order that the members might have an intelligent understanding of the subject before the House met again. Now, yesterday, the hon. member for one of the ridings of Hasting, in my absence, asked a question of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and to that question he could get no satisfaction whatsoever. I have simply asked the question, if the Trent Valley Canal Commissioners had reported in favour of the completion of the scheme—a perfectly proper question, requiring an affirmative or a negative answer, either one thing or the other. It was not a question which suggested that an opinion was to be expressed by the Minister, and, therefore, the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett) was entitled to an answer, which he could not get, from the Minister of Public Works. Although my hon. friend, as a representative of the people, could not obtain an answer to his question, I find that the First Minister, on March 3rd, just prior to the general election, sent the following telegram :—

"From Kingston, Time, 1:25, March 3rd, 1891.

"To D. R. Murphy, Trenton:

"The Trent Valley Canal Commission having reported favourably on the completion of the scheme, Parliament will be asked in the Estimates next session for a grant for the purpose.

(Signed) "JOHN A. MACDONALD."

I should like to ask if it is proper for a member of the Executive to refuse to give to a member of Parliament that information which a Minister will give to one of his supporters just prior to an election? I find that when my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Burdett) complained that he had received scant courtesy at the hands of the Minister of Public Works—and I say he did receive scant courtesy, because the question was a fair, proper and legitimate one, requiring either an affirmative or a negative answer, and such an answer he did not get—the Minister said that his answer was the one given to him to convey to the House. Who gave the hon. Minister that answer?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman cannot refer to a former debate.

Mr. BARRON. I submit, with all deference, that it was not exactly a debate to which I was referring.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works was made on a motion for the adjournment of the House, yesterday.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the answer was in reply to a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barron) has just referred, was a statement made by Sir Hector Langevin on the motion for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BURDETT. I think Mr. Speaker is correct. The statement was made on the motion for adjournment.

Mr. BARRON. My chief object is to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett) has not been able to get an answer to a proper question, information as to which the First Minister thought fit to communicate to one of his supporters just prior to the last general election. And yesterday, when one of the representatives of the people asked that question he was politely, though I say with scant courtesy, refused it. I would ask the Minister of Public Works, if, in pursuance of the promise made last session by the First Minister, the report will be placed in the hands of members immediately, because the report is printed, and also, if possible, the evidence on which the commissioners arrived at the conclusion, for the promise was made last session that the evidence would be printed as speedily as possible, and would be placed in the hands of members before the then next session. Surely these documents are ready now and can be placed in the hands of members without the necessity of a motion being passed, as, if a motion were placed on the Notice paper, it might not be reached for some time, and it is absolutely necessary, in view of the promise of the First Minister, that the matter should be discussed as soon as possible, and it cannot be discussed intelligibly unless the report and evidence are placed in the hands of members without delay.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. member has alluded to the debate of yesterday, I may be permitted to offer a few remarks in answer to the observations he has just made. When the question came up yesterday, I gave the answer that had been placed in my hands. No doubt the hon. gentleman was perfectly well aware that it was not a matter coming within my Department, and I gave the hon. gentleman the best answer I could under the circumstances, in the absence of the First Minister. The hon. member called my attention to the fact that I had not answered the second portion of the first question. I answered in this way: that I had not seen the report, and was not in a position to give an answer to that part of the question. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Barron) stated that the First Minister sent a telegram on 3rd March last, stating that the report of the Commission had been received, and so on. That may have been done; I did not know it. That telegram was one from the First Minister to an outside party. It was sent during the election, and, of course, I did not know it. If the First Minister has made a promise, he will do, as he has always done—he will keep his word; if he promised to bring the matter before the House, he will bring it up. If the First Minister promised that copies of the reports should be placed in the hands of members during the recess, the hon. gentleman will see that the reason why it was not done was that Parliament was dissolved, and, therefore, there were no members to whom to send copies of the report. The election has taken place, Parliament has been called, and no time has been lost, if the report is in the hands of the Railways and Canals Department, as no doubt it is. So far as the information is concerned, although I could not give it to the hon. gentleman, he cannot be in such great haste, because he evidently knows that the report was favourable, for he has quoted a telegram from the First Minister.

Mr. BURDETT. The whole difficulty has arisen from the Minister of Public Works not permitting my question to stand until the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was present to give an answer to my question. When I learned that the Minister of Public Works was only giving the answer placed in his hands, and had no personal knowledge of the matter himself, I felt I could not expect him to give an answer very different from the one he did give: but that was a perfectly good reason for permitting the question to stand until the Minister of Railways was in his place, when he could give the information desired. Had I got an answer either in the negative or affirmative, I would have followed it up with a question as to whether the telegram which my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Barron) has read, was sent by the First Minister to Mr. Murphy, and then we would have had some basis on which to found a motion. Outside of the technical nature of the question and answer, there is the broad subject as to the completion of this canal or the abandonment of the work. It is improper that the time of the House, session after session, should be occupied in discussing matters of this character, as to whether public works are simply kept before the public and spasmodic efforts made towards their completion just prior to or during an election, or whether these public works are undertaken and carried on in the public interest, no matter at what time they are undertaken, either before, during or after an election. This is an old and important undertaking, and I respectfully submit to the Minister of Public Works and to the Government, that the time has now arrived, in the history of this undertaking, when the representatives of the people ought to know whether the Government intend with due expedition to go forward and complete the work. If they arrive at the conclusion that this work is not of sufficient national importance to warrant the expenditure of the large sum of money that will be necessarily required to complete it, and if they say to the House that they feel that in the interests of the public they are unable to go on with it because it is not in the interests of the whole Dominion, then I will be prepared to carefully consider the question. There are many people who think that the public works of the Dominion are abreast, or somewhat in advance of the public requirements, and are certainly abreast, if not in advance of the resources of the Dominion, and that it probably would be more prudent, in the interest of the development of this country, that we should go somewhat slower in spending the public money in building public works, until they are absolutely necessary in the public interest. I am not speaking to make political capital or political interest, because the work does not go through my riding, neither does it affect me individually, if I put it upon the low ground of personal political gain; I am only speaking in the general interest and to save the time of the House, because our lives are short in any case, and they will be very much shorter if we have to remain here through the dog-days, debating questions of procedure as to whether we ought to get answers to questions and as to whether public works in course of construction for thirty or forty years shall be completed or not.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 18th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS—MILEAGE.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 43) to further amend chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes, entitled An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons. He said: Those members of the present House who were members of the last Parliament will remember that an hon. gentleman who then sat for Shelburne, N.S., was awarded by the pay clerk mileage for the whole distance from the city of London, England, to Ottawa, to attend Parliament. I brought the matter before the House at that time, and I think it right that we should provide against any incident of that kind taking place again. The Bill proposes to amend the statute so as to make it clear that a member of the Senate or the House of Commons shall only be entitled to mileage from his residence, which must be in Canada, to the seat of Government.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 44) to amend chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the safety of ships. He said: This Bill is for the purpose of preventing passenger ships from carrying dangerous explosives. In Canada to-day we have no such legislation, while in the United States and in England there is legislation of this very necessary character. The Bill is based largely on the English Act.

Mr. LISTER. Does it include refined petroleum?

Mr. TUPPER. It includes a good many dangerous things.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. AMYOT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 45) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to fix thirty days after the polling day for the contestation of elections, instead of leaving it entirely to the discretion of the returning officer. The Bill is very short, in fact containing only one clause. I presented the same Bill two years ago and three years ago. Two years ago it took one month to print it, though I had given it to the proper officers in both French and English. I expect that this year the printers will be less busy, and will print the Bill sooner.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the House goes into the Orders of the Day, I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the great importance in the public interest of his pressing forward the Bill which he had given notice of his intention to introduce to-day, but which he did not introduce—to amend the law respecting the safety of ships. It was my intention to make a few remarks on that subject. The hon. gentleman knows that on the 19th of June next, I think it is, the English law regulating the load-line will come into force, so far as it concerns Canadian ships sailing from British ports, and he knows that a great deal of anxiety is felt in the various ports of the Dominion on the subject. He has seen a large number of petitions from important shipping centres tabled here to-day, and I have no doubt he has also received private letters from leading shipping men of the Dominion, pressing this Bill on his attention. The Bill is of such great importance, that I fancy it will have to be printed and sent out, so that those specially interested may have an opportunity of examining its provisions. I, therefore, desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, in view of the very short time which remains before the English Bill comes into operation, to the great importance of his introducing the Bill and having it printed and circulated, in order that, if possible, it may be passed and come into operation before the 19th of June.

Mr. TUPPER. I am very glad to find that the hon. gentleman appreciates the great importance of the Bill to which he makes reference. I am also very glad to be able to say to the House, that I have already taken occasion to send the information to the ports of the Dominion most interested; and in order to enable us to deal successfully with this important measure, the authorities of the Imperial Board of Trade have intimated to the Government here that the period at which legislation was expected from this Parliament under the Imperial Act, the 9th of June next, will be extended by the non-enforcement of the Act until October next, so that none of our ships will be embarrassed by the application of the rules under the Imperial Load Line Act until that date. In the meanwhile it is most desirable, in fact it is necessary, that the measure we introduce shall be on principles acceptable to the Imperial authorities, and I am engaged now, with the assistance of those officers whose help I can command, in preparing a draft; and as soon as that work is completed, I shall lose no time in laying it before the House, so that it will have, as I have no doubt it will have, the careful attention of all those interested in securing for the wooden ships of this country the opportunity of successfully carrying on their business.

ENQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to remind the hon. Minister of Public Works that on Friday last, at the meeting of the Privileges and Elections Committee, an order was made for the production before that committee of a number of documents from his Department relating to certain specified contracts. These were ordered to be brought to the committee room in charge of some officer of the Department, so that members of the committee might have an opportunity of inspecting them. I have twice been to the committee room to-day, and I have ascertained that they have not been brought yet. An enquiry has been made at the Department, and they are not ready to be brought, and the departmental officers cannot say when they will be ready. From the well-known business habits of the hon. Minister of Public Works, I am sure that he must have all the papers in his Department so arranged that they can be readily obtained, and I hope he will give his personal attention to the matter and see that the committee is not any longer delayed for that reason.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The committee met on Friday and gave that order, which reached the Department the next day, Saturday, and my officers went to work at once. I enquired on Saturday morning before the Council met. To-day I enquired again, and was told by my officers that they are looking for the papers. The hon. gentleman will remember that the motion was not a divided motion, but that certain papers are asked for together, and they must be classified on the different subjects of the enquiry, which must take more time than if all the papers were to be thrown together. Then, as the originals are to be delivered to the committee, by order of the committee, I of course gave orders that a tabulated statement be made, showing what papers are delivered and to what subject they relate, in order that there may be no mistake, and to prevent loss. The clerk of the committee will be answerable for their safety, and be bound to give them up when required. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the papers will be brought down as fast as possible.

Mr. EDGAR. Can the hon. gentleman give some idea of when we may have these papers? He says they are being classified under five or six different heads. If we cannot have them all, why not have some of the heads?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman must know that the papers belong to different years, and each year is fyled away separately, which occasions more delay in collecting them. They will, however, be all produced at the earliest possible opportunity.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 39) respecting the Maritime Chemical Pulp Company, Limited, and to change the name thereof to the Maritime Sulphite Fibre Company, Limited.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 40) respecting the Farmers' Bank of Rustico.—(Mr. Macdonald, P.E.I.)

Bill (No. 41) respecting the Canadian Power Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1st. Whether the Government is aware of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refusing to operate the L'Avenir Branch of their line, formerly known as the "South-Eastern Railway," and removing the rails from that portion of the said road, which railway has been subsidized by the County of Drummond and the Legislature of Quebec, and has been declared by this Parliament to be a work for the general advantage of Canada? 2nd. Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any action in the matter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government is not aware of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refusing to operate the L'Avenir branch of their line, formerly known as the South-Eastern Railway. The Government has no power to force the railway company to operate that branch.

STEAM VESSEL ON GEORGIAN BAY.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Whether the Government have recently contracted for the construction of a steel steam vessel for fishery protection on Georgian Bay? Was the contract let by tender, and if not, why not? To whom was the contract given, and the price to be paid?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government have made a contract, and the contract was not let by tender for the following special reasons :—There is but one firm, the Polson Iron Works Company, on the great lakes, who could build the screw steamer required, and this steamer is built according to special specifications and terms submitted by Lieut. Gordon, commander of the Fishery Protection Fleet, and Capt. Harbottle, Inspector of Hulls, Toronto. The contract price was $40,000 ; $30,000 in cash, and the Polson Company agreed to take a cruiser, now owned by the Government, in part payment, at a valuation of $9,000, being about the sum that vessel, with repairs, cost the Government. The date of the contract is 14th March, 1891.

POSTMASTER AT KENTVILLE, N.S.

Mr. BORDEN asked, Whether the postmaster at Kentville, N.S., has been suspended? If so, when and why? Who is the acting postmaster? What is the salary of the office, and who is now receiving it?

Mr. HAGGART. The postmaster was suspended 14th January, 1891, on account of deficiency in his accounts. Mr. J. M. Ward, clerk from the post office at Halifax, is in charge of the office. The salary of the postmaster at Kentville is $840. This is at present retained by the Department towards meeting the cost of keeping a clerk in charge and paying an assistant, Miss Eaton, who receives $5 per week.

ELECTORAL DIVISIONS, N.W.T.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether the Government proposes to make a re-arrangement of the electoral divisions of the North-West Territories, before the general elections are held there? If such is its intention, will the re-arrangement be made in an equitable and fitting manner, so as to permit of the French settlements being represented in a manner suitable to their population and their importance?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That question is now receiving the consideration of the Government.

FISHERY PROTECTION—SUPPLIES.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Whether the supplies required by the crews of Government vessels engaged in the Fishery Protection Service are purchased by tender or by private contract?

Mr. TUPPER. These supplies are purchased by private contract, with instructions to the officers to obtain them at the lowest market rates in each case.

PUBLIC EMPLOYÉS IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. BRODEUR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to dismiss those public employés who took an active part in politics during the last Dominion elections, and who were guilty of insulting their political opponents in an offensive manner?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Whenever a complaint is made of improper conduct on the part of any public employés, an investigation will be held in regard to it.

NORTH NATION RIVER WHARF.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, What steps have been taken by the Government toward the construction of a wharf on North Nation River, in the parish of Angélique, County of Ottawa ; when were such steps taken, and how much money has been expended in connection therewith ; has the wharf been completed, and if not, when is it proposed to complete it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed by my Department that this work, the hon. gentleman speaks of, has not been undertaken by the Department, and no expenditure has been made for the construction of that wharf.

HULL POST OFFICE CLOCK.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, When does the Government intend completing the tower of the post office of Hull city, and is it the intention to place a clock therein? Was the contractor obliged to add the clock, and if so, why was this part of the contract not carried out?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The tower as it stands now is completed as far as intended. It is not at present the intention to place a clock therein. The contractor was not obliged to add the clock, as it was not part of his contract.

COTEAU LANDING WHARF.

Mr. MOUSSEAU (translation) asked, Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government, and in particular within that of the hon. Minister of Public Works, that the wharf at Côteau Landing, the property of the Government, on which is erected a shed built for the purpose of housing freight and sheltering passengers, is now under the exclusive control of two agents of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company ; that they retain possession of the keys of the shed on this wharf, and that they refuse entry and access to this shed to the freight carried by other steamboats, such as the Garnet and the Chaffey? If the Government is acquainted with these facts will it divulge the reasons for this conduct ; and has the Government any intention of permitting this state of affairs to continue?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). A lease was granted to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company on 20th August, 1875, and this lease is still in existence. It gives the company the right of building a road 800 feet long to reach the Government pier ; of constructing and using a shed on this wharf ; and of levying and collecting tolls established by Order in Council for the use of the road. Such privileges are granted the lessees during Her Majesty's good pleasure, on the payment of a sum of $25 a year. The question goes further, and contains a complaint that the company does not allow two steamboats, the Garnet and the Chaffey, to use the shed. I purpose to inquire in the matter, in order to see whether any remedy can be secured.

CAVALRY SCHOOL IN TORONTO.

Mr. DENISON asked, When is it the intention of the Government to organize the Cavalry School in Toronto?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The subject-matter of this question is now under the consideration of the Government.

POUND-NET LICENSES—LAKE ST. CLAIR.

Mr. LISTER asked, Whether pound-net licenses have been issued for Lake St. Clair in each year from 1884 to 1891 inclusive? If not, in what years during that period were no such licenses granted?

Mr. TUPPER. Pound-net licenses were issued for Lake St. Clair in each year from 1884 to 1891 inclusive.

DUNDAS AND WATERLOO MACADAMIZED ROAD.

Mr. BAIN asked, At what date was the Order in Council passed respecting the ownership of the Dundas and Waterloo macadamized road? At what date was the Order in Council officially communicated to the Ontario Government? Has Dr. Walker presented any claim for damages in any way respecting the road, or has any allowance been made to him in settlement; if so, how much? Has Dr. Walker presented to the Government any statement of his receipts from and expenditure on the road from the month of April, 1885, when he entered into possession of the road, till he ceased to control it at a recent date? Has the Government any knowledge that Dr. Walker has sold and conveyed a brick house and site formerly used as a toll-gate on said road; and if so, has the sale been cancelled?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Order in Council respecting the ownership of the Dundas and Waterloo macadamized road is dated 11th December, 1890. The Order in Council was communicated to the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario by the Department of the Secretary of State on the 20th December of the same year. Dr. Walker has not presented a claim for damages, and no settlement has been arrived at with him. A statement of receipts and expenditure has been sent to this Department by the Department of Justice, through Messrs. McCarthy, Hoskins & Creelman, dated the 3rd April last, on behalf of Dr. Walker, showing the receipts and expenditure from 1884 to 1890 inclusive. To the above are added further payments made in the purchase of the road by Dr. Walker, and interest, and so on. The Department has no knowledge of the sale of the brick house referred to in the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid I shall have to ask my hon. friend to be satisfied with a somewhat general answer to-day, and, if more minute information is asked, it would be well to put it in the form of a motion and have the return called for. The High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, received the $10,000, the amount of his salary. He also received the allowance of $2,000 as given here. The clerks in the offices received the amount of $7,477. Distressed Canadians received the amount of $25.33. With reference to all the other questions, the parties or companies that rendered the services received the pay, and the municipalities and governments that imposed the taxation received the tax.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would it not have been as well for the Finance Minister to have made that manly answer the first day I put the question?

Mr. FOSTER. I answered your question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You denied the question the first day.

REWARD TO CAPTAIN OF AMERICAN SCHOONER SEIGFREID.

Mr. FLINT asked, Upon whose recommendation was the reward of a watch granted to Captain Peterson, master of the American schooner Seigfreid, for rescuing the crew of the schooner Blizzard of Lunenburg, burnt at sea in October, 1890?

Mr. TUPPER. The reward was granted upon the recommendation of the following people:—The master of the Blizzard, the collectors of the ports of Lunenburg and Shelburne, and the United States consular agent at Shelburne, followed by the recommendation of the Deputy Minister of Marine.

INDIANS IN ANTIGONISH AND GUYSBORO'—MEDICAL SUPERINTENDENCE.

Mr. FRASER asked, What was the amount paid annually for medical superintendence of the Indians in Antigonish and Guysboro' for the three years preceding the month of May, A.D. 1889? Who has performed the duties in said counties since that date? Why were the services of Doctors Cadigan and McKinnon dispensed with?

Mr. DEWDNEY. To the first portion of the hon. gentleman's question, I may state that in the year 1886-87, $55.30 were paid; in 1887-88, $155.02 were paid; in 1888-89, $112.70 were paid. Doctors Cadigan, McKinnon and Cameron performed the medical duties for the Indians since May, 1889. The doctors are not engaged for any particular time, the agents securing the services of medical men as they are required.

PETERBOROUGH POST OFFICE.

Mr. BARRON asked, Who was the contractor for the erection and construction of the Peterborough post office building? What was the contract price? What amount (if anything) was paid to him by the Government for extras over and above the first contract price? What further sum was paid to finally complete and equip the building, exclusive of furnishing, and to whom?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contractor was John E. Askwith. The contract price was $16,500. For extras, there was paid to him the sum of $1,642.56 above the first contract price. There were also paid to J. E. Askwith the following sums: for clock tower, $2,300; for post office fittings, $2,500; for fence walls, etc., $1,162; for granolithic pavement, $1,272.21; for coal bins, $373. Paid Chanteloup for letter-box fronts, $1,863.82. Paid McAndrews & Noble for heating apparatus, $1,270.75. Paid J. McLelland for clock, $1,895. Paid Peterboro' Gas Company for fixtures, $198.56.

LINDSAY POST OFFICE.

Mr. BARRON asked, Who was the contractor for the erection and construction of the Lindsay post office building? What was the contract price? What amount (if anything) was paid to him by the Government for extras over and above the first contract price? What further sum was paid to finally complete and equip the building, exclusive of furnishing, and to whom?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contractor was Patrick Navin. Contract price, $16,497. Paid to him for extras over and above contract price, $2,960.43. The following further sums were paid: P. Navin, post office fittings, $1,600; P. Navin, boundary walls and fences, $655; P. Navin, detached water closet, $198; P. Navin, granolithic sidewalk, $941; P. Navin, artesian well, pump and cistern, $488; P. Navin, lifting and relaying church drain, $398.40; P. Navin, connecting drain with street drain, $142.50; P. Navin, extension of building, east side, $544; Edward Woods, heating, $1,574.45; Chanteloup, letter-box fronts, $1,078.25; Edward Woods, gas fixtures, $138.

GALT POST OFFICE.

Mr. BARRON asked, Who was the contractor for the erection and construction of the Galt post office building? What was the contract price? What amount (if anything) was paid to him by Government for extras over and above the first contract price? What further sum was paid to finally complete and equip the building, exclusive of furnishing, and to whom?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contractor was M. A. Piggott. Contract price, $2,100. Paid to him for extras, $761.45. The following further sums were paid to M. A. Piggott: for post office fittings, $2,295; for Customs and Inland Revenue, $857; for water closets, $130; for retaining wall, $1,138; for stamp vendor's office screen, postmaster's office, and mail porch, $567. Paid McGuire & Bond, heating apparatus, $1,323. Paid Chanteloup, letter lock boxes, $1,324. Paid Harrison Bag Rack Company, $55. Paid R. Forsyth, granolithic pavement, $645.82. Paid H. H. Dakin, gas fixtures, $235.

WIARTON HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. BARRON asked, Who was the contractor for the harbour works at Wiarton? What was the contract price? Was additional work decided upon and asked for by Government? Did the same contractor get the additional work? What was the price thereof? Were tenders asked for each additional work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Contractor, David Porter; contract price, $5,900. Additional work was decided upon, namely, the placing of fender piles and stone talus around the work. Mr. Porter executed this work for the sum of $1,175. Tenders were not asked for this additional work.

BEAVERTON HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. BARRON asked, Who was the contractor for the Beaverton harbour works? What was the contract price? Was additional work decided upon and asked for by Government? Did the same contractor get the additional work? What was the price thereof? Were tenders asked for each additional work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Contractor, David Porter; contract price, $7,500. Additional work was asked for by the Government, being the filling between the two outer blocks of the structure, for strengthening the same, and adding to the protection of vessels lying there. The same contractor got the additional work. In the case of additional works, arrangements are always made with the contractor for their execution.

HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS, P.E.I.

Mr. WELSH asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out, this season of 1891, the harbour and breakwater improvements, recommended by the Government engineers, to the harbours of New London, Pinette and Wood Island, or any or which of them?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The surveys or examinations were made for these works at the mouth of the South-West River; estimated, the cost is $1,300. At the Pinette, there are two estimates. For a channel 200 feet wide by 15 feet deep, the cost will be $5,200; for a channel 200 feet wide by 16 feet deep, the cost would be $10,000. Report is dated 20th January, 1890. At Wood Island the following estimates were submitted on the 21st of January, 1890:—Raising northern breakwater, $2,600; extending southern breakwater, $6,500; contingencies, $900; total, $10,000. No estimate is furnished for dredging. I am not in a position just now to say whether these works will be undertaken, the Supplementary Estimates for 1891-92 not being completed.

SUBMARIN TUNNEL—P.E.I.

Mr. FOSTER. In answering the question asked by the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Perry) the other day with reference to the tunnel, I find, in looking over the memorandum, that I gave the information for a land tunnel, the tunnel from shaft to shaft, and the contingencies, but did not give the separate sum estimated for the cost of the tunnel from shaft to shaft. I think it best that the House should have full information, and my hon. friend shall have all the information that is in my hands. Estimate by Sir Douglas Fox, May, 1891, for a tunnel of 11 feet, internal diameter, from shaft to shaft, £897,500; ditto, including land tunnel and contingencies, £1,075,200. For a tunnel of 16 feet, internal diameter, from shaft to shaft, £1,652,500; ditto, including land tunnel and contingencies, £1,971,800. For a tunnel of 18 feet, internal diameter, from shaft to shaft, £1,890,000; ditto, including land tunnel and contingencies, £2,252,500.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be remembered that last session the House passed unanimously an Address to Her Majesty assuring her of our loyalty and affection to her person and Government. A despatch in reply was received and forwarded to the Speaker, but, as the House was not in session, it could not be laid before this body until the present time. I now present a Message from the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, a copy of a despatch, No. 126, of the 9th July last, which he has received from the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, conveying an expression of Her Majesty's pleasure at receiving their loyal Address.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 15th May, 1891.

MY LORD,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's despatch, No. 111, of the 9th ultimo, and to acquaint you that I have laid before The Queen the loyal Address unanimously voted in the House of Commons of the Dominion Parliament, which accompanied it.

Her Majesty was pleased to receive Address very graciously, and to command me to convey to the Speaker, through Your Excellency, an expression of Her pleasure at receiving this renewed proof of the loyalty and devotion of the Canadian House of Commons, and of Her subjects generally in the Dominion.

I have, etc.,
(Signed) KNUTSFORD.

The Governor General,
The Right Honourable,
The LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON, G.C.B.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1892, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 18th May, 1891.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for:

Reports from or correspondence with the Superintendent of the Prince Edward Island Railway, with respect to the condition of the road-bed or the rails of such railway, together with any reports or representations made with respect to such road-bed or rails by any of the track-masters or other officers of said road: (2.) Showing what portion in mileage of such road-bed has been relaid with steel rails since the completion of such road.

He said: I was not aware whether the reports of the track-masters were transmitted to the chief engineer in Ottawa, but, on reading the report of the Minister of Railways on the Intercolonial Railway and Island Railway, I find that the superintendent of the Island Railway stated that the road-bed was in excellent condition, or words of equivalent meaning. As this statement differs from representations made to me just before I left the Island, I think it is my duty to call the attention of the First Minister to the matter. The condition of the road-bed generally may be all that is stated, but I speak more especially in regard to the rails on the road. There are over 200 miles of railway on the Island, and the rails were laid in 1873—nearly eighteen years ago. Of these 200 miles, 62 miles have been relaid with steel rails, the remaining portion having the rails which were laid in 1873. I am instructed that these rails are all worn out, and the track-masters fear that, unless they are supplied with new steel rails, serious damage will result to passenger and freight traffic. Some years ago the Island Railway was charged with new steel rails for the Cape Traverse branch, but the Intercolonial Railway very coolly appropriated them and sent us second-class rails. That is apart from the point now in question, but I want to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that his officials have stated to different members of Parliament, that, in their opinion, the condition of the rails, apart from the 62 miles that were relaid with steel rails, is dangerously bad, and the track-masters, who have been desirous of economising to the utmost possible extent, and who have from time to time been trimming the broken edges and piecing the rails together to make them workable, have so represented, I am told—for I have no personal knowledge of it—to the superintendent. I was, therefore, very much struck with the difference between the reports that were made to me on the subject by the officials of the road, and the official report of the superintendent made to his chief at Ottawa. I would not make so serious statements, as I consider these to be, without having satisfied myself thoroughly that they were based upon facts; and having brought them to the notice of the First Minister, I have no doubt that if he finds my statements are approximately correct, proper action will be taken to supply the road-bed with new steel rails at the earliest possible moment. I have no doubt that such action will be taken by him, in view of these statements which I take the responsibility of making, as will enable him to determine in his own mind whether they are accurate or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to giving this information. I would ask my hon. friend to state to what period this will apply. I suppose he only wants the present condition of the road and the correspondence for last year?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not wish the correspondence to extend for more than last year.

Motion agreed to

EMPLOYÉS ON WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. GERMAN moved for:

Copies of all letters, correspondence, documents and papers showing the number of extra or additional men employed on the old and new Welland Canal, between the 10th day of February, 1891, and the 7th day of March, 1891; the names of such men, the work required to be done, and the amount of money paid to each man.

He said: I beg to make known to the House some matters which came under my observation and within my own knowledge during the recent election, and as to the truth of which this resolution is moved. It has been a notorious fact that for the last eight years just prior to a general election either for the Dominion Parliament or the Local Legislature, a large number of men have been placed on the Welland Canal, ostensibly to do work, but really to influence the vote for the Conservative candidate, there being at the time no work to be done. I am credibly informed and believe that about a week before the last general election there were a large number of men placed upon the Welland Canal, and there being no work for them to do they were kept on the pay-list doing nothing until the next day after the election when they were all discharged. That was done in the neighbourhood of the town of Thorold, in the County of Welland. In the town of Thorold my opponent increased the majority he had four years ago by something over forty votes, whereas in every other portion of the county his majority fell off in large numbers. I cannot help thinking that his increased majority in the town of Thorold was influenced by the action of the Government paying wages to these men at the expense of the country when they had no work to do. It is time that this House and the country should know whether or not a great public work, such as the Welland Canal, should be used as an electioneering agency as it has been used during a number of years past.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the papers are brought down I am quite satisfied they will convince the hon. gentleman that he is quite misinformed as to the matters he mentions.

Motion agreed to.

OTTAWA COUNTY POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for:

Copies of all letters, petitions and memorials relating to and praying for the construction of a suitable post office in the town of Buckingham, County of Ottawa.

He said: I may say that already a promise has frequently been made that a suitable post office would be built in the town of Buckingham. I know, as a matter of fact, that, on the eve of the provincial election, this promise was made by many prominent speakers belonging to the Conservative party, but, when the election was over, we heard nothing more about the post office. During the recent election we were also assured that a sum would be placed in the Estimates for the post office in Buckingham. It is also known that, on several occasions, deputations have come to the Government asking for this very necessary building. Buckingham is a large and prosperous town, and the mail matter which passes through its post office is very considerable, even more so than that which passes through the post office of the village of Aylmer, which is endowed with a post office building that cost the Government something in the vicinity of $15,000. I make my motion simply to obtain the papers and documents in relation to this question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The petition was received on the 5th of February, 1890, for the construction of a public building at Buckingham; it was referred to the Post Office Department on the 13th; on the 15th, the answer was that the matter would receive the attention of the Minister. That is all we have.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for:

Copies of all letters, correspondence and petitions relating to the establishing of a post office in the township of Lowe, County of Ottawa; also petitions, memorials and documents complaining of the mail service between Ste. Emile de Suffolk and St. André Avelin, in the County of Ottawa.

He said: I understand that a post office did exist in that part of the Township of Lowe, where recently a demand was made for the establishment of one, and I believe the postmaster received an annual salary of $10, which he possibly thought was hardly sufficient to remunerate him for the trouble of keeping the post office. However, it is not in existence now; and I know as a fact, that a petition has been sent to the Government praying for the reopening of a post office, and that the people of that district require one. With regard to the second portion of my motion, I may say, that during the last year demands have been frequently made that the mail service between St. Emile de Suffolk and St. André Avelin should be somewhat more regular than is the case now. At present the mail service is carried on once a week, and the people ask that it may be increased to three times a week.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may state that it is only within a few days that any petitions have come in with reference to the subject of which he speaks; that they have been referred to the Post Office Inspector for his report as to the allegations in the petitions, and that the Post Office Inspector has not yet had time to report.

Mr. DEVLIN. The petition for a better mail service between St. Emile de Suffolk and St. André Avelin was made nearly a year ago.

Mr. HAGGART. The information I received from my Department was that the two petitions were in one.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to ask if the petitions came to the Department at the same time, or if the petition from the Township of Lowe came a few days ago, and that with regard to the mail service at St. Emile de Suffolk about a year ago?

Mr. HAGGART. I was instructed that they were both received within a few days ago.

Motion agreed to.

MILITIA CAMP IN DISTRICT No. 1.

Mr. HYMAN moved for:

Copy of all correspondence, papers and reports, in the possession of the Government, relating to the locality for holding the camp of Militia District No. 1, for the years 1890 and 1891.

He said: In making this motion I desire to call the attention of the House and the Government to the fact that when this camp is held at any other place than the city of London an injustice is done to that city, which I have the honour to represent. In 1884, or 1885, I happened to be a member of a deputation who waited upon the Government in the endeavour to obtain the establishment of a military school at London. As a result of the negotiations which then took place, it was understood that the city should purchase the property known as the Carling farm and should deed it to the Government, and in exchange for that property the Government agreed to give to the city certain Ordnance lands, presumably of equal value, for military purposes. The question came up as to the number of acres necessary for the purposes of a military school, and it was then stated to the deputation that property would be required, not only for military school purposes, but also for camp purposes; so that when the arrangement was made, it was agreed by implication that the property should be used for camp purposes for District No. 1. I have had conversations with several officers in the district, and they have all stated to me that they feel that London is the proper place for the camp. The Militia stores are there; and to hold the camp at any other place is to deplete the public chest of such an amount as is necessary to transfer those stores to the place where the camp may be held. In 1890 the camp was taken to the city of Stratford, and it was stated that that was done as a political bribe; but, unfortunately for the Government, it was not successful, for we have in the House at present representing that city a gentleman who, I believe, is not entirely in accord with the Government. Public rumour states that the Government have somewhat changed their intention this year, and that the camp is to be taken away from London, not for the purpose of a political bribe, but that it is to be sent to the city of St. Thomas, as a sort of reward to East Elgin, in which that city is situated, for returning a supporter of the Government, and as a sort of a punishment to London for returning a representative who is not in accord with the Government. My whole object in bringing this matter before the House is simply that the Government may find, when the papers are brought down, that the representations made by officers in the district are so strong that they will hesitate in doing an act which, while bringing them a small amount of political influence, will be against the public interest and against the interest of Military District No. 1.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I fear very much that the hon. gentleman misapprehends the question completely. There is no doubt that when the exchange was made the Department of Militia asked for a certain quantity of land which would be required for drilling purposes. I think that the history of the past sufficiently indicates that London is considered to be an important place where camps should be held. Since I have been at the head of the Department of Militia, London has had the camp oftener than almost any other locality in Ontario. There is no objection that I know of to bringing down the papers, but I think the hon. gentleman will find on looking over them, that he is completely mistaken as to the conditions upon which the exchange of property took place in the city of London.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED STATES FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. TUPPER moved third reading of Bill (No. 10) respecting Fishing Vessels of the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I thought the Minister of Marine would have taken the opportunity of the third reading of this Bill, to make a statement to the House as to the position in which matters stand between Newfoundland and Canada under this Bill. The Bill extends the operation of licenses granted by Canada to Newfoundland, provided there is a mutuality on the part of Newfoundland; but there have been some other dealings in regard to Newfoundland, such as those in reference to the sale of bait, with reference to which I know negotiations have been pending, and I expected that the hon. gentleman would have taken the opportunity of stating whether negotiations had been successfully concluded between Canada and Newfoundland by which our fishermen could obtain their bait in the ports of Newfoundland. We know that complaints have been made, that a written undertaking of the Attorney-General of Newfoundland, and further representations made by the Minister of Justice when in England, have not been carried out. I would like to know what the representations were, and if our fishermen are justified in assuming that, during this season which is fast passing away, they have the right to obtain bait in Newfoundland harbours or are excluded from obtaining their bait there? This is a very serious matter, and I thought the Minister of Marine would have taken this opportunity to inform the House on this subject. The report of his Department only deals with the matter up to a date some time ago, and gives very few details. I would like to know now in what state the negotiations are.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not think it necessary to the consideration of this Bill to state any of the matters at issue between Canada and Newfoundland, because this Bill simply affects the vessels of the United States, and does not in any way affect the vessels of Newfoundland or Canadian vessels. I think it well that the Bill should proceed on the old lines, and as already stated, this Bill is a reproduction of the old Act. In this way and proceeding on these lines, it will be less likely to lead to any misunderstanding as to the position of the Canadian Government as to privileges which have been conceded for a time to American fishing vessels. As to the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in regard to the stage of the negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland or the position of our vessels in the waters of that colony, I regret that at present I am not in a position to tell the House the exact position that question is now in, except to say that the negotiations have not ended which are under way through the Imperial Government. I trust before long the Government will be able to give the more pleasing intelligence that the negotiations have ended satisfactorily. At present the position is simply this: that the Government of Newfoundland has, under the provisions of the Bait Act, prohibited, and now prohibits, Canadian fishing vessels from obtaining bait in the ports or waters of that colony under any terms. Last year our vessels were permitted to go into the ports of Newfoundland and obtain a limited supply of bait, on payment of a license fee. This year, however, even that so-called privilege has been withdrawn. The Government is pressing with every effort possible the solution of this question so that the rights of the fishing vessels of Canada may be respected. I need hardly dwell upon the allusion the hon. gentleman made to past assurances, as the hon. gentleman admits that the information has been brought down both in the Imperial blue-book, and explained to some extent in the Fisheries blue-book this year. But the hon. gentleman stated quite accurately that there were pledges given by the Government of Newfoundland previous to the passage of the Bait Act that the Act would not be enforced in its express terms against Canadian fishing vessels. The negotiations have been going on since that time, and I am not yet in a position to give the full explanation as to them or to lay the papers before the House, as they are at present considered confidential.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, before the hon. gentleman presses this Bill to a third reading, the House is entitled to information which up to this time it does not possess. I suppose that the Government are proceeding with this Bill on the assumption that negotiations are to be renewed with the United States Government for the settlement of the question with which this Bill deals. We have no information as to the action of the Government on that subject before us. We do not know what the action of the Government on that subject is. We know that a few years ago the Government appointed a Commissioner who, along with the British Ambassador at Washington, negotiated a treaty which was rejected by the Congress of the United States. We do not know that any further action has been taken. The Government have not told us they intend to take further action, or to take the initiative in opening negotiations upon this subject. It seems to me that we are entitled to all the information it is in the power of the Government to give the House upon this question before we are asked to pass this Bill. What is the object of such a measure—unless the Government propose to abandon the exclusive control of the fisheries altogether—unless it is passed with a view to negotiation; and why should this House be called upon to pass a measure with a view to negotiation when it is not informed that there are any negotiations pending or even contemplated? Before the hon. gentleman presses this measure to a third reading, the Government ought to place before the House their intentions upon this question, and, if any negotiations have taken place, they ought to inform the House as to the character of those negotiations. We were informed a few days ago, with regard to another branch of this subject, that certain papers would be brought down. I think we are entitled to the possession of that correspondence, that we should have the opportunity of perusing that correspondence before we are asked to read this Bill a third time. I noticed, among the English papers that came into my possession a short time ago, a very extraordinary Minute of Council prepared by the Minister of Justice, which seems to have been communicated to the Colonial Secretary of the Imperial Government, interfering with the negotiations which Newfoundland was carrying on, on her own behalf and in favour of her own people, with the people of the United States. It seems to me an extraordinary proceeding on the part of the Canadian Government, that it should have intervened between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of the United States with reference to the negotiations which were being carried on in the interests of the people of Newfoundland exclusively. I do not say that negotiations might not take place of such a character, affecting so vitally the interests of this country, that, as a measure of self-defence, they might take so extreme a position as the Minister of Justice did take in that Minute of Council. Now, I say that this House is entitled to that paper, and to all other papers that may have passed between the Government of Canada and the Colonial Office, and the Government of Newfoundland, upon this particular question. Let us not be called upon to legislate in the dark. Why, if it is the intention to hand over to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the discretionary power to do precisely as he pleases in this matter, let us abdicate our function, let us carry through this House a measure declaring that all necessary legislation shall be enacted by hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches. But if we are going to discharge our duty, if we are going to exercise an independent judgment upon an important question of this sort, then it does seem to me that we are entitled, merely for the protection of our own self-respect, if for no other reason, to ask that these papers should be laid upon the Table of the House, and placed under the control of the House, for its information, before we undertake to carry a measure of this sort. I think it is due to the House that the hon. gentleman should not press the third reading of this Bill, but that the information that the House is entitled to upon this subject, should be placed before us before any further proceeding is had.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman objects to the third reading of the Bill relating to the modus vivendi, on the ground that the papers are not on the Table of the House to give him information which would enable him to discuss a subject entirely foreign to the Bill. If the correspondence which the hon. gentleman refers to were upon the Table of the House, there is no member of the House so fully aware as himself that he could not, without being called to order, rise to make a discussion such as he has just indicated that he would like to make upon the third reading of this Bill. The hon. gentleman, however, commenced to give, as a reason to the House why this Bill should not be read the third time now, that he was not in possession of the information, of which he showed himself five minutes afterwards to be fully cognizant of. The hon. gentleman complained that he had not a certain document. If he has it not, it is his own fault, because he undertook to quote from it and to characterize it as very extraordinary. As the hon. gentleman has gone so far into that subject, I may be permitted to say to him, although it is not within the range of the discussion which ought to come up on this Bill, that that Minute of Council, in the opinion of those who are best qualified to judge, namely, that portion of the population of this country whose interests it most affects, is not an extraordinary one, but one which the Privy Council would have been criminal if they had not adopted it in its entirety. Let me remind the hon. gentleman—for I will not undertake to give him information upon such a point—that the policy with which every colony in the Empire has been well conversant ever since responsible institutions were given to the colonies of the Empire, and which has been fully recognized by the Imperial Government, is that the interests of every colony shall be considered in relation to negotiations which take place with regard to any one of them; and while the administration of affairs is in the hands in which it is now vested, the Government of this country will not consider it extraordinary, will not consider it outside the line of its duty, to interfere in any negotiations which may take place with regard to any colony of the Empire, which touch important interests of the people of Canada. I must remind this House—the hon. gentleman is already well aware of it, because he has read the Minute to which it refers—that the interests of the fishing portions of our population especially, would have been deeply affected by the negotiations which were going forward and to which he refers, on behalf of the Island of Newfoundland; and I know to his credit that there would have been a no more eloquent and forcible remonstrance addressed to this House on that subject, if we had failed to pass such a Minute of Council, than that which would have come from the hon. gentleman for Bothwell this afternoon. So far from being extraordinary, as he intimates, on the ground that it was uncalled for, even that Minute of Council, dealing with the interests of the people of Canada, and protesting in the interests of Canada against certain negotiations being consummated without our right to be heard—even that Minute was not adopted until Her Majesty's Minister at Washington and the Secretary of State for the Colonies had invited an expression of opinion on the negotiations which were going forward, and, therefore, in no sense was the remonstrance uncalled for. Now, I think the hon. gentleman has not taken the point well—that the House is not informed that any negotiations are likely to take place, or that any negotiations have gone forward in the past. The House has been informed, in the first place, that negotiations have been entered upon, and that intimation has been received by the Government going to show that, at an early day, negotiations will again be entered into with regard to these very questions. The hon. gentleman says he has not all the correspondence which he would desire to have, but the reason for that delay has been made known to him, and I think his judgment will be satisfied as to its soundness and its fairness, namely, that the correspondence in its entirety could not be brought down because the assent of other Governments had to be had, and until that assent was had, portions of the correspondence would have to be considered as confidential. But I assured the House, in giving that reason the other day, that if any protracted delay should occur, owing to the non-assent of the other Governments concerned, in the correspondence as to confidential portions being produced, we would bring down, at any rate, those documents in relation to which that restriction does not apply, and, as I said before, I think the hon. gentleman can hardly fail to consider that a satisfactory answer. But it is remarkable that at this session, after that most solemn and official announcement that negotiations are to take place—and that consequently it would be well to consider the propriety of renewing the modus vivendi for another year—had been made, the objection to this Bill for the extension of the modus vivendi should come from hon. gentlemen opposite, when for the last two years, at least, we have passed Bills for the extension of the modus vivendi framed in the very terms of this Bill, without any remonstrance whatever, or any enquiry as to future negotiations, or any mistrust as to the supposed discretionary power which this Bill is said to confer. With regard to the objection of the hon. gentleman, that the Bill conferred discretionary power upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think he has misapprehended its purpose. It simply permits the Minister to issue a license to enable foreign fishing vessels of the United States to obtain supplies, to obtain bait and other port facilities, in the Dominion of Canada, precisely on the terms of the Act passed last year and the Act passed the year before. Every provision with regard to the way in which these licenses are to be carried out, and the privileges they are to give, are enumerated in the Bill, and contained in the license which is embodied in the schedule; so that there is no discretionary power vested in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but merely the power to do that which Parliament has instructed the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to do, namely, to extend the modus vivendi licenses another year, as has been done for the last four years.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the North-West Mounted Police.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to move that certain changes be made in the Standing Committees, and I may say they are made with the concurrence of hon. members who formed the Committee appointed to strike the Standing Committees. I move:

That the following changes be made in the Standing Committees:—That Mr. McDougall (Cape Breton) be substituted for Mr. Cameron (Inverness) on Banking and Commerce Committee; that Mr. Cameron (Inverness) be substituted for Mr. McDougall on the Committee on Agriculture; that Mr. Denison be substituted for Mr. Miller on the Committee on Railways and Canals; that Mr. Miller be substituted for Mr. Denison on the Committee on Standing Orders; that Mr. Daly be substituted for Mr. Ross (Lisgar) on the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that Mr. Choquette be substituted for Mr. Préfontaine on the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that Mr. Paterson (Brant) be substituted for Mr. Cameron (Huron) on the Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—MINISTERIAL EXPLANATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire to bring to the attention of the Government the fact, that they have not yet informed the House whether the President of the Council has tendered his resignation as a member of the Administration, and if so, whether any other person has been appointed a member of the Administration in his place.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The question had escaped me, and this seems a fitting opportunity to make a statement. Mr. Colby, much to the regret of his colleagues, tendered his resignation. His resignation was accepted by His Excellency the Governor General, and his office as President of the Council has not been filled.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 19th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 46) respecting the South-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 47) to amend the Act of incorporation of the Collingwood and Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Western Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Macdonald, Winnipeg.)

THE COMPANIES' CLAUSES ACT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 49) to amend chapter 118 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, known as the Companies' Clauses Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of this Bill?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I would ask the House to allow any explanations of the Bill to go over until it is before the Committee. It was placed in my hands only yesterday, and I have not had time to look at it fully. It seems to confer on companies not organized under the general Act certain powers which are conferred by the general Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DELAY IN PRINTING BILLS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to enquire of the Minister to whose Department the matter belongs, why the Bill to amend the Election law which I introduced on the 5th of May has not yet been printed in English, while Bills introduced after that day have been printed in both English and French? I introduced a similar Bill on three different occasions in a previous Parliament, and I never could get it printed in time to enable me to move the second reading. This Bill ought to have been printed before now, as there is very little printing to be done.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My attention having been drawn to the matter, I will send down to the Printing Department and ascertain the cause of the delay. Was the Bill introduced complete?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Complete.

SUPPLY—TREATY PAPERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the motion is put, I would like to enquire when there is any prospect of getting the papers I enquired for with respect to the negotiations with the Washington Government, and certain other papers which have been promised us with respect to the fishery negotiations, and certain papers moved for by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I gave the answer the other day as to the Washington papers, and I think in the course of a week we shall have the answer from England that we are waiting for. We are not in a position to bring them all down yet.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must say that the statements of the Minister both yesterday and to-day are rather disappointing. I find in His Excellency's Speech this statement :

"The papers relating to this subject will be laid before you."

And now, after the House has been in session nearly a month, the hon. Minister of Justice tells us that leave has not yet been obtained to submit those papers to the House. I would like the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to tell us how they came to instruct His Excellency to give this promise when the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Minister of Finance now tell us that they have not obtained permission to submit the papers at all ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is hardly the time to raise that question. I shall be ready to answer the hon. gentleman when the proper time comes to make a speech.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this is a very proper time, when we are going into Committee of Supply, to discuss the grievances of the House and the country ; and it does seem to me a most extraordinary condition of things for the hon. gentleman to inform the House at this period of the session that the Government have not permission to submit those papers which they promised through His Excellency at the opening of Parliament would be laid before us. If the Government are not masters of those papers, how is it they made such a declaration ? Why, these hon. gentlemen are unable to keep their promises. My hon. friend from South Oxford criticized the course pursued by the Government before the correspondence was made public, and what answer did the hon. Minister of Finance make on that occasion ? He told the House that when the papers came to be submitted, the facts would be found to be different from what my hon. friend stated them to be, that he ought to wait patiently until those papers were brought down, that they would be almost immediately laid before us, and that we ought rather to have confidence in the statements of our own Government than in those made by the Secretary of State at Washington. At this moment the Government are not in a position to keep the promise which they caused His Excellency to make to Parliament, and I submit that the House is not being fairly dealt with by these hon. gentlemen, who are asking us to go into Committee and vote the necessary appropriations, while upon the question, in which above all others this country is interested, we are to be kept in the dark.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no foundation whatever for the statement of the hon. gentleman, that we are in default in any way in regard to the statement made in His Excellency's Speech. The Speech promised that the papers would be laid before the House. So far from having repudiated or violated that promise, we have distinctly told the House that the papers will be brought down, and have given a definite idea of the time when they will be brought down. The hon. gentleman was equally unfortunate in his attempt to persuade the House that the statement in His Excellency's Speech was incorrect, because we were not in a position to promise the papers. I have already said that the great bulk of the papers are already under the control of the Government ; but every member will feel more satisfied, inasmuch as the papers, taken together, form a complete record of the transactions and negotiations, that they should be all brought down together rather than piecemeal. It is obviously for the convenience of the House that hon. members should not be asked to consider first those over which we have complete control now, and then those which may subsequently be brought down, but that the papers should be brought down in a complete, connected form ; and as the Government had complete control over a large portion of the papers, the promise made in the Speech from the Throne was perfectly capable of fulfilment. The Government are in no way in fault. It was necessary, as regards the latter documents, that permission should be obtained from the other Governments concerned before the papers could be laid upon the Table. That permission has been applied for, and it is in no sense the fault of the Government that it has not yet been given.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell are well founded. While the hon. the Minister of Justice may have pursued a course consistent with his utterances, we have the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance, which certainly warranted the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in making the remarks he did. The hon. the Minister of Finance took the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to task for having made some allusion to the negotiations that were in progress, saying that the hon. gentleman had dealt with matters with which he was not acquainted, and that if he had read the Speech from the Throne he would know that the House would be shortly in possession of the necessary information to make the matter plain. I will read to you what the hon. Minister said, and the Minister of Justice will admit that when a promise is made by the Minister of Finance the House expects it is to be carried out. The hon. Minister said on that occasion :

"But what is the information on which he speaks? Mere suppositions, a bundle of extracts from various newspapers. Hour after hour he consumed in concocting possibilities, in devising imaginings, in seizing what this one and that has said, when, in the Speech from the Throne, there is a promise that if he will wait a day or two, he will have the very papers and documents which will make all this matter plain. Is the hon. gentleman afraid of his case? Was he afraid that if he waited three or four days until these papers came down he would not be able to make the speech he has just made, and so decided to forestall the address and get his surmises spread throughout the country before they could have a chance of being confronted by documentary truth?"

My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was content to wait a day or two, or three or four days, but when three or four weeks have elapsed and he is told that the Minister does not know when the papers will be brought down before the House, he has a right to express dissatisfaction.

Motion agreed to ; and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Governor General's Secretary's Office, $10,325

Mr. FOSTER. In this item there are two statutory increases of $50 each and an increase of $200, caused by the promotion of a third class clerk to a second class clerkship. Then there is a saving of $125, being the difference between the salary which the third class clerk received and that of his predecessor.

Privy Council Office..... $27,630

Mr. FOSTER. In this there are eight statutory increases of $50 each. Then there is a saving, being the difference between the salary of one first class clerk transferred to the Marine Department and that of his successor, $200. The net increase is $200.

Department of Justice..... ..... $22,135

Mr. FOSTER. There are six statutory increases of $50 each, two at $30 each, and one, short estimated last year, $15. Then there is a saving of $125, between the salary of a clerk and his predecessor, and there is one new third class clerk at $400.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think there should be a change made in this system of statutory increases. In the first place a man who tries to perform his duty faithfully every year, while he is entitled to a statutory increase, has no incentive to zeal once he has reached his limit. There are in some of the Departments men who have reached the limit of their statutory increases and are now simply doing a kind of routine work, and in many cases not doing it. There should be a change made. Either those statutory increases should be reduced and extended over a longer period of years or they should be altered, so that when a man reaches the ultimate sum he can earn he will be subject to a reduction if he does not do his work with that efficiency and care with which he performed it when expecting the statutory increase. Before the limit of the statutory increase is reached a man is liable to have his increase cut off should he fail to perform his duties efficiently, but I have not found a single case in any of the Departments of the increase having been refused. There is no case in which they are deprived of it. Then, when they reach the ultimate sum they can earn under the operation of that statutory increase, there is no inducement for them to do their duty. They lag behind and do not perform their duty with the attention they should. I know there are cases in which certain men have been complained of who are droning along in the discharge of their duty without that zeal and attention they should display.

Mr. FOSTER. There may be something in what my hon. friend states, but this is the law at present, and some change in the law would be needed before it could be altered. He says that, when a third class clerk gets to the limit, there is no longer any inducement for him to do his work well. That is not quite true. There is always the inducement of promotion, and every ambitious and skilful and good clerk has before him the prospect of promotion from the lower to the higher classes, so that is an incentive for him to perform his duty well. What my hon. friend suggests really amounts to a system of fines. But at present, if a man is at the head of his class and does not perform his duty, there is a very heavy punishment which may be inflicted upon him. He may be suspended, or he may even be dismissed. As to the statutory increases, that is not so much a matter of form as my hon. friend seems to think. The deputy head has to report on each of his clerks, and, if the deputy head reports that a clerk has not done his work well and is not worthy of the statutory increase, he will not get it. I grant that probably minute care has not been taken in this matter, and that the rule has been that, generally speaking, the statutory increases came. I know, however, that stricter care has been taken of late, and that several clerks had been refused the statutory increase.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know of any case in the last twelve months where it was refused?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I know of two or three cases, but then, as a rule, we have very good clerks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have a regiment of clerks, amounting, I should think, now to nearly a thousand men. Are they all such good clerks as to deserve the statutory increase?

Mr. FOSTER. I will try to find two or three cases for the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood the Finance Minister to say that these statutory increases were strictly a matter of right.

Mr. FOSTER. No; I did not say that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We ought not to accept that. It is a thing which should be entirely a matter of judgment when approved by the head of a Department on the recommendation of the proper officer, and an examination should be held in every case.

Department of Justice—Penitentiaries Branch $6,300

Mr. FOSTER. There is only one statutory increase of $50.

Department of Militia..... $44,000

Mr. FOSTER. There are simply the statutory increases.

Department of the Secretary of State. $38,240

Mr. FOSTER. In this there are 17 statutory increases at $50; 1 at $37.50, 3 at $12.50, 2 at $30, and 1 at $20; there is an increase by promotion of two second class clerks to the first class amounting to $125, the one being an increase of $50 and the other of $75. There is a promotion of three third class clerks amounting to $300, and there are two new third class clerks amounting to $800. This makes the total of $2,230.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Probably the Secretary of State would advise us why he requires two new officers in the Department.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. These are officers who have been employed as supernumerary clerks, one for ten years and the other, I think, for eight years. I do not see why we should charge to contingencies the salaries of officers who are practically permanently employed, and the amount paid last year on contingencies will be reduced by more than double this apparent increase.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then I understand that the policy of the Government is about being adopted that, if temporary clerks are required to be used continuously, they are to be transferred from the temporary to the permanent list and the contingencies are to be reduced accordingly?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the case in regard to this item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see that the contingencies are decreased.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I spoke of the expenditure last year of contingencies, which was $14,000. That will be reduced this year to the normal sum.

Department of Printing and Stationery.....	$25,447 50

Mr. FOSTER. There are 15 statutory increases at $50, 1 at $37.50; there is one second class clerk transferred from the House of Commons, formerly paid from the vote for printing, printing paper and binding, $1,200, and a corresponding reduction will be made in that vote. Then there is one third class clerk, formerly paid out of contingencies, amounting to $950, and there is a saving of difference in proposed salary of one third class clerk at $200.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I should like to ask if the Secretary of State thinks he has now sufficient clerks in the Stationery Department to manage it, or will it be necessary to go on increasing the staff each year?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend has heard, I suppose, that half of the increase is composed of the salary of an officer who has been transferred from the House of Commons, at a salary of $1,400, to the Printing Department, for what we call outside distribution. Another officer, a messenger, has been required to assist the officer in that outside distribution. My hon. friend will have an opportunity to look into the detailed account of the Printing establishment, and I am sure he will be satisfied, as I am, that the strictest economy is practised there.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Secretary of State has not answered the question. The question I asked was this: Has he a sufficient number of clerks there to attend to the business of the Department without going on and increasing the expense more next year?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not think anybody will want more than they are getting this year. As I always do with supernumerary officers, I have put this man on the regular list so as not to charge it to contingencies, because they are not regular contingencies.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I asked the question because a large amount of printing that ought to be done at the Bureau is not done by the Bureau at all, but by outside printers. When the Government introduced the Bill for the establishment of a Printing Bureau they promised to do all the printing in the Bureau; now, as I understand, a large proportion of the printing is done by outside printers, not by the Bureau at all. If this printing is hereafter to be taken into the Bureau and done there, I suppose the Secretary of State will require to appoint more officers to look after the work, and that is the reason I ask the question.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would like very much to know what is the large amount of printing done outside of the printing office?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Certainly, the Secretary of State ought to know. The public know, the men who got the money know, because a very large amount of money was paid for the printing of the voters' lists that ought to have been printed in the Bureau; and I believe the Geological Survey reports are still printed in Montreal, whereas they ought to be printed in the Bureau. Besides this, other work is done outside. I think the Secretary of State ought to be well aware of these facts.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The remark of my hon. friend, if the expression is parliamentary, is rather antiquated. The voters' lists were printed outside, some of them, three years ago, and not a single line has been given outside since then. The Geological Survey Report, which was printed outside, is now done in the printing office since last year. My hon. friend should know that, because I have taken into the Department everything that could be done in it. The Geological Survey Report required a large number of cuts and some kinds of printing for which we were not just prepared in the Department. At present the Geological Survey Report is being printed, and will be printed in the Department.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Secretary of State knows perfectly well that the plates that are printed in the Geological Reports are not printed from type at all, but are lithographed, and no printer in Montreal, I believe, has a lithographing establishment in connection with his printing office; so that the Government Bureau could get this lithographing done just as well as a private printer in Montreal could get it done at an outside establishment. I can see no reason why the Geological Reports should not be printed in the Bureau as well as in Montreal. The reason given by the Secretary of State is not at all sufficient. So far as the voters' lists are concerned, I am asking for information—what the intention of the Government is with reference to these lists in future? The hon. gentleman states that we have had no revision of the voters' lists, and there was, therefore, no occasion for this work to be done, either in the Bureau or outside; but I want to know if it is the intention to have the Bureau do all this work in the future, if it is the intention that this work shall not henceforth be given to outside parties?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I see my hon. friend is improving. I never said that lithographing and wood cuts were required for that Bureau. I said some work was done outside because it was peculiar, not ordinary printing. But when my hon. friend says that he was only asking for information, I am glad to hear it. He was not asking for information a moment ago; he was making charges, at first. If he had asked for information he would have got it, and it would have satisfied him. Besides, I will tell the hon. gentleman that the Geological Report is now printed at the Printing Bureau, and that the voters' lists have not been printed outside the Bureau since two years, at least. That is the information I can give, and it is true information.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. According to the Auditor General's Report, the Geological Report last year was printed not in the Bureau, but in Montreal.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The report ending the last fiscal year, not this year. They are printed here now.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am glad to hear it, but the only information I had was obtained from the Auditor General's Report, and that report stated that the book was printed in Montreal. How was I to know, without asking, that the Government had turned over a new leaf? Because we have a statement, made by the Minister of the Interior in this House during last session, that the reason he had the Geological Report printed in Montreal was because the printers here could not do it as cheaply as he could get it done in Montreal. Now, I am glad to know that the Printing Bureau is prepared to do the Geological Report just as cheaply as it could be done in Montreal, although I must say that the price paid in Montreal was largely in excess of the price that the contractors offered to do the work for, and were prepared to do it for, when the Government let them the contract for doing that work and then refused to give it to them. At the present time, Mr. Chairman, there is an arbitration going on in a suit against the Government for damages, for having had this work done by other parties than the contractors, and I suppose that a heavy verdict will be obtained against the Government for having had this work done outside the contract—and not only the Geological Report, but other work which the contractors ought to have had.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend is just as mistaken on that point as he was about the voters' lists. I do not suppose the amount of the award will be heavy, I hope it will not be much. As a matter of fact that work was done outside, and I may say it was done with the assent of the contractors. No damages will be awarded, because no damages were asked for, in so far as that work is concerned.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Secretary of State does not give the whole statement; for the simple reason that after the Government renewed the contract with the contractors, they put a saving clause into the contract to prevent them from obtaining damages for certain work; but in the original contract which was running for years, they have a right to obtain damages for this work that was given out.

Mr. IVES. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, who does not seem to be at all satisfied after he has learned that the work is now being done in the Department, that he should ascertain from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who sits just in front of him, how the matter is managed in Quebec by the Provincial Government. It would be very interesting for us to know just how the public printing is done by the Mercier Government. If we knew all about that, and how economically and cheaply it is done, the Secretary of State might be able to adopt some improvements in the matter here at Ottawa. Speaking of the claims of the contractors which have been arbitrated, I believe that an arbitration was called for with reference to a claim of a similar character arising under the Mackenzie Administration.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) seems to be considerably exercised about the printing done in the Province of Quebec. Now, I do not profess to know anything about that; it is not my business to enquire about that. I am sent here to enquire about the printing done by this Government for the Dominion of Canada, and I am not here to look after the printing of the Province of Quebec, or after legislation in the State of Texas. I think if the member for Sherbrooke knows anything of that, this House would be interested in learning about it; because if this House is interested in learning about the printing of the Province of Quebec, it would be equally interested in learning about legislation in the State of Texas, and the hon. gentleman ought to be able to give us that information.

Mr. IVES. With regard to legislation in the State of Texas, when people there get too impudent they are sometimes called to order in a very summary manner. I think my hon. friend is very unkind in trespassing upon the territory of the hon. member for East Grey. That is a favourite interruption of the hon. member for East Grey, and I do not think it is fair to the hon. gentleman, who is supposed to know all about printing and to represent the printing intelligence of the Opposition, to trespass upon his limits. Reference is frequently made that I come from Texas, and represent Texas. I suppose there is some point in this reference to Texas. I should like the hon. gentleman to tell what it is. If it is that I have invested money in Texas and have not invested in Canada, I will undertake to say that I have invested more money in Canada and am now employing more labour and paying for more labour to-day in Canada than any man who sits on the Opposition side of the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You should be taken into the Cabinet at once.

Mr. IVES. That might be a very good reason, because part of my business is manufacturing chairs, which would seem to fit the point. I do not know of anything to qualify the hon. member for a Cabinet position. The fact of the matter is, that if the reference to Texas, which is frequently made by my irrepressible friend from East Grey, means that, it is utterly unfounded and there is no ground for his charge. I have invested in Texas and in Canada and in other parts of the world, and I am only happy to say that my Texas investment, in regard to which I have been laughed at so much, is likely to prove very profitable. We have had some lean years, it is true; but things are looking up, and I am happy to inform the hon. member for East Grey of this fact, and I can afford to be laughed at in regard to it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I rise to a point of order. If the hon. gentleman desires to speak, I hope he will not point to me as the hon. member for East Grey. I draw the line at that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I can readily understand why the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) remains a resident of Canada. He has shown that in Texas, where he has investments, the people deal very summarily with those who indulge in a certain line of conduct which is not very reputable, and I suppose that fact accounts for the hon. gentleman living in Canada.

Mr. AMYOT. I understand I am called upon to state as to how the public printing is managed in the Province of Quebec, and I have no reason to refuse a reply. The Government of the Province of Quebec have not thought proper to take away from private enterprise the printing of public documents. It is a false principle that the State should carry on that work. It is a means by which to help private individuals in their regular and honest line of business. If the result is the aiding of some newspaper, I see no harm to it. When a Government, be it Liberal or Conservative, or both, or be it Grit or Tory, deprives private firms of their share of public patronage, and place the work as a monopoly in the hands of the Government, a wrong principle is adopted, and such action is contrary to the principles adopted by those countries which look to the welfare of private enterprises as well as to the public at large. I never heard any complaint made as to the way the work was done in the Province of Quebec. I will go one step further, and say that if the hon. gentleman seeks to attack in this Parliament absentees, and to strike them in the back when they are not here to defend themselves, he is not doing a very brave deed. Let him go where his attacks may be answered. We have not here the papers, tenders and contracts, and the parties involved are not here to defend themselves. Such an attack is entirely uncalled for, and does not throw much credit upon the valour of the hon. member for Texas—I mean for Sherbrooke.

Mr. IVES. It is understood, I think, in regard to the printing of the Province of Quebec, that the proprietor of La Justice obtained a share. The hon. gentleman spoke about some members upon this side of the House being robbers. I think some of the late friends of the hon. gentleman characterized the manner in which he got possession of that paper as being somewhat of that character. It is well understood that La Justice has received justice in the matter of printing in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. AMYOT. That I am one of the proprietors of La Justice is true; but the proprietors of La Justice never received a cent either from one Government or the other. All such work falls to those who print that paper, and I do not belong to that part of the company. There is not a member of this House or the other Chamber who is a member of the company who prints La Justice. It was born in a moment of public excitement throughout the Province. It has an object to attain, and it will pursue its regular line of conduct until its object is attained. I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that a single cent was ever received by any one of the proprietors of La Justice, and I will wager my seat against his on that point.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was glad to hear the Minister state that the principal part of the printing was done at the Printing Bureau. What was the printing given out to an Ottawa newspaper for, when it drew over $10,000?

Department of Interior.....$91,817.50

Mr. FOSTER. There are 27 salaries increased by $50 each, one $62.50, two by $25 and one by $30. Five additional third class clerks are provided. The total increase is $2,730.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say that as regards the Department of the Interior it is very objectionable, looking at the receipts of that Department, that we should be called upon to provide five additional hands. We are now called upon to vote 87 employés for that Department instead of 82, at a cost of $91,000 and $18,000 for contingencies, exclusive of Minister's salary. These sums amount to almost as much as the total receipts from all the North-West lands, and the hon. gentleman's predecessor promised us to have $70,000,000 on hand on 1st January last. I look with extreme regret on the proposed increase in this Department, under the existing circumstances, and I hope the Minister of Interior will be able to explain satisfactorily to the Committee why he wants five new clerks.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Although this is apparently an increase, it is really a decrease. The hon. gentleman will remember that last year I made an explanation in regard to some change I proposed to make, and that was to do away with a number of temporary clerks and place some of them on the permanent list, and I accordingly asked for a comparatively large increase for third class clerks. Unfortunately, during recess, circumstances occurred which prevented my carrying out this arrangement. It occurred in this way: I proposed to place a number of temporary clerks on the permanent list—and this is the matter about which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has just referred to. A difference of opinion arose, however, between the Auditor General and the Department in regard to the standing of temporary clerks paid under the heading of Dominion Lands. The Minister of Justice, on the matter being referred to him, gave his opinion that all the clerks, whether paid out of the Civil Government money or the Dominion Lands money or out of contingencies, should come under the Civil Service Act. That prevented my carrying out the arrangement I had proposed, for the reason that I would have done a great injustice to several officers of very long service. If the hon. gentleman will look at the last page of the Estimates he will find that I am making a decrease of $22,440.75 in Dominion Lands, for the reason that I am taking a number of temporary clerks who were drawing large salaries and putting them on the permanent list, where they will receive the minimum salaries of their class. This is saving a large amount of money on salaries as well as conferring a boon on some of the clerks who otherwise would not be eligible to work for us on account of not coming under the Civil Service Act. I am sure the hon. gentleman's remarks with reference to an increase were made under a misapprehension, because there will be a large decrease in the cost of management of the Department of the Interior this year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many extra sessional clerks are there in the Interior Department? Are there more than five?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot remember the number now, but there are more than five on the temporary list and paid out of Dominion Lands fund.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to the principle proposed by the Minister, but I doubt the application. My experience has been that when a number of men are put on the permanent list, although for a few months the number of extra clerks appears to diminish, we invariably find that the exigencies of the service—or political exigencies or some other exigencies—require that the vacancies should be filled up, so that we do not gain in the end by the substitution of permanent for extra clerks. I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to make a better showing in this respect than has happened in the past.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There will be a large decrease this year.

Mr. CHARLTON. I notice on page D—124 of the Auditor General's Report, expenditures for surveys, that the amounts seem to be given in round numbers. Are the payments to the several persons mentioned for salaries or for contracts let to these persons for work done?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The majority are for contracts, and there are, I think, a few permanent officers.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are these contracts let for surveying each township?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They are let at so much a mile, and the rate is fixed by Order in Council.

Mr. CHARLTON. I notice that the expenditure for surveys for 1890 is very much less than for the previous year; is that due to the fact that a smaller amount of Government land has been surveyed during the latter year?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The amount asked this year is practically the same as for the year before. We took $100,000 in the main Estimates last year and $25,000 in the Supplementary Estimates: the latter for the reason that we wished the parties to be able to go out to work earlier in the year.

Mr. CHARLTON. The object of my question was to learn what amount of surveying was done for the two years.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I presume there must have been less work done last year. There are several classes of surveys, and I presume the hon. gentleman's question refers only to the sub-division work in the North-West.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is the intention of the Minister of Interior the same as that announced by the Secretary of State, namely, to do away with the employment of these temporary clerks and to give employment to permanent clerks instead?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, that is what we propose to do; that is the arrangement which I was endeavouring to explain to the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Department of Indian Affairs.....$49,087.50

Mr. FOSTER. There is a statutory increase in salaries amounting to $1,937, less extras for 1890 and 1891, which leaves the net increase $1,554.48.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice, from the Auditor General's Report, that Mr. Wm. McGirr, of Ottawa, is engaged in this Department at a salary of $1,600 a year. Under what circumstances was it necessary to engage him?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The gentleman referred to by the hon. member has been in the service of the Department since the winter of 1879. The salary, which is the same as he has been receiving for the last three years, and when he was working with me in the general office in the North-West, has been paid out of the Indian vote for general expenses in the North-West.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it only last year that he has been engaged in the Department here?

Mr. DEWDNEY. When I came down I brought him here for the purpose of giving assistance in the office in North-West matters. He has been here now two years and a half.

Mr. WATSON. Is he employed continuously at Ottawa now, or are part of his duties in the West?

Mr. DEWDNEY. He is working continuously here now.

Mr. WATSON. I thought East Assiniboia engaged part of his time.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board.....$49,382.50

Mr. CHARLTON. How is it we have the unusual spectacle here of a decrease?

Mr. FOSTER. You will always find these instances of economy in my Department. The work will be done quite as well. In this Department there are twelve statutory increases, in addition to an increase in Mr. Toller's salary of $200. The decreases are in part due to the differences between the salaries of two officers, Mr. Jarvis and Mr. Baxter, who have been superannuated, and the salaries of their successors. No new appointments have been made in the place of those gentlemen, but there will be promotions from the class below. Then, one of our clerks died, and the difference between his salary and that of his successor is $300. The three places thus vacated have not been filled, and I find that under the re-distribution it will not be necessary to fill them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has mentioned the name of one clerk who is to have an increase of $200; he did not state why.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Toller holds a very responsible office: he is comptroller, and has charge of all the securities which have mounted up to a very large sum, as well as supervision of the printing and custody of the Dominion notes. He has had no increase of salary for a number of years; and taking all these things into consideration, I thought it only right that he should have this increase, especially as in the general distribution of the work of the Department I was not asking the country to pay more largely for equally good service.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am aware that the Treasury Department is entitled to the unique distinction of being the only Department in the public service which for a number of years back has continuously decreased the cost of its civil appropriation, and I am glad to see that it is continuing the good work. But I wish to know what position this gentleman holds, what his salary is, and how long he has been in the public service? And with all due respect to my hon. friend, I have failed to find in his explanations any valid reason for the increase. The mere fact that Mr. Toller has charge of certain securities does not seem to me to entitle him to an increase of salary.

Mr. FOSTER. His salary is $2,400, and this increase makes it $2,600.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did the hon. gentleman recommend an increase in the salary of any other clerk in his Department?

Mr. FOSTER. The arrangement I have made here and which I have explained, provides for the promotion of some of the other clerks. That has not taken place yet; of course we must have the authority of Parliament before it can take place.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The arrangement with Mr. Toller has not taken place yet, I understand; that is the proposition the hon. gentleman is now making to Parliament. He does not state that there has been an increase without the authority of Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no increase.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then does he propose to increase the salary of any other clerk in the Department?

Mr. FOSTER. If I carry out the arrangement, I do propose to promote three or four clerks, and that promotion will carry with it necessarily an increase of salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman kindly state who they are?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not altogether certain as to what arrangement I may make, and I do not think I ought to state the names of any clerks who might be promoted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he had made arrangements for the promotion of three or four clerks, and I assume that he would not make those arrangements without having decided who the clerks were. I certainly do not object to proper promotion: far from it. But if the hon. gentleman singles out Mr. Toller, this gentleman who has been so markedly favoured in times gone by for increases in his salary, which some people might hold his services did not justify, I think the hon. gentleman might give us the names of others who are entitled to the same promotion. This gentleman, I think, comes from the same locality as the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. FOSTER. The date of Mr. Toller's appointment was 1871. With all due deference to my hon. friend, I do not think I stated that I had arranged for what promotions should take place. I said I had asked the authority of Parliament to vote sums which would be necessary to make the arrangement. The arrangement is not completed, and I do not think my hon. friend should press for the names of certain persons who might be promoted before I have determined what promotions should take place. That I think might very well be left to the head of the Department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says he is not in the position in which he wishes the House to assume he is. He has already determined what promotions shall take place.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He has, I understand, determined what salaries shall be given to those who are to be promoted, and asks this House to vote the appropriation. Having determined the number to be promoted and the increases to be paid, the hon. gentleman should take the House a little further into his confidence and say whom he intends to promote. I would like, also, to understand the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman recommends the $200 increase in the case of the officer whose name he has given. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, he said there was a heavy responsibility attaching to this gentleman's office, owing to the fact that he has the charge of valuable documents. But he has had the charge of those documents for years, and I am not aware that his responsibility has been increased in that regard.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I have already stated the grounds for the increase, but will re-state them. I thought that Mr. Toller should have an increase of $200 for several reasons. He has had the responsibility of the care of very valuable documents, which have been, it is true, in his custody for a number of years, but my hon. friend must know that these documents are constantly increasing in number. The great advance which has taken place in the insurance business, and the consequent increase in the deposit of valuable securities, has led to a very large increase in a number of these securities, and Mr. Toller has, so far as I know, performed the duties of his office well, and I must be responsible for considering what is to be done with the officers of my Department, and, after thinking the whole matter over, I came to the conclusion it would be but fair to give him $200 increase.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman may have the best grounds for that, but he has not suggested them here. What I complain of is, not that the increase has been given, but that the grounds urged by the hon. gentleman for that increase are inadequate. I cannot see that the possession of valuable documents locked up in the safe over which Mr. Toller has control, is any reason for increasing his present salary of $2,400 by an extra $200. Everybody in the service who happens to be entrusted with the duty of keeping certain valuable papers in a safe will be entitled to demand an increase, if such a precedent be established. The hon. gentleman must have some other reasons.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps you would state them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If I did, the hon. gentleman might repudiate them. But the hon. gentleman should take the House into his confidence and state the reasons himself. There may have been political services rendered which the hon. gentleman thought worthy of reward.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not aware that Mr. Toller ever was a politician.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is not aware whether he was engaged directly or indirectly in the late elections? Of course, if the hon. gentleman has no other grounds for the increase, we must be content with those he stated, but they are certainly not sufficient.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would again ask the hon. gentleman, who has taken the place of Mr. Graham, who has been superannuated?

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend must refer to the Assistant Receiver-General in Victoria, B.C., who was superannuated, and one of the officers next to him given his place. I will give full particulars of that when we come to the item relating to the management of the Assistant Receiver-Generals' offices.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman who it is takes charge of these valuable securities during Mr. Toller's absence, and whether the party who takes such charge is entitled to any additional compensation?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose when Mr. Toller is absent, some other official, under the direction of the Deputy, takes charge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does he receive additional compensation?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not aware of any.

Department of Inland Revenue. . $38,750

Mr. FOSTER. There are nine statutory increases at $50 each; one at $25, and one at $30. Then there is a difference in salary of a third class clerk transferred from the Interior Dopartment of $112, and a difference in salary between that of a second and a third class clerk of $50, and a difference in Mr. Gerald's salary of $200. The House will find that in Mr. Gerald's case the $200 has been struck off later on under another heading.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. Minister to say that the salary of the Deputy head of that Department had been materially decreased either last year or the year before. Is the present sum paid the decreased sum, or has the salary of the Deputy been put back at its old figure?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not think I said the salary had been decreased. When Mr. Brunel ceased to be Commissioner, Mr. Miall was appointed, and the position of Assistant Commissioner was not filled, making a saving to the country. Mr. Miall, therefore, claimed very strongly that he was entitled to the allowance of $800 per year which had been made to his predecessor, as Commissioner of Standards, but had been dropped after Mr. Brunel left the office; and under those circumstances he was granted that allowance. After that, the position of Assistant Commissioner was revived by the appointment of Mr. Gerald; and the vote of $800 was dropped out of the Estimates some two years ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On the recommendation of the Minister?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman may say so if he chooses.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I only asked the question if it was on your recommendation.

Mr. COSTIGAN I do not know that I could give a satisfactory answer to that at present. The only other increase is the $200 increase proposed to the salary of Mr. Gerald. Mr. Gerald is not only Assistant Commissioner, but discharges the duty of Inspector of Tobacco Factories throughout the Dominion. He is entitled to this increase by his great ability and his attention to the duties of his office, and this includes the two offices.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand that the Minister proposes to pay Mr. Gerald $3,000; that is within $200 of the amount paid to the Commissioner, Mr. Miall?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I only wanted the hon. gentleman to state the fact. I understand that Mr. Miall was appointed at a salary of $3,200, and that after occupying that position one year, he was granted the $800 which was paid to his predecessor as Commissioner of Standards.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then in another year, on the Minister's recommendation, as I assume, or on the responsibility of the Government, at all events, that was withdrawn, and now the hon. gentleman proposes to give the Assistant Commissioner an increase of $200, which will bring him within $200 of the salary paid to Mr. Miall. Does the hon. gentleman propose to increase Mr. Miall's salary?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is now under the consideration of the Government.

Department of Customs..... $33,110

Mr. FOSTER. There are seventeen statutory increases at $50. There is an increase caused by promotion from third to second class of $550. Then there is one packer at $430 and one new third class clerk at $450, making a total increase of $2,280. One first class clerk has died, and the saving has taken place by the third class clerk having been appointed. The net increase is $830, which is more than covered by the statutory increases.

Post Office Department..... $201,360

Mr. FOSTER. The statutory increases amount to $6,870. Then there is an increase to Mr. LeSueur of $200, and an increase caused by additions to the staff and promotions of $2,330, making the total increase of $9,400.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the reason of that special increase to Mr. LeSueur?

Mr. HAGGART. He is a very efficient and able clerk, and the salary of chief clerks generally is more, I think, than $2,600. His predecessors in office received $2,800, and we thought that, on account of his ability and efficiency, he should receive this amount.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is this the Civil Service examiner?

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Department of Agriculture..... $54,130

Mr. FOSTER. There is a decrease of $1,830 there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is quite as interesting to know why the decreases take place as to know the reason for the increases.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought it was all right when the amount was decreased.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We like to know the reason why.

Mr. HAGGART. The increases are as follows:—Statutory increases, 24 at $50, $1,200; 1 at $37.50, 2 at $30, and 2 at $20, $137.50; Mr. St. Denis to be promoted to first class, $200; Mr. Lyster to be promoted to second class, $100; amount short voted Miss Steacy last year, $12.50; second class vacancy, $1,100; four third class clerkships (three vacant), $1,600; making a total of $4,350. The decreases are:—D. Brymner, $50; J. B. Jackson, $100; (these officers did not pass their examination in time to obtain the increase voted to them), $150; Mr. D'Auteuil (dead), $1,450; Mr. Lemieux (dead), $950; Mr. Skead (not appointed), $730; Mrs. Fraser (resigned), $650; difference between salary voted for Mr. Béland (deceased) and minimum salary of second class, $50; Mr. Lyster (provided for at minimum of second class), $1,000; Mr. St. Denis (provided for at minimum of first class), $1,200; making a total of $6,180, or a net decrease of $1,830.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Lyster has been in that Department for a good while. He was on the permanent staff before, and I should like to know what salary he formerly received. He is to get $1,000; I thought he was getting more than that before.

Mr. HAGGART. No, it does not appear so. He is to be promoted to second class, with an increase of $100. There was a provision made for him last year at the maximum of the third class, of $1,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then we are to understand from the explanation of the Minister, that these vacant places are not to be filled to which he has referred, and that the present staff is adequate for the work?

Mr. HAGGART. This is all the information I have on the subject.

Department of Marine..... .... $32,067.50

Mr. FOSTER. There are 13 statutory increases at $50, $650; a first class clerk transferred from the Privy Council, $1,650; addition to Mr. Anderson's salary, $400, making $2,700. There is a decrease in the salary of one first class clerk, $50; net increase, $2,650.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that Mr. Chipman received $2,970 last year and that he has been appointed to another situation. I would like to know about his holding these two positions.

Mr. TUPPER. That gentleman is no longer in the service. He resigned about a couple of weeks ago.

Department of Fisheries..... $17,825

Mr. FOSTER. There are 8 statutory increases of $50, and one at $30. Difference caused by the promotion of two third class clerks, $200; addition to Mr. Winter's salary, $250, making in all $850.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Marine and Fisheries just made an observation that, perhaps, the Government would explain. The Minister stated that Mr. Chipman had resigned his office as a clerk in the Department. What does the Government do in cases of that sort with reference to the superannuation fund? Do they refund the payments to the party who retires?

Mr. TUPPER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He has no claim upon the fund?

Mr. TUPPER. He resigned without any special allowance being made or claimed. He received other employment: he has been made a Commissioner of the Hudson Bay Company at a salary, I believe, of £1,000 sterling, with allowances, including a house, so that his present salary is about $6,000. With reference to the Fisheries Department, that, I may say, is a special case, and an increase, making the salary $850, is asked for on the grounds that Mr. Winter has been about eight years in the service of the Department, and he acts now as secretary to the Deputy Minister, and, consequently, his time is taken up much over the ordinary office hours. He is specially a typewriter and stenographer, and under all the circumstances we thought him worthy of a small increase.

Department of Public Works $47,60.750

Mr. EDGAR. Would the Minister tell us whether Mr. Henry F. Perley is still in the employ of this Department and comes under this item?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. In what capacity?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the same capacity as last year—Chief Engineer.

Mr. EDGAR. He gave up the superintendence of the Quebec harbour works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, last year.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has the Minister all the help he requires in the Architect's department of Public Works? I understand that there were to have been some plans prepared for a drill shed, and that they have been in preparation for two or three years, and as the Minister told me that I might leave the matter to him, I had relied upon that. I thought probably the delay must be owing to a pressure of work in that Department. I think they have been working at it for about three years, and as I understand the plans are not yet ready, if there is a want of sufficient help in that Department, I think Parliament will sanction a little further advance in that direction.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the work that I require for the prosecution of this drill shed, but the money. I have not sufficient money to erect a building such as the hon. gentleman wishes to see erected. The matter is still under the consideration of the Department, and I hope that before long we will come to a decision, and have a smaller building erected with the money that will be at our disposal.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The difficulty could be overcome by asking for an additional grant. But it does seem to me that the Department—without wanting to reflect too severely upon it—has not done itself any credit in this matter. After having made this grant years ago the Government, it seems, have come to the conclusion not to go any further. I will speak on this matter further on, but it is a matter of great injustice, and if they felt it was their duty not to increase the grant, it does seem to me that instructions ought to have been given, and plans ought to have been prepared, coming within the amount of the vote. That is the reason I make this observation at the present time.

Mr. TARTE (Translation). Is the hon. Minister in a position to say whether Mr. Perley has resigned his position as Chief Engineer for the Quebec Harbour Commission, or whether he has been removed from that office without any notice?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, as to what took place; but I believe that the Chief Engineer gave in his resignation. It is my impression.

Mr. TARTE (Translation). The information I was able to secure, and which I hold from good source, tends to establish that a dismissal took place. I even read a letter from a person well acquainted with the facts, which states what I have just stated, that this officer, who held a very important position in Quebec, was not notified but dismissed without any warning. I will add, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the very grave charges that hang over this officer, I do not know whether the House would be justified in voting the item of his salary. I declare here that I have in my possession letters signed by Mr. Perley in which information of the most serious nature is given to public contractors, information which I might call most indiscreet on matters connected with the Public Works Department. I call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this fact. I am ready to accept his word before this House that when Mr. Perley was writing "I am directed, &c.," he was not authorized as he pretended to be. I am ready to accept the word of the Minister of Public Works should it be given before this House. But until we get a candid and clear explanation on this matter I think the hon. Minister himself should not insist upon having the House vote a salary for a man who is just now under the most serious charges.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). In answer to the hon. member I may say that the amount put in the Estimates for specified officers, such as deputy heads, chief clerks, accountants, chief engineers, &c., are not amounts to be voted especially for the persons now occupying such positions, but rather for the offices themselves. Thus, if an officer should die before the 1st July the salary voted for him would be paid to his successor. Therefore, the vote is not especially for the officer but for the office he holds.

Mr. TARTE (Translation). I understand that, but on the other hand I call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to this fact: I declare, under my own responsibility, that I have in my possession letters from this engineer—for whom we are now called upon to vote a salary—giving information on what transpired in the Minister's office; and I say that as long as this man is maintained in the office which he holds the Minister himself cannot be justified in asking the House to vote that salary. So that I believe it would be as well perhaps—if the public service would not thereby suffer—nay, that it would be better, to say, stand.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). No, it is out of the question to postpone this item; for if the amount put in the Estimates is not voted I shall not have the necessary money to pay this officer. Therefore, this item should be voted now.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) has made a complaint against the Government, that for about three years the people of his constituency have been waiting for the construction of a work which the Government have not been able to proceed with for lack of architects and draughtsmen. I do not think there is the slightest ground for complaint, for he has only waited three years. I remember the case of a small public work in my riding promised by the Minister over and over again, which was postponed over ten years, as I suppose, because the architects and draughtsmen were so busy they could not attend to it. The people chose, for reasons known perhaps to the Minister of Public Works, to change their representative, and the architect was there at once, and within six months the land was marked out, and within a year or a year and a half the building was commenced. Of what has my hon. friend to complain when he has only waited three years, and I waited ten years, and it was only when the people changed their representative that our little work was carried out. The people were then satisfied, and they again changed their representative. Let my hon. friend not complain now, but let him wait ten years, and then complain to the Minister, who no doubt does the best he can, but who apparently has not a sufficient number of draughtsmen and architects to attend to all these works.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is not to be wondered at that delays should occur in regard to such an important work as a drill shed in a large town such as the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) represents. But, in the little matter of a fence running around post office grounds in Prince Edward Island, the Department have been four years in preparing plans before undertaking the construction of that work.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman does not usually take the fence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is quite evident I have not taken it. I have been using my powers of persuasion with the Minister of Public Works for a good many years in regard to that little two-penny-halfpenny matter, and I received the positive promise of the Minister last session, that he would personally see that the work was carried out, that his overworked men should attend to the matter at once, and that I need not trouble further about it. I knew the hon. Minister's character for veracity, and the care he has always shown in this House not to make any promises he could not fulfil to the letter, and, therefore, I at once wrote down to the people interested in this little work, told them it was going to be built at once, that few weeks would pass before a fence would be erected, and the boarding which had disfigured the grounds removed. I thought I could rely on the Minister; but the overworked officials could not overtake the work, and the whole summer went by and they were unable to determine the plans for the fence, and so the matter has remained. I hope, from indications I have seen lately, that we shall have this work of art erected and the promise of the Minister redeemed, and I have only to express the hope that the gentlemen charged with preparing the plans have not had their health seriously impaired.

Mr. LANGELIER. I desire to bring the attention of the Committee back to the question of Mr. Perley's salary. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) stated that very serious charges had been made in the public press against that officer, and that very damaging correspondence, which was supposed to emanate from him, had been published. Mention was made of the fact that in some of the correspondence, which was so damaging to the party who wrote it, Mr. Perley wrote as if he had been directed by the Minister of Public Works to write as he was supposed to have done. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) asked whether Mr. Perley was warranted in stating in those letters that he was instructed to write, as he had written, by the Minister of Public Works. I noticed that no reply was given by the Minister to that question, which was a very important one. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to another point, and it is as to the course which the Government intend to pursue against that officer. If the charges which have been made against him were proved, will the Government retain Mr. Perley in his office? It appears there is some difference of opinion between the Minister and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), who seems to be very well posted, as far as Mr. Perley is concerned. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) stated as a fact that Mr. Perley had not resigned his position as Chief Engineer of the Quebec Harbour Trust, but had been dismissed on account of the damaging correspondence which had been published. The Minister stated that Mr. Perley had not been dismissed, but had resigned. There may not be much difference between the hon. gentlemen, because everyone knows that certain resignations are tantamount to dismissals, for the individual resigns instead of being kicked out. Accordingly, the hon. gentlemen may agree that Mr. Perley was dismissed. But whether he was dismissed right off or was asked to hand in his resignation, we should ascertain whether, after the publication of the damaging correspondence to which the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) has alluded, Mr. Perley went out of the office of Chief Engineer of the Quebec Harbour Trust. It is most extraordinary that the Government have not informed the House as to what they propose to do in regard to one of their highest departmental officers who stands under a cloud, very grave charges having been made against him. The Committee should have some explanation, first, as to whether the statement made in those damaging letters, that Mr. Perley was directed so to write by the Minister of Public Works, is true; and second, what course the Government propose to adopt with respect to him?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. While replying to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) on another subject, I forgot to answer this matter, but the hon. gentleman knew my answer from having heard it elsewhere. It is a formula in my Department, as well as in other Departments, that the chief officers of the Department when replying to certain matters merely say, "We beg to acknowledge your letter," or, "I am directed to," and so on. The Minister does not answer all these communications, for if he had to look over all these letters he would be obliged to go through 15,000 or 20,000 of them during the year. These are mere matters of form, but important letters have to be shown to me, so that I may answer them. Now, with reference to Mr. Perley, I am sure it is the opinion of this House, as it is the general practice in such cases, that Mr. Perley being accused before this House, and the accusation being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, we are not to decapitate that gentleman before his trial. British fair play is to try a man before you hang him, and you do not punish him before you find that he is guilty. An accusation has been brought against Mr. Perley, and the House has decided that it should go before a committee. That committee will meet at the proper time and try that gentleman, and if he is found guilty we know what the Government have to do. Up to that time we must consider Mr. Perley innocent. In making this statement I feel sure that I am only speaking the sense, and opinion, and wish of the House.

Mr. TARTE. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to decapitate anyone before all the evidence which I possess is produced against him. It is not forged evidence, but the evidence of genuine letters which I now hold in my hands. But, Sir, holding in my hands at this present moment, not forged letters, but genuine letters from an hon. member of this Parliament, I think I am justified in saying that this House should not proceed too quickly in voting a salary for a man who is not accused by me, but by another hon. member. It is no use saying that those letters are forgeries; they are not forgeries. It is no use saying, as I know it has been said, that I was a party to a conspiracy. That statement is an unmitigated falsehood. The hon. Minister of Public Works stated a minute ago that Mr. Perley gave up his position as Chief Engineer of the Harbour Commission in Quebec, and, later on, he said that he was not quite sure of this fact. When such an important officer resigns such an important commission it seems to me that the hon. Minister himself should be the first to be informed about it. Then, Sir, I wish to know if the hon. Minister of Public Works is in a position to state before this Parliament that he has been informed that Mr. Perley has given up his position as Chief Engineer of the Harbour Commission at Quebec. If it be so, let the correspondence be brought down as soon as possible. Again, let it be understood that I quite agree with the hon. Minister when he says that we do not wish—not one of us wish it I am sure—to be unjust towards anyone. If Mr. Perley is not a guilty man—and I hope he is not guilty—I will be the first to state so before this Parliament, if he is pronounced innocent. But if he is a guilty man, if he has given information which the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) has stated he has given, if the letters which are now in my possession, and which I now hold in my hands, and which the hon. Minister may see whenever he likes, immediately if he wishes—if these letters are true, then this man is a guilty man indeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read the letters.

Mr. TARTE. No, Sir; if the Prime Minister tells me to read, I will read, but I believe we should wait for the action of the committee. Although I am quite prepared to read now, yet I remember that the matter has been sent for report to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have not only one letter, be it remembered. I believe, Sir, that, if I am not mistaken, two and two make four, and that I have about forty or fifty letters from the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy). If these letters are forgeries, then forgers have committed crime for a long time indeed. I say again, these are not forgeries: these are genuine letters, and these letters prove, if they are true, that from year to year, from week to week, and during the session of Parliament, almost from day to day, a member of this House has received the most private information from Mr. Perley. The hon. Minister of Public Works has himself a deep interest that this correspondence shall be brought down as soon as possible, and I may state for his information that his name has, over and over again, been dragged into contempt by the hon. member to whom I refer. More than this, if we are to believe that these letters are true, we are face to face with nothing short of high crimes. Then, Sir, I say that I was justified in asking, if it is not against the public interest, that this item should stand until we have evidence that Mr. Perley is either guilty or not guilty. If he is guilty we would not be justified in voting one cent for his salary. I do not ask that this item should stand, if it would be an injury to the public interest, but if it is not against the public interest it seems to me we can allow it to stand in view of the fact that an enquiry is about to be made in a very short time.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Public Works referred to English precedent, and he said that every accused person should be assumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. That is all right; but you cannot ignore in this House, and the country will not ignore, a statement made on the floor of this House on the responsibility of an hon. member charging an officer of the Department of Public Works, whose salary we are now asked to vote, with highly improper conduct. I do not think it would have been an un-English precedent for the Minister of Public Works, in the face of these charges, to suspend this officer from his functions; not to dismiss the officer and say he is guilty, but to say: "In the face of this charge, which will be settled in one way or the other in a very short time, you will be suspended until this case is decided." If the Minister of Public Works had looked a little further into British precedents he would have found out that whenever a Minister of the Crown is charged, as he is charged to-day, with a gross offence, which if it is proved would have the most serious consequences to himself and his colleagues, I say that if he looks at British precedents he will find that in no case has a Minister who has charges like that hanging over his head continued in office until a decision on the accusations was arrived at. If the Minister of Public Works were to follow British precedents I am perfectly satisfied that his course would be to say to his colleagues: I am innocent, I will stand aside, I will vindicate my public character and I will not drag my colleagues down with me if I fail to do so; and if I am innocent, as I claim to be, I will come back to my place with increased honour and reputation. That is the position which I think the hon. Minister should take; and I am not surprised, when he remains where he is, that he does not think it proper to suspend Mr. Perley.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is greatly to be regretted that on this ordinary item, which appears in the Estimates every year, the House should be drawn into a discussion of a matter which is of very considerable importance, but which is altogether irrelevant to the vote now before the Committee. There is such an officer as the Chief Engineer of Public Works; we must always have such an officer; and this vote is for the salary of the person who will be Chief Engineer from and after the 1st July next until the 1st of July, 1892. The vote is not necessarily for Mr. Perley; it is for the person on whom the Crown may confer the office of Chief Engineer on the 1st of July next. So that all this discussion is irrelevant; and after these charges have been relegated to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it is unfortunate that we should be induced by feeling or otherwise to extend the scope of this discussion; and I may say, Mr. Chairman, that it would be quite within your jurisdiction if you were to put an end to a discussion so irrelevant. One would suppose that some hon. members have a pleasure in attacking their fellow members. I regret that any cause for reference to the proceedings of a committee should have arisen. I speak thus because I think it is well that we should keep the two subjects altogether separate. Now that the matter has gone to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I hope it will be pressed, as it ought to be pressed, to a thorough investigation, and that we may free our minds of the subject in this House until it is dealt with by the tribunal to which it has been relegated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What the right hon. Prime Minister says is no doubt perfectly true, that the House is not called on to vote the salary to Mr. Perley, one of the incriminated parties in the charges brought by an hon. member; but at the same time we cannot ignore the fact that the gentleman so charged holds the position to which the salary we are now voting is attached. Therefore it seems eminently proper that we should ask whether it is right that the party or parties against whom these charges have been made on the responsibility of a member of Parliament should continue to hold the responsible positions they do while the charges are pending. There is no doubt of the truth of the remark that the right hon. First Minister has made, that these charges should be brought to a speedy trial. There is no doubt, on the other hand, that if the hon. Minister of Public Works had felt it right for the time being to resign the responsible position he holds, and to resign to another member of the Government the custody of the documents which the hon. gentleman making the charges has asked for, he would perhaps have been consulting his own self-respect and the wishes of the members of this House; but he has not seen fit to do so. On that point a great deal rests with himself; but on the point now before us, I think the House is entitled to receive more information from the hon. gentleman. Are we to have these matters burked or not? Is the investigation to be delayed from day to day, or not? The hon. gentleman who made the charges moved, on the first day the Committee met, for certain papers which he said he required in support of one or all of those charges; he stated that it would be impossible for him to proceed with the oral testimony until he had the official documents in the Department of Public Works. I should have supposed that all the other work of the Department, not absolutely necessary in the public interest, would have been delayed until all these documents had been collected and presented to the committee. I should have supposed that the urgency of the case would have presented itself to the mind of the hon. Minister himself, and that he would have given directions that other matters should be in the meantime laid aside, in order that these documents should be brought down to the committee at the earliest possible moment. If these gentlemen are innocent, in God's name let it be proved so, and let it be proved quickly; if they are guilty, it is necessary in the public interest that they should be removed from the responsible positions they hold. As the hon. First Minister says, this matter should be brought to a speedy issue, and before the proper tribunal; and it is to be regretted that the delays occasioned by the Public Works Department should necessitate the matter being brought up here. Holding as I do the position of a member of the committee, I shall try to keep my mind clear in the matter——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope so. Some hon. gentlemen cheer; I hope it is in support of the honourable position I take on this matter; but, in trying to hold my mind clear, I think I am safe in saying that I voice the opinion of the majority of this House when I say that so far as the Public Works Department are concerned, every energy they possess should be devoted to bringing down these papers at the earliest possible moment, so that not a shadow of suspicion should rest on their good faith in the matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I agree with very much that the hon. First Minister has said, and with what my hon. friend beside me has said. The charges which have been made would be very much better discussed in the committee than on the floor of this House at the present moment; but I think the hon. member has taken a very reasonable position in asking that this vote should not be proceeded with at present. The hon. gentleman has made charges against a member of the Administration and against a member of the House who occupies no official position, also against the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department. That being the case, it does seem to me that it was proper for the hon. gentleman at this time to discuss the actual position of affairs. Let us suppose for one moment that this engineer has from day to day, as is charged, been giving confidential information from the Department to outside parties. That would be a most improper proceeding. Now, the Department continues to discharge its public duties, and that gentleman, whether he be innocent or whether he be guilty, ought not to be permitted for one moment, until those charges have been investigated and disposed of, to continue to deal with those confidential matters with which he is necessarily brought into contact. I think every hon. member will understand the propriety of that position. Suppose a commander-in-chief of an army in the field were charged with entering into correspondence with a view of betraying the army to the enemy, would he be permitted to continue to hold his position—to jeopardize the interest of his country, until he was exculpated of the charge made against him? Hon. gentlemen will see that that is a perfectly reasonable request. Then, with regard to the hon. Minister himself, those charges being made against him, it was the duty of the First Minister to assume the control of that Department for the time being, and to see that those papers are furnished to the committee. Surely the business of furnishing the papers should not be done by the party inculpated; surely the hon. the Minister of Public Works, supposing for the moment that the charges are well founded, can have no interest in bringing down the papers by which those charges are to be established. If it were the case of a private party being charged with a private matter, he would not permit the accused to control the evidence by which the charges against him were to be established. I am discussing this matter altogether apart from the question whether the Minister of Public Works is guilty or innocent. With that, for the moment, we have nothing to do. Let us lay that question aside. Let us consider this fact: that an hon. gentleman on this side of the House has made from his place in the House certain charges, and has asked for a committee, and the House has considered his charges sufficiently important to refer them to a committee. The hon. the First Minister has stated that it is of the first consequence that those charges should be expeditiously investigated. I entirely concur in that opinion, but I hold that it is his duty, as the leader of this House, as the First Minister of the Crown, as the one specially interested in the maintenance of the honour and purity of Parliament, in the maintenance of purity in the administration of public affairs—as the one who is interested not merely in preventing wrong-doing, but in preventing the suspicion of wrong-doing going abroad, for the suspicion itself is mischievous and injurious to the country—it is his duty, I say, to the House and the country to see that everything relating to the Department in question is not, for the moment, under the control of the Minister against whom the charges are made, but under the control of the First Minister himself, or of some person whom he vests with the responsibility for the time being of the charge of the Department. It is his duty to see that the papers moved for be prepared free from the supervision of the Minister against whom the accusations are made. Otherwise what must be the opinion that will be entertained abroad among the people? It will be that some of the papers have been destroyed; that some improper action has been taken, if the party against whom these charges are made is to remain in charge of the papers and to prepare the case in part against himself. Surely the hon. Minister of Public Works is more interested than any of his colleagues in having nothing to do with the search for those papers or their arrangement or their custody. They ought to be in the custody of some other Minister, so that if the hon. gentleman who made these charges fails to substantiate them, his failure will be satisfactory to the public and not be viewed with any suspicion.

Mr. IVES. I do not think that the course proposed by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), or the hon. member who has just addressed the House, would be practicable. I do not think it would be practicable to carry on the business of Government, if, every time an accusation is brought against a Minister, he should take the course suggested. For example, it would be rather difficult for the right hon. the First Minister to maintain his Government at all, if that principle were adopted—if, because one of his colleagues were attacked, he should at once resign. On the other hand, to carry that principle out would work badly for our friends opposite, who are all laying under serious charges. The illustration used by the last speaker is very applicable to the case of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. He said, if a commander-in-chief, in presence of the enemy, with his batteries unlimbered, ready for action, and the country depending on him to lead his army to victory—if that commander were charged with conspiring with the enemy, it would be his duty to resign at once, leave his army without a chief, and let the enemy take possession of the artillery and supplies. The illustration was unfortunate for the hon. gentleman. He is, I believe, one of the leaders of his party, one of the syndicate who lead the party, and that party has been accused in the public press and throughout the country generally of having conspired with the enemy, of having been engaged in raising funds in a foreign country——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Texas.

Mr. IVES. If it is right that a member of the Government, because he is accused by any hon.

gentleman on the other side of a high crime, should resign, I think that the hon. gentleman opposite, who stands accused of conspiracy against his native country—of conspiracy to bring about annexation to a foreign country—I do not say the charge is true, but that he is charged with that act——

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Who charges him?

Mr. IVES. There are people who believe the charge to be true. I do not say that I do, but the hon. gentleman knows that the charge has been made.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Why speak of a charge if you are not prepared to make one?

Mr. IVES. If the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman opposite be the correct one, the hon. gentleman against whom such charge has been made should take no part in the proceedings of the House until he has disproved it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Make a charge and ask for a committee. Be a man.

Mr. IVES. We left the matter to a committee composed of the people, and they acquitted us and convicted hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You had to flee for your life.

Mr. IVES. Judging from the uneasiness and irritation of hon. gentlemen opposite, they are evidently in a hungry mood, and as it is now on the point of six o'clock, I will defer continuing my remarks until after recess.

Mr. FRASER. I wish just to say one word——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; six o'clock.

Mr. FRASER. If the Chairman says I am out of order I will sit down, but I will not yield to the cries of the unruly horde opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FRASER. What I wish to say is that I commend very much the bravery of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives).

Mr. LISTER. Texas.

Mr. FRASER. After the admirable manner in which the hon. member for Sherbrooke was sat upon this afternoon, it does say a great deal for his reviving bravery that he should again enter the lists, but let me say the instance he has given is not a happy one. I grant it would be a very difficult matter indeed for the Government to continue administering public affairs if all the charges brought against members of the Cabinet compelled them to leave their seats, as most of them would be out of their places; but we cannot help that. It is their misfortune. But when the hon. gentleman advances, seriously, as an argument what is said in the country by the irregular camp followers—and he has not the courage to make in the House a single charge against the Opposition except in this irregular manner—I must say the Government would have been better served, and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) himself would have covered his retreat with more glory this afternoon if he had said nothing. It is about time that we understood that these irregular remarks are good enough for the hustings, but certainly they are unbecoming the dignity of Parliament. The hon. gentlemen ought to understand that the less said about it the better, not only in the interest of Parliament, but for their own reputation. This appears to be the difference—a member of Parliament makes a charge against a Minister of the Crown: outside parties make statements in order to serve party ends; and the hon. gentleman sees no difference between the statements of a gentleman who pledges his reputation as a public man for the accuracy of his charges and that of the camp followers outside. If that be the view taken by the hon. gentleman, I can readily understand how it was he had to leave one constituency and seek another.

Committee rose; and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Committee rise and report the resolutions.

Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What business will the Government take up at the next sitting of the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To-morrow is not a Government day. Whenever we have the opportunity, we will go on with the Estimates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The understanding is that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) shall go on with his Bill to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; that is arranged.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 8.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 20th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 50) to incorporate the Steam Boiler and Plate Glass Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Hyman.)

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Vancouver Dock and Ship Building Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the McLeod Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

Bill (No. 53) to make voting compulsory.—(Mr. Amyot.)

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. BARRON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 54) respecting elections of members of the House of Commons, being chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: The object of the Bill is to set aside any disputes as to whether the deposit of $100 required, on asking for a recount, should be paid in legal tender or ordinary bills of any chartered bank. Recently, in the county from which I come, a large number of people thought great injustice was done by reason of a recount being refused because the deposit had not been paid according to the views of the County Court judge. The second section of the Bill is to enable any person, who is dissatisfied with the refusal of the County Court judge to grant a recount, to compel the judge by means of a mandamus to have the recount. As the law now stands, a judge may refuse the recount, and there is no means of compelling him to grant it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MOUNTED POLICE, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN asked, When the report of the departmental enquiry into the management of the Mounted Police of the North-West Territories, by Lawrence W. Herchmer, Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police, will be laid before this House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will be able to inform my hon. friend on the return of the Comptroller, who is just now out of town.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, WALKERTON.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Who tendered for the contract of the Walkerton public buildings? What was the amount of each tender? Who received the contract? Where does the contractor reside? What was the total contract price to complete the works? How much has been paid up to date, and to whom paid, on all accounts in connection with the contract? Were the plans open to inspection in Walkerton; if so, how long before the last day advertized in which tenders would be received? Who was the inspector; when was he appointed; what is his salary; has he been continuously, and is he still employed; what was his former occupation? Was a clerk of works engaged; if so, what is his name, occupation, date of employment and salary; and has he been steadily in the employ of the Government since his appointment? Are the buildings completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The tenderers were: Tighe Bros., Toronto, $14,560; P. Navin, Lindsay, $14,897; Lewis & Cluff, Ottawa, $15,950; Tobin & O'Keefe, Ottawa, $17,000; M. A. Pigott, Hamilton, $17,500; J. Bower, Paisley, $18,500; H. Clerk, Walkerton, $18,517. The amount of the lowest tender was $14,560. Tighe Bros. received the contract. They reside in Toronto. Building not yet completed; no contract let for post office fittings or heating. Paid to Tighe Bros. up to date, $9,830. Plans were open to inspection at the office of Mr. C. W. Storel from the 7th July until the 22nd July, 1890, and at the Department of Public Works, Ottawa. No inspector employed, but the work was examined periodically by an officer of the Chief Architect's staff. A clerk of works was engaged. His name is J. J. Tolton. He is clerk of works, and was appointed 7th July, 1890, at $75 per month. He has been steadily in the employ of the Government since his appointment. The buildings are not completed.

69TH BATTALION, No. 5 COMPANY.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) asked, At what date did Charles Whitman succeed Captain George Wells and become captain of No. 5 Company of the 69th Battalion, Annapolis County, N.S.? Who was the colonel of the 69th for four years subsequent to said Whitman becoming captain?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1st. Charles W. E. Whitman succeeded Captain George Wells on the 18th February, 1873, and became captain of No. 5 Company in the 69th Regiment. 2nd. At that time Lt.-Col. Starratt commanded the 69th. 3rd. Lt.-Col. W. E. Starratt was in command for four years subsequent to said Whitman becoming captain.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). At what time or times did Edward or Edwin Inglis officiate as bandmaster of the 69th Battalion within the last eight years? Who was the colonel of said battalion at the time or times the said Inglis so officiated? What pay did Inglis and his band receive at such time or times?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am instructed that enquiry will have to be made in Nova Scotia before a reply can be given.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, LINDSAY.

Mr. LISTER asked, Have the Lindsay public buildings been completed? Who were the contractors for the same? What is the contract price? What is the total amount paid on account of such buildings to this date? Is any further sum to be paid; if so, how much? Who tendered for the buildings? What was the amount of each tender, and was the lowest tender accepted?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The buildings have been completed. Lewis & Cluff were the contractors. The contract price was $14,475. Total amount paid up to date, $25,028.61. This amount includes cost of site, clerk of works, heating, post office fittings, furniture, &c. The contractors claim that $2,119.50 is due, and the chief architect reports the amount due $10.50. The tenderers were A. Johnston & Co., Strathroy; Patrick Navin, Lindsay; Lewis & Cluff, Ottawa; J. Strachan, Ottawa; William Stewart, Ottawa; F. Toms, Ottawa; Tumbling & Jones, London. The amounts of the tenders were as follows:—A. Johnston & Co., $19,646; P. Navin, $20,222; Lewis & Cluff, $14,475; J. Strachan, $18,992; Wm. Stewart, $17,711; Tumbling & Jones, $18,670. The lowest tender was accepted.

VOTERS' LISTS REVISION.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What is the total amount paid out to date in connection with the two revisions of the voters' lists had under the provisions of the Franchise Act? Does such amount include the cost of printing done in the Government Printing Bureau? If not, what is the amount of such cost?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The total gross expenditure to 1st May, 1891, was $682,078.83, less refunds, proceeds of sale of lists, $5,513.42, leaving the net expenditure, $676,565.41 : charged in the following years:—1885-86, $159,882.85; 1886-87, $196,575.07 ; 1887-88, $65,970.35 ; 1888-89, $17,337.75 ; 1889-90, $233,078.35 ; 1890-91, to 1st May, 1891, $3,721.04 ; net expenditure as above, $676,565.41. The above amount includes cost of printing done in the Government Printing Bureau. There may have been a few trifling items since that date, but not such as to appreciably change the total. The old lists being in type will by so much reduce the cost of next revision.

WEST POINT WHARF, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have the Department of Public Works a report of the engineer on the state of the Government wharf at West Point, P.E.I. ? Is it the intention of the Department to repair said wharf during the present season ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The condition of this wharf was reported upon in February, 1885, at which date it had been damaged to such an extent that it was useless as a shelter or shipping place. It was advised that a new wharf should be built to the southward of the present one, the cost being then placed at $10,000.

SHAWANAKISKIC'S INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. BARRON asked, How many Indians are there on Shawanakiskic's Reserve, No. 6 of the Robinson Treaty, entitled to receive bounty from the Government of Canada ? How much money has been paid to them out of and from the sum realized from the sale of timber on said reserve ?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Seventy-seven persons of this band are entitled to share in the annuity provided under the treaty. The amount paid to these Indians, being the interest on the proceeds of the sale of timber on their reserve, is : 1873, $33.63 ; 1876, $101.42 ; 1879, $124.91 ; 1880, $41.50; 1881, $31.30 ; 1882, $49.02 ; 1883, $136.34 ; 1884, $256.95 ; 1885, $162.03 ; 1886, $147.19 ; 1887, $183.73 ; 1888, $193.45 ; 1889, $262.50 ; 1890, $222.96 ; total, $1,946.93.

MacLEAN, ROGER & CO.'S CLAIM.

Mr. INNES asked, Has an award been made by the arbitrators appointed to investigate the claim for damages made by MacLean, Roger & Co., late contractors for Government printing, for work given to other printers which was included in their contract ? It so, what is the amount of the award ?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The claim is not before arbitrators. It is before the Exchequer Court, and is still pending.

Mr. BARBER'S CLAIM.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Has Mr. Barber, paper manufacturer, who had a contract with the Government to supply printing paper, entered a suit against the Government for damages for orders given to other dealers which he was entitled to receive under his contract ? If no suit has been entered, has the Government agreed to an arbitration to ascertain what, if any, damages Mr. Barber is entitled to receive ?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Barber and his administrators have sued some time ago in the Exchequer Court for damages. The question of the amount was referred to referees, whose award is now before the court for confirmation or revision.

WELLAND CANAL TURNING BASIN.

Mr. GIBSON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a turning basin on the enlarged Welland Canal, at St. Catharines ? If so, at what date ?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The attention of the Government has not yet been drawn to this subject.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. TARTE asked, What amount of money has been paid to Larkin, Connolly & Co. on account of the Graving Dock at Esquimalt, B.C., from 1884 up to 1890, inclusive ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In reply to the hon. member I beg to say that the amount is $580,841.43.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. TARTE asked, Whether the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec owe any sum of money to the Government on account of interest ? If they do owe anything, what is the amount of the debt ?

Mr. FOSTER. The interest is made up half yearly. The amount due on the 31st December, 1890, was $185,925.07. This amount is still unpaid.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT ANNAPOLIS ROYAL.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) asked, Why has Augustus Fullerton ceased to be the collector of Customs for Annapolis Royal, N.S. ? 2nd, Is he superannuated ? 3rd, If so, what is his allowance ?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Augustus Fullerton was superannuated on the 1st September, 1890, at his own request on account of ill-health. His annual allowance under the Superannuation Act is $336.96.

POLSON MANUFACTURING CO.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Were the Polson Manufacturing Company of Owen Sound permitted to import free of duty, the steel plates and other materials required for the construction of the new steel steam vessel they are building for the Fishery Protection Service ?

Mr. BOWELL. The Polson Manufacturing Company of Owen Sound has not been permitted to import free of duty steel plates or any other material required for the construction of the new steel steam vessel they are building, other than such articles as are provided for free entry under the tariff regulations, departmental numbers 863, 977, 978 and 979.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR—SALE TO INDIANS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What has been the total expenditure incurred by the Government for the prosecution of persons selling liquor to Indians, in the County of Bruce, during the fiscal years 1887-88-89-90? How much was incurred for legal expenses? What was the name of each lawyer retained, and how much did each receive in the same period?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The total expenditure incurred by the Government amounted to $836.26. The amount incurred for legal expenses was $393.69. The amount paid to different legal firms was as follows:—Shaw & Shaw, $43.72; H. A. Ray, $15; Shaw & Bobier, $12; A. B. Klein, $283.84; A. Shaw, Q.C., $39.13.

TYPE-SETTING MACHINES—COST.

Mr. LÉPINE asked, What is the cost of the type-setting machines purchased by the Government, and what is the cost, per thousand ems, of the work done therewith?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The machines cost $3,500 each. They are now at $3,000. They are capable of composing 3,500 ems per hour, or 31,500 ems per day of nine hours, for which we pay $2. Therefore the cost per thousand ems would be 6⅜ cents.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. JAMIESON moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

He said: I hesitated a moment ago in presenting this resolution to the House, for I was informed there was an understanding that another matter would have precedence to-day. I am glad, however, that such has turned out not to be the case. I think we will have ample opportunity this afternoon for discussing this very important question, which has been so frequently before Parliament and this House in times past. I think I owe no apology to this House in again offering this resolution. Those who have followed this question and the action of this House upon it in the past, will agree that the present resolution is simply the logical outcome of the action which the House has taken upon the question of the prohibition of the liquor traffic in intoxicating liquors. In addition to that, we have had during the present session a very large number of petitions presented to this House in favour of the prohibition of this traffic, and if for no other reason than for the purpose of recognizing in some way the action of the people of this country in petitioning Parliament, I think it is due to the House to bring up this matter in order that we may have a full discussion upon it. It is quite evident that the people of the country, from one end of it to the other, are agitated in reference to this question. In addition to the petitions which have been presented to this House signed by private individuals, we have also had a large number signed by the ecclesiastical bodies of the country, and I think that the representations that have been made to this House in these petitions are entitled to a great deal of consideration and a good deal of weight. It is my desire, at the very outset, to express the hope that this question will be fairly discussed upon its merits in connection with the present resolution, and I do hope that no question will be raised in connection with this matter which will give a partizan complexion to it of any kind. It is not, and has not been, a party question in the country. Neither political party has thought proper to adopt the question and to make it a part of their policy, and, in my judgment, that is the better way to deal with it. Now, in approaching the consideration of the question, I may be permitted to look back upon the action of this Parliament in former years. I have with me here the Journals of the Senate for the year 1873, and I will refer to the action of the Upper House upon this question before referring to the action in this House. In 1873 a committee of the Senate was appointed for the purpose of considering this whole question. That committee presented a very full report, and I may be permitted to refer to some of the findings of that committee, one of which is in the following words:—

"Your committee are fully convinced that the traffic in intoxicating liquors, in addition to the evils already mentioned, is detrimental to all the true interest of the Dominion, mercilessly slaying every year hundreds of her most promising citizens, plunging thousands into misery and want, converting her intelligent and industrious sons, who should be her glory and strength, into feeble inebriates, her burden and her shame, wasting millions of her wealth in the consumption of an article whose use not only imparts no strength but induces and leads to insanity, suicide and murder, thus diverting into a hurtful channel the capital that should be employed in developing her resources, establishing her manufactures and expanding her commerce—in short it is a cancer in the body politic, which, if not speedily eradicated, will mar the bright prospects, and blight the patriotic hopes of this noble Dominion."

The committee added:

"And concurring in the opinion of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, as expressed in their petition, that a prohibitory liquor law such as prayed for by the petitioners would be most beneficial in its results to the Dominion, would respectfully recommend that the prayer of the petitioners be favourably entertained."

That was the action of the Senate upon this question in 1873. In or about the same year that body, by a very large majority, passed a resolution in favour of the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. In the same year there was a committee appointed by this House, and they also placed a full report before this House, which report is a most significant document. After reviewing the whole question the committee finished by this recommendation:

"In view of these facts the committee would most respectfully submit to your Honourable House the importance of speedily removing the evils complained of by the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law; that is, a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors except for medicinal, manufacturing and mechanical purposes, to be regulated by proper safeguards and checks."

That, Sir, was the recommendation of a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1873 upon this question. Then, again, in 1875 Mr. Ross moved a resolution in favour of a prohibitory liquor law. The House went into committee on that resolution and recommended the following:—

"That, in view of these facts, it is in the opinion of this House that a prohibitory liquor law fully carried out is the only effectual remedy for the evils inflicted upon society by intemperance, and that Parliament is prepared, as soon as public opinion will sufficiently sustain stringent measures, to promote such legislation as will prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors so far as the same is within the competency of this House."

We come down to 1877 when a resolution was moved by Mr. Schultz, and an amendment was also moved setting forth that in view of the fact that the power of the Dominion Parliament to pass prohibitory legislation was questioned, it was advisable to postpone action until this point was determined. In 1884 the present Minister of Finance submitted a resolution to this House, and the late Hon. Thomas White moved an amendment pledging the House to the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law when the sentiment of the country would warrant prohibitory legislation. That amendment was carried, and the resolution thus amended was passed. In 1887 I had the honour to submit a resolution to the House, and seventy members on that occasion sustained the proposition for a prohibitory liquor law. In 1889 I had the honour to again introduce a resolution embodying the principle of prohibition, and on that occasion an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) in almost the identical words of the amendment which was moved in 1884 by the late Hon. Mr. White. So that on several occasions this House has pledged itself to the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law when the public sentiment of the country would warrant prohibitory legislation. The resolution which I have now the honour to submit to this House I regard as the logical outcome of the action of the House in past times. We submit now the proposition that the time has arrived when it is expedient to prevent the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. Should this House be of that opinion, then it is the duty of the House to pass the resolution which I have the honour to submit to it. It will possibly be argued that the people have not yet arrived at the point when the House is warranted in passing prohibitory legislation. But that question may be viewed from two different standpoints. In the first place, there are those who are honestly in favour of a prohibitory liquor law, but who hold the opinion that it would be unadvisable to pass a law of that character until a large proportion of the people have been educated up to the point of the enforcement of that law. On the other hand, there are a large number of people in this Dominion who believe in the principle that if a law is required, it should be enacted, and that the law would become an educator, and that the people should be educated up to the point not only of receiving but of enforcing the law. I believe that it is the duty of Parliament to enquire into a matter of this kind, and if Parliament comes to the conclusion that the law itself is right and proper, then, in my judgment, it is the duty of Parliament to enact the law and trust to the good sense of the people to enforce it. Let us for a moment consider what the action of the people has been upon this question. In 1864 a large number of petitions were submitted to this House, or rather to the Legislative Assembly of Old Canada, and the Temperance Act of 1864 was passed embodying the principle of local option. That Act was found to be somewhat defective in its provisions, and a demand was made in this House in 1875 for a general prohibitory law. The Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was then in power, and a committee from a very important and influential convention in Montreal carried to the leader of the Government a resolution passed by the convention in favour of a plebiscite on the question. The position taken by the hon. Premier for the time being was that a proposition of that kind was unknown under the British constitution, and, consequently, he refused to accede to the request of the temperance people of the Dominion. However, a compromise was entered into by which the Canada Temperance Act, popularly known as the Scott Act, was enacted, and that Act shortly afterwards was very largely seized upon by the people and passed into law. It is quite true that in a large portion of the Dominion the Canada Temperance Act has been repealed, and I have no doubt that during the discussion which will follow the introduction of this resolution we will be told that the repeal of that Act indicated in the strongest possible terms that the people of this country were not prepared for the enactment of a prohibitory law. In my judgment the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act does not mean anything of the kind. It is quite true that it indicates the fact very strongly that they were dissatisfied with local option, with that peculiar kind of prohibition which was embodied in the Canada Temperance Act; but it does not indicate on the part of the people any retrograde step on the question of the general prohibition of the traffic. For my part I never was very favourably impressed with the Canada Temperance Act. I supported it in my own constituency, and I endeavoured to have it properly amended in this House, simply because I believed it was the best legislation we had on the Statute-book, and that it was our duty as temperance people to test it, and if found ineffective, then it was the duty of Parliament to give us something better. But I apprehend that, notwithstanding the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act, the sense of the people of this country is still in favour of the general prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. We are told, too, that the Canada Temperance Act was not effective in prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquor to any appreciable extent. I have taken the trouble to ascertain what is shown in connection with this view of the matter by the returns which have been made in the Province of Ontario, as well as in the Dominion generally. I have in my hand the figures taken from the "Taverns and Shop License Act" for the different years to which I shall refer, and these figures show that in the counties which are not connected with cities, in 1884, eighteen counties in the Province of Ontario were under license, and during that year the convictions for drunkenness numbered 692. In 1887 these same counties were under the Canada Temperance Act and the convictions for drunkenness numbered 186, showing conclusively, to my mind at all events, that the Canada Temperance Act had a salutary effect so far as preventing drunkenness is concerned. These facts might not be so conclusive were it not that we have the report for 1890, when these eighteen counties returned again to the license system, and we find that instead of the 186 convictions for drunkenness which took place under the Canada Temperance Act, there were 506 convictions last year. I believe that these figures are convincing to any reasonable mind. Now, Sir, in order to show the baneful effect of the traffic which we are endeavouring to prohibit, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the Criminal Statistics for 1889 show that there were 13,841 commitments for drunkenness in the Dominion. From the Ontario Prison Inspector's Report for 1890 we find that the commitments to gaol during that year numbered 11,810, and of these commitments there were registered as intemperate, 8,478, so that about 72 per cent. of these commitments were directly traceable to the use of intoxicating liquor. The record of the Central Prison in Toronto since it was established in 1874, shows that there were 18,133 persons committed to that institution, and about 80 per cent. of this number were registered as of intemperate habits. Permit me to go a little further into the discussion as to the advisability of a prohibitory liquor law, and as to the baneful effects of the present licensing system. In the year 1834 the Parliament of Great Britain in its report on drunkenness, founded on an elaborate examination of witnesses from the three kingdoms, made the following declaration :—

"The consequences of the vice of intoxication are so many and so fearful that it is difficult to enumerate even the outlines of them : and to pursue them in all their melancholy details would require a volume. The following are only a few of the evils directly springing from this baneful source :

"Consequences to National Welfare.—The destruction of grain given by a bountiful Providence for the food of man, which is now converted by distillation into a poison : the highest medical authorities examined before your committee being uniform in their testimony that ardent spirits are absolutely poisonous to the human constitution, so that not only is an immense amount of human food destroyed, whilst thousands are inadequately fed, but this food is destroyed in such a manner as to injure greatly the agricultural producers themselves for whose grain, but for this perverted use of it, there would be more than twice the present demand. The loss of productive labour in every department of occupation to the extent of at least one day in six throughout the kingdom as testified by witnesses engaged in various manufacturing occupations : by which the wealth of the country is retarded or suppressed to the extent of one million out of every six that is produced, to say nothing of the constant derangements, imperfection, and destruction in every industrial process, occasioned by the intemperance and consequent unskilfulness, inattention and neglect of those affected by intoxication, producing great injury to our domestic and foreign trade. The extensive loss of property by sea, from shipwrecks, founderings, fires, and innumerable other accidents which, according to evidence of most experienced shipowners and nautical men, are clearly traceable to drunkenness. The spread of crime in every shape and form, from theft, fraud and prostitution in the young, to burnings, robberies and more hardened offences in the old : by which the gaols and prisons, the hulks and transports are filled with inmates, and an enormous mass of human beings are transformed into excrescences of corruption and weakness, and constituting our troublesome and dangerous classes. The retardation of all improvement —inventive or industrial, civil or political, moral or religious. That the mere pecuniary loss to the nation from the several causes already mentioned may be fairly estimated at little less than fifty million pounds sterling per annum."

At this late date it is scarcely necessary to argue in favour of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, because it must be plain to everyone the beneficial effects which a prohibitory liquor law would have upon the morals and upon the trade of the country. This question has narrowed itself down to the issue, whether the people of this country are prepared or not for the reception and the enforcement of such a law ; and to properly argue the question now, we have got to argue it from this standpoint. A few minutes ago I pointed out the fact that the Canada Temperance Act had been adopted in a large portion of this Dominion ; and just allow me briefly to show the present condition of the different provinces so far as prohibition is concerned. We find that in Prince Edward Island the whole of that province, except the city of Charlottetown, is under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act, and so far as I know the working of the Act has been satisfactory there. It is quite true that there, as well as in other portions of the Dominion, there have been infractions of the law. That is inevitable, but all we can ask of any law is that it reasonably answers the object for which it is promoted and adopted. Perhaps I should leave the description of the working of the Act in the different provinces to hon. gentlemen coming from these provinces, but I may remark that the Province of Nova Scotia has more than one-half its territory under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act, and that prohibition largely prevails in other portions of the province, owing to the unwillingness of the people to sanction the issuing of licenses. In the Province of New Brunswick I am informed that nine counties out of fourteen are still under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act. In the Province of Quebec, in which the people did not so generally avail themselves of the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act as in some of the other provinces, I am told that the Act is still in force in three counties and that the Dunkin Act is still in force in one or two other counties. So far as Manitoba is concerned, I believe that four-fifths of that province is under the operation of prohibition through provincial legislation. In the Province of Ontario it is quite true that at the present time the Canada Temperance Act is not in force in any county ; but a year or so ago the Legislative Assembly of that province passed a local option law. It is quite true there is a question as to the constitutionality of that law, and that question is now before the courts ; but in many of the minor municipalities the law has been voted on and adopted by the people, indicating that they are not, at all events, tired of local option. But in my judgment, Sir, were no portion of this Dominion without local option, that would be no answer to the proposition we submit in this resolution, that it is expedient to prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors throughout the Dominion ; because I do not think any prohibitory liquor law will be acceptable to the people which does not include every portion of the Dominion : and if we had a Dominion law prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, there would be an enforcement of it sufficient to abate, at all events, this very great evil which is abroad in the land. Now, Sir, I believe it to be the duty of Parliament, when dealing with matters of national importance, to look after the morals of the people as well as after the trade and commerce of the country. I believe in the great wisdom of a remark made by an eminent English statesman, that Parliament should legislate so as to make it as easy as possible for men to do right, and a great legal authority has told us that the object of all law is the well-being of the governed. If these propositions are correct, it is the duty of this Parliament, as speedily as possible, to pass a law to prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors, which we all admit—which every reasonable person in this House or throughout this whole Dominion will admit —is hurtful to every good interest of the country. Now, Sir, I know that some men—who claim to be good temperance men, and I am not going to question their orthodoxy simply because they do not agree with me—contend that the proper way to deal with the traffic in intoxicating liquors is to regulate it. Well, Sir, for centuries past the people of every civilized country in the world have been endeavouring to regulate that traffic; but it has refused to be regulated; and I believe that any traffic which refuses to be regulated should be prohibited, and should be prohibited as speedily as possible. Now, I do not intend to trespass at any greater length on the time and patience of this House. I have as briefly as possible supported by a few arguments the resolution which I have submitted, and I trust that this question will be treated on both sides of the House as it should be treated, on its merits. I trust that we shall have an honest and fair discussion of the question, and that this great inquest of the nation will in some way or other arrive at a conclusion which will satisfy the conscience of the country: because, Sir, I believe the public sentiment of this country to-day is in revolt against the traffic in intoxicating liquors. That being the case, it is the duty of the representatives of the people in Parliament in some reasonable manner to apply a remedy, and a remedy is needed in the very worst way. If we are honestly of opinion that a law prohibiting the traffic is a righteous law, it is our duty to pass such a law, and then to endeavour, as far as possible, to lift public opinion up to the reception and enforcement of the law.

Mr. FRASER. I desire, in seconding this resolution, to say that I believe I am not only performing a duty so far as my own individual interest is concerned, but a duty in the interest of good citizenship in this country. I need scarcely say that I do not look on the question as one which it is easy to discuss, or for which a solution can be arrived at by this House without a great deal of difficulty. On the threshold I can see the difficulties in the way of a prohibitory law in this Dominion, constituted as we are of men who honestly believe that it is not only their right but their privilege to use intoxicating liquors, as well as of those who are in favour of prohibition; we are confronted with the difficulty of dealing with men who consciously are as honest in the one belief as we are in the other. But in view of the ravages wrought in the past and in view of the present state of society, I am as satisfied as I am of my existence that the best interests of this country for the future are bound up in bringing to an end the traffic in intoxicating liquors in this Dominion. Holding that view I cannot but vote now as I have always voted on that question. It may be said that the time has not yet arrived when we should legislate on this subject; and I admit that this is a question on which there may be not only a difference of opinion, but such a difference of opinion as may be honestly held even by men who are in favour of prohibition. But I regard a vote in this House, as the hon. mover has suggested, as something of an education; and if the trend of public opinion in this country is, as I believe it to be, in favour of prohibition, I submit that the men who make the laws of the country should anticipate that condition of things and act accordingly. Back of the vote, and back of the whole question is individual abstinence; and while I am not addressing a temperance society, I am addressing temperance men when I say that the carrying out of this law and the beneficent results which we hope to flow from it, are bound up, not only in the individual abstinence of the members of this House, but in the general abstinence of the people of this country. I think that the people of this country understand that, both for themselves individually and for the country at large, total abstinence is the best, and I am glad that public opinion on the subject is so strong that men who will not go that far, will yet vote in favour of the principle in Parliament, and that is a great gain. I am not going to address the House at length. I could not hope to make converts, because I am addressing intelligent men who have thought over this question carefully, who have had it discussed in their presence and have discussed it themselves time and again. I therefore conceive that this is not the occasion for reviewing the facts or the arguments, for the purpose of inducing hon. members to vote for the resolution. But believing as I do that we must educate the country on the question, and that in my own and my fellow citizens' interests it would be best that we should have prohibition, and hoping that if not now, yet before very long, all our citizens will so see and understand the question, I have much pleasure in seconding the resolution.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I congratulate the House that for once the question under discussion has been introduced in a manner consistent with common sense, and with every appearance of sincerity. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution laid a great deal of stress on the number of petitions in favour of the proposition before the House, and on the number of those who signed these petitions. But we all know that a very large discount must be made upon the value of petitions of that nature, as representing public opinion, more especially when we know that they are signed, not only by the heads of families, not only by voters, but by all the members of families from the youngest to the eldest. Still, although a large discount must be made, I freely admit that those petitions do present so important a body of public opinion in favour of prohibitory liquor legislation, that we are bound to treat their prayer not only with courtesy, but with the most careful consideration. We are bound to assume that these petitioners are, as I believe they are, perfectly honest and sincere in their views. I for one am entirely opposed to the principle of the proposition before the House; but I would no more dream of charging those who advocate prohibition with indifference or carelessness, as to the possible results of their action, than I would venture to charge, as I never have charged, a political party with harbouring treasonable designs, because, in my opinion, the policy they are pursuing might bring about treasonable results. I give the supporters of prohibition in the country and in this House credit for the utmost sincerity, and I believe this House is bound to give these petitioners that which they ask, namely, not only a fair and honest consideration of the question, but an expression of opinion upon it, which will satisfy them, at any rate, as to what the opinion of the House really is. I believe the time for fencing and avoiding, by all sorts of amendments and counter-resolutions, the plain issue has gone by, and I for one, though not in favour of the proposition, shall, by my vote, assist its advocates in bringing it fairly to the test. In dealing with this question we find it presented in a two-fold aspect—the religious or moral, and the economical. From the religious or moral point of view, very great stress is laid by the advocates of prohibition, both in the House and out of it, on the assumption that it is a necessary consequence of our religious teachings. But those who take that position are either unscriptural or illogical. In order to justify the right of the majority to impose their will upon the minority in matters of this kind, the advocates of prohibition are compelled to put upon the Scriptures an interpretation which they have never borne, and never can be shown to bear, and that is, that the use of intoxicating liquors is in itself immoral. They are obliged to abandon what is the scriptural teaching that drunkenness is a deadly sin; otherwise they can find in Scripture no logical basis for their argument. Let us now proceed to deal with the question from the economical point of view. The advocates of the present proposition lay stress upon the statement frequently made by authorities whom we are all bound to regard with great respect—a statement which has become an accepted axiom, with, I think, very little foundation—namely, that to the use of intoxicating liquor is due nine-tenths or nineteen-twentieths or some other very large proportion of crime. That statement has been repeated by judges and other men of authority on various occasions, on the bench, in the press, and elsewhere, until it has become accepted as true. I am not prepared to accept it as true. If any one will consider what the nature of crime is, he will find there are very few classes of crime to which intoxication is an incitement, and that there are many classes in which intoxication would render the criminal incompetent and incapable of carrying out his criminal design. Let hon. gentlemen consult their own experience; let them look at those in their own rank of life or elsewhere, who have unfortunately given way to indulgence in intoxicating liquor, and then say whether the great majority of those men are criminals? Their own observation and experience will show such a statement to be utterly unfounded. If intoxication be the source of crime, how is it that those nations in which it unfortunately prevails the most are not the most criminal? This is a historical fact which the advocates of prohibition have not ventured to meet. Let them compare the northern countries of Europe, where intoxication most largely prevails, with the southern countries where intoxication is almost unknown. I venture to say the criminal annals are strongly in favour of the former. Let them meet that historical fact, if they can, before pressing their legislation on the ground that intoxication is the parent of crime. Again, their theory is altogether at variance with the teachings upon which they profess to base their case. I do not know that we are taught anywhere in those teachings that intoxication is the source of crime. We are told to look elsewhere and not to intoxicating liquor. If it were true that intoxicating liquors are the source of crime or of the greater portion of crime, we would find that doctrine laid down somewhere in the authority to which we all bow. But we find that opinion nowhere expressed, and that contention is, therefore, altogether unfounded. It is easy to rake up cases in support of a contention and apply them so as to fit the argument. I will give one which happened to my own knowledge. A respectable farmer, who had hitherto borne a fairly good character, was found guilty of killing his wife under most brutal circumstances. He was intoxicated, or partially intoxicated, but not so much as not to know perfectly what he was doing, when he committed the act. That was proved by the evidence, but it was also proved that he had planned the murder in his sober senses for weeks before, and had simply fortified himself with whiskey to bring himself up to the striking point. To say that murder was chargeable to intoxication is absurd. There was another case to which I might refer. A man committed a forgery. If there is a crime which requires a man to have all his wits about him, it is that of forgery. Well, what was the excuse of the criminal? It was that he was intoxicated. This plea has been so often abused that it has really come to pass that when a criminal comes to judgment he tries to escape moral responsibility by throwing the whole blame on intoxicating liquor. That doctrine, promulgated as it is by judge after judge, has been productive of very mischievous results. It is contrary to our own individual experience; it is contrary to history; and contrary also to the teachings of the Bible; and although it has become to be an accepted maxim, those who use it ought to carefully look into the evidence before they can regard it as applicable. But assuming, for the sake of argument, that all which is charged against intemperance can be fairly laid to its account, that all this crime, mischief and imbecility which is said to be the result of intoxicants can fairly be attributed to it, we are then to treat this question, not from the religious point of view, upon which, I say, the supporters of this resolution have no ground to stand, but simply as a question of economy, simply as to whether this remedy which is proposed is the one which will best meet the case. It is very hard to get evidence on this point. If we look at the experience of the States of the American Union which have adopted prohibitory legislation, we find the evidence so contradictory that I myself, after endeavouring honestly to discover what the result of that legislation has been, have to confess that I am unable to do so. I could quote page after page from various documents proving that the prohibitory liquor law in force in Maine and elsewhere has been productive of the most beneficial results, and I could quote page after page to prove that not only has it not been attended with beneficial results, but that it has been productive of a great amount of injury and misery. We cannot have a better example than the working of the Scott Act in this country. In the County of Simcoe, in which I live, the Scott Act was carried by an enormous majority, showing that the people there were in favour of that system. What was the result? For a few weeks—perhaps for a few months—the law was enforced, and the men who wanted liquor could not get it; but, after a very short time, places came to be known where liquor could be found. The Scott Act did not prevent the man who wanted to get drunk from getting drunk; it did not prevent the man who had a craving for liquor from getting liquor. The only result was that sober men who thought themselves respectable and did not like to be seen going into such places, did not get the liquor or got it at home, but the man who was desirous of getting intoxicated, the men of the very class whom the Act should have benefited, got the liquor just the same. Then there were prosecutions. Men were brought before the magistrates and charged with infractions of the Scott Act. What was the result of that? It was absolute failure so far as the prevention of drinking was concerned, but the result was of a very serious character in bringing about an amount of perjury, false swearing and false evidence fearful to contemplate. Finally, when the three years had elapsed, the Scott Act was repealed in that county by almost as large a majority as that which originally passed it. But it is said that this Act was not enforced because the officials of the Ontario Government did not try to enforce it. Well, I have, perhaps, as poor an opinion of the officials of the Ontario Government as anyone in this House. I have had some experience of them, and I think they are as inefficient for any purpose except political campaigning as any body of people in the Dominion of Canada. But it was said that they did not enforce this Act because it was a Dominion law, and the Dominion Government ought to enforce it. I think all criminal Acts are Dominion Acts, but it is the duty of the province to enforce them. Why should they make an exception in this case when there are a hundred other Acts which they do enforce? The reason why they did not enforce it was this, which will always stand in the way of any legislation of this kind: that public opinion did not support them in doing so. We can enforce a law against stealing because we are all united in the belief that it is contrary to the well-being of the community that one man should be allowed to rob another. We can enforce a law against crimes of violence because we all have respect for our own skins, and do not want men to go at large who will commit such offences. Public opinion does support the enforcement of laws of this kind, but in regard to the Scott Act they were powerless because public opinion was not with them, and because people who were brought forward, from whom better things might have been expected, did not hesitate in many cases—of course it is hard to say that a man actually swore a false oath, but the inference is very strong that they did give false evidence: and the result was that liquor was sold as freely and openly during the latter part of the existence of the Scott Act as in any previous period of the history of the county. It is said that you could not enforce the Scott Act in a county because it is surrounded by other counties in which liquor is sold. If that applies to a county, it would apply to a province, and it would apply equally to the Dominion. Have we not a country with a frontier of 3,000 miles? What power can prevent the smuggling of liquor along that frontier? Are the Government now able to prevent smuggling in the North-West Territories? Is that army of the North-West Mounted Police able to enforce the law there? We know that it has been to a large extent a failure. If there were only two millions of people in this country who wanted liquor, how could the Government prevent its being smuggled when it might be brought in at any place on the frontier from Victoria to Halifax. Then, illicit distillation had become common under the Scott Act. In many parts of the backwoods, in swamps which were inaccessible, stills had been erected and illicit distillation had become very common. Illicit distillation is very common to-day. The price at which ordinary whiskey is sold to-day is sufficient to induce many persons to enter into illicit distillation. If that is practised under the present system, how much illicit distillation would there be, in the present state of public opinion, if the manufacture and sale of liquor was entirely prohibited throughout the Dominion? Then we come to another question, and a very practical question. I said that I did not question the sincerity of the promoters of this legislation or its advocates in this House, but I do not think they have given sufficient weight to the heavy responsibility which would rest upon them if this measure were carried. With regard to the question of revenue, I will freely admit that, if you can prove your case, if you can prove that the prevention of the sale of intoxicating liquor will bring about all the advantages you say would accrue from it, then the Government would be bound to lose the revenue they derive from it and find that revenue from some other source. All I say is that the advocates of this measure must face the responsibility of calling upon the Government of this country—whoever they may be—to impose the necessary taxation, and to justify the course they have taken in causing the additional taxation. I say I admit that, if you are right in your contention, there ought to be no difference whatever on the ground of a loss of revenue, but that those who advocate this measure must be prepared to face that responsibility, and to ask themselves this question: If this resolution were carried to-day, the Government must carry it out as a resolution of this House. They must do that, or, if they resigned, and other gentlemen took their places, they would be equally bound by the mandate of this House. Are those who advocate this proposal prepared to assume that responsibility? I do not mean to say that they ought not to assume it, but I ask them: Are they prepared to assume it? My hon. friend upon my left says, in a very vague and airy way: Oh, we have no doubt that the prosperity of the country will be so great under prohibition that enough revenue will flow in from some other source. Well, that is just about on a par with the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite when they are met with the prospect of a loss of a similar amount of revenue by unrestricted reciprocity, and they tell us: Oh, we would be so prosperous that our revenue would come from some other source. I should like to hear from those who advocate this motion, some definite idea of how we are going to meet that difficulty, which we should have to meet if we passed the resolution now in your hands. Now that is a very serious consideration, and it is one to which the members of this House are bound to pay respect. They are also bound to meet all the practical difficulties which would arise in the event of such legislation. It is said in this resolution that the Dominion is to enforce it. Well, how is the Dominion to enforce it? Is the Dominion to establish police all through the country in order to enforce it?

Mr. JAMIESON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; that is not in the present resolution. It simply affirms the principle of immediate prohibition.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, if it is not in the present resolution, all I have got to say is that it ought to be in the present resolution, because it has been the contention with reference to the Scott Act, when the officials would not enforce it, that it was Dominion legislation: so, if hon. gentlemen are sincere in wishing to carry out this resolution into practical effect, they ought to be prepared to tell us, and the mover of the resolution ought to be prepared to tell us, how it is going to be carried out.

Mr. JAMIESON. That is a question of detail.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, if ever was a question which, based upon a principle, is yet very largely dependent upon details, it is the question now before the House. It is all very well to bring down abstract resolutions, it is all very well to put before the House a resolution such as this, but if the advocates of this resolution in this House are really sincere, they ought to give us some idea how it is to be carried into effect; if they do not, I think the sincerity which we might otherwise be willing to accord to them, must be qualified considerably. Now, the hon. gentleman has not given us any idea as to how his proposal is to be carried out. I say it will be impossible to carry it out, according to the experience we have had, unless the Federal Government is prepared to do it. Therefore, the Dominion, in addition to the loss of six or seven million dollars revenue, would have to establish a corps of preventive police throughout the country, irrespective altogether of the Provincial authorities whose business it is now to carry out legislation of this kind. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said nothing about what really underlies this whole question, and that is, whether a majority in this House, or a majority in the country, no matter how honest and sincere they may be, have a right to impose upon the minority legislation which is not based upon some better principle than that which is found in the resolution of my hon. friend. That is a view of the question which I do not urge very strongly, because, although it is vital to the question, yet I think many of us might be willing to say that if we believed that legislation such as is now proposed would really accomplish the very great ends in view we might be willing to sink our individual liberty, to make a sacrifice of our individual liberty and our individual inclinations, in order to bring about that result. But while we may be willing, personally, to make that sacrifice, a majority has no right to compel us to make it. There is a vast distinction. I may be willing to sacrifice my interest, to give up my liberty, in order to establish a great national end, but in a case like this, a majority has no right to say to me: Whether you like it or not, you shall give up your liberty, and you shall surrender the opinions which you have just as good a right to hold as those who entertain opposite views. Now, Sir, holding these opinions, I certainly cannot vote for that resolution, because the doctrine of total prohibition, as laid down in this resolution, and as laid down in the constitution of the Dominion Alliance, and which should, probably, carry more weight even than the remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, is one which I can by no means support. This resolution has been drawn up by the body which the hon. gentleman and others represent in this House. In this resolution he is carrying out the wishes of the Dominion Alliance. Well, now, what does the Dominion Alliance say? It assumes, in the first place:

"That the history and results of past legislation in regard to the liquor traffic abundantly prove that it is impossible satisfactorily to limit or regulate a system so essentially mischievous in its tendencies."

That is to say, that you cannot have a license system which shall be effective in reducing the degree of intoxication. They go on to say:

"That the total prohibition of the liquor traffic is in perfect harmony with the principles of liberty and justice."

Now, Sir, I for one, by my vote in this House, can never give assent to a doctrine so monstrous as that. The Dominion Alliance must be singularly ignorant of the first principles of liberty and justice when they can lay down the proposition, in a solemn document like this, in their constitution, that:

"The total prohibition of the liquor traffic is in perfect harmony with the principles of liberty and justice, is not a restriction of legitimate commerce, and is essential to the integrity and stability of the Government, and the welfare of the community."

They may be justified in saying that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is a very great evil, and one that ought to be restricted and prohibited in every way possible, as being a matter of police regulation; but they have no right to say that total prohibition is in harmony with the principles of liberty and justice. Now, Sir, I think the advocates of this so-called temperance measure make another very great mistake; I think they make a mistake in representing, in the exaggerated terms they do, the existing evils of intoxication and the extent of them. I think they make a great mistake in not claiming for themselves, and for the kindred associations of those who take the same view that they do, some of the credit which they might take for the great good they have done in this respect in the past. I think they are not quite honest in their modesty. They wish to make the evils of intoxication appear so great as to justify them in asking the House to pass this resolution, and therefore they ignore even the results of their own action, they ignore even the results of their own societies. Why, Sir, when I was a boy I can remember very well in the township in which I lived, to give only one instance affecting one particular class of the community, that a majority of the farmers who went to town on various occasions, on public holidays, or to market, or for any other purpose, usually went home more or less intoxicated, and if any man went home habitually sober he was a marked man, he was looked upon as something far and away above his fellows. But to-day the very opposite is the case. There are thousands of men who go to market two or three times a week, but if one of them goes home intoxicated, or does it more than once, why, he is a marked man, he is looked upon as a person with whom one ought not to associate, he is looked upon as a dangerous and mischievous character, and he is shunned and treated accordingly. Now, I say there has been a very great reform in this respect, to whatever cause it is due, and I believe it is largely due to the operation of these various societies. So I say they make a mistake when, in order to give greater weight to their arguments in favour of prohibition, they entirely ignore the operations of their own societies. At the present day there are hundreds and thousands of young men and women growing up who, I believe, do not know the taste of intoxicating liquors, and this result is largely due to the operation of the Good Templars and similar societies. While they preach total prohibition they practise something much more valuable—they practise personal prohibition. I hold that a person who believes it to be in his interest either in this world or the next, to practise personal prohibition is worthy of all praise, and he is still more worthy of all praise if he does so, not because he himself is in any danger, but as an example to others. That person is entitled to the very greatest respect, and his opinion is entitled to the very greatest consideration. But it is a totally different matter from action to force at the point of the law opinions which I say are not in harmony either with liberty or with justice. Holding these opinions, and looking at the vast responsibility we would have to undertake were we to enact the legislation proposed, feeling the due weight of the responsibility which every hon. member should feel, I have no hesitation in saying that I shall vote against the proposition, because I think it is one that in its results will cause, if anything, more injuries than the benefits that will accrue to the country. Temperance associations are not wise, even from their own point of view, in endeavouring to force this legislation on the country. They would be much wiser were they to pursue the course which, although perhaps they do not admit it, has been attended with vast success in every part of the Dominion, and the very fact that such large petitions in favour of prohibition can be sent to this House is, I admit, proof of the great success achieved. Let them be content with pursuing the path which has been successful, and not attempt to pursue a path which, in my opinion and, I think, in the opinion of the majority of the people, if that opinion were honestly expressed, would not bring about the results which are desired. But, as I said at the commencement, I admit that these petitions present such a body of opinion, honestly and sincerely entertained, that I feel all the more bound to meet them, as I have met them, with an honest expression of my dissent from what they hold. I have many electors in my own constituency who have petitioned for prohibition, and I feel I would be treating them unfairly if I did not on the floor of this House, having given no pledges whatever on the question, give the reasons why I shall vote against the resolution, which I know many of them desire to be carried. But having that respect for their convictions, I think it is due to them and to the country that this House should give a clear expression of opinion, and therefore, actuated by that regard, I shall vote against every proposition that may be made which may tend to prevent that distinct expression for which they ask: and I am satisfied, from what I have read in the various publications of the temperance people, that unless this House gives a distinct expression of opinion, they will feel they have been unfairly and discourteously treated. For these reasons I shall vote against the resolution, but at the same time I shall do all I can to have the question brought fairly and squarely before hon. members of this House.

Mr. AMYOT. I desire to ask the mover of the resolution whether sherry wine is included?

Mr. JAMIESON. Whatever is intoxicating in its character will be prohibited.

Mr. AMYOT. Then, if I understand properly from those who are in the habit of tasting wines, it is an intoxicating drink. I am rather surprised to hear that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) finds a difficulty in regard to the revenue which would be lost if we had prohibition. Are we not in a state of great prosperity? We were told during the late election that the system of protection gives us ample means of providing for any particular want. The Government have been boasting of four millions of surplus, and I believe the Minister of Finance himself is one of the apostles of prohibition. So, under these circumstances, I do not see that the loss of revenue should be an objection. But I go a step further. I do not believe in clubbing principles into a man's conscience. I believe those who think it is wrong to have a glass of wine are incorrect. They remind me of a parish priest, who said to his flock that anyone who tasted a drop of wine was condemned to Hell forever. His bishop, who passed by one day, said that this was going too far, because our Lord himself took the trouble to turn water into wine. Thereupon the priest replied, yes, but it was not the best thing He did. I will now endeavour to present a more serious view of the question. The mover of the resolution must know that by the laws of this country, and more especially by chapter 74 of the Consolidated Statutes, which is still in force, it is declared that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious and public worship are guaranteed to all Her Majesty's subjects. The Catholic religion is one of these religions. The Catholic priest when he says mass and consecrates has to use wine, according to the rites of his church. If the principle laid down by the hon. mover of this resolution were applied, the priest could not procure here the necessary wine. The hon. gentleman is, therefore, seeking to prevent the free exercise of the Catholic religion. With his sincere zeal, he has seen only one side of the question, the great need of having laymen apply force to send the people of this country to Heaven.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have some hesitation in addressing the House for the first time upon this very important question, because I see some difficulties ahead of us which have been temperately pointed out by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). At the same time I have held for many years a strong conviction on this subject, that the evils of the traffic in strong drink are so great that it would be necessary, sooner or later, that something should be done to prohibit the traffic entirely; and, therefore, while I hesitate to speak upon this subject, yet my convictions are so strong that I feel it is my duty, not only to many of my constituents who supported me because they believed me to be a moderate temperance man, but also to the public generally, to whom we owe the duty to do what we think is best in the interests of the Dominion, not only on this question, but on all other questions brought before the House. I should like at the outset to refer to a few of the arguments brought forward by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and also the question which was raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). In regard to the latter I may say it has always been conceded by the most ardent prohibitionist that in any prohibitory law enacted we would have to exclude the wines and liquors used for sacramental purposes, and also those used for mechanical purposes and for medicinal purposes. So that is a complete answer, I think, to what the hon. member said in regard to that point. Although I belong to a different church from that to which the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) belongs, yet in my own church wine is used for sacramental purposes, and, I suppose, will continue to be so used. So that is a point we are not discussing, and one we need not quarrel about in any way. It is conceded on all hands that the use of wine for sacramental service and the use of all alcoholic liquors for medicinal and mechanical purposes will be allowed to continue. Now, with regard to the arguments of my friend, the hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), I think the first strong attitude he took in reference to prohibition was, that the position of the prohibitionists is unscriptural, and that we are seeking for the prohibition of something that is recognized in Scripture, and not only recognized, but the use of it countenanced. I do not know whether or not I am taking unorthodox ground, from a Methodistical point of view, so to speak, but, if so, I hope the reporters will not take any note of it and will allow it to remain silent and keep it out of their papers. Now, while I am prepared to admit that the Scriptures do recognize, and to a certain extent countenance the use of wine, yet the use of strong drink, to the extent to which it prevails at the present time, is entirely contrary to the principles laid down in the Scriptures for our guidance. There were other things which were recognized by the Scripture as not being evil in early times, but which are evil now. For instance, what we now consider the crime of slavery is recognized in the Bible and the same argument might be applied to that, as to intoxicating liquor, but as soon as it was found out by the advancement and development of society, that slavery was not only a great evil but a great crime, it was considered that it was essentially necessary for the well-being of society, and in order that the principles of the Scripture might be followed out in daily life, that slavery should be abolished. Consequently, it was abolished. I believe we have now arrived at the same point in reference to the traffic in strong drink. It is many years ago since the use of intoxicating liquor was felt to be an evil; it is many years since we have been trying to restrict it in every way; it is many years since we began to curb it within proper limits, but notwithstanding every effort put forward by the people, notwithstanding the local option law, notwithstanding the work of temperance people for many years, the evil still goes on. Although this evil has been abated to a material extent, yet it still exists to such an extent that it is the duty of the people to curb it, it is the duty of Parliament to take hold of it, and if we can see our way clear to pass such a law as will either suppress or lessen this evil, we will be doing something that our country in future years will be glad to boast of. The hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), also questioned to a certain extent whether the amount of crime which is generally attributed to strong drink, is really traceable to that source, but the hon. gentleman did not produce any statistics in support of his argument or to refute the statistics presented to the House by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). These statistics presented by the mover of the resolution are fresh in the minds of the House, and the hon. member for Muskoka did not attempt to show that they were not correct. We have in the annals of our country the clearest evidence that a very large proportion of the crime and imprisonment in Canada is directly traceable to the use of strong drink. Indeed I think the hon. member for Muskoka was rather unhappy in the illustration he used to show that crime was not traceable to drink. His illustration, in my opinion, rather tended to show that if the man who murdered his wife had not got the strong drink, he would never have nerved himself to commit the murder, and, therefore, the illustration of the hon. gentleman reacts upon his own argument and tends to support the resolution which we are now discussing. I will not repeat the statistics which have been brought forward, for we all know very well that a large proportion of our crime is entirely produced by the liquor traffic and by the indulgence in strong drink. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) referred to the possibility, or impossibility, of restricting this traffic and enforcing total prohibition. He properly referred to the fact that we have a very long border line connecting us with the neighbouring nation, and that all along the border line there would be danger of smuggling, so that we would probably have a great deal to contend with in order to prevent liquor from being smuggled across the line. I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, that we will not have very great difficulties, in the outset, at any rate, in enforcing a prohibitory law. I do not think that even the most ardent prohibitionist is prepared to say, that when we put that law in force it would run along so smoothly that we will have no trouble about it. Like all great measures which have been brought forward, we will have difficulties for some time in coping with the evil which the law is intended to suppress, but I feel sure that with the sense of the people in favour of the law, as I believe it is, and with a law passed by this Parliament backing up that public sentiment, I believe that such a law, if it goes into force, will be faithfully carried out, and that in a few years we will see prohibition from one end of the Dominion to the other. Nearly all great reforms have met with more serious opposition than this reform which we are now asking for. I do not know whether it is fair to compare this liquor traffic with the traffic in slaves, but if the hon. gentleman thinks so I hope he will pardon me if I compare it to that traffic for a moment. You will remember that the suppression of the slave traffic cost the nation to the south of us a long and bloody civil war, entailing an expense of millions of money and engendering a feeling of antagonism between North and South which has not yet abated. Therefore, in dealing with a question of this kind, by which it is proposed to suppress a great moral evil, we will always find great opposition, but we who favour prohibition are firmly convinced that if this law is passed, and if there is an honest endeavour to carry it out, that we will soon have prohibition throughout our country. Another difficulty which the hon. member for Muskoka referred to was the probability of extensive illicit distillation. That will not be a new evil, for notwithstanding the fact that we have at present a law against it, it is well known that there are illicit stills, although the law is as faithfully carried out as we can hope it to be. I have no doubt that we will have to deal with that question when we pass a prohibitory law. I believe that the hon. member is correct when he says that under prohibition we will have a great deal of illicit distillation in the country, but that is one of the evils we have to meet and with a vigorous enforcement of the law we can meet it. If vigilant and responsible officers are appointed, illicit distillation will, I believe, disappear in a short time. I was really surprised that the hon. member for Muskoka questioned the fact as to whether the law could be carried out if it were passed by this House. I have heard that statement repeated often and often upon the public platform, when the supporters of the Scott Act and of other local temperance measures were endeavouring to have them passed, but I did not expect to hear upon the floor of Parliament that any laws which were passed by this House could not be enforced. I did not expect to hear upon the floor of this House that the people of this Dominion were not prepared to support Parliament in carrying out a prohibitory liquor law, or any other law, which the wisdom of this Parliament deems fit to pass. I believe the people of the country will support the officers in carrying out the law just as heartily as the members of this House, and will be prepared to stand by the Government in their endeavours to enforce it. Another argument offered by my hon. friend, which as an argument I thought was not quite as strong as some of the others he advanced, was that the majority would have no right to impose this law on the minority. Well, I do not know how far that principle ought to be carried into operation. I know that the majority of us have forced the minority to support the grand old leader and the grand old flag, and I suppose in this age when majorities rule that whatever the majority decide upon the minority will have to assent to. That I understand, from my studies of the matter, to be the underlying principle of our Government. If the argument of my hon. friend were carried to its legitimate conclusion, we should have no right to say to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House: Because you are in the minority you must do as we say, you must submit to the laws which we pass. In reading the resolution which I thought at first the hon. gentleman was going to put before the House by way of amendment, though he afterwards disclaimed that intention, and in which reference was made to the liberty of the subject, I came to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman had not read that old and well-known volume called Blackstone; because if he had perused that valuable work, he would have found that his definition of liberty was not quite correct. If I remember Blackstone aright—it is some years since I read it—it states that liberty is not unlicensed freedom, not that every man may do exactly as he pleases, but that every man may have that measure of liberty which is consistent with the state of society in which we live. That, I contend, is the true definition of liberty. We cannot expect to be free from restraints, because we are surrounded by them on all sides; but we enjoy that measure of liberty which is consistent with our present state of society, and that is all that any man or woman wishes to have. Therefore, to say that a prohibitory law is wrong because it interferes with the liberty of the people is not a correct statement of the principle of liberty, because if the majority decide that we ought to have such a law, then it is quite right and proper that this House should pass it. I was very glad that the hon. member paid the tribute he did to the progress which has been made in the temperance movement in Canada. I am aware myself, although I have not been actively connected with the movement, that there are very many men and women in our country who have made great sacrifices in the cause of temperance. I have seen and I know men who have been maligned and traduced by those opposed to them, men who are sacrificing time and talents in the interest of this cause which might bring them greater personal advantages if applied in some other direction. Therefore, I am very glad to hear from an hon. member of this House who is opposed to this resolution the tribute he has paid to the workers in the temperance movement which has been going on so long in our country. Yet he says that the temperance people are not true to themselves. He expresses the opinion, that we ought to continue to pursue the same lines that we have been pursuing for so many years, and endeavour still further to educate the people until there shall not be one man or one woman in the length and breadth of this Dominion who will not be crying out for prohibition: then he thinks this House may pass it, and not before. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very progress that the temperance movement has made, and the very fact that the hon. gentleman refers to it in such laudable terms, is a clear indication that these people are not prepared to recede from the position they have gained, but are now endeavouring to press forward still further in order to secure a prohibitory measure from this House. They consider this question to be, as it is, a developing question, and they believe that the time must come when it will develop beyond mere moral suasion, and be taken up and dealt with by this House. So that it appears to me that the positions taken by the hon. gentleman, although they are about the strongest positions I have ever heard taken against the cause of prohibition, will not stand the test of argument when they are followed to their legitimate conclusions; and some of them really react upon the hon gentleman himself, and are arguments in favour of prohibition. We cannot overlook the fact of the extent and enormity of the evils which have been produced by strong drink. These have been eloquently and vividly depicted by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), in referring to those evils, said they were now restricted. I am quite prepared to admit that such is the case; and yet we must all realize that in this traffic we are still face to face with a great evil. We must realize that, in spite of all that has been done to restrict it, that evil still stands before us as one of enormous magnitude, and one with which this country has yet to deal. If I were to address myself privately to the members of this House, I am sure, and I say it with sorrow and regret, that there is not one of us who could say in his heart that he had not felt in himself or his family the sting of this serpent, notwithstanding all the advances which have been made in temperance, because it is a well-known fact that the evil which we are contending against has come into our houses and has sometimes tried to nestle itself there in the bosoms of our families;

so that, with all our restrictions, we realize that we have not yet got it trampled under foot, but that we must place further restrictions upon it; and the very next restriction which we must place upon it is total prohibition. The history of this movement in the direction of prohibition is one that must be interesting to every person who favours temperance reform. I think we may say that the temperance movement dates from some fifty years ago, although we have evidence of its existence at a time very much anterior to that. But the history of the temperance movement proper can be comprised within the past fifty years. We find that period has been one of development. The evil was at first grappled with in a small way by means of the license system. Then followed a reduction in the number of licenses granted. Then we had temperance organizations. Then a high price was fixed for licenses: and then came the local option laws. What is the result of this progress? We are not as far from prohibition to-day as we were fifty years ago. Although I am a young man, I can remember the time when the drinking habit was much more frequently indulged in than now; and I am glad to be able to say that the temperance movement is largely to be credited with the decrease in this great evil of indulgence in strong drink. We have yet to deal with the financial problem, and that is where a great difficulty lies. It is all very well to talk of local option and high licenses and temperance organizations; but so long as we do not strike at the source of the evil we will fail to remove it. If we could by local option, by temperance education, by high license, stop the fountain of the evil from flowing, we would be able to deal with it in a more practical manner, but the great difficulty is that the manufacture of liquor has been continually going on, and the only thing that seems capable of being done at present is to strike at the foundation of the evil and pass a prohibitory law. I am well aware that in addressing ourselves to that part of the question we come face to face with one of the most serious difficulties, and that is that there are very many persons engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, and we cannot deal with this question without considering how it affects their interests. We cannot sweep away at once a man's business without making up our minds beforehand as to whether or not he is entitled to some compensation. If I am trespassing a little outside of the resolution, it may be that my hon. friend the mover of the resolution will bring me to time, but I must confess I am not quite orthodox in the matter of prohibition, because I am personally in favour of compensation to the manufacturers. That is my private opinion, which I state to the House as I have stated it to my temperance friends whenever I have had occasion to address them on this subject. It does not appear to me fair, that these gentlemen, who have such an immense amount of capital invested in machinery, buildings and other property for the purpose of carrying on their business, should have their business swept away and no compensation given them. Therefore, at the risk of being called to task by my hon. friend, I feel it my duty to this House and to the country to state that I am in favour of compensation to the manufacturers. I do not think I would like to go further. I know there are hon. gentlemen in this House who say: Why not compensate also the other liquor sellers. I think the others stand in a very different position, but without taking up the time of the House in discussing a matter, which will probably be a question of detail should we decide on prohibitory legislation, I would simply repeat that while I am in favour of compensation to the manufacturers, I do not think compensation should extend to those who only sell liquor and are not manufacturers. Another question arises, and that is as to the right of this House to prevent a man from taking a drink of strong liquor if he chooses. Now I would not like to refuse that right to any man because I believe in the principles of freedom as they have been enunciated, to a certain extent, by the hon. member for Muskoka. I do not think we have a right to say to any man: While there is liquor in this land you have no right to take a glass of liquor; but I do say that if, in the opinion of this House, the time has come when we ought to prohibit its manufacture and sale for beverage purposes, there would not, I believe, be any improper interference with the liberty of the subject if when dealing with a great evil we should subject people to certain restraint. It does not occur to me that the freedom of our people would be restricted to any extent which would be hurtful to them. I would, on the contrary, be disposed to say that the restriction would be beneficial even to those who indulge moderately in strong liquors. We must recognize, in dealing with this traffic, that there are multitudes of our men and our women who are dragged down by means of it so that they no longer enjoy any freedom; and not only that, but the curse falls upon their children. How much of the crime, how much of the suffering, how much of the misery in our land can be traced directly and indirectly to the immoderate indulgence in strong drink. If all men and all women could restrain their appetites so that there would be no intoxication, and no social and moral misery produced by this evil, we would not be standing here to-day speaking in support of this resolution; but it is because men and women have been made slaves, it is because children have been made worse than slaves, that we are here to-day asking that those who feel that a certain amount of restriction is placed on their liberty by this proposed law should submit to the curtailment of that liberty for the benefit of the multitude who are so deeply affected by the traffic. Another difficulty we have to face, and one likely to cause a great deal of serious discussion before a prohibitory law can be passed, is the question of revenue; and yet I do not see, after all, if we are satisfied upon other points, if we are convinced that this law ought to pass, if we are convinced of the evil we are seeking to banish, if we are satisfied that it is in the interests of the people, a prohibitory law should be placed in our Statute-book that the question of revenue should be allowed to stand in our way. If we are making revenue out of an evil so great that it requires to be prohibited, then we should sacrifice that revenue. If we are making a revenue at the cost of the suffering, and misery, and loss, and ruin of many of our people, then we ought to be prepared as a Government to sacrifice that revenue, and to say to the people: We will give you a prohibitory law, whatever loss it may be to us by way of revenue. But it is contended, and it appears to me with some degree of force—I must confess, with convincing force to my mind, although it does not seem to have struck all the hon. gentlemen in that way as yet—that, although the revenue would be at a loss immediately after passing the Bill, ultimately we would be no losers by the passage of a prohibitory law. I do not know whether I can work that out satisfactorily to the gentlemen who have taken the opposite view, but, as it presents itself to me, it is something in this way: Take the manufacturers who are engaged now in the manufacture of liquor and from whom the Government derives its revenue. Of course, all the revenue from the dealers is municipal. It is not to be supposed for a moment that these gentlemen would withdraw their capital and their machinery and everything they have invested their money in, and would go out of business entirely. We would find that these immense distilleries and breweries where liquor had been manufactured before would at once be turned into revenue-producing manufactories. We would, therefore, find that the capital now invested in the manufacture of strong drink would be directed into other channels.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You would have to protect them.

Mr. COATSWORTH. That would be a question for the other side to deal with, and, whether we protected them or not, we find in the actual working out of our manufacturing interests that one of the results of establishing manufactories in our country is the production of so much more revenue. There is another question which may affect it, perhaps, a little more indirectly. I am not personally familiar with the working of the traffic, but I am told on credible authority that there are fewer workmen by far employed in the manufacture of liquor than would be necessary in any other manufacture, so that one of the results of the passing of a prohibitory measure and the establishment of other manufactures in place of the manufacture of liquor would be that an immense number of workmen would be employed, more than are employed in the liquor manufacture at the present time. There is another aspect to that question, and it is that, if it be true, as the statistics of my hon. friend the mover of the resolution have shown, that a large proportion of the crime in this country is traceable to strong drink, then the natural conclusion is that, when strong drink is banished from our country, when we are able to put into force and operation a prohibitory measure, that crime, to a large extent at any rate, will be checked, will be stayed, and therefore the cost of the administration of justice, the cost of the maintenance of our prisons, and the cost of all those things which are produced by strong drink will be reduced in proportion, and there would be a great saving to the Government in that line of expenditure. In concluding my remarks, I would just like to say that we must not look entirely at what might be called the economical side of this question. Every gentleman in this House is to a certain extent responsible for the moral and social well-being of this country; and to the extent that we can by our laws, passed after due consideration, lift up the moral and social condition of our people, to that extent we are responsible for the passage of such laws as will do so, and I believe this prohibitory legislation will be in the direction of the uplifting of our people both morally and socially. We have all realized that the indulgence in strong drink, to the extent to which it is carried on, is an enormous moral evil. What mean those petitions which are coming to us? How is it that we are having petitions presented from almost every church in the Dominion, asking for the prohibition of the traffic? It means that the churches, who are to a certain extent, if not to a full extent, our moral guides, realize that the traffic in strong drink is so immoral in all its tendencies that it ought to be suppressed. If it were not a great evil from a moral point of view, if it were not felt by all the churches of our country that the time had come for the suppression of this traffic, would we have such petitions as have been presented here from the churches? I would call your attention to a petition I had the honour of presenting yesterday from the General Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 46) respecting the South-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Sproule, for Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 47) to amend an Act to incorporate the Collingwood and Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

PATENT RELIEF BILL—J. S. CORBIN.

Mr. REID moved the second reading of Bill (No. 30) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Jay Spencer Corbin.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the House ought to have some explanation concerning this Bill before consenting to its second reading.

Mr. REID. The circumstances under which relief is sought are set forth in the preamble of the Bill. It appears that Mr. Corbin had a patent on some harrow, that the patent expired, and as he wished to renew it he sent forward the application and fee, which failed to reach its destination in time. There was a similar Bill passed last year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As the hon. gentleman states, the Bill is somewhat in the line of a Bill which we passed last year in this House. The circumstances are not quite similar, but the parties claim that the case is an exceptional one. It is a case in which the patentee, by what is alleged to be an oversight, failed to secure a renewal of the patent for the reason that the fee required for renewal, together with the application, arrived six days after the proper date. I had a very strong impression that one of the Bills at last Session ought to pass because the case made out in evidence before the committee showed that the patentee was in no way at fault. He had made his application in due time, and it was due to the mistake of one of his clerks that it did not reach the Commissioner at the proper time. There are no such strong circumstances stated in this Bill; nevertheless, I think it will not be improper that it should have its second reading, and should go to the Committee on Private Bills for investigation of the allegations set out in the petition. I would not advocate that course if the rule were not well understood, that in reading a private Bill the second time we are not committed to its principle. I am somewhat doubtful that the facts which are contained in the preamble of the Bill can be made out, but if the facts are made out we can deal with the principle of the Bill when it comes back from the committee. So far as I am concerned I would be disposed to support the second reading. As a general principle, I am opposed to persons obtaining exemption from the general rule by means of special legislation; nevertheless, under the circumstances, I would consent to the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WESTERN LIFE ASSURANCE CO.

Mr. CURRAN (for Mr. MACDONALD, Winnipeg) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Western Life Assurance Company.

Mr. COCKBURN. There is in Toronto an insurance company doing business under the same name, and when this Bill goes into Committee I shall move that some change be made in the title of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

FRANCHISE ACT REPEAL BILL.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 8) to repeal An Act respecting the Electoral Franchise. He said: I desire to say but a very few words with reference to this Bill. The Bill which I propose by my Bill to repeal, passed the House of Commons some five years ago, and I can safely say that no Bill affecting the representation of the people in Parliament, that has received the Royal Assent, for the last quarter of a century has proved more entirely unsatisfactory than the Act called the Electoral Franchise Act. The law itself, in my judgment, at the time it was introduced in Parliament, was wholly uncalled for. There were no demands for it, no petitions presented in Parliament in favour of it, no public clamour for it. It was a Bill that was entirely uncalled for; and I think the experience of the last five or six years has shown it to be a harsh Bill, a vicious Bill in principle, and a Bill difficult to work out in detail. It was, I believe, introduced into Parliament by the First Minister solely for a political end. I believe it was forced through Parliament, against the strenuous efforts of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, solely for a political end. I believe it was introduced and forced through Parliament and received its final stage with a view to benefit one political party and damage, if not destroy, the other political party, and the effect of the Bill has proved eminently unsatisfactory to both the political parties. I believed then, and I believe now, and more especially now, that the honest sentiment of the great mass of the Dominion is adverse to this Bill. I believe the honest sentiment of the majority of the members of Parliament is not in harmony with this Bill; I believe it is a Bill that has proved as unsatisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite as I know it has proved unsatisfactory to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The honest sentiment of the country, as well as the experience of the last six years during which we have had this Electoral Franchise Bill in operation,—no, not in operation, sometimes in operation and sometimes its operation suspended—has pronounced decidedly and emphatically against the longer continuance on the Statute-book of this Bill. The experience of the last six years has shown beyond a reasonable peradventure that the Electoral Franchise Bill has opened wide and free all the doors for all kinds of electoral misconduct and electoral frauds. I believe the experience of the last six years has shown us, beyond all doubt, that it is a harsh Bill to both political parties, a harsh Bill to the candidates who are seeking the honour of representing the people in Parliament. The Bill when introduced by the First Minister, six years ago, was based, the hon. gentleman told us, on four grounds. He said, as will be found in Hansard of 1885, page 1134, that the Bill was necessary, that a system of representation applicable to all the provinces was an absolute necessity, that a representation of every class alike in all the provinces was a necessity, that the franchise in all the provinces should be exactly alike, and further, that every interest in every province alike should be represented in this Parliament. Before the Bill had received its second reading, before it had received the Royal Assent, every assurance the First Minister gave us as to the necessity of a Dominion Electoral Franchise ceased to exist, and was practically abandoned. We have not now, we never had, under this Electoral Franchise Bill, a system alike in all the provinces. We have not now, we never had since the Electoral Franchise Bill received the Royal assent, a system of elections that was exactly the same in all the provinces. We never had, and we have not now, the same classes in all the provinces represented alike in the House of Commons in Canada. We never had under this Bill, and we have not now, the same interests and the same classes represented alike in all the provinces in the Parliament of Canada. The Province of Ontario has not now the same system of representation the Province of Prince Edward Island possesses. The Province of Quebec has not now the same classes represented as the Province of British Columbia. The two older provinces have not now, and never had under this Bill, the same classes and interests represented in this Parliament as the North-West Territories, as the Province of British Columbia, the Province of Manitoba and the Province of Prince Edward Island. A different system and a different franchise prevails. In one province we have manhood suffrage, in another province we have universal suffrage practically, in another province we have a suffrage based on a real property qualification, and in another province the suffrage is based on a real and personal property qualification. So that the grounds on which the First Minister insisted that this Bill should be passed through Parliament, and was a necessity, ceased to exist before the Bill received the Royal Assent; and for this reason, if for no other, I submit it ought to be repealed by the Parliament of Canada. The Bill is open to grave objections apart from the point I have already been discussing. I have stated that it has been the experience of the last six years in carrying out this Bill that it opens the doors wide and free for electoral frauds of all kinds in the preparation of the voters' lists. Let me give the House a sample or two which have come under my notice since this Bill became law. It was declared, when the First Minister was pressing the Bill through Parliament, that the mixed and complicated franchises he was proposing for some of the provinces would necessarily entail expense, labour, trouble and complications of all kinds; that the returning officers would not all decide alike on the same questions; that one revising officer would decide the point in one way and another returning officer in quite another way. I know of one electoral district in which an income franchise voter made a declaration in order to have his name inserted on the voters' list. He made the usual declaration. He swore to that declaration on oath, and made his application to the returning officer; and the oath—and it is that which substantially affects the merits of the case—was in the following words:—"I am in receipt of wages to the value of $300 a year or over; I have been so for one year prior to 1st January, 1886, and have been a resident of the city for that same period." One would naturally think, that the object of Parliament and of the returning officer would be, that any man making a bonâ fide application to be placed on the voters' list, asking to enjoy the right that every British subject ought to have the right to enjoy, should have his application dealt with, not in a technical spirit, but in a broad and liberal one. This worthy returning officer rejected the declaration and cut off the unfortunate man from his right to exercise the franchise, and the grounds on which he did it emphasizes the stand we took when we opposed the Bill in 1885. The returning officer said: I want information, and the information must be supplied in an intelligible form; the 1st of January must be supplied in so many words, and not by contractions, the words "$300 or over" convey no meaning, the law requires "not less than $300." "Prior to 1st January" is bad. On these four grounds that intelligent and unpartizan returning officer—I am bound to assume that he was such—rejected this man's application to be placed on the voters' list: because the figures "1st January" were inserted, because the words "three hundred dollars or over" were used instead of "not less than $300," and because the words "prior to 1st January, 1886," were used. I say the work of carrying out the Act is difficult besides being expensive. I say that it leaves the doors open to all kinds of electoral frauds. I will give you an illustration of this instead of an argument, because I believe that one illustration is better than an hour's argument. I have in my mind an electoral riding in the Province of Ontario where 125 names on the voter's list were put upon the voter's list twice; on the same voter's list, 15 names were inserted three times, and on the very same list 50 voters put on as income voters had not been living in the riding, nor in the electoral district, nor in the county, for a year or more before the application to put them on the list was made, and yet every one of these irregularities were on the face of the voters' list when the election was held. Is it possible that hon. gentlemen on either side of the House can be satisfied with this mode of preparing the voters' lists: 125 names inserted twice on the one list, 15 names three times, and 50 voters who were not living in the district at all, many of them living in the United States, more of them living in the North-West Territories, and yet every name was inserted on the voters' list when polling day arrived. In the same riding, but in another polling sub-division, 119 names were added to the voters' list by the court of revision as I understand it, and yet when the electors came to the poll their votes only 12 of these 119 names were found on the list. In addition to that, upon that same voters' list and in the same polling sub-division there were 12 names inserted every one of whom was a minor. I have the names here, and they are as follows:—

"Jas. E. Oldershaw, aged 17; Fred. Northwood, 18 years old; Ed. Delahanty, 20; Philip Coate, aged 20; Geo. Northwood, 17; Morton Rolls, 16; Adam Redner, 18 years; Walter George, 16; John Snape, 20; John Symington, aged 18."

This shows you that the electors, the great mass of the people of this country, have no protection whatever for their franchise. They may have their names inserted upon the voters' list at the preliminary or final revision, but they have no guarantee whatever that these names shall appear upon the voters' list when they come to record their votes for or against one candidate or the other. Let me give you another illustration. In another constituency 150 names were stricken off the voters' list altogether. You would think that would be the end of it, Mr. Speaker. I suppose, for I am bound to suppose, that the Government honestly intended to carry out the law. One would naturally suppose, giving everybody credit for fair dealing and honesty, that the revising officer would act the same, but of the 150 names I refer to which were erased from the voters' list, every one of them was upon the voters' list when we came to record our votes. I do not know where the fraud arose. I am hardly prepared to say that it was a fraud, but it was an extraordinary circumstance that 150 names were struck off the voters' list in one riding, and that the revising officer so decided, and yet everyone of these names were upon the voters' list when we came to vote on polling day. I can point to the facts in my own county with absolute certainty and without fear of successful contradiction, and I can state that scores of names which were added to the list, both by declaration and at the preliminary and final revision, were not found upon the voters' list that was sent to Goderich and upon which we recorded our votes on the 5th of March last. Scores of names which were erased from the voters' list by the revising officer remained on the voters' list. Men dead for five years, men who all these years had been sleeping their last sleep and whose names were stricken off, suddenly appeared upon the voters' list. I do not know that there was a resurrection and that these dead men voted, but I do know that they were personated in more than one instance. Dead men voted through their proxies; the grandfather and the father were dead for five or six years, the grandson and the son living on the old homestead for ten years had no vote at all under this beautiful Franchise Act which was to correct all the errors and cure all the mistakes, and be perfect in every respect, as we were told by the First Minister and his colleagues when we were fighting this Bill for months on the floor of Parliament. I will give you another instance which came under my personal observation. In the town of Clinton, with a population of between 2,500 and 3,000, on the voters' list upon which the polling took place there were 119 names of persons who had been absent from the country—some of them absent for four or five years. Eighty of these men had sold their properties and severed their connection with the county altogether, forty-six of them had for years been living in the United States, seventeen of them were dead, and in addition to all this, over fifty good substantial voters were omitted from the list. In the town of Clinton, having a population of 2,500 or 3,000, with the dead men and the absentees on the list and with the good votes not on the list, the voters' list in that town alone was wrong by over 100 votes. The riding of West Huron contains seven municipalities, of which Clinton is the smallest, and assuming that the same mistakes arose in every other municipality, then the voters' list in the west riding of Huron was wrong by 700 votes. Had it not been for this I would have had a majority of 1,000 instead of 379 votes. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have about 210 constituencies in the Dominion of Canada, and if the voters' lists in the west riding of Huron were wrong by 700 votes, as I am satisfied they were wrong, then if you multiply 700 by 210 you will find that the voters' lists of the Dominion of Canada at the last general election were wrong by at least 150,000 votes; and this is the list that was to be perfect under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. I suppose I am bound to assume that these mistakes crept in there unintentionally, but it is a marvellous circumstance that they crept in just upon the occasion of a general election, and that the most of the mistakes were in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is marvellous, I say, that the mistakes should have crept in just then, and under these peculiar circumstances. That could not have happened under a good law, it could not have happened under the old Franchise Law, but it did happen under this law, which I believe to be the very worst Franchise Law we ever had in the Dominion of Canada or in any of its Provinces. The principle of the Bill is bad, the details are vicious in the extreme, the working of the Act is complicated, difficult and expensive, and altogether I am sure that there is not a man upon the other side of the House who will venture to declare on the floor of Parliament that this Bill has proved in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. But that is not all, Sir. There are other and perhaps stronger and more powerful arguments in favour of the repeal of this Bill. I recollect well, others with myself pointing out to the First Minister and to the First Minister's colleagues: you force this Bill through Parliament, and what will be the result? The result will be difficulties in getting the names upon the voters' lists, difficulties in getting names that ought not to be on the voters' list taken off the voters' lists, and, above all, it will entail upon the tax-payers an enormous annual public burden. And that is not all: it will entail upon the candidates and on both political parties an additional enormous expense at every revision. We were told that it would not be so; we were told that it would be a cheap franchise and one easily operated; our fears were belittled, and hon. gentlemen would not take a word of advice or warning. Who proved to be right and who proved to be wrong? According to the Auditor General's Reports—I do not know whether they are correct or not, but they are issued under the authority of the Government—I find that during the year ending on the 31st of June, 1888, $409,317 was expended under this Dominion Franchise Act by the Government alone; in a subsequent year $69,970 was expended, in 1889 $17,237, and in the last year $233,078; making an aggregate of $729,700 of expenditure by the Government as the direct result of this Act, which has given satisfaction to nobody, and has worried and harassed everybody who has had anything to do with it. I notice that the hon. Secretary of State says that the expenditure does not amount to so much; he puts it at $676,000. Well, let us take the lower figure; is not that an enormous sum to pay in such a way? And recollect, we have had only two revisions in six years. The Act is so vicious in principle and so bad in detail that the supporters of the Government persisted in suspending its operation for every year of the six except two years. The result of the suspension was that in the last election the votes in all the constituencies were recorded on ancient voters' lists two years old, the effect of which was to disqualify men who ought to have been enfranchised, and to leave enfranchised men who were not entitled to vote. But you must recollect that the sum which the Government pays is not the whole of the burden imposed on the people of this country by the Franchise Act. As examples, take my own riding and some others in the same neighbourhood. I know as a matter of fact that there was spent in cash in revising the voters' lists in West Huron $750 by the Liberal party alone, and I know that that sum was inadequate for a thorough and effective revision. I know constituencies in which double that sum, and others in which three times that sum was expended. Our Conservative friends in my riding declared that they spent a sum equal to what we did. That makes $1,500 which was expended in that one riding, over and above the expenditure which the Government charged against the tax-payers for the revision of the lists. And that is not all. The total cost of this Act is not the bare expenditure by the Dominion Government out of the tax-payers' money, not the bare expenditure by the parties in the counties out of their own pockets. For a week or two scores of men in each riding have to devote their attention to gathering information as to who should and who should not be on the list, and they have to incur expenditure in attending court, looking after preliminary and final revisions, and so on, which must come to a very large sum. But I am content to put the expenditure at $750 on each side, making $1,500 for each constituency. There are about 210 constituencies in the Dominion; and if you multiply $1,500 by 210 you will have a very nice sum of money, very nearly equal to what the Government pay for revising officers, printing, &c., out of the taxes of the people. The two revisions which have taken place cannot have cost the people of this country less than a million and a quarter of dollars; and I venture to say that if anyone took the trouble to ascertain the real facts of the case he would find my estimate to be below rather than above the mark. That is not all. We ran the last election on obsolete voters' lists two years old. We were handicapped in the race; we have often been handicapped; it has often been "tails I win, heads you lose:" the contest has generally been with loaded dice, the Government having everything in their hands. With an honest voters' list, fairly scrutinized and honestly printed, we should have nothing to say when we lose; but what we complain of is, that in the last two elections the voters' lists have been imperfect, especially in the last. But that is not all. Although this House is fresh from the people, elected upon a stale voters' list, the hon. Secretary of State tells us now that we must have another revision in 1891—for two years before the election no revision; two months after the election a revision, and $150,000 in the Estimates to cover part of the cost. Why, Sir, everybody will have to revise. We do not know, and the Government do not know how long they may live; they may be on the brink of a precipice now, I hope without any personal danger; there may be a new election after the census is taken and after a new distribution takes place, and we must all do as the hon. Secretary of State intimates we ought to do, revise the voters' lists. If we revise them this year the Government will have to pay, according to what the two last revisions cost, about $300,000, and the candidates in the various constituencies will have to pay at least an equal sum. Everybody may revise: I know that 70 at least will revise. I am quite sure the hon. First Minister, the hon. Minister of Justice, the hon. Minister of Public Works and the Minister of War will revise their voters' lists before the year expires. If only half the constituencies revise, the cost will be at least $300,000; if only 70 revise, the cost will be about $200,000. Without desiring to discuss this question at length, I ask hon. gentlemen honestly, is it not the fact that the Dominion Franchise Act has proved unsatisfactory to yourselves? Honestly, do you not find it difficult to work, complicated and expensive, and do you not find when polling day comes that, notwithstanding all you have done, there are an enormous number of mistakes in the voters' lists? The mistakes may be due to the mode of payment to the official in charge, of so much for so many hundred words, instead of in some way that would not offer any temptation to do wrong. Honestly, is it not time that this Franchise Act was repealed? I am not particular about, and I have paid very little attention to the details of this Bill. What I want is the announcement of a principle—the announcement that the Dominion Franchise Act is unsatisfactory and that we should replace it by another Act. If the Parliament declare that the Bill which was passed in 1885 is unsatisfactory, then it will be the duty of the Government to inaugurate or initiate a different and another Franchise Act. I suggest a different and another franchise. I say we ought to adopt the franchise which each Local Legislature has prescribed in each province. We could have had that, not at the cost to the people of this country of two revisions, or nearly $1,500,000, but free of cost. We can have a franchise, tried by the people among whom we live and who know more about it than we do, and we can have it without the expenditure of a farthing. There is not a member of this Parliament who has taken the trouble to revise the voters' lists on the two occasions when they were revised who will not agree with me that it would be far better to have a less complicated and expensive mode than we have now. I think we can, with all confidence, ask hon. gentlemen opposite to assist us in having this Act repealed. It is not a question of politics, although introduced by a Liberal. I have heard as pronounced Conservatives as I am a Liberal declare that of all the measures the Government had passed in the last twelve years, the Electoral Franchise Act was the most vicious in principle and the worst in detail, the most difficult to understand, and the most expensive to operate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has followed the course I anticipated he would follow, when proposing the repeal of the Franchise Act, by refraining from going at any great length into the arguments the House has heard many times before as to the merits of the Franchise Act. The discussions which have taken place with regard to that Act are, I fancy, familiar to almost every member of this House, notwithstanding so many new faces are present. In 1885 we had a most elaborate discussion on every principle involved in the measure; in 1886, when I had occasion to introduce some amendments, we had a very full discussion, not only of its principles but of the expediency of its repeal; in 1887, I think in 1888, and certainly last year, we had every argument exhausted and every argument renewed which this House had heard at such great length during the summer of 1885. The hon. gentleman, however, has called the attention of the House to some of the main objections which he and his political associates urged against the original passage of the Bill. I shall follow his example in touching upon some of those with great brevity, conscious of the force of the reasons which induced him to refrain from speaking at great length in renewing the objections he had to urge. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that notwithstanding the pains that were taken to secure a complete and effectual revision of the lists year by year, differences have occurred in different constituencies in the decisions of revising barristers; and the hon. gentleman has urged those differences as a ground for repealing an Act which accomplishes more in the direction of securing uniformity of decision—decisions according to law—than any Franchise Act in force to-day in any province. If the measure which is now sought to be repealed were cast aside, we should have to resort to a system which gives much less security for uniformity of decision, much less security for decisions according to law. If the hon. gentleman will cast his glance over the Franchise Acts of the other provinces he will find that in some of the provinces there are revisions by municipal authorities; in others there are revisions by municipal officers; in others the revisions are made by the sheriffs who are officers at pleasure of the Provincial Governments. There is no pretence of uniformity; there is no attempt to secure any kind of legal qualification in the officers who have to perform this duty of revision; whereas the Act now under consideration establishes a qualification for the office of revising barrister second to none required for any public office connected with the administration of any law, second only to that required for the filling of the highest judicial offices in the country. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that considerable expense has attended these revisions in the past. That is undoubted. Much as the expense has fallen below the predictions made in that regard on the other side, it is an undoubted fact that the two revisions which have taken place have been accompanied by considerable expense

The first revision involved really the construction of the election lists from the original elements, and was necessarily attended with expense which could not be expected to follow any subsequent revision; and in the second revision, as has been repeatedly explained to the House, the expense of printing was greatly increased in order to make provision for the permanent setting up of the lists as they were then prepared, so that any subsequent revision might take place, with far less cost, by using the standing forms. All this was charged against the second revision. We are making preparations for the third revision, with the full expectation that the expense will be largely decreased, that it will be reduced to the lowest cost at which any franchise lists can be prepared in this country. Let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the provisions of the Bill which the hon. gentleman asks us to read a second time. As explained to the House by the hon. member for West Huron, it is simply a Bill to repeal an Act which, he says, is inconvenient, cumbersome and inefficient; but the serious question that arises is, what is to take its place? The Bill would establish a set of franchises which, I undertake to say, no member of this House understands at the present moment. Even since the discussion which took place in 1885, the franchise of nearly every province of Canada has been changed, and the Bill now before us asks us to adopt the franchise of every one of these provinces as it exists, and makes, if the first section of the Bill is cast in the form in which it is to continue, that franchise, as it will exist at the passage of this measure, the franchise of the Dominion for all time to come. I presume that is hardly the hon. gentleman's intention. Indeed the language of section 4 would lead me to suppose that he would ask in Committee of the Whole to amend the first section so as to make the franchise in force in the different provinces from time to time the elective franchise for this House. But supposing that to be the case, the hon. gentleman seeks to establish a franchise with respect to this country which, as I understand, would require a most careful study of the Franchise Acts of all the provinces, and with regard to which the hon. gentleman has not offered to this House this evening one word of explanation. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that, while the hon. gentleman sees such great disadvantage in a want of uniformity, sees such cause for alarm in the fact that mistakes are made and contradictory decisions are given with respect to the rights of voters to be placed upon the list, the hon. gentleman will, under this Bill, have no two provinces uniform, and have no two members of the House from different provinces sitting under the same franchise, and that while in some of the provinces the scope of the present Dominion Franchise Act would be greatly widened, in other provinces the franchise would be greatly restricted. Let me call his attention to a fact, which perhaps he has not duly considered, and which forms one of the strongest arguments in favour of having a franchise for ourselves, namely, that in at least two of the provinces, for some years past in one of them, to serve Her Majesty in any office under the Dominion Government, or at all events in most of the offices, is considered so great an offence as to deprive the person who holds it of the franchise. As a citizen coming from a distant province in which that disqualification exists, I protest against the disfranchisement of hundreds of my fellow citizens, who are just as competent to consider, discuss and vote on public affairs as I am, and have no other disqualification for exercising that franchise than that they serve the Dominion of Canada as public officers, and many of them serve in positions which have a reward so small that it is absurd to suppose the judgment which they exercise on public affairs would be controlled by the paltry emoluments they receive. Without following the hon. gentleman through all the arguments he has advanced, and which he has hinted at, and which, as I have said before, have been discussed at almost every session of Parliament since the Franchise Act was adopted, let me call attention to the insinuating method in which the hon. gentleman appeals to this side of the House to support his Bill. With a frankness, which would be charming if it were not altogether too specious, the hon. gentleman desired us to say whether we like the Act or not, whether it is entirely satisfactory and in harmony with our opinions or not, and above all with open arms the hon. gentleman appealed to us and asked us for our own sake, not for his sake, not for the interests of a down-trodden Opposition which he says this Act was intended to extinguish, but in our own interest, to come to his support and assist in repealing the Act. The hon. gentleman made a further appeal, which was equally bland and touching, to members of the Government, and he reminded us that to-night we may be standing on the brink of a precipice; that we know not how long we have to live, and we may have very soon to face the people again. As I said before, this would be a very charming appeal indeed, if we did not think that behind all this courtesy and blandishment there is a hidden purpose, which I really think I see in the Bill the hon. gentleman has presented for our consideration to-night. The hon. gentleman, I fancy, entertains, as most of his party do, advanced views as to the effect which should follow an extensive change in the franchise. The hon. gentleman, feeling with respect to the appeal which has lately taken place to the people as much dissatisfaction as he claims many members on this side of the House feel in regard to the Act which he wants repealed, considers it is a great opportunity to make a complete and fundamental change in the electoral franchise of the country. Then he and his friends, as great constitutional authorities, would say: "We have entirely changed the franchise of this country; although fresh from the people, within three months of the time we received our right to sit in this House, we have declared that the franchise under which we came here was a wrong franchise—too narrow in some provinces and too wide in others." Having entirely changed the electoral franchise, as the hon. gentleman by his Bill would do, and provided another, we should hear the cry raised, which hon. gentlemen opposite have raised on far less occasions than this, that we ought to go to the country at once, that our own action in repealing the franchise law had declared that the basis on which the representation of the country had been made ought to be changed as a wrong basis, that we had substituted another, and that we had asserted by law the right of hundreds of people in this country—the hon. gentleman would say this in respect to his own province where the provincial franchise has been extended—to vote, and they should be at once admitted to the exercise of the privilege of assisting to return members of Parliament. I do not think that even if the hon. gentleman were right in his appeal to this side of the House, and that the Franchise Act is capable of improvement, we are willing to go to the length which the Bill proposes; that within, as I have said, three months of the time we acquired the right to sit here we should adopt as one of our first acts a measure to repudiate the right of the people who sent us here, and to afford the right to others who did not participate in that franchise and to deny that franchise to others who did participate in it. Holding these views, and without detaining the House by entering into arguments which the House has heard night after night, and divided on night after night, I move:

That this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If we were to judge of the hon. gentleman's position by the speech he has just delivered to the House we would conclude that he would rather see the Bill proposed by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) become the law than see his own motion prevail. Certainly I never heard any speech in this House delivered by the hon. gentleman in which he manifested less energy and earnestness in the support of a proposition which he placed before the House than in the speech in which he supported his present proposition. This is a very important subject. The electoral franchise lies at the basis of representative government in this country, and the chief reason advanced by the First Minister in favour of the Bill which my hon. friend proposes to repeal was the desire to secure uniformity in the qualification of the voters in the various provinces of the Dominion. Whether the principle of uniformity, of which the First Minister was five or six years ago so zealous an advocate, is the proper principle to adopt or not, depends in part, but not wholly, upon whether there is uniformity in conditions, employment and circumstances of the population of the various provinces. Some of the provinces are old, some are very recently colonized. In some of these provinces society has become complex, as it is in old communities. In other provinces some of the people are devoted to agriculture, some are devoted largely to manufacturing industries, and some are devoted to maritime pursuits. Surely where there are such a variety of circumstances, those who are in the immediate vicinity of each class of the population are the best judges of the qualification of those who ought to be entrusted with the electoral franchise. The Minister of Justice has laid very great stress upon the fact that we are not at the present time acquainted with the qualification of voters under the Franchise Acts of the various provinces. Sir, I do not trouble my mind with that subject; I have confidence in the common sense, in the fitness, of the people of the country for self-government. All our institutions are based upon that assumption. We have, under our constitution, representative institutions in the provinces as well as here, and if we were to suppose, as the hon. gentleman assumes, that we can trust nobody in the provinces, that we must look in every instance ourselves into the matter before we can be sure that we will be standing upon safe ground, then the hon. gentleman should begin by undertaking to reform the constitution, he should not entrust with the franchise those that he is afraid to trust with the powers they possess under the provincial constitution in the different provinces. Let us look at what has been done by our neighbours. In the constitution of the United States it is expressly provided that the qualification of the electors for the election of members to the most popular branch of the State Legislature shall be the qualification for the election of members for the House of Representatives in Congress. Now, Sir, that provision of their constitution has been in operation for 104 years. None of the difficulties which the hon. gentleman apprehends from the passage of the Bill proposed by my hon. friend for second reading now, have arisen there. Are the people of this country, are the inhabitants of these provinces less qualified to be trusted, less qualified to exercise the rights of self-government, than the people are in the various States of the American Union? Sir, I need not go into an elaborate defence of the population of the provinces. Why, those who return us here are the same people who return members to the Local Legislatures. They are qualified to elect those members as they are qualified to elect us. They are as likely to exercise a sound judgment in one case as they are in the other. Our charge against the Bill is not solely, as the hon. gentleman assumes, that it gives us a different class of electors, that it produces entirely different results. Our charge is against the expensiveness of the system; our charge is against the inconvenience of the system, it is against the imperfection of the machinery employed to create the voters' lists. That machinery, in the necessity of things, exists under the local constitutions, and it does not exist under ours. The hon. gentleman overlooked that fact. He says that we want the change for party purposes, in order that we may have some advantage over the Administration, and over the hon. gentlemen who support the Administration. Why, Sir, have we asked by this measure that the preparation of the voters' lists shall be placed in our hands, that they shall be put under the control of our party? The First Minister bows assent to that proposition. Well, I dissent from it. I say the preparation of the local voters' lists is not in the hands of the Local Governments, the preparation of the local voters' lists is in the hands of the representatives, or the supporters of the Government in the Local Legislature. It is in the hands of the people themselves, it is in the hands of the community of each locality, of each local community in every municipality throughout the Province of Ontario, at least, and largely so, I believe, in some of the other provinces. Well, Sir, the preparation of that list is as much in the hands of the supporters of the hon. gentleman as it is in the hands of the supporters of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. We stand upon a footing of perfect equality in that matter. We have no advantage over him whatever. We are seeking no advantage. What we are asking for is simple justice; we are asking that the people may be trusted with the care and protection of their own interests. We say that our whole system of Government is based upon the assumption that our people are fit for self-government, that they are competent to govern themselves, and we want no manipulation of the constituencies, no manipulation of the voters' lists, no manipulation of the officers by whom those lists are to be prepared. We ask simply that the preparation of those lists shall be left in the hands of the authorities in the various localities, who are most competent to deal with the subject, who know the people, who know those who ought to go upon the list. Both parties are there present, and they can see that every member of the party, without expense to any candidate, or any aspirant to become a candidate, shall be put upon the voters' lists as they have been. Why, the Minister of Justice speaks as if this were a new and untried experiment in this country, and that some terrible unforeseen evil might befall us if we were to repeal the measure put upon the Statute-book by supporting the Bill proposed by my hon. friend from Huron. What are the facts? We had this measure upon the Statute-book for seventeen years. Did any one complain? Did any hon. gentleman opposite say that a wrong had been done him by the character of the voters' lists? Were there any complaints that these voters' lists were interfered with, or that names were improperly put on, or names improperly left off? In this House we usually legislate for the purpose of promoting some practical improvement, or for the correction of some evil, or mischief, or abuse, that experience has shown to exist. Was this measure which my hon. friend proposes to repeal, put upon the Statute-book in consequence of any practical mischief that had flown from the trial of that experiment which has lasted over a hundred years on the other side of our boundary, and which was tried for upwards of seventeen years on this side? Not at all. Everyone who has sat in this Parliament, everyone who has had any experience in the conduct of elections when obtaining a seat in this House, knows that the lists were prepared with perfect fairness, because they were in the hands of the electors themselves. They were not dominated by one party or another, and the result was that the House, apart from any manipulation of the boundaries of the constituencies, was likely to be a fair expression of public opinion. Sir, I think that the preparation of the voters' lists by the people themselves, is the proper thing. What is the practice in England? The lists are prepared there by the parish officers. The revising officer is not the party who prepares the list, as he is with us. The party called the revising officer here is a misnamed party. He is not simply the revising officer, but he prepares the lists as well as revises them. And who revises the lists in the United Kingdom? A revising barrister, appointed by the judge upon the circuit. The Government do not interfere, the Government do not undertake to assume control of the preparation of the voters' lists, and take them out of the hands of the electors. The Government do not appoint an officer to see to the printing of those lists: the Government do not put the printing of the lists in the hands of the same department, where the lists are, from carelessness or from some other cause, manipulated, and a large number of the voters left off. I say there is nothing of that sort in England, but there is that sort of thing here. Why, I could refer to a constituency represented by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) where hundreds of names that were put on the list when it was revised were left off when it was printed in the office here, and where hundreds of names that were struck off the lists—and the judge himself affirms that he struck them off the list—were found upon the list when the elections came to be held. Now, I say that shows the impropriety of undertaking to centralize the preparation of printing the voters' lists here. It is perfectly consistent with the Act: it is perfectly consistent with the plan of the Act, but it is wholly inconsistent with the rights of the electors, and with a fair and honest election. The hon. Minister has told us that if we were to carry this Bill we must necessarily go the country again. Well, why go to the country? Will he go to the country after revision? The last election was upon lists which will differ as widely from a new list as from the local lists. Our statement is not that there should be a large number on the list in the one case or off them in the other. That is not the statement upon which we are asking for the change; that is simply one phase of it. What we are saying is this: that there are a large number of people with whom the returning officer must be unacquainted, and who could not be put on the list, that there would be no special supervision, that there must be unnecessary expense, as is the case at the present time, in order to perfect the lists. The reeve, councillors and assessors, who go to every house for the purpose of making assessments, become acquainted with those who are entitled to go on the list and with those who are not so entitled, and he must be a party personally acquainted with those who are entitled to become voters, to be qualified to prepare the voters' list in the first instance. What have we now? We have a returning officer who is placed in charge of a population of 30,000 people, not 500 of whom he knows, and so unless some person assists him, and practically does the work, the work is not likely to be done. Indeed, unless we are on the eve of an election, the work in nine cases out of ten is not likely to be done on account of the expense. It is of the first consequence that this change should be made, that a perfectly fair and just measure should be adopted, that a list upon which members may be elected to the Local Legislature should be adopted as the list upon which members should be returned to this House. The hon. Minister will not pretend to say that the Legislative Assembly of Ontario is a very incompetent body, or that it is elected by men who are not entitled to the electoral franchise. The franchise in Ontario has been extended; but by whose support and at whose instance? Was it by the Government alone? and was it opposed by those who opposed the Government? Not at all. The measure was as warmly supported by political friends of the First Minister as it was supported by friends of the Prime Minister of Ontario. What, then, has the First Minister to fear? Nothing except this, that the undue advantage which the appointment of the returning officer and the control of the lists give him under the law would be lost; but I think that the friends who sit around him would be well pleased to share that loss and to take the chance of equality in order to get rid of the expense which is a necessary incident to the supervision of the voters' lists. I need not say anything further with respect to this question. The Minister of Justice says it is well understood in this country. Yes, thanks to the Opposition of 1885 this measure is well understood in this country. On that occasion, at least, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this House did their duty. They made the public thoroughly conversant with the features of this measure and with the principles upon which it was based, and it speaks well for the general intelligence of the people that they read with attention and care and thoroughly appreciated and understood the character of the measure which my hon. friend proposes to repeal. I have no doubt of this, that the First Minister does not like to place a measure on the Statute-book and afterwards admit he made a mistake. He is advancing in years, and it would be a handsome act on his part on this occasion, and it would not in any way be derogatory to his dignity or his influence in this House, if he were to admit that he made a mistake, and now assist us in repealing the measure and in righting the wrong that he committed in 1885. I am perfectly sure that the friends of the hon. gentleman who sit behind him if he made that announcement would cheer him much more heartily than they cheered the speech of his colleague the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). In addressing the House for the first time I must beg the indulgence of my colleagues while I offer a few remarks. Although a new member of the House, the question under debate is not new to me. When it was first brought under discussion in Parliament I had the honour of occupying a seat in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, and from that distant point I followed with interest the very important proceedings of this House. I read from day to day the reports of the speeches pro and con on the measure submitted for the consideration of hon. members. I thus ascertained the objections of the Opposition to the Bill and the reasons advanced in support of the measure. I remember very well that the first outcry raised in the House was that the Government in proposing such a measure were striking at the provincial autonomy of the provinces. I remember also that it was prophesied at the time that the working of the measure would involve a very large expenditure, and hon. gentlemen sitting on the left of Mr. Speaker, who are always so cautious on the question of public expenditure, were rather afraid of the consequences. In the Legislature of Quebec the Federal Government was attacked for seeking to establish a federal franchise at great expense, and I very well remember that there I heard the strongest denunciations of the Federal Government for trampling under foot the provincial rights. I am free to declare here to-night that at the time I was not carried away nor frightened by this discussion, and that I mustered sufficient courage to take my stand in the Local Legislature of Quebec in favour of the Dominion Franchise Act. Since that time, on several occasions, before many public meetings in the Province of Quebec, I have been called upon to express my opinion on this part of the policy of the Dominion Government, and the stand I adopted in the Local Legislature I took, as it was my duty to do, before those public meetings. To-night we have to decide whether the law is to be repealed or maintained. We have heard two of the hon. gentlemen opposite, leaders of the Opposition, again repeating, although in somewhat briefer form, their objections to the measure. We have heard no new arguments from them whatever; it is a revised edition of what has been said in the House for several years past, not augmented but much decreased. There were two points raised by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) employed all his effort to prove that the Bill is an outrageous one, because of the errors committed in the preparation of the lists, and the other hon. gentleman pointed to the question of expenditure. In the few remarks which I intend to make, with all due respect to the two hon. gentlemen opposite, I will try to look at the question from a little higher standpoint. So far in the debate I have not heard a repetition of the argument which was formerly used that the Bill was a violation of the federal principle of the constitution. I have not heard it repeated to-night that it was a violation of provincial rights. On this subject I will repeat in a few words what I said in the Legislature of Quebec. When the sovereign authority of the Crown, with the sanction of the Imperial Parliament, gave us this constitution which has been now working so well for the last 25 years, it was based on the federal principle it is true, but if we want this constitution to work well, and to produce all the good results we have reason to expect from it, we must never forget that if there is such a thing as provincial autonomy there is also such a thing as federal autonomy. I said in the Local Legislature that it was most absurd to pretend that when the Federal Parliament in the due exercise of its constitutional rights decides upon the question that hereafter there should be a Franchise Bill for the Dominion of Canada, and I repeat now,—it is most absurd to pretend that there is in this a violation of provincial rights. If a measure had been brought forward in this House to declare what would be the provincial franchise for the provincial elections, well and good, then there would have been a violation of provincial rights. If a measure had been brought into the Local Legislature of Quebec to provide for a federal franchise, then there would have been a violation of federal rights and federal autonomy, but so long as the Federal Parliament and the Provincial Legislature remain prudently and wisely within the limits of their jurisdiction, where is the violation of rights on one side or the other? I cannot see any. Perhaps I have to regret that I have not the keen intellect of hon. gentlemen opposite, for if I were so endowed I might see more clearly into the matter. I take the question from its very root, when I say that the right of the Federal Parliament to provide for the Dominion franchise is undeniable. This right was inserted in the British North America Act by the legislative power which alone in the world had the right to insert it, that is, the Imperial Parliament. I call the attention of the House to the fact that when the Imperial Parliament had to legislate to give a new constitution to the Dominion of Canada, it would have been absurd and completely nonsensical not to give to this Parliament the right to declare what would be the franchise of the electors to select the members of this House. If the Imperial Parliament had not given this House control of its franchise, it would have been creating a body without a soul. If the principle announced by the opponents of the franchise law were to be carried into application, we would require an amendment to the constitution under the British North America Act to declare that the right of legislating upon the Dominion franchise would be hereafter vested in the Provincial Legislature: that is the only way out of the difficulty, and for my part, although I claim to be just as good a partisan of provincial autonomy as any member on your left, Mr. Speaker, I state here that I would be opposed, with all my strength, to such a proposition. I do not think I can say any more with regard to the principle of the Bill itself. At all events the question has been decided by our predecessors in this House, and it is now the law of the land for several years. Let me briefly review the objections of the opponents of this Bill. I am just as anxious as any member of this House that the affairs of our country should be administered with the greatest possible economy, but we must admit that if we want to carry on our free institutions, the people of Canada must contribute to their support. With regard to the expenditure for operating this Act, I do not intend to go fully into this part of the question to-night. I know it is a very important question, but I have no doubt that the Government is anxious to see that the expenditure for the working of the Act will be brought down to the lowest figure possible. But there must be no exaggeration one way or the other. Now, a few remarks on this question of expenditure. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) proposes to return to the old system of the provincial franchises. Suppose we do, what would be the consequences? We should have as Dominion electors all those who should be declared so by the provincial laws. But I do not know of any provincial law that provides for the printing of the lists: and perhaps on that subject I may have a few suggestions to make, because I have taken a deep interest in the preparation of the lists, especially in one county of the Province of Quebec, and I have acquired some knowledge of the working of the Act. I could understand hon. gentlemen opposite saying: As the expenditure is large, we will dispense with the printing of the lists; because, if you return to the provincial lists, you will have to do what was formerly done, that is, you will either have no printed lists, or the candidates or their friends will have to get them printed at their own expense. Now, I have ascertained from the blue-book and by information from printers, that, on the average, the printing of a list in a county of say 4,000 electors will cost from $250 to $300.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DESJARDINS (L'Islet). That is true; I know enough about printing matters to say that: and if you do not get the lists printed you have to copy them, and the expense has to be paid by some one. I will not raise the question whether after all it is better to have the printing of the lists done by the Government; that is only one part of the argument; but hon gentlemen opposite have altogether overlooked this point. Now, the hon. mover of this Bill, in asking the House to vote to repeal the existing law, claims that he represents the wishes of the people. We know by past experience that hon. gentlemen opposite are always very anxious, though they are the minority, to claim that they represent the majority of the people. But after all, Mr. Speaker, the Franchise Act was carried in this House some years ago by a large majority It was debated here for weeks and weeks: you had then, I believe, a six months session; since then the question has been debated on the hustings of the Dominion, from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island; all the eloquence of hon. gentlemen opposite, all their intelligence, and I suppose I must add, all their sincerity and patriotism, were devoted to the task of convincing the people that this was a most outrageous law; and what was the outcome of it all? That in two successive general elections a large majority of the people of Canada have declared that they still had confidence in the Dominion Government by electing a majority to support them in this House. Whatever may be the pretensions of hon. gentlemen opposite, there is one thing that is undeniable—and I suppose I can claim the unanimous assent of this House to it—that whatever the popular opinion may be, the constitutional majority in this House govern in the name of the people; and when there is here a majority just fresh from a general contest to declare in the name of the people of Canada that the people approve of this legislation, I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite have the right to claim that in this case—and this case only—they represent the real public opinion of the country. Now, I must add this: I took the liberty a moment ago to inform this House that in the Legislature of Quebec I approved of the principle of this Franchise Act, and opposed the contention of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in that House that it was a violation of provincial rights. But if at that time I had been able to foresee what was to happen in the Province of Quebec at a later period, I would have been a still stronger opponent of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. I could not foresee in 1885 or 1886 that in 1889 such an outrageous and illiberal measure as the one carried in that Legislature, depriving a large number of citizens of the Province of Quebec of the right to vote, could be passed in any Legislature of the Dominion. Such a measure, Mr. Speaker, was proposed there; our friends in the Local House fought it to the last; we did all we could to prevent it becoming law; we tried to show—and I think we succeeded in showing—that the Bill was really outrageous, that it was trampling under foot the rights and the liberties of the people of that Province by depriving of the right of voting at provincial elections hundreds and perhaps thousands of those who might be considered amongst the most intelligent, well educated and patriotic electors of the Dominion. We did all we could; we prolonged the session several days, I admit, in fighting the Bill; and we had the satisfaction and pleasure, in being beaten, of seeing five of the supporters of the Quebec Government voting with us against that most arbitrary measure. Still, it was carried, and fresh from the struggle we had down there, as I am, hon. gentlemen opposite need not ask me to consent to return to the provincial lists of the Province of Quebec under such a law as we have there. With regard to the difficulties of working the Act, there may be some. It would have been a most marvellous piece of legislation if it could have been put into operation from British Columbia down to Prince Edward Island without any difficulties being encountered. Still, because a law meets with difficulties in its working, and all human and even Divine laws meet with such difficulties, that is no reason why we are to deny the principle of the law if it is good. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) raises the objection against the Act, that it is not in the hands of the people. He contends that provincial laws confide to the people the preparation of the lists, whilst it is not so with regard to the federal law. What are the facts as they stand? I am more acquainted with the provincial franchise law of Quebec than with the electoral laws of the other provinces; and in Quebec I know the law provides that the lists shall be prepared by the municipal council, whereas the Dominion Act provides for their preparation by the revising officers. As regards the right of the people to see to the preparation of the lists, I have not perceived much difference between the two systems. If you want, Sir, to be placed on the provincial list, you have to apply to the municipal council and prove your title; and if you want to be placed on the Dominion list you have to establish your right before the revising officer. There is, however, this difference: Observing, as I have done for several years, the working of the provincial law in Quebec, the conviction was gradually forced on my mind that there the system had the effect of introducing party warfare into our municipal institutions. I have seen party-spirit run very high in those institutions. I have seen municipal affairs conducted solely in the interests of party; I have seen that in the preparation of the lists before some of the municipal councils there was not the slightest possibility of justice being done. All this I have seen. With regard to the question of impartiality, I must say, from my experience of the working of the Dominion Act, the revising officers, who act as judges and are responsible, have done their duty honestly, impartially, and patriotically, and with a due sense of their responsibility to the people. I do not intend to detain the House longer. As I said a moment ago, I want to judge the question on its real principle; and I was glad to hear the mover of the Bill say, in concluding his remarks, that he wished the law to be discussed upon its principle. Referring to the principle of the Act itself, I have no hesitation in taking my stand on this ground, that under free institutions the franchise is the very life of Parliament. If that foundation is rendered solid and strong by means of a wide-spread system of education, by means of a well cultivated sense of public responsibility, then the safer and the firmer is the whole structure of institutions depending upon it. Now, the Parliament of Canada is a great representative institution. Whatever may be our differences of opinion, whatever may be our shortcomings, for nothing in this world is perfect, I am sure I voice the whole sentiment of the House when I say that the people of Canada have reason to be proud of their Parliament. In saying this, I am only paying a well deserved compliment to the people of Canada, because this body politic being of their own constitutional creation, they can look pleasantly upon their offspring. But, Sir, the Parliament of Canada, to fulfil its duty, to accomplish its mission, must constantly feel the pulse of an enlightened, sober, mature and active public opinion; and to animate and revive the body politic, the pulse itself must find its existence in the leading principle of our free institutions, which is the franchise. I venture to assert, whatever may be said to the contrary, that since the Act under discussion has been law, since this House has exercised its right to legislate for the franchise of the people, the union of the Parliament of Canada and the people has been brought closer. Now that we have been for the last twenty-five years witnessing with proud satisfaction the cementing of this grand union of the Provinces, now that we have been witnessing the increasing prestige of the Parliament of Canada, I consider it is our bounden duty to maintain this law because it provides that the very life of this Parliament—the very life of this intelligent, devoted and patriotic body—shall be drawn from its natural source and principle, the will of the nation expressed through the instrumentality of the franchise as determined by this Parliament under its constitutional responsibility to the people. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that I will fulfil a great public duty in voting against the Bill of the hon. member for West Huron, because I firmly believe that, at this stage of our national existence, more than ever, we must rise superior to all party prejudices and narrow arguments, and join heartily in the patriotic desire to strengthen as much as possible by all legitimate means the free institutions of which we are so proud.

Mr. AMYOT. I have heard with a great deal of pleasure the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) trying to attach this question to a great principle. I have heard him with surprise, however, trying before this tribunal the Government of the Province of Quebec. I would ask the hon. gentleman under whose authority and in whose name he rises here to speak against the Government of Quebec? Was he elected as a member of the Province of Quebec at the last election? No; he was defeated because he wished to oppose the good laws of that province. I say that he has no authority to make here the trial of that Government. I hope that system of trying here the Government of the divers provinces will soon be given up. At all events, I deny to the hon. member any authority whatsoever to come here and discuss these questions. The franchise, the qualification to vote and the exercise of the same, are two things which the hon. member who spoke before me wants to join together. This Government, he says, has done right to say who shall be qualified to vote for the members of the Federal Parliament. Some contend that such is the case and others contend that, in a confederate system, every state in the union should have the power to decide who should represent the state in the general federation. In the United States, I think in Switzerland too, and generally it is admitted by all the authors who have written on the confederate system, that each state in the confederation should decide by whom it would be represented in the general Government. But let us admit for a moment that this principle is not the right one, but that the central Government should say who should vote for the representation in the general Parliament. There remains the application of the machinery, and the application of the franchise. Where is the good reason why we should take away from the municipal authorities the power of making the lists? Where is the reason why it is necessary to appoint one officer for a county to decide about the right to vote of hundreds or even thousands of voters whom he has never seen in his life? Let this Parliament decide that there must be so much income to qualify a voter, that he must be of such an age, that he must have resided in the locality for such a time. But where is the reason that these matters should be decided very often by an unknown party, and at all events by a person directly paid by the party in power and whose appointment is not always in the public interest? I defy any one to say that our municipal authorities in this country are corrupt.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. Are there some dogs in that party who yelp? Is there a man in this House who will state that the municipal authorities of this country are not capable of knowing those who live alongside them? In the County of L'Islet, who is making the lists? A lawyer residing in Quebec, nearly 100 miles from that county. Whom does he know in that county? If the hon. member who represents that county has one of a majority it may be due to the omission of the names of those who would be on the list if the municipal authorities were making them as they should have the power of doing. We complain that the lists are not made by the parties who should make them. We complain that this system costs a great deal of money to the state and a great deal of money to the various counties, and is unnecessarily costly to the candidates. If you choose to have the franchise settled by this Parliament, at all events let it be applied by the local authorities. In the Province of Quebec the municipal system operates perfectly in this respect. My hon. friend says he has seen some unfairness and some injustice in connection with it. So long as humanity exists, there will be some unfairness somewhere, but I prefer the lists which are made by responsible members of local councils, who may be changed every year, lists which are made every year without costing one cent, to lists which are made every three or four years by paid officers of a Government or a party. I have heard the statement of some hon. gentlemen that they would not take the electoral franchise of the Province of Quebec because some employés of the Federal Government have been denied their right of voting. The Province of Quebec has seen fit to say that the employés of the Intercolonial Railway, whose number increases during an election and who are paid by the country, and who are moved from county to county as the Government may desire, that those paid electors, selected by the paid agent of the Government and transported unduly on the public railways of the country, are no longer able to express a free and impartial opinion, and it has taken away their right to vote, as I think justly. Examples have been given of the unfairness of revising officers in the preparation of the list. In one parish in the County of Bellechasse which I represent—the Parish of Beaumont—and it is a small parish, in the federal lists there are about forty names missing which are to be found on the local list. In one parish I was deprived of forty votes of my friends. We were told not to revise the list last year because there would be a revision in 1891, as well as a census and a redistribution of seats. In Bellechasse I was deprived of about four hundred votes, owing to the bad preparation of the voters' lists then in force. Now, if there is a revision, everyone of us will have to go to his county and do nearly the same work as at elections, in order to remedy the fact that the revising officers will not know the parties they will have to deal with, will not know those who will be dead, and who will be replaced by this and that proprietor. Admit or deny the principle that this or any other Government has the right to say who shall vote and how shall be constituted the House of Representatives. Decide as you like on that; but at all events make the provision practicable. Give it to the municipal authorities who are presumed to be honest and who know what they are about. We understand that it would be hard for the governing party to dispense with a lot of officials who think themselves in duty bound to work for those who have appointed them for life. We understand that, and that is the underlying reason why the Government and their supporters cling so tenaciously to the Franchise Act. For my part I would be in favour of any Franchise Act which would be sincerely, honestly and fairly applied, but it will never be sincerely, honestly and fairly applied so long as it is controlled by an officer not a resident of the county, who very often resides far from the county, who is responsible to nobody, and who receives his pay directly from the power that has appointed him.

Mr. DALY. I would not trouble the House to-night upon this question were it not that we have had a Franchise Act passed in the Province of Manitoba lately by the Legislature of that province, a Legislature composed principally of gentlemen of the same political persuasion as hon. gentlemen opposite, and having at the head of its Government a gentleman whom the mover of this Bill is no doubt very well acquainted with, the Hon. Mr. Greenway. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), who has this Bill in charge, will remember the name of Mr. Greenway, and he will recollect that in days gone by Mr. Greenway was his opponent, and he will recollect that he was left at home, and Mr. Greenway sent down here to represent his constituency. It is true that Mr. Greenway was not sent here by the majority of the electors of that constituency, but he came here by the leave of the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this Bill. This Mr. Greenway went to Manitoba, where he has since become premier of that province. He leads a Reform Government there, he leads a Government which hon. gentlemen opposite delight to honour, he leads a Government of which the Hon. Mr. Martin is Attorney-General, a gentleman who opposed me during the late election; and this gentleman, I believe, on different platforms during the Dominion election that took place in our province some years ago, had as much to say against the Dominion Franchise Act as the hon. gentlemen have to say to-night, and as they have said in previous debates. But a change has come over the dream of the Greenway Government in the Province of Manitoba, and they have introduced a Franchise Act there, which exceeds in enormity, I may say—using the terms of the hon. gentleman opposite respecting the Dominion Franchise Act—exceeds in enormity the Act which was passed by the right hon. gentleman and his Government in 1885. Why, Sir, I have no doubt but that when the hon. member for Huron, with very sweet simplicity and charming nonchalance gave his views to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House respecting the repeal of the Franchise Act, he did not tell those hon. gentlemen who support him that this Greenway Reform Government in the Province of Manitoba, have sought to exceed this great iniquity committed by the Government of the right hon. Premier. Why, Sir, we find that they introduced into the Manitoba Legislature, during its last session, a Franchise Bill, and the hon. gentleman would require by his Bill that myself and other representatives from the Province of Manitoba should be elected under the electoral franchise law now in force in that province, and, Sir, so strong was the feeling of the Reformers of Manitoba against that Bill, so enormous was its provisions, that we find that even the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper that will be acknowledged at all events, by the one Liberal representative in this House from west of Lake Superior, to be a truly Liberal paper, a paper that has opposed the Franchise Act——

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. DALY,—a paper that has made the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Watson), what he is to-day, a paper that is attacking to-day the Franchise Act which has been attacked by the hon. gentleman opposite to-night, and a paper which says that it hopes the hon. gentleman's Bill will be passed. We find this paper saying that an Act has been passed by the Greenway Government of Manitoba, exceeding in iniquity the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885. Why, Sir, we find in the issue of that paper of 11th May, the following:—

"We have in Manitoba what is called a 'Liberal' Government backed up by a 'Liberal' Legislature. The Ministers, Mr. Greenway, Mr. Smart, Mr. McLean and Mr. McMillan, with the Siftons and Youngs and Mickles of their following in the House, have been heard to denounce the Dominion Franchise Act: they probably think they could not pose as Liberals if they did not. But for their own advantage they carried through a Local Election Act last session which contains all the iniquitous features of the Dominion Act, and more, too. What do the honest Liberals of Manitoba think of that? This Local Election Bill provides for the appointment of partisan officers to compile the list, as in the Dominion Act: it provides for the appointment of partisan lawyers as revising officers, as in the Dominion Act. The registration clerks are expected, as they are given power, to stuff the lists, and the partisan courts of revision are expected to interfere with the stuffing as little as possible. Names will be left off that cannot be got on without great trouble and expense, and improper names will be put on that it will often be impossible to get off. This is the very burden of the complaint which Liberals throughout the Dominion have had to make against the Ottawa law. But our 'Liberal' Government went further than this. It attempted to prevent any revision at all. As originally introduced the Bill provided that, by a trick of the registration clerks, notice of appeal could be delayed until a revision was practically impossible. The Dominion Act, with all its injustice, never contemplated going that far. This cowardly and infamous attempt to muzzle opponents was frustrated by the Opposition who exposed it and forced an amendment."

And I may say to you, Sir, and the members of this House, that the Opposition is led in the Legisture of Manitoba to-day by as good a Liberal as sits upon the other side of this House. Although Mr. Roblin was elected two short years ago to support the Greenway Government, yet the actions of that Government were so outrageous, its dishonesty and its corruption was so great, that that gentleman did not wish to support that Government any longer, and he is the gentleman who has seen fit to raise an objection to this Act which the Free Press says exceeds in its enormity the Dominion Franchise Act. And we find that in order to have certain changes in that Act he had a debate precipitated which lasted all night, the only all night session which has taken place in the Province of Manitoba for years. So you see how great was the pressure brought to bear upon the Opposition, only eleven in number, who tried to get certain amendments to this Act. Now, the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this Bill, the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of it, the philosopher from Bothwell, and other hon. gentlemen who support this Bill, have seen fit to attack the provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act. Now, Sir, the one statement that has been repeated from one end of Canada to the other—and I have heard it in this House during the discussion of this Bill—is that we should have "one man, one vote." "One man, one vote," was the cry of the Reform Government in the Province of Manitoba, and we will see how they put it into practice. We find that, according to their Act, the qualification is that an elector shall be of the male sex, twenty-one years of age, and a British subject by birth or naturalization, who "Is at the date of the issue of the proclamation appointing the registration clerk, and has been for one month immediately prior to said date, a resident of and domiciled within the said electoral division, and has been for six months immediately prior to said date, a resident of and domiciled within the province."

That might be very well, but there are exceptions, and the following parties are disqualified, namely:

"All officials and employés of the Dominion and Local Governments, in receipt of a salary to the amount of three hundred and fifty dollars."

Now, just fancy any person attempting to justify a Government, to justify a party, who will say that we have an Electoral Franchise Act which gives one man one vote, and yet declares by its provisions that a man who is in receipt of $350, and being a Government official, shall not be entitled to exercise his franchise. Any man from England, Ireland or Scotland, who has been in the country seven months prior to the issue of the proclamation may have a vote, and yet a man who has resided in Manitoba for ten, twelve or fifteen years will be disfranchised, because he is in receipt of a salary of $350 from the Dominion Government. Further, all regular soldiers and persons enrolled in military schools and also all registrars, sheriffs, county court clerks and bailiffs in receipt of fees to the amount of $350 per annum or upwards are disqualified. A man might be a soldier, or a registrar, or anything else described in this Act, and might earn $349 a year, and he would be entitled to vote, but because he earns $350 he cannot vote. The thing is simply outrageous, and, instead of those hon. gentlemen attacking the right hon. gentleman and his Government for this Franchise Act, I would like them to educate their brother Liberals in the Province of Manitoba as to what a Franchise Act should be. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House take it, I believe, as part of their policy in connection with the franchise that the lists should be made by the municipal clerks. I have no objection to that. It was a principle we fought for some years ago in the Province of Manitoba in connection with our Franchise Act, but we find that the Liberals and Reformers in Manitoba have a different opinion in regard to this from their friends here, because, by clause 16 of their Act, it is provided that "The Lieutenant Governor in Council shall appoint a proper person, to be called the Registration Clerk."

Not as provided by the Dominion Act, a judge or a barrister of five years' standing, but "a proper person," and whom do we suppose the Government of Manitoba will appoint as a proper person but a Liberal partizan. According to this Act, I and other representatives from the Province of Manitoba would be subject to the decision of such a "proper person" as to who should be entitled to vote at our elections. I propose that the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill shall not inflict upon me such an injustice, but that I shall be elected by the voters on a list properly and fairly prepared. I defy any hon. gentleman on the other side to say that the list for my county was not fairly prepared as much in the interest of my opponent as in mine. My list contained 16,000 names, the third largest list in the Dominion of Canada, and my opponent had as much justice given to him as I had. I ask the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) the only Liberal member from the Province of Manitoba, if he will dare to say that the revising officer in his constituency did not give him fair play. The hon. gentleman had so much regard for Judge Ryan, who was the revising officer in his constituency, that, although he was declared elected by a majority of 11, he asked for a recount before that judge, showing thus that he had perfect confidence in Judge Ryan. As to the list on which my hon. friend from Winnipeg was elected, I should like to know if that was not fairly prepared by Judge Ardagh: and it is the same in regard to the lists from one end of Manitoba to the other. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, many of them barristers themselves, do not hesitate to charge judges who have been placed on the bench, to charge their professional brothers with not being fit for the office of revising officer. According to the hon. gentleman, they have the hardihood to say that I am to have my list prepared by "a proper person to be known as the registration clerk," and appointed by the Local Government of Manitoba. This Act goes further and says that these lists shall be revised by these very judges whom hon. gentlemen now pretend are not fit to act as revising officers. The Manitoba Act goes beyond that, and says not only shall county court judges revise the lists but barristers of three years' standing. The Dominion Act says that the revising officers shall be a judge or a barrister of five years' standing, but according to the Manitoba legislation the man to revise the list may be a barrister of three years' standing. In Manitoba we want none of such legislation as is proposed by the hon. gentleman to-night. Further, to show that the Liberal party of the Province of Manitoba are in favour of the Dominion Franchise Act, I may quote sub-clause 4 of clause 18 of the Bill, where it says:

"The registration clerk shall obtain a certified copy, or certified copies, of the last revised list, or lists, of electors in such electoral division, or part of the same, for municipal, local or Dominion parliamentary purposes."

The Act passed by the Reform Government of the Province of Manitoba pronounces that the "Dominion parliamentary" list is one that the registration clerks can take as properly prepared. That is a pronouncement in favour of the Dominion Franchise Act. Further, it says:

"After the date of the closing of the list, the same shall be open to the inspection of any person asking to inspect the same. Before the date of the closing of the list, the registration clerk shall be bound to inform any person enquiring of him, at his office, whether or not he has placed any particular person on the list. Any person so inspecting said list may make a copy of the whole or any part thereof."

Then we find by a further provision that this judge or the barrister of three years' standing who is to be appointed to revise the list, shall revise the list not less than two weeks after the day fixed for the closing of the list by the registration clerk, and according to clause 16 the registration clerk is to close the list not less than two weeks from the date of the proclamation. There are some constituencies in Manitoba 36 miles square, without any railway communication, and you can easily understand what possibility there would be, under such circumstances, of putting names on the list. By clause 22 it is provided that the registration clerk shall furnish copies of the printed list for any person applying for the same for a fee of not more than 20 cents for each copy:

"Provided that such registration clerk must retain a sufficient number of copies of said printed lists for the purpose required by this Act. Such list shall be printed in time for the court of revision, if possible; but such court of revision shall be held whether such list has been printed or not."

I ask hon. gentlemen to bear in mind that the man who is to revise the lists is "a proper person" appointed by the Government, that is, a political partisan; that he has two weeks in which to prepare the list, and that he is not absolutely required to print the list before the court of revision: and then I ask hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, from the experience they have had of hon. gentlemen on the other side, what fairness they would expect from a partisan appointed by a Reform Government under such circumstances. It seems to me the most ridiculous contention in the world that there is anything wrong with the Dominion Franchise Act. We in Manitoba have had every possible hardship in getting names upon the list, and I would ask those hon. gentlemen, if they are fair men, if they are the free men they say they are, if they are desirous of having every man in the Dominion exercise his franchise, to realize that in Manitoba they do not get anything like the freedom under the Provincial Act that they do under the Dominion Franchise Act, because in Manitoba that practically means manhood suffrage. We have no man in the Province of Manitoba, who is a British subject and over twenty-one years of age, who has not the right to vote under the Dominion Franchise Act, because I am glad to say that we are sufficiently prosperous in that Province to insure that every man can earn $300 a year and so has a right to be on the list. That is practically manhood suffrage for Manitoba under the Dominion Franchise Act, and the people are not surrounded with the difficulties which the local Act provides. We find that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) in the third clause of his Bill says:

"3. The returning officers, deputy returning officers, poll clerks and other officials hereafter to be appointed for the purpose of conducting and holding elections of members for the House of Commons of Canada, shall have the same powers and authority as the returning officers, deputy returning officers and other officials in the several provinces comprising the Dominion of Canada now have under the election law now in force in each of such provinces respectively."

I will call the attention of the promoter of this Bill to clause 125 of the Electoral Franchise Act of the Province of Manitoba under which clause I and other representatives from that Province are supposed to be bound according to the proposition which he makes in this third clause of his Bill. That section of the Manitoba Act says :

"Whenever any deputy returning officer has reason to know or believe that fraud or violence is being practised in violation of the rights of electors, by which undue votes are tendered, or that any person is not qualified or has already voted at said election and offers to vote again, or tenders his vote under a false name or designation, or personates or represents himself falsely as being on the list of electors, such deputy returning officer under a penalty of two hundred dollars, and in default of payment, imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, shall refuse to give a ballot to such person and mention thereof shall be made in the poll list."

Now, Mr. Speaker, fancy investing any deputy returning officer or poll clerk with powers such as are given by clause 125 of this Act. I do not suppose that any hon. gentleman of this House, no matter from what province he comes, desires that such arbitrary power shall be given to such an official. There are other reasons why I oppose this Bill. I am astonished that the hon. gentleman who promotes it, after having been away from this House for four long years, after having spoken 57 times upon the Franchise Act in 1885, after having made a speech which covered 922 lines of the Hansard when he first spoke on the Franchise Act—I am surprised that that hon. gentleman after having come back to the House should introduce legislation upon a subject on which he so long and so often aired his eloquence—I can assure the hon. gentleman that he will find on this side of the House the same opposition which he met with in 1885.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DALY. I can assure him that he will find the same majority.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, no.

Mr. DALY. Yes, he will; we are not half through yet my dear fellow—excuse me, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it would be better for himself and better for the country if he would take up his time in devising more useful legislation than that proposed by this Bill. In order to give my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson), the hon. gentleman who represents the returning officer of his constituency, some information with regard to the local Franchise Act in the Province of Manitoba, I will quote an article from the Liberal Free Press. I would ask every one of the hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to this article from a good Liberal paper, one of the best Liberal papers published in the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It is a Tory paper.

Mr. DALY. My dear fellow, if you will read through the paper you will find that it is a good Liberal paper, and I am very much mistaken in the hon. gentleman's politics if he would not agree with a good deal of what is written in this paper.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It has fallen from grace.

Mr. DALY. Listen to this my good Reform friend from Huron, it will do you good, it is an article written by a good Reformer ; it is headed "Scotched, not killed," and it says :

"The electors of Manitoba must not suppose that because the Government was forced to concede certain objectionable features of the election law, therefore the law as it stands is fair and equitable. On the contrary, the electorate will have to exercise the utmost vigilance over the partisan registration clerk to secure registration of votes; over the partisan revising officer to prevent voters from being struck off on some trumpery excuse, and over the party deputy returning officer who can refuse to accept votes when upon the list, whenever he has to think that it would be inconvenient for such a voter to exercise his franchise. Putting aside the cumbrousness of this monstrosity of monstrosities' in its other provisions, these three avenues for corruption are sufficient to condemn any Act."

It is called a "monstrosity of monstrosities," is this Act which was passed by the Liberal Government of Manitoba. Why, no such charge has ever been made, even by a Liberal, against the Dominion Franchise Act. The article continues :

"We denounce these supporters of the Government who, masquerading in the guise of Liberals, through means of a brute majority, seek to perpetuate in power a corrupt Administration, by thus insidiously destroying the popular vote. We hold that this species of Government interference with the people in the registration of their sovereign will is despotic, and dangerously centralizes power in the Executive, and is, therefore, dangerous to the liberties of free men, as well as in direct contravention of the principles of popular government as provided in our constitution."

Now I would ask every hon. gentleman, before he votes upon this question, as he will have to do to-night, to consider before he gives a vote as some he has given before which will be lost and of no value —I would ask them before they rush in to suffer the same defeat as they suffered on former occasions, to weigh well the words which I have read and which were written by as good a Liberal as they are. I would ask the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) if he can stand up in his place to-night to justify the Franchise Act of the Manitoba Legislature, part of which I have quoted. I do not think the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) will justify it, nor do I think that any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House will justify it. I will leave the further discussion on this question to other hon. gentlemen, believing that I would not have done my duty to myself or to my constituents, or to my Province, if I did not show these hon. gentlemen who are so desirous of having a proper Franchise Act what their brother Liberals can do when they are left to their own sweet will. I have no doubt that if the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House got into power we might expect the same treatment from them as we received from their friends in the Local Legislature.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We will take care of you.

Mr. DALY. I have no doubt that my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) would like to sit in my seat upon the Government side of the House, and to warm it as nicely as I do, but the hon. gentleman will never be here : he will be dead and gone before that time comes, and I regret it much, for I like my hon. friend and would like to sit side by side with him. He is in the sere and yellow leaf now, and his party will be doubly in the sere and yellow leaf before they occupy a position to the right of the Speaker. I have endeavoured to show to my friends upon the opposite side of the House, including such valiant champions of the rights of the people as the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), what the Reform Government, which they delight to honour, in the Province of Manitoba, can do. When this Bill came up in the Local Legislature, it was opposed not only by Mr. Roblin, a good Liberal, but it was opposed by other Liberals, who now occupy a position on the Opposition side in the Legislature, and by Mr. Fisher, a gentleman whom the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), will certify to be a strong Reformer. If the hon. gentlemen who speak so eloquently and so forcibly upon the other side of the House in justification of the measure we are now discussing were in power we would find these gentlemen would take the same steps as the Reformers in Manitoba took with the electors there, and that they would mislead the electors of the Dominion as their friends have done in the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), in a speech of some fifteen minutes, condemning almost every clause of the present Electoral Franchise Act. Then he went on to say that the Local Legislature of Manitoba attempted to pass an Act, which he admits they did not pass, containing exactly the same clauses as the Act we are attempting to repeal to-day. That being the case, I think it hardly necessary that I should occupy any of the time of this House in attempting to refute any of the arguments the hon. gentleman has used on that subject. But with regard to the Government of Manitoba, while I do not know that we are here for the purpose of discussing all the Acts passed by that Government, I have simply this to say, that in the last local elections in the province, in which the hon. member for Selkirk took part, only four Conservatives were returned in the whole province. So much for the efforts of the hon. gentleman and his friends. To-day they are in a better position, and I will tell you why. The hon. gentleman has said that he defeated the Attorney-General of Manitoba in the last election. He did so, I admit, and he knows why. At a meeting held in the town of Portage la Prairie a couple of months ago, when Attorney-General Martin was re-elected by a large majority, the hon. gentleman admitted why he defeated the Attorney-General in Selkirk, and I will inform this House what the hon. gentleman admitted at that time. Attorney-General Martin is well known as the father of the Manitoba School Act, and for that reason was bitterly opposed by the Catholics in the Province. He is also known as the father of the Bill to abolish the French language in the Province, for which he was bitterly opposed by the French-speaking electors. Now, there are a large number of Catholic votes in Selkirk, probably 600 out of 6,000; and the hon. gentleman admitted that to make up his majority of 435 he received 200 Catholic votes which any other Liberal besides Mr. Martin would have received. He admitted further that owing to the opposition of the Winnipeg Free Press to Mr. Martin, a paper which was formerly a Liberal paper and was largely read by Liberals in Selkirk, over 100 sound Liberals had voted for him.

Mr. DALY. I rise to a point of order. I utterly deny that I made any such statement. The hon. gentleman states what is untrue, and I challenge him to prove it.

Mr. WATSON. We have heard such statements made by the hon. gentleman in this House before. He also admitted that he had received the votes of 150 Canadian Pacific Railway employés in Selkirk.

Mr. DALY. I rise to a point of order. I said I had not received 100 votes from the Canadian Pacific Railway in Selkirk. Everything the hon. gentleman says is untrue and false.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to order. The hon. member for Selkirk should be required by you to withdraw unparliamentary langaage. He has said that a member here has stated what is false and untrue, and his language is unparliamentary.

Mr. DALY. If the language I have used is unparliamentary, I will withdraw it, but it is perfectly justified on my part.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, we have not had your ruling yet.

Mr. ACTING-SPEAKER (Mr. DESJARDINS, Hochelaga). I understand the hon. gentleman has withdrawn.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman has aggravated the offence by reiterating it.

Mr. DALY. I suppose I am called to order by the great moralist of the country. I want the hon. gentlemen to understand that they cannot put me down. They tried it before, and they cannot do it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, is this in order, that the hon. gentleman should indulge in an attack on my hon. friend for stating a point of order?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. DALY. I want to apologize, if you will allow me. I beg to apologize to you, Sir, if I have used language which is derogatory to your position as Speaker of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. That will not do.

Mr. WATSON. You are probably aware, Sir, that I pay less attention to the interruptions of the hon. gentleman than any other member of this House. We are used to them in Manitoba, and they have very little effect. This may be to a certain extent irrelevant to the discussion; but we are discussing this Franchise Act, and the hon. gentleman has stated why he is here and why I am here. He says that I am here by the grace of the deputy returning officers. I am pointing out that he was elected by 200 Catholic votes, 100 Liberal votes, and 150 Canadian Pacific Railway votes, making 450, which reversed would make a difference of 900 in the count, leaving the hon. gentleman in a minority of 565. It was a God-send to the hon. gentleman that he had an unpopular candidate to oppose him, or he never would have been here. Now, Sir, I have not one word to say in complaint of the action of the revising barrister in my county, Judge Ryan. The hon. member for Selkirk has told you that I had sufficient confidence in Judge Ryan to ask him for a recount, notwithstanding the fact that I was returned by a majority of 12 votes by the returning officer. I asked for a recount simply because my opponent, I learned, was asking for a recount by a judge who was not a resident of my county, but who had jurisdiction over a portion of it. I might say that the hon. member for Selkirk sits by the grace of the judge who revised the lists in his county, Judge Walker, because, in the revision, when he was asked to put 75 Liberal names on the list for one small district, he refused to do so. That is why the hon. gentleman prefers to have a Dominion franchise with Judge Walker as revising barrister. I am not going to discuss the position of Mr. Greenway in the County of Huron, which we have had over and over again. That is the only thing Mr. Greenway's opponents have against him, that he was once a Tory in Huron. I am sorry he was, but he afterwards learned better, and he has had a successful Liberal Government in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman says he is opposed by a Liberal paper, that is, a paper which was Liberal a year or so ago, but has been in bad company ever since, and which has not to-day any backbone in its body; a paper which in the last election denounced the Liberal party in Manitoba from one end of the country to the other. I am not here to attack or repudiate any portion of the public press. They have a perfect right to discuss public questions as they choose; but to quote extracts from a paper of that kind in denunciation of the Local Government proves nothing. What do you find stated? That the Local Government is losing ground, because to-day there are twelve members of the local House in Opposition. What is the Opposition? The Catholics in the House, on account of the school law which was passed there. I have no doubt the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) will approve of the course of the Government of Manitoba, and I should have supposed that even when it is attacked on the subject of the franchise he would get up and defend it for what it has done in the case of the School Bill. The hon. member for Selkirk tells us that Mr. Roblin is as good a Liberal as there is in this House. Well, the Liberals, as I have said, were very strong in the Local House; a lot of them wanted to occupy prominent positions in that House; all of them could not be taken into the Cabinet: Mr. Roblin could not be taken in. They were hard up on the opposite side for a leader, and they elected Mr. Roblin. Although a renegade Liberal, he was good enough to be a Tory leader. We have been told what the franchise of Manitoba is. I only wish that we had a similar franchise for the Dominion elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WATSON. Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear;" but I repeat I would prefer to have a Dominion franchise similar to our Manitoba franchise. So far as the Civil Service is concerned, there is a difference of opinion as to whether civil servants should be disenfranchised or not. I believe if the question was put to the vote among them, the majority would prefer being disenfranchised, because they are compelled, under threat of dismissal, to vote for the party in power—I care not what party may be in power. Officials who are paid by the country should be independent. It is not advisable that officers holding positions of trust should be removed whenever a change of Government takes place; but I say that when the officers of the Government take an active part in elections they should, at a change of Government, go out with their friends. If they will take part in elections they should understand the penalty they render themselves liable to, for they cannot do their duties properly if they take an active part in political contests. We have a franchise in Manitoba which is practically manhood suffrage. You cannot have an election there with the old lists, for the lists have to be revised within a few months of every election. It would be impossible there to have an election on lists as ancient as those used in the Dominion elections. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) knows as well as I that in Manitoba thousands of electors who should have been on the lists were not on them, because in that country the electors change their residences quicker perhaps than in any other province. A great many people who were on the lists two years ago have taken their departure for distant points west. A great number of names on the lists should be struck off and a great number of electors who are not on them should be put on. The revising barrister in my constituency was a fair one, Mr. Justice Ryan. It would be hard to find a fairer man. If there was any mistake on his part it was unintentional. But, notwithstanding that fact, the mayor of the town, who is a Conservative and has resided eight or nine years there and owns a large amount of property, was not on the list. That was the mistake, not of Judge Ryan but of the officers employed by him. We have too many lists. An elector imagines that because his name is on the local list it must be also on the Dominion list, and when the day of election comes he finds that it is not. Under our Manitoba Franchise Act the lists are revised within a few months of an election, and a residence of six months in the province and of one month in the county is sufficient. The hon. gentleman from Selkirk, in criticising the Manitoba Act, did not quote the Act as it is to-day but as it was introduced. We are here, however, dealing with an Act which was passed through this House by a brute majority after the Opposition had fought it for some eight weeks in the interests of the people. Everybody knows that if that Bill had passed, as introduced in 1885, the Government need not, if they chose, have allowed a single Opposition member to come back. I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant when he said I was here by the grace of the deputy returning officer. This question of the returning officers would no doubt be before the House at a later date, and then we will discuss who should be returning officers. I was unfortunate in the choice of the returning officer in my county. He was president of the Conservative Association in the elections of 1887. The sheriff was appointed as returning officer, and I must say that I received fair treatment at his hands. But at the last election word was sent abroad that even the lone Liberal from Marquette was to be left at home, and a dead set was made upon me. The returning officer selected was appointed because he was known to be one of the most bitter partisans in Manitoba to-day. In consequence I was put to a great deal of trouble: ballot boxes were missing, but we finally got them back and I was declared elected by twelve majority. A recount was asked before Judge Walker, who stated openly, a week or ten days after the recount, that it was a God-send for me the recount did not take place before him, or I would have been counted out. Friends of hon. gentlemen opposite were making bets after the election that I would not take my seat, but that the judge would count me out. I say that in the Dominion elections a man was selected as returning officer who could not possibly know all the counties, and I suppose the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), in speaking of deputy returning officers, refers to the fact that a great number of ballots were spoiled in Marquette by the returning officer. There was probably a great number so destroyed in the hon. gentleman's own election, but he does not know that, of course, because there was no recount asked. In my county 622 ballots were thrown out on account of their having been spoiled by the returning officers: 306 of these were for myself and 316 for my opponent, Mr. Boyd, so that I made a gain of 10 on the recount. I gained the balance by the 46 ballots improperly rejected by the deputy returning officers. It is a great mistake that the Government do not see fit to appoint competent men as returning officers, who would name competent deputies, and not have electors in great number disenfranchised through the ballots being spoiled by these incompetent deputy-returning officers. I trust this House may see fit, comprising, as it does, a number of new members who have not had the experience in a sense that older members have had of the Franchise Bill, to vote for this proposition to do away with that Act—although a few of the men who hold seats by the grace of the returning officer may decidedly object. When it comes to revising a list, it is not only a cause of expense to the country, but to private parties as well. One revision in my county cost $4,500, independent of what it cost myself, and friends, and electors in trying for weeks to have their names put on the list. It is altogether a cumbersome system, and one which we must improve. This House has not the right to dictate to the electors of any Province as to how they shall see fit to send members to Parliament. We do not want any partisan revising barristers. I support the Bill introduced by my hon. friend to repeal the Dominion Franchise Act, and I am satisfied it is the one that will be approved of by a great majority, not only of the Liberals of Manitoba, but of the Conservatives as well.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this question is put, I must express my surprise that a Minister of the Crown having charge of the department of the Government which has been accused in this House by four or five members of having perpetrated frauds of the most outrageous character in the preparation of these lists by stuffing them, by putting names on which did not belong to them, and leaving off names that should have been there, has not met these accusations which reflect upon his own character and the character of his department; and the fact that the Secretary of State has not chosen to deny these allegations or to meet these charges is in my mind presumptive evidence that the charges are true, and I believe that the statements which have been made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) and other hon. gentlemen in this House, positive statements, statements that went into particulars and were founded on facts, are true. I believe that this Franchise Bill may be used by the Government of the day as an engine of corruption for the purpose of thwarting the wishes of the people of this country. It is a Bill which provides for the appointment of an officer to make the lists and to revise the lists, an officer who is the creature of the Government, who holds his office at the pleasure of the Government, and there is every temptation for that officer to use his powers for the benefit of his friends. I do not charge that it is done in all cases or even in the majority of cases, but I believe it is done in some cases, and further, I believe that the law is of a character to permit, nay, not only to permit, but to encourage the perpetration of these acts.

In addition to having the revising barrister appointed by the Government we have the Printing Bureau under the complete control of the Government, and it is charged to-night on good evidence that that is a greater evil even than the revising officer. It is charged that, under the cover of that Printing Bureau, which we cannot reach, these lists are stuffed, and the grossest frauds are perpetrated. I think it would have been good if the Government had met these charges. It would be well to have a committee to enquire into this matter in connection with the Printing Bureau, and I propose to ask for such a committee, so that we may see if we have a member of the Government who is engaged in trampling upon the rights of the people by such a fraud as is asserted to have been perpetrated in the preparation of the lists in that office.

Then we have a statement that declarations are made by partisan magistrates and dated back in order to place on the lists the names of friends of the Government which had not been placed on the list at the proper time. It is also charged that Tory politicians are allowed access to the books in the hands of revising barristers and their clerks, and that others are not allowed to see them. We have the charge that revising barristers sometimes stoop to the business of corresponding with friends of the Government in outlying stations, urging them to send in their names, and acting as agents of the Government as well as revising barristers. If these things are true, if any one of them is true, there is not an honest member in this House who, convinced of the truth of these charges, could hesitate as to his vote on this measure. Why was this measure introduced in 1885? Was there any public necessity for the introduction of this measure? Was the system which had existed from the time of Confederation up to the year 1885 one that gave rise to popular dissatisfaction? Were any complaints made as to its operation? There was not a breath of complaint. There was no reason for changing the system on the ground of public dissatisfaction, or on the pretence that the policy which had lasted for eighteen years had not worked well, but the Government adopted the new system, presumably for the purpose of furthering their own interest.

I wish very briefly to compare the features of our franchise law with the features of the franchise laws in England, in the colonies and in the United States. I want to point out that our franchise law is unique in its character, and differs from the franchise laws in all other free commonwealths in the world. We have the revising barrister appointed by the Government, we have the list of voters made and revised by him, we have the list printed by the Government in their own office, and it is possible for them to perpetrate any outrage they may choose in preparing those lists. In England, the revising barrister is not the creature of the Government and does not hold office at the pleasure of the Government. As my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has stated, he is appointed by the courts. The lists are prepared by the overseers of the poor. The printing is not done under Government supervision. There is not a feature in the franchise law of England which corresponds with our Franchise Act. In all the colonies, I believe, the revising officers are appointed by the courts and the lists are the work of municipal officers. In the United States, except in one state where the judges revise the lists, the preparation and revision of the lists are by the municipal authorities. There is not a single Anglo-Saxon commonwealth in the world where the franchise law has any feature in common with this law.

My hon. friends opposite—the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Finance and other members of the Government—saw fit to copy their fiscal system from the fiscal system of the United States. I think, perhaps, they would have acted wisely, in shaping this federal union, to have taken the example of the experience of other federal unions.

Mr. BOWELL. We are not so far advanced as you are.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is true that you are not far advanced. On the contrary, you are very much in the dark. But you have originated a measure which is like nothing in Heaven above or on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. You cannot find a parallel anywhere to this monstrosity, this legislative abortion which we call the Dominion Franchise law. The United States, from which you copied their fiscal system, had the benefit of 150 years of colonial experience, you have had the benefit of ten years of experience under Confederation. They called a constitutional convention in 1787, and that convention considered this question of the franchise under five different propositions. One was that the state should elect the members of Congress; another was that the state should provide the way in which members of Congress should be elected; the third plan was that the people of the state should nominate the candidates, and from these candidates the State Legislature should select delegates to Congress; the fourth proposition was that the United States should have a uniform freehold franchise without any reference to the franchises in the separate states; the fifth proposition, which was adopted, was that the franchise for the election of members to Congress, and for president and vice-president of the United States, should be the franchise in each state which was used for the election of members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature in that state. That law, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, has been in operation 100 years. There has never been the slightest friction, there has never been a single reason why that law should be repealed, as there has been in our experience a reason why this law should be repealed; but in face of that experience, in face of the dictates of common sense, the Government have adopted this law, and it is fair to presume and to assert that the Government have adopted this law for the purpose of securing a political advantage through the control of the formation of the voters' lists, through its own officers, through its own machinery, at great cost to the people, at great inconvenience, and in order to defeat the purposes of justice; and I venture to say that there is not half a dozen members on the other side of the House who, if they consulted their own wishes, would vote for the continuance of this measure—this measure that imposes these heavy liabilities upon every member, and every candidate who wishes to become a member, and who has in consequence to watch the revision of the list; this measure which imposes all this cost, trouble, difficulty and annoyance upon the people of the country; this measure which is so very expensive and so very distasteful to the people, that we have only had two revisions since the law was passed. Sir, I assert that but for the feeling of loyalty to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, there is not, in my opinion, a dozen members upon the other side of the House who would dream of voting for the continuance of this absurd measure. I will close by referring for one moment to a circumstance that has come to my knowledge with reference to the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins). I can imagine that he feels a great degree of satisfaction as to the mode in which the law was operated, and the mode in which the machinery of the Government was used in the election. I understand that the returning officer in that hon. member's constituency appointed eighty election agents, not one of whom were voters, every one of whom voted for him, and that as a result of these eighty fraudulent and bogus votes he had a majority of six. Now, Sir, having in this case a practical illustration of the abominable character of this law, this law that men dare stand up and defend because they have profited by its iniquities, I assert that every fact, every circumstance of the experience of the country, of the experience of every member of this House, point to the assertion being true that I have made, that it is time this mischievous law was repealed.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Richmond, Nova Scotia (Mr. Gillies) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hodgins) have not voted.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member for Richmond hear the question put?

Mr. GILLIES. I was here, but I did not understand the order of taking the vote.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member hear the question put?

Mr. GILLIES. I heard the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then how does the hon. member vote?

Mr. GILLIES. I vote for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member for Carleton hear the question put?

Mr. HODGINS. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then how does the hon. member vote?

Mr. HODGINS. I vote for the amendment.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie) has not voted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He was not in.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He was.

Mr. SPEAKER. The vote of the hon. member for Argenteuil is recorded against the amendment.

An hon. MEMBER. The member for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard) has not voted.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member for Ottawa hear the question put from the Chair?

Mr. ROBILLARD. No.

Mr. WATSON. You have put the question in such a way that I do not think the members understood it. I do not think the member for Richmond understood it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question was put to the hon. member for Richmond quite plainly.

Mr. WATSON. He was out of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. He was there all the time.

Mr. ROBILLARD. I came in after the vote was taken. If I had been here I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. TROW. I think it is wrong to receive the votes of the hon. member for Richmond, Nova Scotia, and the hon. member for Carleton, if they were not in the House.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They were there all the time.

Mr. SPEAKER. These gentlemen say that they heard the question from the Chair, and that is sufficient.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No: they were not in the House, and they could not have heard the question when outside the Chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER. The votes must be recorded in accordance with the statements made by the hon. members themselves.

Mr. TROW. I call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has not voted.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member for Welland hear the question put from the Chair?

Mr. GERMAN. I did not hear the question put.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 21st May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Atikokan Iron Range Railway Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh).

Bill (No. 56) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis).

Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Buffalo Lake and Battleford Railway, Coal and Iron Company.—(Mr. Macdowall).

Bill (No. 58) to incorporate the Whirlpool Bridge Company.—(Mr. German).

ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 59) further to amend the Act intituled: An Act to amend the Act respecting the Electoral Franchise and the Dominion Elections Act, 1874. He said: The object of this Bill is to make these Acts correspond with the proposed amendments in the Dominion Election law sought to be made by the Bill I introduced a few days ago. The wording of one of the clauses in the Electoral Franchise Act is similar to the clause in the Dominion Elections Act. I seek to limit the number of persons entitled to vote, and confine them to British subjects. Therefore, the amendment of the law in one respect necessitates the amendment of the law in the other respect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

AMHERSTBURG DRY DOCK.

Mr. ALLAN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a dry dock in the town of Amherstburg? Has there been any survey made or estimate of cost for such work, and is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the same during the present year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A petition has been received in the Department from the inhabitants of Amherstburg and surrounding townships, asking for the construction of a dry dock at that port. Nothing has been done in regard to it except a cursory examination, which shows that a careful survey will be necessary in order to ascertain, first, the proper site, and second, the probable cost.

PELEE ISLAND SUB-COLLECTOR.

Mr. ALLAN asked, What is the name of the present sub-collector on Pelee Island? At what date was he appointed? Has he continuously discharged the duties of that office since the date of his appointment? Was any other person appointed sub-collector at that outport, or in any way instructed to discharge the duties of that office during the present year? If so, what is his name, the date of his appointment, and the amount of his salary, and is he still in the employ of the Government?

Mr. BOWELL. The name of the present sub-collector on Pelee Island is F. B. McCormick. He was appointed on the 1st December, 1888. Mr. McCormick has not been continuously discharging the duties of that office since the date of his appointment. No other person has been appointed sub-collector at that outport. Mr. J. H. C. Atkinson was requested to perform the duties of sub-collector on Pelee Island during the absence of Mr. McCormick, who had been ordered to report for duty at Windsor. On the 28th of April, 1891, Mr. McCormick was instructed to resume his duties as sub-collector on Pelee Island, and Mr. Atkinson to be paid for the time he had acted as sub-collector, at the rate of $400 per annum.

COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether the Government have decided to bring into force the Copyright Act of 1889? If they have so decided, when may the proclamation be expected, and on what date will the Act come into force?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Correspondence is still being carried on with Her Majesty's Government, and I cannot say anything upon it until that is determined.

DUTY ON SCOTCH GRANITE.

Mr. BARRON asked, Is it the intention of the Government this session to increase the duty on the importation of Scotch granite?

Mr. BOWELL. That is a question to which the hon. gentleman will receive an answer when the Finance Minister makes his Budget speech.

WALKERTON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TRUAX asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sufficient sum in the Supplementary Estimates, to finish and furnish and provide steam-heating for the Walkerton public buildings? At what date is it expected the buildings will be ready for occupation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a sum of, I believe, $8,000 included in the Estimates for 1891-92, which were brought down last Monday, which is intended to complete these buildings. They will be completed within three months from the time when the amount asked from Parliament will become available.

BONAVENTURE PIER.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, What is the reason that although the sum of $5,000 was voted in the Estimates of 1888 and 1889 for the construction of a pier at Bonaventure, in the said County of Bonaventure, that the said works have not been commenced, or any mention made of the sum of $5,000 in this year's Estimates?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The wharf reported on by the chief engineer was a structure 1,200 feet in length, extending to 20 feet in depth at low water at the spring tides. The cost was estimated at $33,000. The work has not been undertaken because of the insufficiency of the appropriation.

WHARF IN THE TOWN OF VAUDREUIL.

Mr. HARWOOD (translation) asked, Whether the wharf constructed near the village of Vaudreuil, in 1888, by G. M. Brabaut, is the property of the Government; if so, what is the price specified in the contract; how much has it cost to date; to whom has the money been paid; do the Government intend to have the wharf completed; and who is in charge of the wharf?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). In answer to the hon. member, I have to say that the wharf is not the property of the Government. In 1887-88, the sum of $2,400 was voted to allow the people of Vaudreuil to complete the wharf which was then being constructed at the foot of Ste. Marguerite street. The amount granted was to be used in the purchase of necessary material. The municipality and citizens of Vaudreuil undertook, of their own accord, to supply, at their own cost, the necessary labour, plant, &c., the whole to the satisfaction of the Department of Public Works. After its construction, the wharf was to remain the property of the municipality, which would levy and collect tolls and keep the work in good state of repair. The details of the expenditure are to be found in the Report of the Auditor General for 1887-88. The total cost of the work is not known. The amount paid to Mr. G. M. Brabaut is $2,400.

FLOODS IN THE RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. BÉCHARD (Translation). Before the House takes up the Orders of the Day, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works when I shall be able to get the copy, which I moved for at the beginning of the session, of the report of the engineer of the Department on the subject of the floods on the Richelieu River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). In answer to the hon. member, I think that the report referred to can be put before the House early next week. The hon. member knows that there are pressing documents which have to be furnished to the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and the staff of the Department is especially busy in preparing these documents.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Jamieson:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I do not wish to take up the time of the House any further on this question, having spoken upon it yesterday afternoon. As there are many other hon. gentlemen who desire to address the House on the subject, I merely wish to add, to what I said yesterday, that we have already recognized in our law the principle of temperance legislation—I cannot say that we have recognized the principle of prohibitory legislation, as the legislation up to the present time has been restrictive. Now we ask the House to go a step further in the interest of the country and in the interest of the people, and to pass prohibitory legislation.

Mr. FLINT. I feel it my duty to state my views on this very important question. I agree with almost all that has been said in regard to the manner in which this question should be approached, and I congratulate the House that the discussion has been so far, and is likely to be, conducted in a non-partisan spirit. Yesterday the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) gave a thoughtful and well-reasoned address, and although I heartily concur with many of the observations which he addressed to the House, I cannot agree with him in his allusions to the scriptural argument against the principle of prohibition. Now, I think that the Parliament of Canada, or any other legislature, is not the place in which to discuss the scriptural bearings of an economic, social or other question. It may be true, or it may not be true, that the tendency and scope of Scripture are opposed to the principle of a prohibitory liquor law, or of any other proposed legislation which may come before this House. I believe, however, that we should discuss this question solely and entirely upon the ground of public welfare, and economic and social considerations. As a complete answer, however, to any assertions that may be addressed to this House from either side that the teachings of Scripture are opposed to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, I may say that those in this country who are supposed to be most conversant with the Scriptures and who devote the most time to their study, are, to a very large extent, with the prohibitionists on this question. We have had an almost overwhelming demand for prohibition emanating from the various great religious organizations of this country, and I think we may feel justified in assuming that in their view the Scriptures, at any rate, strongly confirm the principle they have advocated in their petitions. Another ground that has been taken as an offset, in a certain degree, to the numerous petitions that have been presented to this House, is that they are not representative of the electorate, that they are signed by a large number of persons who are not upon the electoral lists; that while they may represent a deep sentiment of a large number of very good people of the country, they do not represent the sentiment of the controlling classes, that is, the electors throughout the country at large. It is also alleged that it is very easy to obtain signatures to petitions to this Parliament. I am willing to admit that it is, perhaps, too easy to obtain signatures to petitions of almost any kind, but, at the same time, the fact that such an overwhelming number of signatures has been obtained to these numerous petitions which have burdened the Table of the House for the last few days, show that it is somewhat easier, at any rate at the present time, to obtain signatures to petitions of this kind than it has been in the past, or is now in reference to any other subject of legislation likely to come before the House. I think I am safe in assuming that almost every consideration of public welfare justifies the propriety and expediency of prohibition. That principle has been settled not only by the admission of those who have supported it in this House, but by those who have supported the strong amendments to the various prohibition resolutions that have been brought before the House. Almost without exception we have found gentlemen of ability, talent and representative character, standing up in this House and admitting that, as an abstract principle, prohibition is a sound and just one to apply to this Dominion of Canada. But they have only taken exception to certain collateral and subsidiary considerations in connection with the abstract principle, and I wish to treat these objections with the courtesy which they merit. I believe there are very few men, perhaps there are no men in this House, who will stand up and oppose the abstract principle of prohibition of the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental and medicinal purposes. But they take objections, and the objections are to them and to many people very reasonable objections, with which, although a strong prohibitionist, I have a great deal of sympathy, objections which are, however, subsidiary and collateral in character. First, they say we have no genuine assurance that the petitions on the Table of the House and the representations made through the press, and by strong ultra-prohibitionists in this House truly represent the wishes and feelings of the electorate and people at large. This is a very difficult question to settle. It is, after all, a matter of opinion. But, at the same time, I think we are safe in asserting that, if we are to treat this question in the same manner as we treat other questions coming before this Legislature for consideration, it has given greater signs of vitality and shown a greater abundance of public sentiment back of it than almost any other question that has come before this Legislature for its approval or confirmation. I do not allude to it for the sake of party purposes, because it would be highly improper to introduce any partisan or political ideas into this discussion, but we remember well when the First Minister introduced into this House, his National Policy, he introduced it in a resolution setting forth its leading principle, which subsequently led up to the measure of the protective tariff we have to-day. It was stated in the House that this measure was brought forward in response to the wishes of the mercantile community and in response to the strong wishes of the people. It would have been easy, in reply, to have asked for the evidence of this, but the Legislature took it upon the word of the present First Minister that a protective tariff was demanded and required by a majority of the people at large. They had no evidence to produce, no plebiscite had been held, no evidence of the public wish was submitted beyond that possessed by the mover of the resolution now under consideration when he submitted it to the House the other day. But it may be said that there may be a certain amount of delusion in regard to the petitions, owing to the fact that young people and persons of the other sex who have no votes under the constitution, may have signed these petitions, and so they may not really represent the sentiment of the electors. I understand that a proposition will be made that this question be submitted to a formal vote of the electorate. In advance of this proposition being made, I do not suppose it will be improper for me to say, that it is to a large degree unconstitutional, un-British and, at all events, a highly unsatisfactory way of obtaining the opinions of this country upon any public question. The manner in which, in this country and under our form of government, the people's views are to be expressed is through the voices and votes of their representatives in Parliament. By the expression of their voices and votes the representatives will be judged, and they must stand or fall as legislators upon the record they make in Parliament. I will point out, however, a practical difficulty, which will press itself on the minds of those who wish to consider this question from a practical standpoint. Suppose the abstract principle of the resolution were placed before the people, we all know, as a matter of fact, that the public do not rally at the polls, so far as consolidating a vote is concerned, in favour of an abstract principle as strongly as they will rally round the embodiment of that principle in the person of a candidate. You must have the personal influence and the personal work of the men who have to carry out the legislation consequent on the endorsation of this abstract principle at the polls. If this legislation were passed, a prohibitory liquor law satisfactory in itself, meeting in all its details the various difficulties which we are forced to meet in consideration of this question, and having placed it on the Statute-book, then asked for a plebiscite as to whether it should come into force in one or other of the provinces, there might be possibly a substantial reason for such a course. If the votes of the people were taken on the bald resolution, or on a more complete resolution than that submitted by the mover, this Legislature would still be in a helpless condition in regard to crystallizing the resolution into a law of the land. The people who vote would have the same differences of opinion as to the possibility of enforcing the law, and would be face to face with all the difficulties laid before Parliament this session and during other sessions in regard to the enforcement of the law, and we would, therefore, advance no further than we are at the present moment. Consequently, apart from the un-British and unconstitutional character of such an appeal on a question of this kind, it has all the elements of impracticability, and must be ruled out of the discussion. Another collateral objection to the passage of the resolution is the financial aspect of the question, and I must admit that it is the duty of the prohibitionists in this House, and of the representatives of the people here, to consider very carefully, to consider with a great deal of thoughtfulness, the financial aspect of the question. Assuming that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is the parent of a great deal of crime, of a vast amount of poverty, of an immense amount of the suffering in families and in communities, and that it is advisable to prohibit the manufacture, sale and use of them, we meet at the outset a great practical difficulty which it is incumbent on us to dispose of as well as we can do so. I do not propose to examine this matter at great length, but to say, in a general way, that we have had very able arguments from several hon. gentlemen, and those which impressed me forcibly were from the present Minister of Finance, a gentleman of whose ability we are all proud, and who has made some of the most remarkable and strongest utterances ever made in Parliament on this subject. If the Minister of Finance, as representing the financial interests of the country, will rise and tell this House that, from a financial standpoint, it is impracticable and impossible to carry on the government of the country without the revenue derived from Excise and Customs duties on intoxicating liquors, then, I think, we shall have a difficulty to meet that hitherto we have not had. It is true that the sweeping off the revenue of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 would to a certain extent hamper temporarily the administration of public affairs. It is a large sum to make up from other sources; it is a large sum to deduct from the expenditure of the country. But when we consider this aspect of the case, which has been thoroughly threshed out in this House and on every public platform in this Dominion, that if a prohibitory law is passed, enforced and supported by the people, there will be a saving of from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 per annum to the consumers of intoxicating liquors, which sum must be expended in other directions, I believe we can easily make up the loss of $5,000,000, and the revenue will not to a very great extent suffer, except during those few preliminary years when the matter is in course of settlement and adjustment. There has been a time in the history of the country, not very remote, when the necessity of adding five or six millions to the revenue was considered a comparatively light matter. We have had since the introduction of the present protective principles and policy a tariff in force, supported by the Government and endorsed by the people, which has added to the revenue three or four times six millions of dollars; and yet we are told on every platform, and with every appearance of confidence and enthusiasm, that the people are richer, happier and more prosperous, although they are paying $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 more into the treasury than they were paying before the National Policy was introduced. Well, then, can we not equally say that if we sweep away the revenue derived from the connection of the Government with the sale and importation of intoxicating liquors, and pointing to the vast amount of money that must be saved in the pockets of the people, that our people will be richer, that they will be happier, that they will be more prosperous, and that the revenue itself will be more thriving than under the present condition of affairs? I believe that the people of this country who are in favour of prohibition, the people who are supporting the enormous number of petitions which have been laid upon the Table of this House, are willing and prepared to make the necessary sacrifices to supply the Government with the revenue which they might temporarily lose in consequence of adopting legislation on the basis of the resolution we are now discussing. Another objection to the passage of a prohibitory liquor law is that it would be impossible to enforce and carry out its provisions. This is an objection which should have a great deal of weight with all candid minds; it is an objection which has had a great deal of weight upon my own mind, and as I have been a student of this question for several years I have felt that the answer to this objection which was given by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), who spoke so ably on this subject, was a very proper answer. We have reached a pretty pass indeed in the history of the Dominion of Canada when any man can stand in this Legislature and say that a law on our Statute-book, supported by the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the country, cannot be enforced. The resources of civilization are not yet exhausted, and with the people of this country from one end to the other interested in the carrying out of such a law, the burden of proof lies upon those who oppose this legislation to give the reasons in detail and to show the principles on which they have formed the conclusion that prohibitory liquor legislation cannot be enforced.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one moment? I quite admit that if there were an overwhelming sentiment in the country in favour of legislation of this kind, the great objection to its enforcement would be done away with. That is assuming what I do not think has yet been established.

Mr. FLINT. The point raised by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has been partly touched upon by me in my previous remarks. As it is to a large degree a matter of opinion, perhaps it would not be proper for me, without a more thorough study of all the ideas which have been entertained on this question, to dwell any longer upon that particular point at the present time. However, I may point out, that we find in the history of the legislation of this Parliament that it has adopted a great many resolutions, and passed a great deal of legislation directed more or less towards total prohibition as an ultimatum. I hold in my hand the copy of a resolution passed a few days ago by the Legislature of the Province of Nova Scotia upon the motion of the leader of the Opposition in that body, seconded by one of his own supporters who is also a Conservative. The resolution was unanimously adopted in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and it shows that although it may be strictly ultra vires of the Legislature to pass a law upon this subject, both political parties in the Legislature are united upon this resolution, which I believe was animated by a purpose to influence the minds of the members of this Parliament in favour of prohibition, and as illustrative of the wishes of the people of that Province as expressed by their representatives. The resolution was passed on the 13th May and reads as follows :—

"That it appears to this House, in consideration of the very large number of numerously signed petitions relating to the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, now being presented to the Dominion House of Commons, this House hereby expresses its opinion in favour of such a law, desiring to strengthen and encourage the friends of prohibition in the House of Commons at Ottawa."

This resolution will certainly tend to show that public opinion in the Province of Nova Scotia is overwhelmingly in favour of the enactment of some prohibitory liquor law. Another objection to prohibition which seems to have appealed to many highly respectable and intelligent gentlemen in this House representing large and wealthy constituencies, is the question of giving compensation to those who may be injured in their business of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. I will not attempt to enter fully into this important and vast question in connection with the subject of prohibition. It has been thoroughly handled in this House by the present hon. Minister of Finance, whose speech on the subject I remember reading with a great deal of interest and a great deal of instruction shortly after it was delivered. As a large number of the hon. gentlemen have probably not read the speech recently and as some of the ideas he expressed on this subject are similar to the views I hold, I will, with the permission of the House, call attention to some of the features of compensation as applied to those who manufacture or are connected with the vending of intoxicating liquors, and to the principle of compensation as applied in the mother country. In England the principle of not injuring any private man in his business or of taking away the rights of property of private persons for the public good without ample compensation is fully recognized. The law books are full of such cases, the statutes are filled with provisions to amply protect in every detail all these persons who may be injured by the course of public improvements, or the exercise of the right of eminent domain which the country possesses. This right is exercised over private property, or it is exercised by the state for its defence, its protection, or for the improvement of public matters ; or it is exercised indirectly by granting to corporations and private companies certain franchises which must be exercised under certain restrictions for the public good. The exercise of this franchise must necessarily frequently interfere with the rights of private property ; railroads must pass through private lands, bridges must abut upon and interfere with the riparian rights of owners, and so on throughout the whole catalogue of these rights of companies under parliamentary power or by the Government itself. I call the attention of the House to the fact that they cannot find an instance in English history where, in the exercise of the powers of the Legislature for the public good in connection with matters of this kind, where private property is not directly taken out of the hands of the private owners, or where private property or private interests are only indirectly affected by the passage of a law for public ends, the principle of compensation has been applied. In the mother country, as well as in this country, they recognize the right of the law, in the protection of the people, to interfere with the trade or the interests or the habits or customs of every class of the people. The cases are numerous and well recognized in which compensation has been refused, especially in the mother country ; because there the habit has grown up through hundreds of years of custom for the son to succeed the father in the same business at the same stand. The system of licensing public houses in the mother country is substantially the same at the present time, with various modern improvements, that it has been for hundreds of years. But, when in the exercise of the public powers of Parliament, these liquor shops have been closed or the licenses not renewed, we find no instance in which the principle of compensation has ever been listened to or dreamed of. We can apply the same rule to the passage of a prohibitory liquor law in the Dominion of Canada. It is true, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Toronto, that a large amount of capital is invested in the manufacture of certain intoxicating liquors ; a very large amount of capital is also invested in the sale of certain intoxicating liquors ; but to what distance will you go in applying it if you once admit the principle that any of these people are to be compensated for any indirect loss they may sustain in consequence of Parliament attempting to protect the people from the overwhelming evils which flow from such manufacture and sale ? The people engaged in this traffic are not in any sense in partnership with the Government ; they are under no contract, express or implied, with the people of this country to carry on this business ; they do not hold the position of public officers. They have never been sustained or encouraged by Parliament, but they have been constantly legislated against from the establishment of representative government in this country in 1758 down to the present time. Look over the whole range of legislation in this country during that period and you will find that the arm of the law has been raised, not to sustain and encourage, but to restrict and repress to the utmost extent those who are making fortunes from the traffic in intoxicating liquors. It is true, the Government has incidentally, to a certain extent, recognized these people by imposing license fees and Customs and Excise duties upon them ; but the imposition of these dues is only incidental, and they have been laid on as heavily as possible with the view of protecting the people. Now, the

hon. member for Toronto, who appears to be very scrupulous with regard to compensation, would stop at the manufacturer; another hon. member would protect the small retail dealer; and between these two extremes, I would ask any hon. member of this House where he will stop in attempting to apply the principle? I believe the people of this country who have fought the liquor traffic for the last fifty years, who have aroused every energy in the legislature, in the pulpit, on the platform and through the churches against this traffic, will never submit for one hour that the honest, hardworking, economical labourers throughout this country shall be taxed to compensate those who have made immense fortunes out of that which has only tended to injure and degrade our people. I believe the principle of compensation cannot for a moment be admitted in connection with the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law. Compensation for what? What have they done for the public good? What can they do for the public good if continued? What will they have given up to the state when the state has destroyed their traffic? The state does not take over their business for the public good. It destroys it entirely. The only compensation those engaged in such a business can expect is that which, by the laws of nature, they are sure to receive. As they have sown so shall they reap. They have grown rich and strong out of the misfortunes and weakness of society. When society frees itself from their grasp —when, actuated by the instincts of self-preservation, it sweeps away their trade, they must fall back, for material comforts, not upon the state which they have injured, but upon the ill-gotten profits they have accumulated. Who will compensate society for its losses, its sufferings? It, too, must reap as it has sowed; and, having destroyed the destroyer through wise and useful laws, it must work out its future salvation by upholding and supporting the laws it has enacted for its own protection. If a prohibition law is enacted by this Legislature, I believe it will be loyally supported by the people of the country at large. One hon. gentleman spoke about a certain tyranny which would be exercised over the minority. Who are those that form the minority? The minority of what? The only minority we know of must be those engaged in the traffic itself, because the people who partake moderately of intoxicating liquors are strongly in favour of the passage of a prohibitory liquor law. And when the failure of the Scott Act in some portions of the country is pointed out, a failure which I regretfully acknowledge, it is not unfair to point out that the Scott Act laboured under disadvantages. It laboured under the disadvantage of being to a certain extent an illogical Act, apart from the defects inherent in its clauses, making it difficult of being carried into effective operation. So long as the Government permitted and derived a large revenue from the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and maintained regulations respecting the business, there was a certain want of logic in passing an Act to strike down indirectly that which the Government did not feel itself competent to strike down directly. But let the Legislature and the Government take the question out of that illogical region, and let them say that from one end of this country to the other the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors shall cease, and then, I believe, the law will be more easy to carry into force, and the difficulties will to a large degree vanish. That no difficulties will arise no one would be foolish enough to assert. Great difficulties will arise, great sacrifices must be made; but I believe we have in our people resources of intelligence and patriotism and true loyalty to the best interests of the country, sufficient to meet such difficulties and to make such sacrifices as may be necessary to the effective carrying out of this law. We require to have that faith in the country, in its strength and its capacity for true progress and development to enact the law, as well as the courage to stand by it during its first years of struggle and difficulty. We also require what has been already alluded to in this debate, a courteous consideration for the feelings and interests of those who differ from us and whose interests may be to a certain extent injured temporarily by such an enactment; and although I am as strong a prohibitionist as any hon. member of this House, although the surroundings amid which I have been brought up may not permit me to look upon the traffic with as indulgent an eye as other prohibitionists who come from other portions of the country, yet I sympathize with them in their difficulties, and am disposed to have a generous consideration for any interests that may be injured in this case. Let us not worry over the details of this question, which have been purposely left out of this resolution: but let us establish the principle of prohibition prepared to make the necessary sacrifices, and I believe the country will sustain Parliament in enacting, and the Government in enforcing this very salutary law.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am deeply sensible of the necessity this House is under of taking cognizance of the immense number of petitions placed before us in favour of prohibition. There is not only numerical strength, but there is also the strength arising from the fact that they bear the signatures of some of the most respectable and responsible names in the country. For my part, I quite appreciate the remarks made by our hon. friend the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). I quite appreciate the fact that he can look lightly upon the question of revenue; but I have never yet, for the last sixteen years, heard the problem solved as to how the loss in revenue is to be made up. The day has now come when the question must be met in a business-like manner, and it is in no spirit of opposition that I approach the subject. I have an amendment to offer, in which I propose that a committee should be appointed to investigate the question of finance in reference to this matter, to ascertain how the interests of the Provincial Governments should be safeguarded as regards their claims, and report to the House on the whole subject. We are practically without information on these points. The hon. member for Yarmouth figures the loss of revenue at $6,000,000; but no hon. gentleman present can state with accuracy what the loss will be. In view of the commercial situation, and the importance of acting judiciously ere adopting final measures, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome):

Whereas the numerous petitions presented to this and preceding Parliaments, praying for the enactment of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, indicate a desire upon the part of a large section of the population that the question should receive serious consideration from the people's representatives.

That this House is of opinion that, as such petitions as as reports made by various committees of Parliament, well allege that the social, moral and civil standing of the subject is imperilled by the existence of such trade in intoxicating liquors, immediate steps should be taken to obtain full and reliable information upon all practical and financial details connected with the question.

That this House is fully cognizant of the immense loss of revenue which would, for the time being, follow the enactment of prohibitory measures, not alone to the Dominion exchequer, but to the various Province of the Union, and the possibility of complications arising between the Provincial and Federal authorities consequent upon such reduction of financial resources.

That this House, whilst desirous of moving in the direction of the amelioration of evils complained of, is of opinion that any legislation should be so safe-guarded as not to too suddenly disturb the revenue of the country or the vested interests claiming compensation.

In view of these considerations, the House is of opinion that a select committee should be appointed to report upon all the details involved in the subject, more particularly:

1. The annual loss to the federal exchequer;
2. The amount invested in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors:
3. The amount necessary to compensate those now embarked in the manufacture and sale of liquors, should such policy be deemed expedient:
4. The amount of annual loss to each provincial exchequer:
5. The amount of annual loss to each municipality throughout the Dominion;
6. An estimate of the probable amount requisite by taxation, in lieu of license fees in each province and Federal Excise and Customs duties:

Together with all information obtainable touching the present cost of maintaining the various institutions for the suppression and punishment of crime throughout the Dominion,—

Said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Coatsworth, Curran, Davies, Ferguson (Leeds and Grenville), Girouard, Gordon, Hazen, Jamieson, Mills (Annapolis), Mills (Bothwell), Préfontaine, Ross (Lisgar), Scriver, Taylor, Wallace and Wood (Westmoreland); to report at the earliest possible period.

Mr. ROOME. In seconding this motion, I beg to say that I believe the time has come for this House to take some steps in this matter. It is evident, judging from the number of petitions presented throughout the length and breadth of the country, from religious bodies and the people generally, that the people of Canada are about ripe for prohibition or nearly so. It is, therefore, but right that steps should be taken to put this House in a position to deal satisfactorily with this much vexed question Some years ago an Act was passed through this Parliament called the Canada Temperance Act, but that Act proved not workable for several reasons. First, for political reasons, having been passed by the Dominion Government which is Conservative, and having to be put into operation by the Local Governments which are of a different political stripe, especially the Ontario Government. Therefore, in connection with this Act, there was one political party in opposition to the other, each endeavouring to make political capital out of it. The second reason for its failure was that those engaged in the liquor traffic had not been recompensed to any extent for the loss they had incurred through their liquor licenses having been taken from them. Therefore, they and their friends necessarily opposed the working of the Act, as it lessened the value of their property. The hotel-keepers, who had been compelled by local legislation, to provide suitable accommodation for travellers, and who had, in many cases, spent all their money in complying with the law—which was a hardship on them—threw all the obstacles they could in the working of the Temperance Act. The third reason was that the Canada Temperance Act embodied the principle of local option, and could only be enforced where the people decided by their votes to put it into operation. But, in most of the counties when that question came up, hardly half of the electors came out to vote, so that although it was decided by large majorities, in many cases, to apply the Act, the Act had not the real majority of the electors at its back; and no law can be enforced which has not the support of the majority. Owing to those three causes, the Act was not workable; and in almost every instance, when the question of repealing it came up the people in the counties of Ontario wiped it out by larger majorities than those by which it was carried. If we were to adopt the resolution proposed, we would be deciding to legislate without knowing whether public sentiment is yet fully ripe for prohibition. But if we adopt the amendment my hon. friend has proposed, and appoint a Committee to enquire into the facts, this House will then be in a position to legislate upon this question satisfactorily. We do not know at present whether our Local Legislatures, who are deriving quite a large revenue from the traffic—that derived by Ontario being about $300,000—would be willing to join us in enforcing a prohibitory law, which it would necessarily come within their province to do. There would be two political opinions conflicting as was the case with the Scott Act. If this committee will investigate the matter thoroughly and make a full report to this House, we will be able to pass a law which will be in the interests of the temperance cause. There is no denying that the petitions presented to this House show that the people are alive to the evils which are threatening our country from intemperance. Therefore, we ought to consider the matter well, and I believe a great majority of this House will be found voting in the interests of the temperance cause. We must fight this evil fairly and honestly. There is no use in bringing it up year after year and voting upon it without consideration; but if we have this motion carried we shall obtain the information we need, and I think all who are working in the interest of the temperance party should vote for this resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In approaching this very important subject, I feel that I am not capable of discharging my duty in proportion to the importance of the subject brought before this House. I acknowledge that there is a great deal of difficulty surrounding this matter. It is a matter which has knit itself into the social interests of the people for a very long time, but the fact that there are difficulties surrounding it is no reason to lead us not to approach the question with candour, fairness, and, above all, without any political bias. From the number of petitions which have been presented to this House during the last three weeks, it is evident, to my mind at least, that there is a strong feeling in favour of prohibition in the country from one end to the other. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) stated yesterday that these petitions were signed by the father, the mother and all the family. The fact is, no one under sixteen years of age signed these petitions, and about 2,000 petitions have been presented, signed by over 500,000 people. I think it behooves the members of this House, whether they are opposed to, or in favour of, prohibitory liquor laws, to consider this question fairly and squarely. It is a question that must be decided by the people of this country before many years elapse, and if we have prohibition approximately or remotely, it must be obtained, in my opinion, by a union on this question between the two great political parties which now divide the country upon other subjects. Therefore, it is the duty of everyone in this discussion to enter it free from any political partisanship or bias, and to approach the question in the interests of the people whom we represent. This resolution has not been brought forward by the temperance men for the purpose of compromising the Government or compromising a single member of Parliament, but it has been brought forward for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiments of the representatives of the people in regard to this vital question. Even if this resolution were to carry, I do not believe, as the hon. member for Leeds stated, that the Government would regard it as a want of confidence motion. If it were to carry, its mandate would be merely directory. True, the Government would be required to give vitality and life to the resolution at the earliest possible moment. We know that the sentiment of temperance is gaining strength in the country every day. The tide of temperance sentiment is rising, and the waves of popular opinion against the liquor traffic are making for the shore, and you may rest assured that the politician or the party who heed them not will sooner or later be overwhelmed. There must be no compromise in the settlement of this question, because a compromise of principle is a victory for the enemy. I would like to bury this traffic as the old Welsh lady said she would bury the devil, that is, with his face downwards, so that, if he came to life and tried to dig himself out he would only dig himself deeper down. This traffic is eating daily and hourly more into the vital interests of our Canadian people. So I believe it is our duty as representatives of the people, not only in a political but in a moral sense, to pass what are called moral laws if we think the interests of our constituents require them. I have presented petitions from 6,000 people from my riding and its adjacent neighbourhood, and I would be derelict in my duty if I did not express my opinion in favour of their views. But it may be asked, why do we ask for prohibition? We ask for prohibition because, in my opinion, and in the opinion of most of the people of the country, this traffic is a blighting, damning curse upon everything decent, pure and virtuous, because it is the enemy of law, rder, morality, Christianity and civilization. I make this indictment deliberately, and, having made such a sweeping charge, you will expect that I bring my evidence to prove it. I am not of the opinion which the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) expressed yesterday, when he stated that in countries where they drink a large quantity of liquor they are further advanced in civilization. If that were so, it would be advisable for the Government to encourage the consumption of a greater quantity than we are drinking to-day. Of course, that argument is not worth following. What evidence is there to show that this traffic is a blighting curse upon every thing decent, pure and virtuous? First, I take into the witness-box a man who is well known by reputation to everyone in this House, a man who occupies a prominent position in one of the public institutions of this country, and from whom I have received a letter on this subject. I have a letter from Dr. Daniel Clark, superintendent of the Toronto Insane Asylum, in which he says:

"Indirectly alcoholic habits strengthens the hereditary tendency to insanity, and the full results are an unknown quantity and cannot be expressed in figures."

This is what came under his own observation, and he gives it as his opinion that 10 per cent. of the 7,000 cases of insanity in Canada arise directly from the use of intoxicating liquors. Another testimony that I will give, equally valuable in this connection, is that of Dr. Buck, superintendent of the London Asylum, who writes to me as follows:

"I do not know that I have ever seen a case of insanity which I could say was caused by strong drink. At the same time I am as sure as I can be of anything that alcohol is one of the most potent factors in the production of mental disease; but it is not so much the alcohol drank by the patient, though this is often an important causitive agency, as that drank by his ancestors. Insanity as we see it, is largely due to heredity; but if you go back far enough, of course, it has an origin entirely apart from that. That origin I believe to have been very largely a perversion of the higher nerve centres, and nothing interferes with the healthy activity of these more than intoxicating drugs of which alchohol is the chief."

There is the testimony of another eminent man, a man who has no personal interest in expressing such an opinion, but he gives the result of his observations, the result of a number of years of study upon this question. I have a testimony from another source in our country, and I think that when the vital interests of our people are affected, it is due to the Canadian Parliament, it is due to every representative, no matter how much they may be opposed to the methods suggested to remove it, to give a thorough and candid consideration to testimonies of this kind. We have an asylum established in the riding from which my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) in the town of Orillia, county town of the hon. gentleman's riding. In that town there is an asylum for idiots, and I wrote to Dr. Beaton, superintendent of that asylum, to get the facts in connection with the causes of the idiocy of those under his charge. He says:

"My experience, and that of the leading superintendents on this continent, is that a large number of idiots are the children of drunken parents. While, on the other hand, we believe that drunkenness is the cause of physical and mental degeneracy, and that the drunkard's posterity inherits scrofulous diseases, epilepsy, nervous irritability, and, above all, moral obliquity. Therefore congenital idiocy is not the immediate legacy of the drunkard to his posterity."

But let me refer to another source of information to prove that this traffic is a curse to our country. I wrote to Mr. James Massie, warden of the Central Prison in the city of Toronto, a man who has occupied that position, I understand, since 1874, the year in which it was established. In his letter to me he says:

"Drink produces directly more inmates for our prisons, more misery, more suffering among helpless wives and innocent children, more sorrow upon parents and more depravity than anything else in our country."

Sir, that gentleman, who occupies a position which gives him the best opportunity for ascertaining the practical results of liquor drinking, states facts wholly at variance with the opinions of the hon. gentleman for Muskoka, who says that crime does not largely arise from the use of intoxicating liquors in our country. Mr. Massie sends me some statistics to show that what we have stated with reference to gaols, is true. He says that from the time the institution was established in 1874 up to the time he wrote this to me, 8,118 persons were incarcerated in the Central Prison for various crimes, and after making a careful examination of the previous habits of those parties, he found that 1,728 were temperate and 6,390 were of intemperate habits. Does that not show conclusively that intemperance is a great element in the production of crime? But, Sir, not being yet satisfied with the evidence I had received on this point, I wrote to Mr. J. O'Reilly, superintendent of the Mercer Reformatory for females, established in the city of Toronto in 1880, and he tells me that in 1884, 156 females were incarcerated in that prison, of whom 112, or 71 per cent., were intemperate. In 1885 there were committed to the prison 142, and 94 of these, or 66 per cent., were drunken women. In 1886, 123 were committed, and 78, or 64 per cent., were drunkards; and out of the whole number of 1,075 received into the institution since 1880, a similarly large proportion were invariably intemperate. Sir, here we find even women carried away from the paths of virtue and integrity, and brought down to be outcasts upon the streets, through the operation of the liquor traffic; and still we find hon. gentlemen willing to set the question of revenue over against the virtue and integrity of the women of our country. A letter from another gentleman in the city of Toronto, a gentleman particularly well known to those who come from the city of Toronto—I refer to Col. Denison, police magistrate of that city—says: In 1887 there passed through his hands 10,597 prisoners, and of that number 5,229 were drunk or disorderly. Col. Denison further says:

"One-half of the cases of assault, one-half of petty larceny, one-half of the cases of vagrancy, and a large number of other offences outside of the regular drunk and disorderly list were directly attributable to intemperance."

Sir, I have written to another gentleman who is also well known in the city of Toronto; and here let me remark that if the use of strong drink produces such ravages in the city of Toronto, the best ordered city on the continent of America, how much greater are those ravages likely to be in other large centres of our population? I wrote to Col. Grassett, chief of police in the city of Toronto, and he replies:

"Total commitments in the city in 1884-85 and 1886 were 23,912, of which 11,786 were committed for drunkenness, or 49 per cent. of the whole."

Now I will take the evidence of another gentleman in the city of Toronto, who has had control of the Toronto gaol for a number of years, and who is known by the name of Governor Green. He says that from 1884 to 1888, inclusive, there were committed to the gaol in Toronto 14,516 persons, of whom 11,208 were of intemperate habits, or 79 per cent. of the whole number. And this is his testimony, corroborating that of Colonel Denison:

"A large portion of the crime of this city is committed by parties under the influence of drink. In fact one-half of the petty larcenies, nearly all of the assaults and robberies of the person are attributable to the same cause, and certainly the amount of drunkenness prevailing, and the disorder and immorality resulting therefrom, are alarming."

Sir, let me quote one other testimony from a gentleman well known to the people of Toronto, Dr. Reilly, the resident physician in the Toronto General Hospital, who writes as follows:—

"I am sorry to say that my experience during the last twenty-one years of hospital life has been very large as regards the troubles and diseases caused by alcohol. Acute alcoholism causes acute catarrh of the stomach and the mucus membrane of the intestines, rapid coma, delirium tremens, and several forms of acute mania and temporary insanity, insomnia and epilepsy. Cases of this kind are admitted by the score for hospital treatment. A very large number of diseases admitted here are traced to intemperance."

There is other testimony in regard to the physical degeneration which this traffic brings on the people. Hundreds of diseases would be avoided by the people if they were free from the drinking habit, diseases which send people to our hospitals, poor houses and infirmaries, at the expense of the rest of the community. One more testimony I will give and I will then have done with the city of Toronto. I give the testimony of W. J. Hendry, late principal of the Victoria Industrial School for boys. He said:

"From a record I kept of the boys sent to Victoria Industrial School, I find that 68 per cent. have now, or had one or the other or both of them, parents given to the intemperate use of alcoholic drinks. It is also a sad fact that the present unfortunate condition of the lads is caused directly by the habits of their parents."

I have a letter from Miss Wright, who was matron of the Girls' Home, who makes a similar report, and I have a letter from Miss Scott, who was the secretary of the Boys' Home, giving me similar statements as to the result of the liquor traffic. When we consider all these facts in regard to the traffic and remember that they have been gathered up around one city, we can judge as to the amount of evil caused throughout the country, and the statistics that might be presented from the different centres of population. Sir, I think I have amply proven, by the most reliable testimony and by statistics of the most authentic nature, my indictment against this traffic, that it is a blighting, damning curse upon everything decent, pure and virtuous; that it is an enemy to law, order, morality, christianity and civilization. But the injury is not all in this direction. Allow me to point out the cost to the city of Toronto in dealing with police cases alone; and I call the attention of the members for that city to the calculation I have been able to make, based on the figures supplied to me. Toronto had in 1889, 200 places to sell liquor. Result: Arrest of 5,441 drunks; sent to gaol on an average of 30 days, 2,096; cost for board at 55 cents a day, $34,584; lost on wages—say $1.00 a day, $62,790; time lost by 3,345 drunks let off, $16,725; say five days for each—arresting, convicting and sending to gaol, $6,000; total, $120,099. No one looking over these figures can find any fault with the calculation, because it is based on statistics furnished by those who are actually engaged in the work. But there are many objections brought against prohibition notwithstanding this. Having established the charge I brought against the liquor traffic, I will now proceed to deal with other phases of the question from another standpoint. It is said by some people, and I believe it has been said by some hon. members who discussed the question the other evening, that, this being a moral question, we cannot make the people moral by law. The same argument can be brought against fifty Acts on the Statute-book with the same force and consistency. The statute in regard to the observance of the Lord's Day, that regarding theft or murder, and particularly the Act prohibiting the importation of immoral literature, stand in the same position. We do not profess to make a man moral by law, but we profess to assist him in maintaining his virtue and integrity: and on the same principle we wish to prohibit the importation, sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors in order to prevent those who would otherwise drink, obtaining it. Although the Government cannot make people moral by law, it is the duty of the Government to make it as difficult as possible to do wrong and as easy as possible to do right. It is the duty of the State to make the road to manhood and honour as easy as possible; to plant by the wayside flowers of hope and promise and public approbation. On the other hand it is the duty of the State to plant into the road down to licentiousness, crime and dishonour the rocks of law, and to hedge it with the brambles of public opinion, and the briars of public condemnation, and then place the citizen at the beginning of the two ways and say to him: Take your choice. It is here that the duty of the moral suasionist comes in. He can point out the difficulties placed in the way to crime and licentiousness by the Government and the facility with which the road to honour, to morality and to preferment can be travelled. It is, therefore, the duty of the State to place a premium upon virtue and a discount on crime. It is the duty of the State to remember that the unit of society is the individual, and if it wishes to build up a good society it must cultivate the institutions and customs which elevate and improve the units which constitute society. The prosperity of any country having only institutions which develop health, strength, morality and intelligence is assured. On the other hand, any country that enters into a partnership with any system or traffic which debauches public morals, destroys public health, impairs individual credit, stimulates vice and crime ere long will be a thing of the past. Home life is the keystone of our civilization. If the keystone is weakened or corrupted by any cause, or, in other words, if home life, the sacred guarden of our social fabric, is continuously breathed upon by the scorching breath of this traffic, I fear for the future of my country. It is said by some that the licensing system can accomplish all the good results we can expect. If the charges I have made against the traffic are true, and they are true, then license has been a complete failure, because all of the crimes I have enumerated have been perpetrated under it. But passing to another point, that prohibition will not prohibit, that is a question which has been brought up by some of those who have spoken on this question. If absolute prohibition is meant it is probably true, but otherwise it is not. If the law is intended to prohibit, if the machinery for the enforcement is sufficiently strong, and if the enforcement of the law is placed in the hands of executive officers appointed by the Government, there is little danger that prohibition will not prohibit. Is not the state stronger than a part of it? Any Government that cannot carry into effect a law required by the best of the people, the sooner it goes into bankruptcy the better. But we have testimony on every hand that prohibition has prohibited in some of the States in which it has been enacted, and without detaining the House, by going over many testimonies, I will read one or two of the testimonies given. Governor Dingley, formerly Speaker of the House of Representatives and Attorney General of the United States, in reply to enquiries made by Canada's Commissioners, Col. Davies and Rev. J. W. Manning, who were sent to Maine to investigate this question, said:

"Our cities and large villages where the influence of immigration is most felt are far behind the rural portions of the State in the enforcement of the law. Yet in nearly all our cities, with perhaps of two or three exceptions, the law is enforced to a great extent with evident beneficial results. The great improvement in the drinking habits of the people of this State within 30 or 40 years is so evident that no candid man who has observed or investigated the facts can deny it."

The Hon. Woodbury Davis, Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"A prohibitory law tends to make both buying and selling disreputable.

"It holds up the standard of right and puts the brand of infamy upon the wrong.

"He is a blind observer of the forces that govern in human life who does not see the moral power of penal law even when extensively violated in teaching virtue and restraining vice.

"No observing man who lived in this State for the last twenty years and has had an opportunity to know the facts, can doubt that the Maine Law has produced a hundred times more visible improvement in the character, condition and prosperity of our people than any other law that was ever enacted."

This is the opinion of one of the ablest judges in the United States and it disposes of the argument by those who say that no law can be passed by the people of Canada to assist the people to be moral and virtuous. He says that the law upholds the standard of right, and places infamy upon wrong, and in this way it throws the entire traffic into the hands of those who are infamous. I do not believe that any respectable man in the country—and there are many of them who may drink moderately—would be seen going into the back lanes and the byeways to receive a glass of liquor from the hands of those whose business was made infamous by law. It was also contended in this House, that prohibition would interfere with our individual rights. I think the hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) spoke in reference to this: he said that no majority had the right to deprive him of anything he deemed to be a natural right. To-day he withdrew to a certain extent this contention and said: Oh, yes, when a considerable majority of the people are in favour of prohibition, then it is right and just to pass a law to protect the people. That is the proper principle. The hon. gentleman expressed what is right to-day, but yesterday he expressed what was wrong in principle. The individual right has no existence only in so far as it is related to the well-being of society. What may be considered an individual right to-day may be justly and properly withdrawn to-morrow if society so decide. The Sandwich Islander may say it is his right to be a cannibal, but if he removes into another society where the laws were different for the protection of the lives of the people, that right which he said he possessed as a Sandwich Islander would have been lost to him entirely. No man has any right in this country only in so far as the exercise of the rights accords with the welfare of society, and if the exercise of a so-called right is opposed to the interest of the community, such so-called right has no existence. That is the fundamental principle of national and social custom upon which the laws of our country are based. The greatest possible good to the greatest possible number, the greatest possible protection to the greatest possible number, the greatest possible freedom compatible with the health, morals and lives of the greatest possible number; that is the fundamental principle that should underlie all the laws of all civilized countries. That is the principle involved in the License Act, which says that a tavern keeper shall not sell liquors from Saturday evening until Monday morning. That prohibition in the Act interferes with what many would call their individual liberties to drink on Saturday and Sunday, and before the prohibited hour on Monday morning. The law says a tavern-keeper cannot sell to minors, nor to Indians, and I suppose that some minors and Indians believe that their individual rights are imposed upon by this law. Suppose an individual in this city of Ottawa wished to erect a wooden building on a certain lot and contended that he had a right to do so and to spend his money in this way; it would depend entirely where he intended to erect that building, the authorities could say: If you build within the fire limits you have no right, but if you build without the fire limits you have the right, because the greatest possibly protection must be extended to your neighbours, and you cannot erect a class of building which is likely to take fire. If a man wishes to erect a slaughter house in a certain locality the health officers can say: You cannot put it there because it would endanger the health of the neighbourhood in the vicinity of your slaughter house. Thus, I might go on giving illustration after illustration to show that it is a principle recognized by every civilized Government in the world, that so-called individual rights should be restricted for the promotion of the public welfare. I wish now to say a few words in reference to the loss of revenue which might arise if a prohibitory liquor law were passed. Let me point out that this revenue is not lost, and that the prohibition of liquor will only involve a different system of collection. It may be said that the $7,000,000 of revenue from intoxicating liquor is paid by the distillers, the vendors and the importers, but after they have distributed that liquor through various parts of the country the people who use the liquor pay for it and it comes out of their pockets in the end. In reality it would only change the collecting of the duty from the importation and manufacture of liquors, to some other article which would be much more in the interests of the people, and avoid the disastrous results of the traffic. But, Sir, what is the opinion of one of the great men of England in reference to the decrease of revenue from intoxicating liquors. The late Lord Iddlesleigh, (Sir Stafford Northcote) in delivering his Budget speech some years ago in the Imperial House of Commons, referring to the loss of revenue from the decrease of duty on spirits, said:

"If the reduction of revenue derived from spirits to a material and considerable change in the habits of the people and to increasing habits of temperance and abstinence from the use of ardent spirits, I venture to say that the amount of wealth such a change would bring to the nation would utterly throw in the shade the amount of revenue that is now derived from the spirit duty; and we should not only see with satisfaction a diminution of revenue from such a cause, but we should find in various ways that the exchequer would not suffer."

There was the expressed opinion of a man who had upon his shoulders the responsibility of raising all the moneys necessary to meet the liabilities of England. I think the principle enunciated here is applicable to us and that we can apply it to this country. If this degrading traffic in liquor is removed and the country become more sober, the people become more industrious, the application of their skill and energy be more assiduously applied to productive sources of national wealth, we shall have coming into this country much more on the one hand than we could possibly lose on the other. Sir Wilfred Lawson, an eminent commoner in England, congratulated the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon his able speech and the soundness of his conclusions. He said, and his observations are worthy of attention:

"The Government had that night exhibited commendable moral courage, and shown that they would not consider private interests, but only regard the great interests of the nation. He was glad also to find the right hon. gentleman exploding the nonsensical notion that the revenue would suffer if the people would drink less. The mode in which we raised one-third of our revenue was something contemptible. A great swarm of collectors was, as it were, sent forth in the shape of publicans and beer sellers, commissioned to gather in from the people the money required for the national exchequer."

That, Sir, was that great man's opinion in regard to this question, and I think I can reiterate it with reference to Canada. If a prohibitory liquor law were passed to-morrow, we should suffer only a temporary inconvenience while the general result would be a great increase in our prosperity. But let me set down Canada's liquor loss and gain account, let me put on one side what the country is losing through this traffic, and on the other side the loss of revenue that would follow its prohibition, and see how the account stands. According to the estimate made by the Hon. Geo. E. Foster, Finance Minister, Canada's annual liquor bill amounts to $33,000,000; then there is the waste of 86,000,000 lbs. of grain last year, amounting to $1,000,000; loss of time of 40,000 drunkards, 25 days each at $1 per day, $1,000,000; waste of time by 15,000 vendors of liquor at $300 a year, $4,500,000; shortening the life of each drunkard of the 8,000 who die annually, say five years each, which equals 40,000 years of human life at $300 a year, $12,000,000; loss of time by criminals, say $500,000; and extra for administration of justice in the various departments, $500,000, which makes the total on the debit side of the account $52,500,000. Credit by the revenue obtained from the traffic, $7,000,000, leaving a net loss to the people of this country of $45,500,000 a year. And remember that this is without taking into consideration one vicious habit or one departure from virtue or from religious or moral principle. But, Sir, we have tried in a great many ways to avoid these evils. We have tried licenses for many years; we have tried the Dunkin Act; we have tried the Scott Act; we are trying the Local Option Act at the present time; but they have failed to accomplish the end we have in view; and, as Lord Brougham says:

"To lessen its force and contract its sphere no means must be spared, if we really mean to stay the progress of destitution and crime. The law-giver is imperatively bound to lend his aid when it appears manifest that no palliatives can avail."

We have tried, Sir, almost every palliative, and they have all failed, and now we come to the fountain head of power and the law-giver to lend his aid to stop the operation of this traffic. Now, in concluding, let me state the conclusions at which I have arrived on this subject, and I challenge any member who may be opposed to prohibition—and many people are honestly opposed to it—to controvert the position I lay down: It is neither just nor politic for Canada to afford legal protection and sanction to any traffic or system that tends to increase crime, to waste the national resources of wealth, to corrupt the social habits, and to destroy the health and lives of the people. The traffic in intoxicating liquors as common beverages is inimical to the true interest of individuals and destructive to the order and well-being of society. The history and results of all past legislation in regard to the liquor traffic abundantly prove that it is impossible satisfactorily to limit or regulate a system so essentially mischievous in its tendencies. The legislative prohibition of the liquor traffic is perfectly compatible with rational liberty and with all the claims of justice and legitimate commerce. No consideration of private gain or public revenue can justify the continuance of a system so utterly wrong in principle, suicidal in policy and disastrous in results. All good citizens, without regard to class, sectarian or party considerations, should unite to procure an enactment prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the attentive hearing you have given me.

Mr. TAYLOR. I beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. McNeill, in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" in the original motion, and all the words of the proposed amendment be struck out, and the following words added instead thereof: this House renews the expression of its opinion, made in preceding Parliaments, as to the expediency of prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes, but declares that, in a question of such far-reaching importance, affecting long-established social and trade interests, involving the loss of many millions of necessary revenue and the consequent imposition of new and heavy taxation, it is essential to the effectual working and permanent maintenance of such an enactment that the electorate of Canada should first pronounce a definite opinion upon the subject at the polls.

Being a practical man, I believe in approaching great questions in a practical manner. The resolution submitted by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has been before this House on two previous occasions—in 1887, and again in 1889. In 1887 several amendments were moved to the main motion. Against those amendments I voted, save and except one. Then, in 1889 I moved an amendment in the direction that I believed the people of this country should go in grappling with this question if they meant to deal fairly with it, that is, in the direction of compensation to manufacturers. At the beginning of this session a meeting of the Dominion Alliance was called, which was attended by several members of the House who were not members of the legislative committee of the Alliance; and though we had no voice in the framing of the resolution that was to be brought before the House, my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) took the position there that the members of the House favourable to prohibition should be consulted upon the form it should take, so that it should be made free from any political aspect that could cause embarrassment to the Government. The members of the legislative committee did not see fit to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from Yarmouth, but insisted on their bald resolution as they amended it, not as they presented it to this House on two former occasions, for they cut it in two: but the amendment I have now placed in your hands, Sir, is the resolution that should come before this House. The resolution declares that it is expedient to prohibit the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. That resolution, if carried, in my opinion, is a direction to the House, which the Government would be obliged to act upon the next day: yet the mover states it is his opinion that if that resolution be carried, a notice of three or four or five years should be given those engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor to quit the business. The resolution, however, does not say anything of the kind, but it says that it is expedient to prohibit the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor, and at the meeting of the Alliance to which I have referred, the opinion was in favour of immediate action and immediate legislation. Now, if we are to deal with this subject at all, we should deal with it in a practical way. We should say in our resolution what we mean. Many members of this House, many members of the Alliance committee state than when a question dealing with this subject comes before the House, the question of compensation is one of detail. I have always held that every Government in this country has been a partner with the manufacturers of liquor in that manufacture. The people, through the Government, have been partners: we permit the manufacturers to carry on their business, and we take a certain percentage of the profits, which we employ in erecting public buildings, constructing railways and canals and other public improvements. That partnership has been running from year to year: and if to-day we wish to dissolve that partnership, it is but honest that we should go to these people who have erected plant to carry on their business, and say to them: Your buildings are worth as much to you in carrying out some other branch of industry, your land is worth as much to you for other purposes, but we have on our Statute-books to-day an Act declaring that if any person has in his possession machinery for the manufacture of liquor, that machinery must be destroyed unless he has a license from the Government to continue using it. Now, suppose we pass a prohibitory liquor law. It will then be the duty of this Government to say to the manufacturer, that the machinery employed in the manufacture of liquor must be destroyed. But, if we are going to dissolve the partnership and stop the manufacture of liquor, we should meet the manufacturers half way and pay a percentage of the loss on the machinery which has to be destroyed. The press representatives, at a meeting of the Alliance, took the liberty of saying for me, that I am in favour of compensating the liquor dealers. My resolution last year, my amendment of 1889, was to compensate manufacturers only. I have not in my county any manufacturers of liquor, but a great many hotel keepers. Some people go so far as to say the hotel keepers should be compensated. I do not think so. I do not believe that the travelling in this country is on a liquor basis. The hotels are built for the purpose of accommodating the travelling public. Let us do away with the sale of liquor and travelling will continue, and there will be just as much business for hotels without as with liquor. Therefore, hotel keepers have no right to compensation. I believe, however, the manufacturers, who have entered into partnership with the people of this country, and the Government of this country, if we are to enact a prohibitory law, should be treated fairly, so that they may not have any rights or grievances should this Parliament forbid the manufacture of liquor. I hold that view, and have always held it. Other hon. gentlemen go further, and say compensation should reach all the way down the line. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) asks that a committee be formed to gather certain information. That information, I believe, would be of great practical benefit in dealing with this question in a practical, intelligent manner. So far as I am concerned personally, I passed a prohibitory law some twenty years ago, and have lived up to it ever since; and I think what is good for the individual would be good for the country. Yet I will quarrel with no one holding contrary opinions, but if we want to have a prohibitory law a success we must have behind it the strong moral sentiment of the majority of the people. The Scott Act was enacted in many communities where it was carried by the popular vote, but we know it was not a success in its enforcement.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. TAYLOR. Because the strong moral sentiment of the people was not behind it to back it up.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). What about politics?

Mr. TAYLOR. Perhaps politics entered into it, as I believe it does into this question, very largely. I complained, as I had a right to do at the meeting of the Alliance, a few weeks ago, with reference to the electoral address published by that society and distributed throughout my constituency during the late elections. That address did injustice to myself and many other hon. members of this House by publishing what professed to be a prohibition record of the House of Commons of Canada in its sixth Parliament, and among those voting against prohibition my name appears. Now, I did not vote against prohibition. My amendment to the motion of my hon. friend from Lanark was in favour of prohibition, and of course it did not carry, and I voted then with the hon. member for Brockville in favour of prohibition as soon as the country was ripe for its enforcement. Yet this fly-sheet was distributed stating that I voted against prohibition, and I could name two or three hon. gentlemen who are mentioned as having voted for prohibition yet who voted against the amendment I moved and against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brockville, and who would have voted against the main motion had it been put. My hon. friend from North Leeds (Mr. Ferguson) is entered on that sheet as having voted against prohibition, and it appears by the records of the House that he was not here when the vote was taken. I also noticed the names of other hon. gentlemen incorrectly put down as having voted against prohibition. Whether that was done for political effect or not I will not say, but I know it was used against me in my election and did me considerable harm amongst some of the leading temperance people. You can go, Sir, through the journals of this House, and you will find that every vote I have given since I have been in this House has been in the direction of promoting the temperance cause. We should deal with this question in a practical way. If these petitions represent the will of a substantial majority of the people, then it is our duty to pass a prohibition law. I think the proper way would be to submit this question to the people, as I proposed doing in 1889, that it should be submitted at the next general election. My view then was, as it is now, that, in voting for a candidate, whether Grit or Tory, there should be a ballot for the candidate, but that this question should be removed from the political arena, and there should be a second ballot for or against prohibition. The amendment moved by my hon. friend the member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), deals with some questions on which perhaps the people of this country ought to receive information before voting on this question, but these facts and figures could be all brought out before submitting the question to the people to vote upon. But I think, if the temperance people of this country want prohibition, as we do, it is the duty of those who have the best interests of the people at heart to so deal with this question that, when we get prohibition, we can keep it and make it a success. I think, before we pass any such legislation, we should have an expression of the voice of the people from one end of the country to the other. Then, having a majority of the people behind us, the measure can be made a success; but if we have only one-third or one-fourth of the people to support us, it will react, as the Scott Act reacted, and will prove a failure as the Scott Act proved a failure. I have submitted the amendment to the amendment, but at the same time there are some references made in the amendment moved by my hon. friend the member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) as to a committee to gather information that I do not think any hon. member here to-day is in possession of, and that I would like to be possessed of in order to discuss the question intelligently in the House and in the country, which I should like to see adopted. While I favour the amendment of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), I do not think it goes quite far enough. I have, therefore, moved the amendment to the amendment and hope it will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to know from the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, whether he proposes by his motion that a plébiscite should be had, because his motion is somewhat ambiguous. It concludes thus:

"It is essential to the effectual working and permanent maintenance of such an enactment that the electorate of Canada should first express an opinion at the polls."

The electorate may do that at a general election or by a direct vote on the subject. I should like to know which the hon. gentleman intends, and I should like to see the resolution altered so as to express what he means.

Mr. TAYLOR. The motion speaks for itself, and if that motion meets with the approval of the majority of the House, then the other question will be one of the details to be dealt with by the House. I do not see that we can put it in any other way. I had in the motion the words "at a general election," but my seconder objected to that, and, to meet his views, I crossed it out. So we will leave that to be dealt with afterwards, if the amendment meets the approval of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman had made it clear that this was to be submitted to the people, I would have supported his amendment, but I do not intend to practise any deception upon the electors, and so I will not support it. If the hon. gentleman will make this a motion of direct appeal to the electorate, I am ready to support his proposition, but a motion that this subject is to stand over for five years until there is a general election, I am not prepared to support, and it is one the public will not be satisfied with.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to say in explanation, and in modification of what my hon. friend opposite has said, that there was no desire on my part to deceive the people when an amendment was suggested. I stated to my constituents that I would be prepared to support a resolution referring this matter to the people at once—and I am perfectly prepared to support such a resolution—and expressed my views to my hon. friend, saying I would prefer to support a resolution leaving the matter to the people at once.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). All the House has to do is to vote down this resolution, and then another amendment can be proposed expressing the views which the hon. gentleman entertains, and which I and many others on this side of the House entertain. I do not admit that it is an un-British or unconstitutional proceeding to refer a matter of this kind directly to the people of the country. I admit that it is an undesirable course to take in the majority of questions, because there is no difficulty in the majority of instances in enforcing a measure which is placed on the Statute-book. But this would be a sumptuary law, and it requires the general co-operation of the community to give it effect. I do not think any greater misfortune could befall the cause of total abstinence than placing on the Statute-book a measure which would be inoperative. I think such a course would do more to retard the progress of temperance principles than anything else that could possibly transpire. I think we would have in the Dominion at large precisely the same experience as the people of New Brunswick had shortly before New Brunswick became a member of this Confederation. There is no propriety in practising any imposition upon ourselves by supposing that we will put this at rest as far as the people are concerned. If the people of the country will assume the responsibility of declaring in favour of a prohibitory measure, I am prepared to assist in putting it on the Statute-book, and inserting in that measure all the provisions necessary to make it effective and operative: but this amendment which the hon. gentleman has moved will not serve that purpose. The question should be put before the electors, a question which I say is peculiar in its character, differing from almost every other question we are called upon in this House to consider, which requires the active co-operation of the people to make it effective, which is not necessary in many other measures in the same way or to the same extent. Therefore, I am not prepared to support this legislation without the assurance that the people generally desire it. Personally I favour it, but I am perfectly certain that the passage of a measure by the House is not of itself sufficient. But, besides this amendment to the amendment, there has been an amendment placed in your hands by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), asking that a question affecting the revenues of this country should be referred to a select committee. Now, there are sitting opposite to me a number of gentlemen who have been entrusted by the people of this country, by His Excellency, with the sanction and support so far, of the people of this country, with the responsibility of carrying on the Government of this country. It is the duty of the Ministers to submit to this House ways and means for the maintenance of the credit of this country, and the payment of the expenses of the Government. I am not prepared, as a private member of this House, to permit these gentlemen to shift their responsibility from their shoulders to mine, or from their shoulders to the shoulders of a special committee who have not been charged by the Crown with the duties that were devolved upon them. Why, Sir, there is not one member of the Administration on that committee, there is not a member of the Administration who is ready to take the responsibility of investigating this subject as a member of that committee, and the odium, if there be odium in dealing with this question. Now, I think that is a most unconstitutional proceeding, a most improper proceeding. If these hon. gentlemen have not the courage or have not the ability—and I am not charging them with wanting ability to deal with this subject—then I say they ought not sit where they are. The Minister of Finance has himself brought this question before the House: he has over and over again declared to this House and to this country that the question of the revenue was not one that he was called upon to consider in connection with the question of total prohibition: that if the people of this country sustained him in that belief ten years ago, if they would sustain such a measure as prohibition, he was prepared to carry that measure and to adopt some other means of meeting the public credit and expenses of Government in this country. The hon. gentleman has not declared to this House that his views have undergone any change: he has not stated to this House that he is opposed to this policy of prohibition, which, for a long time, he advocated: he has not stated to this House that he will have any difficulty, as Finance Minister, in meeting the financial requirements of the country, if such a measure as this were carried. He has made no such declaration. On what ground, then, is this House called upon to deal with the subject and to consider the question of ways and means, when the Finance Minister himself has not said one word showing that he would be at all embarrassed or that he sees any obstacle in the way of meeting the financial requirements of the country in case this measure of prohibition is carried? I know no reason why this amendment should be proposed. I know no reason why this House should transfer the responsibility and the duties that they have bound themselves to discharge, from the shoulders of the Government to the shoulders of a special committee. Why, Sir, I am under the impression that that amendment was drawn up by a member of the Government. I would like to know, whether the old blunderbuss was not loaded by some Minister and given to the member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) to fire off in the House.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. No member of the Government, and no other member of the House, has known anything about this amendment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No doubt the members of the Government will resent the imputation upon their capacity and upon their courage that is involved in that amendment. How is it that the First Minister is sitting here and has not indignantly called upon the House to vote down that amendment? The hon. gentleman is now prepared to issue a commission of lunacy against the Administration and to take charge of their functions. I am perfectly certain that the Minister feels himself equal to the occasion still, and if that be so, why should the Government not indignantly repudiate the amendment which the hon. member for Ottawa has placed in your hands and upon which he asks this House to vote? Sir, we have responsible government in this country, or are supposed to have, or ought to have. Our constitution requires it, and while it may be, to some extent, a stretch of imagination to say that it has been fully and fairly carried out, yet the Government have not gone so far as to say: We will stay where we are, we will take no risks and we will transfer to various special committees the duty and the obligation that rest upon our shoulders. I do not think that the House will be prepared to go that far. Notwithstanding the vote last evening, which led to the singing of a prayer on behalf of Her Majesty from quarters where I am afraid it will not always be very efficacious, still, hon. gentlemen might have saved their anxiety in this House, and I say that I do not think this House will go so far as to repudiate the principle of ministerial responsibility and to undertake to conduct the financial affairs of this country, as they are conducted by the House of Representatives at Washington, by special committees appointed for the purpose. Now, I think that the House is entitled to hear from the Minister of Finance. We heard from the hon. member who moved the original resolution yesterday a speech that savored, it was said, of a good deal of cold water and a very little spirit. I do not know whether that is a just criticism, but I do know that if the Government undertook to support this amendment, to relieve themselves of all responsibility, and to ask a special committee of the House to undertake to show how the ways and means are to be found for the carrying on the Government of this country in case of prohibition, then they will have exhibited indeed a very little spirit, and very little regard for those constitutional principles which are supposed to obtain in this country. Sir, I shall vote against this amendment to the amendment, and I shall vote against the amendment, and I shall favour an amendment to the original proposition referring this question directly to the electorate of this country at a very early day, at as early a day as the public convenience will warrant; and if the public desire prohibition, legislation shall be based upon the results of the decision of the electors themselves. Sir, the right hon. gentleman informed the House not long ago that he was so anxious to know the opinion of the people of this country, so anxious to have them assume the responsibility of the public policy that the Government intended to pursue, that he found it necessary to dissolve Parliament before the period had expired for which it was elected, and to take the opinion of the country upon a question still in the clouds, take the opinion of the country upon a question upon which he had not yet formed very clear opinions himself, or if he had, had not enunciated them very clearly to the electors, because they were differently interpreted by his friends in every constituency in the country. Well, now, if the hon. gentleman felt that that was so upon a question upon which his opinions were still in a nebulous form, it is still more important upon a question upon which opinions must necessarily be well defined, and whatever may be the opinions of this House, it is most important that the public should be decidedly in favour of the measure if such a measure is to be put upon the Statute-book. I think that a reference ought to be had, that there ought to be no doubt, or difficulty, or dispute with regard to the propriety of referring this question directly to the electors: and that being so, it is not in the public interest, it is not in the interest of prohibition, it is not in the interest of the temperance habits of the community which we all desire to sustain and encourage, that either the amendment to the amendment, or the amendment, or the motion itself, should be carried.

Mr. SPROULE. It now being six o'clock, and several members wishing to speak upon this question, I move the adjournment of the debate.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House divided on the motion to adjourn the debate (Mr. Sproule).

Motion to adjourn debate negatived.

Mr. TROW. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has not voted.

Mr. MULOCK. I had paired with the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White); otherwise, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for Guysboro' did not vote.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for Cardwell did not vote.

Mr. SPROULE. In continuing this debate, I may say, by way of parenthesis, that my conduct had no political significance. Owing to the fact that I had a large deputation down here from my county, and that, necessarily, I was obliged to give some time to them, and that a large deputation was here, comprising about 200 men from all parts of Ontario, I thought this was too important a question for the discussion to proceed with so many absentees who desired to show attention to their constituents from various parts of the province. I thought I was justified in asking the adjournment of the debate until there was a full House to hear the discussion that would take place. I regret that the decision has been otherwise, but it is not my province to reflect on the conduct of the House. One motion and two amendments on this question are before the House at this time. The first is in the following language:—

An amendment has been moved on the line that we are not in possession of sufficient data or information to arrive at a correct judgment, and to say whether or not the time has arrived, or whether or not it is expedient in the interests of the country that we should give effect to the opinion expressed in the resolution. An amendment to the amendment has also been moved to the effect that we should carry out the resolution moved when we have obtained an expression of the opinion of the electors, and that there should be a plebiscite. In my opinion the situation at the present time calls on us to exercise our judgment on the original resolution, and, therefore, for a short time I will direct my attention to it. The question is: Has the time arrived in the history of the country when the sentiment of the people will sustain a prohibitory liquor law? It would be necessary, in order to complete this investigation, to make an examination at whatever sources we take our information. What source would enable us to-day to come to an honest conclusion as to whether or not that time has or has not arrived in the history of Canada? On what basis are we asked to say that the time has arrived? By those hon. gentlemen who have advocated this bald resolution it is claimed that the large number of petitions presented to the House since the opening of the session, containing as they do thousands of names, afford evidence that the country is ripe for this question. I beg leave to take issue with those hon. gentlemen who hold that opinion. While I have every respect for the petitions that are sent to Parliament, while I pay due attention to the requests of the people as expressed in those petitions, I must, after a careful analysis of these petitions, come to the conclusion that they do not convey the sentiments of the large majority of the people who would be responsible for the carrying out of such a law, were it enacted. Why do I say so? Because I find these very numerously-signed petitions are signed not only by the female portion of the community, but by the children down to infants. In many cases the children are so young they have not been baptised and given a name with which to go through life, and therefore the petition is signed baby so-and-so and infant so-and-so, without attaching a name. Is that correct information on which to base a judgment as to whether the people are ripe for the proposed measure? I have no doubt the petitions were numerous and numerously signed, but I take issue with those who hold that they express the sentiments of the vast majority of the people who are responsible for the carrying out of a law that may be put upon the Statute-book. Another fact that makes it easy to get petitions very numerously signed is this: The church is very likely behind the petitions, and requests of the church are often readily assented to without the people analyzing the request contained in the petitions. I believe it is so in this case. I took the trouble to go over some of the petitions, and I found that only one out of twelve or thirteen names were those of ratepayers, the majority of names being those of women and children. With the large number of signatures thus reduced it will be seen how far public sentiment is prepared to sustain the resolution, I mean by the rate-payers of the country. While I hold that the people who feel the baneful effects of that traffic or any others have a right to express their opinions, yet it is incumbent on this Legislature to take into account the class of individuals signing the petitions, and what their position is, and whether it is a guarantee for the effectual carrying out of the principle to be embodied in the law. Then those who say we are to accept the petitions as conclusive evidence go even further and say: We must accept the petitions because of the votes given on the Scott Act. That Act was carried in sixty-eight constituencies, and it was carried after very strenuous arguments by a very large and influential class of the community, including most of the ministers of the Gospel.

They believed that prohibition as provided in the Scott Act would be sufficient for the wants of the people, and that if carried it was likely to be a success. There were those who held a different opinion, but unfortunately their position was so unpopular that they did not like to appear on the platforms against the class of individuals who were urging the Act, even to speak in support of their honest convictions, and the result was that the Scott Act was carried in sixty-eight counties. After a few years they found, exactly as was predicted, that the sentiment of the country was not ripe for such a measure, and to-day we find that the law is not sustained. Then those parties who were largely engaged in carrying out the Scott Act set themselves to work to find reasons why the law was a failure, instead of the success expected. Many of them shut their eyes to the fact, which was patent to every reasonable man, that the great moral sentiment of the country was not ready to sustain that law upon the principle on which it was based when it was carried in these constituencies. It was, therefore, a failure, and in a few years when the people had an opportunity of expressing their verdict a second time, the revulsion of feeling was so great, that the Act was defeated by overwhelming majorities in constituencies which had previously adopted it by majorities of hundreds. That is evidence that the prediction of those who held that the country was not ripe for such a measure were absolutely correct, and that the judgment of those who contended that the country was ready for the Scott Act was certainly very defective, to say the least. The fact that the Scott Act was defeated in almost every county in which the repeal vote was taken is strong evidence, to my mind, that the country is not now ripe for absolute prohibition. It has been stated that the circumscribed area in which this Scott Act was in force was one of the reasons it could not be enforced. That was also said when the Dunkin Act was voted on. I remember when, in the County of Grey, the Dunkin Act was carried by over 900 majority, which was surely large enough to indicate that public sentiment was in its favour. I held then, as I hold to-day, that the sentiment of the country was not prepared to sustain such a law, and we soon found out in that county that this Act did not promote respect for the license laws of the country. We found that liquor was taken into private homes, and opened out in hundreds of places where it was never known before. The result of the law in our county was that there was a greater demoralization among the people than we had ever experienced in the previous history of that county. After several years of experience of this kind, it was not to be wondered at that when the Scott Act was submitted to the county the people refused to pass it; and those who were in its favour were unable to get sufficient signatures to cause the Act to be submitted to the people. In the counties surrounding my constituency, Bruce to the west, Cardwell to the south of us, and Simcoe to the east, the Scott Act was adopted, and we found that in less than a year afterwards there was a complete disregard for law in these counties. There was, in fact, neither law nor order prevailing, and the adoption of the Act brought about litigation, contention, disrespect for law, perjury, which sent people to the penitentiary, complete demoralization to a large class of the community, and the result was that when the Act was submitted for repeal it was abolished in every one of these counties. In view, therefore, of this experience we have a right to carefully examine the question and to ascertain upon some other ground than the number of petitions presented, whether or not the sentiment of the country is ripe for prohibition to-day. An examination of the whole question leads me to the conviction that the country is not now ready for the enforcement of a prohibition law. Another obstacle which we meet with in carrying on this debate is that if we express our honest opinion, although we may be in favour of prohibition when prohibition is surrounded by these safeguards which we believe will prepare the country to sustain it, we are branded by the temperance alliances as opponents to prohibition. We are, in fact, not allowed to fearlessly express what we honestly believe, under penalty of incurring the displeasure of the Dominion Alliance. In proof of this I can point to a fly-sheet which I now hold in my hand, and which was sent out by the Dominion Alliance during the last elections. In this fly-sheet the electors are asked to watch the candidates in the various constituencies, to oppose every man who is not in favour of prohibition, and then the Dominion Alliance gives what it is pleased to call a record of the votes of the members of the late Parliament on this question. Every hon. member, no matter how strong his convictions were in favour of the principle of prohibition, who could not see eye to eye with the Alliance that the country was now ripe for prohibition, was branded as being against that principle. The prohibitionists who honestly believe that, if prohibition were carried out, it should be carried out upon certain considerations, such as compensation, the giving of reasonable time to those engaged in the traffic to get out of it, and allowing time for the country to prepare for the loss of revenue which would be sustained, were put down as opposed to prohibition, although they might have been strongly in favour of it, though not in favour of its immediate enforcement. I have a list here of the members so denounced. It is too long to read, but it includes such names as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, my hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson), my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Roome), my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor); men who are total abstainers, men whose lives have been an example of prohibition, men who advocate the principle as strongly as any one in this House; these gentlemen were branded as opponents of prohibition, and the temperance people of the country were counselled to vote against them. Is this fair to hon. members of this House who have endeavoured to grapple with the question, not upon political but upon moral and conscientious grounds, and to exclude from their minds political alliances and political influences when dealing with a great question which so affects the interests of the country? I say that such action on the part of the Dominion Alliance is neither fair nor just. We have this question now brought before the House under a somewhat different phase from that of last year. Then a resolution was submitted to us saying that in the opinion of the House the country was ripe for prohibition, but that the law should be enforced by the Dominion Government. That complicated the question, because it raised a conflict of authority between the Dominion and the Provincial Governments. We all know it is the duty of the Provincial Governments to enforce the criminal law of the country, and if the Dominion Government assumed the duty of enforcing this law they would conflict with provincial rights, so that thus the Dominion Alliance complicated the question, made it difficult to deal with, and raised other issues not easy of settlement in the future. It was held by some that when that resolution was introduced there was different aims in view; some pointed out that when the Scott Act was in force the Provincial Government—I speak of the Province of Ontario, with which I am best acquainted—never attempted to enforce this law. Why? Because they had a License Act that gave them a revenue of nearly $400,000 a year, and, therefore, they did not feel justified in abolishing that source of revenue. In addition to that they had a class of men called license commissioners and inspectors who were very important political agents through the country whenever an election contest was going on, and they, therefore, did not like to weaken their standing by endeavouring to enforce the Scott Act. In other words, these officers exhibited a supreme disregard for the enforcement of the law in the Scott Act counties, notwithstanding that they drew their salaries from the Provincial Government every year for looking after a license law that was not in existence. Now, it was believed that the Provincial Government was not in favour of supporting the law because it interfered with one of their means of raising a revenue; it was doing away with the work performed by a very important class of their friends, the license commissioners and the license inspectors; and if we had a prohibitory liquor law passed by this House, one of the strongest reasons which might induce me to support it would be that it would do away with that class of people whom we have found everywhere on public platforms, not sustaining the principles of prohibition, but the principles of the Mowat Government and the license system whether it be good or bad. Now, we are asked to pass the bald and bare resolution that, in the opinion of this House, the country is ripe for prohibition, and the question arises whether that is the case or not. What would immediate prohibition mean? It would mean this: If this resolution were carried in this House, it would be a direct mandate to the Government to introduce a law to carry out the wish of this House as expressed in the resolution, and the Government would have to do so. That is the only constitutional course the Government could take in the event of this motion being carried. What would that mean? It would mean that the Government would be brought face to face with the obligation to introduce a law which, by one swoop, would do away with six or seven millions of the revenue of the country; and that must be provided for, whether it comes from this or from some other source. In addition to that, they would be doing away with an important means possessed by the Provincial Governments for raising the necessary revenue to carry on provincial affairs; because, if my memory serves me, the Province of Ontario raises a revenue of $450,000 a year from licenses, and a prohibitory liquor law would do away with that. Thus it would not only cripple the financial position of the Government here, but also that of every province of the Dominion. Now, would the provinces submit to this? Would they not consider it a direct interference with the right bestowed upon them by the British North America Act to impose license fees on every man engaged in this trade, for the purpose of raising a revenue to carry on the affairs of the province? I think many would hold that contention, and the chances are that we should have litigation over the question. Now, it is the part of business men to deal with all questions of this kind on business principles. We cannot say, as some have said with regard to unrestricted reciprocity: Give us the power to get unrestricted reciprocity; we are not going to tell you how we propose to make up the revenue which would be lost thereby, but we will tell you how when we get it. I think the practical business man of the world wants to look farther than that; he wants to see where the revenue is going to come from, so that the country will not feel the financial strain of the sudden loss of six or seven million dollars a year; and if this question is laid before the country fairly, I do not believe the sober, fair-minded portion of the electorate, either in Provincial or Dominion affairs, will be prepared to say that the country is ready to-day to pass an unconditional prohibitory liquor law, which destroys such an enormous amount of revenue, and make it up in some other way, without feeling the financial strain which would result to be almost intolerable. In saying that, I leave out of consideration the question as to whether the country is ripe for such a law, and I think I am voicing the sentiments of the majority of the members of this House in saying that it is not ripe. I agree with the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment to the amendment, that perhaps a plebiscite would give us a more accurate insight into the sentiment of the country than we now possess; but still I feel that there is something rather repugnant to our ideas of responsible government in such a proposition, and therefore I do not exactly favour it. But if we had some expression of opinion from the people, either direct or indirect, that would give us a correct idea of what their feeling is by a large majority, then Parliament I believe would be prepared to carry out the people's will, and bear the consequences whatever they might be. There are some, however, who, while they believe in prohibition, hold that in order to be effective it should be accompanied by compensation; and whether that is agreeable to others or not, it is my view. If you want to pass a law of this kind, which will destroy the property of a great many people, and if you want the law to be respected, you will have to create a healthy sentiment behind the law; and in order to do that you must avoid the possibility of a grievance being brought about by its enactment. Now, would there be a grievance in this case? If we attempted to destroy the property of such large firms as Gooderham & Worts, Labatt, Seagram and others, who have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in plant under the sanction of the law, without giving compensation, the natural result would be to create a grievance which would be largely instrumental in preventing the effectual carrying out of the law. What illustrations have I to prove that that would be the case? We have the very best illustrations in the efforts made to enforce the Scott Act. Those efforts involved the destruction of the property of many men, which excited sympathy for them among the people, which interfered seriously with the carrying out of the law, and in many parts of the country we had a very disastrous state of affairs. So it would be in the case of this law. If we want to enforce it and make it successful we must do away with every chance of a grievance, so that it will have the unanimous support of the people: and then, and not till then, it can be enforced. There are those who hold that we have power to enforce a law whether there is a sentiment in favour of it or not: but if we look to history for illustrations of the contrary view, we shall find plenty of them. I need only point you to one illustration which must be patent to every one, that is, the doing away with slavery in the British domains and in the United States. Britain declared the time had arrived when in the interest of humanity we should do away with slavery: but we do not believe we have a right to destroy men's property or vested rights without giving them compensation, and when it is necessary in the interests of the whole people that we should destroy their property, the equitable course is to give them compensation for it. Therefore, Britain virtually bought out those who had their money invested in slavery: and what was the result? The sentiment was unanimously sustained, and wherever slavery was abolished in that way very little trouble followed. People settled down to the new condition of affairs and were satisfied: there were no grievances: there was no need for sympathy with the people whose property had been taken away, because they were compensated for it, and the result was a great success. On the other hand, look at the result of the abolition of slavery by the United States on the other principle, by the force of law alone. They said that, as a nation, having power to do away with slavery, we will pass that law and enforce it, whether agreeable or disagreeable to the majority or minority of our subjects: and they did pass that law. They passed it, and were compelled to support it by one of the most expensive civil wars ever known in the history of the world—a war which cost them lots of money and millions of lives, which wrought destruction to thousands of homes and left in its wake ranklings that will not die out for the next hundred years. Do we find that law respected in the South to-day? No; in the hearts of the descendants of the people whose property was taken from them by that law, we find the rankling feeling prevails that great injustice was done them, and that feeling prevents that law being a success. Do we find, after twenty-one years have passed since slavery was abolished by force of arms, that reconciliation has taken place? No, on the contrary, we find the feeling of enmity is as strong in the South to-day as on the day the law was forced upon them. A great problem has been created by virtue of the means taken to accomplish that one act, which the American people thought should be accomplished in the interests of humanity, and that problem will not be solved in the present or succeeding generation. I say that is a parallel case. Though on a much larger scale, it is a fair illustration of what is likely to happen in this country if you destroy men's property by force of a law in which they may or may not believe, but under which vested rights have grown up and property has been created which would be destroyed without compensation. The calculation given by an hon. gentleman who spoke before recess, showed that in one year the Dominion was subjected to an expense of over $50,000,000 on account of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, which large sum would be saved annually if we had a prohibitory law. Therefore, if for no other reason but economy, we ought to be ready to grapple with this question, provided we can raise sufficient to compensate those engaged in the trade. Such compensation would be only an expenditure of one or two years, and if we accept the calculation given us, it would be in the interests of the country that we should incur that expense and do away with a great evil, and at the same time effect this saving of $50,000,000 for all time in the future. If we are prepared to pass this unconditional resolution of prohibition, we ought to be prepared to couple with it some fair measure of compensation. We ought to be prepared to carry that law into effect and at the same time reconcile those interested, and thus avoid building up a grievance which might prevent the successful carrying out of the law by rendering a unanimous sentiment in its favour impossible. There can be no sympathy with law-breakers when we know they have been compensated for the loss they sustained by the law. For these reasons, I hold that if we are prepared to pass the original resolution, we should be prepared to accompany it with the principle of compensation. Now, an amendment has been offered in the direction of obtaining more information on which to base our judgment. I am very strongly in favour of that amendment. Though there are many features about it which I do not admire, and though in some directions it goes a great deal too far, it has at least this one merit: that it will give us data on which to form a conclusion. When discussing questions of trade and commerce or the labour problem, we require statistics, and the labour unions require statistics to show the trend of public sentiment and enable a proper judgment to be arrived at. We have not in this question sufficient or reliable data on which to base our decision as to whether the country is, or is not, ripe for unconditional prohibition, and I am, therefore, in favour of the amendment which seeks to stave off a settlement of the question only for a time in order that we may be able to deal with it more satisfactorily later. Great problems are not decided in a day. It is the usual course of Parliament not to get rid of a grievance by one fell coup, but to proceed gradually in touch with public sentiment. We have an illustration of that in the course taken by the British Parliament in dealing with the Irish land question and the Home Rule question. Some hold that the English people ought to put their hands into their pockets and raise money to give the Irish people power to buy out their lands and become tenant owners. Others hold that the British Parliament should pass a liberal Land Bill; and so, step by step, that Parliament is advancing in the right direction, and no doubt ultimately will accomplish what is desired by the most sanguine of those interested in the welfare of Ireland. In all great revolutionary questions such as the one before us, we are justified in advancing slowly. It is not in the interests of the country that a great revolution should be brought about suddenly. Some may say this is not a great revolution. I say, judging it by its financial aspect, it is a great financial revolution, and judging it by its social aspects, it is a great social revolution. Therefore the change should not be brought about hastily, but only according as the people are educated to support it. There will be nothing accomplished by too great a haste. We know that by the history of the Dunkin Act and the Scott Act. Temperance people have a right to feel encouraged because the process of education has gone on rapidly and well in the country, and in due time no doubt the sentiment of the people will be in favour of what they ask to-day; but I think some are, perhaps, over-zealous in a good cause and are, perhaps, a little too ambitious to hurry it on to a conclusion. There is as great danger in too much hurry as in delay. Every step in an advance, in a great revolution of this kind, should be made on firm ground, so that we can maintain the ground we have gained and press still further forward. The sentiment of the country is gradually being educated up to the desired standard of supporting total prohibition. Therefore, temperance people ought to be satisfied, and ought not to be, as they appear sometimes to be, disposed to cry down every member of Parliament who honestly expresses his opinions, even if he does not happen to agree with them in every particular. I am in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), with regard to our acquiring information on which to base our judgment. I hold we can never have too much information. In all walks of life it is information which enables us to arrive at an understanding as to the matters with which we are dealing. Whether in public life, or in the conduct of private corporations or as private individuals the intelligent man always debates in his own mind every phase of the question, bringing to bear the greatest amount of information possible; and when he has done that, the result of his action, whatever it may be, is most likely to be a success. I therefore hold there is virtue in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh). We want to know how much revenue would be lost, how far such legislation would interfere with provincial rights, what means a committee of the House, such as has been suggested, would advise for the purpose of making good the deficiency that would be created in the Dominion treasury if prohibition were carried out. We want to know the far-reaching effect of such a measure, and when we know these facts we will be better prepared to form an intelligent judgment and efficiently discharge our duty as representatives of the people. I am, therefore, in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa. In saying this I do not wish to be understood that I desire to burk the consideration of the question at the present time or delay it. I know some hon. members, in their anxiety, seek either to turn the matter to political account or to create the impression that the object I aimed at in moving the adjournment of the debate was rather to defeat the question embodied in the resolution. It is early in the session yet, and it was distinctly understood that, in the event of the motion to adjourn being carried, the question would come on next week at the latest, when there would be ample time to debate it in all its phases. It was not either with the object of in any way embarrassing the chance of the resolution being thrown out without a full expression of opinion having been obtained, that I moved the motion to adjourn the debate. I therefore say there is no need for too much turpitude in dealing with the resolution, and as there is virtue in the amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa, I, consequently, am disposed to support it. Although I am in favour of the principle of prohibition, although I am in favour of it, whether it is believed in this House or out of it, or not, as much as are many hon. gentlemen who will vote directly for the unconditional resolution, I am also in favour of making progress slowly, gradually, steadily and forcibly, doing it intelligently and making it on those grounds that afford the surest guarantee for the permanence of every step we make towards what we aim at. For these reasons, I am in favour of the amendment to the resolution, and am not in favour of the unconditional resolution before us. I am not in favour of the amendment to the amendment, submitted by my hon. friend who sits beside me. I give these as my reasons for the vote I am about to give, not because I am in favour of prohibition, not because I do not want to embarrass the Government, but because we have the right to look before us and see what the future of the country is likely to be, how we are going to accomplish the object aimed at and do it without at the same time threatening the interests of the country. I am in favour of prohibition, but only on those lines which, in my judgment, afford the surest guarantee of permanence and success after it is accomplished.

Mr. WATSON. It is not my intention to occupy for any length of time the attention of this House during this debate, but coming from a province that adjoins the territory which is supposed to have prohibition, I feel called upon to say a few words. I am in favour of the original motion moved by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), as I believe liquor is a curse to the country and we are better without it. The question of revenue should not be considered when we know the lives and intrests of our people are at stake in this cursed traffic. We have had hon. gentlemen speaking apparently on all sides of this question. They have adopted one part of the speech to temperance people and another to the people who deal in liquor; they have endeavoured to hunt both with the hare and the hounds. But the temperance people in Ontario have taken up this matter, and the Temperance Alliance has seen fit to endeavour to influence temperance people in the constituencies and to direct them as to the candidates they should support. It is only by exercising the franchise and supporting candidates who are honestly in favour of prohibition, not men who are simply pandering for their votes at election times, but men who practice what they preach and are temperance men, that success can be achieved. That is decidedly objectionable to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has told us that he does not want to burk discussion. But we saw the hon. gentleman move the adjournment of the debate. Why should we not debate the question to-night, especially when it is one that has been discussed during every session of every Parliament since I have sat in this House, in 1882. It is no new question. The people should be, and are being educated in regard to it, and I believe the country is prepared to see whether, after the failure of the Scott Act, a prohibitory law cannot be passed and enforced. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) started out by reflecting on the people who had sent in the petitions, and on the names signed to the petitions. More petitions have been presented in favour of prohibition than have been presented for any other measure submitted to Parliament. Then the hon. gentleman reflected on those who were the instigators in having the petitions circulated: he reflected on the individuals who had signed them, because a number of the signatures were those of ladies, who are not voters. I am only sorry those ladies are not voters; if they were, we would have a different class in this House.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to object to the hon. gentleman's statement. I made no reflection whatever on the parties who signed the petitions.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman referred to the signatures, and stated they were not the signatures of electors, and, consequently, they should not be noticed by this Parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. No, I did not.

Mr. WATSON. I say the signatures of citizens of this country, even if they are not electors—and I believe every signature on the petitions is a bonâ fide signature—even if it is found that a majority of them are the signatures of the ladies of our land, they should be respected, and probably more respected than if they were the signatures of others. The hon. gentleman does not believe in the proposition to submit the question to a plébiscite. He is an opponent of temperance on all sides. He stands in well with the manufacturers. He believes there should be compensation. I should like to ask this House what guarantee I have in my business that legislation will not be passed to interfere with it. Men engaged in the liquor traffic have to seek a renewal of their licenses year after year, and they know they are liable to be shut off at the end of any year. They know they have to secure a very largely signed requisition at first to secure a license, and that a very small number of people can prevent the issuing of a license. If we have temperance legislation, I am not in favour of compensating the large distillers; and if I were in favour of compensation, it would be compensation to the smaller dealers who have invested all their means in their business. But we have had legislation within the last two years making changes in the Inland Revenue regulations which benefit the few distillers in Canada to the extent of millions of dollars; and these are the poor individuals whom the hon. gentleman who has just sat down wishes to have protected and compensated. Coming from the Province of Manitoba, a new province where the licensing system has not got as strong a hold as in the older provinces, I think it is a most opportune time to have a prohibitory liquor law passed. There is an agitation in the North-West Territories, which adjoin the county I represent, in favour of some change being made with respect to the disposal of liquor in those territories. We are supposed to have prohibition in the North-West Territories. Unfortunately, on account of the leniency of the Lieutenant Governor in dealing out permits, they have liquor there without any license, I am informed. I am well aware of the fact that many people have gone to Manitoba and the North-West for the purpose of breaking away from their associations in eastern Canada. We are now face to face with the question as to whether we are in favour of prohibition or not. I have no better evidence of that to offer you than the fact that the hon. gentleman who sits beside me (Mr. Davin), I venture to say, could not have been elected in West Assiniboia were it not for the pledges he made on the temperance question—I am satisfied that I am right in making that statement. By pledging himself on that question he secured a large majority of the electors of Western Assiniboia. We were told yesterday by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that it would be impossible to carry out a prohibitory liquor law effectually for the reason that we had across the border to the south of us, a nation who dealt out liquor under a license system, who manufactured it, and we could not stop them. But I did not hear that hon. gentleman charge the Minister of Customs or his officers with allowing smuggled goods to come into this country. Why, we have people in this country who oppose the payment of customs duties on their goods just as strenuously as the temperance people oppose the liquor traffic, but the hon. gentleman did not charge the Minister of Customs with not being able to prevent smuggling of goods into this country across the boundary line. If they can prevent smuggling in other articles, why can they not do so just as well in the case of liquor? Now, reference was made by the hon. gentleman who last spoke to the very large delegation that waited on the Government to-day, as one of the reasons why this matter should not be discussed and disposed of to-night. Well, I thought that this delegation were here for the purpose of asking compensation from the Government for moneys paid by the different municipalities to assist the railways that had been taken out of the control of those municipalities, and I would like to know if that hon. gentleman is an advocate of paying these people the moneys that, I believe, should be refunded to them, seeing that he is in favour of compensating a few distillers who have made millions of money out of the pockets of the consumers of this liquor, who are generally the poorest people we have in the country. I think it would be in the interests of Canada to carry the motion introduced by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). So far as the amendment and the amendment to the amendment are concerned, I believe they are offered merely for the purpose of burking a vote on this bald question. I am in favour of expressing myself in this House, by my vote, in favour of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Lanark. It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen who moved these side issues, for the purpose of shirking a square vote, are not sincere friends of prohibition. The hon. gentleman who moved the amendment to the amendment stated his reasons. Well, I believe that in that meeting in the Tower Room he opposed the proposed resolution of the hon. member for Lanark on the ground that it would embarrass the Government, and, therefore, he could not support it. However, we are proud to know that there are men in this House, and even on the opposite side—I refer to the hon. mover of this resolution—who, notwithstanding that it might embarrass the Government, are prepared to vote for this resolution. I am sorry there are not more hon. gentlemen opposite like him, who are willing to record a square vote for or against prohibition. Without detaining the House any further, I declare my intention for voting for the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Lanark.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I desire to say a few words to define my position before recording my vote. I believe the question before the House is one of great practical importance to the prosperity and well-being of this country, and that great good would result from the adoption and enforcement of such a measure. We see that there is a strong public sentiment throughout the Dominion in favour of it. Petitions in favour of it have poured into this House and are pouring in still. I have had the pleasure of presenting several from my own county, from nearly all the religious denominations in that county, all asking for prohibition. I know that there are many good men and good women there who have been long labouring to promote the cause of temperance, giving freely of their time and means, trying to make the world a little better and a little brighter. They are anxiously looking for prohibition. They believe it is the only remedy that would prove effectual in staying the terrible evils which flow from intemperance, and that the time has now come when such a measure should be enacted. Many of us have read that startling book entitled "Darkest England and the Way Out." Now, I believe that here as in England, there is no way out of the evils of intemperance except by removing the cause, and striking at the root of the evil by wiping out the traffic. So long as the people of England expend nearly 140 million pounds sterling for drink, more than they spend for butter, and bread, and cheese, and milk, just so long will there be misery, wretchedness and ruin. There is no other way than prohibition out of the difficulty. Now, matters are not so bad, I think, in Canada, but we are travelling in the same direction, and in the same path. Our liquor bill is rising at an alarming rate. Just as our population increases, as our towns grow into cities, and our cities become crowded, the result will be the same. And it is not only the material interests of the country that would be promoted by prohibition, but I am fully convinced that it would contribute very largely to the health and longevity of our people. On this point I think there can be no diversity of opinion. We have a concensus of opinions from the leading medical men in Canada, in the United States and in Great Britain, all agreeing that total abstinence and prohibition would contribute largely to the health, happiness and well-being of our people. Those medical men have given their testimony in that direction, they have spoken out clearly and emphatically, and I think their testimony is worthy of consideration. I will not further trespass upon the time of the House, and will conclude by saying that I shall have great pleasure in recording my vote in favour of immediate prohibition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who moved the amendment to the amendment, had expressed the views which I understood him to entertain, in language so clear as that it could be understood by every friend of the temperance movement, I should have been disposed to vote in favour of his resolution. But on reading his resolution I find that it is couched in such language that it is very difficult to understand what the hon. gentleman really means. In the first place, the mover of the resolution puts one construction on its language, and the seconder of the resolution puts a different one. I myself have read the resolution carefully over two or three times, and am unable to put any construction at all upon it. I do not know what will be the effect of the passing of that resolution, and I certainly think that the Government will not be able to derive from the reading of it afterwards, any certain idea as to what the meaning of the House was. I do think that upon a question of this kind the House should be able to express some clear and definite opinion. We cannot ignore the agitation which has been going on for the past eight or ten years in this Dominion, and the expression which has been given to that agitation in the vast number of petitions which have been laid before this House. We know that in a great many districts, and ridings, and counties at the last election, the question was brought up, not for thorough discussion, I will frankly admit, but brought up incidentally, and by a side wind, so that very many of the candidates were seriously embarrassed by the introduction of this question as a side issue. But it seems to me that the question we have to decide is not the mere theoretical one as to whether prohibition in the abstract is a good or bad idea; the academic discussion of that question is hardly suited to this arena. We are called upon as a practical body of legislators to discuss, not so much the question of prohibition, or prohibition in the abstract, but the proposition stated in the forefront of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), whether or not the time has arrived for giving effect to that principle in Canada. The hon. gentleman in his resolution says:

I believe it is admitted on all sides that unless public opinion is strong, unless there is a preponderating weight of public opinion in favour of the prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, the passage of a law enacting that it shall not be manufactured or sold will not advance the cause the hon. gentleman has at heart, but will throw it back. It is no use to try and legislate in this direction, to pass a sumptuary law of this kind, unless you are thoroughly satisfied you have the mass of public opinion behind it. We have had a precedent, and we know what we are talking about. It will be remembered that the Scott Act was carried in different counties in the Dominion, and in many of them it was carried by a bare majority. Look at the record to-day. Is there a county in the Dominion where the Scott Act was carried by a bare majority where it is working favourably? Has it ever worked favourably except in counties where a vast proportion of public opinion was in its favour? We know it has not, and that it has proved a failure wherever it was carried by a bare majority. I think, therefore, the first question we have to ask ourselves is, has the time arrived for such legislation? In determining this question we must determine whether the majority of the electors of this country are favourable to the passage of such a law. The mere passage of the resolution or a law in furtherance of the resolution —and I appeal to the real temperance men to support this idea—would not carry forward or advance the cause a single step, but rather would retard it and send it back. If a law were passed to-morrow, and proved a failure, it would throw back the temperance cause half a century. In this House some years ago, during the second or third session after I came here, I listened to a speech by the veteran temperance reformer, Sir Leonard Tilley, and the arguments and facts which he produced made a strong impression on my mind, and if not trespassing on the time of the House, I should like to read a paragraph or two from his speech. What did that hon. gentleman say? He said that in 1854 he was the leading promoter of a prohibitory Bill in the Province of New Brunswick; that the Legislature of New Brunswick had been flooded with petitions from the people of that province, praying for the passage of a prohibitory law; that an agitation had prevailed there during one or two years: that among those who had taken the forefront in that agitation were many good and worthy men who thought it was their duty to further by their voice and vote this new scheme for the promotion of social reform, and the result was that the Legislature of New Brunswick, acting upon the voice of public opinion, as they thought, expressed in the petitions presented at that time, passed the law. The result was, not that the temperance cause was promoted, not that those who signed the petitions advanced the cause, but within six weeks after the passage of the law, it was found that public opinion was opposed to it; the Lieutenant Governor of the province was called upon to submit the question to the people at the polls; the question was submitted, and an enormous majority of the people voted to repeal the law which six weeks before had been brought into force. What was the consequence? The consequence was, to use the words of this veteran temperance reformer, that temperance in the Province of New Brunswick was thrown back half a century. I should like to quote the argument of the hon. gentleman, which struck me at the time as a strong argument. Sir Leonard Tilley said:

"Never, since I have entered public life, have I voted, nor do I intend to vote, against the principle of prohibition. As early as 1855, I introduced into the Legislature of my own province one of the most stringent prohibitory Bills that was ever proposed in any legislature or parliament in the world. Previous to the introduction of that Bill, we had, as we thought, educated the people of New Brunswick to the point that such a law, if enacted, would be supported and sustained by the people. Reference was made by the hon. mover of this resolution to the number of petitions presented to the House of Commons in 1877: and, if my memory serves me, in the Province of New Brunswick, as far back as 1855, we had more signatures to petitions presented to the Legislature of that province in favour of prohibition than were signed to the petitions presented to this House from the whole Dominion in 1877. They were brought in the House in the size of rolls of carpet by the hon. members who presented them. We thought that we had educated the people of that province up to such a point that if a prohibitory law passed it would be enforced. We had three-fourths of the people of that province signing petitions in favour of prohibition. That law was passed by the Lower House by something like two-thirds majority, and it passed the Upper House by nearly the same majority; and it was passed because of the strong arguments and facts presented and because of the statistics we had collected as to the effect of the traffic in New Brunswick from 1852 to 1855, and which were so convincing that men who differed from us in opinion gave us their support and enabled us to carry the measure by the majority stated. For six weeks that law was enforced."

What followed? Prosecutions followed, appeals were made to the courts, chaos followed, public opinion changed round, and the people who voted for the law demanded its repeal, and the Legislature repealed the law. The conclusion drawn from these facts, and it is a conclusion I should like to impress on hon. members of this House, and it is the conclusion I have arrived at, at all events, is thus stated by Sir Leonard Tilley:

"Under the circumstances, and believing as I do now, that if public sentiment is not sufficiently educated to sustain a prohibition law, the passage would do harm instead of good, instead of abandoning anything by accepting the original resolution, even as amended, I hold that if this motion be carried the cause of prohibition will have made a great step in advance. I can understand the delicacy of an hon. gentleman voting against the last amendment as a temperance man and a prohibitionist, because, as such, he would seem inconsistent, and I noticed cheers when my name was called as voting against the immediate adoption of prohibition: but I did so, because I believe it is in the interest of temperance that we should not enact a law that will not be enforced. I speak with the experience I had thirty years ago, and have had ever since 1856. When the convention was held in Montreal, I was written to by one of the leading friends of temperance, asking my opinion. I was unable to be present, but I wrote a letter in reply, which letter Mr. Ross read at a convention held in Ottawa. What was the opinion I then expressed? I stated that if they decided to submit the proposal to the popular vote they should not suggest less than a three-fifths vote, because, if carried by a bare majority and without public sentiment behind it, the law would fail, and the cause of temperance would be damaged instead of benefited. That has been my conviction since 1855."

I think that the opinion of an hon. gentleman of the age and experience of Sir Leonard Tilley, a life-long temperance reformer, who passed a law with the aid of three-fourths of the New Brunswick Legislature in 1854, which was in force for six weeks, when the people who asked for it demanded its repeal, ought to have some weight with hon. members of this House in considering this question. What did the Dominion Alliance, a body for which I have the very highest respect, say with respect to this matter? It said: "We feel certain a very overwhelming majority of the electors of Canada are in favour of prohibition." I am of the opinion that if the majority of the people are in favour of prohibition, there is every reasonable possibility and probability of carrying the proposition. Hon. gentlemen who have equally as good an opportunity of forming an opinion deny that a majority, or anything like a majority, are in favour of it. That is the issue before us. How is it to be tested? Is it to be tested by assertion on one side and denial on the other? I think not. It seems to me that a resolution should have been proposed, and I intended to have proposed one if the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had not intercepted me with his resolution, which I do not think meets the case, to the effect that the time had come, in view of agitation which had proceeded for so many years, when the question should be submitted fairly and squarely to the people at the polls on the direct issue of prohibition or no prohibition. It is said that it is un-English, that we have no precedent for it. Well, Sir, I am not aware that it is absolutely essential that we never should take any step in this new country unless we can show an English precedent for it, but we can show precedents in other countries, in Switzerland, as my hon. friend reminds me. I would appeal to the practical common sense of every gentleman of this House and ask him if he believes that any fair expression of public opinion can be had on this single question at a general election. Why, Sir, in the recent elections in the province whence I come nothing was discussed there but the trade issue, and I believe the same was the case in every other constituency in the Maritime Provinces. At the last moment, just as we were about to go to the polls, the temperance people set before us a pledge to vote for prohibition. The question had not been discussed, the people had discussed another question which rightly or wrongly they considered of paramount importance, and I for one refused to give that pledge. I told them that if I came to Parliament I would be willing to remit the question to the people at the polls on a reference squarely and singly, not mixed up with party politics, not mixed up with the trade question and a thousand and one other questions which are before the people at a general election. I believe that the question of prohibition is of sufficient importance to justify us in doing that, and if the gentlemen who signed these petitions and this declaration believe that an overwhelming majority of the electors are in favour of it they cannot object to go to the people. If the people vote by an overwhelming majority in favour of prohibition I suppose the Government will be obliged to find means sooner or later to carry it out. There will be no doubt about the question then, and there will be no use making assertions and counter-assertions across the floor of the House because the vote will be our guide. If, on the contrary, the majority of the people vote against prohibition, it will be conclusive evidence that it would be against the interests of the country and against the interest of the temperance cause to adopt such a measure now. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) will himself admit that if the majority of the people are against this prohibitory legislation such an Act would not further his cause but delay it and throw it back for years. If the vote were against prohibition, the work of himself and his friends would be moral suasion, the educating of the people up to the point of belief that total prohibition was necessary. Until he gets such a majority as Sir Leonard Tilley said was essential to the carrying out of such a law, it is worse than waste of time to attempt to carry that measure through Parliament, knowing that it never will be enforced when it is passed. I will not discuss the general principle, but I do think it a pity—I was going to say a shame—that any attempt should be made by this Legislature, as is proposed by the amendment to the amendment, to evade this great question. The question will not bear evasion, the public opinion of an enormous number of people throughout the Dominion is such, that they are determined that we should pass upon the question, and so let us meet it like men. If we think the question should be remitted to the people at the polls so that they may give a direct vote on it, let us say so. Do not let us try to shirk or evade the question. If the opportunity is offered me I will vote against the amendment to the amendment, because it is not an honest one, because it does not give those who favour prohibition, and those who are against prohibition, an opportunity of expressing themselves at the polls. I will, if the opportunity offers, move a resolution which will meet this question fairly and squarely, and if that resolution is adopted it will be the duty of the Government to take such measures as will place the question before the people. Then if the people vote in favour of it, the Government will be obliged to carry out the principle in the manner which they believe to be best. If the people vote against it, the duty of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) and his friends, will be to continue a campaign of education and moral suasion.

Mr. CURRAN. The House appears to be more anxious now to come to a conclusion on this question than they were a short time ago when the adjournment of the debate was moved. It is not my intention to discuss the question at any very great length, more particularly as I agree with a great portion of the remarks of the last speaker, excepting what he says concerning the amendment to the amendment. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) was perfectly justified in saying that he did not intend to discuss the merits of the principle of prohibition, for that question was not introduced by him. However, I do think that the House was entitled to a very thorough discussion on the merits of the question by those who brought it forward; a discussion not merely on the sentimental part of the question, not merely that part of it with which every one must agree who knows anything about the state of society in which we live. I do feel that it was the duty of those who promoted this resolution to have cast a great deal more light upon it than they have done, either upon this or upon any former occasion. We have had a great number of speeches on the floor of this House for a number of years past, all detailing the terrible effects of the abuse of intoxicating liquors. No one doubts that, and any one who would doubt it must have his eyes shut. We must be struck in the first place with the diversity of opinion that exists amongst the advocates of this measure. We have, first of all, those who are in favour of prohibition, pure and simple, and who think the time has come when a law prohibiting the manufacture, sale and importation of intoxicating liquors throughout the length and breadth of our country should be placed upon the Statute-book. On the other hand there are those who believe this also, but they disagree with their brethren in believing that if we have prohibition we ought also have compensation for those who are engaged in this traffic: some draw the line at compensating the manufacturers of intoxicating liquors, while others would go further and give the benefit of that compensation to those who have invested their money in liquors which they have purchased for the purposes of their trade. There are as many camps amongst the temperance men as it is possible to conceive. There are others whom I believe to be equally honest with those who are promoting prohibition, and although they are temperance men, and both by voice and example seek to promote total abstinence in the country, yet believe that prohibition would not prohibit, that it would retard the cause, that it is not the true principle to work upon, and they lay down a platform which is the result of years and years of earnest consideration, the first plank of which is that they do not believe that prohibition is the proper method to arrest the terrible effects of intemperance. These men believe that the liquor traffic should be regulated, that the number of licenses should be limited, that the traffic should be isolated from all other branches of trade, and they advocate that there should be a strict analysis made of liquors offered for sale, either wholesale or retail, and that this analysis should be enforced by the officers of the law. I have met with gentlemen who are prohibitionists but who scout the idea of the analysis of liquors and the other planks of the platform just referred to, and who look upon the persons who advocate them as being almost as great enemies of the temperance cause as those who are directly in the other interest. And it is not uncommon to see those who are members of these moral suasion societies denounced by so-called temperance organs as the greatest enemies of the temperance cause. Now, for years and years we have had this subject before this House; but I would ask anyone who has listened to the speeches we have heard in Parliament, has there been the slightest deviation in the speeches made in this assembly and the speeches the same gentlemen have made in the schoolhouses and on platforms throughout the country? They have talked about the sentimental aspect of the subject, but they have never in their conventions or assemblies or reunions sat down with all the able men working with them, and taken up the practical objections which have been raised against the working of a prohibitory law. One would have imagined that in the course of all these years gentlemen like the hon. mover and seconder of this resolution and those who have supported them in this House, would have sat down to estimate not in general terms how much money society would save if we should do away with the liquor traffic, but they should have particularized: they should have shown where new avenues for trade, commerce and manufactures, that they prophesy will arise, are going to spring up. One hon. gentleman from Toronto summed up in a few words the terrible effects of intemperance. He said there were very few families who had not a relative, or at all events a friend, who was a victim of this terrible disease: but when he spoke of the distilleries and breweries being converted into manufactories of another kind, he never specified what kind of manufactories they would be. There was no plan promulgated. In fact, there seems to have been no study made of the question beyond that appeal to the sentiment of the people which must do good and cause many a young man and many an old man, too, to turn back from his evil ways; but so far from solving the question and meeting the objections which have been raised time and again with regard to revenue and otherwise, there has not been the first syllable expressed either in this debate or in any other that has taken place in Parliament on this subject ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. These gentlemen tell us that they are perfectly satisfied that public sentiment is with them, that the majority of the people are in favour of a prohibitory law being enacted without delay, despite all injurious consequences that may ensue to the business of the country. I do not think the leading minds of this country agree with that opinion. We had a moment ago an extract from a speech delivered by a leading Conservative, and an advocate of prohibition when a member of this House. On the other hand, on the question of the necessity of the people being educated up to a prohibitory liquor law, let me quote from an admirable speech delivered by the Hon. Edward Blake, a few years ago, in which, in the most conclusive manner, he showed that the public sentiment is not in favour of prohibition, that the education of the people has not reached that point, that they do not look upon the manufacture nor the drinking of intoxicating liquor as a crime, or sin, or reprehensible act. He went on to show that while a man who would commit a crime in the street, a theft or any other offence, would be immediately pounced upon by the first passer-by and handed over to the police, any number of people might go into an illicit shop by a side door, and although most of the passers-by would know that they were going to drink, there would be no attempt to stop them. Is there any man in this House who would go and lodge a complaint in such a case if we had a prohibitory law? I say there is not. The law would be a dead letter; you would have four-fifths of the people denouncing any man who would become an informer; it would be impossible for such a man to live in the community; and we would have enacted in this country all the terrible scenes which Sir Leonard Tilley described as having taken place in New Brunswick some years ago, when an attempt was made to enforce a law against the will of the majority, although a great many petitions had been presented in favour of it, and were said to represent the public sentiment, just as hon. gentlemen say the petitions presented in favour of this law represent the public sentiment now. Mr. Blake said that the work of educating public sentiment had not yet progressed far enough to ensure the carrying out of the law, and added:

> "Until progress is made in that, I am not of the opinion that Canada is ripe for prohibition. I do not believe, that the law if carried would in the present condition be useful or permanent. Therefore, I cannot honestly vote for prohibition now. I can give no pledge for such a vote at any definite time."

Have we any evidence that the sentiment of the people of Canada is different to-day from what it was when Mr. Blake spoke these words? On the contrary, what has taken place in connection with the Scott Act in many counties shows that public sentiment is in the very opposite direction. The hon. gentleman who spoke last says that the sub-amendment proposed here is one which does not satisfy him, because he does not think, from the cursory reading he has been able to give it, that it would bind the Government and direct them what to do. That is exactly the reason, because I had not time to study that amendment or give it more than a cursory reading, that I voted to-night for the adjournment, which would have given us an opportunity of fully studying and digesting the amendment and the sub-amendment. I take it the sub-amendment of my hon. friend means that an appeal shall be made to the people in order that they may determine by their votes whether or not they are in favour of the principle enunciated in the original motion. Its object, whether that be expressed in proper shape or not, is, I take it, to ascertain whether the time has arrived for enforcing prohibition. I do not think my hon. friend has, any more than the mover of this resolution, taken the proper course. I think the cart has been put before the horse. I think if there be any proposition before the House worthy of consideration, it is that embodied in the amendment of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) namely, that the information which should have been furnished by my hon. friend the mover of this resolution and his colleagues who are advocating this measure, should be sought for and obtained and put in the hands not only of hon. members of this House but of the people before we can come to a decision. Let us have, first of all, a committee to find out what would be the effect of the legislation proposed, what would be the interests affected by it, how far-reaching would be those effects; and the information thereby obtained will be of service at a subsequent period when an appeal may be made to a people possessing a knowledge of all the facts. They will then be able to give an intelligent judgment, they will know how their interests will be affected, they will see whether it will be in their interests to strike down this traffic and everything connected with it, and whether the advantages to be derived from its abolition will more than counterbalance any injury that may result thereby to trade and commerce. When that information is obtained and the people have been consulted, this Parliament will know what to do. This Parliament will feel it had not obtained a snap verdict, but that the people had pronounced with a full knowledge of the subject in all its bearings; and should this Parliament then decide on prohibition, there will be no danger of our witnessing a revulsion of feeling in this Dominion such as took place in the Province of New Brunswick, when a law was passed before the people were ready for it. The people would feel that the great majority of their fellow-citizens had pronounced on the subject, and that it was the duty of all good men in the country to uphold the law which had been passed in obedience to the voice of the majority expressed after mature deliberation. That is the only course that can be logically followed; and if we now follow that course we will have the satisfaction of feeling assured that any law on this question that may be enacted by us will be supported by the people at large and not be a dead letter or a cause of turmoil and serious detriment to the country.

Mr. GILLIES. I rise to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DEVLIN. I think it is proper that I should express my views on this question, representing, as I do, a county in which it has been considerably debated. We have before the House a direct resolution in favour of prohibition, also an amendment and a sub-amendment. In so far as I am personally concerned, silence might perhaps prove golden, whereas speech may only prove silver, still I do not feel justified in giving a silent vote. We have seen that a number of petitions have been laid upon the Table. I myself have presented some fifty-five or sixty, but when I come to look over one of them I must say it appears to me means have been employed to obtain signatures which perhaps should not have been adopted. For instance, the other day I presented a petition from the village of St. André Avelin in favour of a prohibitory law, and I found it was signed by the members of the regular Baptist church located in that village. Although I have had occasion to pass through that place several times, I never saw this Baptist church; and what is more, I am perfectly satisfied that some gentlemen who signed that petition were not members of the regular Baptist church. So that although I do not find fault with the petitions as a rule, which I did present, I cannot say that they fully represent public opinion in the county from which I have the honour to come. We were told by the last speaker that the Hon. Mr. Blake stated in this House some time ago that public opinion was not yet ripe for such a measure. It is quite possible that public opinion was not then ripe and might be now sufficiently matured. We are also informed that Sir Leonard Tilley held the same view. Well, I think this question can be very easily settled by the means proposed in the amendment which we are about to offer, and that is to refer the matter to the people. It cannot be denied that the resolution itself which has been presented by the hon. member for Lanark has opponents even among temperance people. They do not all see exactly as the hon. gentleman does. Of course we respect those who undertook the work of getting up the petitions which have been laid before this House. We know their work has been considerable, and that great efforts have been made by those heroic mothers, daughters and wives who have given to it so much time, ability and attention. We know that they have presented these petitions, and certainly their opinion is entitled to our respect. I ask, then, can we respect that opinion more than by referring this question to the electorate of the Dominion, and at as early a date as possible? If a prohibitory law shall ever be enforced in this country, it is possible it will not be entirely due to those who, upon public platforms, take a prominent part in the cause of temperance, but it will be due to the earnest efforts of those good ladies who have worked so hard and incessantly on behalf of that cause. They have brought this question before the House and they are determined to see it through, so that it might be just as well to face the matter now as at a later date. I listened with much pleasure and considerable attention to the very eloquent speech delivered by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). He drew our attention to the gravity of the case, and dwelt upon the ills attending intemperance. We are all perfectly agreed that intemperance is not productive of good, but it will be a difficult matter for any one to say that temperance is not a virtue. We know that temperance is a virtue if intemperance be a sin, and there are many in this country who are not prepared exactly to accept the opinions brought forward by the advocates of temperance. For instance, in my own county there are a very large number who favour the cause of prohibition, and on the other hand an almost equally large number who are opposed to it. Now, I was not sent here to vote upon that question. I was sent here to vote upon the trade question. I cannot conscientiously vote in favour of prohibition and say that in doing so I represent the views of my county: nor can I conscientiously vote against it and say that that vote will receive the favour of the overwhelming majority of the electorate of the County of Ottawa. It is a question for the electorate to decide, and I think we would be doing our duty to ourselves and to the electors of Canada, as well as to the great cause of temperance, by referring this subject to the people to decide upon at as early a date as possible. Now, I will not detain the House any longer, only to explain my vote upon the adjournment of the debate. I did not vote as I did because I was a party man; not at all. I expect certainly to be able during the session to vote at times in favour of the Government, when the measures brought forward by the Government are such good measures that they will command my vote. You know, Mr. Speaker, that I represent a county which requires justice from the Government, and the doctrine which is being taught, and which no later than last Sunday I heard announced on a public platform by one who was closely connected with the Government, is that the only thing to do is to support the Government and get the Government favour. Perhaps my course, hitherto, has not been such as to warrant the Government in bestowing much favour upon me; but I wish to say that I am not voting against the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the member for the city of Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) because it is brought forward by him—not at all; nor because it is one that may receive the favour of the Government. I know that there is much sense in that amendment and that it will command a large vote in this House: but still I think the House and the country have had ample time during the many years that have elapsed since this question was first brought forward, to study it carefully and fully, and I, therefore, feel the time has come for referring it to a vote of the people. Believing that this should be our course, I will with much pleasure vote in that sense when the amendment proposing it is brought forward, and against the amendment now before the House.

House divided on motion to adjourn debate (Mr. Gillies):

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A part of our assets, is it?

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTON OF DEPUTY SPEAKER.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of Sir John A. Macdonald, I have much pleasure in moving, seconded by Mr. Chapleau, that Joseph G. H. Bergeron, member for the Electoral District of the County of Beauharnois, be appointed Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, the necessity of having a Deputy Speaker might very well, I think be questioned, but the House has settled and affirmed already its decision in favour of that office, and, therefore, I do not see any necessity for testing the sense of the House any longer on the policy. As to the choice of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), I can only say, speaking not only personally but also on behalf of the Opposition, that we heartily concur in the selection offered. Personally, I certainly congratulate my hon. friend with great pleasure upon his accession to this office, and it is a pleasure for me to recollect that for a great many years I have been with him on terms of personal friendship. In matters not political we always agree, and it is still a greater pleasure for me to remember that sometimes in matters political we agree. I remember that on a most important occasion, a solemn occasion, he and I arraigned the Government for an act which I thought under the circumstances was cruel and unjustifiable. I think it is an indication, since the Government have now placed in his hands more power, that they have come to the conclusion that my hon. friend was right and they were wrong. I congratulate them on their repentance, late though it be. It is consoling to reflect on this additional evidence that not only in the next world but in this world virtue is rewarded.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I might take a different view from that presented by the leader of the Opposition in the observation which he has just offered; but, at all events, he will agree with me that this might be further testimony that the important position of Deputy Speaker, which implies the impartiality of the hon. gentleman occupying that position, will be recognized, not only by this side of the House, but by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that my hon. friend's independence fits him for the position he has been selected to occupy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Seeing there is still a difference on the question referred to between the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. Secretary of State as to the propriety of the course taken by the hon. member who is named for this office.

it will be interesting now to know with which hon. gentleman the hon. member agrees.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. One says virtue is rewarded, and the other one might say that it is always well to repent.

Motion agreed to.

ONTARIO MUNICIPALITIES' DEPUTATION.

Mr. TROW. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to bring a matter before the House. A large and influential deputation of representative men, wardens, reeves of municipalities and municipal officers, numbering one hundred and fifty, from various parts of Ontario, and forming one of the best informed deputations that ever visited the Capital, appeared here yesterday with respect to a matter connected with their municipalities, asking for a refund or for money compensation in return for money expended by their municipalities for railway purposes. I notice the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) introduced the deputation very politely to the Minister; and I heard from many of the deputation that they were treated by the leader of the Government, and also by the Minister of Finance, with the greatest courtesy, and they were perfectly satisfied with what had been said to them by the members of the Government. Yet I notice to-day in the Montreal Gazette an article headed: "A Treasury Raid Balked.—The Ontario Municipalities' Claims for the Refund of Bonuses.—Plain Talk by Sir John, who tells the Raiders that their demands are absurd and unreasonable." I understand the First Minister told the delegates nothing of the kind; but treated them, or at least a dozen of them told me so, with the greatest degree of courtesy. I merely mention this because it is unfortunate there should appear in the press of the country such very absurd and unguarded expressions.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Perhaps I may be permitted to say, in answer to the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow), that I am now attending only to my legislative duties, and that during the session I have no connection with the Gazette. I regret very much as he can the unfortunate and, I think, the unguarded head line which appears above the report, a head line that is not borne out by the report itself. For my part I may be permitted to disclaim responsibility for anything that appears in that journal during the session, and to add that I was not aware any such language would appear.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS—TRANSLATION.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, I would desire to call the attention of the House, especially the attention of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), to some remarks made by that hon. gentleman, and which will be found in Hansard of May 14, which remarks convey an accusation against one of the officers of the House, that is unjust, and I am sure, after the matter has been brought to the attention of the hon. gentleman, he will at once declare his charge was not warranted. I find the following in Hansard:

"M. le Président, avant de passer à l'ordre du jour, je désire attirer votre attention et l'attention de cette chambre sur la manière dont les procès-verbaux et les procédés en général de cette chambre sont traduits. Je n'ai pas l'occasion de me lever souvent dans cette chambre, mais en regardant la traduction des propositions que j'ai pu faire quelque fois, ou des discours que j'ai pu prononcer, je me suis toujours aperçu qu'elle ne rendait pas l'idée que j'avais eu l'intention d'exprimer. J'ai toujours cherché à parler le langage de la majorité afin d'être mieux compris, mais la traduction de ce que j'ai dit n'a aucun bon sens, et s'il fallait envoyer cette traduction à quelqu'un qui connait un peu le français, je passerais pour ridicule si l'on supposait que j'ai prononcé ces paroles dans ma langue maternelle. Ainsi, pour donner un exemple de cette traduction, je vais prendre l'interpellation que j'ai faite aujourd'hui. J'ai posé tout à l'heure au gouvernement une question qui se lit comme suit: 'whether the Government is aware of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refusing to operate the L'Avenir Branch of their line formerly known as the South Eastern Railway.' On a traduit les mots 'L'Avenir Branch of their line' par les mots 'l'embranchement sur L'Avenir de sa ligne'

"Eh bien! M. le Président, c'est simplement ridicule; et ce n'est pas la première fois que je remarque de semblables erreurs."

The hon. gentleman asked in his notice of motion whether the Government was aware the Canadian Pacific Railway was refusing to operate the L'Avenir Branch of their line, formerly known as the South-Eastern Railway. The hon. gentleman said this had been translated into French by these words: "L'embranchement sur L'Avenir de sa ligne comme sous le nom de ligne du 'South Eastern.'" My hon. friend said this was a ridiculous and improper translation. I must tell him that, so far as I know, and I think I am well informed, the translation was a very proper one; and the only French translation that could be given of the motion as it was prepared. I will refer the hon. member to the reports of the French Railways, where a branch has been translated as "embranchement sur tel point." If my hon. friend wishes it I will quote him: "La Grande Encyclopédie" under the word Canada, vol. VIII, page 1170, col. 2, where the expression: branch line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway respectively is used as follows: "avec embranchement sur Québec et sur Montréal." I refer my hon. friend also to the dictionary of P. Larousse, art. "Chemins de fer," page 1131 and 1133, col. 4. Also to the following technical works and authors: "Annales des Ponts et Chaussées; Vallée, Delafontaine, Perdonnet, Jacqmin; "Portefeuille de l'Ingénieur," and other authorities, where the words "embranchement sur" is always used when a railway branch to a certain locality is spoken of. I should not have alluded to this matter, which is comparatively a very small one, except that it stands in our debates. I hold in my hand a newspaper from Quebec which says that the translations are very peculiar and absurd, and that there is no means of getting the work better done because it is done under higher authority, namely, those who control the House and the translation department. This is unjust to the painstaking officer who has charge of the translation of the Votes and Proceedings of the House. I am sure that, having heard my observations, my hon. friend (Mr. Lavergne) will be the first one to see his mistake. It is true that the translation may have appeared inaccurate on account of the word "L'Avenir," which is the name of a village in Drummond and Arthabaska, (having been named after a newspaper edited by L'Enfant Terrible, Mr. Dorion, a former member for Drummond and Arthabaska.)" The word L'Avenir means "future," and the translation would look like "a branch in the future." It is not our fault, however, that the name of the parish lends itself to a jeu de mots. The translation is not only correct in French, but it is the only translation that could be given.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I am certainly ready to apologize if I have acted wrongly in this matter, but, as regards the construction of the sentence in French, I maintain my opinion. I advised the gentleman who made that translation to correct it, but he would not correct it, and did not correct it. I told him I did not pretend to be a linguist, but I thought that the question construed in that form would not be understood, and would not serve the purpose I had in view. He evidently was not willing to correct it, taking the ground that he was right and he would stick to it. I may mention that last year faults occurred in the translation which could not be defended on any grounds. If I had had a few days' notice that the Minister intended to bring up this matter, I would be prepared to support by proof what I said the other day, and we might have been able to settle the matter between ourselves. I must say, however, that I have nothing to take back.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I beg to remind my hon. friend that I did not make my remarks in any spirit of hostility, but only to come to his assistance, and to prevent leaving on the records of this House a remark that was not warranted. I am not myself a great grammarian, but I know the expression was correct and should not have been altered.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I may also point out that my complaint was justified because the word "formerly" was altogether omitted in the translation.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is another thing.

Mr. LAVERGNE. When I brought that to the notice of the translator it was corrected the next day. The name "L'Avenir" was also badly written.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is the fault of the printer and not of the translator.

THE POWERS OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Government Orders are called, I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance, and also of the Minister of Justice, to a matter which I find alluded to on page 14 of the Auditor General's Report, and which is of some importance to the administration of that Department. It is in the form of a letter addressed to the Minister of Finance, but it involves a legal question which, I presume, has been brought under the attention of the Minister of Justice. I may state to the House that our intention, when this Audit Act was created, was to make the Auditor General as far as possible independent of all other Departments, and, as the House is aware, every precaution in this direction was taken, and the Auditor General holds office under a tenure similar, if I remember aright, to that under which office is held by judges of the Crown. For the purpose of enabling him the better to discharge his duties, the control of the officers within the Department was expressly given to him. It was given in the original Act, which was passed under the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), introduced, I think, by myself, and it was confirmed again under the Act of 1885. From this letter I refer to, it would appear that doubt is now thrown on the question whether the Auditor General has power to promote within his Department, and that doubt, as I read the letter, arises from some words having been left out in the consolidation of the statutes which took place some two or three years ago. The matter was never mooted in Parliament; if it had been, I think the sense of the House would have been as in 1885 and on previous occasions, that this power had better be left in the hands of the Auditor General. I would be glad to know from the Minister of Justice in the first place, whether the law has been so altered as to deprive the Auditor General of the power to promote? And I would like to know from himself or the hon. Minister of Finance, if the law has been so altered, whether the Government intends to restore this power to the Auditor General? I think it is a power which ought not to have been taken away without the attention of Parliament having been expressly called to it, and it is perfectly clear the attention of Parliament has not been called to it. The Auditor General, in this letter to which I refer, appears to think it was an accidental change, but there is no doubt it is a change of some moment, and I think, if made at all, it should have been made only after full notice to the House, whose servant the Auditor General is in a very special sense.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On the spur of the moment I am hardly in a position to say that the law has been altered in the direction the hon. member for South Oxford indicates; but I am able to say, from an examination of the subject which took place when the Auditor General wrote this letter and conferred with me in regard to it, that the law does not now authorize him to make promotions, and I hesitate to say that it was changed in that regard, because I am not sure that the original Act confers that power. But it is a full answer to one part of the hon. gentleman's question, to say that the present state of the law does not permit the Auditor General to promote without the authority of the Governor in Council. I understand that the question, so far as its practical importance is concerned, has been disposed of. The Auditor wrote this letter with regard to certain promotions which, according to his opinion, he was given the power to make by Parliament having, in the first place, voted the salaries to admit of their being made. The Governor in Council having changed the theoretical organization and sanctioned the promotions, the practical difficulty has been in that way disposed of; but the fact is, as I have intimated, that the statute as it now stands does not confer that power upon the Auditor. I think it very likely that the change did occur, as the hon. gentleman understands it to have occurred, in the revision of the statutes. Some alteration in that regard was made at that time. The revisers, so far as I can ascertain, were under the impression that the law even as revised would continue to confer that power on the Auditor General; such, I think, however, is clearly not the case. In moving the adoption of the Revised Statutes, I was certainly under the impression that the revisers had simply consolidated and harmonized the statutes, and that there were no alterations made of any importance whatever; otherwise the attention of Parliament must have been called to the fact, and any alterations of a substantial character would have been made the subject of a substantive act. The revision was scrutinized, as the hon. gentleman will remember, by a committee which sat on the subject a good while and examined every alteration that was made; but this alteration seems to have escaped their attention. Whether or not it might be desirable to introduce an Act to give the Auditor power to make promotions in his Department requires some consideration. The statute relating to the Civil Service, I think, undoubtedly gives the Ministerial head of each Department power to make promotions from time to time. The Auditor claims that from analogy he is the head of his Department, and should have the like power; as a matter of fact, however, the power of promotion is never exercised by the Minister, but every appointment to the Civil Service, and every promotion is made by the Governor in Council. First of all comes the vote of Parliament creating the office, and then comes the Order in Council to enable the appointment to be made; and even the recommendation for a promotion comes to the Council itself. It may be a subject for careful consideration whether the power of promotion should be conferred on the Auditor General which, although theoretically now vested in the heads of the other Departments, is entirely disused.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just say, in answer to the hon. Minister of Justice, that the matter was very fully considered, as he will see, if he looks at the Debates at the time the Audit Office was created; and after full consideration it was decided in the case of that particular office that, looking at its peculiar functions, it was desirable that the Auditor General should have full power. The words in clause 15 are these:

"The Auditor General shall have power to promote, suspend or remove any of the officers, clerks or others, employed therein."

As to the rules, regulations and forms which he may use, these must be approved by the Treasury Board. Now, if the Government thought fit to alter that law, that was for them to decide; but I think it ought not to have been altered, and in that the hon. Minister appears to agree with me, without having been the subject of a specific act of the House; and it also appears to me that if by accident it was altered from the law of 1878, which I understood was confirmed by the law of 1885, action should be taken to put it back, unless the Government were of opinion that the law should be formally altered.

SUPPLY—ENQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. EDGAR. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to bring up again the subject, which I mentioned here last Monday, of the non-production by a Department of the Government of papers which have been ordered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and for which, as a member of that Committee, I have been making search in the office of the clerk of the Committee, where they were to be brought. The Committee a week ago to-day made an order for the production by the Department of Public Works or other Departments of the Government, of papers connected with some half-dozen different public contracts or matters that were under the investigation of that Committee. On the same day an order was made for the production by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners of papers in their control relating to some of those matters. Strange to say, the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, although at a great distance, have managed to send their secretary up here with the papers, which were in the Committee room yesterday for the inspection of the members of the Committee. Another Department of the Government has sent the Committee some other papers, but we are without a single document from the Department of Public Works. Now, if there is any Department in the Government that should be vigilant in satisfying the requirements of the Committee, it is the Department of Public Works. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, when I brought this matter up before, said the motion was a general one and not divided. Well, there were half a dozen different contracts mentioned in it, and surely the hon. Minister cannot pretend that the Committee expected he would not bring down any papers until every paper required could be procured and tabulated and arranged. Should such a course be followed, we may have to wait until the end of the session, and I do not think the House or the Committee would be satisfied to wait until then. No corporation or individual would have dared to treat the order of the Committee as it has been treated by the Department of Public Works. If any desire existed on the part of the Department to furnish the papers, some of them could have been laid before the Committee before this, and the hands of the Committee would not be tied as they are. The session, I am sure, will be prolonged if this delay continues, because I do not think its business will be brought to a close until the work of the Committee has also reached its conclusion; and the longer the production of these papers is delayed, the longer the investigations of the Committee will take, and the longer will the session be prolonged. Surely, if the hon. Minister of Public Works does not deem this matter of sufficient importance to save us this delay, some of his colleagues or his leader will. At any rate, on the next occasion the House meets, if the papers are not brought down, I shall certainly in some way test the opinion of the House as to the method followed by the Department in its disregard of the order of the Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman had only asked me whether I could give some information to the House concerning these papers, he would have been saved the trouble of making the speech he did.

Mr. EDGAR. I made the enquiry from the Clerk of the Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman enquired the other day, and I gave him the only answer I could that day. The Committee gave their order on Friday; they sent their order to the Public Works Department on Saturday, and it was on Tuesday, at three o'clock, that the hon. gentleman put his question, or one day and a-half after the order had been received by the Department. When the hon. gentleman sees the number of documents which have to be brought down in answer to the order, he will see that the Department could not take less time than it has taken to produce them. Every day, I urge the Deputy head of my Department, to hasten the collection of papers, and the copying of such documents as could not be brought down otherwise. He told me he would do so, and gave me a statement then, which I asked him to put in writing, so that I might read it to the House. His statement is as follows:—

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
"OTTAWA, 21st May, 1891,

"The Hon. Sir HECTOR L. LANGEVIN, K.C.M.G., C.B., "Minister of Public Works.

"SIR,—With reference to the production of the papers called for by the Committee on Privileges and Elections covering correspondence, plans, &c., respecting works at Quebec Harbour, Lévis and Esquimalt Graving Docks, I beg to state that since the letter of the clerk of said Committee was placed in my hands for action, I have caused searches to be made at once for the papers, which searches are now being pushed without loss of time under my personal supervision. You will kindly note that such correspondence dates back to 1877, and can only be found and put together by a careful examination of all the books and journals of this Department since that time, and that the work in question, in order to be complete, must necessarily take some time. I expect to be in a position to send the first instalment of papers to-morrow afternoon (Friday) and the balance next day or Monday next."

With reference to the production of the papers called for by the Committee, the hon. gentleman will see that no time has been lost in bringing them down. For example, we could not cut up the books of the Department, but have to get copies made of the portions required, because the books are wanted for the daily work of the Department. All we could do has been done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman's explanations are at all satisfactory. The hon. gentleman appears to me not to realize the gravity of the enquiry now pending with reference to these charges preferred by an hon. gentleman in this House. The hon. gentleman knows that when these charges were made as soon as the Committee met, the gentleman who made them stated explicitly that in order to prove them it was absolutely essential a number of public documents under the control of the Minister of Public Works should be put in the hands of the Committee. Now, if the hon. Minister was unable to procure all the vouchers and documents required, he certainly was able to procure some of them. These charges distinctly refer to several specific alleged offences. The hon. Minister knows they refer to the Quebec graving dock, the Lévis graving dock and the graving dock at Esquimalt, B.C. The papers relating to these are not at all mixed together, and those relating to each dock could be brought down separately, so that some progress might be made by the Committee. The hon. Minister of Public Works does not appear to me to appreciate the gravity of these proceedings at all. And I must protest in the very strongest language I can use against serious charges such as have been made against a Minister of the Crown, amounting to high crimes and misdemeanours, being treated in this off-hand manner. I do not suppose that in the history of this Parliament charges so grave were ever preferred before by any hon. member of this House against a Minister of the Crown; and I cannot conceive, when charges of such a serious character are preferred, that, I will not say such negligence, but such carelessness and inattention should be shown in respect of them, as has been shown, with the consent of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, by the Minister implicated. The hon. Minister seems to think the only charge is that against an employé of his Department, but a charge of a most serious nature has been preferred against the hon. Minister himself. I do not think that in the history of parliamentary institutions a charge of such a grave character ever was preferred against a Minister of the Crown, namely, that certain members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. paid and caused to be paid large sums of money to the hon. the Minister of Public Works out of the proceeds of their public contracts, and that entries of the said payments were made in the books of that firm. The charges are such as, if proved to be true in whole or in part, will necessitate the hon. gentleman stepping down and out from the high position he occupies and retiring in disgrace. And in what position do we stand here to-day? We stand here to-day hoping that the hon. gentleman's innocence will be proved, but I am bound to say that the hon. gentleman has taken a course which is not calculated to promote that belief. The hon. gentleman took the responsibility of reading, from his seat in this House, his answer to that charge, but did not take the responsibility of denying that it is true. He does not deny that he received the money; he does not deny that he received it at the times and in the manner charged; he does not deny that he received it in his capacity of Minister of Public Works; but he simply denies that he received it for his own personal use and benefit. And I say that a denial of that most serious charge, made in that lame, and halting, and qualified manner, puts the matter before this House in such a position as to throw the responsibility upon the hon. gentleman and upon his colleagues of seeing that greater promptness is exhibited in the production of the documents required. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman himself did not take care, by his own personal orders, that the documents should be brought down the very next day. He cannot have been unaware that these charges, although not formally and officially preferred, had been hanging in the air for some time. He could not have been unaware that the hon. gentleman who took the responsibility of publishing them in the public press proposed to make the charge formally against him, and, although I would be the last to say that a Minister of the Crown is bound officially to notice every charge made against him in the public press, still, when a charge of the kind made against the Minister of Public Works in the public press, is renewed on his responsibity by a member of this House against a Minister of the Crown, I say it behooves him to take steps to show that his conduct is pure and his skirts are clear. When, still further, an hon. member says he requires documents in connection with the charge against the Minister which are under the custody of the hon. gentleman himself, in order to prove the charge, I say that his duty, his stern duty, his uncompromising duty, is to give up every other business which might take his attention and to devote his mind to the production of these documents; provided only he did not feel inclined to accept the suggestion which was already made from this side of the House, to relieve himself of any further control of these documents, and to hand them over to one of his colleagues. If the hon. gentleman had taken that course, and one of his colleagues who was not charged in this way had said he was devoting all his time in order to bring down these documents, the House might have been satisfied. I am only speaking my own mind in this matter, but I say that I am not satisfied. I believe these charges are being treated in a very light way, and that the gravity of them is not appreciated by the hon. gentleman. Certainly the course which the hon. gentleman takes is not such as to lead us to assume that innocence on his part which we would be otherwise glad to do.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Public Works..... $47,607.50

Mr. DEVLIN. Does that item cover a salary of $1,200 for Mr. Horace Talbot, who is employed in the Department, and resides, I believe, at Gatineau Point?

Mr. FOSTER. This is not for the outside service.

Mr. DEVLIN. He is in the inside service. I find by the Auditor General's Report that Horace Talbot was paid a salary of $1,200 for twelve months up to the 30th June last. I suppose that amount comes under this heading?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; his salary is included in this vote.

Mr. DEVLIN. Might I ask what are his occupations?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is one of the clerks in the Department.

Mr. DEVLIN. And I suppose he has been employed for several years?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not want to make any special charge, but I do say that this employé of the Government, instead of discharging the duties for which he is paid, is generally found during an election time upon the public platform; and I call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that this same gentleman waged incessant warfare against us in the County of Ottawa, not only during the last election but during the local election in May and June last. I do not think it fair that we should pay salaries to officials who are away from their offices for four, five and six weeks at a time. I have been the victim in the County of Ottawa of this kind of work. It is known that the employés of the Departments have been allowed to go out into that county and do all they could against the Liberal candidates. When questioned regarding this matter, they stated previous to the local election that they had tendered their resignation to the Minister of Public Works. We were somewhat astonished to find the same gentlemen in the Dominion election, and we asked if they had been re-appointed after the local election. The answer was, "yes." Then, what are you doing here now? "Oh, we have resigned again," was the reply. Some time ago fault was found with the conduct of Messrs. Poirier and Tremblay, and they were dismissed because they had actively interfered in a political fight when they were officers of this House; but here are employés of the Government who go out day after day, evening after evening, and are allowed to be absent from their offices for weeks at a time, receiving their pay during that time, and they are not treating candidates in a gentleman-like way. I do not think it is fair that we should be asked to vote such sums of money to these men. The gentleman to whom I have alluded was not only actively engaged in the County of Ottawa, but I believe he was in Sherbrooke, and also in the County of Richelieu working for the Minister of Public Works himself; and it is said that his name was mentioned as a candidate in the County of Montmagny. This is the work we have to put up with, and yet, if an employé known to have Liberal views were to go out at all to take part in a contest, he would be summarily dismissed. I think we should have fair-play in this matter, and that the Minister of Public Works should explain the conduct of these employés.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister has heard the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin), and I notice that this same Horace Talbot was paid twelve months full salary up to the 30th June, which covers a part of the time my hon. friend refers to. If that is so, if he has received twelve months' pay for services rendered to the people only during a portion of that time, the Minister is bound to explain why leave of absence was granted to him to stump the country, either in the interests of the candidates for the Local Legislature or in his own interests. There is no reduction made in his pay for absence on special service. It is possible that we may find that this gentleman was also compensated in other ways. I would recommend my hon. friend to look carefully into the list of those who are receiving double pay to see whether the name of Mr. Horace Talbot figures there. In any case, I submit that the Minister of Public Works is bound to offer some explanation of the reasons which induced him to send the officers of his Department to electioneer for the benefit of the local candidates during the late provincial elections.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was not aware that Mr. Talbot had interfered in the elections, as the hon. gentleman says he has. I understand that Mr. Talbot resides at Gatineau Point, and being a resident of the County of Ottawa, he may have taken part in the elections. But, of course, he was not sent by me or by my Department. Whether he spoke or took any part in the elections, I do not personally know.

Mr. DEVLIN. He certainly did take part in the election; he spoke on a public platform on the 3rd day of March last, two days before the election—spoke bitterly. He was not only there, but he was in the County of Richelieu taking part, I understand, in the election; he was certainly in the County of Montmagny. Another one whose name I may mention is Mr. Chas. Leduc, who, in the month of May last, and the latter part of June, was absent three or four weeks, taking part in the local election in the County of Ottawa, and he was able to go from his office here and proceed to Maniwaki, 100 miles, and returning from there, to come down to the lower end of the county and in fact stump it from one end to the other, to interfere actively in the election, notwithstanding that previous to that time, and since that time, he has been an employé of one of the Departments. We have got to put up with his conduct, but if one of our own friends were to do the same thing, he would be summarily dismissed. The state of affairs now is such that our friends in the service are actually afraid to say for whom they might vote.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the subject is deserving of the serious consideration of the House. We have adopted here, to a very large extent, the English practice of permanent officials in the public service. Now, it is of the first consequence, if that system is to be maintained in this country, that those officials should abstain from actual participation in the political affairs of the country. We would not tolerate for a moment any active canvassing on the part of the judges of any of our courts, and it is just as necessary that those who are employed in the political service of the country, and who are paid by moneys that are taken from all classes of the population, should be equally neutral in politics. It is impossible that a public official can be an active politician and at the same time a faithful official. A man who will take the public platform in favour of the Ministry by whom he is employed, is an official who will intrigue against his political opponents, should they be placed in charge of the Administration; and so it will come to this, that the leaders of any party who may take charge of the Government of the country for the time being, in order to be assured of faithful public service, will find it necessary to dismiss from office all those who are politically opposed to them. So you will have the rule that to the victors belong the spoils, and that there must be a change of officials in every department of government with every change of administration. Now, Sir, these men were paid for a certain public service; they are required to undergo an examination; they are appointed in consequence of personal qualification to discharge certain duties, and if a Minister of the Crown takes an official out of his Department and sends him away for a month or six weeks to engage actively in canvassing the country, at the same time this official is receiving his salary from the public treasury, it is clear either that there must be a larger number of persons employed in order efficiently to carry on the Administration, or that there must be great neglect of the public service. It does seem to me that we must take the opinion of the House on the question, and say whether it shall be open to the Administration to enlist men from the public Departments of the country, who are receiving salaries out of the public treasury, to engage in political canvassing as the heads of a party. I do not think that should be tolerated. It is clear from the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa County, that this is a practice which prevails, at all events, in the Department of Public Works. We shall no doubt learn, before these Estimates are voted, how far this practice obtains in other Departments of the public service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend has laid down quite correctly, I think, the constitutional rule that prevails in England. I have myself always believed that it would be in the interest of the public service that civil servants should not vote; that is my individual opinion, but I am aware that the House, on two or three occasions, has pronounced against it. In any case, I am clear on this point, that no public servant ought to be allowed to do more than vote. I would not in the slightest degree excuse a public servant who interfered on our side, any more than I would the public servant who interfered in behalf of hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend is perfectly right in stating that, if this kind of thing is permitted, or is winked at, or is not punished, by hon. gentlemen opposite, their friends will only have them to blame if, in the event of any change of Government, extremely sweeping alterations should be found necessary to be made in the Civil Service. I have myself always been extremely adverse to introducing what is known as the American system, holding that it results in greater mischief to the public service. But it is absolutely necessary, if this is to be avoided, that cases like this should not be permitted to occur. I think my hon. friend stated that this gentleman, Mr. Horace Talbot, has been habitually and systematically in the habit of interfering with elections.

Mr. DEVLIN. He is only one of several.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt of that. This gentleman has been receiving money from the public service, and he has been using it for purposes which were never contemplated when the grant was made—at least, never contemplated, as we must suppose, by the House. There is another reason. If a Minister of the Crown chooses to put himself under obligations of a political kind to an officer of his Department, everybody knows that that gentleman becomes, to a certain extent, his master's master; everybody knows that promotion in such cases will go by favour, not by merit; and it very often happens that this person who has performed political services for the Administration, establishes claims which render it perfectly easy for him to neglect his duties. I have heard of a good many cases in which that has been done, and in which the Minister has been tongue-tied, has been unable to act, because he had seen fit, on various occasions, to ask one of his subordinates to interfere in election contests. Whether that has been the case, what salary Mr. Talbot is receiving, what his grade of promotion, etc., my hon. friend may, perhaps, find it necessary to enquire. But there is no doubt that you will assuredly pave the way for the introduction of the American system, and for the dismissal of a great number of officers, in the event of a change of Government, if this kind of thing is permitted to go on, and to go unpunished.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall the resolution be adopted?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; it is not carried. I am not going to waste any more time on Mr. Horace Talbot at the present moment. I observe that in course of the late discussion, at which I was not able to assist myself, that a question was raised as to the Chief Engineer of Public Works, Mr. Perley. I desire to know whether Mr. Perley has been suspended or whether he still continues to act in this Department?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He has not been suspended and he still continues to act as Chief Engineer.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is exceedingly improper that we should be asked to pass this item to pay Mr. Perley's salary, and allow him to remain in the position he now occupies. It appears to me, from the course adopted by the Government, that a very grave question arises, and it is this, whether Mr. Perley is chief in command, and whether the Minister under whom he serves, dare dismiss him under the circumstances, or not. That is the conclusion to which anyone must arrive. Very serious charges have been made; they have been preferred by an hon. member in his place in Parliament. When the resolution was before the House, three or four days ago, a very extended discussion took place in regard to it, and in the midst of the discussion the First Minister asked for an adjournment. The Opposition were quite justified in coming to the conclusion that when the item was again reached the Government would be able to announce they had suspended Mr. Perley, and the House would then be asked to pass the item. We have reached the item, but we are in precisely the same position as we were before. No change has been made, notwithstanding the very pronounced opposition in the House to passing the item under the existing circumstances, and in view of the very grave charges that stand recorded against that man by a member of this House; and yet the Government come before the House, under the same conditions as then existed, and ask its consent to the passing of the item. It is not showing proper courtesy, to say nothing more, to the Opposition to ask hon. members to consent to it. This is a very grave question, and it is one which the Opposition have a perfect right to discuss and criticize thoroughly, together with the course which the Government seem determined to pursue. A very serious question has also been brought forward by my hon. friend near me, with regard to the active efforts put forward by civil servants in opposing him in his constituency. This practice is carried out to a very considerable extent. On the discussion of another item some days ago, when the Minister of Finance asked for an increase of $200 to the salary of an official, it was pointed out by another hon. gentleman that the civil servant was down in a constituency, I believe in the constituency of the Minister of Finance, discharging very important duties in his behalf at the late election. No doubt the $200 increase of salary has been added as a thank-offering for the earnest, devoted and zealous efforts put forward to secure the Minister's return. And we have the same practice going on from one Department to another. We have examples of civil servants drawing, not the money of the Government, but the money of the people, the money of Reformers as well as Conservatives, pocketing round salaries each year, and then having the daring to go into constituencies and oppose the return of men brought out to represent the people. I repeat that it is extremely discourteous to ask the Opposition, in face of all the charges made against Mr. Perley, in face of the fact that he stands under a cloud next to the Minister of Public Works himself, to pass this item and to consent to the passage of this item of $4,000 to keep this man in his place and continue him in the public service notwithstanding the charges against him. It is exceedingly discreditable to the Government to ask us to assent to this item.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to the statement by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the subject would be brought up as to the extent to which it is legitimate for civil servants to interfere in political contests, I have nothing to say just now. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says that it is very discourteous for us to move this vote for the salary of the Chief Engineer of Public Works from the 1st July next until the 1st July, 1892. The reason why the vote was postponed the other night was that the House was exceedingly thin, and by a sort of arrangement across the floor we agreed that the Committee should rise and report progress and that the question on this vote should remain as it was. Now, however, it comes up in the ordinary way. As I have already taken occasion to say, this is not a question of Mr. Perley personally at all; it is a question of whether Parliament will provide a salary for the Chief Engineer of Public Works. That Department must have such an officer, and that salary is to be given to the officer who happens to be the Chief Engineer on the 1st July next. It is to be understood that Mr. Perley's conduct is to be under review this session by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I hope that long before the 1st of July next, the truth or falsehood of the statements concerning Mr. Perley will be investigated and decided upon by the Committee in the first place, and by the House in the second place. If any improprieties are proven against Mr. Perley the House will deal with that, and another Chief Engineer will be appointed; but there must be a Chief Engineer, and this is not a vote for Mr. Perley, but for whoever happens to be Chief Engineer at the time. Now, as to the question of suspension I at once say that I will never agree to suspend a respectable man who hitherto has had a good character, who still holds a responsible position and who has been trusted for years, because charges are brought against him and not yet proven. I would not keep my place for a moment if that were done, and if such a practice is introduced, it must be introduced by a Government of which I am not a member. I will stick to the English practice, that every man should be considered innocent until he is proven guilty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am rather surprised at the last proposition laid down by the Prime Minister. Certainly, the appropriation we are now asked to vote is an appropriation to be paid after the 1st July.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To be "earned" after the 1st July.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, "earned" after the 1st July, and it may be earned by someone else than Mr. Perley. There is no doubt that no one is disputing that proposition, but the proposition in which the House is interested is to know what action the Government have taken with regard to a person who if he remains in office will earn this salary of Chief Engineer. The First Minister has just stated that until the truth of this charge is established he will not suspend Mr. Perley; but supposing Mr. Perley were charged with murder, would the hon. gentleman apply that rule—how would it be in that case?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he were charged with murder he would be charged before a magistrate and there would be sworn evidence against him, and he would be put upon his trial and he could not perform his duties.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But he might be bailed out, and I suppose that if he should be bailed the hon. gentleman would still continue him in office. I do not understand the English rule to be as the hon. gentleman has laid down. What makes the matter important in this particular is that Mr. Perley is charged with certain acts which affect him in his character as Chief Engineer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not seen such charges.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I understand such charges have been made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman does not know the charges, and yet he asks for a suspension. He does not know what the charges are, or whether there are any charges at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The charges are before the House, and it is pretty clear the First Minister has not read them. Now, what is the English practice. I will take the case of Lord Melville. In 1805 Lord Melville, who was then First Lord of the Admiralty, was impeached by the House of Commons for certain irregularities committed while holding the office of Treasurer of the Navy. After a criminatory vote had been carried by the House, Lord Melville resigned his position as a Minister of the Crown, although his trial had not yet taken place. The rule that a man is to be considered innocent until guilt is established did not prevent his resignation, and it was deemed expedient to erase his name from the list of Privy Councillors, although he was afterwards acquitted of the charge perferred against him. That is the English rule.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was first the criminatory vote.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was just such a vote as was given here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was just such a vote as might follow condemnation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and Lord Melville did not resign until then.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was a vote which put Lord Melville, better known as Sir Henry Dundas, on his trial. We have certain charges made against persons here, and the question has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the enquiry of the Committee is exactly such an enquiry as takes place upon an impeachment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh!

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says "Oh!" but I say that is the case. It is for the purpose of ascertaining whether the party is guilty or innocent of the charge. It is a preliminary trial, for the Committee on Privileges and Elections have no power to punish. They report to this House, they perform the particular functions that are performed by the House of Lords in the case of impeachment, but the fact that they have not power to give an effective judgment with a view to punishment does not at all alter the case in this particular. I stated to the House the other day, and I stated, I think, with perfect fairness, that when these charges were made the persons who are to prepare the necessary papers with a view to bring them before the committee, should not be the persons who stand charged. It is a well-settled rule of law that a man is not to be a judge in his own case, and when you place in the hands of the Chief Engineer any part of the collection and arrangement and preparation of the papers which an hon. member of this House said were necessary for the purpose of establishing the case against him, you are departing from that rule, for you are making him to some extent a prosecutor against himself. It does seem to me that the last proposition laid down by the First Minister is indefensible, and entirely at variance with the principles of our law and with the rule that is followed in the United Kingdom.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not observing his usual accuracy, or rather that his memory has failed him when he referred to the case of Lord Melville and his impeachment. That case and the one under discussion are not analogous at all; on the contrary, if the hon. gentleman will look back at the history of that case he will find that when Lord Melville was First Lord of the Admiralty there were charges brought against Sir James Trotter, a subordinate officer of the Admiralty, and an attempt made to connect Lord Melville with them, somewhat, perhaps, under circumstances similar to this case. Lord Melville, upon these charges being brought against him, did not resign, and Mr. Pitt did not ask him to resign, and he remained in office for more than a year, perhaps for two years, while the evidence was taken inculpating him, as the majority on the committee believed, as being connected with, or conniving at, or submitting to the impropriety of Sir James Trotter. During all the time of that investigation, which is similar to the investigation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, Lord Melville remained First Lord of the Admiralty. It was not until the committee reported, censuring Lord Melville and connecting him with the improprieties committed by Sir James Trotter to such an extent that the House of Commons took it as a condemnation and impeached him of high crimes and misdemeanours, that he resigned. In addition to that, Lord Melville was a political officer as the hon. gentleman knows, and ought to command the implicit confidence of Parliament, and he could not with propriety retain his office. I remember another case, that of Lord Henry Lennox, who was Chief Commissioner of Works. When he was charged he rose in his place voluntarily and he said that he desired to resign and to fight his battle alone. He denied the charges and he said he wished to fight his battle independent of Parliament, and not to cloak himself with any supposed influence he might have as being a member of the Government, and he did not wish that anything connected with the charges against him should in any way, directly or indirectly, affect the Government, or that they might be supposed to be conniving with him, or supporting him against the charges. However, the case of Lord Melville is precisely a case in support of my argument and contention.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be, but I think that every member of this House who will look at this matter with reasonable partiality, will feel that it is an unfortunate thing that a gentleman who is charged with very great crimes and misdemeanours should be the person whose official duty it is to submit these documents for the investigation of this Committee. I state—and this as my own individual opinion—that I believe that the hon. Minister of Public Works would have better consulted his own dignity, would have better consulted the dignity of the Parliament of Canada, and the interest of the Government, too, if he had for the time being changed office with some of his colleagues. That, however, I am not disposed to insist on further than to state that I believe he would have done well to have done so. But the hon. First Minister, if I understood him rightly just now, stated that no charges had been preferred against Mr. Perley. Well, I find the hon. gentleman who brought this matter forward, among other things states:

"That the said Thomas McGreevy used his influence as a member of this House with the Department of Public Works, and in particular with Henry F. Perley, Esq., to induce him to report to the Quebec Harbour Commission in favour of the payment of the said sum of 35 cents per cubic yard.

"That the correspondence on this subject between Henry F. Perley and Larkin, Connolly & Co., before the Quebec Harbour Commissioners were consulted, took place at the suggestion of the said Thomas McGreevy, and was conducted with his knowledge and participation in such a manner as to conceal from the eyes of Parliament and of the public the corrupt character of the contract, in connection with which he had received $27,000."

I think these are very strong charges against Mr. Perley.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Against Mr. McGreevy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They implicate Mr. Perley very grievously.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An inference may be drawn from these statements affecting Mr. Perley, but they contain no direct charge against him. They charge that Mr. McGreevy used his influence with Mr. Perley, but it is not said that Mr. Perley yielded to the seductions of Mr. McGreevy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to another clause:

"That in the execution of the works of this contract extensive frauds were perpetrated, to the detriment of the public treasury, and sums of money were paid corruptly to officials under the control and direction of Henry F. Perley and appointed by the Quebec Harbour Commission."

Mr. FOSTER. That is, that the officials were under the control of Mr. Perley, not that the payments were made under him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, if you connect together the three statements I have read, you will see that Henry F. Perley—he may be innocent or not, I express no opinion as to that—is deeply implicated as an accomplice in the charges made against Thomas McGreevy and the hon. Minister of Public Works. I will not offer an opinion on the legal merits of the case, but I do not believe that any layman reading these documents would form any other opinion than that Henry F. Perley was to all intents and purposes, I was going to say in the dock, along with the other parties charged.

Mr. McNEILL. I want to say just one word on this matter, and that is, that I do think it would be more generous on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to allow this matter to stand over until Mr. Perley had his trial. Mr. Perley, as we all know, has been for many years one of the most trusted officers in the public service of Canada. I have had some dealings with Mr. Perley, and though there are some personal reasons why I should not speak very favourably of Mr. Perley's conduct towards myself, for I must say that on more than one occasion I have received rather scant courtesy at his hands, yet I will say this, that from what I have known of him during the seven or eight sessions that I have been in Parliament, it will take very strong evidence indeed to persuade me that Mr. Perley is other than an ornament to the public service of Canada. My belief is that Mr. Perley is one of the most upright and honourable men to be found in the public service to-day; and, believing this, I must say that I think it would be more generous if hon. gentlemen would hold their hands and allow this matter to go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where there will be an opportunity afforded to Mr. Perley to defend himself, who I believe is being almost killed—as anyone will see who knew him a year or two ago and looks into his face to-day—by the pressure of this charge against him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend misapprehends the point altogether. Nobody on this side wishes to find Mr. Perley guilty; I myself certainly do not. We are simply objecting—and this is a totally different thing—to the man who is accused, no matter who he may be, being called upon to prepare the papers or to decide what particular papers may come before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I understand that it will be part of Mr. Perley's official duty to say what papers will come down in return to my hon. friend's demand for the production of those documents, and I think the hon. gentleman who spoke last will admit that this important and delicate duty should be put into the hands of anyone rather than those of any of the persons accused.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman makes a mistake in supposing that Mr. Perley has anything to do with the preparation or custody of the documents. All the papers are in the hands of the Deputy head, Mr. Gobeil, and Mr. Perley can only have access to them through the intervention of Mr. Gobeil.

Mr. EDGAR. The charge made before the House by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) was levelled against two members of the House, one being a member of the Government, and it brings in Mr. Perley incidentally, and not in a direct manner. But the hon. First Minister has referred to cases in which Ministers of the Crown had construed the bearing of charges made against them. If he had looked at the case of Lord Ellenborough in 1858, he would have found that on the publication of a despatch to Lord Canning, then Governor of India, from Lord Ellenborough, which caused tremendous excitement in the country, Lord Ellenborough at once avowed that he was solely responsible for the publication of that despatch, and he sent his resignation directly to Her Majesty and not to Lord Derby, the Prime Minister, in order to shield his colleagues from responsibility for his act; and in the debate that took place on the subject in the House of Lords, Lord Derby laid down the principle that Ministers were only responsible for the acts of their colleagues if they failed to disavow all responsibility for the act as soon as public attention had been drawn to it. Now, in this case, a gentleman very near to the hon. First Minister, is charged with matters very much more serious than the publication of a despatch. These are much more serious matters, also, than those with which Lord Henry Lennox was charged with; and I admit it is a question of taste, as regards the Minister of Public Works and the First Minister and the others, whether the Minister of Public Works should continue in control of his Department, in which are the papers required for this investigation. The First Minister will remember also the case of Mr. Stansfield, who was accused in 1864, in the press and publicly, of participation in a plot to assassinate the Emperor of the French. An attempt was made in the House of Commons to censure Mr. Stansfield, but the House voted down the motion. As soon, however, as the motion of censure was defeated, the Minister rose and said he would assume the entire responsibility, and retire, thus relieving his colleagues from any imputation or injury. In fact, he said his remaining there would not strengthen his colleagues, and therefore he preferred to leave. It is largely a matter of taste. If the First Minister chooses to allow things to go on as they are going, it is certainly not for us to say anything more. That is his affair and not ours. If it suits him it suits us. I would be sorry to press my opinion on so experienced and able a statesmen as the First Minister, as to what would be his duty or the duty of any of his colleagues under the circumstances.

Mr. DEVLIN. I must thank the right hon. the First Minister for his promise to investigate the matter I brought to his notice. I wish to say, however, it was not through any spirit of hostility to any member of the Civil Service that I mentioned this case, but in order that a matter which is of serious importance should be looked into. I would further ask the First Minister to extend the investigation, so that it may include all the various employés of the various Departments who have taken part in the late Ottawa County elections, both Federal and Local.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the hon. gentleman who spoke just now, does not imagine there is on this side any feeling against Mr. Perley, whose name has been mentioned in connection with these charges. That gentleman's public career has been an honourable and distinguished one. So far as his name is known in the Maritime Provinces, I can bear testimony to the fact that there it has always been a synonym for upright conduct. There are peculiar circumstances with Mr. Perley's state of health and his family relations calculated to evoke sympathy; and I am sure that sympathy is felt in a very great measure by every hon. member on this side. I may add, that I hope it will be shown that Mr. Perley has not been guilty of improper conduct, and in that case no man in this House will be more glad or proud than I will, and I am sure my colleagues around me entertain the same feeling

Department of Railways and Canals... $56,000

Mr. FOSTER. There is an error in the Estimates. The number of second class clerks in the column 1890-91 is printed as eight, whereas it should be nine, so that the increase is two and not three as appears there. There are nine statutory increases at $50; one at $37.50, and one at $12.50. There is an additional second class clerk at $1,125, and another at $1,112.50. There is also an assistant to the private secretary at $300, making in all $3,450. There is a decrease in the estimated salary of the Deputy of $1,400, and two third class clerks, making a decrease of $4,900, and a net decrease in the whole estimate of $1,650.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. the First Minister propose, in future, to dispense entirely with the Deputy Minister, and confine himself to the services of Mr. Schreiber?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Trudeau has been for many years the Deputy head, Mr Schreiber the Chief Engineer of Railways, and the lamented Mr. Page, Chief Engineer of Canals. Mr. Trudeau being an engineer, and especially a hydraulic engineer, as well as Mr. Page, he and Mr. Page acted together for years in connection with the construction of canals and the improvement of the St. Lawrence and other waterways, so that when Mr. Page suddenly died it was thought better that Mr. Trudeau, while still retaining office as Deputy head, should be Mr. Page's successor as Chief Engineer of Canals to carry out the plans which had been settled pretty much by them in concert. Mr. Trudeau is now the Deputy head of the Department of Railways and Canals and also the Chief Engineer of Canals, and will continue to be so until it is found that the work is too much for him and some engineer is trained to take the place of Mr. Page. In the meantime the salary of the Deputy head is saved.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it as deputy or Chief Engineer that Mr. Trudeau is paid?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is the Deputy head and Chief Engineer, but draws only the salary of Chief Engineer, which is $6,000. He draws the larger and drops the smaller salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt Mr. Trudeau is a good officer, but I rather suspect that the hon. gentleman, if he finds it necessary to replace the Chief Engineer, will find that he has landed himself in a dilemma: for, unless Mr. Trudeau is built on entirely different principles from most men, it would be very disagreeable for him, after enjoying a salary of $6,000, to fall back upon one of $4,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He will not do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not if he can help it, I am quite sure; but the difficulty is this: that if Mr. Trudeau is to continue as Deputy head, and a Chief Engineer be afterwards appointed, you will have the anomaly that you will have one Deputy head drawing $6,000, and a great many others drawing $3,200, and you will find a strike for higher wages on their part.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see any fear of that. Mr. Trudeau is now receiving $6,000, and as long as he remains in the service he will continue to receive that salary. It is rather an anomaly that the Deputy head, the permanent head of the Department, should receive less salary than the two engineers. Mr. Trudeau is an experienced engineer himself, and the only consequence will be that if it is found he requires assistance, he will still be Deputy head and Chief Engineer, and will get an assistant who will be quite satisfied to take the $4,000 and wait for an increase, as Mr. Trudeau, like his political head at this moment, is not a young man, and we may both retire together.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that in the year before last we only spent $44,000, and this year we are asked for $56,000. Now that we have completed a great many of our public works, we ought to be able to make a considerable reduction in the expenditure of the staff required in this Department. Certainly the same amount of work that was going on a few years ago is not now being discharged by the Department of Railways and Canals. A great many railways are now built which formerly necessitated the employment of a large staff, and, though there is some reduction, I think there should be a larger reduction in this expenditure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In regard to railways, there will be, and there ought to be ere long a reduction in the engineering staff, because there is no new railway work going on except the Extension Railway and the railway running through Cape Breton. As to canals, however, there is an increased amount of work. The Williamsburg Canal and the Cornwall Canal are now worked up to high pressure in order to have our great waterway finished as soon as possible, and we are entering upon the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, so that there will be no reduction for some years to come in that branch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not refer to any increased expenses on the Trent Valley Canal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That depends upon the support we get from both sides of the House, including my hon. friend.

Mr. BARRON. The First Minister telegraphed that a grant was to be made this year to complete the Trent Valley Canal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman's memory is not quite correct.

Mr. BARRON. I have seen the telegram, and it says that the Trent Valley Commissioners have reported in favour of the completion of that canal, and that Parliament will be asked this session for a vote for that purpose. So I suppose there will be a considerable sum for that work in the Supplementary Estimates. I would call the attention of the Minister to the fact that the railway bridge at Fenelon Falls, to which reference has so often been made, is still there, preventing barges of any size from going down.

Mr. FOSTER. This does not come under this item, which refers only to the officers in the inside service.

Mr. BARRON. I only desire to call the attention of the First Minister to this matter now so that he might see that it is attended to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have been called upon for many years without effect, and I am afraid that, unless the Government takes decided action, matters will remain as they are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps, under present circumstances, more decided action may be taken. I may point out that my hon. friend has not been altogether forgotten. The completion of the Trent Valley Canal is provided for by a vote of $76,000 in the current year, and according to the Estimates before us, we have spent no less than $2,000, and a re-vote of $74,000 will be asked, which I hope will satisfy my hon. friend.

Department of the Geological Survey.. $48,310

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase here of $980. There are 23 statutory increases, amounting to $1,150, and one at $30, making a total increase of $1,180. Four new technical officers have been appointed, and one third class clerk has been promoted to second class, and there has been an increase given to Messrs. Ingall, Curran and Tyrrell. Then, some clerks have been dropped, and one has had his salary reduced by $50, making the net increase $980.

Mr. WELDON. The people of Albert County are very desirous that the men of the survey should make their way down to the southern part of that county again. There was a good survey made some years ago, but it was a very hurried one, and there is a feeling now that a survey would do a great deal to direct the attention of the public to the great mineral resources of the county.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of there being twenty technical officers in place of six? What is the effect of making these fourteen gentleman technical officers? Does it place them under a different regime?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Last year we passed an Act by which we made the Department of the Geological Survey a separate Department, and by clause 4 of the Act, at the suggestion of the Director, we authorized the appointment of all these officers as technical officers. They are only really classed as they were previously, but the Act requires that they shall be technical officers and specifies what their qualifications should be. It causes no change in the expenditure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that technical officers, those having special qualifications, generally receive higher salaries and are removed to a certain extent from the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Their salaries have not been increased, except in the case of the two or three mentioned by the Finance Minister. This was brought about by strong representations made by the gentlemen themselves, who drew my attention to the inequality of the salaries they were receiving with those received by others occupying almost similar positions, not only in Canada, but in the United States; and on the strong representations of the Director, I assented to placing this slight increase in the Estimates. Within the last few years we have lost some of our most valuable men. We have lost Mr. Harrington, who is now receiving $2,500 at McGill College; we have lost Professor Spencer, who is receiving $3,000 as State Geologist of Georgia; we have lost Mr. F. D. Adams, who is now receiving $1,500 at McGill College, and Mr. Kenrick, who is receiving $1,000 at St. John's College, Winnipeg, and about $1,400 as Assistant Dominion Analyst for Manitoba. We lost last year Mr. Lawson, a gentleman well known to hon. gentleman here; he is now Professor of Geology in a university in California. I think that we should endeavour, so far as possible, to keep our able men with us, and we are choosing the best and most talented young men from the different universities, particularly those who show an aptitude for geological pursuits, and we are taking them into service, so far as we can, in order to give them an education which we hope, by-and-bye, will place them in the high position which many of our men now occupy. That is the policy we have pursued in the Department, and I hope there will be no objection taken to these slight increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not disposed to take exception to paying this class of officers well, but I want to understand exactly what we are doing. I believe there are twenty gentlemen altogether under the head of technical officers. Am I to understand from the Minister of the Interior that these are all in one class, and that they may, by process of time, ascend to a point equivalent of that of chief clerk?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; if they serve long enough they are all entitled to the statutory increase, which would bring their salaries up to $2,400.

Office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London, salaries..... $7,384

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). These items pertain to the inside of the Department of Finance, the Minister tells us. I just wish to enquire whether the High Commissioner is engaged in the inside or the outside service at present, and when would be the proper time to discuss him.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not present just now. He certainly does not come in this category, anyway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who looks after these officials during the miscellaneous absences of the High Commissioner on special services? Are they so well trained that they are able to run alone?

Mr. FOSTER. They are able to go by themselves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, does not the hon. gentleman think that if we are so fortunate as to have officers of this class who are able to go by themselves, who do not require to be looked after, who can run the office quite as well, and perhaps a good deal better, when my lord the High Commissioner is away on special service, as when he is there—does not the hon. gentleman, who gives these gentlemen so high a character, think that he could leave them there without a High Commissioner at all, and that he would be justified in letting them run the office alone all the time?

Mr. FOSTER. They can do their own work, but not the High Commissioner's.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is certainly a part of the High Commissioner's work, particularly that part which goes towards making things pleasant in Nova Scotia—this work, probably, these gentlemen cannot do; but all the practical work that he does, what he is paid to do, what he is sent there to perform—all that, I rather think, these gentlemen could do just as well without him as with him. I am glad to have the testimony of the Minister of Finance to the fact, and I hope the House will make a note of it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice that the High Commissioner serves in another office. I do not know whether the Government constituted the office for him or not, but it appears to me to be a type of the eternal fitness of things. I see from the Empire that Sir Charles Tupper has been appointed director of water works and gas works to a corporation which has just been organized with a capital of two million. Now, if he is going to manage the gas works there, how is he going to manage the gas works here? Does he get an extra salary for this? Is this $2,000 for his extra salary? I think that if we want a High Commissioner at all, if there are duties for him to discharge, it would be quite as well for him to attend to them instead of going into trade outside the High Commissioner's business. He is paid a handsome salary, and still he is going into trade and taking the management of these corporations. How much are we granting now in order to keep up this enterprise in which he is engaged? Is he going to employ servants paid by the country in order to manage these companies and these works? That is something the House ought to know. I do not know whether the Government are in this concern or not. I do not think they will manage it as successfully as Sir Charles would if he were here. But they should let the House know about it, and if he is under their instructions, if he is guided by them, if he is moved by them, and if they still control him, we ought to know whether they are with him partners in this gas enterprise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think my hon. friend has brought up a matter which may require a little consideration at the hands of the Government. Now, I doubt exceedingly the wisdom or the propriety of the High Commissioner of Canada, an officer who receives a handsome salary from us, and a house which we have furnished for him regardless of expense—I greatly doubt the propriety of his officiating as a guinea pig in London. I do not think it is consonant with our dignity and——

An hon. MEMBER. What is a guinea pig?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must refer my hon. friend to the habitués of the Stock Exchange. Practically speaking, it means this: that gentlemen who occupy certain official positions are very often in the habit of—what shall I call it?—hiring themselves out to financial institutions in London, for which they receive various sums, some larger and some smaller. In the case of high commissioner guinea pigs, a guinea a week—from which practice they take their name—may be allowed. A plate of guineas, I have understood, is handed round to the various directors at the ordinary meetings, and each of them is allowed to extract one; perhaps, in the case of a high commissioner he may be allowed to extract a little more. Anyhow, I doubt exceedingly whether it is desirable, or prudent, or in the interests of the people of Canada, to retain our High Commissioner.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before resuming the discussion on this item for the office of the High Commissioner in London, it may not be out of place for me to make a reference to the Chairman (Mr. Bergeron). The hon. gentleman has occupied a seat in my neighbourhood during one Parliament, and I am glad to see the elevation to which he has attained. If his services and his abilities are not in due time properly rewarded, I hope he will bolt from the party again. During the time I have had a seat here I have had three or four members sitting beside me, all of whom have attained eminence. I do not know whether the Government have the idea that those who sit beside me are specially fitted on that account to occupy high positions, or not. Mr. Royal was made Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories; Mr. Mercier sat beside me one session and subsequently became Premier of Quebec. I do not know whether this Government made him so or not. Now the hon. member for Beauharnois has been elevated to the position of Deputy Speaker; from the fact that he sat near me three or four sessions, his qualifications cannot be doubted. In coming to the item to which I called the attention of the Committee before Recess, I will refer to the notices which appeared in the newspapers in regard to this subject. I shall also refer to the dual offices that are held by persons appointed to offices by the Government, and consider the advisability of permitting those who are paid by this House, and paid fairly well, to enter into the management of other concerns and business in the old country, thus taking their time and attention from the duties and responsibilities of the offices conferred upon them by the Government and this House. From the newspaper report I notice that Sir Charles Tupper has been appointed Director of the Water Works and Gas Works Securities Corporation, which has just been organized with a capital of £2,000,000 sterling. It is gratifying to know that our High Commissioner is not financially in distress; that he is able to incorporate probably by himself—it does not say he is the manager—a company with a capital of ten million dollars. The object of the new corporation is to buy up water works, gas works, and other concerns of the kind in Canada and the United States. I draw the attention of my ultra-loyal friends opposite to the words "United States," not that I consider it a very treasonable thing myself, but I do not know how hon. gentlemen on the other side may find this compatible with their recent utterances on this subject. You would imagine at least that an officer appointed by the Government of Canada, drawing salary and pickings to the amount of $25,000 or $30,000 a year, would invest his money in enterprises in Canada. I think that is the position which hon. members opposite would have supported during the last election; but they would probably subscribe to a different doctrine now. It is gratifying to know that legislation of an Imperial character will be passed in order to allow this company to go into operation. It is further indicated by the telegram that legislation in the colonies will be required in order to allow our High Commissioner to spread himself through Canada and the United States. If the office of the High Commissioner does not require to be kept open during the whole year, then it is a question for the House and the Government to determine during what period of the year the office shall be kept open. If the High Commissioner can undertake to manage the duties of his office and also this gas concern with a capital of $10,000,000, it is clear to the members of this House and to the people that the time has arrived when this question can no longer be shirked but that it must be dealt with freely by the people. It is not for me to discuss the ways and means whereby the money was secured to the extent of $10,000,000; but the High Commissioner may have provided all the funds himself. That is the question. I do not know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that considering this is the first night you have occupied your position, it would be fair to call upon you to decide whether we should discuss in this House, how and by what means he who has been kept on a salary of almost starvation price can establish a gas company with a capital of $10,000,000. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that I do not doubt his qualifications to manage this company. I do not deny but that he may possess qualifications for this office, but the question for the people of this country to consider is, whether it is longer necessary for us to keep a High Commissioner to discharge the duties of a company involving so much capital as this. It is known to everyone in Canada that the High Commissioner was absent from London quite a portion of this year. He was engaged in the elections here, and it is well known that since the elections he has been keeping himself prominently before the people through the press of the United Kingdom, and he has maintained that prominence at the expense of the Ministers of the Crown here. He would indicate from his utterances that they are his servants instead of his masters: that is the position he has kept prominently before the people of England and the people of Canada. Now, whether he has been always wise or politic in his utterances it is for the House and the Government to decide. He draws his salary from the people of this country independent of party: he has made statements in reference to the Liberal party of this country of such a character that it becomes the duty of the Government to take cognizance of his utterances and to put a stop to them. The Liberal party in this country pay him three-fourths of his salary, because they represent three-fourths of the best interest of the country, and if the High Commissioner continues to use language so offensive to them it becomes the duty of the Government and the duty of this Parliament to say that no gentleman shall occupy a position in which he attempts to degrade and insult those who pay him the larger portion of his salary. During his election campaign the High Commissioner used utterances which were not of a character to be approved of by fair-minded people, no matter to what party they belonged. I believe he spoke at Windsor, in the County of Essex, and it is gratifying to those who sit on this side of the House to know that the Government lost a supporter in that constituency and that we gained a supporter by a majority of some 700 votes. That is one good thing at least for which we should feel a little grateful to Sir Charles Tupper and cause us to be a little lenient towards him. He also spoke at London in favour of the Minister of Agriculture, and my distinguished young friend (Mr. Hyman) was returned by a large majority from that constituency. Now, if the High Commissioner had gone on in that way I might be inclined to excuse some of his vagaries and some of his language, but no matter how eminent his services may be, I cannot forget what is due to the people whom I represent, and to the people of this country generally. After the election was over, Sir Charles Tupper assailed the Grand Trunk Railway, a great enterprise in this country. He made an onslaught on the Grand Trunk Railway Company, because, as he states, they did not consent to convey the voters to the polls and to use their influence to support the Government. I wish to draw the attention of the Government to a speech which he made at Amherst against the Grand Trunk Railway, and I want to ascertain what is the intention of the Government in reference to this speech. I will read the speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it as read.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I know the gentlemen on the other side of the House do not like this kind of literature. I know they feel a little ashamed of it, for well they may feel ashamed, and if they do feel ashamed I must congratulate them, because where there is shame there is some hope of reform. However that may be, Sir Charles Tupper said:

"Among the great odds that the Government had to contend with in Ontario was the enormous power of the Grand Trunk Railway, and Sir Charles proceeded to handle that corporation without gloves. He said he never could have believed that they would have been base enough to be guilty of the disgraceful conduct that had characterized them during the recent compaign. The Grand Trunk railway was deeply indebted to the Canadian Government."

That is something I never knew before—

"That corporation had received enormous assistance from Canada"——

That is more sensible than to say they received it from the Government—

"That corporation had received enormous assistance from Canada—far more in proportion to the benefit received than had been given the Canadian Pacific. When he was Minister of Railways the Grand Trunk had come to him, explained the danger and peril they were in at their inability to reach Chicago, and by purchasing from them for $1,500,0 0 the River du Loup section of the road, in which they were sinking money, he had enabled them to reach Chicago and saved them from paralysis."

He would have allowed the company to take paralysis if he knew they would not support him all the days of their lives.

"But had he known as much then as he knows now he doubted very much if he would have done it. But the Grand Trunk had never forgiven the Government for the construction of the Canadian Pacific.

"Sir Charles said he would let the world into a state secret."

I believe he would, or any other secret if it was going to injure those who opposed him. I believe he is sincere in this matter:

"In 1880, authorized by Sir John Macdonald, he had offered the Grand Trunk Railway Company, through Sir Henry Tyler, all the privileges and franchises now enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific if they would build that road. Sir Henry Tyler was willing to undertake the contract if the thousand mile section between Nipissing and Port Arthur was omitted. Sir Charles Tupper pointed out that that section was an essential part of the line. Canada could never become a nation without it: so the privilege of constructing the Canadian Pacific was refused by the Grand Trunk. Sir Charles pointed out the essential character of the Lake Superior section. Had it not been for it, Canada would be completely at the mercy of the Americans in case of non-intercourse. Sir Charles Tupper's last act as Finance Minister was to induce the Government to give the Grand Trunk a large subsidy to aid the construction of the Sarnia tunnel; yet, when Sir Henry Tyler was denouncing the Government recently and threatening what he would do when the elections came on, at the same time congratulating his shareholders on the completion of the tunnel, he never referred to the Canadian subsidy. Sir Henry had been true to his threats and the Grand Trunk management had commanded their employés to vote against the Government. This corporation exercised great influence, but even if they thought they had ground for complaint against the Government, he never believed the Grand Trunk would be base enough to go back upon England, to go back upon its English shareholders, to go back upon Canada and to support a party and a policy whose avowed mission it was to strike down British institutions in North America and bring about the political union of Canada with the United States."

I would like to call the attention of the hon. First Minister, who, I am glad to see, is now in his place, to this extraordinary utterance of his High Commissioner, and I would like to ask him if he thinks it is compatible with the daty of the Government to allow one of their officers to insult a party which is as loyal to every tradition of this country as any other party, and if he does not think the Government should take some action to prevent any officer in the pay of the people insulting those who have shown their loyalty on every possible occasion. Now, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway makes a reply to this speech, and shows the reason why the High Commissioner made this assault:

"Sir Henry Tyler publishes to-day a long, effective and temperate reply to Tupper's charges. He shows how on February 25 Tupper had a long interview with General Manager Seargeant and warmly appealed for the support of the company in the present emergency, promising in return that if the Government were sustained the company should have the fullest and most friendly support from the Government if and when required."

Now, did Sir Charles Tupper go to Mr. Seargeant at the instance of the Government to promise that, in the event of the Grand Trunk supporting the Government, they would receive every consideration they might require? Then Sir Charles comes back to the charge. This is his last shot:

"Sir Charles asserts that it is now proved that the Grand Trunk Railway went to a shameful extreme to aid the ruined gamesters in attempting to subvert British institutions in Canada."

Ruined gamesters! This is the term that the High Commissioner, who receives from the people of Canada about $30,000 every year, applies to the great Liberal party, which represents half the people of this country; and the Government, regardless of its duty, apparently is willing to allow that insult to go unanswered on the floors of Parliament. I say it is an insult to every man, woman and child in this country to allow a paid officer to make statements so offensive to any portion of the people of Canada. If that officer were in the employ of friends of mine, I would say that it would be unworthy of them to retain him in office any longer. I think it is time this sort of thing were stopped, for it appears that he not only threatens the party on this side of the House, but he threatens the Government. He is going to do wonderful things with his majority if the Government do not do what he wants done; he is going to bring his power and influence to induce his following to go in and ask the Government what they like, promising that they shall receive it. Now, it does appear to me that something should be done by the Government to stop such utterances as these being made by the High Commissioner against the people who sustain and support him. It is bad enough to have to pay such an outrageous salary to him, but it is worse to allow such utterances to be made by him without a word of protest from the Government. It seems singular that a gentleman who is as loyal as Sir Charles Tupper says he is should now be managing this gas company, which intends to do business in the United States. That would seem to be an ultra-loyal piece of business. And in this connection it does seem strange that the Grand Trunk, which goes to Chicago, is a disloyal road, leading to annexation, while the Canadian Pacific, that goes to New York, is ultra-loyal. That is one of the things I cannot understand. It will require a little light from the hon. First Minister or some of the other Ministers. Now, I hope this item will be fully considered before it is passed. If the High Commissioner is going to run this gas company, perhaps we could relieve him of his duties for the rest of this year. We are not going to have another election this year, and I do not think the Government will require his services, so that perhaps we could let this item drop. Let him attend to the gas; let him monopolize all the gas in this country and in the United States, and perhaps his sustaining power will be such with the aid of that imponderable, elastic agent that he will be able to keep the Government under his heel for all time to come.

Mr. McMULLEN. There are one or two questions which I want to ask with regard to this item before it is passed. In the first place, I notice that the estimates for the incidental expenses of the office of High Commissioner when it was first established in 1881 amounted to $3,000, in 1882 they amounted to $5,294, in 1883 to $5,250 and in 1884 to $5,453. Now, while Sir Alexander Galt performed the duties of High Commissioner, these items included the rent of his house and all other expenses; but since Sir Charles has been appointed, we have bought for him a residence at a cost of $48,000, and we have to pay taxes on that residence which are no doubt included in the vote we are asked to pass, namely, $8,790. I cannot well understand how the amount could have run up from about $4,500 at which it stood when Mr. Galt performed the duties, to nearly $9,000, and the disparity is greater when we consider that in Sir Alexander Galt's time we had to pay the rent of a house which was included in the amount of contingencies, whereas the sum now granted to cover contingencies does not include any item for rent, because we have none to pay, having bought a residence for Sir Charles Tupper. I have carefully read over, and I recommend hon. gentlemen opposite to read over the report of our High Commissioner in London, and I fail to see in any part of it any ground whatever for continuing the office of High Commissioner in London, unless I except one good act which Sir Charles Tupper has done, namely, the sending out to this country a delegation of tenant farmers for the purpose of inspecting the lands of our Dominion and the improved lands in the several Provinces. That I consider was a very good move, and I hope it will have the result of inducing a number of these people to buy up lands in our older Provinces and settle on them, which lands can be procured cheaply, and thus allow those holding them to go out to our North-West and open up that country. With that exception, for which I give our High Commissioner every credit, I do not see a single item in the whole report to justify the continuance of this institution. Our High Commissioner gives us a list of a number of charitable institutions formed in the British Isle for the purpose of sending out emigrants to this country and providing for those who are in a destitute condition, so as to enable them to settle on our lands. But all that information could have been easily gathered by our emigration agents in England. The High Commissioner also refers to the fact that there is an unlimited market in England for dried meats and hams and other articles of that kind, which information could also have been obtained equally well from the Trade Returns of England without any expense. He has also drawn attention to the export of eggs to England, and has apparently made some little effort to secure a market there for our eggs and poultry; but it is very singular that notwithstanding the fact that he is in London with a large staff of officials, we had, in order to work up if possible an export trade in eggs and poultry, to send over Mr. Saunders, the chief in charge of the Experimental Farm here. Sir Charles admits that Mr. Saunders has given this matter considerable attention, and that, owing to his efforts, some exports of eggs have been made with, as he says, very profitable results. I do not know about that. Our High Commissioner then proceeds to instruct us as to the way in which fowls should be dressed and put up, as to the portions upon which the feathers should be left and those from which the feathers should be plucked. I never imagined, when we were asked to appoint Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner, that he would be called on to devote his valuable time, at an expense of ten thousand dollars a year with perquisites of fifteen thousand, to the task of instructing our people how they should put up their poultry and eggs for shipment to the other side. That appears to be rather a peculiar business for a man of his qualifications and position to be called on to discharge. When he was appointed High Commissioner, I well remember the right hon. the First Minister, in asking us to provide for his salary and contingencies and for the purchase of his house, thus making the High Commissionership a permanent institution, promised that such appointment would save us more money annually in the way of commissions on loans and payments of interest than the entire salary and expenses would amount to. I have carefully followed Sir Charles Tupper's reports from that time to the present, and have never been able to discover that he has saved us one farthing financially in any manner whatever. Last year the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance was drawn to this matter, and he then put Parliament for the first time in possession of the fact that the Government had made arrangements with some financial company in London for a term of years to act as our financial agents, so that while the right hon. the First Minister was holding out as an inducement to this House the prospect of Sir Charles Tupper discharging that duty, and thus saving us the commissions, we were under contract with a financial company in London to act as our agents, not only during that year, but for four or five years afterwards. While, therefore, we have had our High Commissioner and a full staff of officers in London, and were induced to vote the expense necessary to keep up that department, under the promise that we would be thereby saved all this commission, we were then paying and have been since paying some $35,000 or $36,000 in commissions annually to a financial company for the purpose of meeting the interest on our bonds and redeeming our debentures. I challenge any member of this House to take up the High Commissioner's report and point out where he has rendered any service which will warrant our continuing him in office at a cost of $35,000 a year. Take, for instance, his recommendation concerning emigration. He says:

"I have gone into the question of immigration at greater length than usual in the case of reports of this kind; but, in view of all that has been said from time to time on the subject, it is desirable that the fullest possible information should be placed before the public, especially as I hope large sums will be voted henceforth annually to immigration, in view of its importance to the Dominion."

He recommends that we should devote larger sums to the purposes of immigration in the future. Now, to show how much the Government appreciates his recommendations, in the very Estimates they have brought down this year they have reduced the sum devoted to immigration by $51,000. Yet Sir Charles Tupper recommends in his report that it should be increased. I do not know whether the Government are of opinion that our High Commissioner does not understand what he is talking about, or that he is not capable of discharging the peculiar functions of the position he occupies, but I do say this, that while we have a High Commissioner in England we should make the best use of him we can. That Sir Charles Tupper is eminently qualified to fill that distinguished position I do not deny for a moment, and I should like to see him remain there as long as hon. gentlemen opposite are on the Treasury benches. I have no objection to that, but I do object, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has said, that he should leave the duties of his department for two or three months at a time, and run up and down the country in a special train addressing the electors with a view to show that the Grits should not get into power and that the present system should be perpetuated. I think it is not only unfair, but it is a very imprudent and a very barefaced action on the part of the Government to take a high place functionary, who is receiving $25,000 a year from the people of this country, away from his duties and bring him out here to speak in a manner which is insulting to one-half of the people of this country. I think his assault upon the Grand Trunk Railway was exceedingly imprudent. I do not think this country can afford for a moment to ridicule or to override by legislation the privileges and rights of the Grand Trunk Railway. It was the pioneer railway company of this country, and the people of England spent their money lavishly to open up the country through which that railway passed. I think it is unbecoming of Sir Charles Tupper to assail that company so wantonly and so unwarrantably as he has done in the London Times. However, we may have some more to say upon this subject before this session closes. At present, I say that, if we have no more duties for the High Commissioner to perform than are shown in this report which he has published, there is not sufficient justification for continuing his office. If the people of this country say that there is an evident necessity for the existence of the office of the High Commissioner in London, I am content, but I say that there is not one tittle of evidence as to the value of that office with the exception of the delegation of tenant farmers that he sent to Canada in order to endeavour to secure an influx of that class of people into this country. Apart from that, there is not anything in his report to justify us in keeping him in the position he occupies; and, if he is to remain there, we ought at all events to keep down the cost of the office instead of increasing it from year to year. In the last five years this increase has amounted to nearly $10,000, and I hope the Government will not propose to continue this increase in the future.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken in regard to this question, have shown more animus than wisdom against the High Commissioner. They seem to have forgotten the very important duties which he has performed. There is scarcely a month in which his name is not seen in the public press, not only of Canada, but of England and the European nations, bringing before them the importance of Canada. In that way, he is assisting the interests of this country, and the enterprises in which the people of Canada are engaged. Take his action in regard to the scheduling of cattle from this country. The export of cattle is one of the most remunerative lines which we have, and but for the action of the High Commissioner, no doubt we would be standing in the same position as the United States, and our cattle would be scheduled, and our farmers would have suffered in consequence. This is only one instance, but the effort has been made again and again to interfere with the carrying on of our present prosperous trade on the same lines as heretofore, and every time the High Commissioner has taken a stand for the interest of Canada, and by his great ability, and integrity, and intelligence, and energy, he has frustrated every effort which has been made against the interests of Canada. Should we then refuse to vote him the paltry salary which he is getting? Is it because of this small expense that these attacks are being made upon him to-day? I think it is rather because of the part which he took in the interests of Canada and the preservation of this Dominion during the late election. There is no man who has earned his money so well, and has done so much for the people of Canada in England as the High Commissioner, and he is the last man with whom we should be disposed to part. We should be glad to pay him not only this salary, but a much higher salary, because no man has done so much as he has to bring Canada before the English people. He has the interests of Canada at heart, and we should not only willingly support him to the extent we have up to the present time, but to a larger extent than we have done. In regard to immigration there are many members here who would agree with me that, although the Government has been induced to cut down the expenditure on that account, we should not carry out that species of economy, especially as we have those vast fields in the North-West for incoming immigrants. I think we should have taken the High Commissioner's advice, and increased, rather than diminished, the vote for immigration. The High Commissioner has shown the same ability and statesmanship in that question as he has in other questions in which he has interested himself in regard to Canada. I would be very sorry to see any reduction made in his salary, or to see him brought home and taken away from the great work he is discharging in the interests of Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman refers to the services Sir Charles Tupper has rendered in preventing our cattle from being scheduled in the old country. Surely, he must have read of the visit of Mr. Plimsoll to this country, and that, at the meeting held in Montreal, Mr. Plimsoll said that if the people were under the impression that the reason for our cattle not being scheduled was any action of Sir Charles Tupper, or was because Canada was a dependency of the British Crown, they made a great mistake. He said that there was no person known to him in England as the High Commissioner of Canada or as Sir Charles Tupper. He said this was the first time he had heard of it, and he said, further, that the moment the people of the United States showed that the disease of pleuro-pneumonia was eliminated, they would have their cattle admitted to the British markets just the same as Canadian cattle.

Mr. SPROULE. I am sure the hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) knows, that, when an embargo was placed on our cattle, Sir Charles Tupper went down to the cattle yards and combatted that attempt to exclude them. Are they aware of that? Certainly we see that the public press knows it, and whether hon. gentlemen opposite know it or not is a matter of small concern. The Canadian people do know it, the Canadian farmers know it; they know that an embargo was placed upon these cattle, and, had it not been for Sir Charles Tupper, it would not have been raised. At different times since the same effort has been made to bring us under that schedule, and in every instance he has ably prevented it and defended the interests of the country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If we give the High Commissioner credit for all that is claimed for him, it could only be said that he was doing what was part of his duty. What we want to enquire about to-night, what we want some information upon—and I think this Committee will not be satisfied unless that information is given—is what Sir Charles Tupper was doing when he neglected duties of that kind and came to this country and took an active part in the elections. We want to know who instructed him, who invited him. We want to know if it was done with the sanction of the Ministry; we want to know if it was done at the request of the Ministry; we want to know if the example of a gentleman in the Civil Service, occupying the highest position in that service, is to be accepted as a guide for all other officers that are in the Civil Service? We find the First Minister to-night, replying to my hon. friend from Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), professing some surprise that a gentleman occupying not a very high position in the Civil Service should have been found engaged in electioneering in the late elections in one or two counties; and if I understood him aright, he promised to enquire into that. If we may interpret his words aright, it seems to me that we would be justified in inferring, from what he said, that it was contrary to the wishes and to the policy of the Government that those who were in the employ of the Government, the servants of the public, should be found taking an active part in election contests. If that be so, I say we want to know by what authority, at whose request Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, came to Canada, leaving his duties, spending weeks and months here—not now to enlarge upon some of his utterances, which I may find occasion to do later on. We want to ascertain why it was that he was here. Who invited him? Was he requested to come? Was it with the sanction of the Government that he did so? Is it the intention of the Government to declare that it is one of the right and proper duties of the High Commissioner, for which the people of this country pay him? I do not know whether the Finance Minister is asleep or not, but he is supposed to be leading the House on this occasion; and although I do not suppose that I would be justified in demanding that consideration at his hands for myself, yet I think I may say that this Committee will require that either he or some other member of the Administration shall answer some questions that are pertinent in reference to this matter. It is necessary that we know on what basis we are proceeding, what line of conduct is to be followed, what the duties of those engaged in the Civil Service are, and then we can rightly comprehend as to whether there is any necessity of enquiring into the action of those in the Civil Service who have been found engaged in political work. If that is the policy of the Administration, if that is the British practice that is followed, or professed to be followed, by hon. gentlemen opposite, we wish them to say so, and the answer we want is a definite one, as to whether Sir Charles Tupper violated that which was due to his office, defying British precedent, to say nothing of decency in the matter; whether he did it on his own motion, or whether he came at the request of the Government. We want to know the position Sir Charles Tupper occupies in this country, virtually; we want to know if he claims to be the virtual head and the leader of the Government of this country; we want to know whether he is the virtual power, while the nominal power alone is in the hands of the Ministers? These are points that we want to have answered. I think that sitting still and not answering them, will not, perhaps, conduce to the Committee getting on, for I think I am not alone in the desire that I have for this information. Having got that, we will be better able to understand and to discuss this question, as to whether it is desirable to have a High Commissioner's duty wholly confined to what was supposed to be the duties of his position, or whether it is better that periodically, every year, he should take an annual tour through this country at the expense of the people, in order to abuse and vilify more than one-half the people of this country. We want to know whether it is part of the High Commissioner's duty, while he professes to be engaged in his duties on the other side of the Atlantic, to write down the credit of this country, to engage in enterprises that have for their object, as we have heard investments in the neighbouring States, and at the same time to act as scribe for one of the papers over there, attacking one of the largest interests we have in this country, and using the power and influence that his position gives him, in order to damage that corporation? Let us know what the position and the duties of the High Commissioner are, and in what relation he stands to the Government and to the people of this country.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Shall the resolution be adopted?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; Mr. Chairman, we certainly have a right to know under what circumstances the High Commissioner, who is a paid official of the people of this country, spends many months of his time on this side of the Atlantic? Was it in the discharge of his duties as High Commissioner, or did he come here at the special request and instance of the Government of this country? That is what we want to know, that is what we have a right to know. It is a very doubtful matter whether it is desirable for us to pay money for the maintenance of a High Commissioner at all, if a part of that High Commissioner's duties are, as has been stated, to come over here and abuse his paymasters. I say that he had no right to do it. I say that he set a most disgraceful and indecent example to all the members of the Civil Service. He is one of the chief officials of the Civil Service. He knows that; he, himself, standing in his place here, has repeatedly declared that he believed it was contrary to the rule, to order, and to propriety, for members of the Civil Service to interfere with elections. Now he, one of the leading officials, has set the example to every civil servant throughout this Dominion, of leaving his post, so far as we know, without the authority of the Government, and coming over here to interfere in the elections. The Government should, in justice to themselves, say whether or not Sir Charles Tupper came here by their request, or of his own proper motion. I understand that he was paid his salary as High Commissioner during the whole time of his sojourn here. Had he chosen to resign, as I think he did on a previous occasion, his high commissionership, that would have been another matter. But he did not; he came here while he was our paid servant, and in so doing I say he violated all propriety, and all the rules which we have heretofore understood governed the action of civil servants.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the Government decline to answer that question, would they give us a little light into the journey that Sir Charles Tupper took to Washington when he took two of our Ministers along with him? It is said they did not stay very long in Washington, but they went down there, and I understand they had quite a retinue with them. It seems when they went down there they expected to stay all summer; I was told they had enough trunks with them for a circus troop. But when they went down there the interview that took place with the Government of the United States, I am told, did not last all summer, but lasted only three minutes. The Government might tell us a little about that, if they will not tell us about the other. Did they take Sir Charles, or did Sir Charles take them? That is a very proper question to ask. Did they take Sir Charles to Washington, or did he take them? Did they take the trunks, or did Sir Charles take the trunks? As is very properly suggested by an hon. friend of mine, that is a "grand trunk" question. We ought to know about this, because arrangements had been made before the election to have this meeting after the 4th March, but, after they got there, they were told that no arrangement was made; the Grand Trunk had run off the track, and the connections failed to be met. The arrangements were made before the election, but they did not materialize. I do not think it would take more than three minutes for the Minister of Justice to tell us all about that.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Carried.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If Mr. Chairman did not lean over his papers so much, he would see that this vote is not carried, and you, Sir, as an old parliamentarian, will, I am sure, give every opportunity to Ministers to give information, and we want to have some information in regard to this matter as in regard to others. We want to know whether Sir Charles Tupper left his position in London and spent weeks here, away from his office, at the request of the Government, or, whether he did that of his own accord and in violation of his duty?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it is simply disgraceful that the Government will sit silently upon their seats and that the members supporting the Government sit with a muzzle upon their mouths and dare not open their mouths upon this subject. I think the charges which have been made against the High Commissioner are so important that they require an answer from the members of the Government. I believe, with the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that this office should be abolished altogether. I do not think the country is getting any benefit from it, and all the benefit which may be supposed to be derived from it could be obtained from our thousand-and-one immigration agents in England and other countries. We have an army of immigration agents appointed and paid high salaries to send immigrants to this country, and the result is that very few remain here and we are not able to keep our own natural increase of population, even with the immigrants added. My opinion is that the services of the High Commissioner are of so little worth that the office should be abolished. Besides that, I think his course in leaving his position in London and taking part in the elections here is such as to demand his dismissal. It does not add to the dignity or responsibility of any Government that they have an officer so high in position as the High Commissioner leaving the duties which the people of Canada pay him a large salary to perform, coming out here and abusing a large portion of the people of this country. I say that the course of Sir Charles Tupper, in tramping this country from Halifax to Toronto in a special train at the expense of the people of Canada, and the language he has used in regard to the political opponents of the Government ought to lead at once to his dismissal; not to speak of the abuse which he has heaped upon one of the greatest corporations in this country, the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I think that corporation has done more for the Dominion of Canada than any other corporation in this country, and the only reason for the abuse which Sir Charles Tupper heaped upon it was that that corporation would not turn its influence in favour of the Government of the day. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company were more pliant. They lent their whole influence to the Government. They provided special trains all along their line from Vancouver to Halifax to bring voters to vote for the Government, but because the Grand Trunk Railway Company would not do that, because the employés of that company were told to vote as their conscience directed, they are abused by a gentleman who receives $25,000 a year from the people of this country. I know that the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not try to influence their employés. In my county, in which the Grand Trunk Railway runs from end to end, the employés were told to vote as they saw fit. I am sorry to say that the majority of them did not see fit to vote for me. But the Canadian Pacific Railway sent out a mandamus to their employés that they must vote for the Conservative candidate. This is the position taken by these two great corporations, and I think that this great functionary in London, who is supposed to be doing such great things for the people of this country, when he comes here and abuses this great corporation which I believe has done more for the people of Canada than any other corporation, simply because they did not see fit to turn their influence in his favour, should be dismissed. If for no other reason, he should be dismissed as a warning to all, for all future time, that gentlemen appointed to that position should mind their own business. I think it is the bounden duty of the Government to give us some information on this point. It is very pertinent to ask whether this gentleman came here of his own accord or at the request of the Government, and whether the Government approved of the course he has taken in the election, and of his course in abusing and vilifying this great corporation all over the world. I think it is outrageous that the Government should sit quietly and silently in their seats without giving any explanation on this subject.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the question is too broad to ask whether Sir Charles Tupper was brought out at the request of the Government. But we will narrow the question down. I see that Sir Charles Tupper held a meeting in Kingston, at the close of which he said, according to the supplement of the Empire:

"I must not conclude without expressing to you Sir John Macdonald's deep regret at not being able to be present here to-night. Nobody here regrets it more deeply than the humble servant of Sir John Macdonald's Government, who has been endeavouring to-night briefly to outline the position of our country. But in not coming here Sir John only showed that he thinks of the country before himself. He would have given anything to stand here to-night, to enjoy the pleasure of witnessing your beaming countenances and listening to the rallying shouts of warm support of the Liberal Conservative party."

Some hon. MEMBERS, Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I quite agree with that. I know that Sir John would receive the warmest reception from a great many of the electors of Kingston. But here is the point I am at:

"He directed me to say to you that he was so busily engaged at Ottawa, sending telegraphic messages all over the country, making arrangements for the undoubted security and success of the great party to which he belongs, that he found it impossible, except at an enormous sacrifice, to be here. He felt that if he was able to come, he might be returned by acclamation; but he would subject himself at this inclement season of the year, to the hardships of a contest, rather than fail in a single duty to the country. (Applause.) That is why I have the pleasure of standing here to-night before this magnificent meeting of the electors of this noble constituency, which for so many years has returned to Parliament a statesman who was looked up to throughout the Empire. (Loud applause.) I envy the electors of this noble constituency the privilege which they possess, of holding the services of so distinguished a gentleman as Sir John Macdonald."

Might I ask the First Minister, did the High Commissioner tell the truth to the people of Kingston: did he say truly when he said that Sir John Macdonald had sent him to that meeting and had sent a message with this gentleman who is a leading civil servant of this country? That is a question that can be very easily answered, and if the First Minister will favour us with a reply then, perhaps, we might be able to follow it up with enquiries in other directions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I cannot resist the seductive tones of my hon. friend and I may answer him: Sir Charles Tupper did go there at my request and he made the speech at my instance, and I fancy that his speech must have had a considerable influence, because in the previous election I was elected by a majority of seventeen, and after Sir Charles Tupper made this speech I was elected by a majority that only wanted seventeen of 500. You see I was pretty wise in my generation in asking Sir Charles to go there and make a speech for me.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You would be wise if you stopped him at that point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will go a little further, and I will say that Sir Charles Tupper came out from England to give us the advantage of his skill, and influence, and eloquence, at my special request.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We have succeeded at last. I knew the First Minister would answer, but he was in the back benches when the question was brought up, and his colleagues did not evidently care to assume that responsibility; but he has given the reply. The First Minister is, therefore, guilty of violating all that he has taught this House to believe is a great British principle. He has set an example that has opened wide the gates to permit and warrant any of the civil servants of this country taking part in elections. I would ask the First Minister how he forgot that he had set this illustrious example when my friend brought up the case of these minor officials in the city of Ottawa? How is it that the great Commissioner who kept our cattle from being scheduled in England, who is engaged in promoting a turkey and egg trade there, and whose presence in England is said to be of such vital interest to the country, could come over here and remain for such a length of time? Why is it that the country should have to go to the extra expense of sending to England another—not a High Commissioner, but an egg commissioner—to take charge of this matter which we are led to think Sir Charles ought to have done? The First Minister congratulates himself upon his choice, and I dare say Sir Charles is a powerful speaker. Sir Charles spoke at Kingston, and the First Minister's majority was largely increased, but I think it is only his generous nature that gives the credit of that to Sir Charles Tupper. I think, perhaps, that the majority was due in a great measure to the popularity of the Prime Minister in his own constituency, and that the Franchise Bill and the making-up of the voters' lists helped the majority somewhat, although I do not in the least want to detract from the popularity of the right hon. gentleman. If the High Commissioner had been so eloquent and so powerful it is a pity he should have expended all his eloquence and all his constituency-gaining power in the city of Kingston. The First Minister, while showing great shrewdness in sending Sir Charles to Kingston, has not yet told us whether it was at his instance the High Commissioner went to London and to Windsor, and to other places, because the High Commissioner did not gain votes there. Either the First Minister lost his shrewdness or Sir Charles lost his power of gaining votes by his eloquence. I believe, however, that the High Commissioner would have done better in London if the First Minister had not been there himself. I am told by a friend of the hon. gentleman that at that meeting Sir Charles was speaking only a short time when there were cries from the audience that they wanted to hear the old chieftain, and the eloquence of the High Commissioner was evidently not what they went there to hear. I rather liked that, because I thought that a great many actions of the High Commissioner were an assumption that he was lord and master of this whole Dominion, that he was the leader of the Cabinet, that he was the Prime Minister of the Prime Minister himself, and that he was running the Prime Minister as well as running the country. I was glad to see that the faithful followers of the First Minister rather repudiated that idea which was conveyed by Sir Charles, and that the electors of London gave him his answer by defeating the Minister of Agriculture and returning my hon. friend (Mr. Hyman). Neither was it a shrewd move of the First Minister to send Sir Charles to Windsor. It is true the right hon. gentleman was not there to divide the attraction, and Sir Charles had it all to himself and hesitated to let anyone else speak.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh! Solomon White spoke.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But is not Mr. White an annexationist?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Of course he is.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, that is extraordinary. At all events, Sir Charles objected to have anyone speak against him and he had the whole meeting to himself, with the privilege of charming it by his eloquence, but the result was that the gentleman he supported, and who was, I think, the chairman of the Central Committee of the great Liberal-Conservative organization of the whole Province of Ontario, was defeated and my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. McGregor) was returned with 600 or 700 majority. Now the First Minister might tell us whether he lost his shrewdness in taking Sir Charles beyond Kingston, or whether Sir Charles lost his eloquence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will tell you what he did: he lost his voice.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, if he lost his voice I do not know whether he has recovered it yet or not, but I do know that he is using his pen, or gets someone else to use it for him, and his writings with the pen are not any more creditable to him than his public utterances in Canada. The paid servant of the Canadian people using his voice in his own country to denounce one-half of his fellow citizens as guilty of disloyalty, in attempting to put a brand upon them that no man has a right to attempt to put upon others, has passed the bounds of decency. He is a man whose words could be treated lightly if it were not for the harm they were doing the country. The man who is now using his pen—if we may accept the reports we get—to write what he is putting his name to in the London press, whether written by himself or others; the man who is saying to the people of the mother land that in this important Parliament the Liberals are a party disloyal to the country, a party that are seeking annexation and political union with the United States; the man who being in the pay of the Canadian people, dares in a London newspaper to apply to the Liberal party of this country the name of "ruined gamesters" and insinuates that they were engaged in an attempt to sell their country,—the man who does that passes the bounds of decency, and the Ministry ought to say whether or not they endorse the sentiments that their High Commissioner is giving utterance to. The Government ought to say what is the position they take in reference to this matter: they ought to be bold enough to rise in their places, if they endorse these utterances, and in the presence of the representatives of the Liberal party in this country, make that charge if they believe it to be true. If, however, they believe it is, as they must know it to be, a foul libel upon the Liberal party, then I call upon them to repudiate the utterances of the High Commissioner; I demand that they should recall him from a position he has not dignified by his utterances and writings. I call upon them in the interests of Canada to recall him, because he is doing harm in the mother land to this young nationality, to this Dominion of Canada, when he uses his position as a servant of the Canadian people, and the mouthpiece of the Canadian Government, to declare to the people of the old land that one-half of the people of this country—for I hold that the Liberal party comprises one-half of our people, and I will not say the least important half—are not true to their country, that they are not loyal, that they do not seek the best interests of their country, that they are engaged in an attempt to hand over their country to another nation, to bring about a political union between them. I say, Sir, that utterances like these by him who is considered the mouthpiece of the Canadian Government are calculated to injure this country, of which the hon. gentlemen opposite are the guardians, and they ought to have an answer in regard to this matter. We want to know whether they assume the responsibility of Sir Charles Tupper's utterances and writings; we want to know whether or not they endorse his attacks upon one of the largest institutions we have in this country; we want to know whether or not they sanction his endeavour to destroy the credit of that country; we want to know whether or not he is giving expression to these utterances in accordance with the feelings and wishes of the Canadian Government. Sir, we have a right to know this, and we have now before us the information given by the hon. First Minister himself that he, proud as he claims to be in always following British precedent, sent to London and requested the High Commissioner of Canada, a public servant of the people of Canada and paid by them, to leave his duty there to come to Canada and engage in electioneering, in stumping this country from end to end—endorsing his utterances, as far as Kingston is concerned, and, I suppose, appearing in company with him in vilifying a large portion of the people of this country, in endeavouring to excite hostility against them, and in giving utterance to sentiments calculated to damage this country in the eyes of the mother land and other nations. The hon. First Minister has told us that it was at his request that Sir Charles Tupper came and engaged in this work; and I suppose, unless he repudiates it, that we have to assume that it is with his consent, concurrence and approval that Sir Charles Tupper is engaged at present in England in attacking one of the most important institutions of this country, and in libelling one-half of its people as not being true to it and its institutions. That is the position in which our High Commissioner has placed himself, and do you think it wise that we should continue him in that office? Do you not think, if we are to have a High Commissioner in England and part of his duty is to take part in an election contest and stump this country in order to provide eloquence for a party who you would have thought would be able to provide it for themselves, that he should be appointed High Commissioner for the Conservative party in Canada, and that we should have another High Commissioner to go to England who will understand his duty to be to look after the interests of Canada there, and strive to do it good instead of harm? It seems to me that that question is involved when we are asked to pass the vote now before us; and we are entitled to a further explanation from the Ministry as to whether or not they look with approval upon the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper since his return to England. Perhaps the hon. First Minister will vouchsafe to us his views on this point as candidly as he did on the other. He is the most trusted member of the Cabinet; when he speaks he speaks with the approval of his colleagues, and I have noticed sometimes that when he refrains from speaking, his colleagues do not show a disposition to take the responsibility upon themselves. Therefore I may be pardoned if I single him out and ask him to be kind enough to answer this further question: Having approved of Sir Charles Tupper's conduct here, and having brought him here, does he approve of his conduct at the present time in the mother country?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the Government will find it to be to their interest to give a little more attention to the discussion of this question than has yet been given by the limited answer of the hon. First Minister. His answer has gone this far, that the Government have assumed the responsibility for the appearance of the High Commissioner in this country as a partisan of the Conservative party and a paid orator for the promotion of their party interests. We know that if a citizen of one country goes abroad and commits an offence against the law of another country, and his Sovereign chooses to assume the responsibility of his act, that relieves him of any liability to criminal prosecution for the wrong he has done; and looking at the relation in which the High Commissioner stands to the Government, the hon. First Minister's answer has to some extent relieved Sir Charles Tupper of what would otherwise be a very grave political offence. But, Sir, there is something more to be considered than the mere fact that the High Commissioner has taken part in the elections of this country. It is true, when the Government proposed to create the office of High Commissioner they told us that the appointment of a representative of the Government of Canada in England would relieve the Government here of a great deal of their responsibility in the negotiation of loans and in other public purposes which made it sometimes necessary for Ministers to cross to the other side of the Atlantic. Well, experience has not proved that statement to be well-founded; and if the High Commissioner can leave his office, as he frequently does, without detriment to the public service, it is perfectly clear that the public service does not require a High Commissioner. But, Sir, the offence with which the High Commissioner is charged from this side of the House is not that he has obeyed the Government and neglected his duty as the paid official of the people of this country, but that he has devoted himself largely to misrepresenting and vilifying those who are politically opposed to the Government. In fact, he is the official vilifier and unveracious calumniator of those who represent the Liberal party on this side of the House. The High Commissioner is the last man who should have brought the charges which he has against the leaders of the Liberal party. This gentleman has been singularly fortunate in his efforts to provide at the public expense for those who stand near to him. It has been stated that he and those immediately connected with him draw not less than $30,000 a year from the public treasury of this country. He has, no doubt, a very great interest, therefore, in upholding the party with which he and his friends are, for the time being, identified, and he does not appear before the people of this country to give evidence against the Liberal party as a disinterested witness. His interests are far too great personally for him to be looked upon as a witness whose evidence can be taken with the utmost confidence. Where did he learn that the Liberal party or its representatives in this House were "ruined gamesters"? He should be the last public man in this country to employ such a phrase. He is the last man connected with this country who should speak in that way of those who sat opposite him for nearly a quarter of a century in this House. There ought to be, Sir, at all events, something like esprit de corps among those who are here, even though politically opposed to each other in Parliament. But there is nothing of that spirit exhibited in the attacks made by Sir Charles Tupper on the leaders and representatives of the Liberal party in this House. The hon. gentleman employed his position in England, not merely to attack the Grand Trunk Railway Company and damage it as far as he possibly can, but he employs his official position and the standing it gives him before the public of England for the purpose of calumniating and traducing those who are now sitting on this side. It may be a very short time or it may be a considerable length of time, but some time or other he must know that, in the fortunes of political warfare, parties will change seats in this country. What sort of impression is the statement of this calumniator, made before the people of England, calculated to leave in their minds of the leaders of the Liberal party in this country? Have we no pride of country, no interest in the character of those who sit opposite to us? If we are to be regarded as representatives having an interest in our country, is it to our advantage to go abroad and to have presented to us the statements said to be made by men belonging to our country, holding high official positions, that we are ruined gamesters, that we are men not to be trusted, that we are men who sought to sell our country and are ready to sacrifice the interests, and future hopes, and prospects of it for the purpose of removing those who sit opposite to us from office? I, as a representative of a section of the Liberal party in Ontario, feel very little interest in the question whether I sit on this side of the House or that, but I feel a very great interest in the promotion of what I believe to be a wise policy in the public interest. I have no interest whatever in traducing the character of those who are politically opposed to me. That is what the High Commissioner has done before the English-speaking public, not only on this continent, but over the whole British Empire, in order that, wherever the name of Canada is spoken, the leaders of the Liberal party may be spoken of as ruined gamesters; as men who undertook to ruin this country for the purpose of securing their temporary success as a party. I denounce such statement as a foul calumny: I denounce it as a malicious falsehood, and I call on hon. gentlemen opposite to unite with me in denouncing such language, and with the view of bringing this matter fairly before the country, I move that this whole item be struck out—that it be not concurred in.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 20; nays, 37.

Contingencies, including amount $2,000, required to pay for the contingent expenses of the High Commissioner, taxes and insurance on official residence, income tax, rent, fuel, light, stationery, &c.....$8,550

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). With reference to these contingencies, I wish to ask for information to which I think we are entitled. When the High Commissioner was taking his tour through Canada, it was stated in the press that he travelled by special train. I would like to know whether that was the case, and if so, what was the cost of that train and out of what fund it was defrayed?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not aware that any of the High Commissioner's expenses were paid out of the public service, but I will enquire.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose his trips from England to this country and back again find a place in the expenses?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That may be, but I cannot say.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have a right to know whether he came out on the special invitation of the First Minister and for what particular purpose. Did he come out for the purpose of attending to elections or other matters of an official character?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have already stated what I asked him to come out for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The right hon. gentleman stated candidly that he came out to attend the elections. The First Minister has been, however, altogether too modest. I, as a citizen of Kingston, beg to state that it was to the First Minister's own special and earnest care of his constituents, he was indebted for his increased majority. The First Minister had been a good nursing father or mother, whichever he prefers to be called, to the citizens of Kingston for the last three or four years. Such has been his care that a short time ago, when I had to go down to that constituency on private business of my own, the first thing I heard was that the hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to prevent the people from suffering from distress and destitution, caused no less, I think, than one hundred and twenty cars to be built, about the 5th or 10th of February last, in certain car works in that city. About the same time likewise, the hon. gentleman, in his disinterested regard for the welfare of my fellow citizens, was solicitous in procuring some important railway subsidies for projected railways in the neighbourhood of that city. Well, they have as good a right to it—no more and no less—than a good many other roads the hon. gentleman has subsidized.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You did not do much for them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; we did, in a fair and square way.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman would not thank you for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know that, but the hon. gentleman was too modest in attributing to the words of Sir Charles Tupper what is due to his own good deeds. The hon. gentleman has ordered measures to be taken for the construction of a graving dock in that port of Kingston, and that graving dock, I believe, is under the charge of a certain Mr. Connolly, a member of a firm of which many members of this House are likely to know more before many days than they have before; and I am told that, somewhere about the 15th February, a little after the date of the speech referred to, this worthy man, Mr. Connolly, caused it to be proclaimed in the city of Kingston that anyone who wanted work had only to come to him and he would get it, if the work only consisted in wheeling the rubbish from one side of the dry dock to the other. It is evident, therefore, that not only is this due to the words of Sir Charles Tupper, but also to the good deeds of the First Minister, and the zeal which was shown in bringing in so many expatriated Canadians from Watertown and other parts of the United States to swell the hon. gentleman's majority. I might ask if this includes the hon. gentleman's club fees? I understand the hon. gentleman's club fees were paid amongst his contingencies.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Was his board paid when he was here?

Post Office and Finance Departments—
To pay the officers engaged in balancing and computing interest on depositors' accounts to 30th June, 1891. $3,600

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this paid by the job or by the hour?

Mr. HAGGART. I think it is by the hour, after their usual time, but I am not certain.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is very important, because, if they are paid by the hour, the officials have the opportunity of lengthening out the work to suit themselves. If they were paid by piece-work, they would rally to the work, and a certain amount of work would be done for a certain amount of money.

Mr. HAGGART. They are all trusted officials, and I think they are paid by the hour.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is a very unwise course to pay them by the hour. You are offering a premium to them to leave over an amount of work, so that they may charge extra pay for that service. No doubt, some of it is work that cannot be done within the hours. I believe that, in connection with the Savings Bank branch, the books used by the officials during the day cannot be used for the purpose of balancing up for the end of the year until after hours, but it should be let by piece-work, or a certain amount of work should be done for a certain amount of money.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would suggest to the Department some plan by which the balancing of accounts could be done by piece-work.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that the Postmaster General is not posted with regard to the work done in his own Department, because I asked one of the chief clerks in the Savings Bank Branch, and he told me that part of the work is done by piece-work. I know that part of the work is done by piece-work, and the hon. gentleman says it is done by the hour. I advise the Postmaster General to post himself before he gets so saucy about it.

Contingencies—Governor General's Secretary's Office..... $13,500

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How would the contingencies of one of the Departments compare with the others as to the number of hands employed? Would they be about equal?

Mr. FOSTER. I think so. In the printing, it is much larger. In the Post Office Department, for instance, a large quantity of the contingencies is due to printing. In the Governor General's Office or the Privy Council, there is a very large item for telegrams, and especially for cablegrams, which are costly and numerous, particularly during the last two years. You will see how that runs by the Auditor General's Report, page B-63 and afterwards.

Privy Council Office—Contingencies... $11,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that last year the hon. gentleman did not confine himself to the vote spent, about $14,000.

Mr. FOSTER. This year we are trying to keep it down to the amount.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice one or two curious items in this. What on earth are the leather boxes for, fifty-two in number, for supplying the Privy Council?

Mr. FOSTER. They must be for covering the documents in the office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope those refreshments were not wholly of a spirituous character.

Mr. FOSTER. Apollinaris, mainly.

Contingencies—Department of Justice. $5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know how it comes that this varies so enormously from the actual expenditure? In the Minister's department for the year 1890, I see that $10,141 were required, while he only asks for $5,000 this year. I would be very glad if he confined the expenditure to it, but the disproportion is enormous between what was actually expended and what is asked for. There is no particular advantage in cutting this down nominally, and then spending a great deal more than we are asked to grant.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the penitentiary branch is included in the Department of Justice.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is. In the Auditor General's Report, both are included.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How are the travelling expenses of inspectors of penitentiaries fixed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Fixed by Order in Council, the same Order in Council that fixes the travelling expenses of other civil servants. An inspector is allowed $3.50 a day for travelling, besides actual boarding expenses; and in British Columbia, $5.

Contingencies — Department of Interior..... $18,000

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In looking over the report of the Minister of Interior, I notice that there was a sale of some property by auction in Montreal, that the auctioneer did not pay over the proceeds of the sale; that after election time had expired, something over $2,000 were got out of the auctioneer, and that subsequently, I think, endorsed notes were taken for the remaining $8,500; that the parties all went into insolvency, and that nothing has been received. How does that account stand now?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think the account stands exactly as the hon. gentleman has stated, and he has correctly related the circumstances. The auctioneer who was engaged to make the sale of that property, was represented to me at the time, by gentlemen who knew Montreal well, as one of the most responsible auctioneers in the city of Montreal. He had been previously doing work of that character for the Government, and I had no hesitation, from what I had heard of him, in engaging him to make a sale of that property. The Deputy Minister attended the sale, the terms of which I do not exactly remember, but I think a percentage was paid at the time of the sale. A certain time had been given to the auctioneer to make up his accounts, but when it was found that he was not making the remittances that were due, application was made for them. He continued to be slow in making his remittances, and after some pressure, he paid the proportion which the hon. gentleman mentioned, some two or three thousand dollars, into the bank as part payment of the sale, leaving a large balance. I came to the conclusion there was something wrong, and I put the matter into the hands of the Department of Justice, who proceeded against him. In the meantime he had gone to England, and was away from Montreal for eight or nine months. When he came back, the matter being still in the hands of the Department of Justice, a proposition was made on his behalf, offering these notes which, it was represented to me, were the best security we could get for the money. I accepted the arrangement, but eventually the parties who owed us the money went into liquidation, and I fear the account will be a dead loss.

Contingencies—Department of Indian Affairs..... $8,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the Minister of the Interior would look at B—66 of the Auditor General's Report, under the head of travelling expenses, he would see "Mr. Dingman, $1,606.86." Is he the inspector of Indian agencies?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; he is the inspector.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not understand that amount. I thought he had been in Brantford all the year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. He was a great deal of the time; but the travelling expenses had been incurred, except those for travelling between the head office and Brantford, in visiting the various reserves, going as far as Quebec in the east. Last year the same question arose, and I brought down a return showing exactly what travelling expenses had been paid by the inspector, and I shall be glad to bring down a similar return this session.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who was in charge of the Brantford office when he was not there?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The agent, Mr. Gilkinson.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). He is the agent.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, he was the agent until very lately—until he was superannuated.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What position did Mr. Dingman occupy then?

Mr. DEWDNEY. When it was found that the affairs of the office were in rather a bad shape, he was sent there to put matters on a more satisfactory footing. It required all the time he could give in order to put the office in a satisfactory state. I believe it is now in a pretty good position, but not as good as it should be.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another item which reads very curiously. I do not know what explanation the Minister may choose to make in regard to it. It reads as follows:—"Advertising Notice, re-addressing communications to the Hon. E. Dewdney as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and not as Minister of the Interior, or L. Vankoughnet." Are we to understand that for the purpose of advertising the fact the hon. Minister was not to be addressed as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, or was to be so addressed, and not as Minister of the Interior, it was necessary to spend $2,805 not to speak of the odd cents? That is the way the entry reads. Perhaps there may be some mistake, and I should like to know whether the money was spent for that purpose.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I must say that when this paragraph in the Auditor General's Report was brought to my notice, it was the first time I had heard of this matter, and I can assure the hon. gentleman it surprised me as much as it does himself. Immediately on the matter being brought to my attention, I made enquiry as to the circumstances connected with it. I was reminded by the Deputy that a month or two after I had been in office my attention was drawn to the fact that there was great difficulty in getting letters belonging to the different branches sent directly to those branches. The head branch of the Interior Department is in the Eastern block, and the other is in the new building. In view of this inconvenience, I authorized the Deputy to take measures to correct it. I found that, on the strength of those instructions, he communicated with the Queen's Printer, and requested him to advertize in various papers in the Dominion for a certain length of time, so many insertions daily and so many weekly, and to his astonishment he found that the accounts paid by the Queen's Printer amounted to this most extraordinary sum. This is a plain statement of the fact, which astonished me as much as it has astonished the hon. gentleman, when brought to my knowledge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It appears to me that in the administration of the Department of the Interior there does not appear to be any desire for economy. I observe that $18,000 are asked for contingencies, which is about double the amount for an ordinary Department. On reading the report of the Department the other day I found that in all the branches the receipts and the work are both decreasing: that the number of letters sent out and received is very much materially less than formerly: that the receipts are very much lower, in fact, ridiculously low: and if one may judge from reading the report, the general work of the Department cannot be much more than 50 per cent. of what it was formerly. I do not know whether the Minister or the Deputy is responsible for the extravagance. Six or eight years ago, when there was a great boom in the North-West, and when very large receipts were expected from the sale of Dominion lands, and when the Department was apparently energetic in endeavouring to sell the lands, there might be some excuse for an increase in the departmental contingencies; but that excuse ceased now that the receipts have declined, and the work of the Department has decreased so materially, as appears from the report. I cannot understand why there should be such an enormous amount for travelling expenses. Besides the Minister's expenses, which I presume are necessary, there are the expenses of Mr. Burgess, the Deputy, Mr. Pereira, Mr. Deville, Mr. King, Mr. Rothwell, Mr. Hume and others, ranging from $100 to $500 or $600. I should like to know what is the necessity of incurring such large travelling expenses, and whether the hon. gentleman can give any assurance to the Committee that, in view of the decreased receipts, the Department will be conducted on more economical principles?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think the hon. gentleman will allow, from what occurred several days ago, that we propose a very large decrease this year, a decrease larger in proportion than the falling off in the receipts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not in contingencies.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No: I find that the contingencies have ranged from $22,000 to $17,000 odd last year. In regard to the travelling expenses of the gentlemen mentioned, I may say that, first, there are my own travelling expenses. I went as far as the Pacific that year, and I do not think my travelling expenses were exorbitant, but economical. Mr. Burgess had instructions that same year to go to British Columbia to enquire into certain important matters pending there. He was taken ill when on his trip and detained there some weeks, which accounts for the apparently large amount of his expenses. With respect to $94 for

Mr. Pereira's expenses, I do not exactly recollect whether they were incurred when he was travelling with me or not. Mr. Deville, as Surveyor General, must necessarily do considerable travelling, and I do not consider the amount charged by him is excessive. Mr. King was one of our inspectors at that time, and had to do a certain amount of travelling. Hon. gentlemen must remember that our work is in the far west, and is an expensive journey, and if any one is detained in that country, he must necessarily run up a pretty large account for travelling expenses. Mr. Rothwell was sent by me to Banff Park, when the Park regulations came into force, to consult with the superintendent with regard to the issue of leases and so forth. Mr. Hume is secretary to the Deputy Minister, and he went with him to British Columbia.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose the hon. gentleman will be able to effect a saving next year. I presume when he went to attend to his election this year, at his own expense, he would look over the affairs of the Department at the same time, and there will be no travelling expenses for that.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Johnson is our lithographer, and I presume this amount is for travelling expenses in visiting the establishments, chiefly in Montreal, where our lithographing is done.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister expressed his surprise at the amount paid for these advertising notices, and, I suppose, being in that state of mind, he cannot tell us much about it. Has he noticed, since this money was expended for advertising purposes, if the communications coming into him were more properly addressed than formerly?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is a great change for the better in that respect, but it has not yet been altogether corrected.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the Minister if he thinks it really necessary to have this army of extra clerks who appear to be in the Indian Department? There appears, from the Auditor General's Report, to be a regiment of clerks in that Department. It would almost seem to be a refuge for the incapable. Can the Minister give us any assurance that nine-tenths of these will be released from their attendance and their salaries saved to the people?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I propose to do away with almost the entire number of our temporary clerks and to increase the permanent list. We can make a reduction of expenses in that way.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That principle would not seem to make any reduction, but, on the contrary, it would increase the permanent expense. I notice that the work of the Interior Department appears to have greatly decreased. Now, why cannot the Minister run the Department on the old permanent staff and save $5,000 or $6,000 a year to the country.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is not possible to do that. The temporary clerks are now drawing larger salaries than if they were on the permanent list, because in the latter case they would only receive the minimum of their class on first appointment. I am endeavouring to carry out the suggestion of the hon. gentleman as far as I can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I took occasion in a general way to make an investigation into the departmental expenses by comparing one Department with the other, and it appeared to me that the only Department which decreased the expenditure for clerks for a number of years past was the Finance Department. I presume that in this Department the work would be increasing rather than diminishing.

Mr. FOSTER. It has increased.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In other Departments, and I specially refer to the Interior, where the work is largely decreased, the expenses for clerks has been increasing every year. Judging from the statements made by the different officers, the work of that Department cannot be more than half what it was seven years ago.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the work of the Department of the Interior is not decreasing, but increasing, yet he will find that we are decreasing the expenditure. Owing to improved communication we are able now by amalgamating offices to do a good deal of the work in the Territories. If the hon. gentleman had looked into the work of the Indian Department he would find that it has been steadily increasing. Since 1882 the increase has been a hundred per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It was not that Department that I spoke of, but the Department of the Interior, and I formed my judgment from the hon. gentleman's own report.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask a question with regard to subscriptions to newspapers. It seems to me, as a new member of the House, that this item is very large, considering that it applies to every Department of the Government. I would like to ask if there is a reading-room in connection with each of these Departments, and whether all these papers are taken in the city of Ottawa or scattered through the different offices throughout the country? It seems to me, from a superficial glance, that there might be a reasonable saving in this item, for in the nature of things there must be an enormous number of papers taken which are scarcely of any value. I can easily understand that in some of the Departments newspapers of a valuable character require to be taken, and the country should pay generously for them; but there appears to be included a vast number of small country papers which can be of no value at all, and they must be taken merely for the purpose of gratifying their publishers. I would like to ask also whether, as a rule, these papers belong to one political party. I have not added up all the items, but there must be something like $10,000 spent in newspaper subscriptions, although we have two or three large reading-rooms in the city. However, I am asking for information, and I would like to know what is the custom or rule, or the necessity for such an extensive subscription for country papers throughout the Dominion?

Mr. FOSTER. The reason for it is that information must be had. If my hon. friend had been here for a number of years, he would have heard this discussion of newspaper subscriptions at every recurring consideration of the Estimates. Two years ago I stated that an effort was being made to reduce them, and that effort has been attended with considerable success. It is being repeated this year, and I have every reason for believing that the accounts for the current year, and certainly those for next year will show a great improvement in this respect. A large number of these papers have to be taken, in some Departments for one reason and in some for another; and it is not always the big papers that are the most necessary. For instance, in the Marine and Fisheries Department, the local papers about the coast are specially needed. In the Finance Department we require to take some financial papers both from our own country and from Great Britain, some of which are expensive. I am free to confess that this item has been larger than was necessary, not only under this Government but under preceding Governments. I suppose if we came down to a fair and honest expression of opinion, we would say that we could do with a very much less number; and the question now is how we can fairly reduce the number, not by a too heroic and sudden a process, but this happens to be a very opportune time for economy in this respect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The chief sinner, I think, is the Department of Agriculture, which pays $1,368 a year for newspapers. Those overworked officials must have a great deal of trouble in reading those papers. The Department of Interior is almost as bad with $686; but, considering that there is an army of 87 officials there, you must give them something to do. But when we pay these sums for newspapers for a single Department, the thing is becoming ridiculously absurd. Promises of reductions have continually been made, but I have been long enough here to know the value of these promises. However, it is very little boodle to give them. If that were all the complaints we had to make, it would not be much.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance whether Liberal newspapers as well as Conservative, are received in the Departments?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, they are at times—the valuable ones.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am not at all surprised at the item being large; we find it amounts altogether to something over $10,000. I think all the newspapers are not received for information. I have heard that for a number of years something was practised on one of the Departments that shows that the papers are not always read. An enterprising editor, by changing the heading of his paper, got a Department to take the same paper under two names for a number of years.

Mr. FOSTER. We found that man out and stopped it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a story that one official wanted to receive some real information and got the Globe newspaper, but as soon as it was found out the paper was summarily stopped. I think the hon. Minister of Marine knows something about that.

Mr. FOSTER. The Globe and Grip are taken.

Contingencies—Department of Public Works..... $7,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a charge here for framing an address to the Queen. What has the Department of Public Works to do with that?

Mr. FOSTER. It ordered the frame for Mr. Mulock's address.

Contingencies—Post Office Department. $35,000

Mr. DEVLIN. I find that the Postmaster General invited sealed tenders for the contract to carry the mails between Chenneville and Papineauville railway stations from the 1st July next. I have every reason to believe that various tenders were received. I know, as a fact, that some parties came all the way from Chenneville, got the blanks, and made out the tenders. They were reliable men and had excellent names upon their tenders, but they were informed that the old contract would be renewed after they had been put to the inconvenience and expense of coming up here.

Mr. HAGGART. Whenever tenders are opened the contract is given to the lowest tenderer. In no case since I have been at the head of the Post Office Department, when tenders have been opened, has the contract with the former party been renewed.

Mr. DEVLIN. Can the hon. gentleman inform me now what is the amount paid to the contractor for carrying the mails between Papineauville and Chenneville?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the names of the post offices even off by heart.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will read a copy of a letter which I received from Mr. Lindsay, the superintendent of the Department, in reply to one I wrote asking for an explanation. I received this reply:

"The Deputy Postmaster General desires me to say, in reply to your note asking for blank tenders, that the Postmaster General has decided to renew the contract from Chenneville to Papineauville for the mail service, and, therefore, the forms you ask for would not be required."

Yet I find that a notice was posted up in the lower end of the county asking for such tenders.

Mr. HAGGART. That was done through error, as the hon. gentleman can see. The contract was renewed before the notice was put up.

Mr. DEVLIN. I got the reply I read, the day before yesterday, and the notice is dated the 3rd March, 1891.

Mr. HAGGART. The contract is often renewed before the tenders are opened. Sometimes tenders are advertised for, and before the tenders are opened and received the old contract is renewed. It is always renewed on the report of the Inspector, and the recommendation of the Deputy in my Department.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then there is no necessity for inviting tenders, and great inconvenience is caused to the parties who tender. No doubt in this case the contract was renewed because the contractor was a very devoted friend, I will not say of the Department, but of the party controlling the Department.

Contingencies—Department of Marine, $4,000

Mr. TUPPER. The estimate has always been too small. The expenditure last year was $3,667, and I think, it has never been kept within the $3,000. In making up the estimate, there was no use in keeping it within the $3,000 when $4,000 was expended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I remember that, at the time when this Department was divided, I predicted that the officials would devote themselves to showing that they could spend as much money as other Departments, and they do not think they are as important unless they do spend as much money. I should like to ask if the Minister does not see his way clear to putting the Department back on the basis on which it was some years ago, instead of having two Deputy heads? I think the business was conducted more satisfactorily then than it is now, and I believe the hon. gentleman will agree with me.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the Committee rise and report the resolutions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the Minister of the Interior whether there is any foundation for the statement that his Department has recently sustained a loss in connection with the revenues from Crown timber at Calgary?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; I am sorry to say we have.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman know the amount?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think it is a little over $3,000.

Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 26th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 77) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

Bill (No. 78) to confirm an agreement between the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to confer further powers on the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to-morrow, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the time for the completion of the works of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited, shall, as respects their title to receive the subsidy heretofore authorized, be the 1st day of July, 1893, instead of the 1st July, 1890; also that all penalties, forfeitures and deductions incurred by the company under section 2 of chapter 4 of the Acts passed in 51st Victoria be remitted, and that said section 2 be repealed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Printing Bureau—Cleaning, &c.....$2,000

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). An understanding was arrived at when the Committee rose that one item should be reserved to afford an opportunity of discussing the various contingencies of the different Departments, and in order that any hon. member who desired to offer observations on the subject of contingencies should have an opportunity of doing so in Committee to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. That was true, and I suppose the observations will be forthcoming when we take the item up.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is the last item, and the House is very thin to-day. The expectation was that this would be allowed to stand, so as to give an opportunity for discussing it.

Mr. FOSTER. It was allowed to stand for the last night only.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I was not here during the discussion with regard to the High Commissioner, and I would like to get some information with regard to this matter. Item 24, page 9, reads:

"Contingencies, including amount of $2,000 required to pay for the contingent expenses of the High Commissioner, tax and insurance on official residence, income tax, rent, fuel, light, stationery, etc."

Now, in the Public Accounts Committee last session a question was asked with regard to this expenditure, and an effort made to ascertain what this money was paid for, but we were unable to get that information. I see, however, that in the Auditor General's Report we have some explanation of this expenditure. At page 72—B, it says:

"Gas rent, $14.94; ground rent of official residence, $332.15; house duty and tax, $97.00; income tax, $250.00; parochial rates, $349.47; stationery, $559.60."

These items are mentioned in the Estimates, and it would therefore appear that the High Commissioner gets this $2,000 in addition to all these other contingencies. I think, therefore, that there ought to be some way of obtaining information, either in the Public Accounts Committee or in the House, which would enable hon. members to ascertain how these $2,000 were spent. The High Commissioner receives a salary of $10,000 per year, and if that is not enough let the Government make the salary $12,000 a year, and we will at least understand what the money is voted for. We should have some information to enable us to say whether this vote for $2,000 ought to be voted or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I find in the Estimates for contingencies, High Commissioner's office, London, for the year 1890-91, the following:—"Rent of office and fuel, $2,812; cleaning, gas, repairs, $175; printing and stationery, $650; postal expenses, $800; miscellaneous petty cash, $960; travelling expenses, $150; income tax, $122; newspapers and periodicals, $255; messengers' wages, $603, making a total of about $7,000. These are the contingencies in the High Commissioner's office itself. This vote of $2,000 is for contingencies of the High Commissioner for expenses pertaining especially to his office. I find that in Sir Alexander Galt's time we paid $4,000 to him, out of which he provided a residence for himself, but after the purchase of the official residence it, of course, became unnecessary to grant that sum. The official residence was furnished by the Government and is a fixed charge on the Dominion revenues, so that, instead of paying the High Commissioner, after Sir Alexander Galt's time, $4,000 for house rent and incidental contingencies, I understand an arrangement was made by which $2,000 was retained by the Government in consideration of house rent and the other $2,000 is a grant to the present High Commissioner, on a par to the grant to the former High Commissioner, for contingencies and expenses incidental to his being there in his official capacity. This he receives monthly, and the vouchers are to be found in the Auditor General's office.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We tried to obtain the vouchers last year and we could not.

Mr. FOSTER. The one-twelfth part of this $2,000 is paid every month, just the same as the salary is paid, so that there is no necessity for any more vouchers than for the salary. The items are not given.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Are we to understand then, that the High Commissioner stands on a higher level than a Minister of the Crown in this country, because if any Minister of the Crown incurs contingent expense in the management of his office, if he travels or hires a cab, he has to produce a voucher for it; but here we are voting $2,000 to our High Commissioner in England, who is at liberty to spend this money in whatever way he pleases, and he is not responsible to the Parliament or the people of this country. I say that this is not a proper method of proceeding. If $10,000 a year is not sufficient to pay the High Commissioner, let the Government ask for $12,000 and let them deal honestly in the matter. Take the list of contingencies we paid the High Commissioner last year as found in the Auditor General's Report: "Aid to distressed Canadians, $25.53." I can imagine that the High Commissioner might have paid that amount out of the $2,000 instead of charging it to the public service. "Burdett's Official Intelligence, $6.80." That is another matter which might have come out of this $2,000 vote, but did not. "Cables and telegrams, $195.55; cabs and travel, $86.83; carpentering, $67.20; commission on postal orders, $17.60. These might all very well be considered contingencies, but they do not come out of the $2,000. Then there is a gratuity to Mrs. Wilkinson of $68.13. I think that might be paid out of contingencies. So might gratuities to postmen and others, $29.57. Then we have income tax of the High Commissioner, $260; ground rent of official residence, $332.15; house duty and tax, $97.33; newspapers, $196.04; newspaper cuttings, $24.33. I think all these might very well come under the head of contingencies, and that, even down to the winding and regulating of the clock, $10.34, the amount might be paid out of the allowance for that. It may be asking too much of the Government, but I say that the High Commissioner has no right to be placed on a higher level than a Minister of the Crown here, and I believe that if he pays these amounts, he ought to give an account showing what he has paid. Sir Charles Tupper has a salary of $10,000, and he ought to give a strict account of the expenses he incurs under the head of contingencies. If the contingencies do not amount to $2,000, he should refund the extra amount, but at all events he should give an explanation of the amount he expends. If this $2,000 is given to him as a gratuity, we should understand it. Let us know that we are paying him $12,000 instead of $10,000, besides all his other perquisites.

Mr. FOSTER. What perquisites?

Mr. McMULLEN. The perquisites he has under these items, and also the perquisites he has in coming here to Canada and travelling through the country free and interfering in elections. The Finance Minister said that the information on this subject was given to us in the Public Accounts of last year.

Mr. FOSTER. I said no such thing.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to give us those details this year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the income of the High Commissioner is increased by the amount he has invested in the gas company, I should like to know if we will be compelled to pay the increased amount on his income tax.

Mr. FOSTER. That is too gassy a question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think that is a very proper question, and I think we ought to know if the electors of Canada will have to pay the amount of that increase.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Taking the Minister's explanation as to the reason for the amount of contingencies being reduced from $4,000 to $2,000, because of the purchase of the official residence, one would imagine that the ground rent and the income tax would be included and should be paid out of the $2,000 now allowed to the High Commissioner. If the whole $4,000 had been taken from him it might be different, but we find, of course, now no item for rent, but $2,000 is still left to the High Commissioner, and one would think that out of that he would pay the ground rent; and that item is fairly open to criticism.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think the information which is asked for by this side of the House is perfectly reasonable. We want to know for what purpose the amount voted for contingencies has been spent. We do not charge that it has been spent improperly or corruptly, but we ought to know how it was spent. If it has been spent properly, the Government have no reason to refuse to tell us how it has been spent. If I were asked by my constituents how that money was spent, I ought to be in possession of the facts so as to give them a proper answer, and I do not think it is right for the Finance Minister to ask us to pass this item without a proper explanation. If Sir Charles Tupper has used this money in order to entertain his friends, let us know it, or if he has used it for any other purpose let us know it. I think the question put by the Opposition is a perfectly proper question, and the Government will not perform their duty in refusing to give us the desired information. If the information is given, I am convinced that we can pass the item without further trouble.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought I gave a fair statement of the case in reply to another hon. gentleman. We know that this money has been paid to Sir Charles Tupper as well as his salary of $10,000. We know that we allowed Sir Alexander Galt $4,000 for contingencies. Of course he had to pay the rent of an official residence, while now we have purchased an official residence. Consequently, instead of allowing $4,000 for contingencies, we only allow $2,000. We do not ask how that was spent any more than we asked how the $4,000 was spent. As far as this country is concerned, we know that amount was paid. I do not think it will take hon. gentlemen very long to understand that there is a considerable amount of incidental expenditure in connection with the High Commissioner's office. Sir Alexander Galt did not give the items for his expenditure. He found that it would be impolitic in some cases to give these items. There are various expenditures which the High Commissioner has to make as representing the people of this great country. This $2,000 is given to him as an allowance, and has been given to him for the last nine years, in lieu of the amount which was previously given to Sir Alexander Galt, less the amount for house rent, because we purchased the official residence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will look at the Auditor General's Report, he will see that what he mentions is not exactly adhered to. Sir Alexander Galt paid his own income tax, he paid his own rent, he paid many charges which are included in the contingencies of the present High Commissioner. The present High Commissioner not only has a house furnished him, but he is receiving nearly as large an allowance as Sir Alexander Galt was receiving, and the latter had no house furnished to him at all. The hon. gentleman will see, therefore, that so far as the High Commissioner is concerned the understanding to which he refers, and which was stated to us at the time the house in London was purchased, is not adhered to. Now, I would like also to ask how it is that while the appropriation made last year for the expenses of the High Commissioner's office amounted to $7,163, the amount actually expended was $15,970. I do not see from what source the difference between these two amounts is made up.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, if he looks closely, will see that it is he who has made the mistake. The amount voted was over $15,000, and the amount expended was also over $15,000.

Mr. HYMAN. The hon. Finance Minister says practically that the $10,000 is paid as salary, and that the $2,000 additional is also practically paid as a salary, because we have no more vouchers for the one amount than for the other. It may be, as the hon. gentleman suggests, that it is not politic for us to know in what manner that $2,000 has been expended. If the hon. Finance Minister will add that $2,000 to the High Commissioner's salary, making it $12,000, I do not suppose any more questions will be asked.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the difference between that and what we do at present?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear. We do not see the difference.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think there is much to see.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the hon. Finance Minister state what object there is in paying $10,000 of salary, and then giving $2,000 in addition? Would it not be better to put the total amount at $12,000 rather than give the country the impression that the High Commissioner was only receiving $10,000?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter of taste.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Let us hear what your taste is about it?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is precisely what it is, a matter of taste, and I suppose the Government want a guarantee that the $2,000 shall be a matter of taste.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. I would suggest to the hon. Finance Minister that it would really be better to include the amount as salary; but while I have a very proper idea of economy, I do think that, instead of putting it at $10,000 or $12,000, $20,000 would be by no means too much to pay—I am not speaking of an individual, but for the position of the representative of Canada in London. There are so many demands made on any gentleman in that position, that I think it would be only showing a proper regard to the dignity and the position of Canada to make a good allowance for the High Commissioner.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think everything must be judged by its relations to other parts of the Government. Something may be said from the point of view of the hon. gentleman: I know that those possessed of great wealth look at $10,000 as a very small sum; but when we consider that the Prime Minister of this country, whose position is at least as honourable and I fancy ten times as difficult and onerous as that of the High Commissioner, receives but $8,000, it seems to me absurd to suggest that the High Commissioner should receive $20,000. You ask that an officer who lives in England, and who, however you may attempt to surround the fact with verbiage, holds a sinecure——

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—very largely, should have a salary larger than that of the hard-worked head of a Department. If it is not a sinecure, perhaps the hon. Finance Minister would enlighten this House as to what practical duties the High Commissioner has discharged during the last eight or ten years. We have had this matter discussed here session after session, and with the exception of an effort made by the High Commissioner a few years ago, to stop an edict, the effect of which would have been to hamper the importation of our cattle for the time being, I know nothing practical which that gentleman has done. He may have done a great deal; but from his report, which I have read, year after year, I have failed to find what he does. I remember that, some years ago, a mission was undertaken for the purpose of improving our trade relations with Spain, and predictions of no mean kind were uttered in this House as to what the results of those negotiations should be; but thus far they have been nil. Will the hon. gentleman tell us in what other direction they have not been nil? I know that in election times he comes here and does a great deal of good to his party, and a great deal of harm to his country; but I do not think that anyone, looking at the matter from a non-partisan point of view, will say that for that work he should receive $20,000 a year of salary, to say nothing of the other expenses of his office. I do think that before the hon. gentleman startles us with such an extraordinary suggestion, he must be prepared to show that our condition in Canada is so essentially prosperous that we should be justified in moving in the direction of increasing the salaries of our hard-worked officials: before we increase those of persons holding sinecures. Look at the salaries paid to our judges, who are in many cases overworked; look at the salaries paid to our county judges, many of whom are underpaid. If the country is in a financial condition to increase the salaries of any of our officials, I think these are entitled to consideration: but I do not know that the hon. Finance Minister would be prepared to say that the financial condition of the country is such as to enable him even to move in that direction. But before we have these propositions for increasing salaries, which are easily made, but difficult to carry out, we should have satisfactory assurances from those in charge of the finances of the country that our financial condition is better than the official blue-books and the statements in the Gazette would lead us to believe.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. The hon. gentleman has compared the emoluments of the High Commissioner with those of the hon. First Minister and the other Ministers of the Crown. The hon. gentleman does not require to be informed that many representatives of European nations, those in Austria, in France, in Russia, in England, get much higher salaries than the Prime Minister in any of those countries; and that is undoubtedly considered necessary to their position, representing as they do their Sovereign, as the High Commissioner of Canada represents the Dominion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Misrepresents.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. And I think it would be really in our own interest that the position of High Commissioner of Canada,—I say again, I am not speaking personally, not speaking of the individual—should be made such as to enable him to entertain, to some extent, out of the proceeds of his salary, as is done by almost all other representatives. The hon. gentleman incidentally said that there was a notice on the paper from me in respect of increasing the salaries of the judges. I do trust this will be taken into consideration by the Government, because I think we owe it to ourselves that the salaries of our judges should be increased; and while I hope I am as much actuated by a proper desire for economy as the hon. gentleman or any other member of this House, I should certainly not be opposed to seeing the emoluments of the Ministers of the Crown and of our judges increased, but at the same time we ought to exercise every care in introducing into every portion of the Civil Service those only who are fit to do the work to be assigned to them. If such care be observed, we should be able to pay well all those who are capable of doing, and who do good work for the Dominion.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we will all agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat. We all want the country to pay properly for all services rendered. The difficulty in this particular case is to discover what services have been rendered for any portion of the salary to the country as a whole. However, I have not risen to discuss that question, but rather to reply to a few remarks that fell from the hon. the Minister of Finance, who, I think, through not having looked into the matter carefully, has fallen into a mistake. The hon. Minister tells us that we are now carrying out, as it were in a partial way, the arrangement made when Sir Alexander Galt was appointed High Commissioner. Now, as I understand the position of the matter, when Sir Alexander Galt was our general agent, he received for about one year $4,000. For that $4,000 he was to pay his own rent and taxes, fuel, light and other incidental expenses. That arrangement lasted for about one year. After that an Order in Council was passed giving him $3,500, out of which he was to supply himself with house rent, etc. That was the state of affairs when the present High Commissioner made the arrangement by which Canada purchased a house in England. We paid for that house and furniture some $42,000, and it was then stated in this House that the $4,000 for contingencies was not to be continued because we had furnished the High Commissioner with a house. But to-day we are in this position: that, although we have furnished the residence, we are still voting $2,000, or half the contingencies. Now, when Sir Alexander Galt got his appropriations, he had to furnish his own house and to pay his own rent and taxes and other incidentals: yet, to-day, we are asked to vote half the expense of the appropriation, and at the same time to supply the High Commissioner with a residence and all the expenses connected therewith. If you look through these items in the Auditor General's Report, you will find that, in addition to getting the $2,000, Sir Charles Tupper has been paid for those incidentals that were formerly paid out of the appropriation. When the purchase of the house was made, Sir Leonard Tilley, Minister of Finance, pledged himself, on the floor of the House, that the interest upon the whole investment was to be deducted from the allowance. The interest on the purchase of the house and on the cost of the furniture and other expenses was to be deducted from the allowance. But to-day the Government are maintaining one-half of the allowance, thus not carrying out this arrangement of Sir Leonard Tilley's. If you take, say 5 per cent. interest on the investment of $42,000—I do not know if there is anything additional to that on original capital account—that amounts in itself to $2,000, half of the original $4,000 the Finance Minister has spoken of; and, in addition, we are paying other incidentals, such as $349 rates, $250 taxes, $332 gas, and so on. So that you are practically making an increase of salary and not carrying out the arrangement Sir Leonard Tilley had made. I think the item should be struck out and put on its proper footing. If we wish to give an increase of salary, let us say so. If we want to pay necessary expenses, the vouchers should be here. That is the only honest way of keeping the public accounts. If the salary is too low, let us say so, but not cover up an increase of salary in this way.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I hope the hon. the Finance Minister is convinced that not only the Opposition but his own friends agree to the proposition I made, that the $2,000 should be added to the High Commissioner's salary rather than be paid in the way it is. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) must be convinced, from his own argument, that there is something wrong in this way of voting money; and I trust he will see the force of the demand made. If Sir Charles Tupper is to be paid $12,000, he should honestly and above board be paid the money, and not be paid $2,000 under the cover of contingencies. I cannot say I agree in the opinion of the hon. member for Montreal West with regard to the payment of enormous sums to the High Commissioner. However, we are not now considering that matter, and when it comes up for consideration it will be ample time to discuss it, but I fancy there is no chance of it coming up this session. I trust the Finance Minister will see the force of the argument that the $2,000 should be put on a proper footing.

Mr McMULLEN. The hon. the Minister of Finance has stated that this item of $2,000 is in keeping with a like amount paid to Sir Alexander Galt when he was our agent. I have searched the Auditor General's Report for a like sum passed en bloc to Sir Charles Tupper and his predecessor. I find that in the first year of Sir Charles' appointment he was allowed $3,500 for fire, light and taxes. Now, these are all charged in the items recited in the Auditor General's Report, and the $2,000 is charged in addition. Now, with regard to the remarks that fell from the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), I am prepared to say, that when Canada is prepared to use a High Commissioner in England to such an extent that his residence in London will pay the country for keeping him there, I have no objection that he should be paid a fair salary for his services, and I am willing also to allow him such an amount as will enable him to discharge his duties with credit to Canada and to himself; but at the time Sir Charles Tupper was appointed High Commissioner, I claimed that the House and the country were misled. The First Minister stated that, by sending a High Commissioner to England and by giving him an official residence, we would save more in the interest we paid in various other ways than his whole salary and expenses would amount to. From the first time he undertook his duties as High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper has not discharged those duties as it was promised he would discharge them when he was appointed, and, consequently, we were misled. When the attention of the Finance Minister was called to this two years ago, he stated that we were under contract with our financial agents in London to allow them to put through our financial transactions, and that, until that contract expired, we would not be able to use our High Commissioner in the way it was intimated to us we could use him five years ago. It is very extraordinary, when the First Minister and the Finance Minister were urging that we should appoint Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner because we would save money, that it has been found impossible to take advantage of his residence in London to act as our financial agent. Anyone who reads his report of this year will find that, with the single exception of the delegation of tenant farmers which were sent to Canada, there is not an item of his action which properly belongs to the duty of the High Commissioner. He makes extensive reports in reference to charitable societies and emigration societies, he makes many references which belong to the duty of an emigration agent, but we were led to believe that he would perform much more important duties than those in connection with emigration. He deals also with the matter of educating our people as to how they can ship a number of small commodities which we used to send to the United States, such as eggs, and butter, and so on. I recommend hon. members to read Sir Charles Tupper's report, and there they will find the class of duties in which he is engaged. The duties he performs could be attended to by a man with a salary of from $1,000 to $2,000. Taking the turkey question, he says:

"A considerable number of turkeys have also arrived recently, and have sold readily at good prices: so far as I can ascertain from persons engaged in the trade, there will be an unlimited demand for them in future. They are regarded as being more like game than the British farm-fed turkey, which arises, no doubt, from the touch of wild blood which they contain."

What a grand idea must have struck our High Commissioner in trying to secure an extended market for our turkeys in England, because, as he says, a touch of wild blood makes them more palatable to the English Lords. I never knew that we sent the High Commissioner to England for the purpose of extending the trade in turkeys. However, I say that he has never performed the duties in England attaching to his position for which we pay him $12,000 a year. I never could get at the secret. I do not suppose that anyone on this side of the House could get at the secret why he was ever sent to England. Perhaps the question of who should be the chief of that party in the future, may have had something to do with his crossing the Atlantic. There were two men on this side who were possible leaders, and we had to send the one to the other side of the Atlantic at an annual cost of $25,000, and to keep the other here. That appears to have been the reason why Sir Charles Tupper was sent to England, and I do not hesitate to say boldly that it is an outrage to keep a man like him there at such a cost performing merely nominal duties. I do not deny that in point of ability Sir Charles Tupper is a credit to Canada, but, whatever may be the amount of his ability, we do not have the value for the money we pay. The duties which he performs are not in proportion to the amount we have to pay him. There appeared to be no particular objection to paying $10,000 for such on official. Sir Alexander Galt and others had received a similar amount. But we bought him a residence and furnished his house with everything required from garret to cellar. We pay for that house, and we give him $2,000 in addition to that. Now the hon. member for Montreal West says it is necessary, in order to enable the High Commissioner to entertain those whom he is called upon to entertain in the high position that he occupies. If that is so, let the people of Canada understand that it is for that purpose the Government are asking for the money. Why should we ask the people of this country to consent blindly to part with $2,000 for purposes that are not openly acknowledged? The people have a right to know where the money goes. If it is intended to give wine dinners, say so. If it is intended for other purposes, say so. Let the people of this country know what the money is being spent for. I say they have a perfect right to know that. They have a right to know why we are paying Sir Charles Tupper $12,000 instead of $10,000. Perhaps that $2,000 extra is given him in order to equip him thoroughly and prepare him for his periodical visits to the Dominion of Canada when the elections come round, and to discharge the duties of chief advocate of the cause of Toryism in this Dominion. Perhaps that is what it is given for. If it is given for that purpose, we would like also to know it. Now, I wish to say that I quite concur with the remarks already made, that if we are going to continue Sir Charles Tupper in London, we had better, in the interests of this Dominion, endeavour to make better use of him than we have been doing for the last five years. We have spent from $100,000 to $120,000 on the High Commissioner in London for the last five or six years, for which this country has virtually received nothing, unless on one occasion, for which he gets credit, when he prevented our cattle from being scheduled so that they would have to be slaughtered within two weeks of their arrival, the same as the American cattle. Now, that is the only thing, I believe, that he ever accomplished, and that was done three or four years ago. Still we keep him there in the discharge of functions which are of no benefit to this country, and I hold that we should either bring him back or else assign him duties in the performance of which he could be of some advantage to us as High Commissioner. Before sitting down, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, when does the contract terminate with these gentlemen in London that are now discharging the duties of financial agents for us? When may we expect that Sir Charles Tupper, or any other person discharging the duty of High Commissioner in London, will perform those duties himself in the interest of this country, duties which we were promised would be performed by the High Commissioner when we were asked to consent to his appointment?

Mr. FOSTER. I have a great desire to give the hon. gentleman information, and I will answer his questions categorically. That contract expires on the first day of July, 1892, in this way: That on that day, we can either get a year's notice, or we can give a year's notice of the termination; so that either way it may terminate on the first day of July, 1893. With regard to the second question, as to when the time will come that Sir Charles Tupper will do such and such things, I am not prepared to give that information. I want to say, however, as long as I am on my feet, that the hon. gentleman seems not to object to the payment of $12,000 on the ground of economy. He does not at all find fault that it is necessary that $12,000 should be paid, but he does not want it to be paid $10,000 plus $2,000—it must be $12,000 in a lump sum; and the reason he does not want it paid in $10,000 and $2,000, is because, he thinks he ought to know the items for which the $2,000 are spent, and he has not been furnished with these items. Now, it seems to me that the arrangement I stated here was a full, open and fair arrangement made in 1882 or 1883, whenever Sir Charles Tupper went there. I did not say that the same arrangement was carried out as we had with Sir Alexander Galt. I stated that Sir Alexander Galt received $4,000 for certain purposes, so he did; and although the Order in Council mentioned $3,500, that was only part of the $4,000 he received, and he was getting besides that, $500 contingencies pure and simple. I stated that when Sir Charles Tupper became High Commissioner that arrangement was made by which $2,000 should be retained by the Government and the other $2,000 should be paid to him for certain incidental expenses. That is exactly the arrangement that was made with reference to the salary, an open and full arrangement, and I do not see why we should cavil about that. Now there is another point. There seems some strange difference between my hon. friend who spoke last and my hon. friend from Charlottetown. My hon. friend from Charlottetown complains that the High Commissioner has nothing to do, and does not do anything, and my hon. friend who has just spoken complains that the High Commissioner does too much, and that he ought not to do those things that he does do. For instance, the hon. gentleman trys to belittle the work of the High Commissioner because he deals in such small matters as the egg trade, and the poultry trade, and the cattle trade. Not many months ago, Sir, it was not thought in this country, by the party in Opposition, that the egg trade and the poultry trade were small matters. I remember that scarcely a paper of theirs, scarcely an orator of theirs, ever published an editorial or made a speech in which these matters were not prominently brought forward, and the farmers and the farmers' wives, it was said, would be irretrievably ruined because the McKinley Bill would destroy their trade in eggs and poultry. Now it seems that these trades are not so important. I do not think the farmers of this country will look upon it in that way. I do not think that it demeans our High Commissioner, be he Sir Charles Tupper or whoever may succeed him, to look after these interests, which are very large when you come to look at the incidence of them, and the great majority of the people whom they affect. Sir Charles Tupper is not too high a commissioner to look after these matters of trade, which are of vital importance to the various interests of this country. What he has done with reference to the cattle trade is well known, and there is no member on either side of the House, I suppose, who will withhold from him the meed of praise which is his due with reference to that matter. With reference to the egg and poultry trade, my hon. friend, usually so well informed, seems to have fallen into a strange error. I may say to him that Mr. Saunders, Director of the Experimental Farm, never went to Great Britain to look after the egg and poultry trade. The hon. gentleman must have found his information in some strange way; however, it is totally incorrect. The services that Sir Charles Tupper and his assistants there effected were valuable services, and they have resulted in large benefit, and will result in much more benefit, to this country, so far as the trade in eggs and poultry with the mother country is concerned. My hon. friend finds fault, as well, because Sir Charles Tupper is not all the time engaged upon high and lofty matters; he thinks, that instead of fiddling around with eggs and turkeys and the like of that, he should be making loans. Well, Sir, when we made the last loan, the most advantageous loan that ever was placed on the British market, Sir Charles Tupper had an important part to perform, and he did it well, and the result was that, as I said before, we placed a loan on the British market at a rate less than any colony had ever placed a loan there before, and on very advantageous terms, as well. My hon. friend may try to belittle the work that a gentleman representing Canada, in so important a centre as London, has to perform, but he cannot go counter to the general sense of the intelligent people of this country who have only to reflect for a single moment to understand in how many varied and important ways a gentleman of the ability, such as my hon. friend acknowledges Sir Charles Tupper to be, a gentleman of the unwonted activity which the hon. gentleman also concedes to Sir Charles Tupper, can perform in London in the interests of Canada; and those who have to deal with the English Government know what great services he has rendered to this country in promoting our trade interests. They know how important it is that we should have some person there who understands this country and who is able to work in its interests; and, although the hon. gentleman may cavil as to the $10,000 and the $2,000, I apprehend the time will never come when the Government of Canada will cease to have an able and true representative of its interests at the seat of Government in London.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Finance says that Mr. Saunders was not sent to Great Britain for the purpose of enquiring into the egg and poultry business; he said that Mr. Saunders went there upon other business.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, what did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I am bound to repeat myself so many times, but I will do so out of sheer kindness to the hon. gentleman. I said that Mr. Saunders, the Director of the Experimental Farm, never went to England on any such mission as my hon. friend says he did.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, we will see what Sir Charles Tupper says, and then we will find out whether the hon. gentleman is right, or Sir Charles Tupper. Here is what Sir Charles says in his report:

"The operations of the McKinley Tariff have created a desire in Canada to render the country more independent of the United States markets for poultry and eggs, and inquiries and experience have demonstrated that an unlimited demand exists in Great Britain for such products. Before Mr. Saunders, the Commissioner deputed by the Government to visit this country, and to report upon the subject, arrived, much information was collected respecting the trade, and I trust that its dissemination has been of use to Canadian shippers."

Mr. FOSTER. I will help the hon. gentleman out of the dilemma. There are a great many people by the name of Brown, and there may be several by the name of Saunders.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is possible there may be other Saunders than one. If I made a mistake in saying that he was superintendent of the Model Farm I withdraw that statement. I do not for a moment belittle the duties which Sir Charles may have to perform, but I do not think it necessary that a man receiving a salary of $12,000 a year should be called upon to discharge such duties. They could be discharged by a great many people who are in our employ in England, and who are sent there for different purposes. It was announced in Parliament that Sir Charles Tupper would be engaged in performing very different duties, and would prove valuable as our commercial agent; and I hope, when this promise is carried out, we will obtain some value for our money, for we have received no value for it in the past.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Finance has sought to justify the continuance of the office of High Commissioner and the present occupant of it, on the ground that he has performed great service in respect to the egg and poultry trade. The hon. gentleman has, however, undertaken a larger contract than even he is capable of performing, if he seeks to convince the House that the spasmodic efforts of the High Commissioner with respect to the egg trade would justify the payment of $18,000 a year for the continuance of the office. The egg trade is a very important one, and its importance was always recognized by the Opposition. We complained that the Government would never recognize its importance: but we hold that the importance of the trade lies not with England, with which it is not carried on, but with the United States, with which it is conducted, and if the hon. gentleman opposite would devote his attention to removing all obstructions to the continuance and extension of the trade between here and the United States, he would be doing service to the country, instead of Canada paying $18,000 to a High Commissioner to endeavour to build up a trade which we know cannot be successfully carried on with the mother country. The hon. gentleman was on safer ground when he attempted to justify the continuance of the office of the High Commissioner on the ground that Sir Charles Tupper had been engaged in promotings ome Canadian loans. But the hon. gentleman made the statement, which I cannot allow to go unchallenged in this House, that the loan floated by the High Commissioner was the best loan ever floated by Canada. I am speaking in the recollection of many hon. members in this House when I say that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) delivered a speech last session, or at least the session before, in which he exposed the hollowness of that pretension so thoroughly that not a member on the Government side has ever replied to his speech since. He showed that the loan to which the Minister refers was, taking into account the money market of that day, one of the worst loans Canada ever floated. The Minister of Finance never attempted to answer his speech, but remained dumb. I will challenge him now to answer it, and he will have an opportunity in the Budget speech to reply to the scathing criticism which that loan met at the hands of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Apart from that matter, what has the High Commissioner done? I suppose the Minister of Finance has taken pains to make the House acquainted with all the services the High Commissioner has performed. We have had reference made to floating the loan, and to the High Commissioner's pottering, to use the hon. Minister's choice language, respecting this egg and poultry business. I think the hon. Minister will find that a very large majority of his own side of the House will fail to support the vote on these grounds. It has been suggested by some that the salary should be voted, and should be even increased, on account of the duties of the High Commissioner connected with entertaining. Who is the High Commissioner going to entertain? If he is going to entertain any of his political friends in this country he would hardly ask the Dominion to pay for it, and if the money is to be voted to the High Commissioner on the special ground that he is going to entertain the parcel of ruined gamesters, I suppose it would hardly receive support in this House. So the question of entertaining had better be left out of the argument. With respect to the proposition of the hon. gentleman for Montreal, that Parliament should not only pay but largely increase the office, I have examined the authorities to ascertain what the United States pay their ambassadors and ministers abroad. While we pay the High Commissioner $18,000 a year, the amount of salaries paid to the ambassadors of the United States to France, Great Britain, Germany and Russia is only $17,500.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend was speaking of the representatives of European countries in Europe.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the Parliament of Canada should be asked to draw its comparisons from European countries, and to avoid those of a neighbouring republic entirely.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not saying we should draw or should not draw our illustrations from that source, but I am simply stating what my hon. friend used as his comparison.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will state what I think is the most analogous case afforded by that country which stands in the closest relations to us, and which ought to afford, and may afford some slight grounds, although it should not be the controlling one in fixing our salaries. I repeat that the salaries paid for the four great diplomatic prizes in the United States is $17,500 a year. When the Minister of Finance interrupted me I was about to say that, speaking subject to correction. I do not think there is a large amount for contingencies voted to those ministers or ambassadors. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mills) says there is not. If that is the case, as a matter of fact we are paying the High Commissioner a larger sum than is paid to the ambassador of the United States to France, Great Britain, Germany, Russia or Mexico. The hon. gentleman is prepared to shake his head at anything.

Mr. FOSTER. At almost anything you say.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am speaking from the book. The United States only pays $12,000 a year to their ministers to Austria, Brazil, China, Italy, Japan, Spain; to Turkey, Chili, Argentine Republic, U.S. of Columbia and Peru, $10,000, and to Persia, Portugal and other smaller countries, $5,000. It seems to me that if we are going on the basis of comparison, our High Commissioner receives a larger salary than any of the ambassadors of the United States to foreign countries.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I desire to enquire if the hon. gentleman has been convinced and intends to change the method of voting this money?

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened very attentively to the arguments advanced. I will try and give them all the weight which is their due, and will consider the question very carefully.

Mr. MULOCK. A good deal has been said as to what the High Commissioner has been doing. We have not had explained to us why the High Commissioner has not done something to develop our horse trade with England. When election times come on, he and his friends state there is a limitless market in England for horses. They have sung that tune for some time, telling us there is no necessity to take our horses to the American market, as there is an outlet for suitably bred horses in England. Why does not the High Commissioner take practical steps to establish this trade in the way which he says is possible? Two months ago, there was held in Toronto, a sale of horses suitable for the English market. The sale was advertized for months. The promoters of the sale, I understand, are good supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, and much time and money was expended in scouring Canada in order to gather a very fine collection of horses. I observed in the press, a short time ago, a letter from one of the leading horsemen of Canada—who was also a member of the Conservative party at one time, if not now—in which he stated that these horses were all specially suited for the English market, and yet not one of them found its way there. Why is this? The reason is that when this enterprise was being got up, the High Commissioner, instead of attending to Canadian interests in England, which he is engaged and paid to do, was out here stumping the country in the interests of the Conservative party. Why was he neglecting the opportunity to advance Canadian interests in England; an opportunity which may not come around for years again? Why was he not at that time giving practical effect to what he says is a great possibility for Canada, namely, the development of the English market for our horses? Let us see from the Public Accounts what it costs the country to maintain the present High Commissioner in office. In the Auditor General's Report for 1890, page B—73, I find that we spent last year, $15,973, or $16,000 in round numbers.

Mr. FOSTER. That is for office and all.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes; and if you add $10,000 for salary, you have $26,000 a year. If we include the interest on the $42,000 spent for the High Commissioner's residence, without including depreciation of property, we have a total cost of some $30,000 a year, or a quarter of a million dollars altogether since the present High Commissioner assumed office. We have to pay this $30,000 a year, while the duties of the office lie so lightly on the shoulders of the present incumbent that he can for a considerable portion of the year be absent either in Canada or other parts of the world other than in England, while, apparently, Canadian interests in England must suffer. There is something wrong in this. Either the duties in that office demand his undivided time and should have it, or they do not, and, judging from the practices of the present High Commissioner, the indication is that these duties do not require his whole time. If we look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, it would appear that Sir Charles Tupper is not giving his whole time to his duties, and that, in consequence, the interests of Canada are suffering. In my opinion, the proper way to deal with this matter is to strike at the root of the evil and to recall the present incumbent of the office, because he is above his masters, the people. He is assuming to be the people and to speak for the people, yet he attacks a considerable portion of the people at home, and he attacks Canadian interests abroad. These are no part of the duties of the High Commissioner, and if the Government properly appreciated their duty to the country they would have recalled Sir Charles Tupper the first moment he dared to degrade the condition of the people of Canada by slandering a considerable portion of them. In my judgment, no man could have been guilty of a greater violation of the duties of his office than to use his position as a representative of the people, clothed as he is with the apparent authority of his office, to slander a very large proportion of these people. There is no compromise in the matter at all. The High Commissioner has shown himself unfit for his office, in failing to appreciate the judicial position he stands in as representing all classes of the people and as bound in duty to promote the interest of Canada. His position demands from him neutrality as between parties in this country; and as he has failed to observe this, he should be back in Canada, where we can meet him face to face, if he should be returned to this House, and call him to account for the breach of trust he is guilty of. The Administration is responsible for this, because they aid and abet his conduct and keep him in his office. I believe they have good reason to do so, for they are afraid to have him here. They do not care to serve under two kings, and so they keep him away; they, perhaps, would like him here, but they cannot trust him here. Sometimes he is in the Government, and sometimes we cannot tell whether he is in the Government or out of it. On one occasion he was Minister of Finance and High Commissioner about the same time.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at the same time.

Mr. MULOCK. He had the High Commissioner's patent in his pocket, and he sat here as Minister of Finance voting his salary as High Commissioner. He is nothing more than a general poo-bah for the Government of this country. I see it stated in the papers that he is coming to Canada at once, and that he is to have a seat in the Cabinet. Perhaps the Minister of Finance would tell us what portfolio he would take.

Mr. FOSTER. Ask the Globe.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose the Globe could tell if it desired, but that authority would not satisfy the hon. gentleman, and I will not quote it. I return to the grave proposition which is fairly entitled to consideration, namely: Whether the people of this country are prepared for maintaining in office, in a prominent position in the Empire, a man whose public acts are principally devoted towards slandering a large section of the people of this country?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I do not propose to refer to the item in the Estimates under consideration, but some matters of business have been brought before the House in connection with this matter to which I will briefly allude. It has been stated that an export trade in eggs between Canada and Great Britain is impracticable. I deny that, and I deny it upon the best possible evidence, namely, the practical results obtained from shipments of eggs to the English market. I also deny that the Canadian export poultry trade to Great Britain is impracticable, and I deny that also on information obtained from genuine experiments. Eggs have been exported from the Province of Ontario to England within the last ten months, and the exportation has been successful. Quantities of eggs have been shipped to the English market at a profit within the last six weeks and returns have been already made, which returns I have now on my desk.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read them.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I will read them when the proper time comes. Our eggs are quite equal to, and indeed superior to most eggs placed on the British market from the continent of Europe. The market is not the cause of any loss in shipments to England, the price is not the cause, but it was the lack of experience of our egg men in ocean shipments which resulted in the trade not being so profitable as it otherwise would have been. That difficulty has been overcome by the experience of a few shippers, and to-day Canadian eggs are being laid down on the Liverpool market with as small a percentage of breakages as they are laid down in Boston. There is no difficulty about the shipment, there is no difficulty about the carriage, no difficulty about the quality of the eggs, or no difficulty about the price obtained; but the difficulty lies in Canada, and is accounted for by the opposition shown to this trade by the Opposition here, who seem to be opposed to any trade between Canada and Great Britain. I know as a fact that Mr. Sanders has been successful in his shipments of poultry to England. If my friend Mr. McMullen, instead of reading the names he referred to, spelled them, he would find that one is "Sanders" and the other "Saunders," and that there is quite a difference between them. Mr. Sanders, after his visit to England, made a shipment of seventy-five tons of turkeys purchased in one week. He exported them at a disadvantageous season, shortly after the holidays, and when the choice fowls were all taken out of the country, and yet they competed favourably on the English market and the returns left him a respectable profit. I saw it stated in the papers, that the fowl arrived in a condition unfit for food, that they were condemned by the meat inspectors, and that the exporter was a heavy loser; but, notwithstanding that, I know to the contrary that there was a profit on the shipment, and I know that from the returns which I also have in my desk. Now, as to the horse trade with England. I know as a matter of fact, that, within the last six weeks, a contract has been made by a Canadian gentleman to supply 5,000 horses to one omnibus and carriage company in the city of London; that is about one-third of the annual average of our horse export for the last ten years. When one company in one city in England can make a contract for that supply, I think that we can say that the horse export trade of Canada is on pretty safe grounds.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Have you that in your desk, too?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I have it in my desk, and when the proper time comes I will read it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish in a few words to give the testimony of one of the large egg dealers in the Province of Ontario, Mr. D. D. Wilson, who is called the egg king in the west. Last June he shipped a carload of eggs to England, and at the same time shipped a carload to New York, to his agents there. The eggs sent to England were selected or picked eggs, all the small ones being left out and only the best taken; but those sent to New York were sent just as they came from the farmers. Mr. Wilson went to England to push the sale of the eggs there. He found that they arrived perfectly safe. For them he netted four cents a dozen less than he did from the eggs that he sent to New York at the same time. That is his own testimony, and it shows that the English market for eggs is not so profitable to the Canadian exporter as the United States market. He says that in England you can always find sale for eggs at a price, but not at the best price. In 1878 Mr. Wilson made a test of the English market for eggs. He sent 300 barrels, and he lost $5 on every barrel.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). By breakage?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). No; but by reason of the low prices obtained for them. According to the usage of the English market, eggs are sold there by the hundred, and 120 are required to make a hundred, in addition to which buyers demand 5 extra eggs, so that you have to give 125 eggs for every 100 you get pay for. It is also known that five weeks elapse from the time eggs are laid in this country until they are sold in the British market, so that they have to be sold as stale eggs, and compared with eggs brought from France they only bring second prices. You can always get a market, for there is a demand for all you can send; but the market is inferior to that found in the United States. So that, although Sir Charles Tupper has been doing all he can to establish a market for eggs in England, the experience of those engaged in the trade is that our egg trade in England will be a failure. With regard to horses, it is admitted by everyone who deals in horses that the United States is the best market for the kind that we raise in Canada. Although we have had to pay 20 per cent. on our horses sent to the United States, we have sent from 17,000 to 19,000 to the American market every year, while we only send about 160 to the free English market. A few years ago some parties were sent to this country to purchase horses for the English army, and even for those which they selected they paid an inferior price to the price obtained for Canadian horses in the American market. The consequence is that the Canadian farmer has ceased to sell horses for that purpose, and he sends his horses to the United States market instead. I would ask the hon. member for Leeds how it is that after the 6th October last, when the McKinley Bill went into force, the price of horses in this country fell $15 to $30 a head, if the English market were as valuable a market as he says for Canadian horses, and if we could realize as much for Canadian horses in the English market as in the American? With regard to poultry, it is the experience of men engaged in that trade, that the nearness of the American markets, the great centres of consumption, gives a greater margin of profit to Canadian exporters than they could obtain in England. That is a principle in political economy which I hope my hon. friend will bear in mind. In these three articles I am satisfied our market is on the other side of the line, where we can realize larger profits for producers than we can in England.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid that we are forgetting that the item before us is that of contingencies, and we are drifting into a discussion of the best market for eggs, horses and poultry. This discussion came up incidentally in connection with the work the High Commissioner has been engaged in, and to a certain extent it might be considered legitimate; but we have now had a speech on each side on the pure trade question, and I think I must appeal to the Committee to come back to the item of contingencies.

Mr. FLINT. Although perhaps somewhat out of the line of the item before the Committee, I wish to make a few remarks on the question of the High Commissioner's office. The discussion with regard to the salary attached to that office has drawn from the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) the declaration of his opinion that the salary ought to be much higher than it is at present. While I do not rise to attack his opinion on that point, I might even go so far as to agree with him, provided that the occupant of that office were under the control of the Government, that he would so act as to elevate it rather than degrade it, and that he would represent before the people of Great Britain all the people of Canada in all their varied interests, rather than act as the representative of one political party in Canada, using his immense talent and great energies, not only in attacking the political party on this side of the House, but in misrepresenting on the subject of loyalty the opinions and sentiments of a large minority at any rate of the people of this Dominion. I am not attacking the occupant of the office, because we all know that he is an earnest politician, that he has led parties in this country, that he has been to a great degree an ornament of this House, and that he is a strong supporter of the present Prime Minister; but I think that we have reason to feel disappointed in the Government in permitting the highest civil servant under their control to assume the position he does without rebuke. It is not Sir Charles Tupper who is to blame, because he is only acting according to his temperament and under the responsibility of the Government, for which we have the word of the right hon. Prime Minister; they have endorsed all he has done during the election and since in bolstering up and furthering the interest of one political party. Now let us look at the position from an English standpoint. We must consider, not only our own feelings in this matter, as Liberals and Conservatives, but the position of honest independent Englishmen, viewing the Dominion of Canada through the spectacles provided for them by the official representative in London of the Canadian people; and I ask you if the time has not arrived when this House should show its disproval of such conduct by refusing to vote the large appropriations asked for? The High Commissioner—not Sir Charles Tupper the individual politician, but the High Commissioner of Canada—left his office and came to this country to take a leading part in the recent elections. Had he confined himself during that campaign to the consideration of the trade question or any other great question agitating the country, much that has been said need not have been said on this occasion, but we all know that he took a peculiar ground, never before taken by any of the political leaders of this country. He took the ground that the leaders of one of the great political parties in this Dominion were at heart traitors, and engaged in a treasonable conspiracy to wrest this country from the British Crown and annex it to a foreign State. This position, completely unsupported and untrue in itself, should, taken by the High Commissioner representing Canada in England, be repudiated in the strongest possible terms by gentlemen on both sides of the House.

I will not detain the House by entering at length into what that gentleman said in his able and vigorous manner throughout the campaign, and which impelled into the politics of this country a bitter feeling it will take a long time to get rid of, but will briefly refer to the manner in which he has been contradicted by the people of England to whom he uniformly appealed in order to prejudice them against the party to which I have the honour to belong. How have his charges, made directly or indirectly, that we were traitors to the British Crown and engaged in a plot with certain persons in American political life to take this country from British control and annex it to the United States, been met in England? These charges, which were telegraphed to all the prominent English papers, called forth in the columns of the London Times a protest from so distinguished a statesmen and Conservative as Sir George Baden-Powell. That gentleman was in Canada during the elections, and there heard the charges hurled by Sir Charles Tupper, and his supporters, and the Conservative press, against the Liberal party; and so strongly did he feel the injustice done to the Liberals of the Dominion, that he wrote a long and able letter to the Times, a few passages from which I shall quote. On the 29th February, 1891, Sir George Baden-Powell wrote as follows:—

"It so happens that when I was in Canada last autumn, I had the privilege of seeing a great deal of the leading men of both parties, and especially of the Liberals, staying, for instance, with Mr. Goldwin Smith in Toronto, enjoying the hospitality of Mr. Longley in Halifax, and talking over the situation with many another Liberal in Victoria, Vancouver, Montreal, Winnipeg, Ottawa and other places."

He then goes on to say:

"It becomes absolutely clear that both parties in Canada are not only distinctly loyal to the British connection, but also loyal to Canada, and that any ministers or leaders who swerve for one moment from either type of loyalty will at once lose the votes and support of their followers."

This is the opinion of Sir George Baden-Powell:

"Such are, in brief, the conclusions arrived at after much discussion with men of all parties in Canada. And above all, we know that the leaders and voters of both political parties will give short shrift to any who are wanting in loyalty to the Canadian nationality or to the great Empire, of which the Dominion is rapidly becoming one of the most important and principal constituent elements."

Well, Sir, that is the opinion of Sir George Baden-Powell, to which he gave circulation in order to check the false impression which was being created in England by our High Commissioner against the leaders and rank and file of the Liberal party. But let me quote the London Times itself in an article dealing with the colonies. On the 30th March, after the English and Colonial papers had been filled with the diatribes of Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner, that great exponent of English public opinion thus sums up its views on the matter, after a careful review of the whole situation, and, I presume, a careful examination of the leading speeches on both sides:

"In listening to the echoes of the election which are carried over the Atlantic, it is hardly possible to doubt the strong political dislike to the constitution of the United States which continues with other causes to stimulate the sentiment of loyalty to British connection. Not one party alone, but all parties cherish the Canadian constitution which they regard as the nearest approach to liberty which has yet been realized. They look upon it in every way as more admirable than that of the United States."

I do not blame our official representative for being a politician; but I blame the Government which, after placing him in the position he occupies, compelled him to give expression to his views. The Government are responsible for every utterance he made during the elections in this country and in Great Britain since the elections with regard to our political affairs. But after the excitement of the campaign was over, and when the echoes of the struggle had died out, the feelings of our High Commissioner became to a certain extent abated; and the London press received a telegram recording an interview held in New York with the High Commissioner, just as he was about to leave for England. We find that the High Commissioner felt compelled to take back many of the utterances he had made during the campaign. On 8th April, 1891, the following telegram appeared in the London Times from New York:—

"Sir Charles Tupper in an interview with a representative of the Tribune, on being asked whether he regarded complete reciprocity between Canada and the United States as unfair to Great Britain's material interests, is represented to have replied that the only terms upon which complete free trade could receive the sanction or support of anyone in the United States would, in his judgment, inevitably sever Canada from Great Britain and could not fail to be regarded in England as indicating Canada's desire to adopt that course. He declared that the number of annexationists in Canada was utterly insignificant, and that any man who had shown any tendency in that direction had been defeated at the polls."

How much more moderate is this very proper expression of his views, if they were honest, than the fiery statements he made from the platform throughout the country during the elections. It is merely an expression of opinion—an opinion which that gentleman has a right to maintain if he sees fit. He declared that the number of annexationists in Canada was insignificant. This admission is a direct contradiction of his wild statement during the campaign that the result, if the Liberals obtained office, would be inevitably annexation, that they were the head and forefront of a conspiracy entered into with prominent men of the United States to bring about annexation. Since the election, this very High Commissioner, feeling bound to eat his own words, took back, in the presence of the people of England, all the assertions he made during the campaign. He said that the number of annexationists is utterly insignificant, and that every man who showed any tendency to annexation had been defeated at the polls. He withdrew the charge of treason against our party, for we find that a number of the most eminent and prominent gentlemen on this side of the House have not been defeated, and, consequently, could not have shown any tendency towards annexation. Unrestricted reciprocity, he added, was dead. Well, this is the position that our High Commissioner has been compelled, in the face of the people of England, to occupy; and I ask this House if it is such a position as should be rewarded with increased salaries and emoluments. When the High Commissioner of Canada descended from the lofty position in which he was placed with the almost unanimous approval of the Canadian Legislature, and degraded himself by resorting to the lowest tactics of party warfare, either the position should be abolished or the salary reduced so as to administer to him and the Government which sustains him an effectual rebuke. But not only has he, during this election and since, been occupying an inconsistent position before the people of England in regard to his statements as to the loyalty of the great political parties in this country, but he has entered into a controversy in England where both their feelings and their capital are involved in the welfare of one of the greatest corporations of this country. Whether the charges he has made are true or false, what position does the High Commissioner occupy in England when he enters into a controversy with these people, who are interested in this great corporation? This is a controversy which has become very bitter, which must be prolonged, and must destroy any usefulness which the High Commissioner may have had in the mother country. I am not going to quote at any length the extracts I have in regard to this gentleman, but it is clear that, owing to this controversy, and the bitterness engendered by it, owing to the charges which have been flung backward and forward, the High Commissioner's usefulness is gone in the mother country, and the Government ought to withdraw him from the position he occupies. The Railway News, referring to this matter, says towards the close of an article :

"But what about Sir Charles Tupper's position? He is the highly paid ambassador from the young Dominion to the old mother country, paid out of the taxation of the Dominion, contributed by the citizens of all shades of opinions, and probably the largest contributor is the corporation of the Grand Trunk Railway; and yet he considers it within his privileges to forsake his duties as a servant of the State and to engage in a fierce and undignified advocacy of one set of politicians against another."

Importing into the mother country the charges which are made by one party against another in this country, which should be threshed out in the courts of this country and not made a laughing-stock in the press of the mother country. Further, this article says :

"The conclusion is inevitable that the interests of himself, his relatives and his friends outweigh all considerations of the discharge of a great public duty. What would be said of any other public servant in the world (outside of the South American Republics) acting in such way."

The London Truth, referring to the same subject, charges him correctly with misrepresentation, which, if the office is to be upheld in the way it should be, must involve the High Commissioner in another controversy with that journal. Truth says :

"Does he expect the shareholders to yield to his desire to discredit the present management of the line and to place in their stead a docile set of officers, who will repeat the 'jobbery, corruption and mismanagement' which was the result under the control of his predecessors? Heaven save the Grand Trunk shareholders if the property once passes under the influence of Canadian politicians, whose methods are now very well understood in this country."

Why are Canadian politicians so vilified in the mother country? Must it not be to a large extent due to the charges which have been flung broadcast by the representative of the people of Canada? Should it not rather be the duty of the High Commissioner to soothe the feelings of the people of the mother country, to defend the people of this country whom he represents from charges of disloyalty against the Crown and against the Empire? I contend that the office of High Commissioner has not been sustained in the way it should be by the present incumbent of that office. It is true that he does not lack ability or experience, but the Government, by inviting him to take part in the late campaign, have involved themselves in agreement with all the statements which he has made; and I believe that we ought either to wipe out of existence altogether the office which he holds, or to place in that position a man of integrity, a representative of the veracity and ability of the people of Canada, irrespective of party politics.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not rise to discuss the question which has been before the House, but simply to refer to some remarks which were made by the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). I do not know that the comparison between the cost of the consular service of the United States and the cost of our service in England can be of any practical value, but it is well that the facts should be stated. The hon. member for Queen's asserted that the cost of the consular service of the United States in England was $17,500, and he affirmed that there were no contingencies. I have in my hand the Appropriation Bill presented to the United States Houses for the next year, and in this I find that the salary of the Minister to Great Britain is $17,500—the amount which the hon. member for Queen's stated was the whole expense of the consular agencies in Great Britain. I find also, that the secretary in that office receives a salary of $2,625, and the second secretary receives $2,000. Further I find this :

"For the purpose of enabling the President to provide at the public expense all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several legations in the transaction of their business, and also, for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, clerk-hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, janitors, and porters, and so on, $105,000."

Then there is a further vote :

"To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirements of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $80,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary."

In addition to that, we find that there is an allowance made for several consuls. There is one in London who receives $6,000. There are also consuls at Birmingham and Manchester, who have clerks receiving from $2,000 down to $960 each. Then you also find this item :

"Expenses of providing all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, signs, rent, postage, furniture, statistics, newspapers, and so on, $150,000 in connection with consular agencies."

So, whether the comparison be useful or not, it is certainly only fair that the House should be made aware that, so far from $17,500 covering the expenses connected with these services on the part of the United States, which Sir Charles Tupper performs on the part of Canada, it does not represent more than one-fifth of the amount they expend.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not suppose that the members upon this side of the House, or the party in this country which is represented by the members on this side of the House, have any objection to the office of a High Commissioner in London. On the contrary, it is generally agreed that the office is a very useful one. The objection is not to the office itself, or to the fact that the High Commissioner is paid liberally, and we believe it would be better that the $2,000, which has been referred to, should be incorporated in his salary, and that the country should understand that he receives $12,000, instead of $10,000, with a sort of smuggling arrangement by which he gets $2,000, the country being led to believe that he spends that for other purposes than the expenses legitimately chargeable to his salary. But I repeat, that we do not object to the existence of this office; all we demand is that this office should be properly filled, that it should be filled by a gentleman who will honestly discharge the duties of that office, who will confine himself to the discharge of those duties, who will not act, when he is High Commissioner for the Dominion of Canada, representing all the people of Canada, as a mere partisan, coming to this country to defame and decry one-half the population of the country, to vilify and malign certain public men of this country, thereby prostituting and debasing the functions of his office to the purposes of a mere partisan, and a partisan of the most violent and reprehensible character. These are the reasons why we criticize the salary and matters connected with the position of High Commissioner in London. If the office is to continue in existence, we want that position to be filled properly, we want that position to be filled honourably. We do not want a gentleman in the position of High Commissioner in London who can be called upon, when his services are required, as a mere canvassing or electioneering agent, who will leave his duties for which he is paid in London, to come here and bolster up and further the purposes of a political party. These are not the functions of such an officer, and, by discharging his duties in this way, he casts odium upon his office and he leads the people to believe that the office had better be abolished; for the people readily see that Sir Charles Tupper, in coming, as he has upon two different occasions, to this country to engage in the active business of a political campaign, himself a High Commissioner, representing the whole people of Canada, himself occupying a position where, if he is needed at all, ought to be in London to attend to his duties there, leaving those duties, abdicating for the time being his position, coming to Canada and travelling up and down in special trains through this country, and accompanying Ministers of the Crown in making partisan addresses in various parts of the country, stigmatizing the character of public men, denouncing them as traitors, adopting all the disreputable tactics of mere party politicians—the people, I say, readily see that these are not the duties of a High Commissioner, and by allowing the High Commissioner to discharge his duties in this way, you will make his office odious to the people of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. This gentleman evidently has a good deal of spare time. He can come to Canada in the way I have represented he has come, and travel about with my friend the Minister of Customs, with my friend the Minister of Finance, with my friend the Premier of the country, with my friend the Minister of Justice, he can travel with these gentlemen either in groups, or alone, in a special car up and down this country. In addition to the amount of leisure which he seems to have been able to devote to this business, he evidently had sufficient time to engage in speculation. He is a director in gas companies, he is a director in water companies, he has an interest in the dead meat business. I believe he had something to do with floating a loan upon the English market for the Caraquet Railway, and the English stockholders will naturally not remember that hon. gentleman with feelings of kindness and gratitude for the part he has played in the placing of these various loans and financial schemes which have resulted, not in advantage to the English public, but in advantage to manipulators and speculators only. I say that we do not ask to have this office abolished, but we ask to have it properly and honestly filled. We say that it is a scandal to have this office filled in the way it has been. We say that it is not a mere partisan office, that it is not an office the holder of which is entitled to act as a mere partisan, and that if he has duties to perform which require that he should remain in England, then he ought to remain there and perform them, but, on the contrary, if he has not duties that require him to remain in England to perform, then that fact is sufficient reason for abolishing the office. The whole question resolves itself simply to this: Has the office of the High Commissioner in London, and the functions pertaining thereto, been filled in a decent, creditable and proper manner? Has the office been filled in such a way as to justify the expectations and satisfy the desires of the people of this country?

Has Sir Charles Tupper acted in deed and truth as High Commissioner of this Dominion? Has he acted in the interest of all parties in this Dominion? Has he acted for the people of Canada as a whole? I say that he has come to this country and defamed and vilified our public men, and hundreds of thousands of the people of this country. I say that is not a part of his functions, and that in doing these things he deserves the rebuke of the people of this country. I say that if this office is to be filled in this way in the future, we had better abolish it. If you are going to use it as a mere annex and appendage to the party in power, for the purpose of increasing the influence they may wield, we had better abolish the office. Why, Sir, the conduct of this hon. gentleman in seeking to obtain the influence of a great corporation in this country, and, failing to obtain that influence, then going to England and seeking to injure the reputation of the public officials of that corporation, seeking to injure the interests of that corporation in making himself an offensive partisan in a quarrel of this kind, in bringing himself into collision with the stockholders and officers of a great corporation in Canada, the motive actuating him being perfectly palpable—because he could not control those people, could not use their influence in the interest of the party that he came here to assist—I say it is a scandal, and we have reason to complain, and we do complain, of the manner in which the High Commissioner of Canada has discharged his functions, and we say the mode in which those functions have been discharged by Sir Charles Tupper deserves the rebuke of this House.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister of Finance, in his remarks with regard to the duties of the High Commissioner in England, stated that it was one of his duties to attend to the egg and poultry business, and that he did not consider that a matter that was at all out of the sphere of his duties. We admit that; but I would like to know from the Minister of Finance, if it is a part of Sir Charles' duties to attend to the matter of securing extended markets for such things as poultry and eggs, why did he and his colleagues consider it necessary to appoint a commissioner in the person of Mr. Sanders, to go to England at an additional expense to this country, and attend to that very particular thing? Now, if Sir Charles is supposed to perform those duties in England, certainly he should be able to do them without putting the country to the expense of sending Mr. Sanders there for the specific purpose of investigating and reporting upon the probabilities of our being able to secure a market in England for eggs and poultry. Now, with regard to the remarks that have fallen from several hon. members who have recently addressed the House, on the whole question of Sir Charles Tupper's tour to Canada during the recent election, and the manner in which he has so evidently shown himself a political partisan, not only in Canada but in England, I say that it is unfair and it is more than the Government should expect, that we should consent to the passage of this item, meekly and quietly, in face of the abuse, and criticism, and the undeserved epithets that he has applied to the Reform party in this country in his recent visit to Canada. Why, Sir, supposing any member of the Opposition went home to England while Sir Charles was privileged to hold the office of High Commissioner in London, I would like to know if we ought not be in such relationship with the High Commissioner that at least, although differing from him politically, we might feel at liberty to call upon him, to take advantage of his being there as a representative of Canada, and use him for any purpose that might be proper and right and in the line of his functions? Now, I would ask, in presence of the existing strained relations between Sir Charles and the Reform party of this country, how can we expect that any member of that party can call upon Sir Charles in London, or ask him for the slightest assistance? Why, Sir, after his coming across the Atlantic and pouring out the abuse, the criticisms, and the epithets in which he has indulged, on stump after stump, in regard to the Reform party in this country, how can we forget and forgive such language on his part, and how could we call upon him, or take advantage of his being in London, to ask him to perform any service pertaining to his functions as High Commissioner, in the interest of any person that might call upon him, or in the interest of Canadians generally? We could not do that, we are shut out from doing that. If he is in the habit of entertaining his friends to wine dinners and that kind of a thing, of course we would be shut out from participating in any of them. If you were to alter his designation and call him High Tory Commissioner for Canada in London, that would be a proper name. We should then understand the position he fills. He is really the High Tory Commissioner there, and he shows he is High Tory Commissioner when he comes here; for in making statements that cannot possibly be sustained by facts he is unsurpassed, of which we had a sample last year. He outdid all the members of the Tory party. It is not desirable that the High Commissioner should occupy such a position in the eyes of the people of this country, and it is unfair to expect that we, the Opposition in this House, should quietly submit. I should like to see hon. gentlemen opposite submitting to the insults and abuse to which we have been subjected. I hope the last visit of the High Commissioner to Canada, when he was asked by the First Minister to come here and facilitate the election of his party and the continuance in office of the Tory party, will be the last exhibition of this kind we shall have in this country, whether the Commissioner be a Conservative or a Reformer. I hope the next High Commissioner who is appointed will so carefully keep within the limits and bounds of the duties of his office, that he will not make himself subject to the well deserved criticisms which have been visited on the High Commissioner on this occasion. Well does the High Commissioner deserve from the Opposition the most severe criticism, within the limits of parliamentary procedure, for the manner in which he acted towards the Opposition during his visit, and for the manner in which he acted on all occasions since his appointment to the office. The best course hon. gentlemen can adopt, is to remove the present High Commissioner. We have no objection to fighting that gentleman fairly face to face. We have done so, and are prepared to do so again; but when another High Commissioner is appointed it is to be earnestly hoped he will not disgrace his position, as has been done by the present occupant, by discharging the two-fold duties of High Commissioner in England and high Tory advocate and stumper for the party in Canada. One position is sufficient. I hope that after 1st July, 1893, we will be able to increase the duties so largely that the High Commissioner will no longer be able to visit Canada during two or three months of the year, and the contention be subsequently made in Parliament that the duties of the office did not suffer. Sir Charles Tupper would not dare repeat the unwarranted attack he made on the Reform party during the late election, and we are going to let him know this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen need not begin to indulge in any cat-calls. We are here to stay, and the more hon. gentlemen engage in those amusements the longer will be the session, and there is an hon. gentleman now presiding over the House who will not allow them to be indulged in. We have criticized the actions of Sir Charles Tupper as he has merited, although he has not yet received as much as he should receive. It may be he has been led into a trap by the First Minister, who is a wonderful man for leading people into traps. I have watched the right hon. gentleman's course for 25 or 30 years, and I have found that when a man attains a strong position, he leads him to commit an act which makes him thoroughly unpopular. Whether he has led the High Commissioner into a trap by inviting him on two occasions in Canada to perform the duty he did perform, it is perfectly certain that if the High Commissioner expects to raise himself in the estimation of our people or of the people of England, or to cultivate that cordial feeling that statesmen should cultivate, he cannot do so by adopting the scurrilous course the Commissioner adopted during the late campaign. The High Commissioner should have more respect for the dignified position he holds, than to make himself subject to such criticisms as have been passed upon him. I have made a challenge to hon. members opposite, and I repeat my challenge. I challenge any one to take up the report of the High Commissioner, and to peruse it from beginning to end, and then say that the duties are such as should attach to the office of High Commissioner, to whom is paid a salary of $25,000 a year. The report refers to two or three little matters that have been attended to by the High Commissioner, from which this country has derived a little benefit; but taking the whole volume, it is a compilation of information gathered from different sources, from the Trade Returns of England and other sources, that could be easily compiled by the humblest man in his office. That report is nothing in return for a salary of $25,000. If the United States pays a large amount for salary, and also a large amount for contingencies in connection with their office in London, the country gets something better than we obtain. If we compare the duties of the chief agent of the United States in England and the duties of the High Commissioner for Canada, we find the duties are more onerous, more important and more valuable which the United States have performed for the money they vote for their commissioner than we obtain from the payment of salary and expenses from the High Commissioner. Let us get some duties for the High Commissioner to perform, and in the meantime the Government should withdraw not only the items for the High Commissioner, but the incumbent of the office, and place there someone whose record is unstained by any action, public or personal, one to whom we could look up to with respect, and one to whom the people of England could look up to with respect, and one in regard to whom we can feel we have in England a true and loyal advocate, not in the interests of the Tory party, but in the best interests of the country as a whole, and one who will entertain kindly feelings towards Conservatives and Reformers alike, as anyone occupying the office of High Commissioner should do.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Hon. gentlemen opposite will, perhaps, not feel any great concern respecting the abuse poured out on their political opponents, but this feeling is not shared by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I think they might fairly reprobate it, and they would do so if they were just to their opponents, but we do not expect that. We are not afraid of what may be said about us or of meeting any one in debate on this question; the gentleman himself to whom allusion has been made is a very powerful debater; but I am not aware that the Opposition are afraid to meet him in debate either on the public platform or in the House. This is something which the Ministers ought to consider in reference to the discharge of the duties of that office, and which ought to have some weight with them, if they care anything about utterances made against political opponents. The Minister of Finance has told us that the High Commissioner was very useful during the negotiation of the last loan and that he was able to render that assistance which permitted the Minister to place the loan on terms so favourable as described by him. I have to take exception to his favourable description of the loan, because I think he forgot some terms and conditions peculiar to that loan which made it very acceptable in the minds of the loan-taking public. We are told that one of the principal reasons assigned for the appointment of the High Commissioner was that he would be in England, ready to lend assistance when visits had to be made to that country with reference to any financial undertaking. The First Minister admitted the other night that it was at the request of the Ministry, Sir Charles Tupper came to this country to take part in the elections, and in making that confession he removed part of the charge as it might be urged against Sir Charles Tupper and took it upon the Government. That was very well, but I pressed another question on the right hon. gentleman, to which I received no answer, and to which I think it would behoove the Minister of Finance to give a little thought and attention. That question was: Whether the present conduct of the High Commissioner in England while there professing to discharge his duties as such, has met with the approval of the Government? I ask the Minister of Finance this question; he can answer it in a word. I would ask him, if he thinks that the credit of Canada and the securities of Canada, if he should now desire to negotiate another loan, were such that he could hope to place the loan upon the London money market on as favourable terms as he did when the last loan was effected? I would like the hon. gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. FOSTER. I will answer you when you get through.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to get the answer now.

Mr. FOSTER. But it is not right for two members to stand up at one time.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I will sit and wait for the answer.

Mr. FOSTER. The question, as I understand it, is whether I think it probable that Canada could float as favourable a loan to-day as she did in 1888? My answer to that question is this: If the condition of the London money market and the money markets of the world were just as favourable now as they were then, I believe the loan could be put upon the British market even more favourably than then. If my hon. friend has read the financial papers he must know that at the present time the state of the market is not nearly so favourable as it was in 1888.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have read the financial papers and I can say that the Minister has given a very fair answer, but my question was not directed towards ascertaining such an answer as the one given. I recognize that the condition of the money market has much to do with effecting a loan, and the answer I have received from the Minister of Finance is that he believes, all things being equal in the money markets, we could effect a loan to-day on as good terms as in 1888. Very well; the High Commissioner for Canada has been in England, the High Commissioner has been telling the people in England that one-half the people in this country are virtually rebels and annexationists, and I take it that if Canadian security is as good to-day as it was in 1888 the people of England believe the High Commissioner does not tell the truth of the people of Canada. There must be one of the two alternatives: your credit cannot be as good in London to-day as it was then, and Sir Charles Tupper cannot be believed at the same time. I say, if you take the latter alternative, that you have a man as the mouth-piece of the Canadian Government in London, a man representing that Government, whose word is contemned, despised and disbelieved by the people of England, and in maintaining him in office you are lowering the dignity of the Dominion of Canada. Canadian credit is injured in England, or else you have a High Commissioner representing this country whose word, not being believed, brings upon this country dishonour.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The High Commissioner has, no doubt, a pretty difficult task in England. He is sent to that country, where free trade is the policy, and he is trying to popularize Canada, that has copied the protective trade policy of our American neighbours. He, no doubt, finds it very difficult to make the people of England believe that the present Administration in Canada, which introduced the American tariff, have any love for British instincts or British customs. Hence, Sir Charles Tupper's duty is a difficult one, and sometimes he has to slap his own Government very severely, as well as he slaps the Opposition. Consequently, he appears to be slapping all round. While speaking about the result of the election, after his return to England, he gave the present Government a direct slap in the face. In trying to popularize the great High Commissioner in England, he indicated that it was not the policy of the Government, but the blunders of the Opposition, which won the election. He held that the policy of the present Government was obnoxious, and that, if the Liberals had gone in for a revenue tariff, the Government would have been beaten, because the policy of the Government was a bad one. After giving this slap in the face to the Government, he tried to make things even by using highly improper language and unfortunate epithets against those politically opposed to him. The fact is, that Sir Charles Tupper tries to defy the Government and the Opposition as well. He appears to be an Ishmaelite: his hand is apparently outstretched against every man's hand except the hand of the High Commissioner. There is one man he appears to love, and there is one man he likes to speak of, and to praise, and to admire, and to adore, and that is Sir Charles Tupper. This is the gentleman who has done grand things for the chicken trade, the poultry trade, the egg trade and the other interests of the Dominion. Why, we could have all that done better by a market gardener, with but a fraction of the expense; everything in connection with that would properly come within the department of a market gardener, and not within the department of the High Commissioner for Canada. The High Commissioner for Canada is above the law, and above the Ministers of the Crown, and above the Governor General even; for they give detailed statements of their expenditure in every department, and he does not. High and exalted as our Governor General is, and representing as he does Her Gracious Majesty the Queen in this country, he gives details of his expenditure in his office; but the High Commissioner does not! The latter gentleman gets $2,000 in one lump, and the Government are afraid to ask him for vouchers or details lest they should offend this high and mighty Commissioner. Not a single word of explanation will they ask him; and when you ask them how he spends the money they grin and they fawn upon the High Commissioner, but they dare not ask him for a voucher. When it is moved for in the Public Accounts Committee, as it was moved last year, not a single voucher were they able to bring down. He defies the Government: he says virtually: I am your master and you are my servants; I will give you no return. Give me the money that I want, or I will call out my forces and I will condemn all of you: you are obliged to give me what I want or otherwise out you go. That is about the reason why this Government allows the High Commissioner of Canada to disgrace Canadian interests and the Canadian people as he has done during the past year, circulating statements that are false. Canadians who love their country were glad to find, after he had been hurling tirades against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, that when the shareholders met the old board were re-elected by an overwhelming majority, showing that, however great the influence of the High Commissioner may be over the Government of Canada, he has very little influence or power in England, and very few people there believed the statements he made for the purpose of damaging a railway which has done so much to develop this country. I, as a Canadian born, feel keenly on this subject. I feel that the Government, by their fear of the High Commissioner, are laying down a precedent which should never be set under a limited monarchy, in allowing any officer to take the reins in his hands and defy the Government and Parliament. All he wants is the means to enable him to indulge in unlimited extravagance in the old country, to entertain his friends and to abuse those with whom he differs. It is well enough for us to have our different views about the policy that should prevail in the country; but every man, be he a Conservative or a Reformer, should stand up for British ideas and customs, and fair-play is one of them; and any officer who is a servant of the people and who endeavours to traduce the Opposition, is no longer fit to hold any high position or to receive public money from the people of this country.

Mr. MULOCK. I think there are some matters on which we ought to have information from the Government. It is known to all hon. gentlemen that during the visit of the High Commissioner to Canada before the last election, he was reported to have endeavoured to negotiate a treaty or an alliance with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for political purposes. It is said, with what truth I do not know, but on the authority of persons high in office, that he approached the manager of the railway in Canada, and in one way or another endeavoured to secure from him the support of the railway company for his party, no doubt making offers in return. He was here at that time, I understand, at the request of the right hon. First Minister. Therefore, in engaging in the political campaign, he was the duly accredited agent of the party opposite. First, then, I would like to know from the Government whether it was with their authority that he approached the Grand Trunk Railway Company? I do not know what his method was, whether he used persuasion or something stronger, whether there was a system of intimidation or some attempt at corruption; but whatever his method was, I should like to know whether the proposals he made to the Grand Trunk manager on that occasion were made with or without the knowledge of the Administration. Further, I think it is due to the country that we should know whether or not the attitude of the High Commissioner towards Canada and towards various interests in Canada, since the election, meets with the approbation or the ratification of the Administration. It is one thing, of course, to hold the officer responsible; but since the Administration retain him in office, they are adopting all his doing, and assuming the responsibility for conduct on his part which should properly secure his dismissal. Is it, then, with the sanction of the Administration that he is attacking a great financial corporation to which Canada is deeply indebted for its early development, even if it is not dependent upon it now as it was in years gone by?

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MULOCK. Since Recess I have no doubt the Government have been able to obtain the information they could not give us a few hours ago. I was pointing out, before the House rose, the responsibility which the Government is bound to take in connection with the action of the High Commissioner. I think there is a principle involved in this matter, which it will not do for the Administration to pass by in silence, for when we come to consider the practical effect of the action of the High Commissioner in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway, we find, according to the published statements, that his utterances have been destructive of the property of a vast number of the capitalists of England. We find that the effects of his onslaught upon that great corporation has been to depreciate the value of the securities of that company in the English market, and to the extent of that depreciation to injure the value of those securities to the holders. Does the Government endorse such action? The High Commissioner is reported to have said that the Grand Trunk Railway management has been characterized by reckless extravagance and by recklessness of management. In making the grave charges he did, he spoke, I presume, in his official capacity as High Commissioner of Canada. It is impossible for any one not thoroughly versed in the details of railway management, not having accurate knowledge of themselves, to make any such statement. If we give credit to the High Commissioner of having spoken only what he knew to be the case, then he has stated a fact which, of course, it is wise the public should know, but if he has merely stated suppositions as facts, he has abused the position he fills. If you admit for a moment that the agent of any country—and we boast of Canada being a great country, and the greater the country the greater the influence of its representative—if we admit for a moment that the agent of a country like Canada can in another country become a stock jobber, can become an instrument to depress or raise securities to his interest and advantage, Canada may as well enter the stock exchange at once and become an ordinary gambler in securities. If you propose, Sir, to allow the influence of the Government to be used to destroy capital, let it be known to the capitalists of England that if they choose to invest in Canadian securities, they run the risk, unless they place their political influence at the bidding of the Administration, of having their property depreciated. Why, if the people of England do their duty in this regard, they will call upon the Administration of England to insist on the Government of Canada withdrawing this Commissioner from a position which he abuses to the injury of the English people. The Administration of England, to-day, I have no doubt, will, if they have not already done so, discharge their duty towards the people of England, who have invested their millions in Canadian securities, by causing such representations to be made to this Government, that English investors will no longer be exposed to such dangers. The Administration cannot too early make its position known upon this question, for its silence will be taken as an acquiescence in the acts of their agent. Their maintenance of him in office is a ratification of all that he has done; and if the Administration is dumb, there ought still to be voices among their followers, which will make themselves heard in the interests of the country. Or have things come to this pass, that a Cabinet can muzzle a whole party, which boasts of being so independent, patriotic and loyal? Has it come to this, that the great loyal party of Canada is engaged in destroying the wealth of the people of England for the sake of continuing themselves in office? I can understand men, under some circumstances, holding to party loyalty, but I am unable to understand how, on an occasion like this, the whole party can be muzzled under the leadership of the Minister of Public Works, who, I presume, is leading the House to-night. It is due to the people of Canada that the action of our High Commissioner should be repudiated, or if it is not, that fact should be made known. So long as this cowardly conduct on the part of the Government continues, we can assume but one conclusion, and that is, that the Government, whilst too cowardly to assume the responsibility for what has taken place, desire to profit by it, and must be held responsible. I am not in favour of great corporations, which come to Parliament for powers, using those powers for political purposes. In my judgment, it is equally wrong and equally unfortunate whether it be the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway that plunges itself into the vortex of party politics in Canada. In either case, they are going out of their true course; but I do congratulate Canada that it does not happen at this moment that the two great corporations are united in raids on the public treasury. The High Commissioner gave a parting shot, I suppose, a parting indication of the reign of debauchery he would inaugurate, were he placed in control of the Treasury benches, when he said to the Maritime Provinces, just after the 5th of March last: "The people of Ontario and Quebec are evenly divided, the Maritime Provinces hold the balance of power, and now is your opportunity to knock at the Treasury benches." That was the doctrine enunciated by the agent general of the Administration; and having uttered these words, he goes off to England, to attack English interests in the way I have indicated.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton.) Where did he make that statement?

Mr. MULOCK. I will read it for you before the evening is closed, but I have not got it by me just now.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Better send for it.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad these hon. gentlemen have at last found their tongues, and I will repeat later on the exact words the High Commissioner uttered. This is the first time we have heard from them, and even now I am glad to see that an hon. gentleman so retiring as the hon. member for Cape Breton has sufficient courage to admit that the utterances in question are unworthy of the gentleman to whom he owes his seat in this House.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). He never said it.

Mr. MULOCK. We will see whether he said it or not. I was not present, but I cut the extract out of a good Tory paper, if I recollect aright, and I shall endeavour to place it within the reach of the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

An hon. MEMBER. You cannot do it.

Mr. MULOCK. Who says I cannot do it? The man who says that shall have an opportunity of making that statement good when I present my proof. I do not think there is any man except my hon. friend from Cape Breton, who would have the hardihood to assert that the High Commissioner did not practically make that statement. At all events, it was so stated in the press; and whether or not, let me ask, was the action of the High Commissioner, in his negotiation with Mr. Seargeant, of the Grand Trunk, such as to indicate that he was incapable of making such a proposition? Did he not propose to the Grand Trunk that they should throw in their allegiance with the Administration and that they would be duly rewarded? When did he ever show delicacy in disposing of public money for political gain? We cannot forget what happened in 1872; we cannot forget what the High Commissioner's role has been since he has been in public life, either in the old Province of Nova Scotia, or in the Council of the Dominion Parliament. It would be against his whole record if he did not indulge in the doctrine I have referred to. But, Mr. Speaker, we can take care of his utterances in Canada; we know the High Commissioner in Canada; he is known here, and, therefore, to the extent he is known he is comparatively powerless. It is not so in England. His office clothes him with an authority which gives a weight to his words which perhaps they would otherwise not enjoy, and, therefore, the Administration is the responsible party on this occasion, and it is due to the people of the country that the true position of the Administration on this question shall be made known. There is only one way in which the Government can properly do its duty; there is only one way in which the Government can repudiate their responsibility and again restore Canada to her proper position, and that way is at the earliest possible moment to recall from this position of power and responsiblity an agent who so far mistakes his true position as has the High Commissioner. That is the only compensation which can be made to Canada, and unless that compensation is made the Government is responsible for what has taken place. I venture to say that the Government has taken upon itself a responsibility which, in the near future, they will wish they never had assumed. Under these circumstances, I feel, whatever others may feel, that whilst it may be said we are voting money for an office, I cannot ignore the fact that this is money for an individual as well, and although the item itself is one of comparative insignificance the occasion is one which should not be passed by in silence by those who do their duty to their country. I rejoice, therefore, to see that the question is receiving some attention from those who look after the interests of the country, even though the Government appear desirous to remain silent upon it.

Mr. McMULLEN. This being the last item under the head of contingencies, it is no use calling "carried," because it will take a considerable time to speak on other items connected with this vote before they pass. I am glad to see the Minister of Customs in his seat, because it will be my duty to put a few questions to him before I am finished. Now, with regard to the attitude which the High Commissioner has assumed with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway. I must say that, in my humble opinion, it is exceedingly unfortunate that any such differences should have arisen. It is quite clear from what has been published in the press that after the High Commissioner came to Canada he sought an interview with the general manager of the Grand Trunk, and in order to hold that interview he went to the general offices of the Grand Trunk Railway in Montreal. After the interview, possibly because the Grand Trunk would not come down to the terms stipulated by him, all these differences have come before the public in the press, and have been published by Sir Henry Tyler, as head of the Grand Trunk Railway, on one side, and by Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner, on the other. It is exceedingly unfortunate that this state of things should have arisen, because it is not in the interests of the country that large corporations of that kind should be approached by a man who occupies the position either of a High Commissioner or of a Minister of the Crown in the way in which Sir Charles approached the Grand Trunk. If the Government are enabled by the High Commissioner, or by any other person who chooses to cast in his lot with them as political agent or political aid, to terrorize into obedience the public corporations of this country to support the Government, or else to understand they will be visited by that Government with punishment if they do not, it is, in my opinion, an exceedingly improper and imprudent example to inaugurate in this country. I maintain that it was against the interest of the country for the High Commissioner to make that attempt on the Grand Trunk. Suppose the High Commissioner, on the occasion of his next visit to this country in the interest of the Tory party, should decide to approach the banks of this Dominion and ask them to cast in their lot with the Conservative party or else to be visited with punishment in some direction or other, how disastrous would be the result. This is an unwise and imprudent policy, and it would not be right if an attempt of this kind should be passed over without thorough and searching criticism. I am glad to be able to say that the Grand Trunk stockholders in England do not appear to have been very seriously swayed by the action of Sir Charles Tupper, for in spite of his denunciations they generously supported and re-elected the old board of directors of the Grand Trunk Railway. It is our right and our duty to condemn in the strongest language we can use such conduct on the part of a High Commissioner, no matter to what party he belongs. We should endeavour to show the great public corporations of this country, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway and others, that they are free to discharge their duties and that they cannot be terrorized into obedience by any Government, be it Grit or Tory. The attempt of the High Commissioner to inaugurate a system of this kind was decidedly wrong, and he deserves all the chastisement he has received from this side of the House for his conduct on that occasion. I hold that we are deeply indebted to the Grand Trunk Company, being the pioneer railway of this country, for what they have done to build up the country; we are deeply indebted to those people in England who invested something like 170 millions of money in that institution to give it a standing, and make it capable of rendering the efficient service that we have enjoyed under its operations; and I say that we have no right to permit any effort to be made to trample upon its rights and privileges. Why, Mr. Chairman, had the previous Government who occupied the Treasury benches of this country been permitted to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway, that railway would have been owned largely by this Dominion, it would have been, to some extent at least, the property of this Dominion. But the hon. gentlemen opposite placed the Canadian Pacific Railway in such a position that it was completed by a corporation, and that corporation now virtually owns the country. It is quite clear from their actions during the last election that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are very closely connected, and very deeply interested in one thing, and that is, that the present party should occupy power in this country, and hold their present position in the interest of that particular company. Now, I have nothing to say against the Canadian Pacific Railway. They deserve all credit for the enormous improvements they have made, and the manner in which they have completed their line. I wish them every success, and I am glad to see them occupy the very distinguished position they hold on this continent as one of the leading railway systems. At the same time we want them distinctly to understand that no railway company is to be placed in such a position that they can dictate to the people's representatives, or dictate to this House; and no railway company ought to be placed in such a position that they are subject to be dictated to by the Government that are in power for the time being, no matter of what political complexion they may be. I say that the course Sir Charles Tupper took with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway was not at all the course he should have taken as a representative of this country in England. It was derogatory to himself, it was not creditable to him as the representative of the people, and it is a slur upon the people and upon himself that he should have descended to the means that he used towards that company to try to force them to support the Tory party in this country during the last general election. I hope that it will not be repeated. I earnestly hope that he, at least, will not be permitted to repeat it; and I am quite sure that should it ever fall to the lot of the party on this side of the House to have to send a gentleman to England as Canada's representative, he never will be allowed to indulge in the threats and the insinuations with regard to any railway company, in which Sir Charles Tupper has indulged with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway. I did not wish to allow this opportunity to pass without making these few remarks with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway; and after other members have made the remarks that they desire to make in addition to what has already been said, I may have a few questions to put to the Minister of Finance and some others to the Minister of Customs, because I find there are a great many items that can well be cut down, and should be cut down. I congratulate the Minister of Finance on making an effort to put in the pruning knife, and I am glad to see that he has effected some reform, though I am sorry to see he has not used the pruning knife more frequently. We are glad to see him going in the right direction. At the same time I think it is our duty, when passing these items in connection with contingencies, to point out where we consider the pruning knife might be used more than it has been in the past. I quite understand how hard it is, particularly in the case of those who have been drawing Dominion pap for so many years, to withdraw from them the advantages they have been deriving for years past; but once the knife is put in and the pruning commences, I contend that it ought to be continued. I believe that is the only means by which we can bring the expenditure of this country within the limit of the means of the people of this Dominion—by persistently cutting down the expenses in all directions. We can well afford to do it. We have been on the highway of extravagance for the last 12 years. Year after year increased expenditures appear in the contingencies; item after item has been added to the annual expenditure. Why, Sir, we have had hundreds of officials added to the list of those who have been drawing extra allowances, year after year. Last year some 480 or 500 civil servants drew extra allowances for extra work. This system was only initiated a few years ago. The system of drawing extra allowances has only had four or five years of a start, and if we keep it up for a few years more we will have every civil servant in Ottawa drawing extra allowance. There are several items that should be subjected to the operations of the pruning knife, and before they are finally passed I wish to point out those items which, in my opinion, should be curtailed.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There are some other points with regard to the expenditure which I wish to refer to briefly. I am glad to see the Secretary of State in his place, because there is a matter to which I wish to call his attention; it was referred to in the Committee of Supply during the last session. He will remember that his attention was called to the fact that a large sum of money was paid for advertising the sale of the Statutes, and I think he promised on that occasion that he would look into this matter and put a stop to it. Until then the sale of the Statutes had been advertised almost wholly in the city of Hull and in the city of Ottawa, and in one or two places in Quebec. That would indicate that the Secretary of State believes that it is not necessary that the people resident in other portions of the Dominion should be aware that the Statutes are for sale, as he confined his advertising to those particular localities. This year I see that he has expended the sum of $660.20 in advertising the sale of the Statutes, and he has confined his advertising to about the same papers that he confined it to in the previous year.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is an old habit.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. An old habit ought to be eradicated when it is a bad habit. Now, the advertising is confined on this occasion to the city of Hull, and one or two papers in Montreal that I never heard of—at least, they are not leading papers at all—and some papers in Ottawa that I have not heard of. Of course we have heard of the Citizen, and there is the Journal. Then I see the Naturalist—I never heard of the Naturalist published in the city of Ottawa. It must be a new paper altogether. Then there is the Quebec Canadien, the St. Jérôme Nord, the Three Rivers Journal. I think the Secretary of State made a promise with regard to this matter last session, and I would like to have some explanation from him.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It has been advertized in the Empire for six or eight months.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Don't you pay the Empire anything?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No; they advertize free.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Now, cannot the hon. gentleman get the same terms from these other papers? If he can, I will say that he is discharging his duty well. But I really think some explanation ought to be given regarding this expenditure.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is a matter of advertising. There are very few papers in which the advertisement does not appear; it is not a very large amount, and it goes to the ordinary accounts for advertising, the amount of which is distributed among the several departments. The notice has been advertized in all of the papers, some advertisements being free and some paid for.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then there must be something wrong in the Auditor General's Report. If the hon. gentleman will refer to page 65-D he will find this expenditure is given in detail. The advertisement only appeared in certain newspapers. I never saw it in any newspaper, and I very much doubt if the Empire would insert it for nothing.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman does not read the newspapers in which our advertisements are published.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it necessary that the work should be done at all? I do not think it is.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It has been done.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This is no justification. The hon. gentleman promised last session to remedy the matter. If the Secretary of State refuses to give any information, I will proceed to speak on another point.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have given the explanation. The accounts were paid because the advertisements were given out and were published. I cannot give any other explanation. The advertisements were sent out, were published, and were paid for.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then the hon. gentleman exercises no judgment in giving out advertisements, according to his statement. The hon. gentleman says they were paid for because they were given out, not because they were necessary. There is another matter to which I desire to call attention, namely, the large amount paid annually for newspaper subscriptions for the several departments. I do not know why those papers are taken. There must be a large reading room in every department, and the clerks in the offices cannot be doing anything except reading newspapers, and this may possibly account for the extra clerks required each year. No less than $10,533.50 were paid for newspaper subscriptions for the departments last year, as follows:—Governor General's Office, $474.94; Privy Council, $529.15; Justice Department, $595.46; Militia Department, $816.05; Secretary of State's Department, $745.11; Interior, $724.07; Indian Affairs, $269.15; Audit Office, $8; Finance Department, $580.37; Inland Revenue, $562.76; Customs, $483.15; Post Office, $735.96; Agriculture Department, $1,486.72; Marine Department, $376.70; Fisheries Department, $175.17; Public Works, $1,073.75; Railways and Canals, $897.90. We have in connection with the Senate and House of Commons a reading room to which all the newspapers are sent and kept on file. It would serve the public interest very much better if, instead of there being a reading room for each Department, the clerks in the Departments were compelled to take a little exercise after performing their work and come to the reading rooms here. I do not think this country should pay them large salaries and at the same time furnish them with material which would induce them to neglect the work they are paid to perform. This suggestion was made last year, and, as it is a good one, it should be carried out. No doubt a large number of these newspapers would follow the course stated to have been followed by the Empire in reference to advertisements, for the Tory newspapers obtain not only $10,000 a year for newspaper subscriptions but also bonuses from other sources. Last year they received $133,775 for printing. The Secretary of State told us the other day that all the printing was being done by the Printing Bureau. If so, how does it come about that the Auditor General states in his report, and I refer the Secretary of State to page 131—A, that up to the end of the last fiscal year $135,775 was paid for printing outside the Bureau. Yet the Secretary of State declared only last week in this House that all the printing was done at the Printing Bureau. Surely he must have known that such was not the case. When a Minister makes a statement for the information of the House and the country, he should be in possession of all the information that the public documents give.

Mr. FOSTER. Those are items for a year ago.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That was what I was talking about at the time. No doubt when we look at the next report of the Auditor General we will find a similar statement, because I called the Minister of Finance's attention to the fact that every year, during the last eight or nine years to my knowledge, the amount expended under this head reached from $150,000 to $200,000 every year. Then there is the advertising given to newspapers supporting the Government, because I want to be understood by the House, it is already understood by the country, that an advertisement is rarely found in any newspaper that does not support the Government. The supporters of the Government are supported by the Government. The clerks in the Departments do not read the Grit papers. If they did so, they would be disgusted with the management of the country's affairs and even civil servants would help to turn out the men who now occupy the Treasury benches. But they do not get the requisite information, for the Government take care to provide only good Tory reading in the Departments, and it is because they are educated to support the Government that so many of them do so. The expenditure for advertising appears to have been $46,701. Newspapers which have received these vast sums for subscriptions, printing and advertisements, might well afford to send to each Department of the Civil Service copies of their papers free. It is the common thing for newspaper proprietors to send copies of their papers to advertisers, and to be liberal with such, in order to see that advertisements were inserted in proper places and the number of times ordered. The Secretary of State should take this into consideration and close the reading rooms in the different Departments, and benefit the health of the clerks by asking them to devote their whole attention to the public service during the hours from nine till four, which are not very long hours, and they do not require the eight and nine hour movement here, and after the closing of the Departments come to the House of Commons reading room and peruse the newspapers. If they did so, they would obtain an intelligent view of public affairs, because the papers are not confined to Conservative but include Reform papers, and the Minister would thereby not only improve the physical health of the clerks but their intelligence also, and the public service generally would be benefited.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to ask the Secretary of State——

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like to know if the Government intend to take action in this matter in reference to what I have just spoken. It was before the House last session and they promised to make some improvement.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have taken a note of the hon. gentleman's remarks, and I will answer him after my friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has spoken.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there is an item of $4,000 here for the Civil Service Examining Board, and I would like to know if there is any necessity for continuing the services of that board. How many civil servants have we now in the Dominion who are without office, but who have passed the examination and are eligible for an engagement?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I must answer my hon. friend as I answered him last year. There are I believe over 3,000 in the position he has indicated, but when we remember that the expense of these examinations is in a large proportion covered by the fees imposed on the applicants I do not think it is a bad expenditure of $2,000 to have an examination made on subjects which are worthy of study by not only those who intend to enter the Civil Service, but by those who may enter into banks and other positions in life. I maintain that the small sum which comes from the public treasury for this purpose is insignificant in comparison with the good which is done the young men of the country by a system of examination which causes these young men to devote themselves to the higher classes of education, as they are required to do for the examination.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may state in reply to the hon. Minister that we have institutions of all kinds in the country which subject the young men to a more searching examination than is required by the Civil Service Act.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Question.

Mr. McMULLEN. When we have 3,000 or 4,000 young men eligible for admission to the Civil Service I think we might rest for a year or two without continuing this expenditure of $4,000 for Civil Service examinations. I believe that this system spoils the young men rather than improves them, for the reason that when they pass this examination they devote all their time to exercising influence in all directions to try and secure a Government position.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. They do not need an examination for the purpose of using such influence.

Mr. McMULLEN. Suppose they do not; yet, when they pass the examination, it is a step further in the direction of trying to secure a position. They bring influence of all kinds to bear upon members who are supposed to be able to get them into the service, and, as a result, we have to-day more clerks in the Departments in Ottawa than are absolutely necessary to carry on the business. This is because the claims of the young men who have passed the examination are pressed upon the heads of the Departments and are backed up by such influences that they cannot be refused. As a consequence, we have men engaged in the Departments and drawing salaries from the country, who are utterly worthless. I maintain that these examinations should be discontinued for a year or two. In this connection, I might point out that Mr. LeSueur, who was superannuated some fourteen years ago, and who draws superannuation allowance of about $1,100, is paid $400 a year as a Civil Service examiner, and $700 as secretary to the examining board, making about $2,200 in all, including his superannuation. This, in my opinion, proves that this civil servant was superannuated before his services should have been dispensed with, and that he was superannuated for some cause other than ill-health, because he seems to be able to discharge these other duties fourteen years after he retired from the service.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I find from the Auditor General's Report that a little over $2,000 only is paid out of the public treasury for the Civil Service Board of Examiners. It is intended, in future, to increase in a certain measure the fees to be paid by candidates, so as to meet the whole expense of the board. I understand that it is not well to leave even such a small amount to the charge of the public treasury as is now asked for when such a large number of eligible candidates are on the list, and I shall, therefore, propose to increase the revenue from this source. The fees collected from the applicants amount to over $1,800 now; this year they will amount to $2,000, and I hope that next year the fees will meet the entire expenditure of the board of examiners. In reference to the statements made by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville), I may say that nobody more than himself should have known that the charges he has made against the department are not altogether warranted. The expenditure for printing which has been quoted by my hon. friend as being a contradiction of the statement I made the other day is not justified by the figures. Almost the entire expenditure is not for ordinary printing, but for printing done under contract for the Intercolonial Railway, by the Burland Lithographic Company for the Finance Department, and a class of work which cannot be done at Ottawa. It is put under the head of "printing" although it is not actually printing. Three-fourths, if not four-fifths, of that amount is for printing which could not have been done in the Government Bureau, and for lithographing which must be done outside. Nobody knows that better than my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville).

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am glad to get any information from the Secretary of State, but the information he gives me is not in accord with my information in regard to this matter. I am perfectly confident that when we established this Printing Bureau at an enormous expense to the country, the Opposition, at all events, supposed that it was established for the purpose of doing all the printing required by the Government. The Intercolonial Railway is part of the machinery of the Government of this country, and there is no reason why the printing required by it should not be done at Ottawa. That railway uses blank forms of all kinds and these blank forms can be stereotyped and printed here at a cheaper rate than is now paid for this work which is given out to the favourites of the Government in Halifax, St. John, Quebec and other cities, where the newspapers have enormous accounts against the Government, in some cases amounting to $8,000 and $10,000 for one single establishment. There was no use in establishing the Printing Bureau at all if the work on which such large profits are to be made was to be given out to these private contractors, the patronage of which enables the Government, to the detriment of the public interest, to help those who support them. Now, the hon. Secretary of State says a large proportion of this work is lithographic work. It was stated to me as a fact, and I believe it to be a fact, that the Post Office Department at the present time are using forms for post office orders which were got from the Burland Lithograph Company as photo-lithographs, when they are really letter-press printing done in the city of Montreal, but paid for as lithographic work; and this same work could be done at the Bureau at a much lower cost. If this is the way the hon. Secretary of State and his officers are humbugged by this company, it is time he and the country knew it. The blue-book itself shows that a very small portion of the total amount expended for printing was for lithographic work at all. In fact, there is not a word about lithographic work. Not a solitary item in the amount I gave was paid for lithographing—not one dollar, not fifty cents; let the hon. Minister look at the book and see for himself; and yet he gets up and tells the House and the country that a large portion of this amount is for lithographic work. I think he ought to be more particular when he makes these statements.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is not right to use big words, and words that might be offensive, in a discussion of this kind. But I must say that my hon. friend appears to be very well informed about the internal management of the Printing Bureau. He must have very good friends there. He is nearly as well informed as myself.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Better.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No, because I mentioned, and probably the hon. gentleman has heard of it, that the work of which he spoke and which used to be given to the Burland Company has been taken away from it, because I ascertained that the Printing Bureau could do the work by a new process and I ordered it to be done there. My hon. friend has probably heard that these post office forms and some of the Inland Revenue forms can be printed at the Printing Bureau; this was done two or three months ago; and my hon. friend has only taken advantage of what I had ordered, and what is being done now. Now, my hon. friend has said that there is not a dollar of lithography charged in this printing account. If my hon. friend will look at page A—29, he will find that there is one item of $43,000 charged for lithographing for the Finance Department done by the British American Bank Note Company. At page A—28 there is $10,000 paid to the Halifax Herald for railway printing which the manager of the railway considered could be done more conveniently and more cheaply there than at the Printing Bureau here. The same thing applies to the payment of $10,000 to the Moncton Times. Then, there is another item of $19,000 paid to the Burland Lithographic Company, and there is an item of $5,000 paid to the Montreal Gazette for work on account of the Geological Survey. So that as I said, more than three-fourths, if not four-fifths, is for work which could not be done by the Printing Bureau here. I may say to my hon. friend that I have every year taken notice of his warnings, and I will thank him for every item he sees on which he can give me his friendly advice, which I shall be glad to follow.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend made a statement a little while ago which certainly surprised me, coming as it did from an hon. gentleman so well informed, especially in printing matters. He stated that in this sum of $135,775 not one dollar had been paid for lithographic work. Now, if my hon. friend will turn to B—23, he will find the items which make up the sum of $43,101 charged to charges of management, under the head of printing notes. Of this amount not one dollar is for printing, but all is for lithographing. This shows the House, and those who read these criticisms, the methods adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite in the House, and if such methods are adopted here, what must be the methods used outside on the platform, where no such rein is held over their criticisms.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am willing to acknowledge that I made an error; but we had the hon. Secretary of State the other night declaring that all the work was done at the Printing Bureau. When I make an error I am willing to make correction of it; but hon. gentlemen opposite do not get up and admit that they made an error. The hon. Secretary of State does not admit that he made an error the other night.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I stated that the printing was done outside for some good reason. I never stated that railway tickets, and railway advertisements, and railway time tables were printed at the Printing Bureau; because the superintendent of railways informed me that this could not be done here with equal economy or equal advantage to the good management of the railways. I hope, however, we will be able in the future to do it as we have succeeded to do with the stationery for railways. The printing item for railways alone is $47,000; agriculture comes in for $16,000, a great part of which is for pamphlets published for the benefit of immigration in England. We have $43,000, $47,000, $16,000, $10,000, out of $133,000, which are certainly warranted by the declaration I made the other day, that all the ordinary printing was done at the Printing Bureau.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am not at all satisfied that the hon. Minister has apologized as handsomely for his mistake as I did for the mistake I made. Furthermore, he said I obtained my information from the Printing Bureau, and know as much as he does about the management through some one employed in that department. I wish to disabuse his mind of that impression. I obtained no information from anyone in the Bureau, so that he need not mete out condign punishment to any one he may happen to suspect.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not object.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Nobody in the Bureau gave me information. I furthermore tell the hon. gentleman I am glad to know he has discovered that this Lithographic Company has been imposing on him, and is prepared to have his letter press done in the Bureau, where it ought to have been done long ago. I represented to him that he was paying, as lithographic matter, for what was not lithographed at all. With regard to the statement that a very large amount of money is squandered on outside work which ought to have been done in the Bureau, I still stick to my text. Anyone who examines the pages A—28, 29, 30 and 31 of the Auditor General's Report, where a detailed statement is given of the papers to which money has been paid, will see at once that the accusation I made of money being squandered for the purpose of supporting the party press is well founded. That system should not be allowed to continue. But to come back to the original question, I would like to know when the Secretary of State is going to do away with these reading rooms in the Departments?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Minister of Finance may give some information on that subject, but my hon. friend knows that if this is a sin, it is not a sin of recent date. I think these reading rooms existed before this Administration came into power.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is no excuse for you.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. And they may have existed on a larger scale than they do now. My hon. friend must not flatter himself that the improvement was made in the Printing Department at his suggestion; the reform was made before I was given notice of it by him. My hon. friend says he does not take any information from the Printing Bureau. I must say I do not object to his getting information there as much as he likes. I invite every hon. member to visit the Bureau, and I am only sorry that more hon. members do not visit it to see the manner in which it is conducted, for I am sure that after their examination they would make no complaint on this score. My hon. friend, who is a practical printer, may find fault with my political management, but I have confidence he cannot find fault with the way the Bureau is conducted. The hon. gentleman or one of his colleagues stated that Mr. LeSueur should not have been superannuated, but I did not superannuate him. He was superannuated long ago, I think in 1877, by the friends of the hon. gentleman. If he was superannuated too young, it is not the fault of this Administration; and the duties he has performed as one of the Civil Service Board of Examiners are certainly duties for which credit should be given him.

Mr. MULOCK. A few moments ago when I intimated that the High Commissioner had told the people of the Maritime Provinces, after the general elections, that their opportunity had arrived, that statement seemed to be doubted.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Read the words.

Mr. MULOCK. I spoke from recollection, having in my mind simply what I read in the Empire at the time. I have since endeavoured to find in the file of the Empire what the exact words were, but some friend of the Government has so fallen in love with them that the paragraph has been cut out. I have referred, however, to an authority which ought to be undoubted since it has received over $8,000, for Government printing during the past year, the Halifax Herald. In its issue of March 11 appears a report of Sir Charles Tupper's speech at Halifax, which no doubt will be accepted as authentic. In large black letter type at the head, are the points intended to strike the attention of the people; and after exposing the dastardly conduct of the Grand Trunk Railway people in springing at the throats of the Government and joining with the enemies of Canada, the head note proceeds to say: "Thanks to the votes of the people of the Maritime Provinces Sir John can now send commissioners to Washington" I believe, that was done—"and Mr. Blaine will gladly negotiate a fair and just treaty of reciprocity and a settlement of all irritating questions." And then the newspaper proceeds to give prominence to the point in the address, which concerns the subject under discussion: "The great opportunity of the Maritime Provinces." I have not gone through this four column speech to find out what the great opportunity of the Maritime Provinces is; I have, at all events, struck upon that portion which formed the foundation of the Empire's report. My recollection of the Empire's version was: "Now is the opportunity of the Maritime Provinces to obtain justice."

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Those are the words you used.

Mr. MULOCK. Surely you are not going to repudiate the authority of the Halifax Herald. The report continues:

"You see to-day, as the result of this great and vital contest, Ontario and Quebec pretty nearly balanced, the one party with the other, and you find the Maritime Provinces, Eastern and Western, the smaller outlying Provinces, the North-West and Manitoba, smaller than ours, holding the balance of power. These small Provinces are in a position to claim the very highest and first consideration at the hands of the Government for the noble manner in which they have sustained the institutions of our country."

Will the hon. gentleman say what is meant by these significant words? We have not yet got the supplementary estimates; we have not yet the estimates for railways; we have not yet seen what appropriations are made for public works, this Parliament has not yet run its course. But we see what has been done in preceding Parliaments, and we know as well as if the demands had come down what is going to happen. We know perfectly well it means a raid on the treasury. We know that is what Sir Charles Tupper's words mean if they mean anything.

Mr. FOSTER. A free translation.

Mr. MULOCK. If there is any other translation, I should like to hear the Minister of Finance tell us what it is.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). These are the words: "The Maritime Provinces hold the balance of power, and now is the time to knock at the door of the Dominion Treasurer."

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, and I repeat the words. Those are significant of the views of the High Commissioner. If those words are not correct, will the hon. gentleman tell us what he did mean?

Mr. FOSTER. Put your own interpretation on them.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the meaning of the "great opportunity of the Maritime Provinces?"

Mr. FOSTER. Sir Charles Tupper did not say that.

Mr. MULOCK. The newspapers said that. Tell us what it means?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Will the Minister of Finance make an explanation?

Mr FOSTER. Will this explanation suit the hon. gentleman? We went over the whole question Friday night, and it was up for discussion quite a time. I made my statement then. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will take that as it is in Hansard, so that I need not take up the time of the House on it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There was no discussion, and the discussion was reserved especially for to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), with his usual courtesy, states that there was no discussion on the question of newspaper patronage. If my hon. friend asks the member for Yarmouth, or the member for Ottawa, he will find to the contrary.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Minister of Finance can easily say whether he intends to remove the evil or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, as I stated on Friday. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the amount expended under this head for the last financial year, and this year, he will find we have effected a large saving in most of the departments. In the Governor General's department, where the expenditure was $800 or $900 a few years ago, it was brought down last year to about $500. A similar saving was effected in some other departments, resulting from an attempt to cut down the large amounts that had been previously paid. However, the Government is giving attention to the matter at the present time, and an arrangement has been made by which it will be seen, when the accounts for next year are brought down, that a very large saving will be effected in this item. It is the intention of the Government to bring the expenditure down to a fairly reasonable basis, and to an amount with which I do not suppose hon. gentlemen opposite can find fault.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not like the Minister of Finance to repeat his answer twice, and I think he can properly claim to be relieved in that particular; but neither on Friday nor to-night has he answered the plain question asked, whether he endorses the action and proceedings of Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner in London, in the newspaper controvery he is carrying on?

Mr. FOSTER. What proceedings?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Writing to the newspapers, attacking the Grand Trunk Railway, and denouncing half of our people as ruined gamesters, proceedings which tend to destroy credit—that is if his word is believed in that line.

Mr. FOSTER. I have an indistinct recollection that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) raised this question, but the very eloquent and impressive speech of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) drove it entirely from my mind, especially as I am unaccustomed to receiving compliments at his hand. I remember indistinctly one question, as to whether or not the Government stood by Sir Charles Tupper in his attempt to bring the Grand Trunk into line during the last election, his attempt, in other words, to bulldoze the Grand Trunk. The hon. gentleman aswered his own question, or rather put his own question out of court, because he referred to it as a matter of report, and the time of the House need not be taken up with such reports as that. If the hon. gentleman had continued his search he would have found another report, quite as well founded, the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper, in which he distinctly affirmed that he made no such advances or proposals to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Finance, with that courtesy which has distinguished him on more than one occasion, ventured to impute to-night that I had not stated the truth—that is what his insulting remark amounted to—when I stated there had not been any discussion on the newspaper question on Friday evening. I knew what I was talking about. I observe that the discussion does not take one column of Hansard. A few remarks were made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), stating that he was a new member of the House and asking for some information. The Minister of Finance made a speech not lasting two minutes, in which he said—and it does not cover twenty lines—he hoped some reduction would be made. I made a remark about the Department of Agriculture having spent $1,300 a year, and the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) said a word or two. No discussion took place, no explanations were given. It was intimated on that occasion, and the Minister of Finance knows it was intimated, that explanations would be asked about all the departments; and when he threw his insult across the floor he was stating what he ought to have known was not correct. The statement I made, that there had been no discussion, was literally true. There had only been a little desultory conversation. The hon. gentleman had better be a little more careful in his statements. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) for example, and some other members were not present when the conversation occurred on Friday night, and they appeared to be under the impression that the usual yearly discussion with respect to the newspapers taken by the different departments, ranging in each case from $300 to $1,300 a year, had taken place. There was not that discussion. It was understood by myself and my friends that the discussion was left open and would be renewed to-night, and therefore the hon. gentleman was wrong in his denial of my statement, and I was perfectly correct. There was not a discussion on Friday night covering more than a column of the Hansard. The hon. gentleman can call it a discussion; but it was not that discussion which always occurs over that expenditure each year. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not call a question and a reply a discussion. The understanding arrived at on both sides was that all these matters should be open for discussion to-night, and the item of payments to newspapers was supposed to be one.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot help but return the kindness of the hon. gentleman, and thank him for the very courteous remarks addressed to me. I still think I am correct in what I said. I stated there had been a discussion. I do not know what standard the hon. gentleman has as to what constitutes a discussion, and I will leave that matter with the House. At least four, probably five or six members spoke. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) spoke and addressed some question to me. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) also spoke and addressed some questions to me, and other members spoke. Now my hon. friend complains because my remarks did not fill more than twenty lines of Hansard. That is not a demerit. There may be a contrast between the hon. gentleman and myself in this particular, and it may be possible for me to put into twenty lines quite as much of the real gist of a matter as my hon. friend does in forty lines.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. A short time ago the Minister of Finance assured the Committee that the Government had made quite a reduction in the expenditure for newspapers in the Departments for the last year. The hon. gentleman said that if I would examine the Auditor General's Report for the past year and compare it with the present year I would find a considerable reduction. I have turned up the report for 1889. It shows an expenditure under this head of $10,099.99, while for this year, 1890, the expenditure was $10,533.58. The Finance Minister is progressing the wrong way, and if apologies are in order the Minister of Finance should now get up in his place and declare that he made a mistake, as I acknowledged I made a mistake a little while ago, unwittingly. I want him to do the same. Here are the sums, I can refer to the page. If he will look at page 64—C of the Auditor General's Report for 1889, he will find that $10,099.99 was the amount paid for subscriptions to newspapers in the departments. If he will look at page 74—B of the last Auditor General's Report, he will find that last year $10,533.58 were paid. Now, if that is the way he is improving, what is the Government going to come to? I think that when he seeks to give this House information, he ought to be a little more accurate, he ought to examine the records. The Government were delighted a little while ago when they caught me napping, and for once, they thought they had made a point. Now, the Minister of Finance is much larger game than I am, and I have caught him, and I call upon him now to acknowledge that he committed an error.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What would he say on the stump if you were not there to watch him?

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend, if he will consider for a moment, will give me credit for saying that there were considerable deductions in some of the departments.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly what I meant to state, and I want my hon. friend to do me the kindness to look at those I mentioned. Take the Governor General's Department, for instance. I said that it came down from somewhere in the region of $900 to $500.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But it went up in other departments. You did not tell us that.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but I blame some of the Departments for not carrying out the system, while in others it had resulted in economy, and I have proposed an arrangement by which next year the effects will be seen in all the departments. Now, whatever apology is necessary for that amount of poor understanding on my hon. friend's part, and for poor expression on mine, I am willing to make.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But I think they are commencing at the wrong end. I think the Governor General ought to be in possession of public information; he ought to get the newspapers.

Mr. FOSTER. He has all he needs.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But you have cut him off.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that it was with the thorough co-operation of His Excellency that it was done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have had this statement made from the Treasury benches four or five successive years; at least that length of time their attention has been called to this gross abuse of spending nine or ten thousand dollars for subscriptions to newspapers for the benefit of the Departments. Four or five times over a reform has been promised, and as my hon. friend shows, the only reform they have practiced is to spend seven or eight hundred dollars more.

Mr. MULOCK. Since the Minister of Finance condescended to take up part of my remarks, I will venture to summarize by asking a question. He tells us that the High Commissioner did not, according to his own statement, make the proposals to the Grand Trunk Railway which were attributed to him. I did not say that he did, I simply said that he was so reported. I asked the Minister of Finance, and I now renew the question, if he would tell us what is the attitude of the Government in regard to the action of the High Commissioner, about which I believe there is no question. I will say nothing at this moment about the High Commissioner's attack upon the Grand Trunk Railway in the English press, or his onslaught on a portion of the people of Canada; I will limit my question to the point I mentioned.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Shall the item carry?

Mr. CHARLTON. Surely this is a question of sufficient importance to merit the courteous attention of the Government. We have a right to know, and the country has a right to know, what view the Government take of the conduct of the High Commissioner. We assert that his conduct was improper, that he has been guilty of conduct not in accordance with the duties of his office, that he has been meddling with that which does not concern him, that he has been making an attack upon a very important corporation of this country, that that attack was not only unwarrantable, but it was unjust, and we want to know what view the Government take of that matter. It is an important question; it cannot be burked or treated with silent contempt.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, the natural inference, when the Government have nothing to say after hearing their officer assailed, is that they cannot possibly defend them. That is the natural inference, that is the inference which everybody in the country will draw. Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, has been solemnly arraigned here before the High Court of Parliament for having attacked the Grand Trunk Railway, for having brought unreasonable charges against it, for having threatened it, for having attempted to bulldoze it, and the Government, recognizing that his conduct has been very improper, have nothing to say in his defence. I do not know that my hon. friends need require any other answer. It is quite clear that they cannot say one word in his defence.

Mr. DEVLIN. I did not bring up this question the other night about newspaper subscriptions; it was started by somebody else, I think. I merely asked the question whether the Liberal papers were received in the Departments as well as the Conservative papers. Afterwards I expressed the opinion that the item of subscriptions for newspapers seemed large. There are some other items to come up shortly in connection with this question which will be very interesting. We have heard a good deal said about the statements made by the High Commissioner. I do not know if the High Commissioner charged the Liberal party with having used American gold in the elections. I know as a matter of fact that in our county we saw very little American gold, in fact there was none of it except what may have been in possession of the Conservative party. It was said that they possessed all the American gold that was in the constituency.

Mr. FOSTER. I must ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether this is pertinent to the discussion. This afternoon I appealed to the House to keep ourselves to the discussion of the subject of the item before us, and the House, I think, agreed with me, and they dropped the discussion on trade. I think now it is not necessary to go into the question as to whether American gold was or was not used in the election. I do not think that is regular on this item.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What the Minister of Finance says is quite right, but the matter is largely in his own hands. When questions that demand an answer are asked, questions of importance that the country expects to be answered, and the hon. gentleman sits down and all the other Ministers refuse to say anything, then confusion arises. If they would answer the questions that are put in the interests of the public, that we have a right to ask, then the discussion would be kept within proper bounds. The Minister of Finance surely sees that when he refuses to answer a plain question that the Opposition are quite within their right in asking, that their duty demands they should ask, and when he will not answer, and none of the other Ministers will answer, when they are unable either to grasp the situation or are without sufficient information or courage to answer, then some one tries to see whether they have any information on any other subject, and so it goes on. If the Minister of Finance would answer questions that are pertinent, then we could keep the discussion within reasonable bounds.

Mr. FOSTER. We do not refuse to answer any questions that are pertinent. Any questions with reference to the expenditures in the Estimates are pertinent, and we ought to answer them, and I will try, so far as I am concerned, to answer them. But there are a great many questions, outside of these entirely, that I think are not pertinent questions.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In discussing this matter of the High Commissioner, the Minister of Finance himself admitted that he is occupying that position now in England. The hon. gentleman knows, as a matter of fact by common report, that the High Commissioner is writing letters in the newspaper press, is engaged in a controversy and is attacking the Grand Trunk Railway, that he is engaging in a course that tends, as far as he is able to make it, to injure the company and to depreciate the value of its stock. The question asked is: Does the Minister sanction the High Commissioner in following that line of conduct? It is a plain and intelligent question, one wholly within the scope of this discussion, and we are entitled to an answer to it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then if the hon. gentleman is determined not to go any further with the Estimates until I have answered the question, I will give the answer. The attitude of the Government at the present with regard to that is one of attentive consideration.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is not a satisfactory answer; it is an evasive answer. A certain line of conduct followed by the High Commissioner has been pointed out; it has been pointed out that he is guilty of certain offences, the offences the people understand perfectly well, and the Minister of Finance well understands them. The High Commissioner is acting as a partisan, as a party bully. He strove to coerce the Grand Trunk Railway corporation into a certain line of conduct, and failed. He carried to England the animus engendered by that failure, and he is now making attacks on that corporation. He is certainly doing that in violation of his duties of High Commissioner, and his conduct is derogatory to his office. This action reflects on the Government. It is a serious matter and cannot be dealt with in this trifling way, by the Minister of Finance rising and telling the Committee that the matter is under consideration.

This is not a satisfactory answer. We want to know whether the Government approves or disapproves of the action of the High Commissioner? The country wants to know, the country demands to know, and we are here to-night to ask an answer to this question.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER. I believe the point of order was raised, that on Friday it was understood that all items except the last one were all to be passed, and they were passed. Accordingly hon. members should not now discuss any item except that respecting the High Commissioner? Hon. members who during the afternoon and evening have been discussing newspaper patronage have been out of order, as I understand there is nothing now before the Committee except the item respecting the High Commissioner.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that you did not occupy the Chair at the opening of the sitting to-day, when it was understood that all questions regarding contingencies of all the departments were open for discussion. We have discussed not only the High Commissioner, but matters connected with the Printing Bureau, and others.

Mr. FOSTER. It is true that the arrangement made was that all the items should be passed, except the last one, but that discussion on any of the contingencies of the departments should be allowed. My point of order against the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) was of a different kind.

Mr. DEVLIN. After referring to some other matters I touched upon the question of the expenditures of the office of the High Commissioner. I still think I am perfectly in order in touching upon that question. For my own part I believe the course of the High Commissioner, and I say it frankly, in coming to Canada, was perfectly justifiable. Why do I believe that? Because he was called out by the Prime Minister. I do not suppose that when the invitation was extended to him by the Prime Minister the High Commissioner knew exactly the object of the mission. No doubt he thought it might be in connection with some interest with which he was connected as High Commissioner, and not a political mission. But I believe also that when he ascertained what the mission was he should have returned to England and continued to have performed the duties for which he was specially appointed. Nevertheless, it is nothing new for the High Commissioner to interfere in political matters, notwithstanding his exalted position. In 1886, he was invited to open the exhibition at Charlottetown. On that occasion he took opportunity to deliver a purely political address. In 1878 he promised a treaty of reciprocity. In 1886 he proceeded on behalf of the Government to Charlottetown, although he was not exactly a representative of the Government, and he promised a treaty of reciprocity would be entered into within two years. The promise did not mature any more than in 1878. We know that on that occasion he had very few, if any, good words to say for the Opposition. By him, as well as by many others immediately connected with him, the party of which we are members has been branded as a party of traitors. But traitors to whom? Is the number of traitors not a very large one? We know that the Province of Quebec has declared by a very large majority against the continuation in office of the present Government, and against the policy of the present Government. So when Sir Charles Tupper charges us with being traitors, he makes a like charge against a large majority of the province. This is a serious accusation to bring. It is an unjust accusation to bring against a people, who on many occasions have shown themselves more loyal and more truly devoted to the institutions governing us, institutions which we received from England, than some of the people who have been denouncing us as traitors. Not only have the people of the Province of Quebec been placed under this stigma, but the people of Ontario have likewise suffered, because one-half of the electorate of that Province belong to the Liberal party. It is very easy to bring forward such accusations, but it is an entirely different matter to substantiate them—and this has not been done. In common with hon. members on this side of the House, I protest against the course which has been adopted. I do not think we should pay large sums of money to one whose duty, presumably, it is to look after the interests of Canada in the mother country, to negotiate a treaty with Spain or some other country, and yet who disregards those important duties and comes out here and calls us strong names. I take objection to the statement made by the Minister of Finance, that we had fully discussed the question of subscriptions to newspapers. That was my object in rising. I did not bring up the discussion, nor was it understood that the discussion was closed with the few remarks made on that occasion.

Mr. CASEY. If the Minister of Finance thinks the House and the country are going to be satisfied with the trifling answer he made to the demands of this side of the House for a reply, he is utterly mistaken. He may understand the duties of his position, or he may not, but he does not understand public opinion in adopting such action. Here we have a civil servant, a man who, although he has been a Cabinet Minister, and is the father of another Cabinet Minister, holds the same relation as a junior clerk to the Government, and the Government who are responsible for his actions are questioned in regard to the course he has taken. It was asked whether the Government endorsed his action and the Minister of Finance said that "the Government would take it into their attentive consideration." What are the public to think of such an answer to this question? They will take the Minister of Finance into their attentive consideration and what their consideration of him will be goodness only knows. It is a perfectly childish answer to give to a gentleman in this House, and if the hon. gentleman had been here long enough he would know that. I repeat that Sir Charles Tupper is as much a member of the Civil Service of this country as any clerk in the departments, and he has no more right to take part in a political campaign and to address nasty language to one-half of the people of this country than the youngest clerk in the service. Whether the members of the Government choose to remain silent or to give offensive and slangy answers to questions, they are nevertheless responsible for the acts of the civil servants, and it may be necessary before this matter is disposed of, to point out that Sir Charles Tupper having violated his duties as a civil servant is no longer fit to continue in the service. I wish to impress upon the Minister of Finance that his answer has been insulting to the House and that no member of experience in parliamentary practice would have given such an answer. I was a member of this House in the old days when the rules of Parliament were enforced and long before the hon. gentleman ever thought of coming here, and I know that no experienced Minister would have given such a reply. I may tell the Minister of Finance that to satisfy the public he will have to answer "yes" or "no" to this question: but whether the answer be in the affirmative or negative the Government are responsible for the conduct of this civil servant. I will not enter into the details of the question of Sir Charles Tupper's attack on the Grand Trunk Railway further than to say that the Government is responsible for the insulting and insolent conduct of the High Commissioner towards almost half of the electors of this country, and towards one of the greatest corporations of this country, a corporation which took a greater part in developing Canada than the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, or whatever other Minister is in charge of the matter, what reply he has to give to the question I asked the other night in reference to the High Commissioner being appointed a director of a gas company which is going to do business in the United States. I would like to know if the High Commissioner is acting by the consent and authority of the Government, and if it is not possible that the High Commissioner who draws a salary from this country can find wide enough scope for his energies and financial skill in the Dominion of Canada. I would like to know if he has accepted this position with the endorsation of the Government, or if it is a matter which the Government have under their serious consideration. I would like to know if the public servant who belongs to a company carrying on business to the extent of ten million dollars and operating in the United States, does this with the consent of the Government. I will read the statement from the Empire:

"Sir Charles Tupper has been appointed director of the Water Works and Gas Works Securities Corporation, which has just been organized here with a capital of £2,000,000 sterling. The object of this new corporation is to buy up water works, gas works and other concerns of the kind in Canada and the United States. There is every prospect of an early settlement of the question of the power of the trustees to invest in colonial inscribed stock. A simple bill approved by the colonial representatives in London is being drafted for the Imperial Parliament. Legislation may be also necessary in Canada and the other colonies."

Have the Government been consulted about the legislation which it is said will be necessary? Has the Minister of Justice been consulted about the legislation necessary in order to enable our High Commissioner to direct his capital, which was paid by the people of this country, to the purpose of developing concerns in the United States, and if so, has the Government given its consent to that?

An hon. MEMBER. Answer the question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, if they will not answer that question, I might ask how many members of the Government are interested in business matters in the United States? When these gentlemen are calling us disloyal, I would ask them if it is compatible with their professions for them to apply the capital which belongs to the people of this country to develop the industries of the United States, when we have great undeveloped resources in this country awaiting capital. Surely the Government should not be disloyal to Canada, yet there is no greater disloyalty than that the members of the Government or their High Commissioner should invest our capital in the United States. I say "our capital," because it is our capital. The High Commissioner got that capital from us; when he went into politics he was as poor as a wet hen, he was said not to be worth anything, all the money he has was made in public life and that money he now invests in the United States.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that my hon. friend the member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is now drawing the attention of the House to a question of very great importance, and that he is treated with too great levity——

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER,—by the other side, I mean to say. I ask any hon. gentleman in this House if it is proper for a person occupying the high position Sir Charles does in England, which is practically that of our ambassador to the Court at St. James, to enter into any such scheme as is now being mentioned by my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin). If the emoluments of Sir Charles Tupper are not sufficient for the dignity of his office, then let the emoluments be increased if necessary. But I claim that Sir Charles Tupper should give all his attention to the business of the country, and to nothing else. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House should remember that at one time the Minister of the United States at the Court of St. James, General Schenck, was connected with a certain concern which turned out to be not altogether savoury to the public, although General Schenck had done nothing for which he could be impugned. Moreover, we have seen the name of the hon. Minister of Public Works and the name of Sir Charles Tupper coupled with that of the Direct Meat Company which was not what it should have been either. Therefore, simply as a measure of caution, the Minister who represents Canada at the Court of St. James ought not to be engaged in any such transactions, and I submit for the honour of Canada that if the emoluments of Sir Charles Tupper are not sufficient, let them be increased, but let him give his whole time to the business of Canada and to nothing else.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has certainly treated this matter in a way very different from the very light and trifling and gassy manner in which it was treated by my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). So far as I am concerned, and I think the same is true of the Government, the first intimation we have had of Sir Charles Tupper being connected in any way with such a company was when we heard the statement from a newspaper read in the House. It is simply a newspaper report, and as a newspaper report it has not reached the Government in any authoritative or official way, and I do not think we are called upon to treat as serious matters without consideration, what may be simply reports of newspapers. With regard to the Dead Meat Company, I am not aware that Sir Charles Tupper had anything to do with that in an intimate way. I think that he had nothing to do with it, except in the mere writing of a letter which conveyed no promise of influence or support. The same is true, I think, of Sir Hector Langevin, so far as my recollection goes.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad to hear that the only defence the Government have on this occasion is that they have received no official notice. They will have official notice by-and-bye, and we can anticipate the course they will take.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to point out to the House that the hon. Minister of Finance is not justified in dealing so lightly as he does with a letter which Sir Charles Tupper addressed to a number of promoters in London whom he knew were connected with the getting up of this same Dead Meat Company. If the hon. gentleman is not aware of it, I can tell him that Sir Charles Tupper's conduct on that occasion has been animadverted upon in terms of deserved severity by several of the most distinguished financial journals in England; and he will find that the conduct of our High Commissioner has very considerably discredited us in the eyes of English investors. As I pointed out when I brought this matter to the attention of the House last session, the statements made in that letter were of a most reprehensible and scandalous character. It was also extremely unfortunate that the hon. Minister of Public Works should have allowed his name to appear as a director of any such company; and although the House received his assurance that he had not read the prospectus, he never took steps to disassociate himself from that enterprise until his connection with it became a matter of censure on the floor of this House. But Sir Charles Tupper had seen that prospectus, and knowing the conditions of things in Canada, had been extremely indiscreet, to use the mildest term, in writing a letter which was used on the stock exchange to induce people to put their money into a thoroughly rotten enterprise, which was a disgrace to Canada and all connected with it.

Mr. CASEY. I just rise to point out the number of things which the hon. Minister of Finance disclaims a knowledge of. We may be here for several months, but I think it will take a good many months at this rate to find out all the things the hon. Minister of Finance does not know.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am very sorry I did not impress the hon. Minister of Finance with the earnestness with which I addressed the House on this subject. I am very sorry that this matter escaped the notice of the Government, because it appeared in the Empire, which is published in the interest of the Government. It is rather hard for the Empire to be told in the House of its friends that it is not read. I also notice that the hon. Secretary of State told the House that the Empire advertised the sale of the Statutes for six months and got nothing for it. That is rather a reflection on the circulation of the paper; and if the friends of the Government will not do so, I wish to stand up and say a word for it; and I hope the members of the Government will be more considerate of those great men at the helm of that paper. I think it is a matter we should enquire into seriously, and if the hon. Minister of Finance has mistaken the tone and temper in which I addressed the House on this question, he has greatly misunderstood me. I made this enquiry because I believed I had a perfect right to do so, and I think the country will agree with me that it is not a proper thing for an officer of the people of Canada enjoying a salary of $10,000 a year and perquisites amounting to $2,000 more, to take that money and invest it in Yankee enterprises. I appeal to the people on national grounds to stand up for Canada, and when men holding high positions receive large sums of money from the country they should have the patriotism to invest it in Canadian securities and Canadian enterprises.

Mr. MULOCK. I would just call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to a matter of some importance, which I think might well receive the attention of the Agent General of Canada in England. At all events, I think it is better entitled to his consideration than those outside enterprises which have been referred to. By the Canada Gazette of May, the current month, it appears that our trade with Great Britain is undergoing a very serious change. I think it would be well if the Minister of Finance could spare one moment while I call his attention to a matter with which he is no doubt already familiar.

Mr. FOSTER. I read it to-night.

Mr. MULOCK. I am sure every one who has read it has done so with a great deal of sorrow and some alarm. In the Gazette in question appears an article entitled: "British trade with Canada," according to which our imports from England for the four months terminating in April last amount to £1,567,420.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I ought to appeal to my hon. friend that this is travelling out of the record. It will come up very well in the discussion on the Budget.

Mr. MULOCK. I acknowledge the force of the objection, and will just make one point. According to the statement, our trade with exports to Great Britain are only one-sixth in April, 1891, what they were in the corresponding month last year.

Mr. FOSTER. This is really quite unfair. If the country is to be put in a fair position with reference to the point raised, there ought to be a rejoinder; and to proceed with the rejoinder now would only open up a discussion on a subject which we are not at all discussing.

Mr. MULOCK. I will not quote the figures, but would simply say that the appearance of those figures—

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman might just as well read the figures as make the statement.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Finance Minister to see that the attention of the High Commissioner is given solely to the interests of Canada and that he will not allow this state of affairs to continue if it can be remedied.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I see that the item of telegrams is increased very largely. I do not know whether the business of the country requires more telegrams to be sent now than formerly, but the expenditure seems excessive, amounting to $16,223 last year. In the Militia Department, no less than $1,706.73 were used in telegrams, and as we had no war last year the hon. Minister should explain this extravagance. I do not see that there was such haste required in the management of his Department as to necessitate this extensive telegraphing. In the Governor General's office $1,704.72 were spent. I was under the impression that a lump sum was allowed the Governor General for travelling and other expenses such as this.

Mr. FOSTER. Not telegraphing.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Privy Council spent $1,249.91, which included, I suppose, the cost of telegrams sent Sir Charles Tupper. The Secretary of State's Department, spent $781.50; the Justice Department, $1,167.48; Public Printing and Stationery, $82.20. In this respect the Secretary of State was very economical. Indian Affairs, $703.51; the Audit Office, which I believe is the cheapest branch of the public service, only spent $14.29; the Finance Department, $837.50; Inland Revenue, $606.91; Customs Department, $1,061.87. Customs has been a little extravagant, although the hon. Minister is generally very economical. Post Office Department, $731.64; Agriculture Department, $1,028.63; Marine Department, $752.87; Fisheries Department, $502.97; Public Works, $710.30; Railways and Canals, $353. The fact is the total expenditure in telegrams last year amounted to nearly as much as it costs for the services of the charwomen, which cost us $17,997.20. Some of the Ministers ought to explain why this expenditure is going on increasing. Last year we expended $15,643.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am glad to say that the telegraphing which the hon. gentleman complains of is that which is required on a peace footing, and that we are not at present in a state of war. When we had trouble, there was as much expended in a month on that service as it now costs for a year. The amount may seem very large, but every district in the Dominion contains a portion of the militia force, and the requirements of the service entail a considerable use of the telegraph. I believe the hon. gentleman will see that the amount is smaller than it used to be, and I hope, if we continue to enjoy profound peace, it may be reduced still further.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I cannot see that it is smaller. On the contrary, it is larger. The statement of the hon. gentleman is on a par with that made by the Finance Minister, and it takes the Opposition all their time watching the blue-books to keep the Ministers straight. The expenditure in 1890 in the Militia Department was $1,706.73, and in 1889 it was only $1,188.16, so it is going on increasing instead of decreasing.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The country is increasing.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I doubt that very much.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether any allowance or any sum of money in any shape is paid by the Government to the Reuter Association to send cablegrams of our doings across the Atlantic?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that there is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you sure that none is paid?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know of any at the present time.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the Minister in a position to say that there is not or simply that there may not be?

Mr. FOSTER. I only say that I am not aware that there is, and I do not think there is.

Mr. LAURIER. Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are special rates charged for these cablegrams, or do the Government pay the ordinary rates?

Mr. FOSTER. The ordinary rates are paid, except by the Meteorological Department. A large amount of telegraphing in some of the departments is easily explained. It is a short and sharp way of doing business, particularly if it is important. In the Governor General's Office and in the Privy Council Office this amount is growing because of the quantity of telegraphing that has to be done in regard to important matters, such as the Behring Sea question and other questions of that kind. It is a difficult thing to bring this down. There is a tendency on the part of members of Parliament to send telegrams "collect" to members of the Government, when they desire some information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For example, telegrams on election matters? Would that come within the purview of public business?

Mr. FOSTER. No; that would not be under public business.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman quite sure of that? As to the Meteorological Service, I think they are specially charged to that department.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if this charge includes the telegraphing of the Land Board at Winnipeg as well as that of the department here?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I can hardly give that information now, but I do not think it does. I think the Land Commissioner pays his own telegraphing out of his contingent account.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can quite understand that the amount of $2,412 would not be unreasonable if it included the two branches. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give the Committee the information when we come to some other item.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; but I think most of the telegrams sent from Winnipeg are paid for here.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see by the Auditor General's Report that $50 was paid for advertising in the Christmas number of the Ottawa Citizen. What was that for?

Mr. BOWELL. I think that advertisement contained all the instructions or information necessary for immigrants coming to this country, telling them what was necessary to do in making their entries, what articles were free under the Tariff Act, and so on; and, as that Christmas number was principally for foreign circulation and a large edition of it was printed, it was deemed advisable to give the information through its columns. While I am on my feet, I desire to refer to a matter to which my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville) has called attention. He objects to the large amount of $1,081.67 for telegraphing. If he would reflect upon the amount of business transacted by the department over the wires, I do not think he will find that a very large amount, especially when he compares it with the amount which was expended before the completion of the Pacific Railway line. In 1877, when there were but two companies, the amount paid was $1,510.66. Although the telegraphic connection had not extended throughout the country as it has been now, the amount expended was nearly 50 per cent. more than it is to-day. The member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the indignant tones which he usually uses, referred to what he termed the gross and extravagant expenditure in reference to this matter, but he has forgotten the amount which was expended when he was Minister of Finance. In the year ending the 30th June, 1877, I find this result. I may frankly admit that the mode of keeping the accounts at that time was different from what it is now, and that there is a considerable difficulty in making up a correct comparison. However, in the Public Accounts of 1877, I find the following amounts paid for advertising and printing. There are, however, additional items for printing, printing paper and binding, but simply for advertising and printing, I find that the Governor General's office paid $1,302.81; the Privy Council, $745.75; the Secretary of State, $799.70; the Department of the Interior, $435.36; the Department of Justice, $590.65; the Department of Militia, $903.07; the Finance Department, $681.55; the Public Works Department, $729.20; the Department of Marine, $1,996.11; the Department of the Receiver General, which does not exist now, $435.89; the Department of Customs, $6,856.97; the Department of Inland Revenue, $621.96; Department of Agriculture, $545.15; the Post Office, $2,370.69; and the Treasury Board, $66.52. The Inland Revenue was $545.15; Agriculture, $545.15; Post Office, $2,370.67. The Treasury Board this year spent $8; the last year to which I called the attention, 1877, the expenditure was $66.52. Now I do not give these to the Committee for the purpose of comparing them with the expenditures made by our predecessors, but I desire to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was primarily and mainly responsible for these expenditures, particularly so far as his own department was concerned, was the last man in the world who should have used the strong language that he did with reference to the expenditure to which he called attention. I have not had time, since sitting here, to go into a further examination of the figures to show what amount was spent for printing, publishing, binding and other items, nor do I intend to say they are included in the items referred to in the Auditor General's Report for this year. I refer merely to the question of advertising and printing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman desires to make a comparison between the expenditures under the régime of Mr. Mackenzie and the expenditures under the present Government, I think he will do well to direct the attention of the House to the fact that while there was just as much in reality to do then as there is to-day, their total expenditures were $23,500,000 against $36,000,000 by his Government. If he wants to go into details I call his attention to the fact that our total expenditure for Civil Government, contingencies and all, amounted to $823,000 against $1,404,000 which is asked to-day. I would like to call his attention to the fact that the same diminution exists in every single department, that although there has been comparatively a little increase in the population, although circumstances have so altered that to a very great extent the expenditures of the country ought to be less in many important respects than they were then.

Mr. BOWELL. So they are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are not by any manner of means, the expenses are larger to-day. There is not a single department of the service, I think, not even including his own, in which they are not larger than they were.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you refer to the Customs Department?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Customs were, I think, in 1878, a matter of $714,000; they are about $900,000 at the present time, at least that is what the hon. gentleman asks: and, in every imaginable direction, wherever you go, whether it be Indians, or Mounted Police, or Customs, or Excise, or Civil Government, or Militia, or Public Works, be they what you please, you find an enormous increase, you find the very grossest extravagance; and I tell the hon. gentleman that in every department down to that of his colleague of the Public Works, down to the Department of the Interior, down to Civil Government, down to every solitary thing they have to deal with, there has been an enormous increase. Whether he has stated correctly or not the facts as to the Customs Department, I am not in a position to say, because I am aware that on two or three occasions when these matters have been under discussion, it has turned out——

Mr. BOWELL. Do you mean in reference to this statement I have just made?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. Here it is, you can examine it for yourself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am perfectly well aware there were alterations made in the way of doing business, and in conducting his accounts. But comparing the two statements in the gross, taking the $23,500,000 which we expended, take the $36,000,000 that his Government expended last year, the $37,000,000 they ask this year, without including the Supplementary Estimates, there is no single point that he can show in which the record of the Mackenzie Government will not compare honourably and favourably with anything that has occurred in his department or any other.

Mr. BOWELL. I must be permittted to compliment the hon. gentleman on the dexterous manner in which he has evaded the question before the Committee. He has not uttered a single word in reference to the question which we discussed, but has gone off into a description of the growth of the country and the general expenditures on public works, and everything else. I do not propose to enter into that question, although we are quite prepared to defend the expenditure to which he has referred, and if he fancies for a moment that this country, extending, as it does, from one end of the continent to the other, can be carried on with the same expenditure with which it was carried on at the time he occupied the position as Finance Minister, why, all I can say is that I will make him a present of that idea. I know that no other man having ordinary common sense would ever come to any such conclusions. But I desire to call the attention of the Committee to one fact, and that is that he spoke in indignant tones of what he termed gross expenditures, and used some other strong language with reference to the advertising and printing accounts of the different departments. That is the only point to which I drew the attention of the Committee, and I repeat again that in answer to that point the hon. gentleman never uttered one word. I tell the hon. gentleman that if he is prepared to discuss that question I will produce figures to show that so far as my own department is concerned, and more particularly that portion of it over which I have immediate control, that relating to Civil Government, tens of thousands of dollars have been saved, aye, from forty to fifty thousand, during the time I have presided over that department, compared with the expenditure that took place under the Mackenzie Administration. And if I do not sustain this statement then the hon. gentleman will be quite correct in throwing out those insinuations which are so characteristic of him when any hon. gentleman dares to impugn, or discuss, or contradict any statement, or to expose any misstatement he may make, or to insinuate that he does not correctly state the facts. The statements I made were copied from the Public Accounts of the year to which I referred. I know from past examinations that any investigation of the whole five years of the Mackenzie Administration would compare unfavourably with the Administration of the present Government, even as respects the contingent account to which we are referring. If he will look at those accounts he will find that the statement made by the Minister of Finance is literally true, in reference to the reductions which have gradually taken place in this newspaper and advertising account. If he will compare one year with another I am quite certain he will find that there is a great decrease going on. The question has been brought to the attention of each member of the Cabinet, in order to ascertain if a reduction cannot be made, in what may be considered an unnecessary expenditure, to as great an extent as possible, and I believe that next year we will find a still greater reduction than has yet taken place.

Mr. TUPPER. If the Minister of Customs needs any support in reference to one point he took in this debate, and which the hon. member for South Oxford challenged, I would like to draw the attention of the ex-Minister of Finance to the important fact that in 1878, under his economical administration, the Marine Department and the expenditure for the maintenance of the different lights, fog-horns, buoy service and all the aids to navigation in this country, amounted to $786,156; and in 1890, $807,417 only. The present expenditure and that of the year 1878, taking the relative responsibilities and charges upon the Government, that is, the legitimate charges, are practically the same. I take it that was his argument, at any rate in connection with one department. Let me point out to him these significant facts. Where is the difference between 1878 and 1890? The amount expended in 1878 was $786,000 in round numbers, and the amount expended in 1890 was $807,000. But there is this additional responsibility on the department in 1890 as compared with 1878: In 1878 we had to maintain 427 light stations; in 1890 we had to maintain 599 light stations, with the additional charges for repairs and ordinary maintenance and salaries and so forth. In 1878 we had 518 lighthouses as against 705 lighthouses in 1890. In 1878 we had four fog-horns to look after, and we had 32 to look after in 1890—an extraordinary and marvellous increase, which was demanded by the development of the navigation of the country. It is extraordinary that in this country we have been able to safeguard the navigation in the way we have done. But that there has been an extraordinary increase in these facilities every mariner and every man who knows anything about navigation is aware. I rose simply to point out to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the extraordinary disparity which exists between the charges upon one department of the Government in a year and another, and to show him why that was so. I have shown him that in 1878 the expenditure was, in round numbers, $786,000 in the Department of which I am the head, while, in 1890, it is only $807,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. TUPPER. The whole expenditure of the Marine Department in 1878, which covered all the expenditures of every kind in each year.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does that include the fisheries?

Mr. TUPPER. No: I took only one instance for an example. That is sufficient evidence of the fallacy of the argument of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This statement may be true as to one department, but we know that where it was costing $23,000,000 in 1878, is costing $36,000,000 to the people of Canada in 1890, and there are $37,000,000 demanded for 1892. Does not the hon. gentleman see that there has been an enormous increase in almost every part of the revenue. Does he want me to go through the whole, from the administration of justice to civil government, and from civil government to the Fisheries Department? We find that for what we paid $93,000 in 1878, we are now paying $328,000.

Mr. TUPPER. You do not mean the Fisheries Department?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; we were always able to make a decent bargain with our American neighbours. We sent our High Commissioner, Sir Alexander Galt, to Halifax, and succeeded in extracting $5,000,000 from the American Government.

Mr. BOWELL. That was under a treaty negotiated by Sir John A. Macdonald.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If Sir John Macdonald had the carrying out of that treaty we would not have got anything at all. We remember that he got the navigation of the Stikeen and Yukon Rivers under the Washington Treaty. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) says that the increase in expenditure in his department is justified. Let us take the other departments. Let us take the Department of Justice, the Indian management, our Mail Subsidies, the Militia, the North-West Territories, our Mounted Police, our Penitentiaries, Pensions and Superannuations, our Public Works, and that magnificent specimen of the operations of the present Administration—the Department of Railways and Canals, also let us take the Post Office, which, perhaps, is the least objectionable of the whole; but still it shows a considerable addition to the public burdens. Now, let us see what the result is. Let us compare the expenditure under the Mackenzie Administration with the expenditure under the present régime. The Minister of Customs knows that he cannot get in the Public Accounts a proper statement of the difference in the cost between advertising and printing at that time and this. The amount appears to have been $180,000. Take the four or five years of the existence of the Mackenzie Government, and you will find that for advertising and all kinds and descriptions of printing, for subscriptions to the newspapers and everything of that kind, that amount is not exceeded; and I am not afraid to say that, if Mr. Mackenzie had been continued in office, that Government would have been carried on with every attention to economy and efficiency. Every year since, the expenditure has increased. The fact that there has been an increase of at least $1,000,000 a year is ample proof that their conduct has been marked by gross extravagance, and by gross disregard of the needs of this country. While the American people have been reducing their debt to a mere bagatelle in comparison with their population, we find that, while these hon. gentlemen entered into office with a debt one-third in proportion of what the United States debt was, they have now a debt three times that of the United States in proportion to the population. If they compare their Administration with that of Mr. Mackenzie's they will find that from 1867 to 1873, when they were ignominiously and properly dismissed from office for conduct not dissimilar from that which is now charged against some of them, they added about $11,000,000 to the debt of Canada, while Mr. Mackenzie did not add more than $200,000 to the debt during the time he was in office from 1873 to 1878. And after they returned again, not having improved in the slightest degree by their absence, they proceed to add a dozen million dollars or more to the annual expenditure of this country. It may be that in one or two individual instances they have not very much exceeded the sum that was charged before, but as a whole these figures in my hand show that in these items for Civil Government, which we are now discussing, they have very nearly doubled the total expenditure which was found necessary in our time, and which proper and judicious management would hardly require to be exceeded at all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice an item here which hardly bears out the idea in reference to the economical habits of the Minister of Customs. I know the Minister of Customs believes that the Minister of Customs is a very economical manager and a very prudent one, but I see that in his department they appear to have $6 worth of towels, and that it costs $48 for washing. How can the Minister of Customs reconcile that with his ideas of economy?

Mr. BOWELL. I am afraid the Minister of Customs would require a much larger expenditure for washing if the hon. gentleman had any connection with the department.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is a very brilliant thing; it appears they need more towels than washing.

Administration of Justice—Miscellaneous expenditure, including N. W. Territories..... $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why does the Minister of Justice ask for this increase of $3,500 in this item?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Because the expenses for miscellaneous justice, especially in the North-West Territories, are continually increasing. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Auditor General's account in which these expenses are catalogued he will find that they consist principally of expenses in connection with the maintenance of prisoners there, conveyance for prisoners to trial, summoning of juries, and other fees in connection with the administration of justice. According as the population of the Territories increases these expenses are continually growing, and the estimate up to the present time is based on the actual expenditure of the current year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What does the hon. gentleman call "miscellaneous justice"?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The miscellaneous items which appear in the Auditor General's Report under that head.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the Minister of Justice please explain the item of $4,000 for official arbitrators?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The four official arbitrators held office before the establishment of the court. They constituted a board of arbitration to which all claims against the Crown were referred. By the Exchequer Court Act they were entitled to be paid the same salary previously paid them while they continued in office, and according as their offices lapse they are not to be replaced; but the duties can be discharged by the referees of the Exchequer Court, who will be paid by fees according to the services rendered.

Mr. MULOCK. Were these permanent officers before the establishment of the Exchequer Court?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; and they are now used as referees for the Exchequer Court and for the Government Departments to refer claims to from time to time, without going into the Exchequer Court. The names of the four arbitrators are Mr. Cowan, Mr. Simard, Mr. Muma and Mr. Compton.

Mr. MULOCK. It occurs to me that when we largely relieve them of their duties, we are treating them very liberally in continuing them on full pay. Are they to be considered as superannuated, or have they any real duties to perform, and to what extent are references made to them in the course of a year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are to remain in office precisely as they were and for the same purpose, but instead of adjudicating upon claims subject, as the law then was, to an appeal to the Exchequer Court, they report on claims. Some of them are used almost as much as before, but one or two of them have lapsed into such age and ill-health that they are not actively employed. They are subject to superannuation, but at present they continue to hold office, in view of the fact that the offices will not be filled when they become vacant.

Mr. MULOCK. It would perhaps be better if they were put upon the superannuation list. Could the Minister tell us at some later stage what is the extent of the duties they perform in the course of a year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can state almost correctly now from recollection that Mr. Compton's services are very freely used in reference to claims against the Intercolonial Railway and its branches. Mr. Muma frequently assists in the same way, principally in Ontario and Quebec in relation to canal works. Mr. Cowan is very advanced in age as the hon. gentleman perhaps knows, and Mr. Simard is in a state of health that renders it almost impossible for him to be engaged.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose the reports have a great deal to do with the findings of the Exchequer Court. I suppose that in some cases they have practically the rendering of the judgment of the court.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot say that quite. The hon. gentleman will remember that under the Exchequer Court Act references may be made to those gentlemen for report. For instance, claims are made in connection with the operation of the Intercolonial Railway for damages arising from the destruction of cattle, from fires, from accidents of various kinds; and a short time ago a number of these claims, amounting I think to 30 or 40, had all to be reported upon by Mr. Compton.

Exchequer Court of Canada..... $7,950

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to mention to the hon. Minister of Justice that I frequently hear references made to the working of the Exchequer Court. As we know, there is but one judge, who is clothed with very extensive powers; and while I do not say for one moment that he does not discharge the duties of his office efficiently, we cannot ignore this circumstance, that there is a widespread feeling throughout the country that the Exchequer Court awards very liberal verdicts against the Crown. I believe that court was established to protect the Crown against claims, and in place of the old method which I suppose depended to some extent on the will or judgment of an officer of the Government. The present incumbent of this court is a comparatively young man, which is of course no crime, nor does it necessarily follow that he is not as capable as anyone else would be for discharging the duties of his position. I do not know that he has had a very extensive judicial duty to perform. He was in the Department of Justice, and no doubt the manner in which he discharged his duties there justified the Minister in promoting him to this high position. But there is dissatisfaction in some quarters at the amounts of the verdicts rendered against the Crown, and we know that the amounts involved in the references are extremely large and are growing in size.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. To understand the working of the Exchequer Court satisfactorily, one has to compare it with the system which preceded it. I suppose every member of the House will recall, when I mention it, the unsatisfactory state of affairs which existed before the Exchequer Court was established. We had, as a first atttempt to adjudicate on claims against the Crown, a "Petition of Right Act," under which the subject applied to a suit in the Supreme Court sitting as an Exchequer Court of original jurisdiction. We had, also, for the purpose of adjudicating on claims which did not come directly before the court, the four arbitrators whose salaries we have just voted. Conceding to those gentlemen all the skill and experience which men can obtain in the ordinary course of life, and aided as they were by sound common sense and good judgment, they were not a satisfactory tribunal when the claims referred to them reached such large amounts as they did in the expansion of the public works of the country. It was found that while those gentlemen proceeded on sound principles according to the judgment they could exercise, their awards against the Crown were continually increased on appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada; and if the hon. gentleman complains that awards to a considerable amount are now made against the Crown, that cause of complaint is far less than it was when the adjudication was in the hands of the unskilled arbitrators. Very often we found that those arbitrators—and I wish everything I say shall be taken without the slightest disparagement of them, because I believe they were painstaking and conscientious public officers—based their awards not solely on the evidence placed before them, but on their own observation and knowledge and their own criticism of the evidence submitted to them; and when the appeals were taken to the Supreme Court, because the Appellate Court felt bound to adjudicate on the evidence, we very often found the awards increased on appeal under circumstances which were certainly unsatisfactory to those who represented the interests of the Crown. We have now in place of that state of things a skilled judge of whom I cannot speak too highly, whether as regards his capacity as a judge, or as regards the other office of Deputy Minister of Justice, in connection with which office I must say that every transaction that I had with him developed my opinion not only of his high integrity, but of his skill and fitness for a high judicial position; and when the position became available, I thought I could do no better to serve the Dominion of Canada than to put him in a position in which he could adjudicate over claims against the Crown. I cannot find fault with the hon. gentleman's statement that there is a feeling abroad that awards are made too frequently against the Crown, because—and that is one reason why I can agree with the hon. gentleman, accustomed and trained as I am to resist claims against the Crown—I am inclined to regard the claims as often exorbitant; but laying aside that prejudice and examining the cases in which I have found large adjudications against the Crown, I must say I have generally been convinced that the judge is right, and have inserted an appeal in cases in which I could not take that view, without the slightest want of confidence in the tribunal itself. Very often when one finds that large amounts are given against the Crown, there is a natural feeling of surprise, because we hear but one side of the case; but a little investigation in some of these cases proves that feeling to be unwarranted. I really think there is no occasion for Parliament to feel anything but satisfaction with the experiment begun a few years ago of removing all these cases to a special tribunal, subject to an appeal to the highest court.

Mr. FRASER. I think, perhaps, the hon. the Minister of Justice has not gone far enough. I think the Act might be very materially changed for the better as it is cumbersome, but so far as the judge is concerned, I must agree with him fully in his statements concerning not only his ability but his integrity and fairness. I think, however, the judge has too much to do, and it would be much better if those parties kept in office doing nothing were dismissed and another judge or two appointed. We would then have a better Exchequer Court, and business better done. These men, while they may act as assessors, I am satisfied do not do the work as well as the present judge, and when we consider the amount of business that comes before him no fault can be found. If, in place of these assessors, one or more judges were added, and perhaps the business of the Admiralty Court transferred to the Exchequer Court, an improvement would result. I only rise to say that, as an appeal always lies, I take the ground that the Crown will see that the country does not pay one dollar on any award by the Exchequer Court which it ought not. There is no doubt an impression to a considerable extent that the awards against the Crown are too large. I know, for example, during the time the Cape Breton Railway was being built, a large number of appeals were made to the Exchequer Court. The amounts offered in the first instance were so trifling that a large number went before the Exchequer Court, and the plaintiffs received sometimes twenty, thirty and sometimes forty times as much as offered, but I am satisfied the awards were all correct. We may go to the other extreme, but I believe the judge will not give one dollar more than the claimants are entitled to. I do not think the Crown should be as exacting as a private party, because when they take lands from people they should deal liberally with them. I believe the judge acts fairly and liberally towards those who seek justice from him, and I wish to add my testimony to his ability and fairness. And I think it would be an improvement if no more than one assessor were employed in that court and an extra judge or two appointed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In connection with this, there is another matter. I think the Supreme Court upheld that where the Crown undertook the work of a common carrier, it does not incur a common carrier's liability. That would regulate the carriage of freights over railways in the control of the Administration. I do not think that is a desirable position. I think that the Government when it undertakes the work of a mercantile company, it should be subject to the same liabilities.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is an outstanding decision of the Supreme Court to the effect that a suit will not lie against the Crown in such matters. I may say, however, that in advising the various departments on that question my department invariably advises that, in the case of the Intercolonial Railway, the liabilities of the department would be that of a common carrier, and the Department of Railways always acts on that advice. I am inclined to think, but I do so with great deference to the Supreme Court, that the decision in question would not be upheld now, in view of recent decisions elsewhere, and we also endeavour to be guided by the principles which govern common carriers, irrespective of the exemption of the Crown.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that matter ought to be placed beyond doubt by actual legislation. There is another feature I may observe in this connection, and that is that, according to the more recent decisions in England, they distinguish between the liabilities of a department and the liabilities of the Crown. No such distinction is made in the cases to which I referred.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think anything I said would reflect on the judge. I did not so intend it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Oh, no.

Mr. MULOCK. I merely referred to the situation in hope that the Minister of Justice would see that every possible precaution was taken to aid in the administration of justice, for, however able the individual may be, we know that the decisions of the very wisest of individual judges are frequently reversed on appeal. In our province, where there are men on the bench who have served long years at the bar, we regard them as so mortal and fallible that it is common to appeal from individual judges to the court of appeals and still further. In the Exchequer Court, the amounts involved are so great that I think there is a special onus cast upon the Minister of Justice to see that cases are presented before the courts fully and that the litigation on behalf of the Crown is conducted as a citizen would in his own case. I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend that the Crown is called upon to receive a less measure of justice than a private citizen. If a railway company expropriates, there should be a leaning to liberality towards the citizen where any violation of his right has taken place for the public good, and the same principle would apply to the Crown in like circumstances; but, subject to such special reasons, the Crown has its rights, and the court which stands between the Crown and wrong is the Exchequer Court.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. So far from finding fault with the criticism of the hon. gentleman, I am very glad to have heard it. Assistance and sympathy in the way of reducing claims against the Crown are not very commonly met with.

Mr. FRASER. In saying that the Crown should deal liberally with the subject, I applied my remarks to those cases which the hon. gentleman mentioned. I see no difference between the Crown and a railway company with respect to lands taken by either from the citizen for the public good, and in each case the citizen should be dealt with on the side of liberality.

To pay for salaries or commutations of the Judges, Registrars and Marshals of the Vice-Admiralty and Maritime Courts..... $5,500

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The vote appears to be larger than last year, for the reason that we are voting a part of the amount which was formerly authorized by statute. My reason for asking this is that the Bill relating to the Admiralty Courts, which is now before the House, will make provision for all of these courts, and will place the allowance of the judges at the discretion of the House—their salaries to be voted from the consolidated revenue. I might say a word or two about the Bill in advance, with a view of explaining this item. It makes permanent provisions for the exercise of maritime jurisdiction. Certain other sections make provision as to what shall be done temporarily with the existing maritime courts, and it is to meet these provisions that this item is inserted here. We propose that the officers appointed under the Imperial Act shall be continued in their present positions. I know that complaints have been made that the remuneration of these officers is unequal. We do not propose now to redress this grievance, but we propose that the salaries shall be voted this year at the same amounts that existed under the Imperial Act. It has been proposed by this Bill that we shall continue the existing officers and not commute their salaries. We do not propose to commute with any of them, but we do propose to offer them the offices at the salaries they are now receiving. That is the reason why we take this vote. When we have these officers under our own jurisdiction we may make different terms, and the officers shall have nothing to complain of.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the annual amount?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. $5,500.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is the present salary paid?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. There is one of these judges in Toronto?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to say that the judge we have has nothing to do. I am convinced it is almost a sinecure. The Minister can correct me if I am wrong.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is true that there is not much business there, but it is absolutely necessary to have a maritime judge in the Province of Ontario. We only propose to have one at present, but we take power to increase the number of districts as may be necessary, but the deputy judges hold offices in other districts where there is a considerable amount of business done, and they are paid by fees.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to have a return of the amount paid during the last five years

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will have the return brought down when the Bill is before the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Has not some question been raised in Toronto as to the rights of the province in regard to the establishment of maritime courts?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The question as to our right to legislate was raised, and it was decided in our favour by the Supreme Court.

Dominion Police.....$21,500

Mr. FOSTER. There is only the increase of one policeman.

Mr. MULOCK. Before passing from the other item, I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a question which has been before the House for some time—I mean the proposition to increase the salaries of the Superior Court judges, and I would also refer to the status of the County Court judges. I do not think the latter are sufficiently remunerated, and, in consequence of that, some of them are obliged to engage in extra work, frequently taking references and things of that kind, no doubt having regard to the emoluments. To that extent they are rendered unable to discharge the duties of their office. Take the case of the junior judge of the County of York. He is on the same footing with a judge in the rural districts. The junior judge of the County of York receives $2,000, with $200 allowance when he goes away from the city. I say it is impossible for a junior judge who lives in Toronto to live on such a small salary. While I do not desire to discriminate against a rural judge, I say that $2,000 is too small a sum for the junior judge of the County of York, who has to live in Toronto. If the junior judge were properly remunerated he might be able to discharge his duties without the number of judges being increased, but the Ontario Legislature has provided for an additional judge there. Of course, the city of Toronto is growing, and there is a great deal of commercial business done there, and the judge has jurisdiction not only in the city but also in the county, which is united with the city for judicial purposes. The person who occupies the position of junior judge for the County of York is a very able man, and I think that the fact that he receives the salary he does is not only unsatisfactory and unfair to him, but it is a degradation to the administration of justice itself. As to the remuneration of the Superior Court judges, I think that should be settled. For some years past I have heard propositions made for an increase in the salary of those judges. I do not think it is proper that this question should be constantly brought before the public. It is not fair to the judiciary. They are not able to speak for themselves or to reply to criticisms, and I think the position of a judge should remove him from outside criticism. A question like this is a delicate question, bringing the judiciary, as it were, in opposition to the public, who consider themselves, as they properly are, the paymasters. It is a question which should not be kept open; it ought to be dealt with, and dealt with properly. The salaries now paid are the salaries paid, I think, ever since the Superior Court was established, and a dollar to-day is not worth anything like what a dollar was when the courts were established. The remuneration of the Superior Court judges in the Province of Ontario needs, in my judgment, immediate attention. The salaries are not adequate, and I believe that a good, sound public opinion will sustain the Administration in dealing properly and at once with this matter. It is not popular, I presume, to increase salaries. I dare say there are a good many people who think the judges are overpaid. At all events, I am prepared to take my share of the responsibility in advocating that they be put on a proper footing. I say there is nothing between the people and anarchy except the judges, and if we are interested in any one thing we are interested in selecting to the bench—I am assuming we have always done so—the very fittest men. Whilst no salary that we can assign will, in itself, induce men in great practice to withdraw from practice to the bench, as there ought to be a fitness in all things, so I say a salary ought not to be assigned insufficient to enable a judge to maintain his family. The Minister of Justice, I see, does not approve of my remarks. He smiles upon them as if he thought there was nothing in them. I am sorry I have not awakened his sympathy.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On the contrary, I was smiling with satisfaction to see how much information my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was getting on this question. I hope he will pay the fullest attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I sympathize entirely with what he has said, and as soon as I can convince my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, right and justice shall be done.

Mr. FRASER. No such small matter should stand in the way of justice. I know the Minister of Finance will not take that for a personal allusion.

Mr. FOSTER. The contrast is very remarkable.

Mr. FRASER. I mean that no opposition from any single member of this House should stand in the way, and I must say I think that if the Minister of Justice had thoroughly made up his mind so small a matter would not be allowed to stand in his way. I agree fully with what the hon. member has said. I do think that the question of the salaries of our judges should not be allowed to be discussed in papers from time to time, but they should be put in an independent position. In England there is no question about it, and we very seldom hear any complaint about the large salaries paid to judges in England. Of course, we cannot afford to pay them as large salaries in this country; neither do the judges expect it. But I know there is an inequality, and know the judges in some other provinces get more than they do in others. While, of course, certain litigants are always saying that justice is not meted out to them, I am sure that not only this House but the country would sustain any Government that would set this question at rest. I do believe that our judges are not so well paid as they should be, and that the conditions of life have so changed within the last ten years as to make it impossible—I know this to be the case in Nova Scotia—for the judges to live on the same salaries now that they could live on ten years ago.

Mr. TROW. I agree with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that we ought to place the judges on an equality. In counties with a population of 40,000, 5 cents a head would about make up their present salary of $2,200, and where there are 60,000 inhabitants the judge should be paid a higher salary in accordance with the increased work of the administration of justice. The County of York and a few other counties in Canada are placed on a par with a county that has about 20,000 inhabitants.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not surprised at seeing so many hon. gentlemen of this House, who are members of the bar themselves, advocating a raising of the salary of the judges, because, I presume, they are prospective judges themselves. But outside of that it seems to me they are so accustomed to making very heavy charges for services that anything like a moderate salary, or what would be a competent salary for men in other lines of life would not be considered by them a competent salary at all. I do not think the proposition to raise the salary would be popular with the people of the country. We know for a fact that if a judge happens to die, almost every lawyer in the county is willing to take the position, whatever the salary may be. As long as we find that to be the case I do not see any difficulty in getting even the best men to take the position of judges. Now, I am not saying that their salaries are too high or too low; I only say that the feeling in the country is that their salary is about in proportion with the salary of men of equal ability in other lines of life.

Mr. DAVIN. The inadequacy of judicial remuneration is still more striking in the North-West Territories and Manitoba. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Fraser) speaks about the expense of living in Nova Scotia. Now, it is well known that in Manitoba and the North-West Territories the expense of living at this moment is far greater than in any other part of the Dominion of Canada, and yet our judges are paid less than in Ontario. In a previous session I spoke on this matter, and I spoke with some feeling, but without the least personal interest, as although I happen to be a barrister I do not practice, and I have no ambition to be a judge. I spoke with some feeling because I knew the angusta res of those gentlemen who had to maintain a high position on a very small salary. I am persuaded that if the hon. and learned gentleman would bring in a Bill dealing with this question, and if the Government, and especially the Finance Minister, who is nothing if not economical—and that is a virtue in a Finance Minister—if the Finance Minister will second the action of the hon. and learned gentleman, and if those gentlemen who belong to the same party as myself, but who take a very strong adverse view on this question, will support the Government, it will be found that, as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has stated, the Government, in doing justice to the judiciary, will be supported by a strong and healthy public opinion. It is not possible to exaggerate the importance of having the status of the judge, financially and socially, such that it will attract to the bench the very best talent in the country, and that you have a bar that will devote their whole time to law, and will fix their ambition on the bench, instead of having a bar, as we have in this country, that divides its attention between law and speculations of all sorts. In England, where the judges are properly remunerated, you have men of the highest talent, who devote their whole time, and all their energies—their days and nights—to law, and consequently you have judges on the bench who, when an important case is brought before them in Westminster Hall, do not need to stop and consider the judgment they will give, but are able to pronounce a judgment right off, for they have the cases at their finger ends. There you have the best legal talent of the country on the bench. And what does that mean? What it means is this: You have men of the highest character, of the highest ability, of the highest learning, of the most profound integrity, dealing with the important questions of property and the liberty of the subject brought before them. If the hon. Minister of Justice intends to take a step in this direction this session, and I hope he does, I will strongly, at least as strongly as my poor abilities will enable me to do so, support him; and I venture to say this, that he will be supported by the people of the country.

Mr. DEVLIN. I desire to ask the Minister of Justice if he is aware of the pressure of business in the Ottawa district. In fact, the business is so great that it is contemplated to divide this district, making one Pontiac and the other Ottawa division. I know not whether the Minister of Justice has advised the appointment of an additional judge. However, it is well known that the business is so considerable as to require this division to be made, and the judge at present holding the position has a very great amount of work to do. In fact, I may call the Minister's attention to this, that so great is the amount of work that on several occasions an assistant judge has been invited to attend, and frequently the term of Queen's Bench, which is held twice a year, has been presided over by a judge specially invited for the purpose from Montreal, because the district judge residing at Aylmer had so much to do that he could not attend. Such was the case in June last, and I believe it was so on a late occasion. I cannot exactly understand why judges in the rural districts are paid only $4,000 a year, while judges presiding over courts in the cities are paid $5,000. It is well known that judges in the rural districts have to preside over the Court of Queen's Bench as well as the Superior Court, whereas in the city it is not so. Their responsibility is as great, if not greater; their living expense is equally costly, their position is equally as high, and it seems to me they should, at all events, receive the same amount of remuneration as judges of the Superior Courts residing in cities.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but as a member of the legal profession I cannot allow the statement made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to pass without contradiction. I take the liberty of correcting the statement of the hon. member when he says the judges are paid as highly as other men in the same station in life and requiring the same education. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the House to the fact that the heads of great corporations are paid something like $20,000 or $25,000 a year, although the duties they perform are not more important than the duties performed by the judges of this country. It is not necessary to call attention to these large salaries paid to the heads of great corporations; let us consider the salaries paid the clerks of those corporations, not only of one or two of the great corporations, but even the clerks of banks and insurance companies. Several bank clerks in this country receive more than the $5,000 which is the salary paid to the judges of the highest court of the land, with the exception of the Supreme Court. Take even the cases of secretaries of those banks and corporations, and they receive $5,000, and more. Take the lawyers of some of the great institutions, and they receive more than $10,000 a year for performing duties less important than those performed by the judges. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) does not belong to the legal profession, but he belongs to a profession which does not require to make an appeal to Parliament to effect an increase in their fees; they do it in their offices, and unknown to their patients. I do not rise to make a speech respecting the salaries of the judges, but I call the attention of the House to this fact, and I know it to be a fact, that to-day judges in the great cities of the Dominion, and the judges belonging to the Superior Courts, are obliged to devote a portion of their time to other matters in order to provide the necessaries of life. I think this is a state of things that should be remedied.

Mr. SPROULE. The comparison I made was a fair one. I said the judges were equally as well paid as were men in other lines of life possessing equal ability. I might very fairly draw a comparison between the two professions, medical and legal. Take two men when they commence to study. The medical man when prosecuting his studies is obliged to devote four years of his life to his profession, during which he receives no remuneration, and is under very heavy expenses all the time. The lawyer is placed under another lawyer, and usually commences to earn money from the time he begins his studies. After the conclusion of studies both commence to practice. Taking an average, one is quite as able and intelligent and as well educated as the other. Their earnings are not, however, equal. A very fair amount of earnings of a doctor is $2,000 a year, with much much heavier outlays than a lawyer is required to make. A lawyer earning that sum would be considered as having a very small practice. Again, consider their position after five, ten or twenty years. Let the medical man be placed at the head of an asylum, where he would have as important duties to perform as a judge of the bench, and yet if he received a salary of $2,000 it was considered a very large one, while $1,000 is often considered a very fair amount. Let him be placed at the head of the largest hospital in the country, and he will consider himself very well paid if his salary be $2,000 a year. Let him be appointed health officer. The health officer of Toronto receives about $2,000 a year for giving his whole time and attention to the work. Lawyers, as a general thing, become so accustomed to making very heavy charges in their profession that they look upon it as a small salary when they do not receive $2,000. It is said I should look at the salaries of lawyers who are employed in connection with great corporations. It is understood that some of the lawyers of the Canadian Pacific Railway receive from $20,000 to $25,000 a year. But those salaries do not afford a fair comparison. I hold, notwithstanding the contention of every lawyer in the House, that the opinion prevails in the country that lawyers are paid equally as well as are other men of ability and education. A few instances may be given of large salaries paid to men controlling insurance companies and other corporations, but they have generally the control of the salaries in their own hands; and these few eminent men, either lawyers or financiers, advance their own salaries to a point which may fairly be called extravagant. We should not be guided by that rule. A fair comparison can only be made by taking the incomes of professional men in other lines, of men who are equally clever, who have spent an equal sum of money in acquiring an education, and who are quite as valuable in the line of life to which they belong.

Mr. HYMAN. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in drawing his comparison between the legal and medical professions, has hardly carried that comparison far enough. He must know that it is human to err, and that when a judge errs his error is liable to face him at any time in future life, but when a member of the profession to which the hon. gentleman from East Grey belongs commits an error, that error is generally buried six or seven feet deep.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman forgets that when a doctor makes an error he is amenable to the law, and a judge is not.

Mr. HYMAN. The idea seems to prevail in this House that only professional men believe that the judges are inadequately paid. I do not agree with the hon. member for East Grey when he says that the opinion prevails amongst laymen that the judges are paid as much in proportion as other professional gentlemen. I do not think they are. I believe that a large majority of the laymen in this House and in the country at large feel that judges are inadequately paid, not only for the work they do but for the responsibility which they hold. I notice—and in making the comparison I do not desire to leave the impression that it is because I think the salaries of the judges in the Province of Quebec are anything too large, but simply because I think the salaries of the judges in Ontario are altogether too small—I notice there are four judges in Ontario paid $6,000 a year each, while there are three in Quebec paid that salary. There are seventeen judges in Quebec paid $5,000 a year each, and only ten in Ontario. The lowest payment to a judge in Quebec is $3,500 a year, while in Ontario we have the junior judges of County Courts who are only paid what might be comparatively called the mere pittance of $2,000 a year. I submit that these salaries are entirely too small for the responsibility of the office, and I address these remarks from the standpoint of a layman. I know and I feel that the laymen of this House, and the laymen of the country, will support the Parliament and will support the Government if they make a proposal to increase—I might say to largely increase—the salaries of the judges.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reply to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) I would say that I have not been made aware that the duties in the County of Ottawa, or in that district, have been too great for the present judge. I should hope that such was not the case. The judge in that district is a very able and efficient judge, and I was under the impression that he was not overworked. In reply to the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) I may say that while the Public Accounts do appear to show the result he has intimated, yet the per capita charge for the Administration of Justice in the Province of Quebec is considerably less than in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I agree with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that this question of the judges' salaries should not be continually brought before the House. For years and years we have had this question under discussion, and I would like to ask is it not the legal members of the House who are responsible for this and who are continually bringing up this question, whether for the purpose of getting favour from the judges or of getting on the right side of them I do not know. At all events it is the legal gentlemen who are constantly bringing up this question, and with the exception of the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) I have not heard a single layman in the House, since I have had the honour of a seat here, say one word in favour of the proposal.

Mr. LARIVIERE. I hope the hon. gentleman will except me, because last year I spoke in favour of increasing the judges' salaries and I am not a barrister.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I thought he was a lawyer, for he looks like a member of the legal profession. With the exception of the two gentlemen I have named, I have not heard a layman in this House ask for an increase in the salary of the judges; but the lawyers are everlastingly preaching that the judges' salaries are too low. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) complains that the salary of the junior judge in his county is too low. Is there anything to compel that gentleman to hold the position if he can do any better elsewhere? Why in the name of common sense does he not resign the position and take something else? The judge in the county which I have the honour to represent is one of the ablest men on the bench to-day. We have a junior judge there, too, for we are blessed with two judges; and these two judges have not got as much work to do in one month as an ordinary man does in one week. They have scarcely anything to do, and yet they are drawing big salaries. While there may be some counties throughout the province in which the county court judges have too much to do, yet I do not believe that, on the whole, the judges are overworked. I also contend that the salaries we pay to our Superior Court judges are quite sufficient. I venture to say that there are very few men on the bench who could earn as much at the bar as they are receiving in salaries, and if they can earn more why do they not resign and practice at the bar? There is nothing to compel them to retain their positions. More than that, whenever there is a vacancy to fill on the bench there are twenty-five or thirty applicants, and the Minister of Justice is beseeched from all quarters.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, no.

Mr. AMYOT. No, Sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I know that a great many legal men in my own town have been trying for years to get a position on the bench, and I am told that it is the same in other counties. We must also bear in mind that there are many men who will shine at the bar and yet be a failure on the bench.

Mr. WATSON. What bar?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not the men who will command the highest salaries at the bar who make the best judges. Although I am not a lawyer, yet those who know have told me that some of the brightest men who have filled positions on the bench have been comparative failures while practising at the bar. I believe there are hundreds of men to-day practising their profession who have been almost a failure, so far as receiving large fees and getting large salaries are concerned, who, if they were appointed to a position on the bench, would fill it with a great deal of honour to themselves and credit to the profession and the country. My position is simply this: I know that the country, as a whole, is of opinion that the judges are receiving quite sufficient remuneration, and I sincerely trust that the hon. Minister of Justice will not give way to the flowery arguments which have been advanced by a few members of the profession who are in favour of raising the judges' salaries.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am a layman—neither a doctor nor lawyer—but I believe we should have on the bench the best ability to be found in this country. I do not think the County Court judges in Ontario are paid as much as they are entitled to receive. Any ordinary lawyer in practice will earn more than we pay to one of our County Court judges. I am willing that both our County Court judges and our Superior Court judges should be paid a fair and reasonable salary, and I believe that if it is necessary to increase their salaries in order to secure the best possible ability on the bench, the country would assent to it. The junior judges especially, who get $2,000 a year and $200 for travelling expenses, are certainly underpaid. We know perfectly well that many lawyers doing a special business make more than $5,000 a year, and I have no doubt there are lawyers sitting in this House who in their practice earn as much as $10,000 or perhaps $20,000 a year. Unless you increase the salaries of the judges you cannot expect to secure the highest ability.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not think it was necessary, until it was referred to, to pay attention to the observation of the hon. member of East Grey (Mr. Sproule), when he suggested that if any member of the legal profession who advocated an increase of the salaries of the judges did so from some questionable interest or motive. I need not say that I have not such aim. My profession is that of a farmer, and I am not making much money at either. But if the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) or the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), would like to know why the members of the legal profession bring this matter to the attention of the House, it is because they have actual knowledge of the necessity ; they know the inadequacy of the remuneration, and we only have to look across the line to see how a judiciary——

Mr. TYRWHITT. We do not want inspiration from across the line.

Mr. MULOCK. That is just what I was going to say. We do not want our judiciary to be degraded in public estimation. We want our judiciary to enjoy the fullest confidence of the people. They do enjoy that confidence, I believe ; but if the present condition of affairs is allowed to continue, we are more likely to have brought about the state of things indicated by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) when we may see positions put up for tender, and a general competition for them, and then we may perhaps have the son of the hon. member for East Grey appointed to the bench just after he has been called to the bar and become qualified. We may have inferior men put in these positions, and it is necessary to guard against such a state of affairs. It is, therefore, our bounden duty—though it may not be popular, and though it may be the role of demagogues to denounce it—to place our judiciary in a position to command the confidence of the country. It is no argument to say that a dozen men could be got to fill the position of a judge. As I pointed out to the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) there are many persons in his riding who would be glad to take his position and perhaps discharge the duties quite as well as he does, or possibly better, for less than he receives. But that is not a fair test ; and I think it is unworthy of any member of this House either to impugn the motives of those who advocate this proposition, or to appeal to demagogic arguments, if possible to intimidate the Administration from dealing properly with the question. Do I understand the hon. Minister of Justice to say that he is in favour of immediately dealing with the case, provided the hon. Minister of Finance can see his way to provide the necessary funds ?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) may think that his standing at the bar places him so high that he is above noticing what comes from any ordinary member of this House, even though impelled by a praiseworthy desire for economy. To say that many persons in my county could be got to take my position, and do it quite as well for a less salary, I do not think is very apt. I might say the same thing with regard to him ; nor do I think that any member of this House should be looked on as demagogue because he speaks in favour of economy. The hon. member might, with equal propriety, have directed his attention to his friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell), who I think spoke very reasonably and logically on the subject. Nor do I think the comparisons made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) were any fairer. He says that if a medical man makes a mistake, he buries it under the ground, and there is an end of it, while if a lawyer on the bench makes a mistake it lives to confront him. Now, you cannot criticize him, because he is on the bench, and, therefore, above criticism. If he is above criticism and above law, I do not think that should be a reason for raising his salary. If a doctor is guilty of malpractice, he is prosecuted for it. I believe there is at present a case in the hon. gentleman's own city in which a suit has been instituted against a medical man for $6,000 for the death of a patient, though no doubt he was faithfully and intelligently attending to his professional duties when the accident occurred, and it was in no way due to unskilful or unprofessional conduct. If the hon. gentleman's argument is a good one for increasing the salaries of the judges, it applies with ten times greater force to doctors. I do not wish the inference to be drawn which was drawn from my remarks by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that it was a selfish aim the lawyers of this House had in view. I said, in a facetious way, that they were all prospective judges ; but the agitation is nearly always started by members of the legal profession in this House and carried on by them, and, notwithstanding their great ability, I hold it is not the impression of the country generally that the ordinary judges—I do not know anything of the Superior Court judges—are not paid a fair remuneration for their labour. I know that if there be a vacancy you can have almost any lawyer in the country, no matter what his standing, ready to fill the position of judge and glad to take it.

Mr. DENISON. As a Toronto man, I must say that the salaries of the judges are not sufficient. The salaries drawn by Superior Court judges is about what was paid them forty or fifty years ago, and times have greatly changed since then. In those days a judge of the Superior Court was a comparatively rich man, whereas to-day he is not, and his salary does not at all enable him to do credit to the position he is entitled to occupy. Whether it be unpopular or popular, I am decidedly of opinion that the Superior Court judges in Canada are not sufficiently paid. It is a well known fact that the leaders of the bar in Toronto are earning from $10,000 to $30,000 a year, and we cannot expect our best men to give up their practice and accept a judgeship at a salary of $5,000 or $6,000 a year. If something be not done we will find a great difficulty in getting the best men on the bench, and if we do get a good man occasionally to go on the bench we will probably find that he will resign to renew his practice at the bar. We have had cases already of men not satisfied with their position on the bench going back to the bar, making four or five times their salaries as judges.

Mr. WALLACE. Name.

Mr. DENISON. There is no necessity to name. It is well known that such cases have occurred, and it is desirable that they should not occur. We want the best men on the bench, and not second class men. Canada can afford to pay her judges a proper salary. In every country in the world the judges are the best men, and are well paid, with the exception of this country.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the United States?

Mr. DENISON. I do not care what they pay on the other side of the line, or what they do, but in England, France and on the continent everywhere, they pay their judges properly, and I do not see why we should not do so here. As to the County Court judges, I am of opinion they do not receive what they ought to get. I do not know how it is in the County of Grey, but in the County of York they do not receive what they are entitled to.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it is rather an extraordinary coincidence that the hon. gentlemen outside of the legal profession who have advocated an increase in the salaries of the judges are themselves likely to appear in a short time before those judges to answer for their conduct at the last election. Of course we do not impute their motion to any idea that when their cases come before those judges they may be better considered on that ground, but the public outside may view it in that light. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) has stated that judges have resigned their positions on the bench to resume the practice of their profession. He has not mentioned any names, and in Ontario I think the cases are very few, if any.

Mr. DAVIN. Sam. Blake.

Mr. WALLACE. He did that because he was not promoted to the Chancellorship.

An hon. MEMBER. Oliver Mowat.

Mr. WALLACE. He resigned to take the premiership of Ontario.

Mr. MULOCK. What about the Minister of Justice?

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of the Province of Ontario. He resigned to accept the position of Minister of Justice, which, I imagine, occupies the whole of his time, and leaves him no leisure to practice in the courts. I do not think the people are prepared to endorse any increase in the salaries of the judges. Men trained all their lives, whose training is as severe as that of the judges and who fill responsible positions where life and property are at stake, are getting only $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 a year. The further consideration must also be borne in mind that the judges receive a superannuation allowance when unfit for work, which is a very important consideration, and their labours are not very onerous. It is true that at certain periods of the year they are pretty busily employed, but I do not think as a rule they are overworked, and they have a good deal of spare time.

Mr. DEVLIN. The point I wish to make is not exactly that the judges are overworked, but that the Superior Court judges in the rural districts, whose work is as heavy as that of the judge in the cities, receive only $4,000 a year, whereas the latter receive $5,000 a year. In advocating the increase, I was not actuated by any motive such as that suggested by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), for I am one of those who have the good fortune not to have their elections contested, nor have I any selfish interest, since not being a lawyer I stand a very poor chance of being promoted to the bench; but I find it strange that already two judges have left the district of which I spoke. For instance we had a very eminent judge there in the person of Judge Wurtele, who left the district to take a position on the bench in the city of Montreal, where no doubt it is more pleasant to reside, beside the additional incentive of enjoying a well deserved promotion. Again Judge Bourgeois has removed to the town of Three Rivers, where, though his salary is not increased, the work is lighter. I would also call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that, no doubt, very shortly the district will be divided into two. There will be the district of Ottawa and the district of Pontiac. The contract for the erection of the court house in Hull has been given out, and considerable money has been paid in connection with it. The difficulty in the new district of Pontiac is overcome, in connection with the site, and the work will shortly proceed. I should like to know if the same judge will have to preside over the two districts as he does to-day. We see now that the same judge has more to do than he would have to do over a smaller district or in a smaller circuit.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The reasons that have been given for the discrimination between city and rural judges are sound, and will appear to be sound to hon. members on reflection. It is true that they are the same in rank and that the judge in the district of Ottawa is the peer of the judge in the district of Montreal, but the difference arises from the difference in the cost of living, from the amount of work performed, from the amounts which are in litigation, and with regard also to the emoluments which are received by the profession in the two places. The hon. gentleman has referred to Mr. Justice Wurtele. Judge Wurtele was promoted from Ottawa to Montreal, but I am sure he is worse off in a financial point of view than he was before. The member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has put a question to me as to whether I am in favour of increasing the salaries of the judges now. If I am to answer the question in view of the inadequacy of judicial salaries I would say yes, because I have been for many years, seeing the amount of duties which the judges perform, seeing the amount earned by the profession as compared with former years, of the opinion that the salaries of the judges should be increased. It is a great mistake to imagine that, when vacancies occur on the bench, we are overwhelmed with applications from persons who are desirous to fill those vacancies. I would repudiate such an insinuation for the sake of the profession itself, even if I had no other reasons. But the applications made to us are not numerous, and they are more rare with every vacancy that occurs: and that is especially true in the large centres of population. In fact, we find it more difficult to fill the offices as each vacancy occurs. There can be no greater mistake than to imagine that we ought to recruit our judges from failures at the bar. No doubt there have been excellent judges who had not succeeded at the bar, but these cases are very few indeed. More than that, while there is a great deal of truth in what some hon. gentlemen have said that the salaries seem to some to be liberal, I believe it is to the interest of every person in this country not only to see that the judges are a highly qualified body but to see that they are sufficiently paid, and enabled to keep up a position in which they may receive respect and deference from their fellow men. It would be unfortunate if our judicial officers should sink below the best rank in society. Many other questions arise in regard to this matter, as to whether the finances of the country would warrant a change being made, whether the proposition I previously made should be adopted, that we should commence with the Superior Court judges, leaving the County Court judges to a future time. I could not answer the hon. gentleman's question to-night, but I may do so later in the session.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find that the chief justice of the States receives $10,500 a year, the assistant judges $10,000 each, and the associate judges $6,000. In the State of Michigan the judges receive $2,500 and travelling expenses, while our judges only receive $2,000. I think we can fairly pay as much as they pay in the State of Michigan. In one county in the States a man ran for county judge. He had run for years around the country as a peddler. He was asked what his qualifications were for the position of county judge, and he was obliged not to go to the vote. I agree with the Minister of Justice that we want the best talent and the best ability on the bench, because we are all interested in having our cases decided according to the best judgment that can be given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There will be an important committee sitting to-morrow, and I would therefore suggest that we should stop here.

Mr. FOSTER. I regret exceedingly to move that the committee rise when so little has been done. We have been sitting for eight hours, and only three items have been passed. At this rate, we have to fear that we shall be here until September or October. However, I move that the committee rise and report the resolutions.

Motion agreed to, and Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

CORPUS CHRISTI—ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that when this House adjourns at its next sitting, it shall stand adjourned until Friday next at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House do now adjourn.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 79) respecting the Canadian Land and Investment Company, Limited.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 80) respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Canadian Order of Home Circles.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Septennial Benevolent Society.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company.—(Mr. Wallace.)

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 85) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act. He said: The chief object of the Bill is to provide power for the exemption of steamboats when registered in the United Kingdom or elsewhere out of Canada, under those circumstances under which we have practically exempted that class of steamboats in the past. I refer particularly to those steamers chartered in Canada every summer season, and plying chiefly on the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, which are registered in Great Britain and which possess the Imperial Board of Trade certificates. Under the operation of the Steamboat Inspection Act as it stands, it appears, according to a recent decision given by the Minister of Justice, that the Marine Department will be obliged to insist on those vessels going through a double inspection and paying double inspection fees, although possessing a certificate, not expired, from the Imperial Board of Trade. That is the main object of the first part of the Bill. There are several other sections of less importance; one, for instance, to perfect the existing law in regard to limited certificates. Certificates are granted to vessels plying on certain waters only and limited to those waters; but, under the law as it stands, a vessel having obtained this limited certificate and violating its terms by plying outside of the waters for which it holds a certificate, cannot be punished, as it appears impossible to enforce the penalties for that violation. So the next section supplements the provisions of the existing law. Then there is also a provision inserted at the suggestion of the chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspectors, and in consequence of the great inconvenience the shipping interest often feel from the fact that unless the Board of Steamboat Inspectors is sitting a man who has passed his examination and whose examination papers have been certified, except the formality of submitting them to a meeting of a quorum of the board, is compelled to wait and is unable to pursue his occupation until after the next meeting of the board. There is a carefully guarded clause in that connection, providing that under the circumstances, if the report of his examination is satisfactory, and is certified by the chairman of the board, the certificate may issue notwithstanding the fact that the whole board has not passed on it. The last clause of the Bill is inserted in consequence of our experience under the present Act, where reference is made to an officer of Customs being employed for the purpose of enforcing the Steamboat Inspection Act; for it has occurred in certain instances and in certain places that there was no Customs officer available and none could be spared at the time from the nearest point where there was a Customs station, and so no action could be taken although a vessel was running against the law. The object of the section is to give the Inspector of Steamboats the same authority as is now possessed by an officer in the Customs service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROPOSED QUEBEC BRIDGE—NORTH SHORE RAILWAY DEBENTURES.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) (for Mr. LANGELIER) asked, 1. Whether, on or about the 26th day of February last, Collingwood Schreiber, Esq., Chief Engineer of Government Railways, made a survey of the River St. Lawrence, immediately opposite and in the vicinity of the city of Quebec, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was possible to build a railway bridge there? 2. Whether the said Collingwood Schreiber was commissioned by the Government to make this survey? 3. Whether this engineer has made a report respecting this survey to the Government? 4. Whether this report is favourable to the construction of such a bridge? 5. What is the estimate of the said Collingwood Schreiber as to the cost of such a bridge? 6. Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay this report before the House?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I beg to state that Mr. Collingwood Schreiber was sent to make an examination or survey as stated in the question. I am not in a position to say when that report will be brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to state that he does not know when the report will be brought down?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I could not communicate with the First Minister to-day about that, and I gave the answer as far as I could.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) (for Mr. LANGELIER) asked, 1. Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government, that, at a meeting held in Tara Hall, at Quebec, on the 26th of February last, Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada to London, declared, that having telegraphed to the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, First Minister of Canada, in order to know from him what he ought to say on the question of a bridge at Quebec, and on that of the North Shore Railway debentures, he had received the following telegram:—

"KINGSTON, 26th February, 1891.

"Parliament will be asked to transfer bonds to Canadian Pacific Railway, on conditions proposed by the city of Quebec.

(Signed) "JOHN A. MACDONALD."

2. Whether the said telegram was sent by the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, to the said Sir Charles Tupper? 3. What are the conditions imposed by the city of Quebec, referred to in the said telegram? 4. Whether the Government intends to keep the promise thus made in its name by Sir Charles Tupper? 5. When does the Government intend to introduce the measure promised by the said telegram? 6. Whether the Government is aware, that, at the said meeting, Sir Charles Tupper declared that the citizens of Quebec might regard the building of the said bridge as an accomplished fact? 7. Whether the Government authorized the said Sir Charles Tupper to give the said promise? 8. Whether the Government intends to carry out this promise? 9. When does it propose to introduce a measure to give it effect?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The telegram mentioned in this question is not complete; it is only a portion of the telegram, and that is the only answer I can give to that part of the question. There will be a measure brought down during the present session in reference to the bonds of the North Shore Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (for Mr. LANGELIER) asked, Whether the Government are aware that during the period of the last election Victor Chateauvert, Esq., ministerial candidate in Quebec Centre, published in Le Courrier du Canada the following notice:—

"QUEBEC, 21st February, 1891.

"As member for Quebec Centre, in return for the confidence of my electors, I promise to give them a settlement of the Pacific million, and help for the bridge."

And that in a speech made by the said Victor Chateauvert, Esq., about the same date, to the electors of Quebec Centre, he made the following statement:—

"I can say, without boasting, that I have succeeded, with Colonel Forsyth, in inducing the Government to give up the million dollars of debentures (the million dollars of debentures which the Government retains on the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Quebec and Montreal) on condition that the Canadian Pacific Company shall make the necessary improvements on the Louise Embankment, construct elevators, and carry out the other works which will serve to make Quebec a distributing centre like Montreal and Toronto, and one of the finest ports in the world.

"After having secured from the Ottawa Government, through the influence of our Ministers, Sir Hector and Sir Adolphe, the return of the million of debentures, and a promise of aid for the bridge between Quebec and Lévis, I should consider myself a bad citizen if I did not consent to come forward under circumstances so favourable for the city."

2. Whether it is true, as so stated by Mr. Chateauvert, that he had secured from the Government the remission of the said million of debentures and a promise of aid for the said bridge? 3. What is the nature of the aid so promised? 4. When do the Government intend to introduce measures to carry out the remission of the said million of debentures, and to assist in the construction of the said bridge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government are not aware that the article in question was published in that paper, but they do know that Mr. Chateauvert exerted himself very much about this remission of the million dollars, and also about the bridge in question. The Government will introduce a measure about the million dollars debentures. The remainder of the question I cannot answer now.

Mr. FREMONT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out, during the present session of Parliament, the promise contained in the following telegram of the Honourable the Prime Minister:—

"KINGSTON, 26th February, 1891.

"Parliament will be asked to transfer bonds to Canadian Pacific Railway, on conditions imposed by the city of Quebec.

(Signed) "JOHN A. MACDONALD."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In reply to the hon. gentleman, I must tell him that the answer I gave just now to the question put by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) applies to this case; that is to say, that the telegram referred to is incomplete.

ENGINEER OF QUEBEC HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. TARTE asked, On what date did H. F. Perley cease to be Chief Engineer of the Quebec Harbour Commission? What was his salary when acting in that capacity? How long had he held the position? Who has been appointed to succeed him?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed by Mr. Perley that his resignation as Chief Engineer of Quebec Harbour Commissioners is dated 15th January, 1891. There was no salary attached to the position. He held the position from May, 1884, to January, 1891. I understand that Mr. Boswell has been appointed to fill the office.

PROTECTION OF FISHERIES.

Mr. GILLIES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a cruiser upon the southern coast of Cape Breton early in the present season, for the protection of the fisheries and the property of fishermen from destruction by foreigners?

Mr. TUPPER. There is already a cruiser on the southern coast of Cape Breton for the purpose of enforcing the Fisheries Act.

MEDICAL OFFICER AT ST. JOHN'S, P.Q.

Mr. BECHARD asked, Whether Doctor E. N. Chevalier, of Iberville, has been discharged from his position as medical officer of the Port of St. John's, Province of Quebec; and if so, for what reason, and who has been appointed his successor?

Mr. TUPPER. The port of St. John's, P.Q., is not a port where a medical officer is employed by the Dominion Government, but the collector, under the Act, has authority to engage a doctor from time to time when his services are required.

QUEBEC GARRISON CLUB.

Mr. LAURIER (for Mr. LAVERGNE) asked, 1. Does the property situated on St. Louis street, Quebec, known as the "Quebec Garrison Club," belong to the Federal Government? 2. What area of ground does this property cover? 3. For what purposes was the property leased to the Committee of Management of the Club? 4. What assessment value does the Municipal Council of Quebec place upon this property? 5. (a) For what period is this property leased to the Garrison Club? (b) What rent does the Garrison Club pay to the Federal authorities? (c) Date of the granting of the lease? (d) Date of expiration of the lease? 6. Is it the intention of the Department of Militia and Defence to renew the lease for this property on the same terms (viz., $1 rent per annum) as the present lease? 7. Has the Quebec Garrison Club, in accordance with the terms of the first lease, expended $10,000 on the property? 8. Is it the intention of the Department of Militia and Defence to endeavour to procure a higher rental for the property? 9. (a) Does the Department of Militia and Defence know that the institution is not purely a military organization, but that it is a social place of amusement having a regular bar, billiard room and card rooms, restaurant and kitchen; and that according to the last returns the membership is as follows:—About sixty militia (active), and about one hundred and eighty civilians? (b) That it pays bar and club licenses for the sale of liquors, and for the use of billiard tables, to the local authorities?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I desire to state: 1. The property situated on St. Louis street, Quebec, known as the Quebec Garrison Club, belongs to the Federal Government. 2. It contains 2 roods 12 perches. 3. It was leased for the purpose of being used by the Quebec Garrison Club as a military club and also as a library and reading room. 4. The municipal assessment value of the property is not known in the Department. 5. The property is leased for ten years from the 1st October, 1881, at a nominal rental of $1 per annum, but the understanding is that all repairs and keeping in order of the grounds and buildings would be at the cost of the club, and so it has been. The first lease given was for one year from the 1st of October, 1879; this was for four rooms. On the 15th of January, 1880, this lease was extended, giving the whole of the building known as the Royal Engineer Office, then unoccupied and in very bad repair, with a portion of the Engineer yard. A subsequent one was granted for ten years from the 1st of October, 1881, as I have stated. The lease expires on the 1st of October, 1891. 6. There has been no decision as yet on the part of the Government as to the renewal of the lease. 7. There are no conditions in any of the leases enforcing an actual expenditure of $10,000 on the property, but there was a very large expenditure, amounting to $11,359.91, and the whole of that was borne by the lessees, the additions and repairs becoming the property of the Government. 8. The question of raising the rent, if a new lease is entered into, is under consideration; the rental of the property is quite certain to be increased. The property is insured by the club to the extent of $4,000, payable to the Government of Canada. 9. We have no official knowledge in the Department of the organization or interior economy of the institution called the Quebec Garrison Club. No complaint has ever been received. The club pays all the taxes of the local municipal authorities, and keeps the street clear of snow in winter.

CONTRACTS FOR PRINTING PAPER.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Whether the Government have made a contract with any person or persons, company or companies, for furnishing the printing paper or other paper purchased by the Government?

If so, when was the contract made? To whom was it awarded? When does it expire, and what are its terms and conditions?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Tenders are always asked for printing paper by circular, stating the quality, conditions of delivery and quantity, sent to those firms which are in the habit of making printing book papers as distinguished from those making the cheaper kinds, namely, Buntin & Co., Barber & Co., the Toronto Paper Co., and the Rolland Paper Co. Others have been invited from time to time to tender, but with no satisfactory result. The contract is limited to a supply for one year for the necessary printing services, short contracts having been found the most desirable, in view of the constantly varying prices of those papers. A contract for certain lines of writing paper was entered into three years ago with the Rolland Co. So far as can be ascertained, theirs is the only establishment in Canada prepared to turn out the particular class of goods required. The contract has recently expired, and a new one will require to be made at an early day.

POUND-NET LICENSES—LAKE HURON.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. LISTER) asked, Whether pound-net licenses have been issued for the year 1891, for fishing between Blue Point and Goderich, Lake Huron? If so, how many have been issued? Are any of them double-headers? If so, how many? When was pound-net fishing first authorized between the above points?

Mr. TUPPER. Pound-net licenses have been issued for the year 1891, for fishing between Blue Point and Goderich, Lake Huron. Twenty-nine licenses have been issued, of which eighteen are double-headers, and one has four heads. Pound-net fishing was first authorized between those points in 1882.

ANNAPOLIS PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. LISTER) asked, Whether the Annapolis public buildings have been completely finished? If not, what sum will be required to finish them? Were tenders asked for? Who tendered? To whom was the contract awarded? What was the contract price? What amounts have been paid on account of the work to date? Is any further sum to be paid; if so, how much?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The buildings are not completely finished. About $2,000 required to finish them. Tenders were asked for. The tenderers were F. Toms, Ottawa; J. Burns, Ottawa; McDonald, Aylmer; Rhodes & Curry, Amherst, N.S.; T. O'Connor & R. McDonald, Moncton; C. B. Burton, Annapolis; J. McIntosh, Stellarton. The contract was awarded to Rhodes, Curry & Co. The contract price, $12,497, being lowest tender. $22,739 has been paid on account. This sum includes site, $4,096; heating apparatus, $1,226; fittings, $1,290. About $2,000 remains to be paid.

MR. HILAIRE HURTEAU.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked, Whether Mr. Hilaire Hurteau, formerly member of the House of Commons for the County of L'Assomption, is now in the employment of the Government? If so, how long has he been employed, what are his duties and what salary does he receive?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Hurteau is now in the employ of the Government. He has been so since 1st June, 1887. He is employed in promoting immigration. He is paid $100 per month.

INDIAN AGENTS IN BRUCE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Have any of the Indian Agents in Bruce acted as informers against persons selling liquor to Indians in that county? If so, what are their names? How often have they so acted, and what share of fines have they received in consideration of such service since the year 1886?

Mr. DEWDNEY. 1. J. W. Jermyn, Indian agent, Cape Croker, informed the Department by letter of 19th September, 1889, that he had laid information against John Colclough for selling liquor to Indians. This suit being successful, a fine of $100 was imposed upon Colclough, one moity of which was retained by the agent, as informer in the case. 2. James Allen, Indian agent, Saugeen, informed the Department in 1888, that he had laid information against the following persons for having supplied liquor to Indians, viz.: S. Laird, T. McVittie and James White, from none of whom was there a fine collected; and the same agent reported in 1890 that he had laid information against Simon Wahbeze, who was fined $50, but from whom the fine was not collected, and one Shomacher, who was fined $50. The agent's moiety of this fine being applied towards expenses in case of Wahbeze. This is all the information the Department has on the subject.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Was a report made by any officer or member of the Canadian Government, on the subject of an increase in the length of the graving dock at Esquimalt, subsequent to the Order in Council dated 3rd February, 1885? If so, what was the date or dates of such report or reports?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Upon an application for extension of dock made by Messrs. Baker and Shakespeare, M.P.'s, the Chief Engineer reported on 25th January, 1886, that dock should not be extended, and Mr. Baker, M.P., was informed accordingly on the 2nd February following. On the 7th November, 1889, the Canadian Pacific Railway asked that the question of dock enlargement be considered, as they had determined to proceed at once with the construction of steamships to run between Vancouver, China and Japan. On the report of the Minister of Public Works made the 12th November, 1889, an Order in Council was passed on the 21st November, 1889, authorizing to communicate on this matter with the Imperial Government with the view of obtaining a further subsidy of £10,000. On the 10th May, 1890, a despatch was received stating that the Lords of the Admiralty were unable to incur any expenditure for exteinding the dock, as they considered it large enough.

METEGHAN WHARF, DIGBY COUNTY.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. BOWERS) asked, 1. Has the Government received any report from the Deputy Inspector of Public Works of Nova Scotia concerning the Meteghan wharf, County of Digby? 2. Or any report from the wharfinger on the same subject? 3. If so, and the reports or either of them indicate that the wharf requires repairing, is it the intention of the Government to place an appropriation in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government have received no report in the office of the Department from an officer of the Department. Mr. Deveau, wharfinger, was asked from this office to report what was required, and he stated in reply that the sea had washed out the north-west part and the top is rotten and in poor condition, and finds that it will cost to repair, $3,000.

THE LANGEVIN BLOCK—CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. MULOCK moved for:

(a) Copies of all advertisements for tenders for the performance of any of the works in connection with the construction of the Langevin Block in Ottawa; (b) of all specifications, terms and conditions referred to in such advertisements; (c) of all tenders for such constructions; (d) of all contracts entered into for performance of any of such works, including copies of all specifications, terms and conditions referred to in said respective contracts; (e) also a statement showing: (1) all changes made in any of said contracts, specifications, terms or conditions, with dates of such changes; (2) the authority on which such changes were made; (3) the reasons for such changes; (4) all changes in the contract prices; (5) the reasons for such changes last named; (6) all changes in any such specifications, terms or conditions not accompanied by any change in the contract price; (7) the reasons why no such change was made; (8) all payments made under each of said contracts, and to whom, with dates of payment; (f) also a statement showing all cases in which any higher tender for any of said work was accepted in preference to a lower tender, and the reason thereof; (g) statement showing all withdrawals of tenders; (h) copies of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and memoranda touching any such tender last named, or its withdrawal; (i) statement showing all orders or authorizations for the supply of any materials, or performance of any of such works in connection with the erection of said block, and not included in any of said written contracts; (j) all claims for extras in connection with the construction of said block or any part thereof; (k) all payments made on account of such extras, with dates; (l) all claims for such extras that have been finally disallowed by, or on behalf of the Government; (m) all unsettled claims in connection with any of said works, whether for work, material or otherwise; (n) all claims for damages arising out of any of said contracts, orders, authorizations or works; (o) all changes or alterations in any portions of said works after the execution thereof; (p) the reasons for such changes or alterations, and why such changes or alterations became necessary; (q) the cost occasioned by each of the last-mentioned changes; (r) the total amount paid out to date on account of the construction of said block; (s) the total amount of unsettled claims in respect thereof; (t) the total amount claimed for damages above referred to; (u) the total amount paid for furnishings for said block; (v) the total amount of claims for such furnishings not yet paid.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact, that there has been an order made by the Public Accounts Committee for the production of the original documents referred to here, and, therefore, I would ask if it would be possible to have the copying done here, so that the production of the papers before the Committee may not be interfered with?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Does the order of the Committee include all these?

Mr. MULOCK. I think so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The copying of this will take some time.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not wish the copying of this to delay compliance with the order of the Committee, but there are a number of these returns which consist of statements from the books, and they might be brought down first.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will make a note of that.

SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. MOUSSEAU (Translation) moved for:

Statement showing all expenditure, and a Return of all reports and plans of Government engineers, if any, in connection with the Soulanges Canal, from 1873 to 1889, exclusively, and from 1889, inclusively, to June, 1890; also a Return of all plans and specifications made by engineers and completed by them, at the said date, June, 1890, in relation to the said Soulanges Canal.

He said: Before offering this motion in connection with the Soulanges Canal, I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, a few remarks with regard to this work. The first part of my motion asks for the plans and reports of Government engineers in connection with the first surveys made preliminary to the construction of a new canal on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, in the County of Soulanges. These surveys were made during the period from 1873 to 1876. In the course of these two or three years, several elections were made with the help of this question of a canal; numerous promises were made in order to secure these elections. The surveys took place, but no reports were drawn; after the elections nothing more was heard of the matter. This is the reason why I ask to-day that the plans and reports in connection with this work and its cost be brought before the House, so that we may know how the matter stands. The second part of the motion asks for all plans and specifications made by engineers since 1889, and completed by them, up to the date of 30th June, 1890. I remember that during the election of 1889, solemn promises were made in the name of the Government in the county which I have the honour to represent. It was said that the surveys had been made, plans of the canal were even exhibited, and it was promised that the work would be commenced without delay. Well, the election ended, and immediately, or almost immediately, the surveys came to an end also. Now we are in 1891, and the canal has not been built, not even begun. In view of the expenditure made in connection with this work, if not altogether with the object of deceiving the electors, at least with the purpose of fooling them a little, I have thought it my duty to offer this motion, in order to ascertain the truth in this matter, for when I was elected the County of Soulanges requested from me a solemn promise that I would require and obtain information in regard to this question. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Government will remember the promises they have made, and that they will keep them; I hope that they will persevere in the favourable disposition which they have shown since the elections. Mr. Speaker, I must say that the system of canals built in this country has certainly contributed to our national prosperity and wealth. All the governments have striven to extend this system, and at the same time to favour inland and interprovincial trade. If I appear to be criticizing the Government to-day, it is not because I condemn the past policy of the Government of building and enlarging our canals, but it is because I would like to see the Government still follow the same course and extend still further this development of our canal system. It is true, and it has been recently established, that canals are not a very paying branch of the public service. It is admitted that the canals do not pay the interest on the money they cost, but the money abundantly spent in the construction of canals is a great help to the people; commerce profits by it, and the country is indirectly benefited thereby, inasmuch as these works contribute to increase the national wealth and prosperity. The question, which is intended to be determined by the surveys, is whether it would be better for the country to deepen and enlarge the Beauharnois Canal, or to build a new canal on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, in the County of Soulanges. From information obtained, if not from official, at least from reliable, source, I am about certain that the reports of the engineers, if they are brought before the House, will show that they favour the building of a canal on the north shore. There are obvious advantages in the construction of a canal on the north shore. It would be cheaper than the deepening and enlargement of the Beauharnois Canal. The first portion of the latter, which would have to be deepened and enlarged, is through boulders, and would offer the engineers and contractors endless difficulties and obstacles; moreover, those who know the place are of the opinion that the cost of such a work would be very heavy. On the other hand, if we examine the ground surveyed on the north shore, we find extremely beautiful lands, a kind of plain, free of boulders, and a canal could be built there for much less than the deepening of that of Beauharnois would cost. Thus, Mr. Speaker, everything should induce the Government to decide in favour of the building of a new canal on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, in the County of Soulanges. Another advantage offered by a north shore canal, is that the Baie des Cascades offers a safe and spacious harbour, where vessels could find protection during storms. If you now turn to the north entrance of the canal, off the town of Coteau Landing, you again find a magnificent bay, larger than that of the Cascades, and which offers important advantages to navigation. This bay extends eight or ten acres off Lake St. Francis. It is a splendid bay, the bottom of which has no rock nor boulders, but is altogether firm enough. This bay has also the advantage of never being exposed to storms, as is the entrance of the Beauharnois Canal, especially at the upper end. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I dwell on these advantages it is because they are substantial ones, and because it would cost less to build a new canal in the County of Soulanges than to deepen and enlarge that of Beauharnois. Mr. Speaker, if you now consider the past history of the policy followed by Governments which preceded the present one, you will find that grave mistakes have attended the building of the Beauharnois Canal—I mean from a strategic point of view. It is known that all our canals are built on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, with the exception of that of Beauharnois. I do not have the pretension of saying to the House that it should follow my opinion, but I believe that here is a fine opportunity of correcting the mistakes of our predecessors. Should the present Government decide to build a canal on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, I can vouchsafe that all the country will be grateful to them, and that the people of the County of Soulanges, together with their humble representative, will be satisfied.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have to congratulate the hon. member, at his outset in this House, on the moderation with which he has presented his request. It forms a happy contrast with the speeches which have been heard in the County of Soulanges on this burning question of a canal during the last elections. At that time, my hon. friend, as well as the friends of my hon. friend, were calling into question, not only the good faith of the Government, but the vote in the Estimates of last year; they were calling into question the very signature of the Governor General. To give an example of this, I will only mention the following: The Order in Council for these works, as for all the others, recited that engineers, after long and costly surveys, had come to the conclusion that, from many points of view, and one, among others, which was not mentioned by my hon. friend, that of military strategics—should Canada ever unfortunately have to be concerned in such a point of view—had come to the conclusion, I say, that the construction of the canal would be more advantageous and no more expensive on the north than on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. That is to say, instead of having the Beauharnois Canal deepened and enlarged, the engineers had concluded that it would be better to build a new canal within the limits of the County of Soulanges, to take the place of that of Beauharnois, which is on the south shore. This Order in Council stated that the Minister, having considered the report of his engineer, concurred in this report and recommended the same to the favourable consideration and approval of His Excellency the Governor General in Council. The hon. member held before his electors that this report adopted and afterwards approved of by the Governor General, was only a recommendation to have the work done, but not a decision of the Government. The hon. member will yet learn, I hope, that a recommendation from the Council, when approved by His Excellency, is an order that the thing so recommended be done, an order the good faith of which no one is at liberty to call into question. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has no objection—I state it in his stead—to put before the House the papers asked for by the hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Mousseau). The surveys for this work were begun seventeen or eighteen years ago. I remember the efforts made in the interest of this work, and the very valuable information furnished the House by the eminent man who then represented the County of Soulanges (Mr. Lanthier). The hon. members of this House will remember, as well as I do, the efforts which have been made and the pressure which has also been exercised by the gentleman who succeeded Mr. Lanthier as the representative of the county, I mean Mr. Bain, in favour of the work which the present member for Soulanges has just advocated before this House. What the hon. member has just said in favour of the location and construction of the canal on the north shore, has already, very often and very eloquently, been said in this House by his predecessors. The engineers began by making very costly surveys. Contradictory opinions were first arrived at. These opinions were discussed and represented contradictorily to the Government. On another hand, the important interests which had gathered around the Beauharnois Canal, were also considerations which the Government had to weigh before accepting the report of the engineers favourable to the construction of a new canal on the north shore. That took time. It was not simply a matter of election promises as it was held. It was the result of long consideration, which was brought to a conclusion by the active help afforded by Mr. Monroe, one of the most distinguished engineers of the country. This conclusion was arrived at last year, and my hon. friend could have seen that last session a sum of one million dollars was voted for canal works between Lake St. Louis and Lake St. Francis. He can ascertain it by looking at page 47 of the Estimates. This year, of this million dollar vote of last year, there is a re-vote of a sum of $300,000, which will be available for expenditure in the course of the next fiscal year. The hon. member said that if one would consider the past history of the Governments—I am not used to considering the future history, for history is generally written of the past—one would notice the mistakes which attended the construction of certain works on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, while so many reasons existed for locating them on the north shore. My hon. friend is in accord with the engineers, which is fortunate for them; he is in accord with the interests already known of his county, which is fortunate for his constituents; and he is in accord with the Government; we only ask one thing, that is, that he may continue being so. My hon. friend said he hoped the House would adopt his opinion, and give its approval to the construction of a canal on the north shore. The House may discuss the different schemes; Parliament has always the right to decide on the opportuneness of suggested works, especially when they involve considerable expenditure. When the House is called upon to vote the sum required for the work in question, it shall give by its vote its opinion on the decision of the engineers and of the Government, reached a year ago, in relation to the construction of this work. In conclusion, I will say that the Government has no objection to put before the House all the papers asked for by the hon. member (Mr. Mousseau). Had my hon. friend called upon the Minister in charge of the Department of Railways and Canals, he might have seen for himself that the plans are ready; that the Orders in Council are passed; and that only the necessary vote is now being waited for in order that the work may commence.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) Am I to understand from what the hon. Secretary of State has said, that there was in last year's Estimates an appropriation for the construction of a canal in the County of Soulanges?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. (Translation.) It is mentioned in general terms for canals from one point to another on the St. Lawrence, which included the north shore canal.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) The Soulanges Canal was not then to be seen with the naked eye. I perceive quite a difference between the Estimates of this year and those of last year.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. (Translation.) The conclusion of the engineers was not reached before last session, but a vote was asked from the House to provide for the work in accordance with the conclusion which was only to be finally reached by the engineers after the session.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) I find the following in the Estimates of last year: "St. Lawrence River and Canals, Lake St. Louis, and canals between Lakes St. Louis and St. Francis, $1,000,000." So that in last year's Estimates this vote was contingent. The appropriation could be used for the work or any other purpose as well. Nothing was voted for a canal in the County of Soulanges; there was simply a demand of a million dollars for improvements of canal works in general.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. (Translation.) On one shore or the other, but within the region in question.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) This year the word "Soulanges" was added in the Estimates, but it was not to be found in the appropriation of last year; so that my hon. friend was quite right when he was calling into question the promises of the Government. The promises of the Government, that is something we are used to in election times. The Ministers are lavish not only of religion, of loyalty, but of promises of money as well, in election time. They resemble certain debtors of whom it is said that they ruin themselves in promises and grow rich by not paying anything.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. (Translation.) One thing is certain. There was no canal for the County of Soulanges in the Estimates of last year. It is true that the million dollars voted were for Lakes St. Francis and St. Louis Canals, but the Soulanges Canal was not mentioned. This canal figured on the hustings, but never in the Estimates. Now, what are the surveys that were made? After having so often duped the electors with this canal question, the Government sent, in 1889 and for a little while in 1890, engineers, who, during the winter, bored little holes here and there, such as are made for the use of fishermen. Let one go and see what has been done in the County of Soulanges. Since 1873 all that the engineers have done is the boring of holes which could only be used as starts for little artesian wells. The electors were quite right in doubting, if not the genuineness, at least the validity, of the promises made by the Government in election times. One thing is sure, there has never been a cent voted especially for a canal in the County of Soulanges, and this is the first year that the Estimates have an item for this work.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. (Translation.) I will put this question to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier): Had the engineers decided, as they did after the session, that the canal could and should be built through Soulanges, does the hon. member contend that the vote granted by Parliament last year was not sufficient for the work, if the work was possible?

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) The answer is very easy: A vote is to be applied according to the explanation given in Parliament when the sum is voted; and I have never heard of the building of a canal through Soulanges.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. (Translation). Well, my hon. friend must have been absent from the House, evidently.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

Mr. FLINT moved for:

Comparative statement for the years 1882 to 1891, inclusive (by Provinces) of: (a) Total number of bounty claims received by Department: (b) Total number paid; (c) Number of vessels, tonnage, and number of men entitled to bounty in each year: (d) Number of boats among which bounty was distributed, and number of men engaged in boat-fishing receiving bounty: (e) Total number of men receiving bounty; (f) Total annual payments of fishing bounty.

He said: In making this motion I desire to give somewhat more fully than I had any intention of doing at the time, not only the reasons for which I ask for this return, but also briefly to call attention to the false position in which not only myself and this House, but, I believe, the Minister of Marine himself was placed by the tenor of the reply to a similar motion submitted by me on a previous occasion. The motion I will not read, because it is on the Notice paper before the hon. gentleman, but I may say it asks for a detailed statement of nine items in connection with the fishing bounties. I made the motion after careful consideration and study of the statistics furnished me by this House and placed in our hands, and also those that were accessible to me in the library connected with Parliament. I was surprised and amazed when the Minister of Marine stated that I would find those details in the last volume of his report; but as the Minister, with that emphatic and imperious manner which he assumes as a Minister of the Crown, insisted that all the details would be found in the Fisheries Report, which he held in his hand, I cordially and cheerfully withdrew my motion. I discovered, however, within a few minutes, that the hon. Minister was mistaken. I discovered that the hon. Minister had not carefully read the motion, or that he had not carefully read his report, or a still worse alternative, of which I might accuse him if the matter were of sufficient importance, that he desired to mislead the House. I believe, under the circumstances, it would not be at all reasonable to presume that the hon. Minister had any intention of that kind. With respect to the return asked for the year 1891, I assume that he includes the distribution of the fishing bounties made during the recent spring; and while I am perfectly willing to accept the statement that it is impossible to give those returns, the Minister knowing fully the capacity and routine of the department of which he is so efficient a head, yet at the present moment I do not see why that return should not be included. I await enlightenment on that subject. As the cheques must have been prepared and sent out at a period anterior to 5th March, and as the fiscal year is nearly ended, I hold they could easily be included in the return I ask for in regard to 1891. But the Minister was incorrect when he said that all the items were to be found in the last volume of the Fisheries Report. I was aware before I made the motion that they were not to be found in the latest volume of the Fisheries Report, but I assumed that one or two pages must have escaped my attention in my haste, and possibly the hon. Minister was correct. However, I find on investigation that on the page to which the hon. Minister drew my attention there are none of the comparative returns for which I ask. There are statements of the number of fishing boats of the Dominion for the whole year, and of the number of men. But I call the attention of the Minister to the fact that that is not what I ask for: I ask for a comparative return by Provinces of the total number of claims received by the department. I also asked for the return by Provinces of the number of vessels, the tonnage of the vessels, the number of boats among which the bounty was distributed, and the number of men in boats receiving the bounty. The return presented in the report does not give the total returns by Provinces, although I admit it gives the total returns of some items for the Dominion. Therefore, out of the nine questions I have asked for in this motion, not one is answered by the returns on page 18 in the form in which I required the answer. I call the attention of the Minister to the fact that this return does not contain the items I moved for; it contains the comparative statements by Provinces and counties, which my hon. friend, the member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes), desired to have added, and I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Marine, if it is convenient, that he cause the necessary additional information to be published when this motion is adopted. Page 46 of the return contains a comparative statement of the total amounts paid to vessels and boats, but that includes only two of the items I have asked for in the return. The object of the returns I have asked for is that these may be placed upon some of the official documents, either of the department or of the House, thus presenting a complete picture of the growth and development of the fishery bounty system, and its effect upon the fisheries and upon the fishermen themselves. The hon. Minister, I think, will agree with me that there is no return at present which gives that picture. If an officer of the department takes the time, as I did previous to making this motion, to go through all the volumes of the Fishery Reports in the Parliamentary Library, this information which I have asked for can be procured. I have procured the information for myself, but if it were presented by a private member of the House and published either in Hansard or in any other printed form, it would not carry with it the same weight as an official document submitted by the Government. This information, when it comes from the Government, is authoritative, and it is more likely to be correct than if it were prepared by a person unaccustomed to arrange such statistics. At all events, the official document will be received with interest throughout the Dominion and will be studied with care. When I took up this matter of the fishing bounties I had no idea of raising a political question, nor do I wish to do so now. The only complaint I have made in this House in reference to the question is that there is a tendency—a tendency which I think has not been combatted by sufficient force to suppress—by gentlemen in high position in the Government of this country, to make this a political question. I wish to urge in the strongest manner upon Parliament and upon the Government the necessity for keeping this matter entirely out of the range of political partisanship. The resolution under which this bounty was placed at the disposal of the Government of this country stated that its purpose was "to aid and develop the sea fisheries, the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the condition of the fishermen." If these very worthy objects are carried out, and if the Government will present to us from time to time carefully prepared statistical facts which will show in the blue-books or in other official documents the progress of the fishing industry, they will do a great service to the people of this country and to the members of this House, who are responsible for voting the money. I regret very much that this trifling matter should have been treated so seriously in the press, and that a representative of the people in this House, rising in his place to ask questions on a grave subject, should be made a subject of ridicule. I do not blame the gentlemen of the press, but I think the Minister of Marine will admit that it has placed me in an undeserved position. The importance of this question may not, perhaps, be fully appreciated by gentlemen who do not come from the Maritime Provinces. We have a splendid fund of four and a half million dollars which has been received by the Dominion through the energy of one political party, and which the exertions of the former Minister of Marine, the late Sir Albert Smith, placed at the disposal of the Government. This large sum of money was placed in the hands of the present Administration, and I presume they were carefully considering for a period of time the best use to make of it, but upon the eve of a general election they decided to bestow this fund in the form of a bounty; a decision which caused a certain amount of suspicion and comment throughout the country. I think it is a misnomer to call this a "bounty" to the fishermen. The fishermen of this country do not consider it a bounty, and in my opinion it would be far preferable and far more in accordance with the dignity and character of the men who receive it, if it were called by some other name. I would suggest that it might be called the "Fisheries Development Fund" or some other name which would indicate the purposes to which the money should be applied. From time to time complaints have been made in Parliament, generally by members from the Maritime Provinces, that the whole amount of this fund has not been devoted to the purposes for which it was intended. If we calculate the money at the disposal of the Government at 4 per cent., and deduct from the interest the total amount of fishing bounties paid out, we would find that if this is treated as a trust fund, and the interest on it treated as a trust, there would remain a large sum of money to the credit of the fund which ought to be distributed amongst the fishermen. I should like to see before the close of this session of Parliament, or at all events during next session, some decision arrived at as to the manner in which this money at the disposal of the Government shall be still more fully applied to the improvement and encouragement of fishing industries and to the fitting up of improved fishing vessels. The reports which have been laid upon the Table of the House from time to time contain very valuable information, and if I would not be misunderstood or misrepresented, I would pay the Minister of Marine the compliment of saying, that, so far as I am aware, he has proved himself a very energetic Minister in the discharge of the important functions of his office. I must, however, say that the statistical information supplied to this House, relative to the effect of this fund upon the development and growth of the fishing industry, and upon the improved methods of fitting up fishing vessels, have not been remarkable for that fullness of detail which characterize other official documents submitted to the people of the country. The statistical information I have asked for would, to a certain extent, give a pen picture of the growth and development of the fishing industry which is not given by any other published statistics which I have had the opportunity of seeing. This question must be treated with a great deal of care, and it must be entirely separated from any party bias. It is my sincere desire, as long as I have the honour to represent a maritime constituency, and one largely interested in the fishing business, to place my humble services, so far as I have any knowledge of this matter, completely at the disposal of the Minister, and to assist him by any advice I may be able to give, or any information that I may receive from any of my constituents, in order to aid him in carrying out the distribution of the bounty in such a manner as will promote the development of the fishing industry. While on my feet, I would ask the hon. Minister if it would be consistent with economy and with the view he holds, to publish some of the correspondence which he has had with many gentlemen who are thoroughly posted as to the requirements of the fishing industry? I am aware, from reports made by the department from time to time, that a large mass of correspondence has accumulated there, some of which contains suggestions of great value from practical men, and calculated, if carried out, to improve not only the condition of fishermen, but the character of the vessels. A great deal of discussion has taken place with regard to the decrease or increase of payments from this fund, as applied to the fishermen and the boats. The figures I ask for would show what the increase or the decrease is, and the relation of such changes to the progress of the industries in question. I would also invite the attention of the department to the reasonableness of devoting some portion of the fund still at their disposal to the procuring of information as to whether fishing vessels and other appurtenances of the fishing industry could not be improved. From time to time we hear of terrible disasters on the banks and elsewhere, with great losses of life, in consequence of defective arrangements for dory fishing. There may probably have been representations made to the Government on this subject, and I think a portion of this fund might be used in some way for decreasing the dangers of navigation and the risks of loss of life in connection with fishing on the banks. At any rate, I have found no statistics giving the relation between the amount of the bounty paid, the number of vessels and boats, and the number of men receiving the bounty, which would show the development of the fishing industry in these respects. For this reason I make this motion; and in consequence of the false position I was placed in when I made the former motion, I make these explanations to show that my motion was the result of considerable enquiry and deep interest in the matter. If I am still mistaken, and there is in the pages of the report of the department the information I ask for, I would cheerfully apologize to the Minister for any misunderstanding that may have resulted from the debate of the 15th instant.

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly sorry the hon. member for Yarmouth has made his motion and his remarks in support of it largely on the ground that I had been apparently guilty of an attempt to conceal information from him, and was even so far forgetful of the position I hold in this House as to intend to be discourteous to him when he first moved for the information which he seeks to obtain by the present motion. I think it is only necessary for me, in my defence, to refer back to the Hansard of that date to show that I stated that if there had been anything omitted from the report, a renewal of the request would speedily bring it. But the hon. gentleman has forgotten what I wish to remind him of, that after the matter had passed from the Order paper I took the trouble to go personally to the hon. gentleman in his seat in this House, and there with him and the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes), who is also interested in the question, I pointed out the information contained in the Annual Report of the Fisheries Department, with the pages where I conceived all the information he desired was to be found; and after a few questions as to whether the information was there, which I had looked up for the hon. gentleman, I left him with the remark that if there was anything further that was not in the report, and I could give it, he was, of course, entitled to it. I do not intend to pursue that phase of the question any further. Of course there is no objection to bringing down this information, but I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that the information for 1890, the year for which the last distribution has taken place, will not be ready in the ordinary course for some time yet, and of course that for 1891 will not be ready until later still. Notwithstanding that, if the hon. gentleman wishes a comparative statement of those years, the return will be prepared when we have the information ready. Now, on page 19 of my report, to which I called the hon. gentleman's attention, believing that everything he required was there, will be found a statement made up to the end of 1889, showing the year when the bounty was established, the number of claims paid each year, the amount of bounty paid each year, the proportion of bounty per head, the highest and lowest paid per head to vessel and boat fishermen, and the total cost of distribution since the bounty was established; and in the appendix to the report there are statements in detail for the year 1889 of the fishing bounty claims received for the year, the payments made to boats and vessels, giving the provinces, the number of claims received, rejected, held in abeyance, and paid. On page 46 of the appendix there is a comparative statement of fishing bounties paid from 1882 to 1889 inclusive, giving provinces, counties, vessels, boats and the totals; and it seemed to me that the information the hon. gentleman was seeking was there. But I did not pretend to be infallible and to understand exactly what the hon. gentleman desired; and it was for that reason I went personally to the hon. gentleman subsequently and was delighted to give him the fullest information possible in reference to the distribution of the bounty. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, that, in the distribution of a fund such as that, considering its purpose and amount, it is necessary that the fullest facts should be annually laid before the people and Parliament, and it was in that view I caused to be prepared the very elaborate statement referred to. I do not like to draw into a discussion in which my own conduct is criticized any reference to an officer of my department, but I may tell the hon. gentleman, with reference to the alleged discourtesy, that my Deputy was under the same impression as myself, both on a previous occasion and subsequently, namely, that all the information which could be given was in the report. The hon. gentleman said there was not a comparative statement for the provinces. That is a matter of calculation, which will take a little time, but it will be prepared and laid before the House. In reference to the hon. gentleman's remarks concerning the administration of the fund, that was an idea of my own, and a year or so ago I sent to every hon. gentleman representing a fishing district a circular, and it is no doubt to that the hon. gentleman referred. In the report of 1889, if my memory serves me right—and I must speak very accurately to the hon. gentleman—the Deputy summed up the result of the enquiries and expressed his gratification that in all the reports received from the various districts there were no suggestions of material change in the system which had prevailed from 1882 which could be well adopted in connection with the administration of the fund. If the hon. gentleman, after looking into the report of 1889, desires full information as to what the different opinions were on that question, I will be very glad to bring all those papers down, should the hon. gentleman move for them. In connection with the other question, as to protection of fishermen on the banks, and the enquiry into the casualties that occur, fortunately, in connection with those fishing ventures, it will not be necessary to distribute any portion of the fund to obtain such information, as we can, with our regular staff, obtain the information required. Some of it we have obtained, and it was used, I think, by Mr. Colby, when acting for me last session, in the consideration of the Bill concerning further equipment for vessels going on the banks. However, if any further information can be elicited, I shall be most happy to endeavour to obtain it, and also to receive any suggestion from the hon. gentleman as to the form of enquiry which should be adopted.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman ought not to construe my remarks as imputing discourtesy. The imputation of discourtesy came indirectly from other quarters. I was gratified at the private explanation the Minister gave me, but I felt that the explanation should be made as public as was the original cause of the misunderstanding, since a most improper use has been made in other quarters of this incident.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite clear my hon. friend has some ground for complaining. I recollect he was taken to task in a very snappish and flippant manner for the notice of motion he gave. Now it appears my hon. friend was quite right, and the information he asked for should have been granted at the time.

Mr. TUPPER. That is a most extraordinary intervention on the part of the hon. gentleman, but I am not surprised at it. If there is any hon. gentleman here who understands what flippant and impertinent language is, that hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House is the best authority on the subject I know of.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One excepted.

Mr. TUPPER. I am glad to see the contrast between the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for Yarmouth. The hon. member for Yarmouth is perfectly satisfied with the answer I gave. If the hon. member for South Oxford had any spirit of fairness in him, or any recollection of the facts, he would be equally satisfied with the explanation I gave. If he will look up Hansard, he will fail to see any language from me which could be considered as flippant, even by an hon. gentleman who is so biassed in regard to his opponents as is the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was in the House when the hon. member for Yarmouth read his question, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told him that the information he asked for was to be found in his report.

Mr. TUPPER. Exactly; so I believed at the time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That it would be found at page 17 of the report, and the hon. gentleman expressed his surprise——

Mr. TUPPER. I did not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).——that the hon. member for Yarmouth, before he put the question, had not made himself familiar with the report.

Mr. TUPPER. That statement is incorrect. I am sure the hon. gentleman will not persist in misrepresenting me on a subject which he insists on making a personal matter. The Hansard report is as follows:—

"Mr. TUPPER. The hon. member and the hon. mover of the motion will find that all the information in detail which the mover has asked for, and also the information as to the returns by counties which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) desires, are to be found in the report now in their hands—on page 18 in Appendix 2. I had the statement carefully prepared.

"Mr. FLINT. Are the returns there for 1891?

"Mr. TUPPER. I forgot to add, that it is impossible to give the returns for the year 1891 until the end of the year.

"Mr. FLINT. Does the statement in the report include all the items I have asked for here?

"Mr. TUPPER. Yes; if there is any one item in the motion which is omitted, another motion will at once bring the information."

I never expressed my surprise that the hon. gentleman had not made himself familiar with the report.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman not only spoke in a very sneering tone to the hon. member for Yarmouth, but all his hon. friends about him laughed at the ridiculous figure which, in their opinion, the hon. member for Yarmouth cut in asking for information so plainly presented in the report. Why, the hon. gentleman's answer was a cue to his friends on the press, and the ministerial organs attacked the hon. member for Yarmouth for his ignorance of the contents of the report. The hon. Minister refers to his courtesy in going at once and offering to give the hon. member for Yarmouth the information. Of course, when he discovered that the information which he said was at a certain page of the report was not there, he would have been very glad that this matter should not be brought up in the House, because the rôle is now reversed, and it is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and not my hon. friend from Yarmouth, who is cutting a ridiculous figure. I do not think that the treatment the hon. Minister extended to the member for Yarmouth, is such as he, occupying the position he does, should have extended towards a new member, even if the Minister had been correct instead of being, as he was, wholly in the wrong.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT--PROHIBITION.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With the view of adjourning, if possible, at six o'clock, I would ask the hon. member for Lanark if he would consent to postpone the Order of the Day which appears in his name?

Mr. JAMIESON. I have no objection, provided it is thoroughly understood ample opportunity will be given to close the debate and take a vote. If that is the understanding, I have no objection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. When?

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure the Government has no disposition to avoid the fullest discussion and the consummation of that discussion by a vote in the House, and, if my hon. friend sees fit to postpone this at the present time, he may rest assured that he will have an early opportunity for resuming the discussion and bringing the matter to a vote.

Mr. FRASER. As seconder of the resolution, I should like to know when it is to come up?

Mr. FOSTER. I said at an early date.

Mr. FRASER. If an early date means early next week, very well; but the people of the country will not be satisfied unless a proper opportunity is afforded for the sense of the House to be taken.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the assurance I gave would be satisfactory to the House, but I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) has a lurking suspicion that the Government desire to burk this question. In that case I may relieve his mind. The Government has no such a desire, but wishes that every opportunity should be given for the discussion. I will say that on Wednesday evening next an opportunity will be given to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to bring forward his motion.

Mr. FRASER. I did not suspect the Government of any desire to burk this question, as I know the Government are only too anxious to deal with this matter in the interest of the country, but I simply wanted an explanation that would be definite as to what an early day meant.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the Government are willing to adjourn this evening. If the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) is not ready to go on with his motion, I will not object to the adjournment, because I believe every one expected this debate to go on this evening, and nearly all the other gentlemen who have orders on the paper are not ready to go on with the public Bills and Orders, so that we would, perhaps, sit for only half an hour. I understand, therefore, that the member for Lanark is willing to postpone his motion. He is better prepared to deal with this question than I am, but I may remind him that "to-morrow" is a very dangerous word in this House.

Mr. JAMIESON. The only object I have is to have this question thoroughly discussed by this House, and, so long as ample opportunity is given for this discussion, I cannot offer any opposition to a postponement. I desire that every opportunity should be given to hon. members on both sides of the House to give their views on this question, and I am quite satisfied to allow the matter to remain for a week from to-day when, I hope, it may be disposed of finally.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am unable to understand why the Government desire a postponement of this question, for it is evidently at the instance of the Government, that my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has consented to a postponement. The temperance people of this country are anxious that this matter should be discussed, and it is somewhat suspicious that the Government have shown such a desire for postponing it. The other night the Government were defeated upon a motion for the adjournment of the debate, but afterwards they drummed up their forces.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think this is not the proper time to enter into a discussion of the motion itself.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not discussing the question, but simply the motives of hon. gentlemen opposite in asking for an adjournment.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think my hon. friend will see the inconvenience of entering upon a discussion of the conduct of the Government at this stage. That can be done at the proper time, but the interruption of the order of business can only take place by consent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I thought the understanding was that we would adjourn at six, and then on Wednesday next this measure will come up and be discussed as the hon. gentleman would discuss it to-day. If that is the understanding, I would suggest, in order to hasten the business of the House, we might, with the general consent, take up the private Bills.

THE PICTOU BANK.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 76) to amend an Act to authorize and provide for the winding-up of the Pictou Bank.

Mr. MULOCK. Is there a bank in Pictou being wound up?

Mr. McDOUGALD. This bank has been in course of liquidation for a good many years, and I have no doubt that if the hon. gentleman consulted some of his political friends in that county, they might give him more information than I can give. The bank is nearly wound up, and this is to continue the charter for the purpose of completing the winding up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there is some money due to the Government. I would like to know from the Minister of Finance what is the amount that was deposited there, what amount has been recovered, and what is the total indebtedness to us, if any?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the information in my hands at this moment, but I will procure it for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McDOUGALD. There is nothing due to the Government from the Pictou Bank.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has it all been paid?

Mr. McDOUGALD. There has nothing been due at any time, so far as I know.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there was a deposit there.

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing in the Public Accounts as an asset. I think, if there had been a claim, it would have been kept in the Public Accounts as an asset.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rather think there is. Are you quite certain?

Mr. FOSTER. I looked through them the other night, when you spoke, but I did not find any. But I am told that my hon. friend, the mover of the Bill, is one of the liquidators of the bank, and I think he would know.

Mr. McDOUGALD. So far as I know, there has never been a deposit by the Government in the Pictou Bank.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What business does the Minister of Finance intend to take up on Friday?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a resolution I intend to introduce, and there may be a Bill or two, and immediately afterwards we will proceed with the Estimates.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th May, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga) presented the second report of the Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the Debates of the House of Commons.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 87) to revive and amend the charter of the Quebec Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Desjardins, L'Islet.)

Bill (No. 88) to incorporate the St. Catharines and Merritton Bridge Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Kingston and Pontiac Railway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 90) to amend the Act to incorporate the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Cochrane.)

Bill (No. 91) to amend the Act authorizing the city of Winnipeg to utilize the Assiniboine River Water Power.—(Mr. Macdonald, Winnipeg.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Anglo-Canadian Electric Storage and Supply Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Ontario and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 95) further to amend the Act 36 Vic., chap. 61, respecting the Trinity House and Harbour Commission of Montreal. He said: This Bill is necessary in view of recent legislation which abolished harbour dues in the port of Montreal, to supply another constituency for the representative of the shipping interest on the harbour board. Instead of making the qualification consist of the amount of dues paid on shipping, the Bill provides that that shall be settled by the amount of tonnage represented by the shipping interest.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. DEWDNEY (for Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Tuesday next to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient, in order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway Company to construct a railway from the city of Winnipeg to some point on the Saskatchewan River, to enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and to pay for such services during the said term eighty thousand dollars per annum, such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the said railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know from the hon. Minister whether, when he moves this resolution, he will be prepared to lay before the House anything in the nature of an estimate of the probable cost of the work to which he desires us to donate this grant, or whether any survey at all has been made of the route which it is proposed to traverse?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I shall be prepared to give all the information which the Government have in their possession, and I believe that in it will be found the information which the hon. gentleman asks for.

Motion agreed to.

DEVELOPMENT OF SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Tuesday next to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient that an annual grant of $160,000 be made to aid in the development of the sea fisheries and the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the condition of the fishermen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this an additional grant to the sum of $150,000 or thereabouts now paid?

Mr. TUPPER. $10,000 in addition to the $150,000 now appropriated.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, copies of papers relating to the sale of the Carleton Branch Railway to the city of St. John.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 26th May, 1891.

RECIPROCITY PAPERS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be in the recollection of the House that about a week ago I stated, in answer to a question from the other side of the House, that the papers which were under our immediate disposal relating to the trade negotiations with the authorities at Washington, would be brought down in about a week, in advance of others in respect of which permission had to be obtained. It was fully the intention to have laid them on the Table to-day; but from something I have ascertained to-day, I have reason to believe that a delay of forty-eight hours may result in our being able to lay the correspondence on the Table complete. I thought it better to do that, with the permission of the House, in order that the papers may not be brought down in two batches; but if by Monday that expectation should not be realized, the papers which are in our hands will be then brought down. I may say that in order to hasten a definite answer on that subject a special messenger was despatched some time ago to Washington, and communication has been made by telegraph with the home authorities.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. BARRON. Before the Orders are proceeded with, I would like again to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the importance of laying on the Table the evidence upon which the Trent Valley Canal Commission based their report. I propose to discuss the question by way of resolution some time during the session, but it will be impossible to discuss it properly without having the evidence. If I moved for it in the ordinary way, the motion would probably not be reached this session; and, inasmuch as the Minister promised last session that the evidence, if not too voluminous, would be put into the hands of the members, I would ask now that it be placed on the Table without any motion being made therefor.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman should make a motion on Monday, and I will agree to it.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the time for the completion of the works of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited, shall, as respects their title to receive the subsidy heretofore authorized, be the 1st day of July, 1893, instead of the 1st July, 1890; also that all penalties, forfeitures and deductions incurred by the company under section 2 of chapter 4 of the Acts passed in 51st Victoria be remitted, and that said section 2 be repealed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before going into Committee, we ought to receive a distinct explanation from the hon. the Finance Minister of the state of the works, the amount expended on them to date, and all the reasons that lead him to ask for a further extension. The hon. gentleman is quite aware that there is a very great deal of doubt, I think on both sides of the House, as to the utility of this work at all; and we have extended the time, within my recollection, twice if not three times already. I doubt exceedingly whether this expenditure should be made; but, in any case, before being asked for an extension, we ought to have a statement from the Minister in charge of the reasons which lead him to propose a further delay.

Mr. FOSTER. It was my intention to give the House all the information my hon. friend has jus asked for. It is not necessary for me, of course, to go into the history of the undertaking, as of that hon. gentlemen on both sides are probably well aware. Suffice to say that the first legislation with reference to this scheme took place in 1882, when the company was incorporated by the Parliament of Canada. The Act of incorporation then made it necessary that the work should be commenced within three years, that is, within 1885, and should be finished within seven years, or 1889; and the amount of the subsidy to be given was $150,000 per year for twenty-five years. Nothing practical came as the result of that legislation, and in 1886 the subsidy was amended. Instead of $150,000 for twenty-five years, it was made $170,600 for twenty years, but along with that amendment there was a schedule containing an indenture between the company and the Crown, dated 4th March, 1886, binding the company to complete the work as before, on the 1st July, 1889. There was, therefore, no extension of time, but simply a rearrangement of the subsidy. In 1888, the Act was again amended, and the time for completion extended to the 1st July, 1890, with a further extension of two years until the 1st July, 1892, on condition that for every month of that further two years extension, required to complete the contract to the satisfaction of the Government, the company should pay a penalty of $5,000. The action which is contemplated at present, is to relieve the company of any penalties liable to be incurred under that clause, and to extend the time until the 1st July, 1893, but without the penalty stipulated in the preceding Act. As to what has been done, I may say, that I hold the progress estimates, which show the amount of work performed since late in 1888, when work was able to be commenced. In the Amherst dock and basin there have been, in round numbers, 285,386 cubic yards of clay excavated, leaving 116,404 cubic yards yet to be completed. On the Tidnish side, dock and basins, there have been 71,165 cubic yards of clay and 13,961 cubic yards of rock excavated, leaving to be done 76,608 cubic yards of clay and 7,044 cubic yards of rock. On the railway line itself the clay excavated amounts to 1,225,921 cubic yards, leaving only 33,650 to be done; and the rock to 149,524 cubic yards, leaving 45,127 to be done; so that the total, both of clay and rock excavation, amounts to 1,745,957, leaving 278,933 to be completed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the department estimate the value of the work to be?

Mr. FOSTER. I will come to that later on. As to the progress of the work, apart from the excavations, it may be said that the steel rails and fastenings have all been delivered, and nearly all the hydraulic machinery necessary for the working is on the ground. Thirteen miles of track is already laid, and nine-tenths of the pine sleepers necessary for the road have been delivered. The costly and very elaborate shipping cradles are ready for shipment, the locomotives are being built at the Kingston works at present, and there remains to be done about one mile of grading. The dredging of the channel for the entry of vessels at Tidnish is well advanced, and the moles for the protection of vessels on the Tidnish side are finished. Altogether there have been expended, as is shown by the certified reports, without reading the different items, £580,175 sterling, or, in round numbers, about $3,000,000, leaving somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,500,000 yet to be expended to complete the whole work and put it in running order with all the gear and equipment necessary. It may be said that, at present, although for the last few months not so much work has been done, there is a fairly large force of men on the work engaged in ballasting and at the stone and earth work. The reasons that have induced the Government to ask for a delay are, in brief, these: Of course, the work is one of very great magnitude, requiring a great deal of engineering skill. Although the contract was entered into in 1888, most of that year was consumed in preparations for the work. Advertisements had to be published, tenders called for, investigations made by the tenderers, and it was not until the latter part of the year that the work actually commenced. The next season a great deal of delay happened, on account of the extremely and unprecedented wet weather, the nature of the ground being such that continued wet weather overflows it and keeps it in an unworkable state. This very wet season during that year retarded the progress of the work to a very great extent. Then again, although at first it appeared that the number of feet in depth to which the excavations had to go, in order to reach solid bed rock, that is, in the basins and docks, would not exceed a certain amount, it afterwards was found that the excavations had to be made some 24 feet deeper, the other rock having proved to be loose rock or boulders. That, of course, added to the delay, the consequent amount of work being rendered thereby very much greater. Then, also, there was great difficulty found on the part of the contractors in procuring labour. Large railway works were being carried on in Cape Breton at that time, and the Digby and Annapolis Railway was being constructed, so that it was very difficult for the sub-contractors to procure men, although they offered a considerable bonus, and this scarcity of labour operated to delay the contractors. These are the chief reasons why the Government has been induced to ask that an extension of time shall be granted to the 1st July, 1893. The company is as anxious to finish the work at as early a period as possible as the Government and the country are to have it completed. The company is under large penalties now in the way of the interest it is paying upon its capital and upon its stock, and these are a very large burden upon it and act as a considerable penalty, so the company is not anxious to delay the work beyond the time which is absolutely necessary for its completion. Then, again, financial troubles upon the London money market, with which hon. gentlemen are all acquainted and which had their effect upon very many companies and concerns, were a difficulty to be met by the promoters of this scheme. Taking all this into consideration, with the fact that the Government meets no money loss by the delay, as, by the terms of the contract, it does not pay any subsidy until the road is completed and running, the Government has been induced to ask for an extension of time to the 1st July, 1893. If the works are not then completed, of course the contract is off.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The scheme of this Chignecto Ship Railway has never met with very great acceptance from the Parliament of Canada, nor with much support from the public of the Maritime Provinces. In 1888, when the Government proposed to extend the time for the completion and to alter the subsidy, the scheme was discussed pretty thoroughly in Parliament, and, excepting from the gentleman who then occupied the position of Minister of Finance, there was very little defence of the scheme. The members from the Maritime Provinces appeared to agree that they did not think it was calculated to be of very great importance. In fact, I think they deprecated this work being built for, and as a concession to, the Maritime Provinces. I, for one, deprecate any such idea, and I hope it will not be spread abroad in the minds of hon. members. The members from the Maritime Provinces on either side of politics never asked for the construction of this road. I never knew of any petitions being presented from the Maritime Provinces asking for Government aid for the construction of the road. It was engineered and passed through Parliament almost entirely by Sir Charles Tupper, who was the Finance Minister in 1888. At that time, by the statute of 1882, the Government had bound itself to pay a subsidy of $150,000 for twenty-five years, and in 1888 that was changed to $170,600 for twenty years, which was equivalent to about $2,000,000. Then we granted an extension of time, and it was understood that, if the company did not complete the road within twenty-four months, or by 1890, it would be liable to a penalty of $5,000 a month. I understand that this measure is to relieve the company of the penalties they have now incurred and the further penalties they may incur. It would be of no use now to discuss the principle of the measure. The faith of Parliament has been pledged to the extent of $2,000,000, though as to the benefits which will accrue from that expenditure I have never heard any two members agree. I have heard men engaged in shipping and commercial men speak of this great experimental work—for it is only an experimental work—but I have never heard one who had complete confidence in it. I rise to protest against this being considered a work in the interest of the Maritime Provinces, and against the Maritime Provinces being charged with the money expended on the work, although it is being constructed in the Maritime Provinces. When we ask for expenditure on really useful works in the interest of the country, we are met on the threshold with the statement that so much has been already voted, and the first thing referred to is the $2,000,000 granted to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway. I have not heard any representative express his opinion that this work will be of any use to the Maritime Provinces, and I protest against its being charged against those Provinces.

Mr. TUPPER. I quite repudiate the point the hon. gentleman has made, and I think it cannot fairly be borne out by investigation or by a reference to the past history of this extraordinary undertaking, for it is an extraordinary undertaking. The hon. gentleman has fairly stated to the House that, whatever the individual opinions may be as to the ultimate success or failure of the enterprise as an enterprise, Parliament is practically committed to the extension asked for, unless that extension were shown to be based on poor or meagre grounds. The hon. gentleman has not at any length combatted the reasons given by the Minister of Finance for the proposition before the House, and I would put it to the hon. gentleman's sense of fairness whether it is advisable, since there is a considerable amount of capital embarked in the undertaking in good faith, and since a considerable amount of work has been done in connection with it, that the statements he has made as to the merits of the scheme as a scheme should be forced upon the country, because the result, if it does not prevent the extension of time, will only be to put further obstacles in the way of the carrying out of the enterprise. I do not want to depart from the course taken by the hon. gentleman, who has not directly opposed the scheme, but I have the evidence under my hand to meet the view taken by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). That view is, that practically this scheme had no supporter in the House in 1888 except the then Minister of Finance, Sir Charles Tupper. Remembering that on many occasions there were no divisions taken in the House in opposition to it——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will excuse me. We divided the House in 1888. It was only carried on a party division.

Mr. TUPPER. On several occasions, if my recollection serves me aright, there was no division, though there was certainly one in 1888. But, considering that the measure was not always opposed, even when the proposition was for a ship railway instead of a ship canal, and considering the fact that that legislation succeeded a demand from the province which, the hon. gentleman says, is to reap no benefit therefrom, the Province of New Brunswick, I do not think the hon. member's position can be successfully sustained. He will recollect the late Mr. Elder, proprietor of the Daily Telegraph, in the city of St. John, who was a representative man in the very important district to be largely affected by the successful construction of this ship canal; that gentleman for years gave his attention and his very valuable time and consideration to the subject, first, as a canal proposition, and he appeared before the commission and gave his evidence as to the manner in which the interests of the ports in the Bay of Fundy and the ports in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, would be benefited by the construction of a canal; and then, afterwards, I won't say he was animated with political hostility, but apparently, seeing that no action was to be taken, he did not throw up his hat as the hon. gentleman would have expected, and say: We were well rid of it, and the country would not suffer from any incubus of this kind. In his paper, the Daily Telegraph, the leading paper of that district, he began to upbraid the Government for its want of faith and its inaction in promoting this very ship railway scheme; and I will ask the House for permission to read an extract from the Daily Telegraph of 21st July, 1887:

"Some time since, in speaking of the Chignecto Marine Railway, we mentioned the fact that Sir Leonard Tilley, speaking in the House of Assembly in 1866, stated the construction of the Bay Verte Canal would, at an early date, be undertaken by the Government. We further observed that the canal, having been abandoned and the ship railway started in its stead, it is surely not too much to ask, after waiting twenty years, that the general Government shall assist the enterprising projector of the present scheme in such a manner as may secure its completion."

There is a demand for aid by the chief exponent of the Liberal press in the Province of New Brunswick at that time. The article concludes as follows:—

"We have had a marvellous patience in this matter, and have waited too long. When the Pacific Railway was completed we were told that now something would be done in the eastern provinces. * * * * Meanwhile New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the two worst used provinces in the Dominion (because the National Policy injures both without compensating advantages)—

The hon. gentleman sees what a good Liberal he was——

Let me further support the position I take in answer to the hon. gentleman. The Hon. Peter Mitchell, in his recent utterances in Parliament, was not an advocate of this scheme, but we remember that Mr. Mitchell was an opponent of almost every scheme that the present Government introduced on the floor of this House. At any rate, I will call him as an impartial witness on the point raised by the hon. member for Queen's. The Montreal Herald, in its issue of 10th September, 1885, says:

"This railway will be of great use to those trading between the north shore of New Brunswick and the United States, as it gives them a short-cut to the seaports of the Republic. Prince Edward Island will be benefited in a similar manner, but in a less degree. Advantages from this connection by railway of the waters separated by the Isthmus of Chignecto, would no doubt arise, which have not been foreseen. This is always the result of increased facilities of communication. They create a trade for themselves."

Now, I trust the hon. gentleman from Queen's does not desire to raise greater objections to the future carrying out of this enterprise than the natural difficulties to which the hon. Minister of Finance has adverted. The only effect of going back from the merits of the scheme, beyond raising a long debate in this House, would be to prejudice, to some extent, the enterprise in the markets of the world. Now, with reference to the object of the railway, the hon. gentleman sees, from the references I have given, that the Province of New Brunswick, previous to Confederation, considered this work of sufficient importance to take hold of it; and a leading member, who served in the Legislature of that province, advocated it so warmly that he was charged afterwards with not having carried out the promises he made concerning it. During the Administration of the Mackenzie Government at Ottawa, the Legislature recognized the importance of that enterprise, and if my memory serves me right regarding the debate that occurred in 1888, it was shown then that the matter dropped from executive action owing to the report of Mr. Page, which showed that to carry it out as a Government work would require an expenditure of $8,000,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is referring entirely to the project of constructing a canal.

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly, they are inseparably connected, because I submit that the canal scheme having dropped the railway scheme took its place, as it promised to give the same quick connection between the northern ports and the ports of the Bay of Fundy and on the American coast. Owing to the report of Mr. Page that the construction of a canal would probably cost the sum of $8,000,000 for a 14-foot navigation, and that the work could not then be proceeded with, this scheme then came forward as a private enterprise, for which they asked a subsidy in the nature of a guarantee for twenty years, which was the limit of the expenditure for which the Government would become responsible. Now, I do not wish to travel any further than the hon. gentleman, though there is much to be said in reference to the merit of the scheme. I did not profess to speak from any personal knowledge of the question of construction, but it is a subject commanding now the attention and the study of the ablest engineers in the world. There is an interesting article in the Nineteenth Century for March last, to which I would call the attention of the House, before the next stage of this measure is taken. It is written by a very eminent engineer, Sir Benjamin Baker, who, referring to the work now done, says:

"The state of the works of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway at the present time, is as follows:—The hydraulic lifts and the machinery as previously described, together with the hydraulic traversers for shunting laterally sections of the cradle, with small coasting vessels on them, off the main line on to sidings, have been almost completed and shipped by the manufacturers, Messrs. Easten & Anderson; the cradles are well advanced at the works of Messrs. Handysides; the earthworks of the line and docks remaining to be done are only about one-eighth of the total quantity, and the whole of the permanent way has long since been on the ground. It will be seen, therefore, that, as little remains to be done but the completion of the masonry and the erection of the machinery, there is good reason to hope that the much-debated question of ship railways versus canals will soon receive a practical answer by the opening of the Nova Scotia undertaking."

Mr. WELSH. I would not have said anything in regard to this matter except that Prince Edward Island has been brought into the discussion. The Minister of Marine has given the House to understand that the Island will be benefited by this scheme. I have denounced it every time it has been brought before this House, and I denounce it now; and I say that when this company has had eight or nine years to carry out this work and has only made use of three years of that time, and now asks for an extension of time and to be relieved from the penalties involved from non-fulfilment of contract, the boot is on the other leg. If they had had a claim against the Government which had been put aside, they would have claimed damages to the extent of millions. I have read the article quoted by the Minister of Marine; and as regards the engineers, I would not give two-pence for their opinions. They are full of theories; the engineering difficulties no doubt can be conquered and the railway completed, and Canada will have to pay $2,000,000, although the railway will not be worth one cent when completed. Talk about granting $125,000 a year as a subsidy, I say this is boodleism carried out to a great extent. Talk about wild-cat schemes, this is one of the most wild-cat schemes that ever entered into the imagination of anyone. As I was afraid the Minister of Marine might subsequently say that this resolution passed the House without opposition, I protest against it. I should like to give it the six months' hoist. How many men in Canada have a dollar or a cent invested in this scheme? The money is that of English capitalists, and the credit of Canada will be injured when this scheme is exposed and the railway proves to be a failure. I told the late House that if the Government brought a shipowner, or a man engaged in the shipping business who had invested a dollar in the scheme, I would hold my tongue, but I never heard such was the case. If there were any honourable way of getting out of the scheme I should like to see it adopted, because it is only going to be a swindle.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, who has charge of the resolution, what reasons there are for releasing the company from the penalties under which they at present labour; and, if he thinks it is a proper thing to do, why the penalties should have been inserted in the first instance?

Mr. FOSTER. All I have to say is this: that the reasons which I have assigned for the extension of the time, and I gave them in full, are reasons also, if they are good for an extension of the time, why the company should be left free from the disabilities which according to the Act they have incurred for non-fulfilment. They would not have had to ask for an extension of time if it had not been for the inevitable delay, and it is on that account we also base our action in proposing the relief of penalties, which would not have been incurred if those reasons for delay had not existed, because they themselves have endeavoured to have the project carried out at the earliest possible date. They are paying interest on capital at the rate of about 7 per cent., and a large penalty in interest is therefore involved. The Government, if it errs at all, generally errs on the side of generosity against private individuals or companies. There is one thing to be remembered, and it is this: The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) no doubt honestly opposes the scheme, but if the scheme does not work and is a failure, and if the ship railway is not operated, there is no liability incurred by the Government, because the Dominion does not pay unless the railway is worked.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is true; but injury will be done to the Dominion if the statement proves—as my hon. friend's experience in this matter no one will dispute—correct. If the scheme proves a failure, I have no doubt the credit of the Dominion will be, pro tanto, injured, and very largely so from the fact that the Government have associated themselves with this railway. The fact of Parliament granting a subsidy of $170,000 a year for twenty years to this railway will imply in the minds of English capitalists, from whose pockets I take it this money is expected, that the Canadian Government has looked into the work, that they believe it to be a valuable work, and it may fairly be implied that the Government believe it to be reasonably profitable to those people whose money we are practically securing in consequence of our having granted a subsidy. We have found in time past that the granting of our credit, or the giving of a guarantee by the Dominion for a work of this character, which proves entirely unprofitable, injures the chance of Canadians obtaining money for really useful and sound projects. That is the point which the Government should consider, which is the duty of the Government to consider, and in regard to which they may rightly be called on to answer. Before granting this subsidy, on the strength of which large sums are to be extracted from the pockets of other people not resident in Canada, the Government should assure themselves that there is a reasonable prospect that fair interest will be paid on the investment.

Mr. FOSTER. We are in the situation we occupy, and I would ask which would be the worse position for the Canadian Government to occupy? We have endorsed the work by so much as it is endorsed by our granting a subsidy. That endorsement has already been given. In view of that, whatever it may imply, British capitalists having expended $3,000,000 on the work, would it not be a worse position to occupy if an extension of time for two years, which costs us nothing, should stand in the way of the completion of the work, and consequently the investors would lose everything placed in the undertaking? I believe a good deal in the judgment of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh), but when he snaps his fingers at all engineers, he is a little extravagant in his criticism. As the hon. member said, this is an experiment. It is impossible to say it will not succeed. From my own point of view, according to what little study I have given to it, I believe that, from an engineering standpoint, it will thoroughly succeed; and I am not prepared to say, in view of the development of the trade of this country and the seaboard towns to the south of us, that the Chignecto Ship Railway may not, within the course of not very many years, prove to be advantageous far beyond the anticipations of even its advocates in this House. I know that, at the present time, a steamship corporation is being organized to run vessels between different points north and south and use the railway, and it is not impossible, in view of the development that has taken place in this country, that this railway may prove a paying concern. At all events, I will not take the responsibility, either of damning it with faint praise or offering it open opposition.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the railway be such as the hon. gentleman describes, it will be the greatest kindness to English investors to stop investments now. They had better lose $3,000,000 than five, six, or seven millions. But that is not entirely the point. We have already granted two or three extensions to this company; we have done all we could reasonably be called on to do, and I do not see that we can now be called on to do more either honestly or in good faith.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the effect of the resolution will be, in addition to extending the time, which, I must say, I cannot take very strong ground against, to remit the penalties already incurred and to provide that no penalties shall be incurred in the future, whether they build their railway in the time specified or not.

Mr. FOSTER. If the railway is not built by that time, the all-important penalty exists, that they get no subsidy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will have the same story over again.

Mr. FOSTER. It will be in our own hands then to decide.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The same argument which now induces Parliament to extend the time would impel it to continue extending it if the obstacles in the way show that it is reasonable the time should be extended. So far as the English investors are concerned they are not making such a very bad bargain of it. In the first place, the Act provides that so long as the railway is operated, after it is built, we are obliged to pay an annual subsidy of $170,000. If the railway is ready to carry a ship across, and even if a shipowner would not trust his ships across that railway, they can operate the road by carrying cars or scows or perhaps a schooner or two across, and there is no doubt that, under the wording of the Act, they will be able to operate the road sufficiently to obtain the subsidy. Whether this ship railway becomes a commercial benefit or not, or whether or not large numbers of ships take advantage of it, is a speculation for the future: but, as I have said, the road can be operated so as to earn the subsidy, and so far as the English investors are concerned they get from the people of Canada 3 per cent. interest for twenty years on the $6,000,000 which is the estimated cost of the road. The English investors are, therefore, not running a very great risk: the burden is going to fall upon the Canadian people, and the Canadian people are paying the money by the vote of this Parliament in support of, and to build up, a scheme in which I think my hon. friend was correct when he said he could not find a man in Canada who was prepared to take a dollar's worth of stock in it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. the Minister of Finance able to state who are the shareholders, or whether there are any of the shareholders in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the list of shareholders.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a piece of information which the hon. gentleman should present to the House when asking that this resolution should pass. He ought likewise to have the estimate of the Public Works Department as to the probable cost of building this ship railway. He ought to be provided with some reasonable details showing us how this concern is likely to work out. The Minister of Finance may be correct or he may not; he appears to be unwilling to commit himself in the slightest degree to assert that this will be a commercial success, and I think he is wise in doing so, for I doubt extremely that there is any chance of its being a success. Upon this question the hon. gentleman was quite silent. I think, however, we should have the two items of information which I ask for. We ought to know all about these shareholders when they are applying to this Parliament to be relieved from certain penalties.

Mr. WELSH. Before I vote for this resolution, which, as my hon. colleague (Mr. Davies) said, we cannot very well refuse, I would move that before this extension of time goes into force the company should deposit with the Government a list of the shareholders in that undertaking, so that the people of Canada will be able to judge who are the investors. I am very anxious to get this information. This ship railway has been frequently discussed in this Parliament and all the benefits which it is said we are going to derive from it have been laid before the House in glowing colours. We have been told that ships will be enabled to sail on dry land across this railway with their sails set, and all this sort of high-falutin stuff. I want to know who are the men engaged in this enterprise, because I understand that there is not a practical shipping man connected with it, and that it is promoted entirely by engineers and men of theory. I have grave doubts in my mind about the success of this ship railway, but I have no doubt that it will be a failure as far as any practical benefit to this country is concerned. I certainly believe that the list of shareholders should be deposited with the Government before this resolution goes into effect.

Mr. FRASER. I take it for granted that the Government must have in their possession a list of the shareholders, for I cannot conceive that they would pay so much money to any company without knowing who the shareholders are.

Mr. FOSTER. We have not paid anything yet.

Mr. FRASER. But the Government propose to pay the money, and they should have the names of the shareholders of the company before they submit such a proposition as this to the House. I wish to emphasize what the hon. member for Queen's has said. I am glad to know that none of the extracts which have been read have crossed the border, for, if the people of New Brunswick want this ship railway, I am glad to see that no statement has been made that the people of Nova Scotia want anything of it. As one of the members from the Province of Nova Scotia I wish to state that no man in that province feels like acknowledging that one dollar of this money to be expended for the ship railway is to be paid in the interest of Nova Scotia. In corroboration of what has been said by the senior member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—not senior in age, but in the date of his election—I wish to say that I have not found a shipbuilder or a shipowner in the Province of Nova Scotia, nor have I found any intelligent man there who is prepared to say that this ship railway is going to be a success. I do not think it is wrong to state this on the floor of Parliament. Surely a reference made here to the fact that there are men who do not believe that it is going to be a success ought not to prevent the men who are engaged in the enterprise from proceeding with it. If this statement did prevent them, then it would be proof positive at once that it never can be a success, and, consequently, we would be justified in saying now that we do not believe it will ever be a success. I might give the name of one of the best informed shipowners in Nova Scotia who made the statement to me that if every ship passing along that coast which might cross over that ship railway, did go across the railway, even then it would not pay. Every one knows that the ships will not take the risk or incur the expense of crossing, and that they would rather spend a day, or two, or three, or four days, or not more than six days at most in sailing round rather than run all the risk incurred in crossing on the railway. While I state this I cannot in any way conceive that the statement will interfere with the success of the railway if it can be a success; but my object is to state upon the floor of Parliament, as one member from Nova Scotia, that the people of our province do not hold themselves responsible for the expenditure of this money, nor do they believe it is in any way a grant to them. It would be infinitely better for the people of Nova Scotia if $3,000, or $4,000, or $5,000 were spent in different places all around the coast constructing and repairing harbours and places of refuge for the safety of our hardy fishermen, and to enable them to carry on their calling. It would be a thousand times better, if the money were expended in this way, rather than by sinking it in this ship railway. I presented a petition here the other day asking to have a comparatively small sum of money expended in the County of Guysborough, in a place where the hardy fishermen have no accommodation for their boats, but nothing was done in the matter, while millions will be spent on a ship railway which, I believe, will never be successful, and which will be a standing monument to the folly of those who promoted it. It would be far better for the people of that province if the money voted by Parliament were applied to assisting the fishermen to profitably pursue their trade, for we would receive an extra amount of revenue from the greater quantity of fish which they would catch, thus enabling them to contribute more largely to the revenue, while by investing money in this ship railway we are paying out money all the time and get no revenue in return. It should be the policy of every good Government that no money should be spent without bringing in some adequate return to the treasury, or without conferring some benefits upon the people at large.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend is some days behind the fair. It does seem to me, that there is a marked distinction between the criticism offered by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the criticism of my hon. friend who has just sat down. The hon. member for Queen's, while he criticized the object of this resolution, namely, the taking away of the penalty and the extension of time, yet knowing that the principle had been affirmed by Parliament, that a large sum of money had been invested in this venture, and that, as he said himself, it was at least entitled to be placed in the category of an experiment the outcome of which cannot be foretold—while he made this criticism, did not attempt to state to the House and to have his statement go abroad, to be taken up by any person who had an interest in it, the wide world over, that not a ship would sail over this railway, that it was bound to be a failure, and that it would be a monument of folly. My hon. friend who spoke last, to be consistent, should have moved, and moved at once, that Parliament do not keep faith with this company, that no extension of time be given, and that we shut down on the whole thing; but, if he does not intend to do that and be consistent, he has not taken the most desirable course in standing up and declaring that this undertaking can never be a success, that it must always be a monument of folly, and that not a ship will ever go over it.

Mr. FRASER. I did not say that. I said what was stated to me, that, if every passing ship took the risk of going over it, it would not pay. I did not say that no ship would go over it.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend would be quite consistent in taking the course he did, if he were prepared to say that we should break faith with the company; but as Parliament has pronounced on the policy and has made a promise to the company, and as the company has gone on relying upon that promise, what is the use, what is the practical benefit to Canada in hon. gentlemen saying that it will be an utter failure and a monument to the folly of Canada? It is impossible in these days of invention to say what may or what may not be a failure in the line of new carrying facilities. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down reminds me of a gentleman who lived in the province from which I come—he is not now living—and who predicted that the railway between St. John and Pointe du Chêne would be such a failure that it would not pay for the grease to oil the axles of the cars; and yet to-day there is no better paying piece of road in Canada. As I stated before, the ground of criticism taken by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) was entirely right; but I cannot see that he gave reasons which should in any respect justify hon. gentlemen in standing up in their representative positions in Parliament and declaring, forsooth, that what they have said is an experiment is certain not to succeed, and attempting to throw obstacles in the way of an enterprise which has already encountered sufficient obstacles. The engineers in charge of that undertaking are engineers of eminence, and they have faith in the carrying capacity of that railway, to take up ships and move them from one side of that neck of land to the other side, without strain or damage, and at a very low rate of cost. There are, of course, obstacles and difficulties; but are we justified in saying, they cannot be overcome? They have been overcome in other cases than this, and why should we say it is not possible that they can be overcome in this case? Once let it be demonstrated that ships can be taken up at Tidnish without strain, be carried over dry land and deposited in the water on the other side, and at a low cost, and I see no reason why we should not come to the conclusion that for the developing trade of Canada this may not become a travelled highway for vessels making ports south and north, enabling them to avoid travelling around Cape Breton or going through the Gut of Canso.

Mr. WELSH. My hon. friend is not a ship builder, that is certain, and I do not think he knows much about it. The marine slips, which take ships out of the water, are only perhaps 200 yards long, and yet a considerable number of the ships taken up by them get strained and damaged. In building a ship, the foreman has to keep the ship in shape while it is standing on the blocks; he has to go around those blocks every day and keep them shored up so that there will be as little strain on the ship as possible; and in launching there is not one ship in ten that is not strained before it reaches the water. And yet the hon. gentleman, a man of theory without any practical experience, tells me that this railway will take up these ships loaded, carry them over the land, and dump them into the water again without doing them any injury. When this Bill was first brought in, I proposed to put in a clause to make the company guarantee to pay any damages that might be done to ships carried by it; but Parliament refused to do so. The hon. Minister of Marine talked about the Baie Verte Canal. We know that this talk about that strip of land has been going on for twenty years. At the time that a commission was sent to enquire into the question of the Baie Verte Canal I was examined before that commission, as well as a number of masters of ships in the Imperial service; and that project was denounced, for this reason, that the navigation of the Bay of Fundy was not favourable to shipping. The hon. member for Guysborough is quite right in the view he takes, because if every ship which required to do so took a short cut by that railway, it would not pay expenses; but that is a matter we have nothing to do with. We are in this work, and we cannot honourably get out of it. If we could, I would move the six months' hoist, but we cannot, and it would be like taking an unfair advantage of this company if we threw out this Bill. The wrong has been done, if it is wrong, and we have to swallow it; but I know this, that if any company had the hold on us that we have on this company, we would have to pay for it pretty sweetly.

Mr. FOSTER. I forgot to state that there is no objection to bringing down the list of shareholders, and I will have that brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And you might bring also a statement of what we have spent.

Mr. FOSTER. We have spent nothing. We have no liability but the subsidy.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) I understand, does not object to an enlargement of the time, which he admits is almost inevitable; but in order to get rid of the weight of his judgment, which I know is considerable on naval matters, I would remind him that other people of very high reputation entertain a contrary opinion as to the safety with which vessels can be transported over land on railways of this kind; and I think the hon. gentleman should not be too set in his opinion, and should not hold the experience which he has gained in battling with the seas to entirely overweigh the experience of others who are equally sincere and who hold equally strong opinions on the other side. One of the most distinguished authorities on ship-building in the world is Sir E. J. Reed, the chief constructor of the British navy. He is a man on whose report the Parliament of Great Britain votes millions of dollars without a word, upon whose reports that Parliament alters its whole plan of naval construction. He is a gentleman whose opinion is accepted in the most unhesitating manner, and Sir Edmund J. Reed has given it as his opinion that ships, not only of one thousand tons but of five thousand tons, may be lifted out of the ocean, not 18 feet but 40 feet, and carried, not 17 miles, but across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, which I believe is 117 miles. Therefore, the junior member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh), when giving his opinion, should reflect that there are others equally sincere who hold equally strong opinions contrary to his.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to enter into any discussion of the technical question as to whether it is feasible to construct this railway in such fashion as to carry ships. That is entirely outside the question, but with all deference to the views expressed by the hon. gentleman opposite, I am not prepared, for my part, even indirectly to sanction the doctrine laid down by the Finance Minister, at least apparently laid down by him, that people who enter into a contract with this Government are to be relieved from the penalties we expressly declare should be inflicted upon them if they do not fulfil it within a given time, or that there is anything dishonourable in our refusing to implement a contract which these gentlemen are not prepared on their side to fulfil. If the case were reversed, I know well these people would exact the last farthing from us; and we have the right to exact, and it is not a breach of faith, in my judgment, to exact, when we see fit, the letter of the bargain in matters of this kind, more especially as we have already in this instance altered the terms and extended the time for the contractors' convenience. That is my opinion, and I do not want the impression to go abroad that the Commons of Canada are bound to allow people to alter the terms of their contracts at their own convenience.

Mr. WELSH. I compliment the hon. member for Cumberland on standing up in defence of this ship railway. It is a great benefit to his county, for I believe the whole three or four million dollars will be spent in that county. He has the right to stand up for it. It has brought in a good deal of capital to his county, and done it a good deal of good. But while my hon. friend brought forward the names of engineers high in authority in the Admiralty, while he mentioned as authority one of the head draughtsmen and surveyors of the Admiralty, Mr. Reed, who I have no doubt is quite competent, will he tell me why he could not name some competent man in the Dominion connected with shipping who would approve of it? He went to the British Navy and Admiralty to bring out an engineer and draughtsman and superintendent to prove that steel ships could be carried over this railway. Well, this is a Canadian undertaking. It is not proposed that we are going to carry steel ships over this railway, but the general run of vessels, small fishing vessels and wooden ships, and I would be glad to see some competent shipping man in the Dominion approving of this scheme.

Mr. HAZEN. I do not rise for the purpose of making any extended remarks concerning the merits or demerits of the ship railway across the Isthmus of Chignecto, but I cannot allow to go unchallenged the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) concerning the navigation of the Bay of Fundy. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that when he gave evidence before the commission, which was considering the advisability of constructing the canal which has since had its place taken by the ship railway, one of the reasons which he urged strongly against the construction of the canal was the dangerous character of the navigation of the Bay of Fundy. That statement has done service over and over again to the detriment of the trade of the port of St. John and the ports along the coast of the Bay of Fundy in every direction. So serious was the effect of such misrepresentation in different parts of the world that some few years ago the Board of Trade of St. John directed their attention to the matter, and published a pamphlet on the subject, which I fear the hon. gentleman has not had the pleasure of reading.

Mr. WELSH. Yes; I read it.

Mr. HAZEN. If he had, I feel satisfied he would not, from his place in this House, especially as he is a representative of one of the Maritime Provinces, make a statement so detrimental to the interests of another Maritime Province, in whose interests we, as members of the Maritime Provinces, ought to be bound together by one common feeling. That pamphlet clearly disproves the slanders circulated in the past about the Bay of Fundy. One might well say, on hearing the remarks of the hon. gentleman: "Save me from my friends," as the impression created by remarks such as he has made, scattered broadcast, not only throughout this country but all over the world where people are interested in shipping, has been to lead people to believe that the Bay of Fundy is almost impassable for navigation; that it is full of currents, against which no vessel can make headway, and that any vessel entering the bay is about to undertake a most perilous journey. Investigation has shown, however, that there are as few mishaps in the bay as in any other waters in any part of the world; that few wrecks occur there; that there are not a great many days of fog during the year, that it is eminently safe for navigation. Therefore, statements such as those made by the hon. gentleman, which have inured to the detriment of our shipping interests, are not warranted by the facts; and I am sure it will afford me great pleasure to send a copy of the pamphlet to the hon. gentleman, in order that he may no longer be under a misapprehension of the real facts of the case. With regard to the Chignecto Railway, I do not pretend to be a practical man in matters of that kind and to be able to give an opinion that would be of any value; but it must be borne in mind, as pointed out by the hon. Minister of Marine, that, a few years ago, a gentleman of great authority, one of the leaders of the Liberal party in New Brunswick, the Hon. Wm. Elder, a man who influenced more the public opinion of his province through his journal than any other man in it, was firmly convinced, not only of the practicability of the scheme, but also of the advantage which would accrue from the building of such railway, and he used his great ability to urge upon the Government and to arouse a sentiment in the country which would influence the Government to grant sufficient aid to enable the work to be carried to completion. Concerning the feasibility of the work, I am not a judge, but we have the opinion of the most eminent engineers that it is feasible; and if it be not then we can place no reliance upon the opinion of men eminent in their profession, and whose reputation is not limited by the boundaries of the country in which they live. Statements have been made in this House to the effect that the road cannot pay. Whether it can or not, only time will decide after the road is completed; but it must be remembered that never has a great enterprise been undertaken in this country, no matter what, against which similar prophecies have not been made. It must be borne in mind, as stated by the hon. Minister of Finance, that the leading Liberal politician of his time in New Brunswick, who occupied a portfolio in the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, said at the time of the construction of the road from St. John to Shediac, that it would never pay for the grease on the wheels, and he furthermore said it would pay the province better to hire two four-horse coaches and keep them constantly on the road for the carriage of passengers than to build that railway. Every man in the House knows that there is no line of railway in Canada over which there is a greater amount of traffic, or which pays better, than that portion of the Intercolonial Railway from St. John to Shediac. Then, when the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway was before the country, we had the statement made by a practical man that the whole wealth of the British Empire could not complete that railway within the time specified, and yet it was completed five years before that time. Consequently, in view of the present development of science and engineering skill, it is scarcely safe to make prophecies of this sort, such as the member for Guysborough has made, as the past has shown that they are, in many cases, all falsified by the facts.

Mr. WELSH. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) has referred to a pamphlet which was brought up by the people of that city to show that their harbour was fitted for a winter port.

Mr. HAZEN. It was as to the general character of the port of St. John.

Mr. WELSH. If the hon. gentleman has read that pamphlet, he will find that there is considerable fog there. I was one of a commission sent down to report on the feasibility of the Baie Verte Canal. While I was there, I saw an old gentleman who had been in the Imperial Navy. I asked him what he thought of the Bay of Fundy. He had been sailing as master of a ship for forty or fifty years, and he said the navigation of the Bay of Fundy was the most difficult he had ever encountered in his life. I asked him if there was much fog there, and he said it was the worst fog he ever got in the world, and I think the fog must have got over my hon. friend from St. John. I think he is befogged. I do not blame my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), because the money is going into his pocket or the pocket of his people, but I am sure that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) is befogged. They asked this old shipmaster——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the name of the Ancient Mariner?

Mr. WELSH. I have no objection to give his name. He was a strong man, but his name was not Samson. His name was Salmon—a fishy name, but a good name. He said: "I have been all over the world, and I never saw the fog so thick as in the Bay of Fundy; it was so thick that I could make a looking-glass of my hand by holding it up and looking at it." I hope my hon. friend from St. John will bring this pamphlet here, and then, if my statement is not correct, I will apologize.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not think the character of the Bay of Fundy comes into this discussion, and, if it does, I do not think it is becoming on the part of members from the Maritime Provinces to decry it. Ships have been coming into the Bay of Fundy during all the past, and they will come in in the future. I have never heard that the freights to the Bay of Fundy were higher than those going to the north shore. As to this ship railway I have no experience, but for many years the project of the Baie Verte Canal was a popular project in New Brunswick, and I believe that, when we went into Confederation, it was understood that we should have that canal as an offset to the large expenditures which had been made on canals in other parts of Canada. Of course, the Intercolonial Railway had not been built at that time, and therefore much of that traffic came down the north shore, and it was understood that the Baie Verte Canal would facilitate trade between the St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy. Under the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, a commission was appointed to investigate that matter, and one of the commissioners was Mr. Lawrence of St. John, who did not agree with the majority and produced a minority report which differed very much from that of the majority as to the cost of the canal. Now, the Intercolonial Railway has made that of much less importance than it was, and I hope that the number of ships coming into the Bay of Fundy will increase; and, when we open our ports to the world, as a free trade country, there will be no talk about fogs. The trade will increase, and then it may be that this enterprise will pay. However, I have very little faith in this enterprise. I do not load any ships and I never expect to, but I would be very much afraid to send any ships across that railway. We are appropriating something like $3,500,000 for that purpose, and that is a large subsidy to give to an enterprise like this, and at present, at least, it appears to be very extravagant when there are other undertakings which would be of so much more benefit. But what I want to know is why we should relieve the company from the penalties? If it was necessary at the inception of this enterprise to put the penalties in, why should we remove them now? That is what I cannot understand.

Mr. DICKEY. I want to lift that fog, if possible. I would remind the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh), that the people who have the most interest in the question of fog, in regard to navigation, are the insurance companies, and I should like to know why the insurance from the Bay of Fundy to Great Britain is one-quarter per cent. less than the insurance from ports south of Cape Tormentine to Great Britain?

Mr. WELSH. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what rate they charge from the Bay of Fundy to Great Britain, and I will tell him what rate they charge from the St. Lawrence to Great Britain.

Mr. DICKEY. At what season?

Mr. WELSH. Can you tell me?

Mr. DICKEY. At what season?

Mr. WELSH. Say now.

Mr. DICKEY. 2 per cent.

Mr. WELSH. What do they charge on a cargo of lumber or grain?

Mr. DICKEY. Less than 1 per cent, as I am informed.

Mr. WELSH. Then you do not know. I can give you the information. You have come to the right shop. You are wrong altogether.

Mr. BOWERS. As to the fog in the Bay of Fundy; as one who has traded between St. John and Westport for 15 years, I say there cannot be any place in the world with more fog than the Bay of Fundy. I have known the time when for two or three weeks you could scarce see the light of the sun. Any person living in St. John must know that there is no place with more fog than that city and harbour, and I cannot understand how anyone can say that there is no more fog there than elsewhere. If I ask for $1,000, or $3,000, or $5,000 for repairing breakwaters in Digby county, I am told there is no money, while here we find that $3,500,000 is to be expended in the next 20 years as a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Railway. Mr. Speaker, $170,000 each year for 20 years would build up all the breakwaters required in Nova Scotia, as well as all other parts of the Dominion, and would be productive of more good. I think if this money is to be spent, and I suppose it will have to be, I protest against Nova Scotia being charged for any part of it, and I hope the Government will take steps to see that the work is efficiently done as well as worked afterwards so that we shall not suffer for it.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I was very much surprised at the remark of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh), with regard to the statement which had just been made by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). I have had some experience in shipping myself, although, perhaps, not as much as my hon. friend opposite, but I am sure, and I think he must know, that the rates of freight from ports on the Bay of Fundy, and the rates of insurance, are quite as low as they are from ports on the north shore. He asked for rates at the present time. I have a statement from my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Burns), and it quite agrees with my own views on the subject, that the present rates of insurance from ports on the Bay of Fundy are about 10s. on steamers and about 17s. 6d. on sailing vessels; while from Miramichi and places on the north shore, they are about 2s. 6d. higher. I do not intend to discuss the merits of this ship railway scheme; I do not think it is the proper time to do so. I think what we have now to consider is the question of good faith between the Government and the company which has entered upon the construction of this work. I quite agree with the senior member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) that it would be a bad thing for this country not to give this extension of time. I cannot fully endorse what he stated with regard to the paying of this subsidy. If I read aright the Act granting the subsidy, the Government has taken special precautions with regard to the payment of this subsidy; it is only payable after the completion of the work; it is only payable annually after the work is in successful operation. This, as I understand it, throws the whole responsibility of the completion and successful operation of this great enterprise upon the company who are constructing the work. I think that is a strong reason why the request which is made by the company should be granted, and why the resolution which is moved by the Minister of Finance should be accepted by this House.

Mr. WELSH. I am not going to take a back seat, even if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine desires it. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is in the same position as my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey); they are neighbours alongside of the railway, it is going through their counties, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman makes a very nice pile out of this railway. So far as his rates of insurance are concerned, I will say this: that I do not agree with him. I did not hear all his remarks, but I can guess a large part of them, at any rate. He tells us that the rates of freight and insurance from ports in the Bay of Fundy are less than from places on the north shore. There are different ports in the Bay of Fundy, and he knows that the rates of freight at the head of the bay, where this railway dumps the vessels, are much higher than they are from the Baie Verte, from the other side, during the summer months. He knows very well that the rate of insurance is high enough, and the rates of freight are high enough. But I know that the rates of freight from St. John and the entrance of the Bay of Fundy are less. It is no use for the hon. gentleman to try to mislead the House by talking of the Bay of Fundy as one port. Let him name a port in the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I will name West Bay, or Parrsborough at the head of the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. WELSH. I know where Parrsborough is, but how far is Parrsborough from the point where this railway is going to dump ships into the water? Let him answer that. I know the Bay of Fundy, and I know the port of Tidnish as well as the hon. gentleman does, and I have sailed 150 sailing vessels there myself. I know what I am talking about, and I can get cargoes insured now for 12s. 6d. from Charlottetown to London. Can you quote a lower rate than that?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I can get them insured for 10s.

Mr. WELSH. You can put the half-a-crown into your pocket.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why this company is relieved of penalties? The Act, chapter 4, 51 Vic., section 2, provides for the payment by the company of certain penalties. I would ask the Minister why he amended the Act of 1888 in this regard?

Mr. FOSTER. I explained that, but my hon. friend did not, perhaps, hear it. The reasons I gave on the introduction of the resolution were reasons for the extension of the time and the taking away of the penalties, those that may have been incurred, and those which were to be incurred, by the clause of that Act. I gave the reasons in full to the House, and I will repeat them briefly. The first was the delay which was necessarily experienced in the beginning of the work, so that although their contract was dated in 1888, when the last Act was passed, they did not go to work until the latter part of that year, a certain period of time having necessarily to be expended in getting out advertisements and having the investigations made by the different persons who were tendering, and having the tenders accepted, so that nothing was done until the latter part of that year. Then came an unprecedentedly wet season which, in that part of the country, where the land is flat and swampy, militated very strongly against the prosecution of the work. Then it turned out that they had to dig some 24 feet deeper in laying the foundations of the dock in order to reach the solid rock, than they first estimated for. Then there was the extreme difficulty of getting labour, the Cape Breton and the Annapolis Railway works going on at the same time called labour off in those two directions, and even though they gave a bonus for labourers, they found it very difficult to obtain them. All these difficulties were in addition to those which have taken place in the great money markets of the world, and which have rendered it difficult for this corporation, as for a great many others, to raise the money necessary for the prosecution of their work.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move in amendment: That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—

> The conduct and language of Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner of Canada in England, in interfering in the recent elections and in imputing treasonable and disloyal motives to a large proportion of the people of this Dominion, and also in assailing and vilifying the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and in reflecting upon the position of the said company, is a breach of the duties of the office which he fills, and is calculated to destroy the efficiency of the said office, and to injure the credit of the Dominion, besides damaging a very important corporation whose shareholders have invested large sums of money in the work of extending and promoting the railway system of Canada.

This is a new Parliament and this is the first session, and though I expect party lines to be drawn, even sharply drawn, and I do not at all object to that, still I submit to the judgment of the majority that there are questions upon which all minds, if they listen only to the voice of reason and set aside party prejudices, must of necessity come to the same conclusion. I submit that the question which I now propose to the House is one of these questions. The office of High Commissioner is one of very great importance. It is not new in the history of politics. Before the American Republic, all the provinces, not all perhaps, but the most important provinces among the American colonies, were represented by commissioners at the Court of St. James; and it is within recollection that one of the leading men of his day in England, Mr. Burke, long represented the Province of New York. The services which he rendered were of great importance. The office of High Commissioner is practically one which is in the full sense of the word a diplomatic office. The High Commissioner is the ambassador at the Court of St. James. He has to discharge all those functions which would be discharged by an ambassador were we an independent nation instead of a colony. In fact, the only difference which I see in the office of High Commissioner and the office of ambassador is simply this: that, whereas the ambassador of a nation is the channel of communication between his country and the Government to which he is accredited, in all our official relations, His Excellency the Governor General is the channel of communication ; but, apart from that, all the duties, all the responsibilities which are discharged by and which appertain to the office of ambassador are also discharged by and appertain to the office of High Commissioner. Now, I submit this proposition to the judgment of every member of this House, whether sitting on this side or on the other side, and it is a proposition, I venture to say, which will not be denied by any, not even challenged by any member of this House : that such an office is eminently non political, and the incumbent of the office should be as much removed from the arena of party politics as you are, Mr. Speaker, when you occupy the Chair. Of course, we know very well, that if a man accepts an office, whether the office of Speaker of this House, or that of High Commissioner, or any other office, it is not expected that he will at once divest himself of his own opinions, of his feelings, of his convictions, nor even of his prejudices ; but it is expected of him that so long as he discharges the duties of the office, so long as he receives a salary from the Canadian people, he will be removed from the arena of practical politics, and that if he steps down from the high altitude of his office to come down into the arena of practical politics, I submit to the judgment of this House, and above all to the majority in this House, that that functionary is committing a breach of the duties attaching to his office. I am sorry to have to make the reproach that Sir Charles Tupper, in my opinion, and I submit it to the judgment of the House, has been recreant to the duties of his office. He has not shown himself to be above party politics ; on the contrary, he has shown himself—I am justified in using the expression—a shameless partisan of the present Government. One of the duties of Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner is not only to be the channel of communication for the Government of Canada, but it is also his duty to look after the interests of all Her Majesty's subjects who reside in Canada and who have a temporary habitation in England. If a poor sailor, for instance, were to be charged in England with an offence which brought him before a court of justice, if he happened to be penniless, which is often the case, it would be the duty of the High Commissioner to come to his assistance and secure him a fair trial ; and we know very well the High Commissioner has so acted, and we know from the High Commissioner's report that he has felt bound to assist Canadians who required assistance in London. But while Sir Charles Tupper expended the great sum of $25 in assisting poor Canadians in London, he at the same time was doing his very best with persistent malice—I use the word malice advisedly—to do the utmost injury in his power to a great corporation, and to thousands of Her Majesty's subjects. At this moment Sir Charles Tupper is doing his best in London, and is never losing an occasion, to do injury to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, because, forsooth, the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway chose not to be the humble servants of the Government during the last election. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company had assumed the attitude maintained by the Canadian Pacific Railway, not a word of condemnation would have been said ; but because the Grand Trunk, for reasons of their own, whether wise or unwise, chose to adopt an attitude different to that adopted by the Canadian Pacific Railway, they are assailed in every possible way by the High Commissioner of Canada with all the authority attaching to his name and his position, and every effort is made on his part to do them as much harm as possible. It is useless for me to say that the Grand Trunk Railway Company were quite within their rights when they took the stand they adopted, and even if they had been wrong, even if the course they took did not serve the best interests of the company, it does not lie in the mouth of the High Commissioner of Canada to cast blame on them, but it is a question which can be treated on the floor of Parliament by members of Parliament. Again, I maintain it is a question that is not in any way connected with the position or duties of the High Commissioner, so long as he occupies the present position towards the people of Canada. He is not only agent of the Government of Canada, but he is the agent of the people of Canada, and he is bound by his office to do anything he can to help the people of Canada and Her Majesty's Canadian subjects. But I submit it is a breach of duty on his part when he uses the slightest particle of his influence in order to injure his fellow-subjects, however they may happen to come under his displeasure. What is most remarkable is, that Sir Charles Tupper is displaying malice—I use the word again—towards that railway company, not once or twice, but persistently, that he is attacking the company again and again. He has attacked them in speeches in this country and in England, in the daily press and even in reviews ; and I notice that the day before yesterday, at a banquet tendered to him, he displayed, in my opinion at least, singular want of tact, discretion and judgment, by taking occasion to repeat the remarks with which he had previously attacked the Grand Trunk Railway Company. That is not all. On these facts alone I submit Sir Charles Tupper cannot receive the approbation of the people of Canada. If hon. gentlemen opposite are ready to admit that it is within the power and the duty of the High Commissioner of Canada to step down from his office and attack his fellow-subjects, well, let us hear it so stated on the floor of this House. Is the Government of Canada prepared to say that they endorse the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper, and do they proclaim him right in acting as he did ? Perhaps they will say that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is wrong. I am not discussing that question : all I assert is, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have a right to their opinion, and I further assert that it is a breach of duty on the part of the High Commissioner to attack his fellow-subjects simply because they differ from him in politics. But there is more than this. Sir Charles Tupper stooped from his position to come down and take part in the late election, and I say this was also another breach of the duties with which he is entrusted. Having referred to Sir Charles Tupper descending from his position to take part in the elections, I would be warranted in calling the attention of the House to the language which he used towards the leader of the Liberal party when he charged him with treason. I make no charge upon this ground whatever. For my part, when charged with treason, either by the Prime Minister or by the High Commissioner, or by anybody else, I never was troubled by any such charge, because I claim that my loyalty is above any such reproach. I claim that I am as faithful a subject of the British Crown as the First Minister or the High Commissioner or any member of the Conservative party. It is not for that reason that I attack the High Commissioner upon the present occasion, but I say that the mere fact, the fact alone, that he came down from his position to take part in the election is a conduct which deserves the highest censure of this House. You, gentlemen, talk of loyalty every day, but I appeal to you on the score of British institutions and British precedents: do you believe, or does anyone believe that if any one of the ambassadors of England at foreign courts —Lord Lytton or Lord Dufferin for instance—were to come down from their mission to take part in an election in Great Britain; do you suppose that the people of Great Britain would for one instant tolerate such conduct? The ambassador who would do that would be compelled on the following day to step down and out from his office, and then he would be at liberty to take any part he chose in an election. But, Sir, it would be a disgrace to the diplomatic service of Great Britain if one of the ambassadors of Great Britain were to do the thing which has been done by Sir Charles Tupper in the late election. I appeal, therefore, to the majority; that they will not sanction such a course as that; I appeal to them, if they are loyal to the British Crown, to be loyal also to British institutions, to British precedents and to British practice. It is not enough to proclaim one's loyalty; it ought to be shown in one's conduct; and I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that each one of the members of this House, whatever vote he may give upon this motion here, would, if he were a member of the British Parliament, vote to condemn such conduct as that which Sir Charles Tupper has been guilty of. That measure of justice which would be given on such an occasion I now ask to be given on this occasion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. the leader of the Opposition, in making this proposition to us has declared in terms of great solemnity that he has a profound reverence for British precedents. He has taken occasion to couple that protestation, in the most solemn form, with a declaration of his personal loyalty which he occasionally makes in very earnest tones to this House, but which I shall by no means accuse him of displaying at times for political purposes and then hiding under a bushel, as he imputed not very long ago to members on this side of the House. I shall take the liberty of assuming that the hon. gentleman is not only sincere in his declaration of his personal loyalty, but that he likewise has a reverence for British precedents, and I will ask him before the vote is taken upon this question to point out a precedent in British legislation or in Colonial legislation in which a member of the House rose and moved that a public servant be censured for language which has not been proved against him, and the utterance of which is most distinctly denied upon the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman invites this House to come to the conclusion that the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper is discreditable in imputing treasonable conduct and treasonable designs to a large portion of the people of this country. I assert here that Sir Charles Tupper has not done anything of the kind, either in connection with the recent election or upon any other occasion. I have stood upon the platform with Sir Charles Tupper during the recent election contests. I have read most of the speeches which he delivered in this country during that period, and, so far from imputing treasonable motives to the people of this country or to the Liberal party of this country, Sir Charles Tupper's declaration everywhere, with regard to that question, was that the whole sentiment of this country is loyal to the core; and one proof that he has cited of this is the large number of Liberals who have been returned to this House at the recent general elections, not one of whom could have come here if he had not distinctly avowed his loyalty to British institutions, his desire to uphold these institutions, and his disavowal of the disloyal designs which some of the followers of the Liberal party had attributed to them. Sir Charles Tupper, in one place after another, has shown, that, while certain persons had put themselves forward to promote the welfare and the designs of the Liberal party in this country, but really to subvert the institutions of this country—he has declared over and over again, that, before the Liberal party could venture to go to the polls, they were compelled to disavow all connection and all sympathy with any such designs or with individuals who were promoting these designs. Therefore, far from attributing disloyal sentiments to the great body of the people of this country or to the great minority who follow the fortunes of the Liberal party, he has proudly declared that that disavowal took place in every province of the country, and that if it had not been for that the Liberal party would have been annihilated in the recent elections. In the face of that statement made by himself again and again, this House is asked to come to the conclusion that Sir Charles Tupper has declared that a great body of the people are disloyal to British institutions. Although the hon. leader of the Opposition has not thought proper to give us any notice of the motion which he has made to-day, I am in a position, from my knowledge of Sir Charles Tupper's language, both before and after the elections, to deny most positively that he has attributed treasonable sentiments or treasonable designs to any great body of the people of this country. If the hon. leader of the Opposition had consulted the British precedents which he so much reveres, it would not have been necessary that I should put any denial of this kind on record. If he had followed those precedents or had shown the slightest regard for fair-play he would at least have laid on the Table of this House the evidence of the language he proposes to condemn. Now, Sir, it is perfectly true that the High Commissioner holds a very high and important position in respect to this country; he is one of our great public functionaries; but conceding all that, I deny the hon. gentleman's proposition that he holds any such a position as a foreign ambassador occupies. A foreign ambassador must necessarily keep himself, to a great extent, free from party politics; he must avoid anything that would impair the relations between himself and the court to which he is sent; because he is the medium of communication between the Government which sends him and the Government to which he is sent. The High Commissioner in our service occupies no such position. He is nothing but the agent of this Government living in London. His Excellency the Governor General is the medium of communication between this Government and Her Majesty's Government, and no other can be had; but when representations from this Government are to be pressed on the members of the Imperial Cabinet, it is desirable that we should avail ourselves of the services of an agent, living there, acquainted with the affairs of this country, and competent, as a man of Sir Charles Tupper's experience and abilities is, to aid in carrying forward the public business of this country. He does not occupy, either at home or abroad, such a position as an ambassador in the diplomatic service of the British Government holds. But if he did, while it might be in bad taste for him to engage in a political struggle in his own country, the hon. gentleman knows as well as I know that a British ambassador does not leave his political preferences behind him when he goes into the diplomatic service. It is necessary that our High Commissioner, like an ambassador—and in this the parallel holds—should be the confidential agent of the Government he serves, should be in sympathy with its policy, should strive to carry out that policy, should be the depository of its secrets: and for this very reason the officer, to be competent and efficient, must necessarily have his political sympathies and be in very close alliance with the Government he serves. Sir Charles Tupper, occupying as I have said the position of a public officer not in the diplomatic service, not only is the agent of the Government in the city of London, but has been for many years a statesman of great eminence and great influence in this country. Sir Charles Tupper, when, rightly or wrongly, the invitation was extended to him by the Premier to come to Canada and take part in the recent elections, felt that the interests of this country were at stake in those elections. He has not hesitated to say that himself; and I think the hon. leader of the Opposition is somewhat mistaken in the choice of his expression when he declares that Sir Charles Tupper "stooped" to take part in those elections. Considering that the fate of this country was at stake, considering that the trade relations of this country were being discussed and fought over, and that the issues with regard to those trade relations were perhaps the most important ever submitted to any of the British North American Provinces, I do not think that anybody who had regard for this country and a hope for its welfare, could fairly be said to have stooped in order to take part in that contest. I do not think the hon. gentleman himself stooped very low when he took part in those elections, convinced as he was that the trade policy he advocated was the best for his country. I do not think that Sir Charles Tupper is so high in the position he occupies as the agent of this Government in London that he stooped when, feeling that the welfare of his country was at stake, he came before the people he had served for nearly a quarter of a century as a Minister of the Crown, sharing in its most important struggles, and connected with every phase of its interests in the past. If Sir Charles Tupper mistook his position in that regard, the hon. leader of the Opposition has the distinct avowal of the First Minister that Sir Charles came by his invitation, and in making that announcement the other night, Sir John Macdonald took the responsibility of his action in that respect. Therefore, if anybody is censurable for that action, the censure should be moved against us and not against the High Commissioner. The hon. gentleman must know, when he speaks of the charge of disloyalty, that it was no unfair comment on the trade policy which hon. gentlemen opposite put forward, to say that the success of that policy would undermine the relations between this country and Great Britain: but if the hon. gentleman differs from me in that particular, if he thinks such an allusion to the disloyalty of some engaged in the campaign of unrestricted reciprocity, and the disloyal tendency of that policy, I have to remind him that the leader under whom he served with so much distinction for many years, declared his belief, before polling day was over, that that policy would totally undermine the relations between this country and Great Britain. Now, Sir, returning for a moment and referring to the hon. gentleman's extraordinary course in asking us to pronounce a censure upon an officer for language which has not been proved before this House and which is incapable of proof, what language of Sir Charles Tupper has the hon. gentleman in his mind? Why, he has not even stated what the language of Sir Charles Tupper which he objects to was? Has he quoted a line or a sentence from any report of Sir Charles Tupper's known speeches to indicate that there is a particle of foundation for that resolution? No, Sir: but without doing so, the hon. gentleman not only asks us to vote for a resolution censuring Sir Charles Tupper, but imputes again and again to that gentleman, not only wrong and injurious language, but malice as the motive on which it is founded. Are we, in the absence of a single declaration of the language the hon. gentleman objects to, to take expressions which have been made use of in the proceedings of this House as being the foundation of this motion? I am not at liberty, by the rules of the House, to refer to a past debate: but are we to consider the misrepresentations that have been made by some members of the Liberal party, that Sir Charles Tupper, at a banquet two nights ago in the city of London, used injurious language against the Grand Trunk Railway Company? Is that the foundation of this resolution? Where is the report of it? Where has the hon. gentleman seen such a statement? I ask him to answer me now. No telegraphic report on which the slightest reliance can be placed has yet reached this country, to show that Sir Charles Tupper has made use of such language. Yet, in the opinion of the leader of the Opposition, this House should be ready to come to a resolution that Sir Charles Tupper should be censured for something he said at the banquet two nights ago in the city of London, and which the hon. mover of the resolution is not able to quote. Are we to found this resolution upon an impression which prevails in the minds of some hon. gentlemen opposite that Sir Charles Tupper called them "ruined gamesters?" I am aware that some members of the Opposition have a feeling of resentment against him, through the impression that he had used some such observation with regard to them, and I suppose this resolution is to be founded upon that; but the House will not be surprised when I say that he made use of no such language with regard to them. If I am wrong, by all means let the hon. gentlemen in the front row opposite, who, I suppose, entertain that suspicion, quote his language, unless we are to depend indeed upon any loose telegraphic report, sent perhaps by a partisan or published in a partisan newspaper. The report of the speech or letter, or whatever it was, has, by this time, reached this Dominion, and let us have the words. Instead of Sir Charles Tupper using such language with reference to the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite, and who, it was said, had sat opposite to him in political life for many years, they will find he applied no such observation to them, but to some whose methods and whose conduct in public affairs —outside of this House altogether these men are— these hon. gentlemen, if they expressed their own honest sentiments, would not hesitate to characterize by language no less strong. Are we to found a vote of censure on the statement that Sir Charles Tupper tried to bribe, and bully, and coerce the Grand Trunk Railway Company into supporting the Government during the recent elections, and then denounced them and endeavoured to injure their stock and enterprise because they refused to comply? I can tell this House that not only is there no record to prove this, but that there is no foundation for such statement of suspicion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for South Oxford who has just said "hear, hear," knows perfectly well that Sir Charles Tupper's statement as to the actual interview has been put before the public, and surely that ought to be here, surely it ought to be quoted and refuted, surely the evidence by which it is to be refuted should be weighed in this House before this House is asked to pass judgment. The hon. gentleman knows, as a good many behind him know, that what Sir Charles Tupper did ask the Grand Trunk management was simply this: that in the election contest which was going on, however their interests might lie, they might leave their employés—the men who were earning their bread in Canada, and who were as capable at least of forming a judgment on public questions as Sir Henry Tyler was—to vote as they pleased in the interests of their country and according to their consciences. He asked further that the Grand Trunk should come out in a public declaration and say their men were free to vote as they pleased. That was the only request he made, but it is the one which is sometimes characterized as an attempt to bribe and bully the Grand Trunk Railway. I shall not undertake to show what the conduct of the Grand Trunk Railway in the election campaign was. It is not necessary I should do so. The hon. gentleman has not invited the judgment of this House upon that conduct, he says, but there are impressions abroad that the Grand Trunk Railway not only refused to give the announcement that its men were free to vote as they pleased but adopted a line of conduct in a very different direction indeed. The hon. gentleman has said that if the Grand Trunk Railway had pursued a different course it would have been open to very grave censure. He has said that if it had pursued the course which the Canadian Pacific pursued, Sir Charles Tupper would have fondled them with a very kind caress; but if the Grand Trunk Company had pursued the course which it was asked to pursue by Sir Charles Tupper, let me ask: Would the Opposition have espoused its cause as it has in this resolution in response to any attack which might have been made? What objection can the hon. gentleman have had to a great corporation like that declaring that its public servants were perfectly free to do as they pleased? There was no request even that the facts should be, if they were facts, concealed from the employés; there was no request that the prejudices or sympathies or judgments of their masters, in favour of one party or the other, should be concealed; there was but the simple request: Leave your men free; let them act as Canadians and not as slaves. Is what we are asked to declare by this resolution, that Sir Charles Tupper has attacked the Grand Trunk Railway Company, that he has sought with malice, as the hon. gentleman has said, to injure that company and its shareholders, to injure those people in this country who are interested in that enterprise, true? I ask again, Sir, where the evidence is, that he did anything of the kind? I deny the charge most positively. What Sir Charles Tupper has done has not been against the interests of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway or the people in this country who are interested in that enterprise; what he has done has been to criticize in strong terms the management of the Grand Trunk Railway in dragging the interests of thousands and tens of thousands of shareholders in the old country and here into a political campaign, and risking their fortunes in the result. The probability is that the leader of the Opposition will, before very long, find that he has not the thanks of the people whom he professes to be so desirous to save from the criticisms of Sir Charles Tupper. The shareholders who are well able to look after their own interests, the people who realize to-day that those interests were very seriously jeopardized by the energies of a great corporation in this country being thrown into a political compaign, and its fortunes made to turn on the result, will not feel indebted to the hon. gentleman for the course he has taken. Just a word or two more as to the position which Sir Charles Tupper occupied during the elections. There is no doubt that any public functionary, be he as high a functionary as Sir Charles Tupper is, or much inferior in rank, takes, when he goes into a political contest, his fortune and his political life in his hand. When he enters the political field, his fortunes must depend on those of the party with whom he connects himself, and their fate he must share. Sir Charles Tupper was perfectly conscious of that when he accepted the invitation of the First Minister to come to this country, during the elections; and if the decision of the people had been other than it was, he would have accepted his fate, and hon. gentlemen opposite, if they had assumed office, would have found his resignation awaiting them. He understood that risk perfectly, and he took it; but the decision of the people on the question of the propriety of Sir Charles Tupper's action, and on every other question which was put before them on the 5th March last, was distinctly in favour of the course the Government had pursued, and Sir Charles Tupper had pursued. While that is so, this House, which directly represents the people, which has come from the people within a few months, is asked to censure Sir Charles and to reverse the popular decision. I do not intend to detain the House any longer, but I invite its attention again to the fact that, appealing as the hon. gentleman has done, to British precedents, to British justice and to British fair-play, he thinks it consistent to condemn Sir Charles Tupper upon statements which are not proved, and upon statements which, as many members of this House know, are absolutely untrue. The statements I have quoted, and which, perhaps, the hon. gentleman had in his mind when he spoke, though he did not put them forward, show that the language which Sir Charles Tupper used as to treasonable inclinations, treasonable motives or treasonable designs, were not used with reference to the whole Liberal party or to any considerable portion of our people; and gentlemen who have looked at the record of these statements must come to the conclusion that the assertions which were put forward in the press and elsewhere with regard to Sir Charles Tupper having made use of statements of that kind were calumnious to him, and unjust to the Government he served. I am sure that the House will not adopt any such resolution as this, unless the hon. gentleman can give some evidence of the statements on which he asks us decide.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SUPPLY—THE HIGH COMMISSIONER

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have much doubt whether, if the hon. the High Commissioner had been present in the flesh to-night, he would have felt any exuberant delight or any special gratitude to his hon. friend the Minister of Justice for the peculiar line of defence that hon. gentleman saw fit to adopt on his behalf. I am far from saying that, under all the circumstances, the Minister of Justice, whom I freely admit to be an able lawyer, did not take the best course for his client, but at the same time I must say that the line of defence in itself was a rather curious one. The hon. the Minister of Justice adopted in the first place the plea of non mi ricordo, of which we have heard a good deal in other quarters lately. The hon. gentleman tells us he was not aware that his discreet friend, the High Commissioner, had used any language which would justify the comments of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier). I think, if the Minister of Justice had read, as he said he had, most of the speeches delivered by the High Commissioner during his recent extended tour in Canada, the hon. gentleman would have recognized the fact that, having recourse to a very old and well-worn style of argument, having no case himself, he saw fit to indulge in very nearly unlimited abuse of his opponents. Why, Sir, his whole plan of campaign, and that of a good many of his friends, was nothing else but one continuous screech of treason, supported by a most contemptible theft of a letter from a printing office, obtained by a man whom I have reason to believe had been previously acting as a spy in the Mail office, who, being discovered and turned out of that office, then occupied the honourable position of a thief in the establishment of Messrs. Hunter & Rose; and I have been told—and if that is incorrect let the hon. gentlemen repudiate it here—that, as a reward of merit, that man was subsequently employed by the Government of Canada in some office. The hon. gentleman has nothing to say on that point. Well, Sir, I call the attention of the House to this fact: My hon. friend's indictment of the High Commissioner had three counts. First of all, he accused him of interference in our elections while a paid servant of the people of Canada, occupying a very high position in the Civil Service, being in fact a sort of diplomatist or ambassador. In the next place he accused him of using unjustifiable language to a very large portion of the people of Canada, and of using unjustifiable language and indulging in threats toward the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Justice wanted proof, legal proof, of all these things, and looking at the line he adopted it seemed that he would have required legal proof of Sir Charles Tupper's having come over to Canada and interfered in our elections, if it had not been for the circumstance that the First Minister admitted on the floor of the House a few nights ago that Sir Charles Tupper came at his instance. Well, Sir, I dare say the hon. gentleman is right in demanding that there should be full proof, and I shall presently call the attention of the House to certain statements which appear to me to go as far as can be reasonably desired in supplying exact and literal proof of every statement contained in the resolution in your hands, and of every statement made in the speech addressed to the House by my hon. friend. But I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact: By taking the line that the hon. gentleman did, by declaring that he required proof, legal proof, of these accusations, the hon. gentleman impliedly admitted that if that legal proof were forthcoming, he for one was not disposed to defend the conduct of the High Commissioner. Sir, if that be his meaning, and that is the obvious inference to be drawn from his words, I say it does the Minister of Justice great credit; and I for my part fully believe that at any rate that in their heart of hearts, whatever political exigencies may compel them to say, or however political exigencies may compel them to vote to-night, not only the Minister of Justice but many of his colleagues, not only many of his colleagues but many of his supporters, utterly and entirely disapprove of and repudiate the excessively indiscreet conduct and action of the High Commissioner, at any rate as regards the language which he used to the whole Opposition in Canada, and more particularly the language he saw fit to use to the Grand Trunk Railway. Sir, I say it is creditable to the hon. gentleman's common sense if this be so. For with what pretence of fairness or reason could those hon. gentlemen defend that language, many of whom owe their seats to the direct intervention of another very powerful railway corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which not only transferred a vast number of votes from one part of Canada to the other, but brought in whole hosts and armies, I might say, of men who had departed from this country, but who returned—I won't say for what consideration—to cast one last vote in behalf of their Conservative friends at the last election. Now, the hon. gentleman wants legal proof, he wants evidence that Sir Charles Tupper charged the party of which my hon. friend is the leader, with treasonable and disloyal motives during the last campaign; and he wants proof, also, that Sir Charles Tupper used indiscreet language, used improper language, used language which no man in his position should ever have permitted himself to use, toward the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. By the kindness of a friend I have been favoured with a copy of the Amherst Gazette, which declares that on declaration day "Sir Charles Tupper was at his post," that "he made a ringing speech," that "he unmasked an ingrate railway company." Now, I will give the hon. gentleman, from an organ of his own, a few samples—I am not going to inflict the whole of this article upon him, although it would be worth while—I will give him a few samples which, I think, will show him that Sir Charles Tupper was guilty of what my hon. friend stated, and that he attributed disloyal and treasonable motives to the party of whom we are the representatives in Parliament to-day. Here is one sentence:

"There are two great parties in Canada, one loyal to its own, the mother country, the other ready to hand over our country to aliens, and to turn its back on Great Britain."

Mr. SPROULE. That is quite true.

Mr. BOWELL. Quite true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So the hon. gentleman opposite, the man who of all others is the organ of a party most directly opposed to the whole policy of the Empire, who is the defender of a policy which discriminates against British goods, a policy which has reduced the import of goods from Great Britain into Canada by many millions, a policy under which to-day not one single article in general consumption by the people of Canada, produced in or manufactured by Great Britain, is admitted free, that is the gentleman who ventures to endorse the slanderous and calumnious statement made by Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. BOWELL. True as Gospel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, Sir, if the hon. gentleman, or any other man, on the floor of this House dares to impugn the loyalty of any man on this side, I say that the statement is a slander and a calumny. More than that, if they dare to bring forward a charge, I, here to-night, give them the challenge—let them come forward, let them state their charge, let them ask for a committee of this House, if they dare, to prove their charges; and, Sir, if any man makes the charge and is afraid to ask for a committee, afraid to prove it, then, besides branding the charge as a slander and a calumny, I shall brand the man who makes it as a coward. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the mild and delicate language in which the High Commissioner, after paying his attention to the Liberal party of Canada, thought fit to deal with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He goes on to say:

"When the election came on, notwithstanding all we have done for this company."

What have they done for this company? Why, they have granted, on pretence that it was for the public good in the highest degree, certain sums of money, not belonging to them, but belonging to the whole people of Canada, Reformer and Conservative indiscriminately; they have granted this, as they allege, for the public good of the country. However, he says:

"The Company issued a circular commanding its thousands of employés to vote against the Government."

Which statement, Sir, was denied emphatically by Mr. Seargeant, General Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and unless better evidence than that of Sir Charles Tupper is brought forward, I say that statement is wholly untrue.

"He never could have believed that a company of English shareholders could have been induced to use such great power and influence to strike down British institutions in this country. There are these differences between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway."

There is a difference he did not mention, but which influenced that great man's mind a good deal. The Grand Trunk Railway opposed and the Canadian Pacific Railway supported him and his friends. But he goes on to state:

"We lent the Grand Trunk Railway an enormous sum, and they never paid back a dollar. We lent the Canadian Pacific Railway thirty millions and every dollar was repaid before it was due."

How? We took of our own lands six million or seven million acres back and $10,000,000 out of the $30,000,000 subsidy were repaid in that way, and those six or seven million acres we subsequently re-granted to railways controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is not paying back every dollar before it was due, by taking back lands which are of no use, which we cannot sell, which, according to the Minister of Interior, are at the present moment a dead loss to us. Going on, he said:

"By the wasteful extravagance"——

Mark the courteous language of this eminent official towards a company which has expended $150,000,000 of English capital in this country, for which it receives an exceedingly ill reward—

—"jobbery and mismanagement of the Grand Trunk, millions upon millions have been lost. It was ruinous to its shareholders and many widows and others lost all they possessed. This was most damaging to Canada and led English people to pronounce it an awful country. On the other hand nothing had so raised Canada in the view of English capitalists as the Canadian Pacific Railway, for every man who invested gets a return. The Grand Trunk also since the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been ruining its own shareholders in its vain attempt to obstruct that line and going into wild purchases of lines to embarrass it. Now you find Laurier, Wiman, Farrer and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, these craven creatures who have been representing us as people whose life could be crushed out of us by the United States, leading and abetting a party which turns its back on England; and Sir Henry Tyler, a member of the British House of Commons, using the money of his shareholders, not in building up the country where its interests lie, but in bringing upon it dire calamities. Our Government was very forgiving and forbearing, but, in his opinion, it would carefully guard against giving increased power and influence to a corporation which shows such base ingratitude and is ready to spring at our throats when it sees the opportunity."

I submit, with all respect to the Minister of Justice, that I have given them already in that speech most ample proof of the perfect correctness of the statements made by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and most ample warrant for the motion placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker. But the gentleman was not content with that. The gentleman must needs to do what Job desired his enemies to do, not exactly write a book, but write an article in a magazine. This article which appeared, I may tell the Minister of Justice, in the May number of the North American Review, is signed "Charles Tupper," and I presume the hon. Minister will accept that as sufficient legal evidence, or must I have witnesses to prove the Charles Tupper herein mentioned is the identical Sir Charles Tupper at present High Commissioner in London or plenipotentiary to Vienna, I do not know which. He goes on to make a statement which I will presently characterize somewhat as it deserves:

"The manner in which Mr. Wiman gloats over the McKinley Bill as a great object-lesson to aid in the 'capture of Canada' leaves no room to doubt that this measure, so far as it affects Canada, was prompted by Mr. Wiman and his associates, Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Farrer."

I must say in the mildest manner to every hon. gentleman opposite that that statement is a deliberate and unmitigated falsehood; I repeat, a deliberate and unmitigated falsehood. I never held any communication whatever with Mr. McKinley. I never suggested one line in his tariff. I knew nothing as to what Mr. McKinley was going to introduce, and if hon. members opposite dare to make a statement on the floor of this House that I had anything to do with the introduction of the McKinley Tariff Bill, I do not doubt that within the short time a letter can reach Mr. McKinley, wherever he may happen to be, that falsehood will be branded and gibbeted as it deserves. I notice that other parties followed his example, and the Minister of Justice himself was not ashamed to give utterance in a State document to the same statement. He did not accuse me personally, and I need not, therefore, reply to him on that score: but he makes the statement in a despatch sent to the Home Government, under date of Dec. 14th: "It is the avowed object of the McKinley Bill to teach Canadians that they cannot avail themselves of the markets of the United States while they continue their allegiance as British subjects," a statement of which I should thank him to give proof, if he possesses any.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is a quotation from James G. Blaine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let the hon. gentleman produce his quotation, if he has it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman has greatly misrepresented, or greatly misunderstood Mr. Blaine, and until I see the statement over Mr. Blaine's handwriting I entirely decline to accept his assertion that Mr. Blaine was so indiscreet as to make any such statement.

Mr. TUPPER. Allow me to quote the statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where from?

Mr. TUPPER. From the New Brunswick press.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. TUPPER. I presume hon. gentlemen will not attack the veracity of the New Brunswick press. The hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated that a letter to Mr. McKinley would reach him in a very short time. I challenge him to obtain a letter from Mr. Blaine, saying he did not so speak. Mr. Blaine, speaking in Calais, Maine, in 1888, said:

"Beyond the frontier, across the river, our neighbours chose another Government, another allegiance. They are subjects of Queen Victoria; they are loyal to Her Majesty. They live under a foreign flag. They do exactly as they have a right to do. I neither dispute their right nor envy their situation. It is their right to choose for themselves, as it is our right to choose for ourselves. But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes, and enjoying the actual cash remuneration of American markets. They cannot have both at the same time. If they come to us they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, who have no part or lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign to us; it is an absolute wrong for Congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have. So far as I can help it, I do not mean that they shall be Canadians and Americans at the same time."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the kind of miserable quibble under which, mark you, Mr. Speaker, these men dare to put in a State paper—a statement that "the McKinley Act was avowed to be designed to teach Canadians that they could not avail themselves of the markets of the United States." I say, Sir, that Mr. Blaine is known to have been opposed to the McKinley Tariff Bill; he is known to have been opposed from the first to its introduction, and to have predicted the ruin of the Republican party from the time it was passed. These gentlemen opposite bring a letter or a speech made three or four years ago by Mr. Blaine to prove that Mr. Blaine avowed the object of the McKinley Tariff Bill, which was not so much as thought of for several years after, to be to teach Canadians that they could not avail themselves of the markets of the United States. Well, Sir, if that is what the Minister of Justice calls legal evidence, the less we have of it in this discussion the better. And mark you, Sir, that was not enough; these hon. gentlemen go on to say this:

"The subject is also to be viewed to some extent in connection with the question of the Confederation of the Provinces. The union which was effected, in accordance with the strong desire of Her Majesty's Government in 1867, has always been viewed with unfriendly feelings by a large portion of the people in the United States."

I would like to have proof of that. Is there any letter, or any speech of Mr. Blaine, or even the report of any interview with him to prove the truth of that most improper and unfortunate statement? or, is the Minister of Justice and his friends desirous of heaping up another car-load of dirt to be swallowed by them on the 12th October next, when they resume their interrupted interview at Washington? Now, Sir, the Minister of Justice went on—and I think the hon. gentleman's better sense will teach him that he was very indiscreet, at least, in doing so—he went on to justify the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper, the paid servant of Canada, the High Commissioner of Canada, in coming over here for the purpose of interfering in elections. I cannot believe that, on mature reflection, the Minister of Justice will declare that it is expedient for one of the chief officers of the Civil Service to set an example to others of the Civil Service to interfere in elections. As for his plea that Sir Charles Tupper took his life in his hands, and that he interfered at his own risk, the same would be equally true, no doubt, of the whole mass of civil servants if they choose to do the same thing. Does the hon. gentleman who affects, or pretends to affect, a sincere admiration for British institutions, desire to pave the way for the introduction of the spoils system here? Does he desire that at every change of Government, every civil servant not in accord with the party in power should lose his office, because there is not the slightest doubt that such example as was set by Sir Charles Tupper and other instances of that kind would tend most powerfully to bring about that innovation, which he, I think, as well as myself, would sincerely deplore to see made the rule of Government in Canada. The hon. gentleman, like a good many other gentlemen on the opposite side, cannot forbear, when discussing the conduct of Sir Charles Tupper, to call attention to the fact that in a recent letter of Mr. Edward Blake that gentleman had used words which I believe he subsequently disavowed—used words which were construed into the meaning that he regarded annexation as the result of the policy of reciprocity. The hon. gentlemen are very fond of quoting Mr. Blake, but if they want to quote Mr. Blake's letter I will give them a passage or two which they would do well to mark, read, digest, and inwardly understand. Mr. Edward Blake says:

"The Canadian Conservative policy has failed to accomplish the predictions of its promoters.

"Its real tendency has been, as foretold twelve years ago, towards disintegration and annexation, instead of consolidation and the maintenance of that British connection of which they claim to be the special guardians. It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration and a North-West empty still; with enormous additions to our public debt and yearly charge, an extravagant system of expenditure, and an unjust and expensive tariff: with restricted markets for our needs, whether to buy or to sell, and all the host of evils (greatly intensified by our special conditions) thence arising; with trade diverted from its natural into forced and therefore less profitable channels, and with unfriendly relations and frowning tariff walls, even more and more estranging us from the mighty English-speaking nation to the south, our neighbours and relations, with whom we ought to be, as it was promised we should be, living in generous amity and liberal intercourse. Worse, far worse. It has left us with lowered standards of public virtue and death-like apathy in public opinion; with racial, religious and provincial animosities rather inflamed than soothed; with a subservient Parliament, an autocratic executive, debauched constituencies and corrupted and corrupting classes; with lessened self-reliance and increased dependence on the public chest and on legislative aids, and possessed withal by a boastful jingo spirit far enough removed from true manliness, loudly proclaiming unreal conditions and exaggerated sentiments, while actual facts and genuine opinions are suppressed. It has left us with our hands tied, our future compromised, and in such a plight that, whether we stand or move, we must run some risks which else we might have either declined or encountered with greater promise of success."

Now, Sir, if the hon. gentlemen opposite want to quote Mr. Blake I advise them to quote the whole of his letter and they will see that Mr. Blake's statement is this and nothing else: that the conduct of the Conservative party has been so scandalously corrupt, so extravagant, so disintegrating and demoralizing, that he fears in sheer despair that they have brought the country to such a pass that there is nothing for it but annexation. That is what Mr. Blake said. I cannot say that I myself hold the same view, but I have not the slightest hesitation in endorsing him in the assertion that a very few years more of such scandalous corruption, of such scandalous misgovernment, and of such cases as those which a committee of this House is now investigating, would, in all probability, bring about the results he deplores. Now, Sir, for myself I may say frankly that I do not care one potato paring for any statement that Sir Charles Tupper may make about me here or elsewhere. It is a pretty considerable number of years since, standing in this place, I took occasion to state to that gentleman across the floor that whenever Sir Charles Tupper made any statement on his own authority, from that time out I desired that it should be understood that unless I expressly admitted it to be true I was to be taken as contradicting it. As to Sir Charles Tupper's whole conduct in this matter I say that from first to last it has been intolerable and indecent. He was the paid servant of the people of Canada, he was bound by his office not to make any interference in our campaigns or elections; but whether that be so or not it was his clear and bounden duty to abstain from calumniating the majority of at least several of the most important Provinces in Canada. It was Sir Charles Tupper's clear and plain duty to abstain from vilifying and attacking the Grand Trunk Railway Company, a corporation whose shareholders have invested so many hundreds of millions of dollars in promoting the best interests of Canada and who, as every man knows right well, have received a most meagre and imperfect return for all they have done for us. I do not want to go over all the early circumstances connected with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but I can tell the House, that even up to a very recent date, the fact that a very large amount of English capital has been brought into this country on the faith of representations signed by three members of the then Canadian Cabinet and colleagues of our present First Minister, and that those representations have been utterly falsified by the event, has had an extremely mischievous influence, an extremely injurious effect on Canadian credit. And, Sir, I cannot forbear to express my individual opinion that if there were unhappily many widows and orphans reduced to penury by the Grand Trunk, it was very largely due to the unfortunate representations which were made by certain members of the old Government of Canada. Now, Sir, what was the crime of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? Why were they such monstrous craven creatures? Why was it stated that millions and millions of capital had been wasted in extravagance, jobbery and corruption? Why, Sir, their crime was this: that when Sir Charles Tupper went to Montreal and demanded of Mr. Seargeant that the Grand Trunk Company should assist the present Canadian Government, Mr. Seargeant told him frankly and fairly that he was not prepared to render him any assistance at all. That crime was treason; that crime, according to Sir Charles Tupper, involved the destruction of British institutions and turning your back on the mother country. Well, Sir, if the Grand Trunk Company committed this crime, I have to tell the Government that they held the same opinion as was held by at least a majority of the people of Ontario, as the public records show; that they held the same opinion as was held by a decisive majority of the people of Quebec, as the public records likewise show, and by a decisive majority of the people of Prince Edward Island, as hon. gentlemen know right well, even though the tight and gallant little Island was tempted by the promise of the construction of a tunnel which the hon. gentleman's own colleague has declared in the other House would cost not less than $20,000,000. And, Sir, by whom were these gentlemen charged with treason? Why, they were charged by the identical gentleman who, as soon as he could possibly obtain an interview with the United States authorities, showed himself prepared to grovel at their feet, if only they would give him any sort of hope or encouragement that they would treat on any condition. Now, Sir, I am disposed to deal a little more leniently with Sir Charles Tupper than I otherwise would have done, in view of one consideration, which I mentioned some years ago. After sitting in Parliament for many years with that hon. gentleman, I came to the conclusion that, although a man of great energy and considerable capacity in certain directions, the hon. gentleman was one of those unhappily constituted persons who are mentally colour-blind, and who, if they were paid for it, could not distinguish right from wrong or truth from falsehood; and entertaining that opinion, I have not felt disposed since then to be quite so hard on his little eccentricities as I otherwise would have been. But while, as regards the man, he is more a subject of pity than of blame, viewing the matter in a philosophical light, we have to consider the effect which is likely to be produced in England and in other countries by reason of his language. Now, Sir, I am not going to take extracts, though there are many of them, from journals which might be supposed to be in any wise affected by the Grand Trunk Railway Company; but I would like to read to the House a couple of short extracts from one of the most eminent journals in England, one which more than any other sways the financial destinies of England, and which is likely to have very great weight, indeed, on the minds of English capitalists. I would call the attention of the House to the words in which the Economist of London sees fit to speak of Sir Charles Tupper's actions and language. In its issue of 14th March, it says:

"After accusing the Grand Trunk of attempting virtually to transfer Canada to the United States, Sir Charles Tupper then declared, according to Reuter, that 'the extravagance, corruption and jobbery of the Grand Trunk management, by which millions had been lost by British investors, was the worst blow Canada had ever received, while the investment of millions in the wild and reckless purchase of railways to obstruct and head off the Canadian Pacific had ruined the Grand Trunk shareholders.' He also added that: 'while the Government were of a forgiving disposition, they would fail in their duty to Canada if they gave increased power and importance to the corporation which had shown base ingratitude by springing at the throat of, and attempting to strangle, the young Dominion.' These utterances suffer from the defect of being a trifle eloquent; but, nevertheless, in this instance, their extraordinary character is scarcely diminished on that account."

Then it goes on to say that to the Canadian Pacific:

"The Grand Trunk has, in fact, shown great hostility and no doubt much destructive competition has thus arisen, which might have been avoided by a more conciliatory policy. So much of truth there is in Sir Charles Tupper's assertion; but this obviously does nothing to justify his charge of 'corruption and jobbery,' from which he says, British investors have lost millions. A grave charge of that kind ought not to be made unless it can be fully substantiated, and obviously the matter cannot be permitted to rest where Sir Charles Tupper has left it. If for political purposes he has recklessly made charges which he cannot support, he has acted most shamefully. On the other hand, if there has been such malversation and wholesale peculation as he alleges, why has he done nothing until now to warn or protect the investors for whom he professes so much concern? The Government which for years he has represented here have from the first been closely associated with the Grand Trunk Company. The railway is indeed in a sense a national undertaking, and if his colleagues in the Administration have knowingly permitted the shareholders to be defrauded to the extent of millions, they have been grossly neglectful of their duty. And still more blameworthy will they be if now, having broken silence, they take refuge in indefinite allegations instead of specifying and bringing home to the parties implicated the frauds they allege to have been perpetrated."

That was written, Sir, on the 14th of March. Sir Charles Tupper appears to have accepted the challenge. He appears to have inflicted column after column on the readers of the Times, if they had patience to look over his lucubrations, in the attempt, not to substantiate but to explain away a very considerable portion of the charges which he first brought; and I call the attention of those hon. gentlemen to the way in which six weeks later, after Sir Charles Tupper's charges and Sir Henry Tyler's reply had been fully before the English public, the Economist deals with him:

"We now have a long statement by Sir Charles Tupper in reply to Sir Henry Tyler's speech at the half yearly meeting of the Grand Trunk Company, and it would be difficult to conceive of anything more inconclusive and unsatisfactory."

That is the opinion of one of the highest financial authorities in England as to the figure the High Commissioner has made of himself in his recent duel with Sir Henry Tyler—

"The greater part of it is taken up with the question of how far the Grand Trunk influence was used against the Government in the recent elections. On this point we may be sure of one thing at least: that if it had been employed in the service of the present Government we should have heard nothing of the charges which Sir Charles Tupper has recently brought against the company."

Now, Sir, my point is this: You have heard from a high authority how our Commissioner's charges are regarded. And the hon. Minister of Finance will know that the Government of Canada does not escape quite scatheless in this direction. Now, it is quite possible—I dare say the hon. Minister, if he likes, could say more about it—within a very short time we may require to appear in the English money market as borrowers. It is quite possible that we will have to contract a new loan or two within a very short time, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks he will find his task made easier by the conduct of the High Commissioner? Does he believe that he is likely, by enlisting against him or by having his High Commissioner enlist against him, the opinion of the Grand Trunk Railway, which is a potent influence in Canadian affairs, which has many thousands of shareholders scattered all over England, to add materially to his prospects in floating a loan, if these gentlemen were to ask him (the Finance Minister of Canada): Are we to believe your High Commissioner, are we to believe that one great party in Canada which practically controls three important Provinces—the two most important Provinces in this Dominion; are we to believe that they are, as Sir Charles Tupper has represented them, disloyal to the core, annexationists in disguise, led by men, as he said in Toronto, who were preaching unveiled treason? Are we to suppose he is right in saying that the Liberal party are, to all intents and purposes—because that and nothing else is the meaning to be drawn from Sir Charles Tupper's Amherst speech—practically advocating annexation? I say if there were no other reason, the fact that the High Commissioner was alleged to be sent to England for the purpose of promoting our financial interests, for the purpose of aiding us in contracting loans on good terms, that alone would be a sufficient justification for all my hon. friend has said in condemnation of his conduct in the motion before you now. I believe, and will still believe until I have evidence to the contrary, that there are men on the other side of the House to be found who will express their regret, before this debate closes, at the language Sir Charles Tupper has thought fit to use not merely to his political opponents but to a corporation, which has done so much and suffered so much for the purpose of promoting the interests of the people of Canada as the Grand Trunk Railway has done.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. If, as the hon. member for South Oxford says, Sir Charles Tupper has no reason to be thankful to the hon. the Minister of Justice for defending him, the Grand Trunk Railway has less reason to thank the hon. member for South Oxford for entering into its defence this evening. The hon. gentleman, in espousing the cause of that company, said it opposed the Government of the day because the Canadian Pacific Railway was supporting it. He then proceeded to refer to the fall in Canadian securities and to the possibility of our having to go on the money market to secure a loan. I ask the hon. gentleman if Sir Charles Tupper's correspondence has not been published in all the leading papers, and whether, despite that fact, there has been any greater fall in Canadian securities to-day than those of any other country? On the contrary, our securities stand higher than those of any sister colony. The hon. gentleman is not giving fair-play to his own country when he states that because Sir Charles Tupper defended himself against the grossest kind of attack, our securities are bound to fall when we endeavour to raise a loan. I will not refer to loans the hon. member for South Oxford made when he was Finance Minister or to the loans which this Government has made since he left office. He has stated that Sir Charles Tupper had no right to come to Canada. To be sure the leader of the Government asked him to come, and does not the hon. member for South Oxford remember that while Sir Charles Tupper was performing his duties as High Commissioner, the hon. gentleman made speeches attacking him in his absence, and that Sir Charles Tupper challenged the hon. gentleman to meet him but he did not accept the challenge? As the hon. gentleman has quoted from various documents, it is only due to the man who is three thousand miles away, to give his reasons why he came to Canada. He came to Canada, it is true, to fight the party battle, but in that battle were involved very great interests for our country. The hon. member for South Oxford never lets pass any opportunity of which he can avail himself, to attack the High Commissioner in his absence. If the hon. gentleman desires the High Commissioner to occupy a non-partisan position, he should exercise some kind of judicial fairness and not attack him behind his back, as he has done to-night and in a manner he would never do to his face. The hon. gentleman says Sir Charles Tupper came to Canada simply at the beck of his party. Sir, Sir Charles Tupper, at the time of Confederation, fought for the interests of Canada, which he believed to be then at stake, although he was the only man in his Province who was elected in favour of the Union. And from that day to this, Sir Charles Tupper has struggled to advance the interests of his country, and has been able to defeat his detractors, as the hon. gentleman knows well to his cost. The hon. gentleman has asked us to prove that he ever said a word against the interests of Canada. Why, we are in a position to prove it out of his own mouth. When the Government brought down a resolution to give one hundred millions of acres of land to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. gentleman then decried his country and kept up his opposition to that great enterprise until the last spike in the road was driven. Lest the hon. gentleman's memory has become treacherous, I will call his attention to the remarks he made in this House as late as the 14th March, 1888:

"There is danger lest Canada, so far as regards our native born population, should sink into a mere residuum, a country from which the best and most intelligent of our people are fleeing, not by hundreds or by thousands but by millions. Then as to foreign immigrants, if these statistics can be relied upon, it is clear that we are at the same time becoming a mere dumping ground for the refuse of those whom we import into this country. It is quite clear that we are not growing up towards the light, and I hold it to be a very miserable symptom of our political growth, that there should exist here this craving to hang on to our mother's apron strings."

I can quote further.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Sir, in May, 1884, at Toronto, when the Canadian Pacific was fighting for its life, he said:

"If you want to find a true parallel to our Government in Canada, you will not find it in a country having free institutions outside of Canada. You must search for it in some such state of things as existed in France in the days known as the Second Empire, which began with the massacre of December and wound up with the capitulation of Sedan."

And yet the hon. gentleman professes to believe thoroughly in the institutions of this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Go on. That is a very good speech. You had better read it all.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am not questioning the hon. gentleman's eloquence or the hon. gentleman's ability, but I would like to see his eloquence and his ability concentrated upon fighting the battles of his own country. We have heard Sir Charles Tupper denounced to-night, and it has been said that he has done nothing for Canada. I ask if he has not conferred a lasting benefit on Canada in one matter which has been referred to, by which he saved a million and-a-half of dollars a year to the farmers of Canada, representing now over $10,500,000, when preventing the scheduling of our cattle. The hon. member for South Oxford has referred to the Hoar Committee at Washington. I think he ought to have placed his party in a proper position in regard to that matter. He has said that Mr. Farrer was betrayed by a political spy, but he has not denounced him for his actions in Washington. Spy or no spy, it is the exposed documents we have to deal with, and I will refer to the time when Mr. Farrer came first to the front in this question, and find an opinion of the Toronto Globe with regard to a man who is now the editor of that paper, and has been placed there by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his friends.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Read what the Mail said about you.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am discussing national affairs, no man or no newspaper ever charged me with betraying my country. The Globe, in an article of the 7th January, 1890, had the following with these headings :—

"STARTLING.

"THE HOAR COMMITTEE LOADED UP THE OTHER WAY—THE MAIL'S EDITOR AT WORK.

"False Representations as to the Feeling in Canada.

"Surely the Canadians who have conspired to prevent an early and honourable settlement between Canada and her principal neighbour are traitors to the Dominion. That they have slandered this people by representing them as craving annexation is a minor count in the indictment."

Again, on 9th January, 1890 :

"A Canadian paper capable of spreading in Washington (through its emissary Farrer) the lie that Canadians are on the point of seeking annexation, and of spreading this lie in order to defend a scheme that it publicly declares for the benefit of the country, such a paper is, we say, utterly given over to duplicity and wholly unworthy of credence. They are either afflicted with a monomania of treachery, or maintained by a ring of conspirators bent on bringing Canada to sore trouble, in order to effect her annexation to the Republic."

This gentleman is now at the head of a great Liberal newspaper, and since then it has been admitted that he endeavoured to cripple and hamper Canadians. What could do more damage than this advice to parties in the United States ? Let me quote one sentence :

"The imposition by the United States of a tonnage tax on all Nova Scotia vessels laden whole or in part with fish would speedily put an end to seizures, and indeed to the whole controversy. Another way of bringing the Government and all concerned to their senses would be to suspend the bonding privilege, or cut the connection of the Canadian Pacific with the United States territory at Sault Ste. Marie. Either of these methods would rouse the full force of western Canada influence against the Government. It would be better still to oblige Britain to withdraw her countenance and support from the Canadians as she did in 1871. That would secure the end desired without leaving the United States open to the charge of being animated by hatred of Canada, on which Sir John Macdonald trades. It is plain that Sir John Macdonald's disappearance from the stage is to be the signal for a move towards annexation."

Mr. Wiman has been referred to. Let us see what he has to say in connection with this matter. I wish to show the House that Sir Charles Tupper was thoroughly conversant with everything that went on, and particularly in reference to this Hoar Committee in Washington. On the 30th December, 1889, Mr. Wiman gave his evidence as follows :—

"The first step that Canada will take, or the first indication she will make, of a desire for closer relations with the United States will be at the general elections, within eighteen months. If the question is squarely put before the people at that time for trade relations, and they say 'yes,' as the majority probably will, that would be an indication to this country of a desire for closer relations. I do not know whether you are aware of it, but there is a tremendous religious feud going on in Canada between the French Roman Catholics and the Protestant Canadians. That has produced a growth of sentiment in Canada in favour of annexation ; but it has had the opposite effect in this country, because attention has been drawn to the growth of the French race, and their possible influence if they were admitted to the Union."

Questions were asked :

"Do you not think that with our influences and policies we would be more likely to absorb and master that element, to revolutionize that people, and make them a part of ourselves, than the contrary ?

"Mr. Wiman :—Yes, if we can make them our customers, and trade with them and all that—we can afford to let the question of annexation and of future alliance take care of itself."

And in reply to other questions Mr. Wiman summed up his opinions in these words :

"We want to do something in our life-time. You can do that by making some arrangement that will win them rather than force them. You can encourage the Liberal party who have made that a plank in their platform."

The chairman asked :

"Are you an American citizen? Answer: I am a Canadian subject of Her Majesty. I should say in explanation of that, as the question is so pointedly put, that I did not take upon me the privileges, advantages, responsibility and glories of American citizenship, because, by doing so, I should lessen my influence in my native country."

And yet, Sir, this was the gentleman who was eulogized, defended and caressed by the Liberals of Canada. I will now quote something from Mr. Wiman's own pen, written two weeks prior to the general election of 5th March, Mr. Erastus Wiman issued a manifesto to the New York Sunday Herald, in which the following occurs :—

"Unrestricted reciprocity is now regarded by the Liberal party in Canada as the only practical trade arrangement which can be made between the two countries. Under a policy of unrestricted reciprocity the custom houses would be continued along the border line, but there would be a free admission into both countries of the products and manufactured goods of each. This, of course, requires that the tariff of Canada must never be lower than the tariff of the United States, though it may be placed just as much higher as the Canadians find necessary.

"When it seeks to regulate the commerce of the continent and adversely affect the interests of vast classes of Canadians, then he who is truly loyal to his own country and his own people is at liberty to be disloyal to a nation three thousand miles away and who has no interest to serve except a material interest common to both.

"Unrestricted reciprocity requires also that foreign goods, including those from Great Britain, shall have a duty exacted upon them by Canada, while on goods exchanged between Canada and the United States there would be no duty whatever. This, of course, would imply that Canada should discriminate against imports from British ports."

I have pointed out the fact that these gentlemen were in active communication with Mr. Wiman, and that Sir Charles Tupper, who represented Canada in Great Britain in a semi-ambassadorial position came here to fight the battles of the country. The hon. gentleman mentioned the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the name of Mr. Reeves. Mr. Reeves has said :

"'It is true that we carried between 150 and 200 Canucks to Canada a day or two before the election. We also carried several hundred from various points on the line in Indiana and Michigan. They went to Canada for the purpose of voting a Liberal ticket. I am not ashamed of it. I am an annexationist, and have been for 26 years. I wish we had been able to muster thousands more. As it was we could not muster enough, for the election went against us, and Mr. Reeves smiled sadly.

"Did you furnish the men with free transportation ?—No, we were paid for it. We are not running a gift enterprise.

"Did any one furnish them with free transportation ?—I could not say as to that. I know that I did not furnish them with transportation. Of course I tried to induce as many to go as possible. I see, now, however, that I made a mistake in not working harder. I ought to have organized bureaus and induced every Canuck in the Western States to have gone home and voted against Macdonald and Van Horne."

There is the evidence of one of the Grand Trunk employés that they were quite active in trying to defeat this Government. I am no enemy of the Trunk, but I am a believer in fair-play. The hon. gentleman has charged Sir Charles Tupper with coming to Canada at the beck of his party. Has he read his speech at Windsor? If not, in all fairness to Sir Charles Tupper, some portion of that speech should be placed upon record. I quote the following:—

"Now, I understand that Sir Richard was addressing the electors of this fine city a few days ago and he expressed some surprise that I should come here. Well, I think that he ought to have expressed no surprise. When I was 3,000 or 4,000 miles away Sir Richard Cartwright had the good taste to make me and what I said and did the staple material of his address to the public all over the country. If there were no other reason why I should come here to-night than for the purpose of answering briefly two of the charges made by Sir Richard Cartwright against me, I would be justified in being here. Now, in the first place, he has attacked my veracity. He has said that I have made two very exaggerated statements. He has said: 'I was present when the same accurate and most veracious person (Sir Charles Tupper) declared that before 1888 we would be exporting 640,000,000 bushels of wheat from Manitoba, and was even good enough to cipher out how many cars it would require to carry it.' Now, I think you will agree with me that Sir Richard Cartwright, when he is dealing with an absent man, ought not to make a gross misstatement as to what he has said. I hold in my hand the speech in which I referred to that matter, and you will find that it is just as much unlike what Sir Richard Cartwright said as light is unlike darkness. (Laughter and applause.)

"I was endeavouring to draw the attention of the House of Commons on the 5th February, 1884, to the great capabilities—the great agricultural capabilities—of the North-West of Canada, and here is what I said:

"'But let me just ask the attention of the House for a single moment to a few figures, which will indicate what the capabilities of that country are in regard to the production of wheat. One hundred thousand farmers, each farmer cultivating 320 acres of wheat land—has any hon. member made the calculation of what they would produce?

"'Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

"'Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so. I am glad his attention has been drawn to the fact that 100,000 farmers cultivating 320 acres each, or 200,000 farmers cultivating half that quantity each, and taking the product at only 20 bushels to the acre, instead of 27 or 30 bushels, which is the average in the North-West in favourable years, would give 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50 per cent. more wheat than the whole United States produces to-day. You have only to look at those figures for a single moment to see what the future of Canada may be, to see what a magnificent granary for the world is placed in our Canadian North-West: and when you remember we have six belts running through that fertile country that would each give 320 acres to 100,000 farmers; you can understand to some little degree what a magnificent future awaits us in the development of that great country.'

"Now, I ask this intelligent audience to contrast the statement that I made on the floor of the House of Commons of Canada with the statement that Sir Richard Cartwright says I made, and which the Globe of Saturday last reiterates upon what I think you will say is a very unworthy foundation for the repetition of such a statement. (Applause.) But Sir Richard Cartwright brings a more grave charge against me than that, and he attached so much importance to that charge that he published it in pamphlet form, and I have it in my hand. In a speech delivered by Sir Richard Cartwright in Ingersoll on 14th November, 1889, when I was on the other side of the water, he said:

"'Two years or so ago Sir Charles Tupper, being desirous for certain personal and political reasons (partly connected with the wholesale scheme of bribery by which he secured certain constituencies in Nova Scotia in the very throes of the last general elections) of inducing the House to build a certain line of railway, deliberately assured the House with the utmost emphasis, and particularly that by building a bare 80 or 83 miles they would shorten the distance from a large part of Nova Scotia to the rest of Canada by from 40 to 45 miles for every pound of freight and every passenger going from one place to the other.

"I will hand this statement to the reporters who are present, in order to enable them to take down accurately this charge which Sir Richard Cartwright makes against me. One would say that it was plain enough and emphatic enough, but it goes on:

"'On this solemn and distinct assurance the road was undertaken. It is now nearly completed, and on the vote being brought up in Supply it was ascertained after a long and full discussion, and was admitted by Sir John A. Macdonald himself, that so far from the construction of this 83 miles having shortened the transit from 40 to 45 miles, the utmost that could be gained (and even that was stoutly disputed) was barely 7 miles. And that the country was to spend not less than $1,500,000, and probably fully $2,000,000 for a road, the construction of which had been secured by this gross and most deliberate misrepresentation on the part of Sir Charles Tupper.'

"'Now, Sir, if Sir Richard Cartwright is anxious to indict a man for those statements by which I was led to believe that a saving of from 39 to 40 miles would be made by the construction of the road from New Glasgow to Amherst, I can furnish him with the name. I was not interested in that road or in the promotion of it more than anyone in this audience before me, and if Sir Richard Cartwright wants to indict the man who was he will have to indict his friend, and that man and that friend was Mr. Erastus Wiman. (Loud applause.) If he wants to indict the man who was the author of the statement, I give him the name and the evidence. I hold in my hand the petition of Mr. Blackman, the president of the Great European Short Line Railway, who came to the Government of Canada with a petition asking for aid to construct the road, and the statement made in that petition was that the construction of a line of 77 miles would mean the saving which I have referred to. That paper is the original paper now on file in the Department of Railways and Canals in Canada. That was in 1882. I did not go into the question with as much care as I otherwise would have done, believing that Mr. Blackman and Dr. Green, the president of the Great Union Telegraph Company of the United States, who were promoting this company, and Mr. Wiman, before undertaking the building of a line of railway, would have ascertained what was to be accomplished by it. Their statements were accepted by me, but I put the paper in the hands of Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, Chief Engineer of Government railways in Canada, who reported that what Dr. Green and Mr. Blackman had set forth in regard to the distance to be saved would, he also thought, be saved. Here is what was said:

"'The scheme appears very attractive, and the road would undoubtedly draw a large ocean traffic.'

"It was to form a great line of communication to the heart of Canada; it would also secure to the Dominion the control of the highway between the two continents, contribute to the development of her resources and the promotion of her prosperity. It spoke of the distance to be built from New Glasgow to Amherst, and said it would be 77 miles. Now, these were the statements that Mr. Wiman and his friends made. I have given you the report of the Government engineer, bearing out what Mr. Wiman had said, and upon that Parliament was asked for a vote of money and gave a subsidy. I do not say that Mr. Wiman and his friends were not acting under the belief that the statements which they made were accurate, but if Sir Richard Cartwright wants to indict a man who had a personal interest in the road I tell him that Mr. Wiman was a large stockholder in that road. I give him the name, and I can produce the prospectus published by the company, of which Mr. Wiman was a member, which contains the statement as to the saving that would be made. I hope that Sir Richard Cartwright will feel that no personal considerations will prevent him from doing and going forward with the indictment against Mr. Erastus Wiman for having misled the Government of Canada. (Applause.) If any person here should have the slightest doubt of this I can only say that I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Erastus Wiman, in which he states that he had a large interest in the company, and begs me to give the best assistance I could. (Applause.)

"Having discussed these two personal matters, I think you will agree with me that it would benefit the character, the standing and the ability of a man like Sir Richard Cartwright if he would not attack a man when 4,000 miles away from where he is speaking, if he would not attack a man who is not in political life, and who has to discharge the duties of an independent office in England; if he would not attack such a man with such gross and unfounded calumny and aspersion. (Loud applause.) If there were no other reason for my being here, it should be sufficient that he had ventured to attack me in my absence, and having done so, his course has perfectly justified me in repudiating such slanderous and unfounded language. (Loud applause.) I do not charge Mr. Wiman with intentional misrepresentation. He, no doubt, had accepted somebody else's statement, and had been misled in that way; but I must say that Sir Richard Cartwright ought to be very careful how he assails the reputation of a public man because he made a mistake. You know that Mr. Wiman has taken the position of being the counsellor and guide of the great Liberal party in Canada. (Laughter.)"

Sir Charles Tupper was perfectly willing to discuss matters with the member for South Oxford, but, failing to do that, he put his views on record. He takes the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, and, clause by clause, proves that the hon. gentleman misrepresented him. He proves that he was maligned by the hon. member for South Oxford, and he says that he came back to the country where for thirty-six years he had been a representative man, to reply to the ex-Minister of Finance and to refute the charges that he had made against him. Was there any wrong in that? Was there any crime in that? The hon. gentleman came here to fight his battles, just as the member for South Oxford fights his battles, and to-night he defames Sir Charles Tupper on the floor of the House, and reads parts of extracts, leaving out the context, for the purpose of endeavouring to convict him of wrong-doing. The hon. gentleman says that the Grand Trunk Railway was abused. I cannot see where the Grand Trunk Railway was abused. Sir Charles Tupper has given his reasons for what he stated in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway, and those very reasons are given in letters that appeared in the London Times. His fight was with Sir Henry Tyler for inspiring the action of the Grand Trunk. In the first place, what does Sir Charles Tupper say in regard to the attempt to bribe the Grand Trunk Railway, the attempt to force the Grand Trunk Railway to support the Government? Has that ever been denied? Sir Charles Tupper has publicly denied the allegation, and no one has proved it. He says:

"Sir Henry Tyler had agreed to take over that road from Rivière du Loup to Edmundston, provided the Canadian Government would give a subsidy of about $2,000,000 to carry the line to Salisbury, and running powers from there to Halifax, so as to enable the Grand Trunk Railway Company to reach that point. When I arrived in Montreal Mr. Cameron came to me and said Mr. Seargeant wished to discuss that matter with me, and it was arranged that I should go to his house for that purpose. This I did, as the following extract from Sir Henry Tyler's letter shows:

"'The question of a subsidy for lines to be constructed in New Brunswick in the Grand Trunk interest, with a view to a connection between Halifax and St. John was also referred to; Sir Charles Tupper stating that no personal pledge could be given on the subject further than that the matter would be brought before the Cabinet on the first occasion of their meeting, which would be after the elections.'"

Here Sir Henry Tyler admits himself that Sir Charles Tupper told him that until the election was over it was impossible to discuss that question; yet the member for South Oxford says that Sir Charles Tupper went to Montreal to bribe the Grand Trunk Railway. We have more evidence than that. Sir Charles Tupper says:

"Having received a letter from Sir John A. Macdonald, in which he said, speaking of Mr. Seargeant: 'I was much surprised at the instructions which he had given (of which I had indubitable evidence) to the employés of the railway, to vote against us or not to vote for us,' I pointed out to Mr. Seargeant the great injustice of such an order, and requested him to recall it, and inform the officials and employés that they would all be free to vote as they wished. I sent a copy of my letter to the Times to Mr. Cameron, who wrote to me on March 28 as follows:—

"'You certainly made no request to Mr. Seargeant to issue instructions to the officers and employés to vote for the Government, and you urged nothing more than that the Grand Trunk should remain neutral in the contest and allow the employés to vote as they wished, which Mr. Seargeant said was his own wish and intention, but that he was an officer of the Grand Trunk and must obey any instructions he received.'

"'So much for the question of fact. Sir Henry Tyler denies that Mr. Seargeant issued a 'manifesto,' but adds afterwards 'matters at Washington rendered it absolutely necessary for Mr. Seargeant to make and publish such a statement.'"

The member for South Oxford in all fairness should have read the entire letter referred to in the interview with Mr. Seargeant. But where is the abuse of the Grand Trunk Railway? We will take Sir Charles Tupper's letter; he says:

"I said in the same speech: 'Canada had loaned to the Grand Trunk enormous sums, not a dollar of which had been repaid.' Why, did not Sir Henry Tyler suppose that this implied that the loan was to him? But if there was any misunderstanding on this point, or any delay in correcting it, the fault does not lie with me. I spoke at Amherst on the 9th of March, and my speech was published on the 11th at Halifax, as the enclosed copy of the Herald will show. I said:

"'I will say further that the worst blow Canada ever received in England was that caused by the loss of millions of pounds to English investors because of the jobbery, extravagance and corruption of the Grand Trunk.'"

Well, if I mistake not, some of that very jobbery and extravagance charged now, were condoned and apologized for by the member for South Oxford by his vote in Parliament. Sir Charles further wrote to the Times:

"Sir Henry Tyler knows that I referred to the original construction of the Grand Trunk Railway, which was so marked by 'extragance, jobbery, and corruption' as to waste an enormous sum of money, and involve those who had furnished the capital in all but a total loss. The 188 miles of road from Quebec to Rivière du Loup, which the Government engineer estimated could be built equal to the rest of the Intercolonial Railway for about £372,000, cost the Grand Trunk shareholders no less than £944,000! If Sir Henry Tyler wishes evidence of corruption he has only to read his own letter of April 7, where he says: 'There have been Canadian politicians who in times past too frequently employed the Grand Trunk Railway as an instrument for party purposes, and fattened on the British capital invested in it.'"

He further wrote:

"While every man who had invested a dollar in the Canadian Pacific Railway is drawing interest on his money, thousands of people who invested in Grand Trunk stocks not only receive no interest but have sunk their capital. It was these investments which so damaged Canada in the eyes of the British public, and even to-day the Grand Trunk by its wild and reckless purchases of additional railways—purchased for the purpose of obstructing or heading off the Canadian Pacific—in which additional millions of money are being sunk, is involving the Grand Trunk shareholders in greater ruin."

I would now briefly refer the hon. gentleman to the last report of the Grand Trunk Railway. In that report it is stated:

"If any of the officers or other employés of the company thought proper, in the exercise of their individual rights, to vote against the Government, in regard to which the Board have no information, it may be supposed that they did so from the same feeling which has, from time to time, actuated the shareholders to give expression to their opinions at the half yearly meetings, and in the petition to the Canadian Government, which was signed by 11,000 shareholders in January, 1889, and duly forwarded to Canada and presented to the Government, and of which a copy is also, for facility of reference, herewith forwarded."

In that petition the shareholders state:

"When, however, the original policy was changed, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was empowered and assisted to acquire various lines in the older sections of the country, and to make extensions in competition with and duplication of the Grand Trunk Railway and other railways, then it was realized that a great national undertaking, intended to connect together the various provinces of the Dominion, was being diverted from its original purpose, and transformed into a powerful engine, aided and supported by the financial influence of the Government, for local competitive warfare against the interests of your petitioners, and the properties in which their money had been invested."

Naturally, Sir Charles Tupper, as representative of Canada, says that is not true; he states distinctly that no such thing has taken place. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that in the building of these, some of which were afterwards secured to the Canadian Pacific Railway, aid was given by the Canadian Government, and like many lines they have merged in other systems. The Midland system is merged in the Grand Trunk Railway, and portions of Western Ontario lines have been merged into the Canadian Pacific Railway. Yet the hon. gentleman would ask Sir Charles Tupper to maintain silence while people are defaming the Government of Canada, and stating distinctly that they subsidized lines that the Government promised them not to subsidize. Now, hon. gentlemen have talked a great deal at various times in their press with regard to the abuse of Sir Charles Tupper in calling them "ruined gamesters." I do not believe that the hon. member for South Oxford will again attempt to make that charge. I do not believe that any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House will repeat the charges made in the Liberal press, that Sir Charles Tupper publicly denounced them as ruined gamesters. I ask them if they have taken the trouble to find out what he said? I have here a copy of the London Times in which that charge is made. Sir Charles Tupper writing to the London Times on the 18th May, says:

"I have shown that Sir Henry Tyler—like Artemus Ward, who was ready to sacrifice all his wife's relations to the war—having by his fatuous mismanagement reduced his company to the greatest straits, turned his back upon the Government, which according to his own letter had saved the Grand Trunk Company, and united with Messrs. Wiman and Farrer, who were suggesting to the United States the means of reducing the Grand Trunk Company to bankruptcy, in an attempt to subvert British institutions in Canada. Fortunately for Canada, and for the Empire to which it belongs, this last throw of these ruined gamesters has not been successful, and their designs now stand revealed."

The hon. member for South Oxford might have secured that paper and should apologize to some extent for the words used towards Sir Charles Tupper, but he maintained silence, although the paper was on file in which it is stated distinctly that Sir Charles Tupper refers to Messrs. Farrer and Wiman. More than that, the hon. gentleman asserts that Sir Charles Tupper maligned the Opposition, stating that their policy was inimical to the interests of Canada. The Minister of Justice referred to the fact that Mr. Blake put that on record, and also expressed his opinion on that declaration. Hon. gentlemen opposite quote from Mr. Blake's speech, but omit the most important portions. If Sir Charles Tupper used ungenerous words towards the Opposition, Mr. Blake used words quite as strong and quite as suggestive. In order to prove that I will read what Sir Charles Tupper said when he was charged with maligning hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir Charles at Amherst said:

"I will read extracts from Mr. Blake's open letter sufficient to sustain the position that the great Liberal Conservative party took throughout this campaign, that therein British institutions were at stake in Canada—not on account of free trade only, but the issue was: Whether we were to become a part of the United States or not. I think you will say that Mr. Blake gives evidence on this point that admits of no contradiction on the part of our opponents. Mr. Blake writes: The tendency of unrestricted free trade with the United States, high duties being maintained against the United Kingdom, would be towards political union, and the more successful the plan, the stronger the tendency, both by reason of the community of interests, the intermingling of populations, the more intimate business and social connections, and the trade and fiscal relations, amounting to dependency, which it would create with the States, and of the greater isolation and divergency from Great Britain which it would produce; and also and especially through inconveniences experienced in the maintenance and apprehensions entertained as to the termination of the treaty—our hopes and our fears alike would draw one way. We would then indeed be looking to Washington."

Again:

"Assuming that absolute free trade, best described as commercial union, may and ought to come, I believe it can only come as an incident, or at any rate as a well understood precursor of political union, for which indeed we should be able to get better terms before than after the surrender of our commercial independence."

What else can we offer as a reason for the action of Sir Charles Tupper and the words which he used? We can offer this, that leading Liberals, headed by Mr. Gordon Brown, Hon. Wm. McDougall and scores of others, espoused the cause of the Conservative party at the last election, for they realized the increased peril to the nation. I desire to refer to another matter. It is stated that Sir Charles Tupper called the Liberal Party in Quebec "ruined gamesters." Sir Charles said:

"Mercier, by his wild extravagance and determination to hold on to power, has spent the last dollar in the treasury. He is wandering about from bank to bank now, borrowing money at six per cent. interest to carry on his Government from day to day, and passed an act of repudiation, the most dishonourable and injurious ever passed in a British Province, and in fact the only instance of its kind in the British Empire. He has destroyed the credit of Quebec. His efforts on behalf of Mr. Laurier are well understood and are the last throw of a ruined gamester."

Those words were not applied to the Liberal party, but were levelled at some of the leaders of the party, like Mr. Mercier, who were not only misleading their supporters but ruining the country. We have had other Agents General, and perhaps it would be well for me to call attention to remarks made by a certain Agent General when the hon. member for South Oxford was Minister of Finance, and I will take occasion to compare the acts and statements of Mr. Jenkins with those of Sir Charler Tupper. Sir Charles has worked indefatigably in the interests of Canada. The first act performed by Mr. Jenkins was to deliver a speech against Canada and in favour of other countries. At a Union Labourers' League Demonstration Canada's Agent General advised the people to go to Queensland and New Zealand. I quote from the Labourers' Union Chronicle, June, 1874:

"When he saw men and such men as he did see living on the wretched wages now paid them; when he compared their condition with the condition of those now out in the colonies who went from this country with nothing save their skin, and were now in a position of comfort and influence, he felt that emigration was well worth their notice. If the farmers would not employ the men here let them go to Queensland and New Zealand where they were willing to employ them."

No word for Canada. Not a word was said condemnatory of the Agent General by the then Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright), yet to-day the hon. gentleman denounces the man who has done more to make Canada great and to consolidate the interests of the Dominion than any public man, save and except the right hon. the leader of the present Government. There is another comparison I desire to institute. Charges of extravagance have been made against Sir Charles Tupper. On consulting the Public Accounts I find a record of the two Agents General, one appointed under the régime of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), and Sir Charles Tupper. An exhibition was held in Philadelphia some years ago, and a number of commissioners were selected to go there. The total cost of the Commission reached $30,000 a year, while only $250 or $300 were expended for medals for successful exhibitors. I will now submit a comparison of expenses, selected from the Public Accounts for 1876 and 1891, as follows:—

If you compare the public life of Sir Charles Tupper with any hon. member on the opposite side of the House, or if you compare his actions with those of any official in the country, I think for patriotism, ability and public spirit, they will compare favourably with those of Canada's famous statesmen in either party. I think the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution has done an injustice to Sir Charles Tupper in every sense of the word. Charges have been made that cannot be established, allegations that in his absence his friends—and he has many—will not allow to pass unchallenged. I am ready and prepared to vote to support the action of the Government with reference to Sir Charles Tupper, and to vote against the resolution moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier).

ILLNESS OF SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, we have known that for the last few days the Premier has been lying ill at his residence. I have the painful duty to announce to the House that the news from Earnscliffe just received, is that the First Minister has had a relapse and that he is in a most critical condition. We have reports from the medical men in attendance on the right hon. gentleman and they do not seem to believe that he can live many hours longer. Under these circumstances I will move, seconded by Mr. Laurier, that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, under such sad circumstances it is also a painful duty for me to second the motion of the hon. gentleman. The country will of course be shocked to hear the sad news, and I am sure it will not be possible to proceed with business further. I second the motion.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 9.50, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Mr. LISTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the Minister of Public Works when I may expect to have the return, ordered the 11th May, asking for particulars respecting the dredging of Kaministiquia Harbour?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will take a note of it.

RECIPROCITY PAPERS.

Mr. LAURIER. When will the hon. the Minister of Justice be prepared to bring down the papers with reference to the negotiations at Washington?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am expecting hourly to receive a definite answer, and may have it at any moment, when I will bring down all the papers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman has not received permission to lay on the Table all the papers, he will be able to bring down a certain portion?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

DYKE—LA RIVIÈRE DU SUD.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether the Government intend to place in the Estimates the sum of $3,000, in order to defray the cost of a dyke, to be thrown up in order to protect the public highway running alongside La Rivière du Sud, in the parish of St. Thomas, in the County of Montmagny, in order to prevent damage to the highway by the water and ice, which accumulate there, on account of their being held back by the piers of the Intercolonial Railway bridge; the whole as recommended by Mr. Louis Coste, a civil engineer in the employ of the Department of Public Works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot give an answer now. It is not customary to state what sums are to be placed in the Supplementary Estimates, and I think the hon. gentleman had better wait until the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

LIVERPOOL AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY

Mr. FORBES asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government this session to place a sufficient sum in the Supplementary Estimates to finish and complete the subsidy to the Liverpool and Annapolis Railway from Liverpool to Annapolis?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must give the hon. gentleman the same answer as I have given to the previous question.

ST. JOHN RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. DAVIES asked, 1. What is the "additional property accommodation" at St. John railway station, for which a vote of $80,000 is asked, wanted for? 2. Was the necessity of this "additional property accommodation" reported upon by any Intercolonial or other official; if so, by whom? 3. How much land is at present being taken for the $80,000? Is it proposed to take any more land adjoining? Has the land proposed to be taken been valued by the arbitrators? If not, is it to be so valued? 4. Does the land proposed to be taken belong to the Harris Estate, Harris & Co. (Ltd.) or Jas. C. Robertson, or any and which of them?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the head of the Department I cannot answer now.

LISTOWEL POST OFFICE AND CUSTOM HOUSE.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sufficient sum in the Supplementary Estimates during the present Session, to erect a post office and custom house in the town of Listowel, County of Perth?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will have to wait until the supplementaries are down.

PORT ARTHUR BREAKWATER.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Who received the contract for the Port Arthur breakwater? What was the amount of the contract, and where does the contractor reside? Is the breakwater completed? If so, has it exceeded the contract price, and how much? Has the contractor been paid for the works in full? If not, is any claim made for a balance? If so, how much, and by whom claimed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The following answer has been sent to me by the department:—There have been three different contracts let for the construction of the breakwater at Port Arthur, namely, the first portion to Duncan Macdonald, of Montreal, for $146,000; the second to Archibald Stewart, of Ottawa, for contract amount, $98,000; sheathing northerly end of breakwater, $586.72; for construction of block southern end of work, $9,840; total, $120,910.72; and the third to John M. Kirby, of Chute à Blondeau, and Archibald Stewart, of Ottawa, contract amount, $124,000; for sheet piling the piers at entrance, $4,802.84; for stone placed in talus, $4,000; total, $132,802.84. Mr. Macdonald had no extra work. Mr. Stewart presented a claim in connection with the second contract for alleged subsidence of the work which was not allowed by the Department. No claim for extras has been made in connection with Messrs. Kirby & Stewart's contract. The breakwaters have been completed. No contract price was exceeded. The contractors have been paid in full.

CHIEF ENGINEER OF THE QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION.

Mr. TARTE (translation) asked, Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government that Mr. Boswell was appointed Chief Engineer of the Corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners during the month of September, 1890—that is to say, about four months previous to the alleged resignation of Mr. H. F. Perley, on the 15th of January, 1891?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I have to say that the report which I have received from the department is as follows: There is no record of the department having been notified that a successor to Mr. Perley has been appointed in the person of Mr. Boswell.

RAW SUGAR IMPORTS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What quantity of raw sugar stands in the books of the Custom House, Montreal, as ex-warehoused by the two sugar refining companies or individuals, upon which duty has not been paid? How much duty is unpaid by each? How long are refiners permitted to ex-warehouse raw sugar without paying duty?

Mr. BOWELL. This question is somewhat involved, but I will answer it as fully as possible. No raw sugar that I am aware of stands upon the books of the Customs as ex-warehoused, nor has the department any knowledge of raw sugar being ex-warehoused upon which duty has not been paid. Refiners are not given time during which to pay duties when they ex-warehouse raw sugars.

PROVINCIAL RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, Can the Government state what sums as subsidies to railways have been paid by the different Provinces of the Dominion since Confederation; and, if so, what are the respective subsidies?

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will refer to the yearly report from the Railway Department, he will find the information he asks for. There is a page in the report which gives the amount paid to each railway by the municipality, the Provincial Government and the Dominion Government. If that does not give him all the information he desires, he can put a question on the paper again.

INDIAN AGENT AT WIARTON.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Did Wm. Simpson, Indian Agent at Wiarton, receive leave of absence for two weeks just previous to the recent Dominion elections? Was his office closed during this period.

Mr. DEWDNEY. To the first part of the question I may say, yes. To the second, I understand that arrangements were made for carrying on the duties of the office while the officer was absent.

GEORGIAN BAY ISLANDS TIMBER.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, What amount of dues have been collected on timber cut on White Cloud, Hay and Griffiths Islands, in Georgian Bay, during the years 1887, 1888, 1889 and 1890, respectively, by the Indian Land Office at Wiarton?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In the season of 1887-88 the amount collected was $1,292.79; in 1888-89, $976.34; in 1889-90, $148.32. Returns for 1890-91 have not yet been received by the department.

PIERRE ST. PIERRE.

Mr. PROULX (Translation) asked, Whether Mr. Pierre St. Pierre is still employed as Slide-master at the Carillon Dam? If not, why was he dismissed, and by whom has he been replaced; and what is the salary of the present incumbent?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Pierre St. Pierre has ceased to be employed at the slide of the Carillon Dam. The letter which was sent to him said that one man was sufficient at this post, and consequently Mr. J. Middleton, who was the senior employé, was retained. He gets $1.40 per day.

CATTLE ON EUROPEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked, Whether the Government have made any Order in Council regulating the size of cattle space in steamers carrying cattle from Canadian ports to ports in Europe? If so, what is the length and breadth of each space? If such order has not been made, what orders, regulations or instructions have the Government inspectors at the ports of Montreal and Quebec received for their guidance in loading cattle and sheep at said ports, or have they any power to restrain steamers from going to sea with cattle in insufficient space for their comfort and lives?

Mr. HAGGART. No Order in Council has yet been made to fix the cattle spaces in steamers. The subject is under consideration. The inspections at present take place under the provisions of section 26, chapter 7, Consolidated Orders in Council of Canada. Under such Order the Government Veterinary Inspector has power to prevent any vessel getting a Customs clearance carrying cattle in insufficient space for the health of animals.

SEIGNIORY OF SILLERY.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. FRÉMONT) asked, For what reason, and on what date did the Government discontinue proceedings in the case of Picard vs. Picard before the Superior Court, in the city of Quebec? Whether the Government intends to continue proceedings in this case, in order to decide the question whether the Seigniory of Sillery belongs or does not belong to the Huron Indians of Lorette?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The intervention of the Crown in these proceedings was discontinued for the reason that it was considered that neither the Crown nor the Indians referred to had any interest in these proceedings. In order to withdraw, the intervention of the Crown was made by the department on the 26th January, 1884, but for various reasons the record was not actually withdrawn until 1886.

STRATFORD BOYS' HOME.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Whether the Boys' Home at Stratford is under the control of the Government? If so, who is the director of the institution, and who was acting in that capacity 7th August, 1889? What was the amount of money paid by the Government to the Boys' Home during the year 1889?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government has no control over the Boys' Home at Stratford, and is not informed who is the director of that institution. No money was paid by the Government to the Boys' Home during the year 1889 or since.

WHARF AT GATINEAU POINT.
