It is very hot in O tawa in the summer r us on this occasion.
We had a little side-show that evening t

the spectres they didn't make in l'arliament, after which we held a caucus to decide on the course to be pursued.

Mackenzie, Blake, Huntington, Dorion, me and the balance of the prominent Reformers were there.

"Weel noo," said Mackenzie, looking around the dejected assemblage, "what's tae be done in the present orisis!"

No one spoke—a solemn silence prevailed. "An unprecedented outrage upon the liberty which is the birthright of Britons has been committed." said Blake, trying to work up some indignation, "the Constitution, which is the birthright of every Briton, has been unconstitutionally violated trampled upon."

"We norman it has," said I. "Lord Duf.

"Of course it has," said , "Lord Dufferin admitted it himself."

"Why he said he took his stand, upon it, so, of course he put it under his feet."

"The Constitution," resumed Blake, "which is the birthright—"

"Xe tauld us see alore," said Mackenzie, "A trout was caugh!

"A trout was caugh." "Very true," said I, "the constitution hich is, &c., comes in with splendid effect fore a public audience, like 'the flag which as brawed a thousand years, it never fails fetch em, but I fancy we are none of us so 'trioularly enthusiastic about it that we

"Why, I can't do that," said Huntington, with considerable terpidation. "You know that by so doing I should render myself liable to criminal proceedings. I should be imprisoned for contempts."

"Would you indeed?" said I, delighted to see an opportunity of making a little political capital. "Why, that's excellent, spleadid: The very thing we want. If you could only get imprisoned for a year or so a charge of continuory it would be the best cry we have had for many a year. Just shink of it! Why we should have a real grievance.

"We could hold indignation meetings all over the country, and give Blake any number of opportunities to descant on 'the constitution which is the birthright of Britons."

"We should have no end of speeches and processions and leading articles. 'The Reform Martyr: Shall he Languish in a Wolves in immense my

If you could be judiciously refractory in gool and sear up your clothes and assault the gavers, it would be still better.

"They would then put you in irons and allow you nothing but bread and water, Really we couldn't have a better cry to go to the country with..." Barbarity of Sir John's minions? 'The Reform Martyr Tortured and Manacied'!! That's the programme. Hinnington, you must go to good and be put in irons. We want a martyr the worst way.'

Huntington measuabile sat in spparently specchless astorishment. When I had concluded, he exid, "You cannot be serious the go to good and manacied the celebration of the contraved and manacoled !-not likely!"

But you really must," said Blake, who saw at once the force of my suggestion. It's an admirable idea. Don't you see, my dear. sir, how it would be irresistible. We should sweep all before as from one end of the Dominion to the other. So axperienced a political strain possession of her cocasion very much."

"Bett consider my feelings—immured in a loathsome dangeon, the companion of felons and vagrants. No, I postitively decline," said Huntington.

"What I' said Mackenzie, "ye decline to serve the Pairty. Will ye basely succumb to the mandates of the creatures of Sir Jone. Jist gang yer ain gait, but gin ye dinna obey the Globe age that ye may prepare to be read out of the Pairty as fause an feekless that the cause.

Huntington didn't seem to enter into this project with much enthensam.

In fact I muchly dubitate whether he won't obey the nummons of the Commission after all, and basely surrender his claims to the Martyr's Crown.

One thing is certain, however. If he romes to be martyred for the benefit of the cause he will be martyred in the Globe. That what the martyr.

I think, on the whole, I would prefer the former. Then the Party would read many a column in the Globe to perpetuate the mamory of his zirtne. Globe to perpetuate the mamory of his zirtne.
