The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Now, the question will arise as to whether, under existing conditions, it is worth while keeping up a system which would entail all the expense necessitated under the Bill proposed by Sir John Thompson. The difference of expense is very material, and it is a question as to whether circumstances justify that additional expense. I think that when we come to examine this Bill in detail, we will find that the difference between the provincial and the federal franchises is so small at the present time—and we will take that as our guide for the future—that they are not worth the additional expense of providing a supplementary list, which was really provided for by Sir John Thompson's Bill. Take the provinces of Ontario and Quebec with which I am most familiar. In the province of Ontario the revision of the municipal lists, in a great majority of cases, with the exception of cities and towns, takes place before the county court judges; and what better revisors can we have than the county court judges? In our system in the province of Quebec, with which I am more familiar, the revision of the list is made by way of appeal to the judges of our Superior Court. That revision, made under the control of the judges of our Superior Court, is very much more perfect, very much more exempt from the objections that might be urged against the old system, than the condition of things that exists with the revising barristers. I think the judges of our Superior Court in Quebec—and I speak of them with some knowledge—are in a position to do good service, and any revision made by them will commend itself to all honest and fair-minded men in this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That desirable condition of things does not exist in some of the provinces.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand the hon. gentleman refers probably to the province of Nova Scotia, and perhaps Manitoba; therefore, I speak with some diffidence on this point. But those are matters of detail that we will have occasion to consider when we come to discuss the Bill. For the convenience of members, I do not intend to debate the Bill at any greater length, but merely to state its principles.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It might save a good deal of discussion in the future if the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask a question. I understand from the hon. gentleman's remarks that the appeal is made to a judge of some court, which is a very desirable thing in making the list. I take it from the tenor of his remarks that that is the principle upon which he feels inclined to go.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think my hon. friend thoroughly took in what I said about it. I was speaking of the conditions existing in my own province; and I think in the province of Quebec any revision of the list which would be made before a judge of the Superior Court—and I speak with intimate knowledge of the great majority of these judges—would commend itself to any fair-minded man having anything to do with those lists.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Quite so. The hon. gentleman spoke so highly of a reference to the judges that I thought he would not deny it to the other provinces.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No doubt, as a matter of inference, my remark would apply to the other provinces, but I was speaking from practical knowledge of my own province. For the convenience of members I have prepared an analysis of the Bill, pointing out the changes which it makes in the existing system. As the analysis is somewhat lengthy, I will hand it to the "Hansard" without reading it, if there is no objection.

Mr. CASEY. Hand it to the "Hansard."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Hon. gentlemen having this before them, will see at a glance what changes are made, and the reasons for those changes in each section. If the House will permit me, I will hand it in to the "Hansard" so that hon. members may have it in that way.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Schedule three is a list of the Acts repealed. It will be seen that these are the Electoral Franchise Act and the amendments thereto; the North-west Representation Act and the amendments thereto, with certain exceptions; the Dominion Elections Act and the amendments thereto, and certain other Acts relating to elections. It will be observed that there is a printer's error in this schedule. Sections 2 and 3 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 7, are the sections defining the electoral districts in the Territories, and these should not be repealed.

The following clauses are reproductions, without substantial change, excepting in the order and arrangement of the sections, of corresponding provisions in the existing law. Clause 4, b, 8-11, 14-21, 30-32, 34, 36-38, 40-46, 49-63, 63-67, 77, 78, 80, 82, 84, 84-89, 90A, 91, 93-115, 118-125, 127-130, 133-135, 137, 141, 144, 145, 147, 151, 152, 154.

Taking up in their order the several clauses in which there are changes from the existing law, we have clause 3, Interpretation. Paragraphs (a), (b), (d), and (e) are taken from Sir John Thompson's Bill (No. 143) of 1894.

The sections of the Act providing for the adoption of the provincial qualifications for voters, voters' lists and polling divisions render these definitions necessary.

The necessity for the other new definitions will be seen when the Bill is examined in detail.

Clause 7 adopts generally, but subject to the provisions of the Bill thereafter contained, the provincial qualifications for voters.

Clause 13 defines, as at present, the persons who are disqualified to act as election officers, with the addition of persons disfranchised under the Act of 1894 for bribery.

Clause 22 is substantially a re-enactment of the provision cited from the Act of 1874 (section 29), requiring the returning officer to procure provincial voters' lists, &c. (See clause 4 of departmental draft.)

Clause 23 adopts generally the provincial polling divisions. (See clauses 27, 28 and 29.)

Clause 24 adopts generally the provincial voters' lists, subject, however, to the subsequent provisions of the Bill. (See clauses 25, 27.)

Clause 25 provides that, where there are no lists for provincial elections, there shall be none for Dominion elections.

Clause 27.—Where no polling divisions under the law of the province, but polling places and voters' lists for such places, these shall be used at Dominion elections also. (Clause 6, departmental draft; and see Ontario Act, 56, cap. 4, as to Algoma East and West, and the British Columbia Act, C.S., B.C., c. 39, ss. 9-12.)

Clause 28.—Returning officer to constitute polling divisions and fix polling places, where he is required to do so under provincial laws. (See departmental draft, clause 3 (e), and Ontario Election Act, section 56, and Prince Edward Island Act, 53 Vic., c. 1, s. 22.)

Clause 29 provides for a case where a provincial polling district is not wholly in electoral district, and is taken from the Ontario Act cited. (And see departmental draft, clause 5.)

Clause 33.—As to the Nomination. Subsections 1 and 2 are a re-enactment of the section cited, except that Algoma and Nipissing are not included in the exceptional districts.

The third subsection is new, and provides for simultaneous by-elections.

Clause 35.—Nomination, &c., in the exceptional counties, Algoma and Nipissing being dropped.

Clause 39, as to form of nomination, will re-enact the sections cited. This section will apply to the territories, as well as the provinces.

Clause 47, as to duties of returning officers, if poll is granted. The only change is that indicated by the brackets in paragraph (c), rendered necessary because under the new system there will in some cases be no lists.

Clause 48.—As to poll-clerks. No change except that it applies to North-west Territories.

Clause 64 provides for oath to be taken by agents of candidates, and is taken from the Ontario Act cited.

Clause 70.—Regulations for voting, &c. The amendment of subsection 2 provides for cases where there are no lists, and for cases under the Prince Edward Island Act, where the elector may be required to prove his qualification. The amendment of subsection 3 is also to meet the case of Prince Edward Island elections. (See Prince Edward Island Act, 53 Vic., c. 1, s. 55 et seq.)

Clause 76.—Voters unable to mark ballot papers. No change, except that indicated in subsection 2. Qy. Aimed at Japanese et hoc genus omne? It is taken from British Columbia Statutes.

Clause 79.—The changes are required, to provide for elections in Prince Edward Island. (See the sections from the Provincial Elections Act, above cited.)

Clause 81.—The change indicated by Mr. McCord's note is made because of the repeal of the Franchise Act.

Clause 83.—Change noted by Mr. McCord made because Franchise Act repealed.

Clause 90.—References to Franchise Act omitted, and subsection added as to scale of costs. At present there is no such provision, and this has given rise to differences of practice in the several courts.

Clauses 116 and 117.—The notes explain the change.

Clause 126.—From the Ontario Act cited. Corrupt practice by candidate, or with his knowledge and consent, committed in excusable ignorance, not to subject to penalties.

Clause 131.—From Ontario Act cited. Technical or unintentional breaches of the law on the part of persons other than candidates, not involving moral culpability or affecting the result of the election, not to subject to disqualification.

Clause 136.—The corresponding section of the Dominion Elections Act contained provisions that no person should be excused from answering on ground that an answer would tend to criminate him; but this is no longer necessary, on account of the general provision in the Canada Evidence Act, 1893, and is omitted.

Clause 142.—Corrupt practices not triable at Quarter Sessions. There is at present a doubt as to whether the offender cannot be so tried, notwithstanding the provisions in the Elections Act, arising from the very general language of section 539 of the Criminal Code. The amendment will remove the doubt.

Clause 146.—From the Ontario Act cited. Payment of expenses after one month, upon approval of judge.

Clause 148.—Tariff of fees. Subsection 2 gives Governor in Council power to make new tariff, and at present provides that such tariff shall be laid before the House of Commons at the next session. It is proposed to make this within the first fifteen days of the next session.

Clause 153.—Case of delay of nomination or polling, caused by riot, &c. Gives returning, or deputy returning, officer power to hold same on following day or days.

Clause 155.—Election not to be declared invalid for non-compliance with provisions as to limitations of time, unless court thinks result affected thereby, or non-compliance due to improper conduct of candidate or agent. (From Ontario Act cited.)

Mr. FOSTER. Before this motion is carried we must have a little discussion over the matter, not only of the Franchise Act but of some other matters which have been incidentally alluded to several times during the course of the session, and which it is my purpose to bring up a little more formally at the present time. In the first place, I want to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which it is now sitting. Contrary to the often expressed opinion of the present leader of the Government, the House has been called together at a very late season of the year with all the inconveniences which arise therefrom. I think no man has been more insistent probably than the leader of the Government on that point. In looking at some remarks made by him not very long ago, it is a little amusing to us to see that I am forced to-day to take up and repeat the cry for principle in this matter from this side of the House which my hon. friend not more than a year ago made from his position upon this side of the House. at that time with very little, at this time I think with very great reason.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Before the hon. gentleman proceeds further, I rise to a question of order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, to your ruling that the hon. gentleman is obliged to confine himself to the principle of the Bill now before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must say that I was assuming that the hon. gentleman would turn this portion of his argument into presenting particular reasons against the second reading of the Bill on this occasion. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that he cannot go into a general discussion of the policy of the Government on a motion for the second reading of this Bill, and that he cannot do so by moving a motion to adjourn, but that he must confine his remarks to this particular Bill now under discussion. I assumed that the hon. gentleman would turn his remarks so as to show the impropriety of reading this Bill the second time now.

Mr. FOSTER. I am going to enter into a discussion of the impropriety of reading this Bill the second time, and I am going to make a motion that instead of the Bill being read the second time now, it be not now read the second time. I am perfectly in order in making the motion I propose to submit to the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give the hon. gentleman the motion I am about to submit.

The PRIME MINISTER. Whatever the motion may be, the hon. gentleman cannot divert the discussion from the principle of the Bill now before the House. If the hon. gentleman wishes to attack the general policy of the Government, I shall be very glad to give him an opportunity of doing so. What is, however, before the House at the present time is the principle of the proposed Franchise Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. No doubt the objection raised by the First Minister is correct. But I am assuming that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) does not intend to proceed out of order, but will make his remarks apply to the motion he is about to submit.

The PRIME MINISTER. Whatever motion the hon. gentleman may make, it must be germane to the principle of this proposed Franchise Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; it must be applicable and germane to the principle of the Franchise Bill, or be a motion to postpone.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be, then, that the hon. leader of the House has been a little premature in taking the point of order.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think not.

Mr. FOSTER. What I shall move is, that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time some time posterior to the present; and I suppose when I move an amendment in that sense, I am bound to give the House reasons why I make it. If I am not within the rules of the House in trying to impress on the House good and solid reasons why hon. members should vote for my amendment, then I do not understand the purpose of parliamentary discussion. If Mr. Speaker rules that I have no right to make a motion to postpone the second reading of the Bill to another time and give my reasons therefor—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman knows I could not do that.

Mr. FOSTER. And I think so. So my hon. friend's point of order is altogether premature, and is not well taken. I was going on to say that there were some things that were a little amusing in regard to our present position.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). What has that to do with the motion?

Mr. FOSTER. The Postmaster General confesses his ignorance very early in the debate. He says he does not know what that has to do with the present question.

If he will possess his soul in patience, I will give him some reasons, and I will do so in a very gentle and amiable mood. I am speaking entirely for the public interest; I am speaking for the business and producing interests of the country, and in doing that I am not speaking entirely in party interest. In 1894 the present leader of the House, then sitting on this side of the House, made some remarks that he will find reported on page 30 of "Hansard" of that session, as follows:—

It has been the unwritten law of Canada for a great many years past, that Parliament should be summoned at an early period in the year, at the latest, towards the end of January.

Again, he said:

The reason is obvious. In this country we have no privileged class. All the members of this House, with scarcely an exception, are engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, and it is an object of paramount necessity that, after having discharged their duties to the country, they should be able to go back to their ordinary business pursuits about the opening of the busy season. In years past, I say, it was the unwritten law of Canada; still, this year the Government have departed from that law. They waited, and waited, and waited, until the opening of the busy season was in sight, before summoning Parliament, and as to this not a word of explanation has been offered.

Well, if that in 1894 was a good argument for hon. gentlemen to employ as an impeachment of the then Government as to the lateness with which we called the session, what must be the cogency of such an argument at this time, in 1897? It is true, that in 1894, after a commission had been going through the country seeking information with respect to the tariff with the avowed idea of introducing a revision of the tariff, my hon. friend was right to a certain extent in insisting that Parliament should have been called together at an early date in order that the country should know what the revision of the tariff would be. If that argument had cogency then, how much more cogency does it possess to-day when those hon. gentlemen have not yet made public the principles on which they propose to revise the tariff, as the Government in 1893 did in the case of their revision first, stating to this Parliament and to the country definitely and clearly that the revision was to proceed upon well known and well understood principles, the principles of protection. But here is a Government that has concealed for nine months the principles on which they propose to revise the tariff and have refused to announce them to Parliament and to the country, and yet they have called Parliament at this the second session at so late a date as 25th March instead of early in January, which the present leader of the Government said was the unwritten and a well established and very salutary rule of this Parliament. So if my hon. friend happened to be the leader of Her Majesty's Opposition to-day with how much greater force would he urge the eloquent words which he used in his plea in 1894 for the condemnation of the then Government. The hon. gentleman in another place proceeded to say :

There is not the prosperity among the farmers one would be led to expect from the increase of their exports. Why? Because the farmers sow, and reap, and sell, but they do not toil for themselves ; they toil for monopolists.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER—

It is the old story—" Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes."

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is open to the interrogatory as to whether the same monopolies which in 1894 were those that gathered the sweetness from the toil of those industrious bees—the said bees being the farmers—and if so, whether my hon. friend is without rebuke and without fault if he has allowed his great power in this Parliament to remain unused for nine or ten months and allowed the monopolies to suck the honeyed sweetness out of these same labouring and industrious bees. But, Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) was not content to rest there. He says on this matter of legislating on the fiscal policy :

We must take warning from what has taken place in the United States, and if we wish to avoid the crisis which they are now passing through, our duty is at the very earliest possible moment to reverse our system and go back to a more sane fiscal legislation.

He has had that early moment for nine months ; he has had that insane policy, according to his own view, practised in this country for eighteen years ; he has had an opportunity of going back to a more sane policy ; is my hon. friend without blame and without fault before the country ?

Mr. CHARLTON. What has that to do with the Franchise Act ?

Mr. FOSTER. There is another man who does not know what this has to do with the question. I must ask him to cultivate the Christian virtue of patience. He knows pretty well what that is. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) has had a very good and a very salutary exercise of his moral qualities on that, in a certain bill which he has been introducing into this House for the last eight or nine years, and which I think he devoutly hopes he will have to introduce for eight or nine years more, for I verily believe, that if the hon. gentleman had the good fortune to get his Bill passed he would feel himself bereft of the only child he has.

Well, Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) went on in the same fashion. I will not quote any more, but the point of my quotation and argument—this for the benefit of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) —is this : That if, under the circumstances of 1894, when we had stated the principle upon which we would revise the tariff, and when every business man and business interest in the country knew the principle upon which we would revise it, he brought us to task for being late in meeting Parliament and bringing down the tariff ; what is the blame that attaches to him, when he and his party for eighteen years have declared that they intended to completely revolutionize the present fiscal system, and when he and his party have not had the courage, if they have changed their minds, to give the change to the public, and to state at least before this House—they have been in for two sessions now—the principle upon which they would proceed in the revision of their tariff, and, in the absence of which statement, the threats of eighteen years are held out against every business interest in this country to-day. What blame must attach to the Prime Minister, if, for nine months, he has kept this country waiting, and this Parliament waiting, for the mere enunciation of his view and that of his Government with reference to the tariff system.

Mr. FOSTER.

But, Sir, there is another reason why we should have been called together earlier, and there is another reason why we should pass through the necessary business of this House with all that haste which is compatible with reasonable and careful work. And what is that ? Not having been called together until the 25th of March, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) knew that there were urgent reasons why we should be out of this early. The reasons that usually exist ; reasons of business, which my hon. friend eloquently portrayed in 1894 ; the reasons of the business men in this House who have large interests, and whose interests demand their attention early in the summer or late in the spring ; and that, therefore, the business of this Parliament ought to begin early and finish early, so that these men could go back to their business with the least sacrifice possible to them for their doing the public work. These reasons are as strong to-day as they were then. But, there are other reasons this session. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) knew that this was the Jubilee year. He knew that the Canadian colony, in conjunction with the other colonies of Great Britain, would wish to be represented by its official head at the Queen's Diamond Jubilee celebration, and he knew that he himself as Premier ought to be in his place there as the head of this colony, along with the heads of the other colonial possessions of Her Majesty. He knew, that that would necessitate an early departure for England. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), even though he had the utmost confidence in his colleagues, that they would be able to manage the ship of state, if he were to take his hand, for a little while, from off the helm—I am almost doubtful if he has that implicit confidence at the present time, from certain rumours that have been floating about, and I am afraid that he will hardly find it possible to leave the helm without his strong and firm hand upon it. But, even suppose that he thought he could do so, he ought to have had a little unselfishness in his nature. There are other members of Parliament who are loyal as well as he is, and who would like to get through the duties of this session and go to London with him, if he would allow them to go in the same vessel with His Majesty, my Lord Pax, as my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) christened him. Other gentlemen would like to go over and pay their devoirs, and assist in this celebration, and so it is of great interest—and it is a plea urged by the Prime Minister, and by those who sit around him, and by his organs of the press—that we ought to hurry on with the business in order to let Canada's Premier and public men get over to London in time for the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee. That is another reason why we should hurry through with the business of this House as fast as is compatible with careful analysis and careful legislation.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I see the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has risen, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CASEY. I am waiting for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to sit down, as he should do.

Mr. FOSTER. Now I am seated.

Mr. CASEY. In pursuance of the suggestion that we should hurry through with the business of the House, I wish to ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is carrying out your decision of a little while ago. I understood you to rule, Sir, that whether he was discussing the second reading, or the amendment for the six months' hoist, or otherwise, the arguments he adduced should be addressed to the principles of this Bill. I understood that you allowed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to continue, merely in the hope that he would connect his arguments with the principles of the Bill. I now ask your ruling, as to whether, after ten or fifteen minutes, he has succeeded in doing that. I ask your ruling, Sir, for the reason, that if this sort of discursive speech is permitted now, it would mean an enlarged and irrelevant discussion on every Bill that comes before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) who has the floor, stated that he proposed to conclude his speech with a motion in reference to the postponement of this Bill. I certainly think that the arguments which he has been adducing may be applied as reasons for the postponement of the consideration of the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I understood your former ruling to be, Sir—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) wishes to understand.

Mr. CASEY. I am merely asking for an explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. On the motion before the Chair for the second reading of the Bill, it would limit the discussion to the principles of the Bill; but on an amendment, postponing the Bill for a certain period, either a discussion on the principles of the Bill, or a statement of cogent reasons for that postponement, would be in order.

Mr. FOSTER. Your ruling was very clear to us on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, and I am very glad that the laboured explanation has let a little light into the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey), who seems now to think that there is a little cogency in these arguments. I do not think, however, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) ought to tax the Speaker inordinately to explain everything to his mind. I was going on to say that there were business reasons and jubilee year reasons, why the business of this House should be just as quickly done as it possibly can be.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). That is what you are doing now.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I want to go on to the third point. If my premises are true in this respect, and I think no man will deny them, I come to this conclusion: That if the Government goes upon that line, and is sincerely desirous to do so, the Government is in duty bound to leave off all legislation that is trivial, unnecessary, or, in fact, that is not absolutely and practically necessary, and that it is its bounden duty to put the most important business that the House has this session to come before it, to put that business first upon the docket, and not to interpose between that business and the time of this House, a motion on a subject like the present. Now, I think my argument on this point is clear to my hon. friend.

The Government have brought down a good many topics of legislation, and more they have left out that they might have brought down, if the session had not been so late, and if the session did not promise to be comparatively short. For instance, we would have expected in a usual session to see a Bill introduced by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, if possible, to carry out consistently the views of that hon. gentleman when he was on the Opposition side of the House; and if later experience has made it doubtful in his mind whether he can be consistent on that point, and whether the Government of which he is a member can be consistent, for virtue's sake, the law should be invoked to keep himself and his colleagues from violating what he declared to be one of the certain and absolute principles of good conduct of any Government. Who does not remember when my hon. friend called up his logic, and warmed that logic with all the intense fervour that belongs to him, morally, mentally and physically, and launched upon this House what I myself on the other side at that time felt was a blow that I could not dodge, namely, that no person should be eligible to be appointed to any office in the service of the Government while he was a member of the House of Commons, or, at least, until one year had elapsed since the dissolution of the Parliament of which he was a member. My hon. friend made a declaration of virtue which he and his colleagues have shown by their acts that they cannot live up to to-day. What is the law for? It is to help men to be virtuous, and my hon. friend should have lost no time in introducing into this House, as a prominent member of an all-powerful Government, a Bill to prevent these hon. gentlemen from falling into that temptation to which they are yielding almost every day of the session.

We might have expected to see several other Bills—for instance, one Bill for diminishing the number of Cabinet Ministers and reducing their salaries; for that was a principle very strongly laid down by my kind and amiable friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). We miss his eloquence. We miss his resounding voice raised against all sorts of abuses, and we have a lively recollection of the supreme moral and political height to which he rose in denouncing the iniquity of having thirteen or fourteen full-fledged Ministers in the Dominion Cabinet at a salary of $7,000 each. My hon. friend, who has lapsed on the line of the appointment of members of the House of Commons to office, was a good second to the hon. member for North Wellington. He stood at his back manfully. He held that $4,000 was quite sufficient—$7,000 was quite too much. We would have expected that a Bill would have been introduced to satisfy my hon. friend from North Wellington and my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock).

Then, who has forgotten that up there in Rideau Hall sits a man from Great Britain, who toils not, neither does he spin, but who every year takes so many thousand dollars of taxes which the poor patrons and the hard-working farmers of this country, especially those in my hon. friend's own constituency, have to toil and sweat and delve in order hardly to pay? And yet my hon. friend in the full flush of his great powers as a Cabinet Minister, one of the most important in a business Cabinet, fails to do his duty; and, through all last session, and so far this session, has not brought in a Bill to reduce the Governor General's salary. Why not?

Mr. FOSTER.

We might have expected this, and more, but hon. gentlemen have not brought down these measures. We shall expect them next session. On account of the lateness of the time we met this session, and the demands of this Jubilee year, we shall excuse the hon. gentlemen this session, if they do not bring in these Bills; but next year we intend to demand them.

But the hon. gentlemen have given notice of some Bills which they intend to bring down. They have brought down a Superannuation Bill, and placed it first on their docket; but it turns out that it does not abolish superannuation. That is a Bill which they might very well bring in on commencing their term; and we would give them every facility to carry it through, and attempt to make as good a Bill of it as possible, if it is possible with the Bill they have. Then, there is a Bill for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway. Nobody would have any objection to a Bill for the prosecution of a great public work like that. There is another question very much vexed, especially for my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), and very much vexed for the paternal "Globe," which has taken this young member under its care and administration to him a very severe castigation—on its knee, speaking metaphorically—to which the hon. gentleman objects; and he is to-day sending back his remonstrance in no mild terms. Then, there is the Fast Line Service, which is a matter of important public policy. Nobody could have objected if that measure were put at or near the fore-front of this session's legislation. Where it is, we do not know. We do know where Mr. Dobell—I forget his constituency—is. That is a measure which I suppose will be brought before us as soon as he returns. Then there is the prohibition plebiscite.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. We certainly wish to hold the Government to its pledge. I have evidently struck a sympathetic chord in the heart of my hon. friend from King's.

Mr. DOMVILLE. You have struck oil.

Mr. FOSTER. I knew I should do so, and I am glad to give him pleasure in that slight way. It is not quite as satisfactory as it might be, but that is the best which I, as a cold water man, can do for him. I shall expect the First Minister to bring that Bill down and to pass it in good faith, as he has pledged the country that he will do.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have heard of pledges before.

Mr. FOSTER. So have I.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have also heard of moments of weakness.

Mr. FOSTER. I have heard not only of moments of weakness, because, I suppose, most human beings have such moments, but deliver me from that chronic weakness which manifests itself in my hon. friend from year to year, and almost from decade to decade. Then some provision must be made for the public works of the country, and then there is the tariff measure. I have put that measure last because it is the most important. It is the only one that the country takes any decided or active interest in. What I want to know is why the Government have allowed the tariff measure to lie over for nine months or more, and are anxious to have it lie over still longer, on the plea that they must first introduce and carry through the Franchise measure. My argument is that in a session begun late and which ought to conclude early, it is the duty of the Government to put before us, as soon as possible, the measure which the country is most loudly and imperatively calling for. That measure, beyond doubt, is the Tariff Bill. If there is no doubt at all as to which is the most important Bill, there is equally not the least doubt as to which is the least important for this House to consider this session. The least important is the Franchise Bill to which the Government propose now to give precedence. Why, it is practically of not the least use, by the admission of my hon. friend himself, who told us in this House, not long ago, that he did not suppose there would be any use at all for that Bill except at a general election which would not take place for three or four years yet. He declares he is pretty strongly entrenched, he thinks he has a good and strong working majority, but that is the very strongest argument against his taking up the time of this House, to the exclusion of weighty matters, with a measure, which, even if passed into law, he does not propose to make use of for four or five years. There is no doubt in the country or in the House as to which of the measures promised in the Speech from the Throne is the least important this session. Why, then, should the most important measure be delayed and the least important be proceeded with? My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) undertook, the other day, to break the force of the argument by showing how long we took to bring down our budgets in previous sessions when we were in office. I just want to say two things in reply to that argument, if you can call it one. In the first place, you must recollect that this Government is to be judged by a nine months' delay, and not by a delay simply from the 25th of March of this year, in bringing down its tariff. When a Liberal-Conservative Government had the direction of affairs, it did not wait until the second session of Parliament to bring down its tariff but brought it down during the first session and gave it precedence of other measures. And not only is it nine months, instead of a few days, which is the delay on the part of this Government to bring down its tariff measure, but there is another fact to be borne in mind. Every tariff revision, undertaken by a Liberal-Conservative Government, was one which involved the least uncertainty and disturbance of the business of the country. Why? Because every tariff revision that took place under a Liberal-Conservative Government was effected on the basis of a principle which was announced beforehand and which the whole country knew. So that although there must necessarily, under any circumstances, be some doubt and uncertainty, still the greater part of that is removed when the country knows what the principle is which the Government are going to conserve in bringing down its tariff. In 1878, the tariff was preceded by explicit declarations of principle on the part of the then Opposition in this House. It was preceded by their canvas before the country, by their declarations before the people, and whether the Government took 20, or 30, or 50 days, after the opening of the session, to bring down their tariff, the people knew that it would, when it came down, be a tariff which would conserve and protect the industries of the country, and consequently they could mould their business according to the principle then declared. In 1893, I made on behalf of the Government of that day, from that side of the House, an explicit statement as to what would be the character of the revision we proposed to make in 1894. None of my hon. friends opposite can deny that. In their own party platform, adopted in 1893, they quoted the words I used, and found fault with the principle I enunciated in 1893, as that upon which the tariff was to be revised. When do you have the maximum of disturbance and uncertainty with regard to an approaching revision of the tariff? You have it, as you had it in the United States, after that contest in which the Democratic party, with their half free trade declarations, came back from the polls with a majority in both Houses, and when, as it took them a year and a half or more to bring down their tariff, all that time in the United States there was the direst uncertainty. Why? Because the people took these men to mean what their pledges before the elections meant, namely, that they were to revolutionize the principle upon which the tariff was framed and make it free trade, as far as the revenue would permit. We see to-day in the Dominion of Canada a case stronger than that. The Democratic party, however far they went, never went so far as to authoritatively give the people of the United States to believe that they were going to introduce anything like free trade. It was to be a revenue tariff with incidental protection. But even that threw the business of the United States into the direst confusion. To-day what have you in Canada? What have you had for nine months?

What have you had since the beginning of January, 1896? You have had a party verging on towards power and afterwards coming into power, with every pronouncement, for the eighteen years preceding and up to the time the people placed them in authority, based upon the assumption that they were going to destroy the very principles upon which the business of the country had been based for the last eighteen years. Is there any doubt about that? None in the least. Take what their leaders have said. Take what they have formulated in this House. Take what their organs have said, and running through all the diversities—and heaven knows there are diversities enough to suit the minds of the most exacting in matters of change and differences, running through all the diversities, with all the different flags which they raised, with all the different colours which they flaunted, no matter how many sub-mottoes they may have had, there was one that never was absent, that was put on the highest place on every flag, and that was "Death to Protection." Was it commercial union that my hon. friend advocated as he did, what would commercial union have done? Whatever else it would have done, it would have destroyed the protective principle in the policy of this country. Was it continental free trade—and my hon. friend espoused that plan, not in a moment of weakness, but as an exhibition of chronic weakness which led him to take up every fad which came to his hand no matter how absurd—what would continental free trade have done? Whatever else it would have done, it would have destroyed the principle and policy of protection. My hon. friend advocated unrestricted reciprocity. He said at one time that he nailed it to the top of the mast and that he was going to keep under that flag, until it floated triumphant, no matter how long that took. Whatever else unrestricted reciprocity would have done, it would have destroyed the principle and policy of protection. Then my hon. friend took free trade as it is in England. The same remark applies to that. And when driven by better business men in his own party, he had to leave all his previous fads and avail himself of the declaration that he would adopt a revenue tariff, free from every vestige of protection; that also would have the effect of destroying protection. How well their policy was summed up in that terse and vigorous sentence of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright):

Our policy, from first to last, has been to destroy this villainous protective system.

By free trade, by revenue tariff, or continental free trade, no matter which, the cardinal idea and doctrine was the destruction of the principle of protection. Now, I say that the business interests of this country were alarmed by a threat of eighteen years standing, backed up by the statements and declarations of hon. gentlemen opposite, up to the very day that they triumphed at the polls. Why, my hon. friend has only to take "the official report of the Liberal Convention held in response to the call of Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Liberal party of the Dominion of Canada," held at Ottawa, Tuesday, June 20th, and Wednesday, June 21st, 1893. It is a little refreshing to go back to that time. I simply quote a few utterances to prove the point I am making. That father, that venerable father and mentor of the party, the good Sir Oliver Mowat, raised his voice in that conclave first of all. Amongst other things he declared that:

After the next general election, it may be truly said by the whole country that it was at the Liberal Convention at Ottawa, in June, 1893, that protection, and bad government, and consequent political unrest among our people received—

What, a gentle opiate? No—

—their death-blow.

Death to protection. Turning from good Sir Oliver and coming to the more wicked members of the convention, let me show what my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) himself said:

This simply means—

He said in reference to that statement of mine as to protection:

—that the Government are going to scratch the paint and put on a new coat of varnish, and call it tariff reform.

Are not these strong words? I wonder if, in the next twenty-five days, we shall be in a position on this side to just quote that sentence. If the Minister of Finance is to be believed, we shall, because I take it that no Government could respect itself for a single moment, let alone face the independent and intelligent electorate, and put a high protective tariff on coal, half the coal affected not being produced in this country, but used by the farmers to a very large extent, and not treat every other industry in like manner. So we are looking for developments. The hon. gentleman went on:

Mr. Chairman, again upon this occasion, I want it to be well understood that we take direct issue here and now with the Government. The Government tells us that the principle of the National Policy they are going to maintain; and we answer to the Government, that the principle of the National Policy must be taken off, not only the branches.

He says further:

But I appeal to your judgment, in the face of the experience of the last fifteen years under the system which was introduced by the Conservative party, which was dubbed the National Policy, to say if that system is not vicious in principle, iniquitous in its terms, and dangerous in its consequences.

These are very inclusive words. They allow no honest man a single loop-hole of escape. If a man who goes before the country with these words on his lips and asks the country to give him power to put these words upon the Statute-book, forgets the words and does not put them on the Statute-book, and then justifies himself, not upon principle, but upon simple party expediency, that man ought not to look again into the face of the electorate of Canada. He goes on :

I say that it is vicious in principle. I want to know—and I put the question so as to be heard throughout the length and breadth of this country—

That is where we want it to be heard——by virtue of what principle will you tax a man to enrich his neighbour?

Would the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), if he were here, rise up and answer this question : By what principle do you tax the poor farmer who was to warm himself by the heat of anthracite coal, that tax being levied in order to increase the the gains of—according to Mr. Hardy—a foreign monopoly in the province of Nova Scotia ?

By virtue of what principle will you tax the farmer in order to give work to the working-man? On what principle will you tax the workingman in order to give better prices to the farmer?

Now, if there is any logical conclusion from that, it is that the principle of protection as the hon. gentleman stated, is vicious and ought not to be allowed as the basis of the policy of this country. But he goes further :

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I submit to your judgment, that the servile copy of the American system which has been brought amongst us by the leaders of the Conservative party, is, like its prototype, a fraud and a robbery, and I call upon you, one and all, to pronounce at once and give your emphatic support to the proposition that we shall never rest until we have wiped away from our system that fraud and robbery under which Canadians suffer.

Nine months have gone by since the present Government came into power. Has my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) been resting? He proceeds :

I submit to you, therefore, that the system of protection which is maintained by the Government, that is to say, of levying tribute upon the people, not for the legitimate expenses of government, but for a private and privileged class, should be condemned without qualification. Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection; our ideal is free trade. Their immediate object is protection; ours a tariff for revenue only. Upon this issue we engage the battle from this moment forward, and I ask you once more, never to desist until we have achieved victory, until we have freed this country from the incubus which has been weighing it down for fifteen long years.

Now, Sir, I cannot leave these quotations without giving one from that sturdy champion of free trade, from that whiskered knight of unceasing and irrevocable enmity and opposition to the principle of protection, the gallant gentleman who does not happen to be in his seat this afternoon, who, I have no doubt, at this moment suffers other pains than those rheumatic pains for treatment for which he has to go off to the springs in New York—pains of conscience that he who denounced the coal tax in all its moods and tenses over and over again from his seat in this House, has to remain a member of the Government and sit alongside a gentleman who rises and in his very face and eyes declares that the Government are going to keep the duty upon coal :

However, Sir, these opportunities are gone, and it is our duty now to face the situation as best we may, and I believe, with Mr. Laurier, that the first duty—

You see he says that this is the first duty, not that the Franchise Bill is the first—

—the first duty of the Reform party, the duty which lies next at hand, the duty which is most clearly within their power to perform, is at once and completely to reform the tariff of this country, to reduce it to a revenue basis, to see that no money from this time forward shall, so far as we can prevent it, be taken out of the pockets of the people for any other purpose than for the legitimate needs of the community. Gentlemen, as regards protection, I may say at once that I think that no man who has taken the trouble to examine the working of the protective system, will fail to endorse the statement I make, that liberty and protection are a contradiction in terms.

You can have no true liberty under a protective system; you can have no true liberty under a system the function of which is to create a privileged class and to concentrate an undue proportion of the wealth of the community in the hands of a few individuals. I contend that protection, besides being the cause of the worst political corruption, is the deadly foe of every Liberal who desires to see his country a free country.

Now I am not going to take up the time of the House much longer. I can quote from all the present members of the Government; but I wish just now to read a short quotation from the platform which was introduced by the present Minister of Finance, at that time the leader of the Government of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, who was, I believe, the chairman of that committee, and who reported the resolutions. The resolutions are long, and this one upon the tariff question needs only that I read one or two sentences of it to show its drift :

The Tariff.—We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare :

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

And so on, and so on, which brings in unnumbered evils. Then it goes on :

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await, with the fullest confidence, the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I do not generally complain of disturbance when I am speaking, but I have to face those hon. gentlemen opposite, and a little disturbance in front of a speaker is, as every one knows, more disconcerting than a great deal behind him.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. COCHRANE. It is the Ministers themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. They are the only guilty ones. Now, what have I proved? I have proved that the slogan cry of eighteen years has been: Death to protection, from the party who is now in power. I have proved that the flags under which they have led their forces to battle, that the party platforms they have enunciated, that the comments of their leaders upon those platforms all through, have had, whatever note of variation there may be, one strong and well-defined consistent note, and that was: Death to the principle and death to the policy of protection. Now what I wish to conclude from this is that when a party with that record of eighteen years behind it, comes into power, the people of the country are thrown, as far as business is concerned, into the condition of maximum uncertainty and doubt; because they fear that those men are going to carry out their pledges; they fear that the principle and policy of protection are going to be overturned, and that in their place something directly opposite is to be substituted. They, therefore, have a maximum of uncertainty and doubt in every business relation in which they are engaged. That to-day is the condition in this country. If my hon. friend, nine months ago, had declared to this House the principle upon which he would revise the tariff, that doubt and uncertainty would have been to a certain extent mitigated. He did not do it. All these years that slogan cry has been confronting every producer and manufacturer and disturbing their interests, and although my hon. friend sits here, and his party sits here, and do nothing with reference to that matter, every business interest in this country is feeling to-day a money loss in the present, and the utter paralyzation of effort for the future. They know not which foot to put forward, or upon what they rest when they have put a foot forward.

Mr. FOSTER.

The PRIME MINISTER. They know we will keep our pledges.

Mr. FOSTER. I am thankful to my hon. friend for that. If my hon. friend had a reputation in this country of having fulfilled every pledge that he ever made—which he has not; if the party opposite had the reputation in this country that a party ought to have, that on an issue like the trade question they knew their principles and were willing definitely to abide by them, there would not be so much doubt.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is some hope, then.

Mr. FOSTER. More than that. For the last fifteen months—and I defy my hon. friend to deny it—a whip of terrorism has been held over the business men and producers of this country, whose business and whose interests were founded in any degree at all upon the principle of protection which has been enforced in this country for eighteen years. Does my hon. friend think that he can go through this world of Canada for fifteen months and not know what is going on? Go to Champlain, if you like; go to Bonaventure, if you like; go to Wright, if you like; go to Brantford, if you like; go into any constituency before the general election or since, and I state what cannot be denied, that the Liberal manufacturer has been hopeful. Why? Because a promise has been made simply to his ear. There sits one to-day, there sits another, and you can find them all through this country, who, when you speak to them of the platform pledges of their party, say: We know a thing or two worth more than that, we know it won't touch us. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) sitting there, knows that he has made that statement over and over again, that the manufacturing interests of this country need not be afraid, they will not be hurt.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Nor need they be.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend acknowledges the corn, he could not do other than that. In every by-election which has taken place, the manufacturing and producing interests have been approached, if not by the leaders of the party, by the heelers of the party, and have been given to understand: The tariff is not made yet, you had better consult your own interests. What is the use of imperiling your own business by taking part in that election? You had better keep quiet. They have held that whip over the business interests of this country. My hon. friend knowing, his broken pledges of the past, and knowing the electioneering system which has been carried on in this country on that line, naively looks up in this House and says: Why don't people believe us, then? People have had a little too much experience. They do not altogether believe, and yet they cannot free themselves from a doubt which the pledge makes. They are between two, and this being between two, in that sense, is just what causes the great uncertainty. If they absolutely believed the party, they would cut their cloth for free trade garments at once; but as they do not, they are cutting no cloth at all for their garments, for they do not know whether it is to be free trade or whether it is to be protection.

Mr. LISTER. Would protection to gold mines hurt you?

Mr. FOSTER. How would it affect the oil interests? There is no man in this House who knows better than my hon. friend—and I know it, and my hon. friend knows that I know it—there is more than oil that is bothering hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who does let out those little things so easily sometimes, let it all out of the bag the other night when, standing up before us, he made the remark: You cannot hurry us too much with the tariff, we have got to consult our leading friends before we can bring it down. A political tariff they are making it; it is not a tariff in the interest of the country. They knew all that before. They went through the country and held some commissioners' meetings. They knew more about the subject after that, and now when it is necessary to put the result down in black and white, they find it necessary to consult their leading friends.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There are mouldering branches, and we have to take all those off.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a mouldering branch.

An hon. MEMBER. He will be taken off.

Mr. FOSTER. He will be lopped off at the next general election.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I should like to see you there at the time.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman may go into another county.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is allowable. This is a free country, and it is a good thing to have another county to go to sometimes. The leader of the Government knows that. Since hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power, have they done anything to show that they will promulgate a policy that will be calculated to promote the best interests of this country? Nothing whatever. There is the same attitude of uncertainty and inconsistency maintained. I desire to call the attention of the House to this matter. I am about to read a delectable parable from the leader of the Government. This was delivered in 1882.

Mr. LISTER. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. I knew hon. gentlemen opposite would laugh. They laugh that they are to be held to a principle which is more than five minutes old. A member rose in Parliament and swore by all his political tenets that such and such was the only principle upon which a tariff could be built; but because he did so eight years ago, the hon. member for Lambton says that does not count. No, it does not count for hon. gentlemen opposite. If it were made five minutes ago, it does not seem to count. But I am going to address an argument to the country, where it will count. In 1882 my hon. friend moved the abolition of the coal duties. He spoke on that question and on kindred questions, and among other things he combatted the idea that because the United States pursued a bad policy we ought to pursue a bad policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Kent laughs; no, it is the hon. member for Lambton.

Mr. LISTER. Now you are jumping the fence.

Mr. FOSTER. The present leader of the House is reported in "Hansard"—fortunately it is not a newspaper report—to have said:

Well, then, if the hon. Minister assents to this position, and his followers also assent to it, why do they legislate against nature?

They will tell me that the Americans also legislate against nature. Can this reason ever be given in a civilized country, that because one nation legislates against nature, we should also legislate against nature? The hon. gentleman reminded me of what is said of the Chinese mode of duelling. In Paris, where duels are frequent, a man who is offended calls his adversary out and they settle the matter between themselves,—

I call the attention of the Commissioner of Inland Revenue to the following, as it may be an aspersion upon an adopted country:—

—but in China, if a man is offended, he commences by opening his bowels, and, when this is done, the bloody sword is sent to his adversary, who also opens his bowels, so that instead of one man going to the grave against the laws of nature, two men do so.

On this continent, instead of having one nation legislating against the laws of nature, you have two pursuing that course.

The argument holds to-day. The United States have entered into this duel. It has taken the sword, it has opened its bowels. It has sent the sword to my hon. friend the First Minister; but on the way it got into the hands of the Finance Minister, and what he did was to open his own bowels. The argument was then irresistible; you cannot sustain a bad principle in Canada because it is sustained in another country. The United States is placing the duties higher against this country, and so the argument is still stronger. Does the hon.

gentleman propose to legislate on a bad principle because they did so in another country, and it is legislating against nature? We shall see. The hon. gentleman made a still later utterance; it was delivered in Montreal. He declared:

We are told that we must not destroy the manufacturers of Montreal. I say that we are not going to destroy the industries of Montreal. I contend, on the contrary, that the application of the ideas that we defend will inaugurate an era of prosperity such as Montreal has not known since the inauguration of the National Policy. The present system raises a maximum of taxation, not only on the consumer, but also on the producer. They have a tax on iron, which is also a raw material of every industry. The tax on coal, which is also a raw material of every industry, is 60 cents a ton. Although I have not the latest quotations of coal, I am sure that this tax is equivalent to 40 per cent. Now, I am asked, what are you going to do? I have just told you what we are going to do. We are going to have a tariff for revenue, and we are going to abolish completely the duties on raw material.

I say that if we were to have a revenue tariff, raw materials would be free. Raw materials are not free to-day under the protective system. There are certain raw materials which are free. Wool is free; thank heaven they have not thought of taxing it. Cotton is free also. But is iron free? Cotton is a raw material, and wool is a raw material for certain manufactures. But there are two articles which are raw materials of every manufacturer, and these articles are coal and iron, and are they free? If you have a revenue tariff, the object would be to develop the country, and all raw materials should be free under such a tariff.

Can there be a more explicit statement than that made to the business of the city of Montreal, and consequently to the country, that the hon. gentleman's tariff would include the removal of duties upon raw materials, he specially mentioning two leading articles, coal and iron. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was present with the hon. gentleman. He stands exactly on the same footing, for he declared in this House as follows:—

Now, if there be a principle of political economy clearer than another, it is the principle that the worst tax which could be imposed is a tax on a necessary of life like coal. Moreover, it is a tax exceedingly partial and unjust in its operations. It will fall on the poorest classes of the community in the depth of the Canadian winter. It is absolutely sectional, pressing heavily on the people of Ontario, and not at all on the great mass of the people through the other provinces. It will form a standing grievance. It is a most doubtful benefit to Nova Scotia.

That is the opinion of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce—it was his opinion, at least. Now, what said the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies)?

Protection is false and delusive, and if the coal industry cannot live without being propped up by protection, then we say it is as well for this country that the coal industry should go.

That hon. gentleman is an important member of the Cabinet. The leader of the Government was present in the constituency of Brant at the by-election which took place not long ago. He was a little guarded in his utterances. He spoke all around the subject, he did not give a definite idea of what he would do; but he had a colleague with him on the same platform who was perfectly definite, and the leader of this House sat and listened to the speech delivered by the leader of the Ontario Government, my hon. friend being in the constituency at that time with the intention of carrying it for his party and defeating the Liberal-Conservative candidate. Mr. Hardy said:

Was it going to hurt the manufacturers of Brantford to get free coal? Every year from $30,000 to $50,000 were ground out of them that a few New Yorkers who controlled the mines of Nova Scotia should get the benefit. The Grand Trunk Railway was said to pay almost a half a million a year in duties on coal. Suppose they were added in part to the wages of the men—(applause)—or in part in dividends. That would bring about a new era in the history of the Grand Trunk. So, with free iron, free raw material for all the factories, that policy of free raw materials would give a far more live protection than was now given.

Could anything be more explicit? and yet Sir, the latest development is that the Finance Minister in this House and Sir Oliver Mowat in the other House, vouch for the fact that the Minister of Finance spoke by the book. The Minister of Finance went down to the city of Montreal, and to one particular interest he made this statement:

If it turns out that the United States coal duty is raised to a high figure, then we shall claim to exercise the right to revise our views respecting the Canadian duty, and we shall feel bound to impose a duty, not only on bituminous coal,—

Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) hear that——but also on anthracite coal, which at present comes into our markets from the States free of duty.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Is that the tariff or the Franchise Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. The country is vainly hoping and wishing it may be on the tariff, but the Ministers are outside of it yet, I know, and it will probably take more than the Easter holidays for them to consult their leading men and get together on it. Well, Sir, that is my last point in the argument.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He describes it as argument.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has not been attending to his legislative duties. He comes into the House now, after the main part of my argument is over, and he wants me to repeat it. Surely he won't ask me to do that. The argument summed up is this: That for eighteen years the party platform has given out with one sound, that when they came into power there should be a complete death to protection, and the leaders of the Liberal party, in their platform, in their speeches, in their resolutions in this House, have affirmed the same over and over again, that if they got into power they would wipe out protection. They have not yet removed that doubt and uncertainty by declaring explicitly whether they would carry their professions out or not, and so they leave the whole interests of the country in fear and trembling that they will fulfil their pledges. They have been in power nine months and there is still this utter and irreconcilable diversity between them, which makes it yet impossible for any man to say—judging from their statements—what they will do with the tariff. What is the consequence of this? It is that the business interests of this country are suffering, and suffering badly. I need only advance two or three points to make that clear. The revenue shows it. The revenue has been constantly diminishing, until, when it comes down to nearly the point that it is supposed that the tariff will be brought in, people who have great interests at stake in matters of revenue, hurry to take advantage of the time that is left them to get their merchandise out of bond, and to pay the duties for the time-being rather than they should have to pay the duties which may accrue if the merchandise is not taken out now. The decadence of the revenue shows that there is this doubt and uncertainty. Sir, the newspapers that are upholding the Government have spoken strongly about it; and the "Globe" newspaper more strongly than any. On the 4th January, 1897, under the caption "An early session," the "Globe" said:

The reform of the tariff is perhaps the first question that calls for consideration. * * * The fixing of customs tariff is, of course, the most urgent of all the matters that the Government has to deal with. It is frankly admitted that, while the adoption of protection is one of the easiest of economic changes, its abandonment, in a country like Canada, at all events, is fraught with no small difficulty. But it is not unreasonable that the business community should like to know at as early a day as possible what the reduction is to be. The tariff is one of the prime factors in importation, and the basis upon which that will take place during the ensuing season will be of the first consequence to every merchant and trader in the Dominion.

While the uncertainty lasts, there will be a hesitancy about importing, and a hesitancy about buying from the importer—two conditions which will not tend to improve the business situation. The manufacturer, too, will be inclined to go slow, until he learns definitely about the tax on his raw material and on his manufactured product. If the former is to be reduced, he would feel inclined to lie on his oars until the era of cheaper raw material arrives. It is not necessary to go into detail. The hurtfulness of uncertainty in the business world is too well known to need illustrating, and, being well known, the new Government should be careful not to superadd that disadvantage to the other disadvantages under which trade and industry have been, and are, labouring—the necessity for bringing on an early session of Parliament and taking the country into its confidence as soon as possible.

The country above all things wants an early session of Parliament, and a Budget speech soon after the assembling of Parliament.

That is from the Toronto "Globe" on the 4th of January, 1897. January passed, February passed, most of March passed, and then the House got together. The House met on the 25th, when all these troubles and difficulties had been augmented and added to, and yet we are likely to be here for a month more without the voice of the Government being heard by the business interests of Canada as to what their fate will be in the tariff revision. The "Monetary Times" is not a party organ, and from a late issue of that journal, I read:

The universal cry that comes up from business circles in all directions, in almost all places, is of continued and most monotonous dullness. This condition of things settled down upon this country months ago, and has continued ever since, with blighting effects upon trade and industry, until the condition has become almost unbearable. The banks are experiencing the full effect of all this, and loudly complain of stagnation, want of enterprise, want of active demand for money, and diminished profits. This continues and shows no signs of abating. Failures are constantly occurring, many of them where they were least expected, and amongst those who were thought to be prosperous and doing well. * * * Our readers are well aware of the real cause of this wretched state of things, namely, the uncertainty as to tariff legislation.

And I find on looking over the columns of the "Globe," not in its party columns, for it has now discreetly ceased to say anything about this uncertainty and inability of its party to do what it sees its party is not able to do; that is, to bring down the tariff in good time. I find in the financial columns of the "Globe" of April 3rd, only last Saturday, the following:

Wholesale trade has not been so dull for many years, and no improvement is expected until after the tariff changes have been announced.

Now, Sir, there is no need for my reading from other papers to make that stronger. That is a sample not only of what is being said in the press, but of the cry that is coming from the business people. The same cry comes from the bankers, the producers and the merchants everywhere. The same cry comes up from all of them to the Government: end this uncertainty, stop our losses and give business a chance to recuperate. Here we are to-day, not only without the tariff, but without any prospect of the tariff being brought down. Why is this? They are unready to bring down the tariff, and if they are unready now, after announcing their principles for eighteen years, and after being nine months with the reins of government in their hands, what claim can they lay to be a Government of business men and of business habits. The United States people passed through the throes of an election only a few months ago. Their Congress met under the new regime on the 15th day of March, and on the 31st day of March, through that body—where legislation is not easily passed—they had passed a complete revision of their tariff, and it was sent to the Senate within sixteen days of the opening of Congress. And not their second session either, but their first session. This is the second session of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why have they not the tariff down? Because they are unready—is that the reason? What becomes of the statement made by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) out at Aylmer when an election was on? He has seen the statement in the newspapers, and heard it quoted in the House—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). What statement?

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell you. And from that time to this he has not denied it, and he is not now plucking up courage enough to deny it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not heard the statement made in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. He said that when the hon. leader of the Opposition heard the statement, he would hear a statement that would surprise him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The report in the papers is false.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt my hon. friend is a very diligent reader of the papers. He is too old a politician not to see what his enemies say of him, or not to be flattered by the good things his friends say of him. I was out at Aylmer, and everywhere I was met with the statement, "They are going to have the tariff down right away; Mr. Davies says so." And what is the hon. gentlemen reported as saying? He said:

It had been charged that the Liberals had no policy and no intentions. Well, I would let you into a few secrets only for the presence of these newspaper men. But I can tell you this, that within a week of the opening of Parliament we shall produce our Budget and our tariff; and we shall give Sir Charles Tupper one of the surprises of his life.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will, I am sure, allow me to say that I never made such a statement.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What does my hon. friend mean by the interruption? It is rather rude, I think. I was reported by a number of papers at that meeting—among them the Montreal "Star," an independent paper, the "Citizen" of Ottawa, an Opposition paper, and several others. Not one of them put that statement in my mouth. I did not make it nor anything like it. What I did say was that within a few weeks of the meeting of Parliament I had no doubt the tariff would be brought down. That statement was never made in this House before. If it had been, I should have taken the first opportunity to repudiate it. The hon. gentleman will do me the justice of admitting that it was never quoted or referred to, in my hearing at least. The latter part of the statement is right, that we would give the hon. leader of the Opposition a surprise, and I think we shall.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is now in for a surprise himself. He says he was reported in the Montreal "Star," an independent paper, and in the Ottawa "Citizen," which was not a friendly paper, and that in neither of these papers was he so reported. This is the "Citizen" I am reading from.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, the hon. gentleman cannot be reading from the "Citizen." Is it the "Citizen's" report of the next day?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I read the "Citizen's" report, and did not see the statement. I saw the statement, which was incorrect, in the Ottawa "Free Press," which was the only paper, I understand, that gave it.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has stick-to-it-iveness enough at any rate. What the hon. gentleman now says is that he made the statement that in several weeks the Government would have their measure down. Well, one finds it difficult to know what effect that statement would have two days before an election. At all events, the tariff is not down. What is the reason? Has there been any time within the last eight years when they have not been able to declare before the people that they had well-defined and certain principles on which to base their tariff? Now, I find that in "Hansard," on page 47, in Sir Charles Tupper's speech, this quotation from the "Citizen's" report:

I can tell you, that within a week of the opening of Parliament we shall produce our Budget and our tariff, and we shall give Sir Charles Tupper one of the surprises of his life.

My hon. friend was probably not in the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was not in the House, and I have not heard of it before.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some things, Mr. Speaker, that would help one to the conclusion that the Government is not ready with the tariff, but we are loath to think that a party which, for the last eighteen years, has been on every occasion declaring its fixed principles as to the basis which should underlie tariff revision, which has not only done that outside of the House but has formulated in the House, time and time again, resolutions embodying its views, and which has been in power now for nine months, during which it ought to have been able to have had a tariff ready, if not at the last session, certainly at the beginning of this session—I say that one is loath to conclude that a Government and a party, in these conditions, does not bring down its tariff because that tariff is not ready. If the tariff is not down because of the unreadiness of the members of the Government who have it particularly in hand, there is only one other reason for the delay, and that is because the Government is unwilling to bring it down at this particular time. When the whole country is crying out for relief from its uncertainty and doubt, when the Government have it within their power to solve that doubt and uncertainty, when it is their first duty, as their own chief organ has declared over and over again, to relieve this uncertainty and anxiety at the earliest moment of the session—I say when the Government, under these conditions, are unwilling to bring down their tariff, there must be some vital reason for this unwillingness. It cannot be founded upon any reason, so far as the tariff of the United States is concerned. Taking into consideration the party utterances and the great party victory in that country last autumn, taking into consideration the action of the Ways and Means Committee, taking into account as well the fact that that Ways and Means Committee performed its labours almost unanimously and presented the result of its labours to Congress, and that the House of Representatives, in less than fifteen days, adopted the representations of the Tariff Committee, and sent them to the Senate, where the dominant party has a majority at its control, there can be no reason at all, based upon the constitutional conditions in the United States, why our Government should be unwilling to bring down their tariff. Nor can they base their unwillingness on the ground that the business interests are not waiting and longing for the tariff. The only reasons that I can see why the Government are unwilling to bring down their tariff are certain party and petty reasons which will exist until certain provincial elections are decided, until which time, for reasons best known to themselves, they are unwilling that their tariff measure should see the light of day.

I doubt if ever, in the history of Canada, or in the history of any constitutionally governed country under the constitution of Great Britain, there has ever been seen what we are witnessing at present. Outside of a declaration of the general principle which underlies the revision of the tariff, whether it be the principle of protection or the principle of free trade or the principle of a tariff for revenue alone—outside of the declarations of the principle, in a general way, which serve to guide the public mind and the business interests of the country, it has been the law, up to this time unbroken, that no Finance Minister and no Government should give any intimation to any of the different interests which would be affected by the tariff as to what would be the policy of the Government when the tariff was brought down, with reference to that particular industry. That has not only been the rule of this Dominion Parliament and of the Government of Canada, but it has been a salutary rule, and the moment that you break away from that rule, the moment you single out any one interest—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should really state how that affects the question under discussion. The hon. member knows the form of the resolution which he is to propose, and as he is certainly apparently bringing us very far afield from the object of this discussion, I think he should explain the point of his resolution, so that we may see whether his remarks apply to it or not.

Mr. MCGREGOR. He should not say the same thing over twenty times.

Mr. FOSTER. It is necessary sometimes to repeat—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Order, reply to the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. FOSTER. Having answered my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. McGregor), let me say, in reply to Mr. Speaker, that I am not making my speech from the standpoint of one who has not thought it out and does not know exactly the trend of it. I am not speaking against time, but making an argument which, I believe, is fair and pertinent, and I have no hesitation in saying that when my resolution is before the House, every point I have made will be found to hinge directly upon that resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not make that statement unless I believed it were true.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman to continue his remarks on his own responsibility.

Mr. FOSTER. I do; I am not taking up time in any sense. I was about to say that this rule is a salutary one, and that if we break away from it, we do not know where we may find ourselves. If the hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) or the Government are going, prior to the bringing down of the tariff, to make any intimation to any individual or corporation or industry or interest, which will give that individual or corporation or industry a fair knowledge of what it may have to expect under the tariff, and so give it a chance to run its business in accordance with the coming tariff, the Government is, in the first place, breaking the whole genius and spirit of tariff-making, as we have continued it in this country from confederation up. On the other hand, it is unfair if such hints or intimations be given to one industry and not to others. It is favouritism and most unfair for one to be singled out to receive the information while it is kept from all others. Is it a fact or not that the Finance Minister and the Government have, during nine months, ostensibly and so far as public utterances go, carefully concealed what they proposed to do with any single item of the tariff? There are interests just as great as the coal interests. There are interests which, if they are not as great, yet are just as important to those engaged in them, interests which have been hampered and have suffered heavy money loss because they could not do business on account of not knowing the mind of the Government with regard to the coming tariff. Those industries are scattered all over the country, and I say it is unprecedented and a breaking of that salutary condition I have spoken of, to single out one industry in advance of the tariff and set that industry completely at rest, if not as to the exact amount of duty which shall be levied on their products, at least to give them the minimum duty and to lead them to suppose that, under certain conditions, a higher duty will be placed on their product. My hon. friend beside me spoke about it as a rigging of the stock market. That was not an extravagant expression to use.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The hon. gentleman is out of order in referring to a past debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refer to a past debate.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very happy to be able to congratulate my hon. friend on having at last taken successfully a small point of order. It has been spoken of as a rigging of the market, and it has that effect undoubtedly. Suppose that the intimation had been given six or seven months ago to the pork packers of this country, to the cotton men, to the woollen manufacturers, to the leather producers—to any industry that you choose to name, as to what would be, at least, the minimum of the tariff they might expect, would not the course of business in those industries have been very different from what it has been, and would not those particular industries have been placed upon a very different basis, and would they not have been saved from the loss which has come from these long months of uncertainty and doubt? I think there is no doubt about that. The only safety of the Government is to tell all interests at the same time what they propose to do with them, or else to give no intimation to any interest as to what is to be done. What would the iron makers of Hamilton or New Glasgow not have given to know, nine months ago, whether they could go on with their production, certain that nothing less than a certain amount of protection would meet them when they came to make their after sales. What would not the cotton men have given for similar assurances? So I say that to single out one industry, and that the coal industry, leads us to ask what are the reasons for so doing. What are the circumstances? The Nova Scotia legislature has still a year and a half of its time to run. But it is dissolved hurriedly and the Government goes to the people. On any provincial issue? No, Sir, on no provincial issue whatever. The manifesto issued by the Premier and the leader of the Government party presents simply one issue, and that is the coal duties, upon which, he says, the prosperity of that great industry depends. Is that a proposition that will hold water? Mr. Murray, the provincial Premier, says: I dissolve and go to the people on the issue that I want the Administration at Ottawa to know the mind of this people and that it is in favour of the protection of the coal industry of this province. And before he has got to the people, the Finance Minister makes a speech in the city of Montreal stating on his word as Finance Minister, backed afterwards by a strong member of the Government in another place, backed afterwards by the Finance Minister's own statement here, in the face of his leader and his colleagues intimating that he was authorized to make that statement—that, under certain conditions, which conditions have already been realized, the duty on coal will not be lowered, but that if anything is done, it will be made higher. What becomes, then, of the provincial Premier's issue? Does he believe the Finance Minister? If he does, then the question is settled, and, that being so, why does he want an election in Nova Scotia? Does he not believe the Finance Minister and his Government? That is scarcely credible. What is the only other reason for this delay? It is that there are certain things about that tariff that it is feared when they are made public, will have an adverse effect upon the party interest in Nova Scotia, and there is a desire to get these elections over before the tariff is brought down. Is that the reason hon. gentlemen opposite are unwilling to bring it down? It looks so upon the face of it. Here we have an important industry, at the head of this syndicate, of which Mr. Hardy, the Premier of Ontario, at Brantford, spoke as a syndicate of outsiders, of New Yorkers and said, that for the sake of these, the farmers of Ontario and the railways of the country have to pay the higher duty on their coal. These men, this syndicate, wherever they may reside or however many they may be, are told a thing which puts their business on a solid basis, if the tariff does not come down for fifteen months or more. Do you mean to say that all these things can be put together and you can keep this country from believing that this unwillingness to bring down the tariff is due to the political necessity felt by hon. gentlemen opposite to carry their party in the province of Nova Scotia safely through the elections before any disturbing questions with reference to the tariff are raised? And that when the way it may affect certain interests in Nova Scotia is known the effect might be to alter very much the political sentiment in the province? Are they delaying, not for business reasons, not because of the condition of the United States tariff, but because of the party and political necessity which they feel is laid upon them to have those elections out of the way before they bring down the tariff? And for this the business interests of the country are asked to wait, day after day, week after week, and month after month. By-elections are on in the province of Manitoba. When this tariff comes down, it may be found that certain promises which were made to the western people have not been carried out. It is of great moment to the Liberal party that they shall have the by-elections there over, as far as possible, before the tariff comes down. If that tariff is in any degree disappointing to the west, and if my hon. friend the Finance Minister is going to give the coal interests of Nova Scotia high protective duties, how can he avoid giving the implement men their duties, how can he avoid giving other industries their duties? And if he gives these how can he avoid the difficulty that the men of the west to whom they have promised free trade will feel that these promises have not been fulfilled, and that they have been deceived in this matter and consequent discontent and dissatisfaction will arise. This aspect of the case is one which ought not to be ignored. If these hon. gentlemen are unready, they are at fault. I cannot think that, when they have had nine months to spend upon this question, after long years of constant iteration of their policy, they are not ready. And, if they are unwilling, and there is no reason for delay except party and political reasons, I can only say that is not sufficient reason why we as Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, should sit on this side and not raise our protest against any further deferring of the tariff measure which the business of the country needs, and especially deferring it in favour of a Bill for which there is no present necessity, however much necessity there may be hereafter. Now, these are the points of my arguments and remarks: That we are in a short session, called late, and ought to get through at an early period; that it is the business of a Government that wishes to get through with its business well and speedily to present and press forward first those Bills which are of the greatest importance and to leave to later in the session any business which is not of present practical importance. The most important of all measures promised is the tariff measure, and it is that which the country is looking for and asking for; and I say that the Opposition would not be doing its duty to the business interests of the country if it did not protest against the intervention of a measure which is of no practical importance at the present time. But pressing this measure would not be so bad, even though it was of no practical importance, were it not for the fact that it is the most contentious measure that could be brought before this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that. We know the history of this legislation in this House. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) knows that the Bill he is introducing by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is retrograde in its principles, looked at from the Dominion point of view. He knows it is a Bill which, if carried out—

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The most obnoxious Bill ever placed on the Statute-book.

Mr. FOSTER. This one will certainly be so, I agree with my hon. friend. I am glad that for once, at least, I can agree with him, that this Bill, when it goes upon the Statute-book, will be the most obnoxious Bill that has ever been placed there.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The old Bill, I mean.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends opposite know that this is designed to strike the Conservative party; they know that it is designed for that purpose. The principle that is involved in it is as to whether gentlemen sitting in this Parliament shall have control of their own constituencies, or whether they shall give that control over to a possibly adverse power, a power over which they can exercise no control at all. The principles of that Bill, if I understand it rightly, propose to take our constituencies, and the power of forming these constituencies, from the gentlemen who sit here as a Dominion legislature, and hand it over to a provincial legislature, which may be hostile or may not be hostile, it makes no difference either way. If they are hostile, it may be used to the disadvantage of the party which is in power; if they are favourable, it may be used to the advantage of the party that is in power; but neither of these things is defensible. It also gives to a power entirely out of our own control the right to say what shall be the polling divisions of the constituencies of gentlemen who sit in this House. Now, if there is one principle that is well established, it is this, that a legislature should have control over its own constituencies, that it should fix the bounds of its own constituencies, that it should be the executive power which carries out its own elections, and that neither of these things should be given to a power outside of itself, one which may be hostile or one which may be favourable, there is no difference in the principle of the thing at all. Now, Sir, to bring into this Parliament a Bill so against the genius of our federal institutions a retrograde motion, so far as the growing community and progress of this country, from a federal point of view, is concerned, is bad enough; but to bring it in and pass it under local conditions now existing, which put the governance of these elections, of the bounds of the constituencies, of the men who vote, entirely into the hands of law-givers over whom we have no control, who may be hostile to us, and whose laws at present existing upon the Statute-book are not to the credit of the provinces, nor are they for the purity of elections or the straightforward and honest declarations of the will of the electors—it is on these grounds, I say, that this Bill is a contentious Bill. If my hon. friend expects that Bill to pass in a few days, he is quite mistaken. Every line of that Bill will have to be fully and exhaustively discussed, every line of that Bill will be fought by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, not in a way merely contentious, but with a view of making it a measure, so far as it possibly can be made, which will give justice to all parties. The Bill as it is presented before the House, does not do so; and if Her Majesty's Opposition can defeat that Bill and substitute a better principle, it is the determination of the Opposition to do so. That makes it a Bill which will require time, and it is utter folly for the Government, who wish to get quickly through with their business, who have business admittedly important that ought to be before the House and that must be passed, to interject between that business and the present time a Bill of this contentious nature, which must be debated lengthily, which must be fought inch by inch, and which this House must criticise first in its principle, and afterwards, if it be defeated on that point, in the details of the Bill to its very last section. I am making now a plea for taking this Bill out from the consideration of the House until a more important measure has been discussed and has been passed, namely, the tariff measure. My hon. friend who sits beside me, in the way of counsel, asked whether it would not be better that this House should forego consideration of that Bill for this session entirely, inasmuch as there was no present need for it. My resolution is not going so far; it is simply going to say that until the tariff measure is brought down and is disposed of, the House can very well leave aside the discussion of this measure which has been brought before us this afternoon. That is the length to which my resolution will go. More than that, I will state that if the other measures which hon. gentlemen have to pass through, measures which are not of this contentious kind, the Estimates which we must have for the service of the country, if it is necessary for the Government to take some little time to discuss and consider these, we are ready to discuss and consider them with a view to getting them most speedily through this House. But it is different with this Bill: it is different because this Bill is absolutely of no importance at the present time. It is a Bill which goes against what we believe to be absolutely essential to the dignity and the independence of this House: it is a Bill which puts the fortunes of this House as to constituencies, as to constituents, as to polling divisions, as to the administration of the law, entirely in the hands of bodies over which we have no control, and bodies which may be hostile to us; but whether hostile or not, makes no difference in the principle, as I have said before. With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move:

That all the words after "That" in the original motion be struck out, and the following be added in lieu thereof:—

"The further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the tariff promised by the Government for this session, has been disposed of by this House."

Mr. CAMERON. I have listened with great attention to a three-hours' speech delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. Of the three hours of the time of the House taken up by the ex-Finance Minister, five minutes exactly were devoted to the principles of the Franchise Bill; all the rest of the hon. gentleman's speech was extraneous to and entirely beside the matter now before the House. I have said that I listened with considerable attention to the hon. gentleman's speech: but had I known the line of argument the hon. gentleman was going to pursue, I must confess that I would not have paid the same attention to it, because to my certain knowledge, two-thirds of it I have heard three times in the House during this present session, either from himself or from the gallant baronet who sits beside him. Now, three times in one session, and in speeches of three, four or five hours is altogether too much of a dose for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, Sir, I think that I might well charge the hon. gentleman with having obtained the right to address the House, and with having addressed the House, under false pretenses. I assumed, in my simplicity and innocence, that when the hon. gentleman rose to reply to the clear and lucid statements of my hon. friend the Solicitor General, that we were going to have an exhaustive argument on the Franchise Bill. Instead of that the hon. gentleman has boxed the compass; he has been here, there and everywhere. This tariff, the tariff that worries the life out of the hon. gentleman, that is a nightmare to him, that he dreams of at night and thinks of every hour of the blessed day, appears to worry the hon. gentleman. Don't be worried; it will come down in due time; and perhaps when the hon. gentleman does see it, it will not be exactly as he would like to have it for the purpose of embarrassing the Government.

It was, taking it altogether, an extraordinary speech, closing with an amendment to which I have no objection. I do not want to be offensive, and I never was so in the House; but I do not believe I could describe the hon. gentleman half so well as an hon. gentleman in the Imperial House of Commons described just such a speech as the hon. gentleman has delivered. The words are not mine, Mr. Speaker, I only use the classical language of a distinguished member of the Imperial House of Commons, and say the speech of the hon. gentleman was the veriest tommy-rot as applied to this Bill. The hon. gentleman in the early part of his speech occupied at least half an hour in assigning this reason and that reason for the postponement of this Bill. The House was called too late, he said. That was a tremendous sin on the part of the First Minister. But fortunately or unfortunately it was a sin committed by the Tories for the last thirty years, off and on, and in fact was very frequently committed by them. But whether it was a sin or not, what on earth has it to do with the discussion of the Franchise Bill? The Bill is before the House, the second reading has been moved, the hon. gentleman made a speech in reply, and we are now discussing the Bill. Assuming, for argument sake, that the House was called rather late in the season, surely that is no argument against proceeding with the Bill, discussing its principles and its various clauses? The hon. gentleman has stated that the Bill ought not to have been introduced, that it ought not to be proceeded with, that it ought not to be discussed until this terrible tariff comes down. The tariff is not down yet, but we have a Bill before the House, and surely hon. members are going to occupy the time of the House in discussing some measure that is not before the House. Then the hon. gentleman was much concerned about the spring ploughing and the farmers. Why, Sir, he has supported a Government ever since he came into Parliament that never thought of the farmers; they paid great attention to the combinesters and the large manufacturers, but they had very little time for the farmers, and we may now well say, as was said by a farmer during my last campaign: The late Government gave eighteen years to the combinesters; we hope the new Government will give a few years to the interests of the poor farmers. Yet the hon. gentleman regrets that Parliament was called so late because it interferes with the spring ploughing. Why, he never had a plough in his hands in his life; I doubt whether he could tell the head from the tail.

Mr. FOSTER. I never saw a plough.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman could not handle one. Again, the hon. gentleman is very much concerned regarding the possible absence of the Premier from the Queen's Jubilee. My own opinion is that the hon. gentleman himself would like to be there. He wishes at all events the leader of the House to attend the Queen's Jubilee, and he asks what is the Liberal party going to do when the great Liberal leader is absent. Why, we are not so badly off as is the party opposite; we can spare the leader of the Liberal party, and if he goes to England we can find ten men to lead the House in his absence, indeed when I look around I see a score of members who are well able to lead the House in the absence of the Prime Minister. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not, however, a man to lead them except the old baronet from Cumberland, and we all know the experience of the party during the few months he was head of the Government. He led them into the ditch, they are there now, and my earnest prayer is that they may remain there a long time. Then the hon. gentleman had a fling at my friend the Postmaster General. My hon. friend introduced a few Bills, probably good in principle and perhaps they might have been better in practice, but because he does not as a Minister of the Crown introduce those Bills now and press them, the hon. gentleman is terribly concerned. Why, it has taken all the Postmaster General's time from daylight to dark and well into the small hours of the morning to unravel post office matters and try and correct the scandals that were perpetrated by the Tories when they were in power, and I believe it will take the Postmaster about the remainder of his natural life to straighten them out. Post offices sold, mail contracts sold in open market—it will take a long time before the Postmaster General will be able to undo what hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House when in office accomplished with marvelous success.

I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman through his three hours' speech on the trade question and various other questions; I am going to deal with the Bill introduced by the Solicitor General to repeal what some people call an infamous Act, and with the principles involved in the Bill the Solicitor General has submitted and for which he asks the sanction of Parliament. The hon. gentleman says it is a trivial and unimportant Bill, one of no consequence. The Tories did not think a Bill relating to the franchise in 1885 was a trivial and unimportant Bill. The leader of the Government at that time did not say exactly that he was prepared to shed the last drop of his blood and die in his tracks for the Bill, but he and his followers fought for the Bill, and those members who were in the House at that day are well aware that day in and day out for over one week, with no adjournment except for dinner, the House continued to sit for the purpose of pressing this Bill through. By numerical strength and force they pushed it through the House. I agree with the view frequently expressed that a worse Bill, a more scandalous Bill, a more infamous Bill never was placed on the records of Parliament than the Franchise Bill of 1885. Sir, that Bill admittedly was not introduced in the interest of the public, surely it was not introduced in the interest of the Liberal party, or in the interest of the great mass of the people. Pray in whose interest was it introduced? It was introduced into this Parliament, it was discussed, it was forced through for the purpose of advancing the interests of the Tory party. And it did so. For twelve years, by virtue of the Franchise Act and by virtue of the still more infamous gerrymander Act, hon. gentlemen opposite were able to return to Parliament after the general elections with a majority behind them. I believe now, however, that the good sense of the Canadian people is so strong and determined that not even the Franchise Act or the Gerrymander Act could restore hon. gentlemen opposite to the Treasury benches. Sir, that law was uncalled for, nobody asked for it, there were no petitions presented to Parliament in favour of it. On the contrary, if my memory serves me, there were petitions presented against it, at all events, there were many and strong remonstrances made against the passing of that Bill. It was not called for, it was not required, and before its passage we acted under a law practically the same as the Solicitor General has now introduced. Did the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) ever complain of the old franchise system? Was there a man in Parliament who ever complained of any injustice or wrong being done under it? No, Sir, every one was satisfied. We heard nothing in those days of a want of dignity in the Parliament of Canada adopting the local Franchise Acts, and using the local lists. Everybody was satisfied, until the tempter in an evil hour seduced from their allegiance to the country the Ministers who then occupied the Treasury benches, and pawned off this so-called Franchise Bill on the country. We were told then, that the Bill was introduced in the interests of the country, but we knew it was intended for the purely political purpose of obtaining an undue and illegitimate advantage over the Liberal party. Nobody knows that better than the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition. Sir, the honest sentiment of the country in 1885 was opposed to that Bill. The honest sentiment of the country has been opposed to it from that day until this hour, and the honest sentiment of the country will be opposed to it until the Bill of my hon. friend the Solicitor General becomes the law of the land. The Conservative members of this House well know the iniquities of the present franchise law. They know the hardships of it, and the difficulties of working it, and in their calmer moments they admit that the statements which I now make are correct. The experience of twelve years of that law has from, day to day, intensified the feeling in my province against it. It was ostensibly introduced by the then First Minister in the interests of the public, and Sir John Macdonald declared that the principle of the Bill was that the franchise should be uniform throughout the Dominion. He said:

A system of representation applicable to all the provinces was a necessity.

And he further declared:

That the same class should be represented in every province, that the same franchise should be applicable to all the provinces, that the same interests should be represented in all the provinces.

Well, Sir, after we discussed that Bill for weeks and weeks together, the principle upon which it was based at its inception was abandoned by the First Minister, and the franchise was not made uniform throughout Canada. We have not the same classes represented in all the provinces; we have not the same interests represented in all the provinces. Ontario and Prince Edward Island have a different franchise, Quebec and British Columbia have a different franchise, Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia have all different franchises, and hardly two of the provinces of which this Dominion is composed have the same franchise under the existing law. In my judgment it is time that this Act should be repealed, and its worst features eliminated from the Statute-book.

Sir, the reasons for the passage of the present law never existed, and they never will exist, and the Act has produced grave injustice to the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, and no doubt throughout the whole Dominion. We were told when this Bill was introduced in 1885, that it was simple, easily worked, and economical. But the experience of twelve years has proven that the law is complicated, that it is open to various interpretations by the revising officers, and that the revising officer of one riding takes an entirely different view of the qualifications, from the revising officer of another riding. In order to show the House that this is so, I intend to submit one or two facts, because I find that in discussing a question of this kind, facts are more important than all the rhetoric, or all the eloquence—if I did possess such a thing—that I could possibly use. I find that one of the revising officers, when an application was made to him to add a large number of income voters placed upon the list in a western constituency, gave the following judgment on the following declaration. The declaration was made in due form of law under the sanction of the statute, in the following words:—

I am in the receipt of wages to the value of $300 a year and over, and have been so for one year prior to the 1st of January, 1886; and have been a resident of the city for that same period.

Now, would it be believed that this sapient and all-wise returning officer appointed by the Conservative Government, rejected that declaration and so disqualified over thirty voters. He says in his judgment:

I want information, and information must be supplied in an intelligible form. The "1st of January, '86," in figures, not written, must be supplied in so many words, and not by contractions.

And so this wise revising barrister, whom the late Government appointed in 1885, disqualified thirty voters because "1st January, '86" was in figures and not in writing. This learned gentleman goes on to say:

The words "$300 or over" convey no meaning. The law requires it to be "not less than $300."

Well, if it was over $300 it could not be very well less than $300, don't you see, but this wise returning officer, appointed by the Conservative Government, disqualified a large number of voters, because in the first place the figures were not written, and in the second place, because the words "$300 and over" were used instead of "not less than $300." I commend that judge for his skill and I would advise him to make application to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House for information. There never was another statute in which the loop-holes for fraud and misconduct were greater than in this Franchise Act. The complicated franchise it provides is difficult to understand, and you hardly ever find two revising officers agreeing in regard to them. But it was open to other frauds, which have been perpetually committed for the last twelve years. Let me give you some instances. There is one constituency in which it was found when the voters' list was placed in the hands of the returning officer, that 125 names were on the list twice in one polling subdivision, and that 15 names were inserted three times. There was a chance for men who had slept their long sleep for ten years presenting themselves; and this was done as systematically and regularly as the ballot stuffing that has become notorious from one end of the Dominion to the other. Over 50 men whose names were on that list had not been living in the riding for years, but had been living, some in the United States, and some in the North-west Territories; 119 names were added on the revision, but only 12 of these were names of residents of the province of Ontario. Over a dozen minors were added to the list by the revising officer. There is another constituency and another municipality in which, at the revision, 150 names were stricken off the list submitted to the revising officer. Will it be believed?—every one of these 150 names was found on the list when it was handed to the returning officer. There you see, is room for fraud, and fraud has been perpetrated, and hon. gentlemen opposite for twelve years have had the benefit of these irregularities and these frauds. More than that: scores of names were added by declaration, not one of which was on the list when handed to the revising officer. All these men whose names were added were Liberals, but their names did not appear on the voters' list when it came to polling day. There were five names on the voters' list of men who had been dead, some for ten years, and some for five years. Several names were duplicated in almost every polling subdivision in that constituency. In my own riding, in one polling subdivision, there were 19 men on the list described as stage-drivers, although there was only one stage-driver in the whole division. There were 19 men on the list that nobody in the township knew—certainly nobody in the polling subdivision. This is the kind of law which hon. gentlemen opposite want us to keep in force—a law that encourages fraud, that offers a premium for fraud, and that when worked out under the manipulation of the revising officers, benefits the Conservative party. In a western town it was found that 119 names of men who were not living either in the town or in the county were on the voters' list; 80 of them had sold out and left the place years before. Forty-six of the eighty were living in the United States, and 17 were dead. Fifty good names were left off the list altogether. The dead men whose names were on the voters' list that came before the returning officer were just as sure to vote as the sun is to rise to-morrow. They are very much alive when polling day comes. Somebody is there to attend to them. That is not all. In my own riding at the last revision, I found that one man who owned 200 acres of land in West Wawanosh, who had lived there 25 years, and had voted at every election during that time until January, 1896, had no vote. His name was on the assessment roll, the collector's roll, and the local list, but not on the voters' list. Another man who had occupied 200 acres of land for four years was left off the voters' list. Another man in the town of Goderich, who had lived there for 30 years, who owned the property where he lived, and who had voted at every election, was left off. Another man, Patrick McCarthy, who had lived in the town for 35 years, was on the local list, the assessment roll, and the collector's roll, but not on the Dominion list when election day came. Another man, James Munro, who had lived there 40 years, and had voted at every election during that time, was on the assessment roll, the collector's roll and the local list, but not on the Dominion list. Scores of names added at the revision were left off the list on polling day, and scores of names that had been stricken off the list were on when polling day came. A law under which such things can happen is a law that ought to be repealed at the earliest possible moment. I care not what the hon. gentleman calls it, to my mind it is anything but trivial and unimportant. It is one of the most important laws we have on the Statute-book—a law which sends the members to this Parliament, and which we ought to see honestly carried out; but it has never been honestly carried out. There were in my own riding at the last revision about 100 names left off that should have been on, or on that should have been off, and you may be sure that those who were on that should not be were not the names of Liberals. In one municipality there were 100 such. There are seven municipalities in my riding, so that on that basis there were 700 votes that were either left off intentionally or put on intentionally, where neither should have happened. All this is owing to this vicious law, as vicious a law as ever found a place on the Statute-book of this country; and this Government would not be worthy of its name as a square, honest Government, willing to carry out the will of the people who sent it here, if it did not repeal this law. When I make these charges, I do not attribute them all to the revising officers. In fact, I am not sure now these things happened—whether by the manipulations of the revising officers or their clerks or at the printing bureau at Ottawa. That they did happen is capable of the clearest proof, and the fact that they can be proved ought to be sufficient to justify us in repealing this law.

Now, there is another reason why this abominable law should be removed from the Statute-book. We were assured when this Bill was introduced by the late Sir John Macdonald, that it would be a law simply and easily worked, and above all that it would be an economical law. Now, I appeal to the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite whether it be true that this is an economical law. Why, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) told us that the money extracted from the Dominion Treasury for the purpose of paying the army of officials created under this law amounted to the sum of $1,250,000; but that is nothing to what it really costs the country to carry out this law—a law so bad so vexatious, so costly, that hon. gentlemen opposite, for twelve years, dared not enforce it, except upon four different occasions. Some elections were held upon lists two years old, and in some cases three years old, so that every young man of twenty-three or twenty-four was disfranchised because hon. gentlemen opposite dared not enforce their law, on account of the enormous cost, and that is what the hon. gentlemen terms a trifling matter. That is the law which the hon. gentleman is pleased to describe as one that does justice and fair-play to the rising generation and the voting population in this country. I am amazed to hear the hon. gentleman make such a broad assertion. The hon. Solicitor General told us when introducing the Bill, that the cost of enforcing this law at different revisions amounted to $1,250,000. I now make the statement boldly on the floor of Parliament, that every revision of the voters' lists apart from what it cost the country, cost each candidate in each riding at least $350. I know that in my riding we can never revise the lists for much less than double that sum. Our Conservative friends have to pay the same sum. They do not neglect their duty in looking after the voters' lists, and the result is that in every constituency in the Dominion the revision costs, on an average, I venture to say, $700 to the candidates, apart from what it costs the Government. We have over 200 constituencies. Multiply $700 by 200, and you have the cost of each revision, outside the expense to the Government, amounting to nearly $150,000. You will thus see, Mr. Speaker, the enormous sums extracted, under this so-called Franchise Bill, out of the pockets of the candidates and the electors and ratepayers of the Dominion. Well, I submit, that that is not a condition of things that ought to exist in a country like this, and we ought to repeal this law, which we have had now for twelve years on our statutes, and which, the Lord knows, we have had long enough.

There are other objections that, in my judgment, are of paramount importance. I have only glanced hastily over the Bill of my hon. friend, and I do not see in it any provision for one man one vote. If there is not such a provision in the Bill, the hon. gentleman ought to insert it. Let the man vote and not the property he holds. The man's judgment will then be exercised and not the judgment of the inanimate thing.

Mr. CAMERON.

I say here, especially after the extraordinary revelations that were made in the election trial in the city of London, that there is no one source that tends more to corruption or a violation of the election law, than cumulative voting. Voters with us are scattered all over. A great many, I am sorry to say, go to the United States, a great many go to the North-west Territories, and when an election takes place, especially in a close constituency, it is of importance that these scattered fragments should be gathered together. Both parties make the greatest possible effort to get in the outside vote. A man's fate, as a candidate for parliamentary honours or perhaps even as a Minister of the Crown, may depend on his getting in the outside vote. I have had some experience of this. In my by-election of 1892, I found three men, who had lived in British Columbia for years, brought in on passes from that province to vote against me. From Crystal City in the North-west Territories, eight men came in on passes over a certain railway to vote against me and all their expenses were paid. From Manitoba and the North-west Territories and British Columbia, over fifty outside votes were brought into West Huron to vote against me, and all their expenses paid. The majority against me was sixteen, and as I could not go to the expense of bringing in men from outlying provinces and from the United States, the result was that these fifty votes gave my opponent his majority of sixteen and some to spare. If my hon. friend the Solicitor General will take my advice, he will, on the further consideration of this Bill, give one man one vote. Look at the terrible condition of things that was revealed in the London election trials. Both parties struggled to get the party vote from Hamilton, Detroit and Toronto, and other places. I am satisfied that there is nothing which tends so much to the violation of the election law as the right of a man to vote in as many constituencies as he can reach.

There is another thing which I am not sure is in my hon. friend's Bill or not, and that is the right to appoint returning officers. I am not sure whether the Government have reserved still to themselves the power of nominating returning officers. If they do, my own inclination is to oppose that clause. I believe that the correct and fair and honest principle, would be to make the local officials returning officers—the sheriffs and registrars of counties, men who have got their offices for life, who have responsible and honourable positions to fill, and who are not likely therefore to commit fraud. Under the present system, what have we had? We have had jail birds, penitentiary birds, appointed as deputies. We have it on record that in one case a man who was appointed a deputy returning officer had been convicted 42 times by the police magistrate.

Mr. BEATTIE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He was never convicted of any offence.

Mr. CAMERON. What do you know about it?

Mr. BEATTIE. I know all about it.

Mr. CAMERON. I was not referring to the hon. gentleman about it at all. I only said that one man had been convicted 42 times, and from the hon. gentleman's interruption I am afraid there is something in it. All I can say on the subject is that at one election trial it was sworn to that one deputy returning officer had been convicted 42 times, and is now in jail.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? The statement was made that a returning officer had been a jail bird, not a deputy returning officer, and let me further state that in my last election, one of the deputy returning officers was arrested three days afterwards for fraud and forgery. That is a sample of the appointment of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CAMERON. If so, he ought to be committed, but it strikes me forcibly that I saw somewhere that in the west they brought deputy returning officers from the city of Winnipeg, and one of these had just got out of the penitentiary where he had been for a year or two. At all events, whether that statement be correct or not, we ought to have returning officers who would not select such men as their deputies, and you can accomplish that best by making the sheriffs and registrars of counties ex-officio returning officers.

I do not propose to discuss this matter much further. The hon. gentleman who preceded me said nothing practically about the Franchise Bill, but his leader, on the introduction of this Bill, did make some observations to the effect that it would be beneath the dignity of this Parliament to leave our franchise at the mercy of the local legislatures. Well, I know one country where the local legislatures fix the qualification; they have either universal suffrage or property qualification. If my memory serves me right, in the United States Congressmen are elected by universal suffrage, but the suffrage is fixed by the different states as they see fit. They may give a vote to a mule, they may make an income franchise, or establish a property qualification or do anything they like. Yet every United States Congressman is elected under the franchise adopted by his own commonwealth. Sir, I never heard any complaint of that system. I believe that it is wholly unexceptionable, and I believe that this Government could do no better thing than follow that course. The hon. gentleman says that he would favour universal suffrage rather than have the local legislatures prepare the voters' lists. I am as strongly in favour of an extended franchise as any man could well be. We have nothing to complain of in our province. We have an extended suffrage there. Every man who is a British subject, who is over 21 and a resident of the district for 12 months, I think it is, has a right to vote. But suppose we do accept the hon. gentleman's theory and declare universal suffrage for the Dominion, the most objectionable feature of the Franchise Act still remains. What I complain of and what my hon. friends complained of when this Bill was passing Parliament and ever since it was enacted, was that the tools, the instruments, the partisans of the Government are revising officers in a great many cases, and we have got to fight them. In making up the provincial lists, the judges and the junior judges are revising officers. Most of these gentlemen are Conservatives. The Government has been continuously Conservative for eighteen years, and the judiciary has fallen into the hands of the Tories, especially in the local courts. We do not complain of that. The judges are men who realize their responsibility, and are independent, to a large extent, with very few exceptions of politics. They care but little what Government is in power. They have their fixed allowance and they draw their pay regularly and are independent of the Government. On the whole we have nothing to complain of. But I want no franchise, federal or local, under which there must be revising officers appointed by the Government, and I care not whether the Government is Liberal or Tory. If we were to act as human nature prompts, we would treat hon. gentlemen opposite to a good dose of their own medicine. But we do not do business that way. We want justice to all parties. We say: Abolish the revising officers, save an enormous amount of money to the Canadian tax-payers, and let those who are seeking to have their names put upon the voters' list and those who have a right to be there so placed that their claims shall be fairly and honestly treated. The First Minister and his colleagues have taken a step in the right direction. They are implementing their pledges. I had no doubt that in every respect those pledges will be carried out. But, in order to complete the work they have undertaken, they must do something more than abolish the Franchise Act; they must abolish a still more infamous Act that was placed upon the Statute-book by the Tories—I refer to the infamous Gerrymander Act. When the hon. the Premier has repealed the Franchise Act, when he has repealed the Gerrymander Act and reconstructed the counties, not upon party lines, but having due regard to the judicial and municipal boundaries—when he has done that he will have satisfied the great mass of his supporters, and I believe he will have satisfied the great mass of the people of this country. He and his colleagues will then have accomplished a task that will live in the memory of Liberals and of all honest and independent men long after they themselves have passed from the scene of action. I hope the hon. the Premier will very shortly introduce a Bill to repeal the Gerrymander Act.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the indulgence of the House for a very few moments while I discuss the amendment moved by the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). But before doing so I must pay some attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman complained that a good deal of time has been taken up in discussing a matter not at all pertinent to the question before the House. But the hon. gentleman himself has sat down without giving a single reason why this Bill should be proceeded with. The House, I am sure, was prepared to listen to any reasonable argument that might be adduced by that hon. gentleman to show why the Bill should be proceeded with now and why the Bill which is more important than all others, this session, the Bill relating to the tariff, should be delayed. Now, the hon. gentleman made reference to what he is pleased to call—I would like the hon. gentleman stay in his place and hear what I have to say.

Mr. CAMERON. I will come back and hear you; I like to hear you.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman will have that pleasure if he will remain only a few minutes. We can quite excuse the hon. gentleman for leaving. A gentleman who dealt, to put it mildly, in such extravagant statements, might be expected to walk out before he hears the reply. The first thing we heard from him was a reference to the "infamous" Franchise Act. It does seem to me that no more extravagant and no more bald statement could be made. Yet it has been made use of until it has become a by-word of the Liberal party from one end of the country to the other, and they have come to believe that the Franchise Bill of 1885 was aimed at one political party and that its design was an infamous one. I challenge any gentleman in this House to show—independent of the defects incident to any legislation—and it is only by putting a law in force that we learn its defects—to show that it is a bad law and particularly to give the slightest evidence that the Conservative party had the slightest advantage in the administration of the law with regard to the voters' lists. Let me turn to the county I have the honour to represent. The judge there is a Liberal, a strong Liberal. I am bound to say here, in justice to that gentleman—and I think, on the broader ground, the same applies equally to every judge in Ontario, and I have no reason to think that it does not equally apply to every revising officer from one end of Canada to another—that he was perfectly fair. He laid down one rule at the outset; both parties knew what it was and were kept to it, so that there could be no injustice. Now as to leaving names off the list. Is it not perfectly plain that whatever system you adopt, some names will be left off. It is utterly impossible to frame a Franchise Bill so as to have every name put upon the list that might reasonably be expected to appear there. I must call attention to another statement that was made, namely, that there is a disagreement among the judges. Well, is that a new thing? If a layman were to make a statement like that in this House, he might be excused; but when a member of the legal profession says that because judges disagree regarding the voters' lists that is a reason for taking it out of their hands, it does seem to me the most extraordinary statement coming from such a source that I ever heard. Then the hon. gentleman spoke with regard to dead men voting. I am sorry that he did not call my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) as a witness. I am sure he could tell him about the dead men who came from London to Brantford to vote, who were caught red-handed in the Liberal committee room, who were arrested in the Liberal committee room, and led off by a friendly policeman. Then the hon. gentleman has a nightmare over the gerrymander. I would like to know if the Liberal party ever gerrymandered. I would like to refer him to the province of Ontario, in the very year in which this franchise Act was passed, in 1895, when the present Minister of Justice was at the head of affairs in that province. Why, Sir, he is a pastmaster in gerrymandering, he is the prince of gerrymanderers in this country. He was able to shape constituencies in the province of Ontario with loaded dice. He is perfectly safe, he is able to defeat the will of the people in that province. And how far did he go? Why, he went so far in the very judicial county in which the hon. gentleman resides who spoke last, as to cut a township in two in order to serve his own party. Yet this hon. gentleman had never heard of a gerrymander before. Then he is shocked again for fear the Government will appoint as returning officers other than those who are registrars and sheriffs in the province of Ontario—because he speaks more particularly for that province. Now, let me ask that hon. gentleman, How do these gentlemen earn their positions under the local government? Are they not picked up because they have been partisans in the past? They earned their wages before they received them, and they walked out of the legislature and were placed in these positions. I say if there are partisans in this country, these gentlemen are partisans of the worst kind. I say the great army of officials in the province of Ontario have been appointed to these positions simply in order that they might do service to their party afterwards. I am not making a charge against returning officers in that province. I believe that men may be appointed by this Government as returning officers in the province of Ontario, or elsewhere, who are not so degraded, who are not quite so low as to violate their oath any more than the returning officers did who were appointed under the late Government. It does seem to me to be a serious charge, and I think it hardly a fair charge for any hon. gentleman to shelter himself behind. Let the hon. gentleman point to the cases where wrong has been done. That some person may have gone wrong, may be the case. But is that a fair argument to use here because you can point to a single instance in a whole election, or a few instances? The hon. gentleman cannot hope to make a case out of an exception; it should be substantially the rule before there is an outcry. Now, I do not propose to go further with that. I simply wish to say that the hon. gentleman who made his little speech and then went out, was somewhat disappointing to the House, at least to this side of it, and I am not at all sure that he was not disappointing to the First Minister. That hon. gentleman sat down without giving any good reason why we should not proceed with the Tariff Bill, rather than with this Franchise Bill. Now, I think every hon. gentleman in this House must feel impelled to support the amendment moved by the ex-Finance Minister. The arguments which were adduced in favour of his amendment are wholly unanswerable. No doubt, the course of hon. gentlemen opposite will be a surprise to both sides of the House, and a surprise, I fancy, to the country. The whole country is in such a state of feeling that no matter what position the hon. gentlemen may take, it will be a surprise. If the hon. gentlemen should turn their backs upon their pledges, on the strength of which the most of them have come to this House, will it not be a surprise to a great many of their friends? Will not one-half of the people at least be greatly surprised that they should take a position of that kind? Then let us suppose that hon. gentlemen should live reasonably up to their pledges; will they not surprise the electors in whose ears they have been whispering during the general elections and the by-elections, that no great changes would be made in the tariff? The people will be surprised if the hon. gentlemen keep their pledges; but so far they have not made a record in that direction. I am sure those who have been threatened in this country with complete commercial annihilation, those who have been kept in business suspense for nearly nine months, may possibly have little fear that anything will overtake them, because they can refer to the records of the hon. gentlemen in carrying out their pledges in other directions. Let me say that no case like the present has ever occurred in the history of Canada before. There was no time when there was so much uncertainty with regard to any previous revision of the tariff in Canada, and when the people did not have at least something before them. Before the adoption of the National Policy, it was only a case of how much the tariff might be raised by percentage. Then we had the National Policy, to which the Liberal Conservative party were committed; they were committed irrevocably to the maintenance of that tariff, and there could be no question then as to the permanency of the tariff if that party were sustained in power. There could be no doubt in the minds of the people after the general elections as to what the character of the tariff would be. There might be many things regarding details that had to be worked out, and that must always more or less affect the commercial interests of the country; but the general principle was so clearly laid down and adhered to, that the business of the country became inseparably connected with it, and there was not a single doubt in the minds of the people as to the broad grounds upon which the policy of the Conservative party would proceed. Now, I wish to point out to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce one or two things. I am glad to see him here, because he has declared to the country that thirty million dollars were taken annually out of the pockets of the people that never went into the treasury. Now, Sir, he and his friends have been nearly ten months in office. The hon. gentleman has slept, and no doubt has taken his ease, at least during nearly ten months. Now, during that time, without making a very close calculation, according to his statement, about twenty-five millions dollars have been filched from the pockets of the people that have not gone into the treasury. Now, I want to ask that hon. gentleman and the First Minister, if it be true that a greater amount by far than the customs revenue of this country is taken each year improperly from the pockets of the people, how is it that ten months should have been allowed to elapse without their taking any steps to stop a course that is so vicious, so detrimental to the public interest, and that is producing such results as have been stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I say, Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that no delay can be excused in putting a stop to an evil of that kind if it exists, as hon. gentlemen have stated.

There is another class of people, the farming community, to which the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House referred, this class being composed of about three-quarters of a million of people interested in this matter. We have had pointed out to us more than once the great evils under which the farming community has suffered during recent years. The evils were described as being of a very serious character, and if they were half as bad as stated and crystallized into the platform of the Liberal party, surely a remedy ought to be at once applied. In addition to the large sums of money declared to have been taken from the pockets of the people, what do we find? We find that hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1893, declared:—

It had decreased the value of farm and other property; it had oppressed the mass for the enrichment of the few; it had caused a great loss of population; it had checked immigration; it had impeded commerce; it had discriminated against Great Britain, and it had been the means of fostering trusts, corporations and monopoly.

Now what would be the remedy? All hon. gentlemen would have to do would be to come down with their tariff, and the people will secure commercial emancipation at once; the farmers will look for a rise in the value of their property; the masses will be provided with labour; the discrimination against the masses will cease; combinations and trusts will cease, and all the wrongs suffered would terminate at once. It appears to me that some reason ought to be given, other than a Franchise Bill that will not be required for four or five years. Why should the Government delay a single hour in bringing down the tariff and proceeding with that important measure if their statements be true? It has been stated in general terms by the ex-Finance Minister that this side of the House was willing to proceed with this Franchise Bill and that the Opposition were willing to assist the Government in making it a good measure. That is a very reasonable proposition. This is a Bill that should occupy the place that properly belongs to it in the business of the House, that position in which it should have been placed at the outset considering all the circumstances, and especially as hon. members desire a short session. I am sure the First Minister must know that party politics do not go so far as to divide us in a matter of national importance. We all agree that this should be a short session in order that the leader of the Government may go to England and occupy there that proud and prominent position which belongs to a great nation like Canada. He must also realize that the statement made by the ex-Finance Minister was made in good faith. But we are met with what would be called obstruction, if the same thing came from the Opposition. This could be called useless legislation—I say unless as regards the present time, because no hon. member will declare that this Bill would be necessary this session or next session, or that it is imperative that it should pass now. I am free to say that the Franchise Bill, like all such laws, must be changed from time to time, and we on this side of the House are willing to pass a measure consistent with the advance made in public opinion, one that will be free from defects and embodying the wisdom learned by experience. He are quite prepared to take that position when the proper time comes; but as a humble member of this House I protest against proceeding with a Bill not needed now, but one which will simply be the means of delaying the legislation of this Parliament. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite cannot hope by pressing a discussion on a Bill of such importance—one that is contentious in its character, one that involves very serious changes, and one that involves the surrender of a Dominion franchise in favour of the franchise of the provinces—to forward public business. I care not if the franchise were such that they could be adopted in detail, or that we could make them conform in principle and essence to the principles of a Franchise Bill for the whole Dominion, I yet contend that there is no reason why we should adopt them and surrender our Dominion franchise. Vast changes have taken place during recent years in the franchises of the different provinces. In Ontario the franchise has been almost completely changed. In 1885 it was a property qualification; it was not then one man one vote. We have now in Ontario practically manhood suffrage. We have, moreover, in all the cities a system of registration such as is not provided for in this Bill. All these changes have taken place during recent years, and it is idle to say that the franchise as it formerly existed might be adopted without change. I simply point out these matters for the purpose of showing the difficulty of entering upon the discussion of a Bill that must necessarily occupy much time. If it was one that could be dealt with summarily, that would occupy only a day or two, that required little examination, there might be reasonable excuse for saying that the House might proceed with it; but this Bill will require considerable discussion, not for the purpose of raising contentions, but for the purpose of making it such a Bill as is required by the country. This Bill involves a new departure, it constitutes a new franchise, because as regards Ontario it is widening the franchise to manhood suffrage. The Bill refers to qualifications and conditions. This is simply one of the conditions that attaches to the franchise in Ontario, and under it a voter must be a resident within the province and also within the electoral district. I shall not enter into a discussion of the difficulties that will be met in seeking to accomplish the object aimed at, for I shall have another opportunity of doing so; but I wish, in conclusion, to enter my protest against proceeding with this Bill, knowing as I do, that it must be apparent to hon. members that the present discussion is fruitless, instead of proceeding with the tariff revision for which the country is now waiting. Hon. gentlemen opposite may declare that the business of the country is not disturbed, but they are too close observers of public events not to have noticed that there are several branches of trade which have been severely injured. For instance, take the woollen business of this country, and we know that as a result of the delay in the revision of the tariff, it is almost a daily occurrence that certain of them are going to the wall. For the few reasons that I have given, and for many more that I have not attempted to urge upon the House, I shall vote for the amendment of the ex-Minister of Finance.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 29) in further amendment of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BERGERON. Explain.

Mr. McMULLEN. My object in introducing this Bill is to secure the appointment of a Civil Service Board, clothed with authority to inspect the inside and outside services of the civil service of the Dominion, and to dispense with and remove any incompetent or unnecessary civil servant. From the opinion I have formed regarding our civil service, I do not believe that under the management of any Cabinet we shall get our staff of civil servants reduced to the proper number unless by the adoption of a measure of this kind and the appointment of a board such as that proposed. However willing Ministers may be to discharge their duty in the several departments. I have come to the conclusion that influences of one kind and another will be brought to bear in order to retain civil servants in departments when virtually there is little or nothing for them to do. Another point is this. I notice that whenever even the present Government has made a move in the direction of discharging their duty with respect to the removal of unnecessary or incompetent civil servants, the cry is immediately raised that it is done for party and political purposes. I want to relieve the Cabinet from the position of being charged with acting from party and political motives when civil servants who are absolutely unnecessary or incompetent are still retained in power, and that they are so retained perhaps because of influences brought to bear on Ministers, or partly also because if they are turned out, the Government is charged by the Opposition with acting from party and political purposes. In Canada I believe to-day we have not less than perhaps 1,000 civil servants more than are absolutely necessary to perform efficiently the public service of this Dominion, and it must be remembered that we are paying a large amount annually for our civil service. I contend it would be greatly in the interest of the country—it is an absolute necessity, if we are to secure the reductions which can be made, that a board of this kind should be appointed. I propose that it should be placed in an independent position, in a position similar to that now occupied by the Auditor General, so that the members of the board would not be subject to dismissal by any Minister or the Government, but could only be removed by the joint action of both Houses for cause. Three members would compose the board. It would be their duty, and indeed they would have the right under the law to enter every department and demand the submission to them of all books and statements of labour and duties performed by each clerk, and after carefully and thoroughly investigating the duties performed by the several clerks of the department or any branch of it, the commissioners would have power to dispense with the services of those officers they considered were not necessary. The Bill requires that within fifteen days after the suspension or dismissal of any clerk the fact be reported to the head of the department, and it is further provided that within fifteen days after the opening of the session of Parliament each year a list of those removed by the board shall be submitted to Parliament as the names of those superannuated during the year have to be submitted at the present time within the first fifteen days of the session of Parliament. My impression is, that if this Act meets with the approval of the House and becomes law, it will effect a much improved condition of things in our civil service. I have discussed the matter with men in the civil service who are well posted with regard to its present condition, and I am glad to say, that I have received from those gentlemen every encouragement to proceed with the Bill. They believe that a board of this kind will be the means of weeding out unnecessary, inefficient, and undesirable officials, and that it will free the country from enormous expense in retaining useless officers. This is an explanation of the several provisions of the Bill which I hope will receive unbiassed and careful consideration from hon. gentlemen. I trust that the Government may be able to lend it their countenance and assistance, and that through its influence the civil service may be gradually improved, and the expenditure considerably reduced.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) would go a little further, and take off the shoulders of members of Parliament and of the Government, the responsibility of appointing officials, I believe he would do the country a great service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret that I had not the advantage of hearing my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) make his opening remarks in introducing his Bill. I am not sorry to find that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are driven to the conclusion, that it would be an extremely unsafe thing to leave our civil service in the hands of the present Government. In that, I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. McMullen), and I think it is quite possible that the First Minister has, perhaps, prompted this move. The hon. gentleman has likely introduced the Bill at the instance of the First Minister. We all remember the pitiful wail sent up by the leader of the Liberal Government from 1874 to 1878, in regard to the terrible position in which he found himself. He discovered that he was besieged and overwhelmed by hungry supporters, and he had to stand day and night over the treasury of the country to prevent its being pillaged by adherents of the Liberal party. The hon. the First Minister now knows how to sympathize with his predecessor, the leader of the Liberal Government, in his desire to preserve some regard for the honest administration of public affairs, and, at the same time, to ward off the attempt of the Liberal party to besiege him at every turn. The former leader of the party told us himself that he was compelled almost to sacrifice his own life in defence of the treasury. Anything that will relieve the civil service of this country from the oppressive and tyrannical acts of the present Administration, will be hailed, if not in this House, at all events, in the country, by a general acclaim of approval. I have no hesitation in saying that this Government has already demoralized the public service to such an extent that it will take years to restore it to its former condition. There is no person, I will not say "no person," but I will say there is no intelligent man in this House or out of it, who does not know that the very foundation of a good, economical, and wise administration of public affairs rests upon the members of a civil service who must feel that the position they occupy is one of respectability and of high character, and that they are bound to give the faithful discharge of their duties. No Government, however wise; no Government, however able; no Government, however honest, can faithfully discharge their duties to the people, unless throughout this widely extended Dominion they maintain a civil service of high character and high attainments. Sir, the first element of that independence of character, the first element of that faithful performance of duty, centres upon the fixity of the tenure of their office. Introduce and carry out this wretched system of spoils of office, which this Government has introduced for the first time in the history of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. Introduce this system of spoils and your civil service is at once demoralized. I say without fear of contradiction from any person who searches the records of this country, that it is for the first time in our history, that a Government has shown that they are prepared to drive out of office men of the highest character, men in the very prime of life, men whose experience qualify them to perform their duties in a faithful and fearless manner, and to bring into the public service, men without experience, without character, without standing, and without any qualifications to discharge their duties. Why, Sir, what have we seen in the Interior Department. I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any length on the introduction of this Bill, but I ask you to look at the Interior Department, and what do you find? Why, Sir, you find men who were not brought into the department by the Conservative party, but by the Liberal party, men whom the Liberal party sustained and upheld in office in consequence of their great ability, and who were maintained in office by the Conservative party, you find these men of vast experience driven out of office, in order to make room for men, whose only attempt at the discharge of public duty so discredited them, that they were driven out of the position which they held. I say that, in my judgment, a greater outrage was never perpetrated in this country, and never could be perpetrated, than the disgraceful manner in which the present Government have subordinated one of the most important departments, that of the Interior, to the interests and to the necessities of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) who now presides there. Does any person doubt that the gentleman who was sent by the Government of Manitoba to perform the important duties of representing that province at the World's Fair, and who so discredited himself as to bring a torrent of indignation about his ears and about the ears of the Government that appointed him, because of the scandalous manner in which he mismanaged the duties which he had undertaken to perform—does any person doubt that, for the purpose of securing the aid of that gentleman in obtaining an election by acclamation, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has brought him here, thus discredited, without any of the qualifications necessary for the discharge of his duty? He has dragged even the Crown in the dust by driving out of the office he was entitled to hold a man of the highest position, who had discharged the duties of that office with such signal ability as to command and obtain the confidence of the Governments of both of the great parties in this country. I say to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that he has not introduced his Bill a moment too soon. He proposes to transfer the powers of the Crown to a commission, whether to enable them to appoint and dismiss, I did not quite gather. That may have been owing to my not having had the advantage of hearing the hon. gentleman when he introduced his Bill. But if it is a Bill that will protect the civil service of this country from such outrages as those to which they have been subjected since this Government came into power—not in one department only, but in a great many departments—if it is a Bill of that character, it will be hailed with great satisfaction by the people of this country, whose only hope of having the duties of the civil service ably and efficiently performed is that their independence of character shall be guarded and their rights respected by the Government and the Parliament of this country. When this Bill reaches a more advanced stage, I will deal with its provisions at greater length; but when I felt the outrageous manner in which the civil service had been tampered with, I could not forbear expressing the indignation felt throughout this country by every intelligent and independent man who realizes how that service has been tampered with, and the baneful and fatal results that must follow to the best interests of the country.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) had not consulted me before introducing his Bill; but I have no hesitation at all in saying at once that if the Bill of my hon. friend has for its object and will have the effect to remove some of the temptations which beset public men in office, it shall have my most cordial support. My hon. friend referred a moment ago to one of the Ministers of the Crown who had said that he had to keep guard over the treasury to prevent it being plundered by political adventurers. It is a pity for Canada that we have not many more men of that kind. It is a pity we had not a man of the stamp of Alexander Mackenzie to watch over the public treasury when the section B contract was made, or when the Quebec Graving Dock matter was going on, or when the Lévis Graving Dock affair was in progress, or when the Langevin block was being constructed. Sir, the hon. gentleman has this for my answer: all public men are subject to temptation; but there is this difference between the party on the opposite side of the House and the party on this side—that we are willing to remove these temptations from us by law, while they have been always ready to yield to them. If it is possible to remove these temptations, I say once more that I am disposed to tie my hands and the hands of my colleagues to that extent. With regard to the charges which the hon. gentleman makes as to the manner in which the civil service has been treated, I may say that for the first time since confederation notice has been given that the civil service shall be non-partisan, that its members shall no longer be the henchmen of the men in power. We do not want the members of the civil service to do our bidding as some of them did the bidding of the hon. gentleman opposite, when he calculated that the Government would receive $50,000,000 from the sale of public lands. We want every man in the service of the Government to discharge his duty fairly by the country, and so long as he does that, he has nothing to fear. But the moment a man becomes a political partisan or is found to have been a political partisan, he has no favour to expect or to receive at our hands.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may be allowed to explain, for the benefit of the hon. leader of the Opposition—

Mr. FOSTER. Spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has a reply.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Bill does not go so far as to propose to take out of the hands of the Cabinet the appointment to office of any person who is recommended to them as a fit and proper person. My reason for not going that far with the Bill is this. Every member has the right to certain patronage in his constituency; and if you transferred the right of appointment as well of the right of dismissal to the supervisors, then the civil service would be absolutely and entirely under the control of that commission. I am not prepared to say that that might not perhaps be an advisable thing for the House to consider; but at present the Bill simply proposes to authorize these men to inspect the staff and to decide whether the number employed, either in the inside or the outside service, is too great, or whether any of those employed are inefficient or that the services performed are not up to the standard. In these cases they have the right to suspend, and to report the fact to the head of the department. On the other hand, if they find that there is not sufficient work to afford continuous employment to the officers of any department, which they inspect, they have the right to reduce the number of officers in that department to what they consider necessary to carry on efficiently the service of the country. I may add that I have not been inspired nor instructed in any shape or form by the hon. leader of the Government or any other member of the Government with regard to this Bill. It is a subject that has received consideration from me for years past, and I have thought it was necessary in the interests of the country that some change should take place. The Bill is solely and entirely a project of my own, with the object of making the service cheaper and more efficient.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. He proposes to create three new officers in the shape of commissioners. Does he propose to put them in the civil service?

Mr. McMULLEN. That is a question that can be decided when the Bill comes before the House. The present Auditor General is, I think, in the civil service. I think he contributes to the Superannuation Fund. For my part, I am in favour of whatever will give these men the most independent and untrammelled action, free from the dictation of any party.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition told us that he could not forbear letting fly his indignation on the first occasion that occurred. The hon. gentleman seems to be greatly troubled in that way this session. He has an almost unlimited supply of indignation to let loose on any occasion or without occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. There is great occasion for it.

Mr. CASEY. The real occasion of the indignation of the hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, is that he is not controlling the civil service himself. It is less the manner in which it is conducted than the hands in which it rests that seems to affect the conscience of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He was rather unfortunate in his reference to the late Mr. Mackenzie standing guard against the pillage of the treasury by his supporters, because he thereby reminded us of the fact that Mr. Mackenzie's successors—the Government of which the hon. gentleman semi-periodically used to form a part, and which he supported—saved themselves that trouble. They did not stand on guard, and the difference has been quite perceptible in the public accounts ever since.

Mr. LISTER. They left the lid open.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And the key out.

Mr. CASEY. They did. As an old civil servant, the hon. gentleman's opinion ought to be worth something, if he had only confined himself to the subject before the House.

Turning to the Bill I may say that I had hoped its scope would be rather wider than appears from the hon. gentleman's (Mr. McMullen) last explanation. It is twenty-two years now since I first asked this House to agree to the principle that appointments to the service should be made by some other means than political patronage, and although circumstances ever since have been rather adverse to the adoption of any such principle, my opinion remains unchanged. Of course, there are a number of appointments such as country postmasters and small collectors of customs and so on, which must always remain matters of local patronage, because the offices are so trying that they must be filled by people in the locality, and those who fill them cannot form part of the professional civil service. Our object ought to be to create, at headquarters, a professional civil service, which should be selected, in the first place, on business principles, in which dismissals, when necessary, should be made on business principles, and in which promotions should be made on the same principle. If that were done, I am satisfied, as my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is, that the number employed could be greatly reduced, while at the same time, the salaries of those remaining could be kept quite adequate to their duties. In some cases the salaries might be increased, because the fewer men employed, the more would have to be done by those who are employed, and the more money they would earn. I am not in favour of a cheap and nasty civil service, but want men properly selected and well paid.

The root of the whole trouble in connection with dismissals by an incoming Government is to be found in the manner in which appointments were made. The service was overloaded by the late Government, and no doubt would be overloaded by this if it stayed in as long as the old Government did. A number of men, who have practically no duties to perform, are put on to suit the exigencies of politics, and I do not believe that any Government could possibly be proof against pressure of that kind. For that reason, I always advocated the principle of a non-political civil service, in which admissions, promotions and dismissals should be under the control of a Civil Service Board, who should not be members of the civil service themselves, but appointed, like the judges, during good behaviour, and as independent of the control of the Government as the Auditor General is. A great many modifications would be required in the details of the plan, but the great principle has been in force in England for nearly fifty years, that men should enter the public service as they do the service of any private corporation, on account of their fitness for the work, and should be retained, promoted or dismissed on the same ground.

I know a great many hon. gentlemen would feel the loss of patronage involved in this reform, but I am sure that those who support this Government and those who supported the late Government, must feel that the possession of that patronage is a most serious weakness to them. They must feel that more enemies are made by its exercise than by almost anything else they can do. I shall reserve any further remarks on that point until the Bill comes up for its second reading, when we can discuss its provisions more intelligently.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ATLANTIC FAST SS. SERVICE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the attention of the Government to an article which appeared in the Toronto "Globe" on Saturday, the 10th instant, from which I extract the following:—

Another proposal for a fast Atlantic service has been laid before the Government within the last few days, and it is so entirely novel and striking that, if it is considered, it may put a new phase upon this important question. The proposal made by the promoters and their associates in England is to establish a twenty-knot service for the conveyance of mails, passengers and express freight from Milford Haven, in Wales, to Middle Milford, in the Strait of Canso, N.S., these two points having been ascertained to afford the shortest, safest and quickest service on the basis of the idea upon which these proposals rest, which is an Imperial idea, as well as one calculated to meet the wants of Canada. The English syndicate which is to furnish the capital, is offering to put on four express steamers of the requirements of the Imperial and Canadian governments that will make the trip from Great Britain to Canada, from port to port, in four days, representing a saving, as compared with the fastest passage between Daunt's Rock and Sandy Hook, applied to the proposed route, of three days and eighteen hours.

I would ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce whether such a proposal has been submitted to the Government as indicated in this article.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would say that no proposal in due form, having reference to such a project, has been made. Some suggestions and letters were laid before us. As I understand, this article, which I have not had the opportunity of reading, refers to communications between Milford Haven and the Strait of Canso, but the hon. gentleman is aware that the statute under which alone proposals could very well be considered does not contemplate that at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask whether the statement published in the papers as to Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Minister's declaration on the floor of the House of Commons of England, that a contract had been signed between the Government of Canada and the contractors for a fast service, is well founded.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes, Mr. Chamberlain's statement was well founded, and the matter is now under the consideration of the Imperial authorities.

THE BUDGET.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would remind the hon. First Minister that he led us to hope that there would be a declaration made as to the period at which the Budget would be brought down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In accordance with the understanding mentioned. I now desire to say that my expectation is that, if nothing unforeseen should occur to prevent it, the Budget will be brought down on the third day after the close of the Easter recess, that will be the first day after the reassembling of the House, or Thursday the 22nd April. The House will reassemble on Tuesday, and on Thursday the 22nd, I expect the Budget speech will be delivered.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has made up his mind that the Budget cannot be delivered before the 20th, the day on which the Nova Scotia elections are to be held.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I regret it very much, Sir; for if the Liberals of Nova Scotia needed any assistance, as I do not think they do, I have no doubt that the Budget—the facts I shall present at any rate, whether I put them in good form or not, the tariff I shall have the honour of presenting—will be one which when well known, will largely assist the Liberal party throughout the whole Dominion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There may be some merit in bringing the Budget down on the first Thursday after the 20th April. One advantage is that we may hope to have the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in the House at that time. Therefore, if agreeable to the House, I will propose:

That the Order of the House for Committee of Ways and Means, and any motion in relation thereto, be made the first Order of the Day, after questions, on Thursday, the 22nd April and subsequent days, until the debate on such Order is completed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the hon. leader of the House what business he proposes to take up on the Government days between now and the 22nd April?

The PRIME MINISTER. We are engaged at the present time on a debate on the Franchise Act, and there is an amendment by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to be disposed of before we can think of going on with other business.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now that the object of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has, I think, practically been subserved by the declaration of the Government as to the day on which it will bring down the Budget, I will ask my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to withdraw the motion which he has now before the House. It was made solely with a view to expediting the bringing down of the Budget and, that having been fixed, time, I am afraid, will be lost if it is followed up in the present position of affairs.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was not quite in order in proposing the withdrawal of the motion—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was simply a suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think hon. members will allow me to suggest that the discussion is wider than is quite proper on the calling of the Orders of the Day.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope you will not rule absolutely on this subject, Mr. Speaker. Any debate at this time is designed to facilitate the business of the House. As my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has suggested, that, as we have now the promise of the Government that the tariff will be brought down on a definite day and the debate proceeded with de die in diem, I will be very glad to withdraw my amendment provided my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) will agree that he will not press the second reading of the Franchise Bill until the tariff measure has been gone into.

Mr. SPEAKER. The discussion is really so much out of order—

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the matter suggested will be subject of a conference between my hon. friend and myself between now and to-morrow.

THE HULL ELECTRIC COMPANY.

Mr. POUPORE moved second reading of Bill (No. 20) respecting the Hull Electric Company.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That Bill has not been printed in French.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to that, hon. members will observe that none of these private Bills have been printed in French, but all that we shall take up are printed in English. Of course, rule 93 of the House of Commons applies to private Bills as well as to public Bills, and, if any hon. member insists upon the objection that, before the second reading private Bills must be printed in French as well as in English, I shall have to rule in his favour. I must say, however, that it has not been the practice of the House to do so, for the reason. I think, that the Bill, long before it reaches the committee for consideration, will be printed in French. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will not insist upon the point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

What is the date of the dismissal of Mr. Martin as postmaster at Eldon, in Prince Edward Island? What was the nature of the charges preferred against him, if any? Has he been furnished with a copy of those charges? Has he been given an opportunity to defend himself against those charges? Was his case examined by the investigating commissioner who is inquiring into such cases in Prince Edward Island? If not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would state that there is no post office named Eldon in Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman probably refers to some other post office.

DISMISSAL OF JAMES ROSS, SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

What is the date of the dismissal of James Ross as sub-collector of customs at Mt. Stewart, in Prince Edward Island? Were there any charges preferred against him? If so, what was their nature? Was he given an opportunity to refute them? Was his case examined by the investigating commissioner? If not, why not? Was he dismissed for political partisanship? Has a successor been appointed? If not, why not?

The COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). James Ross, sub-collector of customs at Mount Stewart, P.E.I., was dismissed by Order in Council dated 21st October, 1896. The reason for his dismissal was that no appropriation was obtained for payment of his salary for the fiscal year 1895-96, and provision was only made in the Estimates for the current fiscal year for payment of his salary to 30th September, 1896. Charges of political partisanship were preferred against him but were not investigated. He was not dismissed on that ground. No one has been appointed in his place, as it was not deemed necessary to fill the position.

DISMISSAL OF DANIEL McDONALD, SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

What was the nature of the charges preferred against Daniel McDonald, late sub-collector of customs at Vernon River Bridge, in Prince Edward Island? Were the charges referred to the investigating commissioner? Did Mr. McDonald have an opportunity to refute charges? Has a successor been appointed? Was there an appropriation last session for sub-collector's salary?

The COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). No charges were preferred against Daniel McDonald, late sub-collector of customs at Vernon River Bridge, P.E.I. He was dismissed by Order in Council, dated 21st October, 1896. The reason for his dismissal was that no appropriation was obtained for payment of his salary for the fiscal year 1895-96, and provision was only made in the Estimates for the current year for payment of his salary to 30th September, 1896. An officer was appointed at Vernon River Bridge on the 1st January, 1897, because the outpost of Orwell was abolished by Order in Council dated December, 1896, and it was reported to the department that there was more necessity for an officer at Vernon River Bridge than at Orwell. The salary voted for the officer at Orwell became available for the new man at Vernon River Bridge.

DISMISSAL OF DUNCAN CRAWFORD, POSTMASTER, WOOD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Was Mr. Duncan Crawford, late postmaster, Wood Island North, in Prince Edward Island, dismissed for political reasons? Were any charges preferred against him? What was their nature? Did he get an opportunity to defend himself? Was his case inquired into by the investigating commissioner now travelling over that province? If not, why not? What was the salary attached to the office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Duncan Crawford, the postmaster at Wood Island, was relieved of his office because he was an active political partisan. The evidence being regarded as conclusive, no formal investigation was necessary. The salary is thirty-two dollars a year.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Does the Postmaster General propose to increase the salaries of postmasters in sections where a daily service has been substituted for a weekly or bi-weekly service? Has a uniform scale of increase been agreed upon? On what basis are increases made? Have applications to be made for increase of salary?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The salaries of postmasters, with the exception of those at city post offices, are based upon a scale of percentages in proportion to the revenue. This scale has been in force for many years, and no change in the rate is contemplated.

PHYSICIAN TO WALPOLE ISLAND INDIANS.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

When was Dr. George Mitchell, of the town of Wallaceburg, appointed physician to the Indians of Walpole Island? Was he appointed by Order in Council? Has the said Dr. George Mitchell been dismissed? If so, has his successor been appointed? What is his name, and the amount of his salary?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. On the 8th May, 1891. 2. He was not appointed by Order in Council. 3. He has been dismissed. 4. His successor has been appointed. 5. His name is Dr. W. W. Hay, of Wallaceburg, Ont., and his salary is $500 per annum.

INDIAN AGENT JOHN McIVER.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In further reference to the question asked by Mr. McNeill respecting Mr. John McIver, Indian Agent, the other day, I may say that the names of the agent's sureties are the London Guarantee and Accident Company, Christina McIver, Donald Randolph McIver and John McIver.

INDIAN AGENT CROWE.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I also desire to answer a question asked the other day, the answer to which has been temporarily mislaid. Mr. McNeill asked :

1. What are the irregularities in connection with the duties of his office of which Mr. Crowe, late Indian agent on the Saugeen Reserve, has been adjudged guilty, and which in the opinion of the Government rendered him unfit for the position he held?

2. Was Mr. Inspector Macrea instructed to inquire into charges of this nature, or were his instructions to inquire into political charges preferred against Mr. Crowe?

3. Has Mr. Crowe been asked if he has a defence to these charges?

My answer is as follows: 1. The irregularities in connection with the duties of his office of which Mr. Crowe, late Indian agent on the Saugeen Reserve, has been adjudged guilty, and which in the opinion of the Government rendered him unfit for the position which he held, consisted in allowing Indians to cut bark without the authority of the Department and to dispose of it without the payment of dues. 2. Inspector Macrae's instructions required him to investigate the matter in regard to which Mr. Crowe has been adjudged guilty of irregularity. 3. Mr. Crowe had every opportunity of offering defence at the investigation held under oath by Mr. Macrae and he has consequently not been asked if he has any further defence.

STATION-MASTER AT POINT TUPPER.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Who is station-master at the present time, upon the Intercolonial Railway, at Point Tupper, Cape Breton?

2. When was the present station-master appointed?

3. Upon whose recommendation was he appointed?

4. For what length of time was Mr. Fitzlay Macdonald station-master at Point Tupper?

5. Was Mr. Macdonald dismissed from this position?

6. When was he dismissed?

7. For what reason, and at whose request was he dismissed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. No permanent appointment of station-master has been made. T. P. Moffatt is acting station-master. 2. Acting station-master was appointed in February last. 4. From January, 1891, until February, 1896. 5. His services were dispensed with. 6. He was notified in February that his services would no longer be required. 7. He did not devote his time to the service of the railway. The department did not feel that it would be of any material advantage to the railway service to have this gentleman studying law in Halifax, while in receipt of a salary as station agent on the Intercolonial Railway.

In regard to question 3, I do not think the hon. gentleman should expect me to answer it. I do not consider it is necessary or in the public interest that the Government should disclose the names of persons with whom it consults confidentially on matters of appointments, and therefore, I do not feel called upon to answer it, although I should like to comply with the wish and to gratify the curiosity of the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, Mr. Speaker, I must call your attention to the fact that it has been the universal practice of all governments in this House to answer such a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is entirely discretionary with the Minister as to how he should answer a question put by a member of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the hon. gentleman does not propose to answer it at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. Minister does not desire to answer it, I cannot say anything, nor can any member of the House.

PROPOSED SAVINGS BANK AT MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a savings bank at the Magdalen Islands?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) has applied to the department for the establishment of a savings bank at Magdalen Islands. There are some difficulties in the way, but the Government have endeavoured to comply with the request, believing it to be a meritorious one, and it is expected that a savings bank will be established at Magdalen Islands in due course.

MAILS TO MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

1. What steps were taken during the course of last winter to provide for the carrying of the mails to the Magdalen Islands?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to assist those who shall undertake to carry the said mails for the future?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). At Mr. Lemieux's request, it was determined, if practicable, to take the mails to the Magdalen Islands during the course of last winter, and whilst negotiations were being had for securing a steamer for such purpose it was ascertained that the Islands were ice-bound, which rendered it impossible to carry out the plan and it therefore had to be abandoned for the time.

PROPOSED STEAMBOAT LINE BETWEEN QUEBEC AND GASPE BASIN.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

1. Whether the Government are aware that the north shore of Gaspé, from Cape Chat to Gaspé Basin, is wholly unprovided with means of communication by railway or steamboat?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to aid in the establishment of a steamboat line to perform a weekly service between Quebec and Gaspé Basin?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I believe the hon. gentleman is correct in saying that the north shore of Gaspé is almost wholly unprovided with means of communication either by railway or steamboat. In reply to the second question I beg to say, that the matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

WHARF CONSTRUCTION AT GRAND RIVER, P.Q.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

1. How much has Mr. Atkinson, a contractor of Quebec, received from the Government for the construction of the wharf at Grand River, county of Gaspé?

2. Is the Government aware that about seventy-five to one hundred workmen, who worked on the construction of the said wharf, have never been paid?

3. Has the Government returned to the said Atkinson the deposit placed by him in the hands of the Minister of Public Works as security for the execution of the work? If so, on what date was the deposit returned?

4. What is the date of the last payment made by the Government to the said Atkinson?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. $8,800. 2. The department has seen to the payment of certain claims preferred for wages by men who worked for Mr. Atkinson on the wharf at Grand River, P.Q., but there remains a balance claimed by certain of the workmen which up to the present time Mr. Atkinson has refused to recognize, he stating that he did not owe the amounts claimed. 3. No. 4. 28th June, 1895.

THE LANGEVIN BLOCK—CONTRACTOR'S CLAIMS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

1. Whether Mr. Charlebois, the builder of the Langevin Block, has still claims pending before the Government?

2. If so, what is the amount and nature of said claims?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2. The total amount claimed by Charlebois is $296,338.05, being made up as follows :—

Claim on account of contract proper.....	$252,593 57
Claim on account of iron roof	15,813 99
Claim on account of iron stairs	3,854 58
Making a total of.....	$272,262 14
In addition to that sum, Mr. Charlebois further claims that a deduction of	22,113 64 should not have been made from his contract when the estimates were rendered, and if to that is also added a sum of.....	1,962 27 amount still to the credit of Mr. Charlebois by the department, the total amount of his claim is.....	$296,338 05

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. What changes in the general administration of the Royal Military College, which Major General Gascoigne, its president, officially stated, on the 14th August, 1896, were to be immediately effected, have been carried out?

2. What are "the great and many advantageous changes" in the college administration referred to by Lieutenant-Colonel Kitson, commandant, in his speech to the Royal Military College ex-Cadet Club in the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, on 27th February, 1897, as "soon to take place"?

3. What other changes in the college administration are contemplated?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. No changes in the general administration of the Royal Military College have been recently carried out. 2 and 3. The report of the Commandant of the Royal Military College on the subject referred to in this question is now under the consideration of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he has not answered the first part of the question.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is answered by the reply that I have made, that the report of the Commandant is now being considered by the Government.

Mr. TARTE.

CAPTAIN OF DREDGE "PRINCE EDWARD."

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Was there any charge of offensive partisanship preferred against Captain John N. McDonald in dismissing him as captain of the dredge "Prince Edward," in Prince Edward Island?

2. Was any question raised as to his ability and faithfulness in the discharge of his duty?

3. What was the ostensible reason for his removal?

4. Is it the intention of the department to appoint a successor, or is it intended to have Captain McDonald reinstated?

5. Was Captain McDonald's case inquired into by Mr. Palmer, the investigating commissioner?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. No official complaint has been lodged in the department. 2. No. 3. The reason for his removal was that his services could not be utilized in the winter months, the dredge not being in commission. 4. It has not yet been decided whether or not Captain McDonald shall be re-engaged, the dredge "Prince Edward" not being yet in commission. 5. Mr. Palmer has not been instructed to make any inquiry into Captain McDonald's case.

WOOD ISLAND HARBOUR DREDGING.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the dredging of Wood Island Harbour and Murray River, Prince Edward Island, during the coming summer?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The question is under consideration.

MANITOBA SCHOOLS QUESTION.

Mr. HAGGART asked :

Have the Government any intention, as a sequence of the recent arrangements between themselves and the Government of Manitoba, to rescind the Remedial Order made by the Governor General in Council on the 21st March, 1895, and formally communicated to the Government of Manitoba with the object as set forth in said order, of restoring to the Roman Catholic minority of the province the rights and privileges of which the said minority have been deprived with respect to education, or do the Government propose any parliamentary action in relation to the said matter?

He said : If there is any controversy as to what is the effect of the Order in Council, I will put the question by leaving out the words :

Of restoring to the Roman Catholic minority of the province the rights and privileges of which the said minority have been deprived with respect to education.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The policy of the Government upon this question has already been announced, and they do not think it advisable to take any further action in reference thereto.

INSPECTOR WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—PORT ARTHUR.

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Taylor) asked :

Who has been appointed to the position of assistant inspector of weights and measures at Port Arthur, in place of W. W. Russell, deceased?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). No permanent appointment has been made. The duties are being performed, temporarily, by Mr. G. W. Francis.

TARIFF INQUIRY—THE EVIDENCE.

Mr. QUINN (for Mr. Monk) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to cause a translation to be made into the French language, of the evidence and proceedings of the Tariff Inquiry Commission, in order to place the same within reach of French Canadians interested in the said inquiry?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The tariff inquiry having been publicly conducted, the proceedings were somewhat extensively published in the newspapers of the day, and the Government have not thought that any further publication of them is necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) another question in connection with that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Part of these investigations were not publicly conducted, as I understood. If any persons had objected to publicity they were allowed to make their communications privately; will that part of the commissioner's investigation be brought down?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, Mr. Speaker. If the House deems it necessary, and I hope it will not, to have the whole matter printed, we would be obliged of necessity to withhold that portion which was given to us confidentially.

DUTY ON TIMOTHY SEED.

Mr. BAZINET asked :

1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to impose a duty of 50 cents per bushel, or any other specific duty, in addition to a duty of 15 cents per bushel ad valorem, on timothy seed imported into Canada?

2. Is it also the intention of the Government to impose a duty of 2 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem, or any other duty, on clover seed imported into Canada?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is not deemed expedient to make any statement at present respecting the duties mentioned.

POSTMASTER—AYLMER WEST.

Mr. INGRAM asked :

Upon what date was David N. Price appointed postmaster of Aylmer West? What date was he dismissed? Was he fully qualified for the position? Did he perform his duty to the satisfaction of the department, and if so, for what reason was he dismissed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). A vacancy at the Aylmer West post office occurred on the 20th of June, 1895, by the death of the then postmaster. The office was kept vacant for more than one year and after the defeat of the late Government, but before their resignation Mr. D. H. Price was appointed postmaster. He was promptly notified, to wit, on the 29th July, 1896, by the new Government that his appointment would be cancelled. This was done on the 17th of March, 1897, by the appointment of Mr. Ashbaugh as postmaster. The reason for the cancellation of Mr. Price's appointment was that inasmuch as the late Government had kept the office vacant for more than one year there was no urgency in its being filled up by the defeated Government before their resignation, and, therefore, their act in appointing Mr. Price was regarded as one that could not be assented to. No complaint has been made as to the manner in which Mr. Price discharged the duties of the office.

SMUGGLING AT HERSCHEL ISLAND.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Is the Department of Customs aware that smuggling is being carried on by the crews of American whalers from Herschel Island into Mackenzie River Basin?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It was reported to the department in December, 1895, that illegal trade was being conducted by United States whalers at the mouth of the Mackenzie River. On 5th March, 1896, the department received a letter alleging that smuggling was going on at Herschel Island.

HUDSON BAY CUSTOMS PORTS.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

1. Is the Department of Customs aware that goods are being brought in at the ports of York Factory, Moose Factory and Churchill?

2. Has the Government any collectors of customs at these ports?

3. And if not, by whom is the duty collected?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. The Department of Customs is aware that goods are being brought in at the outports of York Factory and Moose Factory, but not at Churchill; there is no customs office at Churchill. 2. Customs officers are stationed at York Factory and Moose Factory, but not at Churchill. 3. Goods imported by residents of Churchill are usually passed at the outport of York Factory.

AYLMER WEST POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. INGRAM asked :

Did the Postmaster General, or any other member of the Government, instruct Mr. Alexander Smith, the Reform party organizer for the province of Ontario, to make any inquiries into the postmastership of Aylmer West, in East Elgin, and if so, what report did Mr. Alexander Smith make to the Postmaster General or other member of the Government, having relation to the above position?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). No.

MOUNT ALBERT AND HOLT MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Who carries the mail between Mount Albert and Mount Albert Railway Station?

2. Who carries the mail between Mount Albert and Holt Post Office?

3. When was the contract between Mount Albert and Mount Albert Station entered into? What is the present contract price? Is there a contract? Has the contract been signed?

4. Who was the last mail carrier?

5. What is the date of the contract between Mount Albert and Holt? What is the contract price? Is there a contract? Is the work performed by day labour, or on what terms is it performed? What price is being paid per trip?

6. What was the lowest tender for the contract between Mount Albert and Mount Albert Station? Whose was it? Why was it not accepted?

7. What was the lowest tender for the contract between Mount Albert and Holt? Whose was it? Has the price per trip between Mount Albert and Holt been raised over his tendered price? Is the contractor doing the work for the price stated in the regularly presented tender?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. The mails between Mount Albert and Mount Albert Railway Station are carried by Mr. Parish Steeper. 2. The mails between Holt and Mount Albert are carried by Mr. Parish Steeper. 3. There is no contract for the Mount Albert and Railway Station service at present, the lowest tenderers having declined to undertake the service unless they could obtain the contract for the Holt and Mount Albert service which is arranged for under a separate contract as it has been for some years past. Mr. Steeper is at present performing the service under a temporary agreement pending the making of a regular contract. 4. The last mail carrier on the Mount Albert and Station route was Mr. John Roseman. 5. The contract for the Holt and Mount Albert service went into operation on the 1st January, 1897. The price is $62 per annum. At this price the rate per trip would be nearly 20 cents. 6. As the contract for the Mount Albert and Railway Station service has not yet been entered into, it would be inadvisable to give any information regarding the tenders at present. 7. The lowest tender for the Holt and Mount Albert service was that made by Mr. Parish Steeper at $62 per annum. Mr. Steeper is performing the service at this rate, and there has been no advance in the price.

THE EXPEDITION TO HUDSON BAY.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to have the North-west Territories represented in the exploratory expedition to Hudson Bay?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will answer this question and at the same time a question to the same effect that stands on the Order paper in the name of the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). The Government have considered the matter, and have determined that it would be in the public interest that Manitoba and the North-west Territories should be represented on that commission, and a representative of Manitoba and the North-west Territories will be appointed.

HARBOURS OF OWEN SOUND AND COLLINGWOOD.

Mr. DAVIN (for Mr. Bennett) asked :

What aggregate amounts have been expended by the Public Works Department in the harbours of Owen Sound and Collingwood, respectively?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte.) The expenditure to date since the 1st of July, 1867, is as follows:—Collingwood harbour, $220,286.18; Owen Sound harbour, $236,755.

BORING FOR COAL IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place any sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the boring for coal in Pleasant Valley or Wood Islands, in the province of Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The hon. gentlemen will get the information when the supplementaries are brought down.

IMPORTATION OF COAL OIL.

Mr. CALVERT asked :

1. What was the number of tenders received by the department for the erection of the post office at the town of Strathroy, county of Middlesex?
2. What were the names and amount of each tender?
3. What was the name of the party to whom the contract was granted?
4. What amount (if any) was paid for extras?
5. What did the officers of the department estimate the cost of said building, before contract was let?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Eight. 2. Lewis & Cluff, $14,475; Wm. Stuart, $17,711; Tambling & Jones, $18,670; F. Toms, $18,900; James Strachan, $18,992.60; Johnston & Fawcett, $19,646; P. Navin, $20,222; Campbell & McBeth, $21,870. 3. Lewis & Cluff. 4. $475. 5. $25,000, including site, heating and clerk of works.

THE QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for :

Copies of all letters, petitions and other documents bearing on the changes made in the quarantine regulations between the United States and Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, and particulars of changes made at each station in the personnel of officers employed to carry out the quarantine regulations.

He said: In rising to make this motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the sentiment of fear that pervades that portion of the North-west Territories which I represent, Western Assiniboia, respecting the changes which have taken place in quarantine. But I have made the motion cover more than Western Assiniboia, for the reason that I am assured that the feeling of alarm has extended into Alberta and into Manitoba as well. There are three classes of animals mainly affected by the change—sheep, cattle and swine. We are mainly concerned with sheep and cattle. Some four years ago, in consequence of a tainted flock of sheep having been brought in by Mr. Philbrick, the flocks and herds of Western Assiniboia and other parts of the country became affected with a virulent scab. The consequence was great loss, not merely in the animals that had to be killed, but also as to the saleability of our sheep and as to the wool clip. I spoke to the Minister of Agriculture on the subject at the time, and he passed an Order in Council giving a quarantine of thirty days. Now, that thirty days' quarantine is removed by the regulations passed by the present Government at the instance of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The consequence is that there is great alarm. I have here a communication from the Canadian Land and Ranch Company, Limited, Crane Lake, N.W.T. signed by :

	Sheep.
Joseph Dixon.....	1,400
A. J. Wallace.....	3,500
Martin & Harris.....	800
E. E. Heffer.....	300
G. W. Quick.....	1,900
Hassett & Cooil.....	1,100
W. Brown.....	1,850
Martin Bros.....	1,325
J. G. Farr.....	3,000
Canadian Land and Ranch Co.....	15,000

Now, I may say just in passing, as a matter of mere comment, that the name which heads this list is that of a strong supporter of the Government. This is what Mr. Andrews writes me :

Dear Sir,—I am requested by the wool-growers of the Maple Creek district to ask you to use your influence to get the Government to again establish the quarantine of thirty days on all sheep coming from the United States to the North-west Territories or British Columbia. (2.) We have already suffered very severely from scab in this district, which was brought in by a herd of sheep imported by a man named Philbrick, from Montana. These sheep were sold in small lots to sheep-owners in the district, and in every instance scab of the most virulent type made its appearance, causing the loss of thousands of sheep. As it made its appearance just at the beginning of winter, several owners were nearly ruined. Not only did a large percentage of their sheep die, but their next season's wool crop was hardly worth clipping, and they could not dispose of their fat sheep for mutton, as the district was quarantined. It took two years to stamp out the disease, and, as the late Government put on a quarantine against American sheep, no more scabby sheep have been imported. It is well known that sheep may have become infected by scab in passing over infected ground, or from corrals or cars, and that it is impossible to detect the disease in its early stage; but, if the sheep are held for thirty days, and inspected two or three times during that period, scab could be detected, if it is there. I inclose you the names of the wool-growers who have asked me to write to you. There would have been many others, had we had time to have seen them.

Yours truly,

D. H. ANDREWS.

Then follow the names I have already given. Mr. Johnson was one of those who called my attention to this matter some four years ago. He has published a communication to one of the members from Alberta, in one of the western papers, in which he made precisely the same estimate made by the writer of this letter. He pointed to the same source of loss and emphasized the fact that while scab in sheep so affected might appear at once, it also might appear only in fifteen days. So that you see, Mr. Speaker, the wool-growers and sheep-owners in the west are alarmed at what has taken place, and there is a general impression that the Minister of Agriculture was rather precipitate in his action.

There are others who feel equally alarmed with regard to cattle. They feel that our ranches will be overrun by American cattle. I believe that in Western Assiniboia there is no difference of opinion at all on this subject, but I am told that west of Western Assiniboia there is some little difference of opinion. For instance, I am told that some persons connected with the Corcoran ranch have said that the Chicago market is as good for them as the Montreal market. I do not know whether they go so far as to say that the quarantine was of no use, but they have expressed themselves as I have just stated. I am told, however, that that feeling is not general even there. I can say for Western Assiniboia, at any rate, that any cattlemen who have approached or written me on that subject have emphatically condemned the new regulations. What they say is that their ranches will be overrun, and that our ranches are valuable, whereas the Americans' are not, but are eaten off and daily becoming worse. There cannot, I think, be any doubt that our ranches are in excellent condition, and that the action of the Americans in heading their cattle at the beginning of every winter, on to the boundary line at Wood Mountain and Willow Bunch or still further west, shows what value they attach to our ranches as winter ranches for their cattle.

There is a communication to which my attention has been called, signed "Canada for the Canadians," which was sent to the Medicine Hat "News," and appears in that paper of 25th February, 1897, and just as some of those who signed the letter which I read to the House are strong supporters of this Government, I may say that the gentleman who writes this letter is an avowed supporter of it. He expresses belief that we have now a Government in power who will hear appeals of this nature, and, under such circumstances I feel still more confident in bringing his opinion before the House. This writer in the Medicine Hat "News" asks: What, under the existing condition of things, is to become of the stock-raiser and farmer in the great North-west who is just beginning to realize the profit there is in stock-raising in Manitoba, Assiniboia and Alberta, with "its vastitude and ranges," of which there is not the like on the continent of America? And right well, he goes on to say, do the Montana stockmen, as well as the stockmen of Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho and all the western grazing states know it. For many years they have looked on with jealous eye, but could not partake of the fruits which were and should be henceforth protected for the young and enterprising Canadian cattlemen. He goes on to say:

It is a well-known fact that the North-west ranges are the best in quantity and quality that are in the west to-day. It is also well known that the ranges of Montana, Dakota, Idaho, Wyoming, &c., are a thing of the past.

He says that the American ranchmen are rejoicing at the change and are laughing at the idea, and saying: What a snap it is for us, and he concludes by deploring the imminence of the inroad of American cattle into our valuable ranches. Again, he asks:

Are the Canadians who are just commencing the stock-raising industry, to be crushed out and made to return whence they came, and give all to the Yankee across the line, and his immense herds to feed and grow rich on the fat of our land? These same Yankees made their beginning in the stock-raising industry years ago, the same as our young Canadians are doing to-day, but time has allowed the Yankee to accumulate his thousands.

More than once, in this connection, he emphasizes the fear that the comparatively poor Canadian stockmen will be crushed out by the rich Yankee stockmen. He says:

Are the American stockmen going to crush out our young industry? The Canadian stockmen will need all the range this country has in a very short time, and so why should the American stockmen be privileged to come into our country and lease large tracts of territory for their immense herds, for the nominal sum of one cent per acre? These herds are sure to bring disease with them. They will eat out the range, leaving it as bare as the desert. How is the young stockman to compete with this foreign capital, literally bleeding the country? It will crush the young stockmen out for ever, unless he can procure some protection from the Government.

Here again is what he says, and I call the attention of the Government especially to it:

Although we believe in free trade to a certain extent, we do not believe in giving the already equipped and established Yankee stockmen the pasture that is intended for our Canadian citizens. Give the Canadian stockmen a chance, and in one-half the time it took the American cattlemen to accumulate what they have, our Canadians will double, as they have in every branch of business since confederation.

Then he says, as I told the House at the beginning of these remarks in introducing these letters :

The present Government is willing to hear you, and willing to protect you.

And then he goes on to make a very important statement.

At the present time there is a disease breaking up near Fort Benton, Mont. The nature of this disease is unknown to stockmen, but it threatens absolute destruction to many thousand head.

And again :

Why cannot there be some plan suggested that will protect our Canadian ranges or our own citizens, instead of allowing the American stockmen to monopolize the country and give nothing in return? It certainly will hurt the country and tend to depopulate it.

We are, in politics, Liberals and free traders, so long as we get the equivalent in return for what we give ; but in this important matter we get nothing.

Politics should have nothing to do with so important a matter as this, and every right-thinking person whom it may concern, should do something to assist the Government in adjusting the measure so that it may be an everlasting benefit to ourselves.

Should the Government remove the quarantine? The duty should be raised to 40 per cent to all American stockmen, who are sure to flood the country with their countless thousands of horned cattle, horses and sheep, if once the quarantine is removed in the British North-west Territories. But the actual Canadian citizen who is actually engaged in stock-raising and is helping to build up the country, should be privileged to get his young cattle in the United States from parts where disease is not known, free from duty.

And he closes with these words :

This is one way out, where the actual Canadian citizen will have protection, and in a very few years will be able to compete successfully with other stockmen. On the other hand, if he has no protection, he will be completely crushed out of business by the wealthy American stockmen.

Now, that is from a man as far west as Medicine Hat. I have here a communication from Parkbeg which, as hon. members know, is considerably east of Maple Creek :

Dear Sir,—Many thanks for your prompt attention in the matter of reports. I would like to call your attention to—but, doubtless, it has been done by others—that of the agreement made by Hon. Mr. Fisher, the Minister of Agriculture, and the United States Secretary of Agriculture, relating to the quarantine of animals under the heading of "breeding cattle, &c." It says : cattle for feeding or stock ranches must be accompanied by a certificate showing that they are free from any contagious disease. If I understand this rightly, the United States cattle in limitless numbers may be fed in Canadian pastures. This, to my mind, is unfair and detrimental to western stock-raisers, and certainly ought to be amended. Some one should see to it. I know of no better man than the member elect.

Yours respectfully.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that these communications establish that there is uneasiness in regard to these quarantine regulations, and therefore I think it is desirable that the papers that I ask for in this motion should be brought down, explaining the changes in these regulations. I further ask for "particulars of changes made at each station in the personnel of the officers employed to carry out the quarantine regulations." I will not dwell at any length on my reason for asking for this list. Hon. members will easily surmise why I wish this information, but I have no desire to divert the attention of the House from the subject which is the pressing subject in regard to these regulations that is before the House and the country, viz., whether the Minister of Agriculture has not been a little precipitate in having the Government pass the Order in Council that has been passed, and whether he should not consider the rescinding of these regulations, or, at least, the making of inquiries with a view to seeing whether it is not his duty to rescind them, in order to protect our stockmen in Assiniboia and other parts of the west.

Mr. LISTER. I am sure we all must regret the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) when a somewhat important motion, as this is, is brought up for discussion before the House. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who has just spoken. I think the Government is entitled to the thanks of the stockmen of Canada and of the country at large for the steps they have taken to facilitate the sale and transportation of stock from Canada to the United States and from that country to Canada. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is evidently not familiar with the facts. He has spoken from a brief furnished to him by gentlemen who seem to imagine that these new regulations will have the effect of destroying the industry in the North-west. But, Sir, a moment's consideration must satisfy you that such cannot be the case. The hon. gentleman surely knows that cattle coming into Canada, whether into the older provinces or the North-west Territories, must pay a duty ; and he knows that if these cattle are transported again to the United States they are met at the boundary line, and must pay duty on going back. So that, so far as the fear of cattle being brought into Canada to compete with the Canadian producer of cattle in the United States market or any other market is concerned, it is without foundation. I know as a fact, at least I believe, that the hon. gentleman who occupied the position now held by the Minister of Agriculture, made efforts to bring about the simplification of the quarantine regulations between this country and the United States, regulations which every person at all familiar with the trade knows where such an obstruction as to make it impossible to deal in cattle between the two countries. Why, Sir, what was the fact? While we sent large numbers of sheep to the United States, we were unable to export cattle. Why? Because we were met at the border with quarantine regulations. It was necessary that the cattle should remain in quarantine for ninety days. The result was a tremendous cost to the importer, making it impossible for him to trade profitably with the United States.

Why, Sir, if my hon. friend will take up the London "Free Press," if he will take up the Brockville papers, if he will take up the Buffalo papers, within a few days after these new quarantine regulations came into effect, he will find that thousands of cattle at once went from Ontario to the United States, and found a market in the city of Buffalo. It was not profitable to ship away our cattle at that time to England, and the new regulations enabled the Canadian stockman to ship his cattle to the United States last winter and receive profitable prices for cattle that otherwise he would have had to winter over and ultimately send to England for sale. Why, the Buffalo papers day after day remarked upon the tremendous impetus given to the cattle trade. Twenty carloads would come in, forty carloads would come in, during the day, finding a ready sale, and the consequence was that the Canadian farmer had a market open for his surplus products that he would not have had had not these quarantine regulations been brought into operation by the present Minister of Agriculture. What is the position? Was there any greater safety then than there is now? At that time the animals imported into the country had to be put in quarantine; now, instead of going into quarantine, a veterinary surgeon appointed by the Government, certifies that these cattle are free from disease, and upon that certificate the United States authorities allow them to enter that country. We in like manner accept from the United States officer his certificate to the same effect, and we allow those cattle to come into Canada. As a matter of fact, we import no cattle at all, except for breeding purposes; and I venture to say that any cattle imported into the North-west Territories must be for the same purpose—not for the purpose of entering into competition with local breeders, not for the purpose of feeding and going back again to the United States, but for the purpose of improving the herds in the North-west Territories. No cattlemen would take their cattle from Montana, or from Idaho, or any other state, into the North-west Territories, paying a duty to Canada, and then take them back to the United States, paying the 20 per cent duty which is exacted there again. It would not be profitable, and not being profitable, it will not be done. I apprehend that the gentleman who wrote those letters, parts of which my hon. friend has read to the House, were apprehensive that injury might result, when, as a matter of fact, no injury has resulted. The quarantine service of Canada and the United States did not work satisfactorily. It was overloaded with officers, it was costly to the country, and it was an impediment to trade between the two countries. These difficulties and objections have been removed to a great extent. So far as safety is concerned, I venture the assertion that we are as safe to-day as we were when the quarantine regulations were in force which compelled us to keep those animals in quarantine ninety days. In my own town we had a quarantine, and I venture to say that in all the years it was in force I do not think one single animal was destroyed on account of disease. They were put in there, poorly attended to, often at great expense; they were not entrusted to the man in charge of the quarantine, but to the hired men themselves. Only animals were imported into Canada that were brought in for the purpose of breeding. It was a subject of irritation, but it was a subject of loss and complaint; and I repeat the statement which I have made, that the Minister of Agriculture, in removing those objections, in carrying out what I believe his predecessor intended to do, and tried to do, has bestowed upon this country a great benefit that it would not have enjoyed were it not for the regulations being changed and made as they are to-day. It is quite possible that within a very few days the tariff of the United States may be so high as to prevent the importation of cattle into that country at all; but at the present moment, and for months past, vast quantities of cattle have been exported to the United States to the great profit of the farmers of this country. Papers which support my hon. friends opposite have spoken in terms of the strongest commendation of what has been done; and I venture to say that there is no paper in Ontario East, and I doubt if there are many in the west, thoroughly understanding the subject, which would be prepared to take exception to what has been done by the Government. The Government are entitled to the thanks of every stock-raiser in this country, and I believe they will receive it. A return to the old condition of affairs would be taking a step backwards, a step not in the interests of the people of this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no one, I think, who will for a moment say that the subject which has been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is not a very important one indeed. It has many phases, one of which has not been touched upon, either by the hon. gentleman who moved the motion or by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), who has continued this discussion. I may be pardoned, perhaps, if I go for a few moments a little outside of the line which these gentlemen have taken, and refer to another phase of the question which will be very interesting to the House, more particularly in view of the history of this question, because it has had a long history so far as negotiations in regard to the cattle trade are concerned. But first let me say a word as to the first part of the subject which the hon. member for West Assiniboia discussed, namely, the sheep question, in which the western districts are, if we are to believe their representations in papers submitted to the department, very greatly interested indeed. Under the late Government representations of a very urgent nature were made that on account of the scab which was prevalent in the territory across the line, a quarantine should be established in regard to the importation of American sheep. At first it was asked that a ninety-day quarantine be established, and afterwards it was agreed upon that possibly a shorter time would prove to be effective in keeping out that disease, which the sheep-raisers of Alberta, particularly, were very anxious to have kept out. Whatever may be said with regard to the policy of the Government, and of its popularity in other sections of the country, I venture to say that if the Government have entirely abandoned the sheep quarantine as regards those territories, it will be a move against which the sheep-raisers of Alberta will determinedly set their faces. Now, as to the cattle quarantine, it is important to look at this subject in view of a statement which was made by the Minister of Agriculture, whose absence I regret, equally with the member for West Lambton. Last year when this subject came under discussion in the House, some conversation took place across the floor as to whether the Government had absolutely abandoned the policy of securing the removal of the embargo enforced against Canadian cattle. At that time the Minister of Agriculture, in answer to a question put by myself, declared that he had not at all abandoned that policy, but that he had a firm hope that he would eventually succeed in getting that embargo against Canadian cattle removed. I take it, from the policy which the Government has pursued, that they have at least absolutely abandoned that hope, because the Government are quite aware that in the abandonment of the quarantine against American cattle, they can no longer with a shadow of reason entertain the hope of securing the removal of the British embargo against our cattle, which was imposed in 1892. Sir, I must say this, that I do not think they are abandoning much, because, after the conferences which I personally had with the Department of Agriculture in England, I was convinced that the attempt to secure the removal of that embargo was a vain attempt, and any hope we might have entertained of securing the removal of that embargo was a hope practically without foundation. But it is just as well for the country to understand the intimation which is unmistakably given in the removal of quarantine against American cattle, that the Dominion Government has abandoned even the effort to secure the removal of that embargo which has worked so strongly and effectively against the interests of Canadian cattle. I now want to refer for a moment to a statement made by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) as to the credit which should be given to the Dominion Government for this very prompt and important action on their part in securing reciprocity, so far as this matter is concerned, not a reciprocity involving the absolute abandonment of the duty or of any duty, but the mutual removal of the quarantine between this country and the United States. The hon. member for Lambton knows very well that there is not a very great deal of credit due this Government for that work. I am willing to give the Government any credit due them on any subject, whether of an agricultural or any other nature, but the hon. member for Lambton must know, and the Minister of Agriculture must know that that quarantine was never put up on account of the action of the United States in quarantining Canadian cattle, but it was put up because of the action of the Canadian Government against the United States for the protection of our herds from disease, and we maintained the quarantine against American cattle, not for the purpose of obstructing trade with the United States, but because we always hoped and fondly hoped that by keeping up that quarantine against American cattle, which was one of the requirements of the arrangements made with the Imperial Government, we would maintain the health of our herds and would finally secure release from the embargo, and entrance into the British market, and such an advantage, for one hour, would be more beneficial to the Canadian farmers than access to the local market of Buffalo from now till the end of the century. Sir, when credit is spoken of as being due to the Government, I am bound to say that in five minutes we could have secured the removal of the American quarantine against our cattle, simply by saying to the United States Government: We will take down our quarantine and give free admission to your cattle. But we maintained it with a view to secure the greater market of Great Britain, which was of immense advantage to the Canadian farmers. I am not saying that the question cannot be argued from both sides. When I looked at it, I considered it with the view that there were two sides to the argument. If we were to abandon the hope of securing the removal of the embargo in Great Britain, if there was good hope of securing the removal of that embargo by keeping up the embargo against American cattle, then the question was not one for argument, the facts and advantages were all on one side. But if we were to abandon the hope of securing the removal of the British embargo, the question was a debatable one, and there were arguments to be used on both sides. There are arguments to be advanced for the removal of the quarantine, and there are arguments for its maintenance; but so far as any credit due to the Government is concerned, I repeat that this is a question with which the late Government might easily have dealt, if we had not looked at the broader question of securing the British market for our cattle exports. I desire to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Lambton as to the importance the American market has proved itself to be for Canadian farmers. I have no doubt when these new regulations came into force a considerable number of cattle were taken to the other side of the line; but it is my information that the trade did not pay, and that if the hon. gentleman will follow the inquiry into recent months and recent weeks he will find that what promised to be a very flourishing trade has proved exceedingly disappointing to those who engaged in it. There is another phase of this question to which I desire to refer for a moment. When the hon. leader of the Government visited the county of Brant he said to the people there: See what we have done; we have only been in power an exceedingly short time, and yet we have given you free trade between Canada and the United States. I know it was a lapsus linguae, that the hon. gentleman did not mean that he had secured the removal of customs duties on either side, because he knows that quarantine regulations and tariff regulations are two different things; and I am pleased that the hon. gentleman was in error in that regard, for I am justified in supposing that it was not a shadow which told of coming events by the candid manner in which the hon. member assured the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that while the quarantine regulations were off, the duty was still on, and hence there was no ruinous competition in the cattle-raising business in the North-west Territories of Canada. I hope that the little utterance of the member for West Lambton is correct, and that even if the quarantine regulations are permanently removed, we will at least have the protection of our own market for our farmers in regard to this line of the product of the farm. I can only say in conclusion that the removal of the sheep quarantine will be a disadvantage. I can only hope that the removal of the cattle quarantine will not be an injury. The hon. member for West Lambton says no injury has been done. I tell the hon. member that sufficient time has not elapsed to discover whether any injury has been done. The future will tell whether the health of our herds is affected; but, personally, it seems to me that the maintenance of the sheep quarantine in the North-west would be exceedingly advantageous to the people there.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to say a few words on this question. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has forgotten that the Government of which he was a member was the first to relax quarantine regulations with respect to cattle. They removed the quarantine regulations so that cattle could come in from the United States to our North-west. It was owing to the action of the late Government in not enforcing quarantine regulations against American cattle, but allowing them to come into the North-west during a number of years that, in my estimation, was the cause of our cattle being scheduled in the British market. That was known to the Government, and, in fact, known to every one in the trade, and we have suffered on that account. This Government undoubtedly deserves great credit for what they have so far done for the farmers. They have accomplished more. They have secured the settlement of the quarantine question and, at the same time, they have ensured adequate protection to the health of our cattle. Let me read to the House the regulation under which cattle now come into Canada, that is, fat cattle and cattle for feeding, including range cattle for stocking ranches:

This class of animals shall be accompanied by a certificate of inspection, signed by an official veterinarian, showing that the animals are free from contagious disease and that no contagious disease of cattle (excepting tuberculosis and actinomycosis) exists in the district whence they came.

Therefore, with the exception of these two diseases, our cattle are free from every other disease, pleuro-pneumonia included, because of which the British Government scheduled our cattle. If I have been correctly informed, and I think I have been, it has been a benefit to the people of the North-west, because large numbers of even beef cattle have gone to the States from Manitoba and the Territories. Our settlers who go into the North-west will be very much benefited because they can go to the United States and purchase stockers for their farms. They have been coming all the way to Ontario for these cattle, and they have been put to the expense of getting them to the ranches from such a great distance. This arrangement will relieve the settlers in the North-west from a good deal of expense, and more especially the young settlers who want a few ranch cattle. We have been very much benefited in Ontario indeed as will be shown by the following statement:—

The total value of the live stock exported from Toronto during March was $110,643. For the same month, last year, not a dollar's worth of live stock was exported from here. The exports were divided between Portland and Buffalo, the latter point, however, taking the bulk of this stock. On Saturday, fourteen cars of stock were sent over the Grand Trunk to Iowa, several cars containing calves for feeding purposes. These were sent from Myrtle. There were also eleven cars of stock for Buffalo and five for Portland.

Now, Sir, although I hold it would be a benefit to have every animal we raise fattened for the market in this country, yet we have a large number of farmers who are not in a position to fatten their stock and who are compelled to sell. I hold that the quarantine regulations that have been entered into between the Government of Canada and that of the United States, have been a great benefit to that class of farmers. When the McKinley Bill came into force between 30,000 and 40,000 head of stockers went annually to the States, and we know that the McKinley Bill stopped that trade. I believe that the quarantine regulations are such, that if the disease appears in any locality the Government can at once enforce these regulations. Our cattle breeders have held for a long time, that it was necessary that animals for breeding purposes should be allowed to come to Canada from the United States free from quarantine regulations, so long as a certificate was given that the animal imported was free from disease and that no disease existed in the locality whence it came. The Order in Council had hardly been passed when the buyers from the United States were scouring Ontario to purchase cattle there, and take them to the States. It is a benefit to the breeders of the province of Ontario to get animals from the United States to mix with their stock, because there is some excellent stock in the States. I hold that the late Government was very negligent with respect to the quarantine regulations and also with respect to the complaints about scab in sheep. I myself rose in this House and warned the late Government that unless a very strict system of inspection was put in force, our sheep would soon be scheduled. But they paid no attention to it until the disease came into the country from the United States, and then got to Great Britain. If the regulations had been enforced properly, we would not have had our sheep scheduled as they have been. The late Government was unwise in its generation, and they did not lock the stable door until after the horse was stolen. I believe that the present regulations will be of great benefit to the people of this country even suppose the American tariff increases the duty on animals and prevents us shipping stockers or beef cattle. The free interchange of animals for breeding purposes would benefit both Canada and the United States. The new arrangement made by the present Government enables us not only to ship from Portland, but also from Boston and New York to the British market, and this will prevent the grievances the farmers laboured under in having to pay higher rates from Canadian than from American ports. That benefit will continue to us even though a higher tariff is enforced ed against us by the United States. The present Minister of Agriculture has done a great benefit to the farmers and stock-breeders of this country, and he has succeeded in doing more than was done by the late Government for many years. To say that there is no thanks due to the Minister of Agriculture for negotiating this arrangement at Washington, is not a correct statement to make. The farmers in this House knew their wants and knew what would benefit them and they unsuccessfully urged on the late Government to take measures to bring this arrangement about. The conduct of the late Government is another evidence of the rank folly of having a Minister of Agriculture who did not understand the business, and who did not understand the needs of the cattle shippers and farmers of this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I be allowed just a personal explanation. My hon. friend (Mr. McMillan) and myself, are, I am afraid, upon the same side of the question, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) had listened to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) he would have understood so. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) stated, and stated properly, that the negotiations which finally resulted in the removal of the vexatious quarantine between the two countries were started by myself, and in consequence, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) can have no fault to find with me on that score. What I did say was this: That the late Government only considered it a question of discussion for the removal of these quarantine regulations, when we had absolutely abandoned the hope of securing the removal of the British embargo. I am sure the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. McMillan) agrees with me in that conclusion.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one point in connection with this discussion which we should make clear. The ex-Minister of Finance has said, that the action of the present Government, entering into an arrangement with the United States for the betterment of the quarantine regulations, is an evidence that they have dropped all hope of the removal of the embargo on cattle from England. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) knows, if he is a close reader of what has taken place in England, that the embargo occupies a very different position to-day from what it did when he was Minister of Agriculture, and when his party were in power. He knows that then the embargo only took the shape of a schedule order by the Minister of Agriculture suspending the admission of our cattle. He knows that since then, and before the present Government came into power, it took the shape of a statutory enactment, and occupies that position to-day. Now, during the time that there was any hope at all of removing that embargo, and when a vigorous and active and earnest effort should be made for its removal, hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and they did not make that vigorous, active and determined effort to have it removed. The result was, that the English Government passed the embargo into a statutory enactment, so that its removal, if made at all, has to be made by a repealing Act of the British Parliament. Under these circumstances, the present Minister of Agriculture, seeing that England had proceeded in the determination of perpetuating that condition of things, made the very best move he could make. That was to secure the closest, most liberal and most unrestricted intercourse for the sale of cattle between Canada and the United States; and he has done that. But what was the cause of the embargo in the first place? Was it because there were no quarantine regulations between Canada and the United States? It was because, although they did exist, they were so loosely, recklessly and carelessly administered by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, and the English Minister of Agriculture became aware of the fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. That has been proved over and over again in this House, and the documents will bear out what I say.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I will say that, on some future occasion, I will bring a letter which was sent to me by the present president of the British Board of Agriculture, the Right Hon. Walter Long, in which he said that the British Government never had a shadow of fault to find with the manner in which we carried out the regulations.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) read to this House all the correspondence in connection with that unfortunate incident, and proved beyond all question that the responsibility rested at the door of the Government here, and there has never, to this day, been an answer made to that charge.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him, who is the higher authority as to what influenced the Imperial Government—the British Minister of Agriculture or the Postmaster General of Canada?

Mr. McMULLEN. What the Postmaster General of Canada presented here was a complete recapitulation of the communications that passed between the Government of Canada and the Home Government on that whole question. The English Government outlined a certain course which the Canadian Government should take in order to get that embargo removed. Were the suggestions of the British Government carried out?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is another question altogether.

Mr. McMULLEN. They were not at all, as the hon. leader of the Opposition knows. One suggestion was that several of the herds shipped to England should be slaughtered in order to ascertain whether pleuropneumonia existed in Canada or not. Can the hon. leader of the Opposition say that that suggestion was carried out?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. An utterly impracticable suggestion.

Mr. McMULLEN. It was not carried out, and the reason was that it would be too great an expense to do so. The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), in presenting the case to the House, did not do it fairly. Hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches when the opportunity existed for the removal of the embargo, and neglected that opportunity. They did not exert themselves as earnestly or zealously as they ought to have done to get that embargo removed. The present Government, however, entered office after the embargo had taken a statutory form, and when the prospect of getting it removed was much less than when it was in the form of a scheduling order. That is the difference.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in the view he takes of this question. The evidence is clear and incontrovertible. The papers brought down and laid on the Table of the House of Commons by the Imperial Government showed that Canada had made out such an overwhelming case in favour of the removal of all the disabilities imposed by the schedule, that the Colonial Minister, who had the whole matter under his charge, and with whom all the negotiations were carried on, declared, in a communication to the Department of Agriculture—a thing almost unparalleled in the history of the Imperial Government—that he was satisfied, from the case that Canada had presented, that no pleuro-pneumonia existed in this country. The Liberal party were then in power, and the Marquis of Ripon exerted all his influence—in fact, went further than a British Minister almost ever goes—to induce his colleagues in the Government to cancel the order. If the Government of Canada were able to make out a case that satisfied the Colonial Minister that the restriction ought to be removed, I want to know whether it lies with any person in Canada to say that there was any failure on the part of the Canadian Government. I think that settles the matter conclusively. Lord Ripon felt strongly, as the late Minister of Agriculture said since his removal to the House of Lords, that the adoption of an Act prohibiting cattle from being landed alive in Great Britain was a matter of pure protection. I, myself, felt, when the present Government came into power, that the removal of the embargo was practically hopeless, and it was the deplorable condition of the agricultural interest in England, brought so forcibly to the notice of the Imperial Government, that induced them to adopt this policy. It was not in my opinion, for the purpose of protecting British cattle from the introduction of pleuro-pneumonia or other disease from this or any other country, but for the purpose of protecting the interests of British agriculturists.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. SPROULE. I rose before six o'clock to say but a very few words upon this motion in reply to some remarks that were made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I was a little surprised at the position taken by the hon. member for South Huron to-day and the fulsome eulogy he expended upon this Government for the concessions which they obtained from the United States, in the shape of permission to export our cattle to that country without undergoing the quarantine that was previously imposed. It is only a few years ago when the hon. gentleman advocated very strongly the importation of free corn on the ground that it was absolutely necessary in order that we might feed our cattle as cheaply as possible. He contended that the most profitable trade to our farmers would be the feeding of cattle in Canada until they were in prime condition and then exporting them to the old country. At that time there was a discussion as to the advantage which Canada had secured through the efforts of our then High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper) in getting the embargo taken off cattle exported to Great Britain, and the hon. gentleman took the view that the removal of this embargo was no great advantage to us, because it would be much more profitable to our farmers to ship our cattle in prime condition than to ship them as stockers, and that it would be in their interests if our Government would prevent the exportation of stockers. He said that he himself every year fed a number of cattle, and the disadvantage he found he had to labour under was the difficulty of obtaining coarse grains, and contended that if corn were allowed to come in free, we would be enabled to feed our own cattle cheaply, so that even if Great Britain did schedule our cattle, that would be to our profit, because it was much better for us to feed our own cattle for export to the old country. The sooner the day came, he said, when Canada would not export half-fed cattle or stockers, the better it would be for Canadian farmers, and therefore he did not consider the late Government entitled to any credit for the removal of that embargo or for its efforts to have it removed. To-day however, the hon. gentleman appears to have changed his views, and thinks it is a great concession to be allowed to ship our cattle without quarantine to the United States, and he instanced with much satisfaction the number of stockers which had been sent to Buffalo last spring. I really can find no reason for this change of policy on the hon. gentleman's part except in the fact that this concession was obtained by his friends. Just as it depends a great deal whose ox is gored, so it depends a great deal who it is that does the act, and he congratulates his own friends to-day on obtaining something which a few years ago he argued was no advantage to our Canadian farmers.

The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) complained very strongly that the late Government had not made the strong effort they should have made to have the embargo raised on our cattle, and he went on to argue that that embargo was put on our cattle because the quarantine regulations were not enforced by this Government, but were very laxly carried out. I believe he went so far as to say that the British Board of Agriculture declared it was because of that fact that the embargo had been imposed. The late Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) replied by citing the contents of a letter from the president of the Board of Agriculture (Mr. Long), which distinctly stated that the board had never complained of the way in which we had carried out our quarantine regulations, and that it was not at all on that account the embargo was put on Canadian cattle. At the time the first complaint was made, in 1892, two cases supposed to be pleuro-pneumonia were found in a consignment of cattle on the "Huron" and "Mount Seaton." The late Government did everything possible, firstly, to satisfy the British Board of Agriculture that there was no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada and, secondly, that the herd from which these cattle came was not affected but was healthy in every respect, and that, therefore, there was no possible reason why they should be slaughtered. The hon. member for Wellington condemned the late Government for not having ordered the slaughter of the cattle from which these two cases were taken. He said that, at any rate, they were open to the suspicion of having been brought in from the United States, owing to the lax enforcement of our quarantine regulations, and therefore prejudiced our case in the old country. He forgot to tell the House that in tracing up the sources from which these cattle came, it was found that one came from Wolfe Island, near Kingston, and that the herd from which it came was closely inspected and again examined and every single animal in it found to be healthy in every respect, free from pleuro-pneumonia or any other infective disease whatever. It was found that the other animal came from Pilot Mound, in Manitoba, and that also was traced to a herd which was found to be healthy in every respect. What need had the Government to go further? There would not have been a man in this House more ready to condemn the Government if they had gone beyond that and slaughtered the cattle belonging to the settlers after it was found there was no pleuro-pneumonia or any other disease whatever among them.

The hon. gentleman has overshot the mark in his anxiety to eulogize the present Government for the concessions they have obtained with regard to quarantine. The late Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) began negotiations with this object in view, and had the late Government remained in power a little longer, there is no doubt we would have obtained the same relaxation, with better regulations than are made to-day. I regard the regulations that have been made on this quarantine question as very lax, and I do not wonder that the people in the North-west Territories are apprehensive of danger arising from them. It is no wonder that they dread the bringing of the sheep scab into that country, as one of the results of these lax regulations. There is another reason why they are not satisfied, and one which is worthy the serious attention of the Government. It is this: At certain seasons of the year, the pasture south of the boundary line is very sparse, and the American ranchers are disposed to bring their cattle north for grass, and the regulations are so lax that there is nothing to prevent their doing this and possibly importing disease. But even if they do not import disease, the Americans will obtain a very important consideration in being allowed to graze their cattle in our country where the pasture is good at a season of the year when with them the pasture is bad. Some hon. gentlemen may deny this but here are the regulations:

Fat cattle and cattle for feeding, including range cattle for stocking ranches.

Section 22. This class of animals shall be accompanied by a certificate of inspection, signed by an official veterinarian showing that the animals are free from contagious diseases and that no contagious disease of cattle (excepting tuberculosis and actinomycosis) exists in the district whence they came.

It is the easiest matter in the world to get that certificate. Men bringing in cattle from the ranches can get it at any time. How are the parties charged with the authority of administering these regulations to know whether the certificate is official or not? An American ranchman brings that certificate along and his cattle can feed in our country the whole season. Some of our ranchers think that this is going to be very injurious to them. If it does nothing else, it gives the use, free, to Americans of our pasture lands for which our ranchers pay an annual rent, and which our ranchers think ought to be preserved for the use of our own cattle. Our ranchers therefore do not think these regulations are stringent enough to secure to them the consideration and protection they ought to have in their own country. Then the Americans can bring in horses without any inspection:

Section 40. Horses may be admitted for general purposes, for sale, or for stocking ranches, and also cow ponies for cattle ranches, or horses which form part of settlers' effects, on inspection at port of entry only.

N.B.—Inspection of horses admitted under the above clauses shall not be enforced unless ordered by the Minister of Agriculture, when deemed expedient or necessary.

Therefore, it is quite clear it is not deemed yet expedient or necessary, and American horses may come in without any inspection or examination. Our settlers object to this. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to this, if he were in the House or the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), because I think it is worthy of serious consideration, and it appears to me more stringent regulations will have to be made before you can secure to our settlers what they are entitled to in their own country. Then I take the question of sheep. Now it is true that the importation of sheep for breeding and feeding purposes may be permitted subject to inspection. But inspection at a port of entry will not always show whether sheep are troubled with scab or rot. The disease may be in its incipient stage, and in that case, it cannot be detected by the best veterinary surgeon. I find that sheep for slaughter will be admitted without certificates or inspection. What is to prevent people representing that their sheep are brought in for slaughtering purposes? They may be brought in in large numbers and no record will be kept of them. They may mix with the ranch sheep of our North-west, and cause a repetition of the same trouble that the ranchers had to meet in 1892, when they suffered severe losses through the scab. To my mind the regulations are too lax, and I am quite sure it will be found that they will have to be changed before very long, or else there will be practically no security for the settlers in the North-west and nothing to prevent the mixing with their flocks of sheep from south of the boundary line.

While I am quite satisfied that it is of great benefit to us here at some seasons of the year to be able to send our stockers off to the United States under better quarantine regulations to Canada than we had, still I do think this system will lead to evil in the future which will necessitate a change in the regulations. Then, with regard to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, especially the North-west Territories, I think that when these regulations are practically worked out it will be found that they are of no practical advantage to the settlers there, and the Government will be obliged to change them and change them quite materially. I do not wish to detract from any credit that the Government is entitled to for anything they have done in connection with the Department of Agriculture. I think the present Minister is endeavouring to do his best, and with many of the things he has done I am heartily in accord. But I do say that he is not entitled to so much credit in this case over the late Government, because they were going to do the same thing. Until it was seen that it was impossible for the Canadian Government to secure the withdrawal of the embargo upon our cattle in England, it was inadvisable to do anything about the relaxation of the quarantine regulations. But when it was found that this could not be done, the late Government attempted to do what the present Minister has done. The idea being carried out, in my opinion it might have been carried out with better and stricter regulations, regulations that would inure more to the benefit of the Canadian farmer than those that have been adopted.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to occupy the attention of the House for a few minutes with a discussion of this question from a strictly non-partisan standpoint. I regret very much that a question of such importance to the country, and especially to the western country, should have led to so much discussion, which was, to my mind, more historical and partisan than matter of fact. On this question it may be admitted, perhaps, that I speak with some authority, as I happen to represent the constituency that is probably most deeply interested in this quarantine question, by reason of the number of stock held in it and by reason of its situation. I would like to set before the House as clearly as possible the different questions that are affected by this matter, and that, with all deference to preceding speakers, have been rather mixed up. I should like to sort these questions out, so to speak, so that there may be a clearer understanding of the effects in regard to each one.

Now, as to the good intentions of the Minister of Agriculture and the Government in bringing about this change of the quarantine regulations, I do not suppose there can be any question. This was not a partisan move, but one intended in the general interest of the agricultural community. In the discussions in the Agricultural Committee last session, men of all parties spoke in favour of the abolition of these quarantine regulations—not that I spoke in favour of them, for I did not. There is a certain difference of interest between the west and the east in this matter of stock and cattle generally, which I would like to point out to the House. While in the east, the drift is towards the States from Canada, in the west the drift is from the States to Canada; so that, while there is an antagonism in the eastern states to our Canadian stock going over there, so in the west there is an antagonism to American stock coming to our side of the line. There are reasons for this which do not need to be particularized now. I am simply stating a fact which must be borne in mind when considering and discussing this question. Now, we in the west believe in governments that will work in the line of the greatest good to the greatest number; and, as the greatest number of people is in the east, we do not expect that our special interests will receive special consideration at the hands of the east to their own prejudice. At the same time, we would not be doing what is right by those who sent us here if we did not represent the special interests of the west as the people of the west understand them. We do not expect impossibilities on the part of the Government; but we certainly cannot expect the Parliament or this Government to legislate satisfactorily in regard to our special interests unless Parliament is thoroughly informed as to what those special interests are. In regard to the matter of sheep quarantine, I am bound to say that the experience of the past has been that a quarantine is necessary for the prevention of the disease called scab being introduced into the flocks of sheep on the Canadian side of the boundary. This disease was introduced some years ago accidentally, and it cost the southern range country many thousands of dollars before it was got rid of. Not only was there the loss of sheep dying through the disease, and the cost of eradicating the disease, but, during the continuance of the pest, the sheep could not be sold and had to be held on the ranges, being thus dead stock, for two if not three years. The loss was tremendous; and it is desirable that it should not be repeated. Now I am aware of the provisions contained in the new quarantine regulations for the protection of sheep from the introduction of disease; and, while I believe that these regulations are probably sufficient for the conditions prevailing in eastern Canada, I certainly, on the information I have, cannot consider them effective in regard to the protection of sheep in western Canada, that is to say, in the ranching country. Where sheep are brought in by two, or three, or a dozen—and that is the only way, I believe, in which they are brought in from the states to eastern Canada—they are distributed among the bands in small numbers which are kept in closed fields in the farms of eastern Canada, and it is a very small matter to know whether disease has been brought in, and to isolate that disease if it has been brought in. But in the west where bands run into the hundreds of thousands, the introduction of disease among them is a serious matter, and once it is introduced it becomes almost uncontrollable except at tremendous cost and loss. Therefore, the House will see how important it is that provisions to prevent the introduction of disease should be made as effective as possible. I am afraid that in the drafting of these resolutions sufficient consideration has not been given to the conditions prevailing in the west whereby the introduction of disease could be prevented. I am perfectly aware that there is a provision by which sheep brought in must have a certificate from the Government inspector on the United States side of the line, showing that they are in a healthy condition. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the House will agree with me that a certificate from an inspector appointed by the United States Government, when we take all the circumstances into consideration, is not an adequate protection against the introduction of disease into this country. Although I do not wish to say anything offensive, still when we consider the system under which officials are appointed in that country, when we consider the general spirit prevailing in that country, I think you will agree with me that when $100,000 or $200,000 is at stake, it would be an easy matter to fix an inspector, or to secure almost any kind of certificate from a great many of those Government inspectors. This would not be the case in the east, where each importation would only amount to a few dollars anyway, and it would not be worth the while for the exporter to do any figuring with the Government inspector. The case is different in the west, where a deal may run into hundreds of thousands, and where it is worth the while of the party who is bringing the sheep across, or sending them across, to make any terms that may be desirable with the inspector. Now, in regard to cattle, the case is entirely different. There has not been any introduction of disease amongst Canadian cattle from the United States side of the line. I understand that there is not the same probability, and therefore the same stringency in regard to quarantine is not necessary. When the quarantine regulations were first abolished, or when the people in the west heard they were going to be abolished, they were very much excited, and greatly feared that the abolition of quarantine regulations in regard to cattle would injure their interests severely. The instinct of self-preservation is just as strong in the west as it is in the east, and when the cattle ranchers of the west think they are liable to be injured by any Government regulations they certainly become alarmed, without respect to party politics, just as people in the east do. Therefore, when they feared that the abolition of these quarantine regulations would lower the value of their cattle on those ranches, they certainly did get considerably excited. I may say, Sir that that alarm was considerably increased by the very injudicious acts of an employee of the Government who was sent out there. I suppose, to allay the excitement, which he certainly did not succeed in doing. It was published in the newspapers, whether mistakingly or otherwise, that he had grossly misrepresented public opinion in the west in regard to this quarantine matter, and whatever excitement existed before was greatly increased by this deliberate misrepresentation. However, I am bound to say for the information of the House and for the information of the Government, that so far as matters have gone up to the present time, the cattle interests of the west have not been prejudiced by the removal of the quarantine: on the contrary, I notice in a late issue of the Macleod "Gazette," which may be said to be the organ of the cattle industry in that ranching country of the south, that cattle are bringing to-day a better price than at any time during the past two years, that the demand is better and the price is better; and particularly the price is better for the purpose of supplying the British Columbia market. Now, it was the fear of being shut out of the British Columbia market that stirred up the western ranchmen against the removal of the quarantine regulations in regard to cattle. I am not going to discuss the merits of the question as to what is going to be the result of the abolition of these regulations; but I will merely state as a matter of fact that up to the present time the price of cattle is better than it was before, and therefore the excitement that did arise among the cattlemen has been to a great extent, if not altogether, allayed. That is information that I think it well to put the House in possession of, so that there may not to be any misunderstanding. There was another matter that was discussed at some length by the hon. member who moved the motion, and that was the driving of American cattle across the line for the purpose of enabling them to feed on the better grasses on the north side of the line. That is a matter of very great interest in the western country; it has attracted the attention of a great number of stockmen; and it was the fear that the abolition of the quarantine would facilitate this practice of driving cattle across the line that roused them against the abolition of the regulations. Now, let it be thoroughly understood that the quarantine regulations are not necessary to the ranges of our country. I believe that these ranges can be protected by other means than by keeping up a quarantine, if the quarantine is not otherwise necessary. This is not a question necessarily belonging to the quarantine, and is not necessarily affected by the removing of the quarantine; it is a question that stands by itself. But I would like it to be understood that it is an important question in that country it is one of first-class importance, and demands the attention of the Government so that the ranges of our country may be properly protected. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) said he thought there was no danger of this occurring as long as the customs duty remained, because cattle coming across the line would have to pay duty to the Canadian Government, and then, after being fed and when taken across again to the other side, they would have to pay duty to the United States Government. Well, Sir, I have been informed on good authority by ranchers that arrangements have been made with the United States authorities whereby cattle which are allowed to come across to our side of the line for pasture did not pay duty when they are taken back again. If such an arrangement has not yet been made, and if the ranchmen of Montana can benefit by such an arrangement as that, we can easily suppose that the United States Government and the United States officials will be sufficiently patriotic to help out their stockmen in that way. So it is our business to make such regulations in our own interests as will protect our own ranchmen.

There is another class of stock that I think is worthy of more consideration in regard to quarantine regulations than perhaps it has received, and that is horses. I should like to point out to the House that there has been a very considerable importation of horses with glanders into the North-west. Our farmers and ranchmen have lost severely by the importation of diseased horses, and while there has never been any quarantine applied to them in the past any more than there is now. I think it is desirable that efficient quarantine measures should be passed in regard to the importation of horses coming in from the United States. I urge this the more for this reason, that there is in the ranching country of their west a superabundance of cheap horses. The ranges are eaten down by horses having little or no commercial value. In some quarters it is stated publicly, and it is a fact, that horses are absolutely shot simply to get rid of them, so that the grass they would otherwise eat may be eaten by cattle that have commercial value, which horses have not. That condition of affairs prevails not very far south of the boundary line; so if there is a natural tendency on the part of Montana ranchers to allow their cattle to drift north of the line, there is a still greater tendency on the part of those ranchers to allow this cheap class of horses to drift north of the line. The customs duty offers very little hindrance, because it is an ad valorem one, and if the horse is only worth a dollar in Montana, the amount of duty cannot be sufficient to keep the animal on the other side of the line. So it is more necessary when there is, and it is going on now, a practically unlimited drift or importation of cheap horses from the United States to Canada, and inasmuch as they are of little value, and as they are likely to be contaminated with disease, a regulation should be framed to protect our ranchmen and farmers from the importation of these cheap horses. To sum up, I ask, without prejudice either for or against the Government, that the quarantine regulations in regard to sheep be made sufficiently stringent to protect our flocks against scab, and that the regulations in regard to horses be framed so that it will afford protection against the disease called glanders. In reference to cattle, I repeat, that so far as Alberta is concerned, the cattle in that country have not suffered by the abolition of quarantine, but if it has had any effect it has been a good effect, and the cattle industry to-day there is more profitable as to prices than it has been during the past two or three years.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say a few words in reply, or rather not in reply because the weight of argument on both sides of the House has been for the contention that I ventured to place before the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has brought to bear the powerful aid of his authority, and representing as he does the greatest ranching constituency in the North-west, he can speak with more than common authority, and with the qualification that he does not wish to be understood to say anything against the Government, he has supported entirely the contention I ventured to place very modestly before the House in regard to sheep, and has made a very strong plea to the Government to protect the country from that dire and dreadful disease of glanders in horses. Having my hon. friend's support in regard to sheep, and having the support of other hon. gentleman who could also speak with some authority, let me say a word in regard to the one point on which there seems to be a difference of opinion between my hon. friend and myself, and that is with regard to cattle. My hon. friend says there is no danger of the cattle interest being injured by these quarantine regulations because the price of cattle is better in Macleod than it has been for some time. I would remind my hon. friend that the price of cattle always goes up in the spring; and the fact that the market of British Columbia is as good as it was before the quarantine regulations, which are only a month old, went into operation, is really no argument against the fears which I have endeavoured to express on the part of ranchmen south of Regina, that is to say south rather of Moose Jaw, at Willow Bunch, Wood Mountain and south of Maple Creek and of Medicine Hat. Their fears, are that our ranges will be invaded; but my hon. friend says that they may be protected by other means than quarantine. If the Government come forward with another method to protect our ranges, that will meet the wishes and desires of my constituents and of myself personally. I cannot help reading to the House a few words which came with authority from my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), but in another character from that of member of Parliament; and at the same time it is only just to say that these words were written on 25th January, before these regulations came into existence. I am not going to say that there is any inconsistency between what he said to-night and what is written here by him, but the principle laid down as to how we in the west should regard our stock interest so entirely meets my approval that I call the attention of the House to it. His opinion is thus stated:

The Winnipeg "Commercial" is at a loss to discover the reasons for the opposition raised by some to the removal or modification of the quarantine regulation. To put the matter in another way, this leading commercial paper, representing the interests of Western Canada, does not know any reason why the quarantine regulations which have been, at least nominally, in force for a number of years without protest from any one in the west, were framed. Possibly there was no reason for them. At any rate, they existed and were approved by those interested. This being the case, it should need more than the word of Dr. McEachren that they were not wanted by the western stockmen, to cause their removal. There should be a reason shown for their removal before reasons against it are called for, and before removal takes place. It may be that the stockmen want these restrictions retained for their mere selfish interest, just as the merchants, or millers, or farmers of Manitoba might want something for their special interest. And if there were no other reason, this would be good enough to warrant full consideration before action is taken.

Well now, Sir, in regard to that I have to say, that the stockmen of Assiniboia still fear that the results of these regulations will be disastrous to them.

The stockmen of Alberta and British Columbia are absolutely unanimous on this question, so far as heard from, with the solitary exception of Dr. McEachren, who, as the hired servant of the Government, anxious to hold a lucrative job, is not unprejudiced evidence. It is possible that the stockmen of the west may want something that they cannot or should not have. But, at any rate, their interest is of sufficient importance from a national standpoint to warrant their being consulted in the matter; and if their interests cannot be conserved directly, some alleviating or compensating arrangement might be made. For the information of the "Commercial," and of the Government as well, the "Bulletin" begs to remark that this is the way to make the country prosperous, and also to win western elections.

I quite agree with that sentiment. I think that the way to make a country prosperous is to legislate or to order in council in such a way as will be in the interest of the great staples of the North-west. And the writer adds:

Something that the Liberal party has only begun to make a record in.

That is to say, legislating in a way to make the country prosperous, and also to win

western elections is something the Liberal party has only begun to make a record in. Well, Sir, it is quite clear that I have shown in this debate an impartiality that even transcends that of my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver). He commenced by saying that he spoke without any party proclivity—and we know he has none—and that there would be nothing of a political character in what he might say, and he carefully guarded himself lest what fell from him should condemn the Government. Here am I, an open foe, and I advocate the very course the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) says is the way to make the country prosperous, and to make a record for the Liberal Government in the manner in which they have only recently begun. Let it come in whatever form it may, I welcome the powerful aid of my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), and after the discussion we have had, I have to express my regret that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture is not here. I have no doubt there is a good reason for his absence, and I suppose he will read what has been said in "Hansard" and take heed of it. It is clear that a case has been made out for the Government to consider the question as regards sheep. We have the positive statement of the hon. member (Mr. Oliver), that in regard to sheep and horses quarantine was necessary; although he thought that in regard to cattle it was unnecessary. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) pointed out, that the quarantine regulations for protecting the country against diseased sheep coming across the line, were not sufficient. As the hon. gentleman has shown, in the United States, and probably in other countries where large interests are involved, nothing is easier than to get a certificate of the kind now required. The point I wish to make most strongly in regard to cattle is this: that an effective check on the inroad of cattle to our ranches has been removed, and unless the Government intends to give us some substitute for that check, the result will be that our sheepmen and stockmen will suffer, and their ranches will suffer because of the attraction that these ranches have for the cattle south of the line.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, as I come from a constituency in the North-west Territories, it is not perhaps out of place that I should say a few words upon this important question. One would think, after listening to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that he was the only representative in this House from the North-west Territories. He has told us of the number of letters he has received in connection with this matter from one end of the Territories to the other, but I must say, that although I represent a large district in the Territories, I have not received one letter on this subject. The people in my district are perfectly satisfied with the quarantine regulations as they are to-day, because they have discovered that they can now get more for their stockers than they could before, and it is perhaps unnecessary to say that we raise a great number of that class of cattle in the district of Saskatchewan. Although my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has stated that the people of Manitoba have become alarmed at the change of regulations? I know as a matter of fact, they are not. A few weeks ago a number of buyers came from the United States and purchased stockers in the province of Manitoba, and paid $2 per head more for them than they could have got before the new quarantine arrangement was made. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has spoken a great deal about sheep. Well, Sir, it appears to me that he is raising a tempest in a teapot, because all the sheep brought from the United States into the Territories since the change in regulations numbered only about 1,000. If there is a qualified man to examine these sheep when they enter our Dominion of Canada, I do not think there would be any danger at all.

There is another phase, Sir, of this question which has not been referred to by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. The late Government spent a great deal of money in sending immigration agents through Dakota and the western states to try to get emigrants to settle in the Territories. When these intending settlers came to the line they were met, under the old quarantine system, with a delay of ninety days. It is quite clear that a poor man on coming into Canada with a few cattle in the spring of the year, could not afford to stay at the line for ninety days. I believe that if a qualified man gave a certificate that the cattle were all right, they should be allowed to proceed with them and take up these lands. I know personally that the previous quarantine system stopped a great many from settling in the North-west Territories. I have had letters from different parts of the United States, from people who stated that they would have settled in Canada had it not been for the quarantine regulations. I am of opinion, Sir, that there is nothing in the complaint of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) about the ranchers of the United States bringing their cattle to Canada to feed them upon our pastures. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the Americans in bringing in their cattle would be met with a 20 per cent duty at the line, and if they pastured their cattle on our ranches all summer they would have to pay a duty to the American authorities in the fall on their return. Now, if the police force do their duty it would be impossible that the Americans should get their cattle across the line in any other way than by paying the duty, for the police are supposed to patrol the border and prevent them doing so. One hon. gentleman stated that horses were brought in now at a valuation of $1 per head. Now, Sir, in all my experience in the North-west Territories I never knew of horses being valued at that figure. I know that they value them for far more than that, and that the parties who bring them across the line have to pay duty on a high valuation; in fact on as much as the horse is worth. So far as glanders are concerned, if the horses are examined at the line by a properly qualified veterinarian, I do not think there would be any difficulty in that respect. As I said before, the people in my district are perfectly satisfied with the existing regulations. They have raised the price of our cattle, and they have given us competition in freight rates, allowing us to ship by Boston, if they have not lowered them. Therefore, we feel that we are in a better position than before. If the question came to a vote I would certainly vote in favour of retaining the regulations as they now are.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). This has been a very interesting discussion on a very important subject; but my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), the mover of this resolution, will agree with me, I am sure, that the discussion would not be complete unless the Minister of Agriculture had an opportunity of taking part in it. He is unavoidably absent this evening, and therefore, I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LARIVIERE moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, Reports to Council, petitions, memorials or other documents relating to the Manitoba school question, not already submitted to this House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when on the 29th of March last I requested the hon. the Premier to lay before the House the papers that I am going to move for, in order that they might be made use of during the debate that was then going on, I received the promise from him that those papers would be brought down without the necessity of a motion; but, as none of the papers have been yet brought down, I have to move this evening for the production before this House. I regret, Sir, to find that there is a certain amount of hesitation on the part of the Government to put this House in full possession of all the necessary information that is required in order to look into this question of the schools of Manitoba. I myself made an inquiry of the Government the other day as to what were the propositions that had been made to the Government of Manitoba and the concessions that had been asked for, and which of these, if any, had not been granted; and the only answer I could obtain from the hon. the Premier was that the negotiations had been verbal, and that there was no record of them, and that the papers connected with that subject would be brought down. Well, Sir, I am surprised that in dealing with such an important question the Government did not keep any record of the transactions that took place—that, on a question of such vital importance, the negotiations were merely and chiefly verbal. It must be that the Government did not wish to commit themselves or to make known what their attitude was in the premises, when no record was kept of what had taken place. Surely somebody was appointed to negotiate with the Manitoba Government; that somebody must have had instructions; that somebody must have had negotiations, and those negotiations must have been recorded in some way or other. A report must have been made to His Excellency the Governor General in Council of what had taken place, and that report should have been the basis of the acceptance or non-acceptance of whatever settlement was arrived at. But we are told that everything was verbal, that there was no record, and that there is nothing to be communicated to the House. To-day, Sir, we had another instance of the hesitation of the Government to put this House in possession of all the facts in connection with the school question, when, in answer to a question of an hon. member, the hon. the Premier stated that the policy of the Government was well known on that subject, and that it was not necessary to say anything further about it. Well, Sir, I must say once more that I am altogether surprised at the manner in which this matter has been conducted, and more so at the manner in which the Government is treating this House in keeping back all the information which the Government should possess and which the members of this House are entitled to receive. Much more is this the case when we have had from one member of the Government this advice thrown at the minority of Manitoba. When speaking on this very question on another occasion, the hon. Solicitor General said:

Now, I think, so far as the Roman Catholic minority—

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must not quote from a previous debate.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I did not say that I was quoting from a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I leave it to the hon. gentleman's honour whether or not he is quoting from a previous debate; but if it is a previous debate, he cannot refer to it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Well, if the Government is afraid that I should refer to a former occasion—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I cannot allow the hon. member to question the ruling of the Chair on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member will regret having said that my ruling is influenced by a question of whether the Government is afraid or is not afraid.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say anything of the kind.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I heard "Order" from the Government benches, Mr. Speaker, and it was to that I referred. I made no reflection at all upon your ruling. Well, Sir, if we are told to-day that the Manitoba school question is not finally settled, that we have only received an instalment, how can we know whether or not the Government has made due efforts to secure the best possible settlement. Well, Sir, I shall not dilate further on this subject, because I am forbidden by the rules of the House to refer to a previous debate, and as this is not the last occasion upon which we may have the pleasure of discussing this subject, I shall reserve any further remarks until the question comes up again.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There is no objection whatever to this motion being carried and the papers brought down. Quite the reverse. The Government is just as solicitous as my hon. friend that all the light possible shall be thrown on this subject. We did not wait until this motion carried to have these papers prepared. They are being prepared at this moment, and will be laid on the Table at an early day.

Motion agreed to.

DUTY ON REFINED PETROLEUM.

Mr. MOORE moved:

That in the opinion of this House it is in the best interests of the farming and labouring classes, and the country generally, that the duty on refined petroleum for illuminating purposes be reduced to three cents per Imperial gallon.

He said: In rising to press the motion which I lay before you, Mr. Speaker, I realize that the sentiments to which I am about to give expression will be met by objections from hon. gentlemen on both sides. Notwithstanding this, I cannot refrain from doing what I deem to be my duty to my constituents and a large majority of the people of this country. In the first place, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not make this motion with the view of perplexing or in any way embarrassing the Government or any members of this House, or of doing injury to any of the important industries of this country, especially that industry which claims that its existence depends on the maintenance of the present high tariff. I make this motion solely and purely for the purpose of discharging a duty which I owe my constituents and the public, and which I owe to the labourers, the farmers, and the poorer classes of the people. I am well aware that this question is viewed from different standpoints of interest with regard to the rate of duty which should be imposed. The farmers and the labouring men, who form the larger part of our population, claim that, in justice to them, the duty should be entirely removed. On the other hand, the producers and the refiners of coal oil in this country desire that the tariff should remain as it is, on the ground that if the duty were reduced in any particular, such reduction would wipe their industry out of existence.

A just and proper appreciation of this motion involves a consideration of three important points. In the first place, to give the farmers and labourers and the poorer classes good oil at a cheap price; in the second place, to give the purchaser and refiner reasonable protection; and in the third place, to give the Government a fair and reasonable revenue. In discussing the demands and claims of the first named class, the farmers and labourers, for free oil, for which they have been asking for many years, I believe I give expression to the sentiments of hon. gentlemen on both sides when I claim that there is not a class of people more deserving of encouragement and sympathy than the toiling, industrious tillers of Canadian soil. Surely a class of people which composes half the population of this country, which furnishes 25 per cent of the traffic upon our railways, which furnishes $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent of the trade upon our canals, and one-half the tonnage of Canadian-built ships—surely this class cannot have a subordinate place in the affections of the Canadian people or in the considerations of a wise Government. It should be the desire of hon. members of this House to give cheap and good oil to our consumers. It may be inferred from this expression that we are not getting from the Canadian producer good coal oil at a cheap price at present. Regarding that, with all due respect to the enterprising men who are interested in this important industry, and with due deference to the statements we have seen in the newspapers and the claims these gentlemen are making, throughout the length and breadth of Canada, that the coal oil produced in Canada is equal to and, in some respects, superior to the American article. I beg to say that I have had something to do for thirty years in American and Canadian coal oil, and I have yet to see a gallon of Canadian oil equal in quality to the American. It blacks the chimneys, it blacks the ceiling, it emits a very offensive odour, and whilst our Canadian producers claim that it lasts longer, I claim that if their oil will give the same candle power, the same brilliancy as American oil, it will be consumed as rapidly. I can put this matter in no stronger light than by quoting a remark made with respect to the quality of Canadian oil by the hon. member for the county of Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) some years ago. He said that the Canadian oil was not as good as the American, and any one who had used the American would not use the Canadian article. And what was true at that time, I claim, is mainly true to-day. I hold in my hand a letter bearing date of 7th inst., from a large coal oil dealer along the frontier between the United States and Canada in which he states that he cannot sell Canadian oil because its quality is so poor. I hold that if crude oil, produced in Canada is as good as the American article, then, certainly, we ought to get as good a refined article, and, if we do not get it, the refiners of this country are not entitled to the high protection which they have had. If the crude oil is imperfect, if it has qualities that cannot be eliminated and that prevent it being made into a good refined oil, then the industry does not deserve the encouragement and protection which it has had ever since the discovery of oil in this country.

In the next place, I will consider for a moment the price of Canadian as compared with the price of American oil. The consumers in this country claim that no satisfactory reason has been given why there should exist such a difference in the prices on this side and on the other. On investigation it will be found that the Canadians are paying full duty on what is imported from the United States as well as an equal sum on all the oil consumed and produced in Canada, making our light cost our consumers six cents per gallon more than it costs the consumers in the United States, whether they use Canadian or American oil. If it costs us very much more to produce our oil, that might be a reason for asking a higher price. I see by reports made by experts that the contract price for sinking wells in Canada at a distance of 400 or 500 feet, is only $110 on the average. That is the statement made by a mining engineer representing gentlemen who are very much more interested in retaining the present duty upon coal oil. And, if you take the statements of the United States expenditure in connection with the sinking of oil wells, you will find that up to 1885 it cost an average of $4,000 to sink each well. The wholesale price of oil on the American side is 8 16-100 cents per gallon. The Canadian article costs 15 cents per gallon. Therefore it is quite evident that our consumers are giving to the producers and refiners the full benefit of the duty of six cents per gallon. This duty represents as high an ad valorem rate upon American oil at its present price as a duty of 15 cents per gallon in 1877 on the price at that time. The argument used by the hon. member for Stanstead in 1877, and fully endorsed by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was that, in consequence of the great burdens upon the people of this country, there was a necessity for reducing the duty upon coal oil from 15 cents, and this was accordingly done, being reduced to six cents. And, Sir, the duty which has since been collected of six cents per gallon has been as great or greater a percentage on the market value of the oil than the duty of 15 cents was in 1877. I beg to submit the following figures for consideration. In 1877 there was imported under a tariff of 15 cents per gallon 348,635 gallons of oil, valued at $105,888, upon which was collected $57,328.44 or 54.3 per cent ad valorem. In 1896, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the quantity of oil imported was 6,682,272 gallons, valued at $596,450, upon which was paid six cents per gallon, or a total of $412,996, which was 69.33 per cent ad valorem. Again, taking the export price of oil as given in the United States abstract of 1896, I find it to be 6.8 cents per wine gallon. Reducing this to Imperial, we find that the price for Imperial gallon is 8.16 cents. A duty of six cents upon this would be 73½ per cent ad valorem as against 54.3 per cent when the duty was 15 cents. I will now undertake to show hon. members of this House what duty on coal oil has cost the consumers since coal oil was discovered in Canada. We find that there has been consumed in Canada from 1877 to 1885, both years included 232,756,786 gallons of refined petroleum. Of this amount 155,489,641 gallons was produced in Canada, and 77,267,145 gallons imported from the United States. The Canadian Government have received upon the imported, reckoning a uniform rate of six cents per gallon, since 1877, $4,636,028. And the oil cost the consumers in Canada during that time $13,965,407.16 more than it would had there been no duty upon it, and that amount more than the same quantity cost the consumers in the United States. And, tracing it back to the time when oil was first produced in Canada it has undoubtedly cost the consumers to keep this industry in existence no less than $22,000,000—an amount equal to what the oil men claim has been invested in this important industry. It is claimed by the classes to whom I have referred that there is no good reason why coal oil should receive more protection than other necessaries of life of equal importance. Light is a very important household necessity; light is the poor man's friend; it cheers his heart when his daily toil is over to reach his well-lighted home where he can rest in the bosom of his family, and read during the long winter evenings. That is the only time he has to devote to study to reading and to learning. Therefore, it greatly contributes to the intelligence, the welfare and happiness of that class of our people. Now, it is claimed on behalf of this portion of our population that the Government should endeavour to give them a good and a cheap light, which they are not receiving at the present time. They also draw our attention to the fact that the people in towns and cities and populous centres have, to a great extent, discarded the coal oil lamp, and are now using gas and electricity; so that most of the coal oil now used and likely to be used in the future, will be used by farmers, labouring men and the poorer classes of this country, upon whom the burden of taxation will fall most heavily. This, Sir, is all I have to say in regard to the claim of the consumer upon this Government in respect of the reduction of the duty. In the second place, I will consider for a few moments the claims of the producers and the refiners. Their business is considered an important one, and I believe, Sir, that they have had an unreasonable and unnecessary protection. But the protection which has been accorded in the past has stimulated capitalists to invest their means to a large extent in the business. It has been in existence something over thirty years; and it is claimed that the withdrawal of any portion of the tariff would destroy their industry altogether, that is giving employment to a large number of workingmen, and if wiped out of existence, it would shut up many other works which depend upon the production of crude oil, such as barrel manufactures, the manufacture of gasoline, benzine, naphtha lubricating oil, paraffine wax, paraffine candles, chewing gum, colouring materials and other very useful articles in connection with this industry. But this motion which I present to the House has nothing whatever to do with the production of crude oil or any of its products, but only with that used for illuminating purposes. Therefore, it would not be considered just nor in the interests of the country to take away all protection of an industry which has grown up under the fostering care of both Governments. I may be excused for saying here that in 1876 the coal oil men claimed that any reduction in the duty from 15 cents per gallon would wipe the industry out of existence. In 1877 the duty was reduced from 15 to 6 cents per gallon, since which time the production has steadily increased from 12,813,566 gallons in 1881, to 26,760,247 gallons in 1895. As these gentlemen were false prophets in 1876 and 1877, we may fondly hope that they may be mistaken in 1897, should the Government take into consideration and reduce the duty upon this article in the terms which I have proposed in my motion. In the third place, the pressing demand upon the treasury to pay current expenditures, to say nothing of the extraordinary requests for assistance to build public works of various kinds, may not admit of a great and material reduction in the aggregate of the duties which are imposed upon imported articles, but they may be so adjusted as to bear more lightly upon the poorer classes. So far as this article is concerned, I have no doubt that the patriotic tillers of the soil will loyally yield to any reasonable tariff which the Government may impose. But the present rate is considered by them unreasonable and exorbitant, and falls with too great a force upon the poor people who are the least able to bear it. In 1877 the hon. Minister of Finance stated that about 800,000 gallons of oil were imported into this country, paying duty, and that probably double that quantity had been imported without paying duty, had been smuggled, in fact. But by reducing the tariff from 15 to 6 cents, he believed the entire amount thus smuggled would be brought in paying duty. I am sure that those anticipations have not been realized, for the reduction in the price of oil has been so great that the inducement still continues, and this contraband trade is still being continued along the frontiers of Canada. Should the duty be reduced to 3 cents, smuggling would no doubt cease. Now, Sir, I find that in 1887 the Minister of Finance reduced the duty from 15 to 6 cents per gallon, making a reduction of 9 cents per gallon. From a statement found in the Trade and Navigation Returns, it appears that there were 570,128 gallons imported in that year; 9 cents per gallon on that quantity amounted to $51,312.25, which the Government would lose. The Minister of Finance said in the House, on February 20, 1877 :

The Government, therefore, have carefully considered this whole question, with a desire to reduce the burdens of the people as much as they could, and yet not utterly wipe out of existence a Canadian industry which had grown up under the protection of the law enacted by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The conclusion I have come to is this : We propose to abolish the excise duty altogether, and reduce the duty on imported petroleum from 15 to 6 cents per gallon. And by this operation we believe the people of Canada will be the gainers by full 9 cents per gallon on every gallon of the 8,000,000 gallons now consumed. * * *

So, therefore, as we are giving the country the benefit of a reduction varying from $750,000 to $1,200,000, we think we may fairly ask the country to recoup us by paying an additional duty of 2 cents a pound on tea that would make us tolerably square and restore the desired equilibrium, so far as it goes.

These statistics inform us that there were imported into Canada that year, 13,482,657 pounds of tea, which, at 2 cents per pound, amounted to $269,653.14, to establish the equilibrium of the loss to the Government of $51,311. The Government apparently gained by this swapping of duties, the sum of $218,332. By this transaction, a burden of $51,318 was removed from the backs of our people, and, as compensation, another one five times as heavy was imposed. As the succeeding Government removed the duties on tea in 1882, there is a grand opportunity for the present able hon. Minister of Finance to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, and to reduce the burden which now falls so heavily upon the people in the matter of coal oil to 3 cents per gallon, which would apparently reduce the receipts in customs duty about $206,646. By adopting the plan of 1877, and placing a duty of 2 cents per pound on tea, there would be a return to the treasury of $453,351 on the 22,667,555 pounds of tea now imported, and the equilibrium between coal oil and tea restored and the Government would gain $246,705 in the trade. That I may not be open to the imputation of inconsistency in advocating a reduction of the tariff upon coal oil and, at the same time, advocating the protection of Canadian industries, I beg to say that I most certainly believe in encouraging Canadian industry and giving Canadian producers the control of the Canadian market, so far as it can be done in the interests of the Canadian consumer. But I believe that there is such a thing as going too far in protection, and I believe, Sir, that the tariff which has been imposed upon coal oil by both governments, has been one of the Canadian industries which has had an obnoxious unreasonable amount of protection which has proved to be a great burden upon the people of Canada. I have been a steady advocate of the National Policy, which I believe has been of inestimable benefit to the people of Canada, and, Sir, I have faith to believe that the benefits and the advantages have been so great as to convince even the hon. members on the ministerial side of this House that the well being and the prosperity of Canada requires the continuance of that policy which has placed us in the favourable position we now occupy amongst the enterprising people of the world.

Mr. LISTER. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing whether the duty on coal oil should be reduced to 3 cents per gallon or abolished altogether. In view of the fact that the tariff is now engaging the attention of the Government, I think it is ill advised at this particular moment that particular items in the tariff should be singled out for the purpose of discussion in this House. I have no complaint to make of the tone of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House; his speech was very interesting, and if the facts stated by him were really facts there would be a good deal in the argument he made. The hon. gentleman told the House that he is in favour of protecting the industries of this country, and he was good enough to say in addition, that if he thought the proposition which he makes here tonight would have the effect of destroying a natural industry here, he would not be prepared to go so far as he proposes in his present motion. So that when the matter comes to be discussed at the proper time, and the action of the Government is announced to this House, the hon. gentleman will then be in a position to form a more correct opinion as to what this industry can stand and what it cannot stand than he is capable of estimating at the present moment. I may say to the hon. gentleman,

I having some knowledge of the question about which he speaks, that the facts have evidently been furnished by some person outside, by some person not at all acquainted with the industry. It is somewhat surprising to me that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, who was elected to this House as a supporter of a high protective system, coal oil being among other articles protected by the tariff, should be found seeking to break down the tariff that his friends during eighteen long years have stood by and supported. The conclusion to be drawn from that is only one, and it is that the hon. gentleman living on the boundary down in the province of Quebec, an imaginary line dividing his county from the United States, is a protectionist in the day time, and a free trader at night.

Mr. MOORE. Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman. I never smuggled a gallon of oil in my life.

Mr. LISTER. Then the hon. gentleman has been deprived of light; he does not come within the category so pathetically described by him, that light is the poor man's friend; he does not belong to that class. I said a moment ago that this is not the proper time to discuss this question. The Government have to-day announced that the tariff would be brought down a week from to-morrow. When it comes down we will know what the Government propose to do, whether they will meet the views of the hon. gentleman or not. If they meet his views, then this motion is entirely unnecessary. If the explanations that may then be made are sufficient to satisfy him that the industry will be completely wiped out by a reduction of the duty to 3 cents per gallon, the hon. gentleman, who is a protectionist, who has announced himself to be desirous of promoting any natural industry, will no doubt be found supporting the Government even in case the duty should not be reduced to the extent that he to-night wishes it to be reduced. The hon. gentleman's figures, and they are many and complex, are not strictly accurate, and I may say to him moreover that although the present tax appears to be a considerable tax, it is not the burdensome tax the hon. gentleman imagines it to be. There are about 15,000,000 gallons of refined oil consumed, which would give for each family about 15 gallons. Statistics show that cities, towns and villages burn much more proportionately than the country portions of Canada, and the result is this that less than 15 gallons per family is consumed in the country districts. Taking the duty at 6 cents per gallon and the consumption at 12 gallons per family, the total tax, this over burdensome tax, would only reach 72 cents per year. However, that is a matter for discussion, and no doubt it will be brought before the House when the tariff comes down and be discussed by competent men. In the meantime I do not see any particular necessity at this particular moment, and in view of the early date at which the tariff is to be brought down, why we should further discuss this question. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. QUINN moved for :

Copy of letter addressed by Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick to Hon. Edward Blake asking for his opinion as to the settlement of the Manitoba school question under the judgment of the Privy Council.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There is no such record in the archives of the department, I may inform my hon. friend.

Motion negatived.

POSTMASTER AT BEAUHARNOIS.

Mr. BERGERON moved for :

Copies of all papers, correspondence, petitions, &c., connected with the dismissal of Alexis Doutré as postmaster at Beauharnois.

He said: The hon. the Postmaster General stated the other day, in reply to a question of mine, that the postmaster at Beauharnois had been dismissed at the demand of the Minister of Public Works, and that the complaint was that the postmaster kept a political committee in his office. My object in making the motion is to have all the papers in regard to the dismissal of Mr. Doutré. I wish to tell the Postmaster General, that as I understand it, when the postmaster was dismissed he asked for what reason he had been so dismissed. On being informed that it was for active and offensive partisanship, he asked for an investigation, as he believed he was in a position to refute the charge. The investigation was refused, and he then asked to know who the complainant against him was, but he was answered that he would not be told. We were told the other day, however, that the complainant was the Minister of Public Works. When the correspondence comes down, I believe that it will show, that there should have been an investigation, and that if the Postmaster General had acted justly towards Mr. Doutré he would have allowed an inquiry. I trust the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) will bring down all the papers as soon as possible, and it will be my duty then to call the attention of the House to the matter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Mr. Speaker, there is no objection whatever to the order passing. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) no doubt made his statement on the information he had received, but I think he will find when the papers are brought down he has made a mistake. If there had been an investigation it would simply have resulted in a waste of public money, because I have in my desk the letter on which the dismissal took place, and I am perfectly satisfied that the statements in that letter are incontrovertible. However, the facts will be open to discussion when the papers are brought down.

Motion agreed to.

EAST AND WEST ELGIN MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. INGRAM moved for :

Return showing all mail contracts that were cancelled and all that expired in East and West Elgin since 15th July, 1896 ; also all correspondence, reports, tenders received and contracts entered into for carrying the mail since 15th July, 1896, giving names and amounts.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection to the motion, but as regards that portion of it which asks for the production of tenders, my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) will see, that should these tenders refer to any contracts which are not yet completed, I would be obliged to withhold that information until the contracts are completed. It is not customary to give the tenders pending the completion of the contract. It may be that none of the papers asked for refer to contracts in that uncompleted stage.

Mr. INGRAM. All I ask is for the tenders up to date.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will give all the tenders that have been carried into contract. I have no objection to the order going, but I would have to defer producing the tenders in the other cases until the contract is completed.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Detailed statement of the several amounts expended on Port Stanley Harbour since 15th July, 1896, including pay-sheet ; also all reports and correspondence in connection with the harbour and its improvements since 15th July, 1896, up to the present date.—(Mr. Ingram.)

Return showing the number of fishing licenses granted to fish in Lake Erie, opposite East and West Elgin, and their location; whether pound-net, gill-net or seine licenses, and to whom granted during the years 1895 and 1896. Also the names of all applicants for licenses for the year 1897, giving the names of those applicants who were granted licenses and the amount paid by each of them. Also, all telegrams, letters, reports and correspondence of every description in any wise relating to the granting or refusal of such licenses.—(Mr. Ingram.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE—THE CANADIAN MILITIA.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a matter which is interesting us all, and probably the best way for me to bring it to the notice of the House is to move the adjournment. The Queen's Diamond Jubilee is an event which now occupies the attention of the loyal people of Canada, and more especially our active militia who are the backbone of the country, Although our militia may not, in this House, meet with that consideration which they are entitled to, and although their services have not been called on of late, yet we must look back on their past history, from the war of 1812 to the North-west rebellion of 1885, and consider what valiant services they have rendered to this colony. On the occasion of Her Majesty's Jubilee our militia, as loyal British subjects, as descendants of men who have fought for the Crown in the past, and as men who, at the present day are ready to fight for the Crown again if ever unfortunately they should be called upon to do so again, they desire to have some idea as to what action will be taken in regard to their services in England in regard to the jubilee. I may call attention to the fact, that already five of the colonies have voted money to send their military representatives to England, and even the little island of Jamaica, with a very small population, has given 9,500 pounds sterling to send over a force. I regret very much that my friend the hon. Minister of Militia has suffered so much in the recent railway accident that he is unable to be present. I feel that whatever I have to say, I must say it in the most delicate way, because I would be far from wanting to offend that hon. gentleman, or to lead him to think that I would be trenching on his duties or responsibilities. I wish to guard myself in every way from creating the impression that I am finding any fault with his administration, or that I wish to take away from him the credit of what I am sure he would do if he were present. I have no doubt at all that Sir Richard Cartwright, his representative for the time being, as a loyal British subject, and as one proud of his distinguished history, will do everything that can be done in the interests of the country in connection with this matter. In a certain sense, I speak on the floor of this House for the militiamen of the country, and I see other officers opposite who have also an interest in the militia and who have done good service. I say that we do not want to be behind the other colonies, and that we should not ask our militia force to go over on the strength of public subscriptions.

The people of Canada expect hereafter to rival the other nations of the world, and we do not want it to be supposed that in this country we have to go around, hat in hand, to collect money to send a body of troops over. I do not think the Government should be extravagant; the people of Canada do not wish their money to be thrown away; and the militia do not wish to embarrass the Government. All they want is that Canada should be properly represented. For my own part, I think we should send over a small column, in which would be represented all the corps of the country. I have no desire myself to go to England or to parade myself before Europe. I am not coveting or seeking any honour or position.

Mr. DOMVILLE.

I simply wish to see that we as a young nation, with 40,000 men under arms, shall be represented by such a body of men that when they march in the parade the people will say, "There goes Canada, a country that is now producing gold in British Columbia, silver in the Slocan and gold in the Yukon." I have no desire to take up the time of the House, and I would ask the acting Minister of Militia to pardon me for bringing this matter up in this way, and to kindly foreshadow something of what is going to be done in this matter. I believe I voice the sentiment of the militia and the people of Canada when I say that Canada is able to send over a small force and to do it properly.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has made a speech without concluding with a motion.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Lemieux, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Speaker, as a sequel to what has been said by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), I would like to read, for the information of the acting Minister of Militia, the following letter:

Dear Sir,—You know that we are making great preparations for the Jubilee celebration in Montreal. We wish to organize excursions from all parts of Canada and the United States. The railways are ready, but are waiting for the proclamation of the Federal Government fixing the day of the celebration, which is to be the same here as in England, June the 22nd, in order to announce the reduction in fares and the dates of the excursions. Please, therefore, urge the Government to fix the day and to issue its proclamation. We are stopped in our work, in the meantime, though there is not an instant to be lost to complete our organization.

This letter is sent by the president of the Jubilee committee in Montreal.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, I think every hon. member of the House will be glad that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) has brought this matter up, and I think it is right that a word should be said on this side of the House; for to my mind, this is a question that politics should not at all interfere with, but a question of the honour of Canada, in which both Conservatives and Liberals should take an interest. I think Canada has to-day the best chance she has ever had since confederation of making a name for herself in the old country. If a good regiment of Canadian militia, that would be representative of this country, were sent home on this occasion, it would do more to advertise Canada than any amount of money spent on agents. The regiment would be seen by millions of people, not only from Great Britain, but from all the other colonies; and I think that any gentleman who knows the Canadian militia, and has seen them in training, must admit that there are no finer troops to be seen anywhere in the world. Perhaps that remark, coming from a militiaman, may sound a little big, but I believe what I say. I do not believe in the scheme that is on foot to let men go who will pay their own expenses. If a regiment goes over, I think the country can very well afford to pay its expenses; and this is the only way to get the best selection of men. If the Government can see their way to put a decent sum in the Estimates in order to meet the expenses of sending over a regiment, say of 500 men, I cannot think that the taxpayers of this country would object. Every province should be represented, and that can only be done, to my mind, by the Government paying the expense. I do think that the Government should send some of the permanent corps and some of the Northwest Mounted Police, but these should not be sent unless some of the active militia are also despatched. I know that militia matters, as a rule, do not catch the attention of the House, but this Jubilee celebration is a matter of great importance, and I feel that we are only doing our duty on both sides in bringing it forward. If the Government can see fit to promulgate some scheme whereby every province and regiment—the best men, both non-coms and men, in each regiment—are got together and formed into a good battalion, it would be to the credit of the country, and the taxpayers would consider the money well spent.

Mr. HUGHES. Before the motion of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) is put, I desire to express my appreciation of the spirit which prompts it. There are various aspects from which to regard it, one of which is the sending of a regiment home to the old country. As I understand, the Imperial Government have invited Canada to take part in the celebration by sending over a certain number of troops—I do not know whether the number is specified or not—to take part in the celebration. If that be so, it is altogether likely that all that Canada will be called upon to do in connection with this force, will be to see that it is properly equipped, officered and drilled, and the best men chosen. It is altogether probable that the number of these men will be limited, not to exceed possibly a couple of hundred. However, there is another project on foot which should receive the endorsement of this House. A number of Canadian militiamen who have command of capital, are anxious to equip a regiment at their own expense, to cross over and take part in the celebration. I think the Government would be only doing its duty if it were to supply the transport of such a regiment, and the two contingents might unite and form one force on the other side. However, that is a mere matter of detail, and I merely suggest these ideas in order to assist the Government in coming to a conclusion.

But there is another aspect to the case. While I would be delighted to see a Canadian regiment in the old country, I believe that those who take part in such an expedition will come back sadder and wiser men. They will undoubtedly have a very good time on the other side, but if they expect to dance attendance on the First Minister or to act as a bodyguard for Her Majesty, they will be greatly mistaken. They will have a few days' parade through the streets of London, which will not be a very enjoyable thing in itself, but the greater portion of their time will be spent in Aldershot or some other place outside the city, where they will be subjected to the strict discipline of barrack life. So that while I desire to offer no words of discouragement to those who wish to cross, I must say that I do not envy them.

There is still another aspect of the case which I would commend to the attention of the acting Minister of Militia (Sir Richard Cartwright). We can do as much at home to promote the loyal and patriotic spirit of our militia as we can by sending contingents abroad. Undoubtedly the contingent we would send across would impress the people assembled on the other side with a high idea of the importance of Canada, as part of the British Crown, but nevertheless we could do very good missionary work at home by seeing that proper recognition is given to the Jubilee in this Dominion. I would suggest, as the military spirit is strong in our people, that military displays to be held in different parts of the country should receive proper recognition from our Government, and no more tangible mode could be devised by which our people could show their loyalty. I would point out to the acting Minister of Militia that Jubilee Day, the 21st of June, is a day when nearly all the brigade camps are assembled for their annual drill, and I would suggest the propriety of seeing that these camps should meet at such a time as to enable them to be disbanded in time to allow the various regiments in camp the opportunity of taking part in some celebration in their own localities. I am satisfied, from what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) and others, and from what we have heard of the interest which the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) takes in this subject, that this matter will receive fair consideration from the Government, and, as far as my district is concerned, aside from politics, the Government will be heartily endorsed in anything they do to celebrate in a fitting manner Jubilee Day.

Mr. CASEY. It is from no doubt of the capacity of the Government to arrange this matter properly that I wish to say a few words, but because they may like to hear, even from their own side, a word of encouragement. I believe, with my hon. friend who has just sat down and the hon. gentleman who preceded him, that we cannot afford to be economical in connection with the celebration in the mother country of the Jubilee festival. Whatever we undertake to do, we cannot afford to do on a mean scale. Whatever we do will be looked upon as the best we are capable of doing. The younger and more enterprising colonies of Australia and elsewhere will strain a point to make a grand show on that occasion, and I hope, as no doubt will be the case, that Canada will be represented by a force which will take its proper position at the head of all the colonial forces—I had almost said of the colonial exhibition, for surely no grander exhibit could be made of what we can produce in Canada than an exhibit of picked men, and nothing would go further to give prestige to this country in London on that occasion. It must not be forgotten that the lines of streets through which the procession will pass will be a focus for all the eyes of the Empire.

My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) has well pointed out that the eyes of the people in all parts of the Empire will be centered there, while millions will be there in person, and it will be the centre of interest and news for all the world. As we shall be judged by what we send, I trust that the exhibit will be as creditable as possible. There is one suggestion I would like to press upon the acting Minister of Militia (Sir Richard Cartwright). It has been made already in debate, but I do not intend to break the rule by referring to a past debate. That suggestion is that we should send a good, strong contingent of the North-west Mounted Police as a part of our representative force sent to attend the Queen's Jubilee. That body of men, we all know, is comparatively, a select body, composed of men who are intelligent, educated, well-drilled, and well accustomed to all kinds of work which can be performed by men in their position. There will be contingents of that kind, no doubt, from the Cape Mounted Rifles, if that force is now in existence—I know that there used to be a celebrated force of that name—and also from Australia. The impression upon the mind of the home-keeping Englishman will be great, if he sees a fine body of men splendidly equipped and mounted and is told that these are not regular soldiers, not even volunteers, but the constabulary of our frontier, to guard the homes of settlers from all the perils that the home-keeping imagination may invest that country with. This suggestion does not originate with me, but was made to me by a friend. It struck me, however, as being a highly proper one. I believe there could be no better adjunct to our contingent than a comparatively strong force of the North-west Mounted Police. My hon. friend from Victoria has suggested the idea of a purely volunteer contingent going along with that other part of the contingent which would go partly at the public expense. I am rather inclined to fear that that might arouse some jealousies between the two branches of the force. That is a matter, of course, for the military authorities to consider.

Mr. SPROULE. Speaking from the standpoint not of a military man but of an ordinary citizen, I concur in what was said by my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Donville) and reiterated by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) that it is time we had some answer from the Government giving an outline of the course they propose to take with reference to the invitation given us to send a military force to take part in the celebration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee in England. The country is very much interested in this question and is looking to the Government for information as to what they propose to do. And, as the Government is the centre of power and information here, it is from that source above all others, that that information would come with the best grace. While saying that, I fully concur in what was said by the hon. member from Victoria that it would be unfortunate if we allowed the force that went to England to be the result of free choice, their expenses paid by free contributions. I think that the expense should be defrayed by the state. And I would have a representative body of men sent over there. Otherwise, no doubt, men of wealth and influence who, perhaps, would like to have a good advertisement before the world, would get up a force at their own expense which, in all human probability, would not be truly representative of the Canadian militia, but would be made up mainly of the class to which they belong rather than of the average class of the country. I think that the country ought to be represented in its average capacity. We ought to send the class of men that go to make up our military force, and the expense of sending them ought to be defrayed by the state. I do not believe that any citizen of Canada would refuse to pay his portion of that expense, but I feel confident that all would willingly pay their share of what may be necessary in order to make a good showing. With regard to sending a detachment of the North-west Mounted Police, I believe that to be a very good idea. That vast country belonging to us is but little known in England. To send a contingent of the North-west Mounted Police would be a good advertisement of that country in England, and it would be an evidence of the security of life and property in the wilds of that vast country to those who might contemplate going there. We should endeavour to make the best possible display. I have no doubt that we shall acquit ourselves creditably, and that this demonstration will result in bringing people to Canada.

Mr. BEATTIE. I am one of those who think that it is not necessary to send a regiment of active militia to England. In the first place to send such a regiment properly equipped would cost, at the least, $200,000. It is not necessary to send a regiment to England to inform the people there that we have a militia here that is well armed, well equipped, and quite capable of defending the country. We have shown on more than one occasion that we can do that. I would be in favour of sending a nice bodyguard of from 20 to 25 officers with the leader of the Government. That would make a nice representation, and I think, would fill the bill, and would cost a very small sum. But, if a regiment is sent, I hope the Government will send it in proper shape. It would be a mistake to send a regiment not properly drilled or not well selected. If the Government is going to send a regiment I trust that it will send one that will be a credit to the country.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the motion is put I wish to thank those hon. gentlemen who have endorsed the suggestion I made to the Prime Minister something more than a week ago, to have the North-west Mounted Police represented in any military display that we may make at the Queen's Diamond Jubilee. I will only say, in regard to the proposal that lies underneath of my hon. and gallant friend (Mr. Domville) that if we do send, we must send creditably; and, if we do send, we should not send in the haphazard and shiftless manner of having the men pay their own kit and their own expenses—for the reason that the country would have no guarantee whatever that we should be properly represented. Some men would be well equipped, other middlingly equipped, and others poorly equipped, and there would be a national military representation not unlike that army that General Falstaff led through Coventry. So, if we have a military display representative of Canada, let it be really representative and let it be creditable. Suppose it cost $200,000, suppose it cost $300,000, I do not care—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not care and, what is more, the country does not care. If we send at all, the people want to have this country properly represented. My hon. friend who laughed misunderstood my argument. I am not now discussing the question whether we shall actually send or not; but, on the hypothesis of our sending, I say we should send at the country's charge, and that the body we send should be creditable and representative. Every remark of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) with reference to the North-west Mounted Police, I endorse. What the hon. gentleman says reinforces what I suggested to the Prime Minister something more than a week ago. Sir, no better course could be taken by the Government, if they are sending a military body over to represent Canada at the Queen's Jubilee, than to have a contingent from our militia, and a contingent from that body of men which is known so popularly, and known so interestingly in connection with the history of the country—the North-west Mounted Police. Not only that, but, according to the evidence of all military men who have visited the North-west, we have there the finest body of men to be found in the Empire. I have heard generals who have fought on the plains of India, generals who have fought the world over, say that in the British army no finer body of men is to be found than that of the North-west Mounted Police. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it would be a mistake not to have our North-west corps represented, and I hope if there is to be a military display of Canada, that these will be represented. The acting Minister of Militia is probably aware of the answer the Premier gave me; he replied to the question I put to him that the matter was under the consideration of the Militia Department. Now, I hope that the acting Minister of Militia will not only be able to answer the question of my hon. and gallant friend, but also my own question, as to whether, in case there is a military body sent to represent Canada at the Jubilee the North-west Mounted Police will be represented.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is very gratifying for the Government to find that apparently there is such substantial unanimity on both sides of the House as to the desirability of Canada being represented by a contingent of our various military forces on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee. The Government, I think, will be acting in accord with the general wish, not merely of Parliament but of the country, in taking care that Canada is properly represented on that occasion by a thoroughly representative contingent, and they will see that that is done; and I think I may venture to intimate to the hon. gentlemen that the various bodies composing the Canadian militia, not excluding the Mounted Police, will not be forgotten on that occasion. As to the other matters, I can say that a good deal of correspondence has been going on, and is going on now, with the Imperial authorities with respect to certain details as to the composition of the force; and the House will therefore, I hope, excuse me for not going into details yet. They will remember that those who go over, at any rate a considerable portion of them, will, of necessity, be guests of the Imperial authorities, and we must not intrude ourselves too much upon them. Now, one other point which I was glad to see brought forward by several hon. gentlemen on both sides. I am entirely of their opinion that thorough economy is not parsimony in dealing with our militia; and when we bring down our supplementary Estimates I trust that we will receive the support of hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as of hon. gentlemen on this side, in making reasonable provision to see that Canada is fairly and properly represented, as Canada ought to be, on an occasion of this importance. I quite agree with what has been said on both sides of the House as to the importance of the occasion, and as to the importance of Canada making it plain to every section of the British Empire that the people of Canada are thoroughly determined to preserve law and order in this part of the continent that has been committed to their charge, and that they are well able to do so. I trust, if not to-morrow, at any rate immediately on the reassembling of the House, to be able to communicate full details to the House; but the House will understand that while these negotiations are pending, it is not desirable to go into minute details as to the number of the contingent, and other matters of that sort.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

INDIAN AGENT CROWE.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Interior whether his reply is correctly reported in the "Hansard" of yesterday, where he said, in reply to my question as to the dismissal of Mr. Crowe, Indian agent at Saugeen :

Inspector Macrae's instructions required him to investigate the matter in regard to which Mr. Crowe has been adjudged guilty of irregularity.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). That is correctly reported.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman lay the instructions and report upon the Table ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no objections to doing so.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fitzpatrick for second reading of Bill (No. 7) to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members to the House of Commons; and the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto.

Mr. McMULLEN. In rising to reply to the address delivered by the hon. the ex-Finance Minister on Friday last, upon the franchise question, and in which he wandered over the entire record, I desire to recur to a few points that he attempted to make upon that occasion. First of all, he complained that Parliament had been summoned too late this year. Well, we know that it is desirable, all things being equal, that Parliament should meet as early in the year as possible, but we know that the present Government have met with great difficulties in the way of summoning Parliament at an earlier period of the year. Hon. gentlemen opposite are well aware that the Government intended to summon Parliament at an earlier period, but, unfortunately, a fire in the departmental buildings necessitated a postponement; and then, again, another accident occurred whereby the hon. the Minister of Militia was very seriously injured, and that was the cause of a further postponement of the meeting of Parliament. The ex-Finance Minister has been calling loud and long and pointedly for the delivery of the Budget speech, but I think he has no reason to complain when we look over the history of the past and see at what dates, under the Conservative Government, their Budget speeches were delivered. I have looked at the dates on which those budget speeches were delivered by the hon. Finance Minister, including tariff changes, and found that the first was on May 12, 1887, the next on March 27, 1890, and the other on March 27, 1894. The first budget speech delivered by the hon. gentleman was delivered about one month after the date on which it is now announced that the budget speech would be delivered during the present session, and the others were only some twenty-five days earlier. On those occasions the hon. gentleman had not to contend with a fire, which destroyed two or three important departments, and other difficulties with which the present Government have had to contend. So I do not think there is room for the complaint made by the ex-Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman claims a great deal of credit for delivering his speech in 1894 so short a time after Parliament assembled. We know on that occasion he delivered the speech a few days earlier than was the ordinary rule, but that was the one exception in his political lifetime. We should also remember that prior to the delivery of that speech, considerable reductions in the tariff were promised, and that when it was delivered it was in such a crude and unsatisfactory form that when the hon. gentleman came to explain the alterations, clerical errors almost innumerable were found to exist. Rather than have a repetition of the experience of 1894 by a Finance Minister before this House and the country, it is very much better that a fair portion of time should be given to the Finance Minister to properly and carefully prepare the changes he desires to make in the tariff, so that when they come before the people there will not be unpleasant explanations to offer, such as were necessary on that occasion owing to the mixed and muddled details of the budget speech, which was full of clerical errors, as the then Finance Minister admitted. Then, again, the hon. gentleman has intimated that the country was fairly aware of the line the Government would pursue, that the people were not taken by surprise, that there was always a well understood principle at the bottom of their tariff and their policy. In connection with that matter we have a very vivid recollection of some incidents that happened which led us to suppose that the public had too much knowledge with respect to what was likely to happen. I would not charge the ex-Finance Minister with having given hints or winks to any particular section or individual, but we know that in 1894, when he added half a cent per pound to the tariff on raw sugar, some of the refineries in Halifax imported more sugar within the three months prior to the delivery of the budget speech than they had ever imported during a previous year. We do not know who gave the hint, or how the refiners got into possession of the fact that an increased duty on sugar was going to be levied. Whether they got it directly or indirectly we have no knowledge, but the fact remains that in some way they obtained an inkling of what was likely to occur, because two hon. members who then sat in this House, Mr. Kenny and Mr. Stairs, who were largely interested in those refineries, reaped a very fine harvest out of profits from the enormous quantity of raw sugar imported by those refineries before the duties were levied. Of course no Government is justified in giving a hint in respect to proposed tariff changes.

The ex-Finance Minister also spoke with respect to the necessity of avoiding a long spring and summer session, and he urged that we should get through the work rapidly; that many of the members had very important interests to attend to at home, and it was desirable that they should be relieved from their duties as soon as possible in order that they might attend to important private business. I have gone over the record and ascertained to what extent the hon. gentleman who now makes this plea on the Government and the House, sought to allow members to engage in their regular work during spring and summer, and I ascertained that out of eighteen years, the House was in session during sixteen springs and summers. That is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite, that is his record as a Minister, while now he is seeking to find fault with the present Government on the ground that they did not call Parliament earlier in order that members could get away to attend to their spring and summer business.

The hon. gentleman has also declared that it is not the intention of the Reform party to fulfil their pledges, and he has outlined a number of pledges given by the party which so far have not been carried out. The hon. gentleman evidently expects that a Government that has only been in power a few months should be prepared during practically its first session to implement every promise made. I do not think it was reasonable to expect the Government to do so. The Speech from the Throne foreshadowed certain measures to carry out promises that the Government have made when in Opposition. One of the leading features in the Speech is the tariff. It is fully the intention of the Government to carry out that promise as one of their principal measures. After the tariff is dealt with, the proposed Franchise Act, which unquestionably will meet the wishes of the people, will be taken up; and if the Government get through the measures outlined in the Speech from the Throne, they will accomplish a great deal in the direction of carrying out the promises made to the people of the country.

The ex-Finance Minister also drew attention to the Bill before the House with respect to superannuation, and he said it did not abolish superannuation. I should like to know from the hon. gentleman if he would justify the introduction of a Bill containing more drastic clauses than the one now before the House, and which he has declared himself quite willing to assist in carrying through Parliament. I believe that the Postmaster General, who introduced the Bill on the question of abolishing the superannuation system, no doubt was prepared to go as far as the abolition of the Act as was fair to the civil servants. The civil servants have certain vested rights. They were engaged and entered the service on certain stipulated conditions. Those conditions were that after they had occupied positions in the service for ten years and had contributed to the superannuation fund by reductions made from their salaries, every permanent civil servant had a claim on the Crown for superannuation, and the result is that if the Crown expects loyalty from their public servants, she must deal honestly and honourably with them. I would like to ask the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), what kind of a Bill he would introduce? Would he deprive those who are now on the superannuation list of the amount they are enabled to draw under the operations of the Act? I do not think he would be so dishonest. Would he deprive those who are now in the service, and who are entitled to superannuation if they become sick and disabled and have served over ten years? That was the bargain and contract with them when they entered the service, and would the hon. gentleman take advantage of a power of Parliament to break that contract? I do not think he would.

Sir, I want to draw attention to the handle that is attempted to be made by the Conservative press of a recent statement of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in this House. In reply to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) the name of every one of those superannuated since the present Government came into power was given to the House, and the Conservative party is trying to prove that the Reform party have superannuated, as well as the Conservative party, when they were in power. Sir, there is no member of this House who has more frequently criticised the abuses of the Superannuation Act than I have. I claim that I am familiar with every provision of it. Had the superannuation system been rightly used in Canada, it would have been self-sustaining; but owing to the fact that the Conservative Government misused the Act, the system has become obnoxious and the people have declared that it must be abolished. Let me show that the present Government have not abused the superannuation system. They have not added one year, or one month, or one hour, to the time of service of any clerk who has been superannuated, and they have not given one dollar more in the way of superannuation than the official was entitled to under an honest application of the Act. When the present Government dispensed with the services of those clerks, they were bound to recognize their right to superannuation so long as that law is on the Statute-book. But, on the other hand, let me give the House a little idea of the manner in which the Superannuation Act was abused by the late Government. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) must have an idea of how the provisions of the Act were applied in the interests of his own relations. No Minister of the Crown on this side of the House has been charged with being guilty of installing his own relations in office by superannuating other officials. I call the attention of the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) to this fact. Mr. R. W. Cruikshanks of St. John had $2,000 a year, and the ex-Finance Minister superannuated him and added to his time of service, so as to give him the full amount, namely, thirty-five-fiftieths of his salary, or $1,400 a year, and he appointed in Mr. Cruikshanks' place, Mr. H. D. McLeod, his own nephew. Mr. Cruikshanks got as full a superannuation allowance as if he had served fifty years. Now, was Mr. Cruikshanks in such bad health that he was incapable of performing the duties of his office? No, Sir. He has since been performing very onerous duties for the local Government and he is to-day as able to discharge those duties as ever he was in his life. But the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) wanted to find a place for his friend and nephew, and in order to get Mr. Cruikshanks quietly out of the way he added to his time of service.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to take any honours that do not belong to me. Mr. McLeod is not my nephew. I am old enough, but I am not old enough for that.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, perhaps he is his cousin or some relation. The hon. gentleman cannot say that he is not related to him.

An hon. MEMBER. He is his uncle.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) the uncle of Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. FOSTER. If I continue to deny any longer, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) will have all the degrees of consanguinity exhausted, and he might then find out the relationship.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) wants to escape the charge that Mr. McLeod is his nephew, but he won't deny that he is a relation of his.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) to try and keep a little closer to the amendment before the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to point out how hon. gentlemen opposite abused the Superannuation Act.

Mr. FOSTER. I must imitate my hon. friend the leader of the Government and take a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is now discussing the Superannuation and Civil Service Act. I am not aware that that is pertinent either to the main motion, which is for the second reading of the Franchise Bill, or to the amendment, which is that the Franchise Bill shall not be proceeded with until the tariff Bill is disposed of.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am simply answering the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). I admit that he took a very wide range—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Even if the hon. member (Mr. Foster) were out of order when he was addressing the House, now that the point of order is raised and my attention called to it, it would hardly justify me in permitting the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to proceed with remarks which are not pertinent to the question before the House. I may say further, that there is hardly any doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is anticipating discussion on another order which is on the paper. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) must confine himself to answering the certainly very numerous arguments which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) adduced in support of his motion. I do not remember that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) addressed any argument to the House with reference to the Superannuation Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I surely gave him chance enough.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. ex-Finance Minister did unquestionably deal with the Superannuation Bill. I hope he is not going away, for I have something more to say to him. But as you have raised the point, Mr. Speaker, that I am dealing with a question that is now on the Notice Paper, I will postpone any further remarks in regard to that question; and I notify the ex-Finance Minister that when the Bill comes before the House, I will take the opportunity of dealing with the superannuation system, and showing how it has been abused.

The hon. ex-Finance Minister also tried to frighten the manufacturers of this country by saying that we had declared that our tariff would be death to protection. Well, Sir, I believe I am voicing the opinion of the entire Reform party in this Dominion when I say that as a party we have no bitterness or hostile feeling towards any manufacturing institution in this country that can fairly hope to exist. On the contrary, I believe that the Reform party are prepared to encourage any such industry in any way they can. One feature of the National Policy which we have denounced most strongly has been that feature which produced monopolies, which placed manufacturers in a position to combine and to extort from the consumers of this country excessive prices for the commodities which they manufactured; and I believe it is the determination of the Government, as it is the feeling of every Reformer in this Dominion, that that feature of the National Policy should be obliterated, but we have no hostile feelings towards the legitimate manufacturing institutions of this country. Many of these flourished before there was a National Policy, and I believe that they will continue to flourish after the new tariff is introduced, and that they will come to realize that while the National Policy professed to build them up and make them rich, they were bled in other ways to such an extent that when the annual balance sheet came to be made out, they were not in as good a position as they would have been under a reasonable revenue tariff. We do not want a single manufacturing interest in this country that can fairly hope to exist, to get alarmed. It has nothing to be alarmed at, if it is not one of those sucking monopolies that has been existing unfairly and unjustly by extorting excessive prices from the people.

In the next place, the ex-Finance Minister said something with regard to the Reform party having declared themselves in favour of free trade as it is in England. We would rejoice if the financial condition of this country were such that we could follow the example of the mother country in regard to free trade; but, unfortunately, hon. gentlemen opposite, during the sixteen or eighteen years of extravagance, of increased debt and increased expenditure, have placed this country in such a condition that we cannot hope, for many years, to adopt a free-trade policy; but that is the goal. We earnestly hope, however, that Canada's better day has dawned. The economy in public expenditure that has been so well commenced by the present Government is shown in the Estimates which they have brought down; and I hope they will continue in that course until, at some time in the future, we may be able to follow the noble example set by the mother country, and adopt free trade. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was a protective policy; every item in the tariff was placed there with the view of protecting the particular commodity it referred to. On the other hand, the policy of the Reform party is first a tariff for revenue, so adjusted as to reach fairly and equitably the entire consuming masses of this country, without doing any violence to any manufacturing institution that can fairly hope to live and prosper in Canada.

The hon. ex-Finance Minister appears to assume to himself the championship of the manufacturing industries of the country; he appears to think that no member of this Government has any sympathy whatever for any of these institutions. Well, Sir, I think he is greatly mistaken. I think he will begin to realize very shortly that he is under a delusion, as no Reformer desires to injure any industry in the country that can hope to exist under a revenue tariff, fairly administered.

Now, the hon. ex-Finance Minister has challenged the prudence, the propriety, the justice of introducing the measure now before the House. He has said that it strikes directly at the Conservative party, that it is intended to deprive them of the rights and privileges they enjoy. I would like to know in what way he can prove that statement. The provincial franchise as it now exists in the province of Ontario is entirely under the control of the municipalities. The reeves and councillors are not all Reformers. Even in townships which are looked on as Reform or as Conservative there is always a considerable body of the opposite party. These men lay the foundation for the provincial franchise, and they are in a much better position to say who, within the limits of the township shall be granted the right to exercise the franchise at municipal and provincial and Dominion elections, than any revising officer or any county judge. They are well acquainted with the neighbourhood in which they live, and they are usually scattered over the township. It is the privilege of every inhabitant of the municipality to appear at the revision and to ask that a name should be put on or taken off, and if the council declined to do what any individual deems to be simple justice, he has the right to appeal from the council to a county judge. Thus the last appeal is to friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I would like to know how, under these circumstances, hon. gentlemen opposite can claim that the proposed measure is a direct thrust at the Conservative party.

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) very strongly advocated the continuation of the franchise now in existence. I do not much wonder at that, because it landed him in this House, and if the other system had been in existence, I doubt very much that he would have come here. So I suppose he thinks he had better stick to the ship that landed him here.

The hon. ex-Finance Minister has been singularly uneasy since this House met. He has been very restless in his seat. He has been very ready to rise to ask questions, to press for certain measures, and to ask for the Budget. I do not know what is the cause of his uneasiness. The fact that his seat is not now cushioned with the $7,000 salary which he formerly received may possibly explain why he is so fidgety. All we have to say is that the verdict of the people of this country on the 23rd of June last landed him in the seat he now occupies. I think it would be very much better for the hon. gentleman to cultivate a little patience beneath the wave of popular indignation which placed him where he is, and allow the Government a fair and reasonable opportunity of showing how they can discharge the duties of the Executive of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite may possibly feel sore with the Moses of their party (Sir Charles Tupper) who has led them into the political wilderness, where, in my opinion, they are likely to remain for some time. There can be no doubt that these hon. gentlemen have a record which is exceedingly unsavoury, and I look forward to a better condition of things. I look forward to the present Government administering the affairs of this country honestly and sensibly, and feel confident that we have done with such scandals as the Curran Bridge scandal, the Tay Canal scandal, the McGreevy scandal, which disgraced the last Administration. Let me urge hon. gentlemen opposite to cultivate patience and forbearance, and realize that they are in Opposition. We sat on that side for a great many years, and we tried when there to discharge the duties we owed our country, as we shall endeavour to do on this side. We hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will equally discharge their duties, because the Opposition have very onerous duties to perform, and I have no doubt that the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) will prove himself a very efficient member of the Opposition. He has evidently made up his mind to do a great deal of work, whether the hon. gentlemen behind him perform their share or not.

I hope that the Bill now before the House will receive its sanction. We must not forget that the Government have promised a plebiscite on the temperance question. Now, the plebiscite cannot take place before we have revised the franchise, because it would be a gross injustice to submit the question on the present lists. We have had no revision for some two years, nearly three. Would it be fair, I ask, that a question so vital and prominent should be submitted on defective voters' lists, in which many young men who have just come of age are not entered. I venture to say that 10 or 12 per cent of our young men who have a right to vote are not on the lists at all. We require a revision of the voters' lists. You cannot possibly proceed to take a plebiscite, until you have a revision under the proposed Act now before the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Why not take a vote on the provincial lists, and provide in the Plebiscite Act for this way of taking it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the proper way to take a vote is to take it on the lists adopted by the Dominion for Dominion purposes, and until we have that list, the Government cannot carry out their promise with regard to the plebiscite. We have it hinted that possibly the Franchise Act will receive very severe handling in the Senate, and some say it may possibly be choked up there. If the Senators are prepared to assume the responsibility of doing so, if they are bound to stand in the breach and not allow the Franchise Act to pass, they will have to bear the odium. But before the plebiscite is taken, we should have a thorough revision of the lists of the Dominion. When that is done, we can take a fair and honest plebiscite, but until then we cannot. Until we pass the present Franchise Bill, it will be an utter impossibility to get a verdict by means of a plebiscite.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I must say that I have not given that attention to the Franchise Act which I would like to do, and which I propose to do in order to discuss it thoroughly in the Committee of the Whole House. But there are some primary objections to this measure becoming law, which I wish to point out to the Government, and, which, if my interpretation of the statute itself is correct, renders it almost impossible for a measure of this kind to become law. In the first place, I understand that, under the present law, in the province of Quebec, the principle of one man one vote does not apply, and it does in Ontario. If that be the case, then the result of this law would be that you would give to the electors in the province of Quebec a very much larger representation at the polls than you would give the electors of Ontario and some other provinces, where the principle of one man one vote obtains. This is to my mind what renders it almost impossible for the Government to go on with the measure during the present session. I cannot conceive it possible that an elector living in Montreal, having votes in seven or eight constituencies in that province, would have the right to exercise his franchise in these different constituencies, whilst an elector residing in Toronto would be tied down, by the principle of one man one vote, to the one constituency, though he might own property in several. Do you mean to tell me that, at the present session, in the face of this one fact alone, without any assurance of a change in the laws of Quebec, we, in this Parliament, are going to enact a measure of that kind? I venture to say, with all deference to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who has had in charge the preparation of this measure, that no such law will ever be enacted in this Parliament during the present session at least. Well, Sir, that is only one illustration of the change that has taken place in the history of franchises in Canada. I say "franchises" advisedly, because in this Bill we are dealing with franchises of all kinds, and not the franchise of the Dominion alone. The principle upon which the legislation first introduced in this Parliament was based, was not, as some suppose, to obtain uniformity throughout the Dominion. Any one who doubts that I would refer to the speech of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, when he introduced the Franchise Bill in 1885. He stated that it was not on that account, but it was, that, though the provinces might differ in their franchises, nevertheless we in this Parliament had the power to say whether these should be the franchises of this Dominion. That is the great principle involved in the franchise of 1885. We know, Sir, that during the session of 1885 we adopted the franchise then existing in Prince Edward Island, we adopted the franchise then existing in British Columbia, though that franchise was manhood suffrage in each case. Though they differed from the franchise in Quebec or Ontario, they then became the Dominion franchise. It is not alone in the particular I have mentioned as regards the province of Quebec or Ontario, but in every respect we are subjected to any future changes that may be made by any legislature—which may be more advanced, if you like, as to the extension of the franchise. Whatever it may be, under this Bill we are bound to accept it as a matter of course. There are, in many of the provinces, people who believe, and believe honestly, in the principle of minority representation. Much may be said in favour of that principle. I am not prepared to say, so far as my humble opinion is concerned at least, that the day is not so very far distant when the principle may be adopted by provinces in this Dominion. If that day should arrive, we shall have no fault to find with the province adopting it, but it may not meet with the approval of the majority of this House and of this country. Nevertheless, under the principle of the Bill before us, we are bound to adopt it as the Dominion franchise for that province. We are subject, therefore, to all the changes—I will not say whims, because some of the changes may be good, some may be advanced, some may be, perhaps, ahead of the times in the Dominion yet not ahead of the time so far as the particular province is concerned—of the various provinces. But I am not prepared to say that some of the provinces will not act in this same high-minded spirit. We have had experience in the province of Nova Scotia. We know that prior to an election, the men in the employment of the Dominion Government were disfranchised in order that they might not cast their votes at a Dominion election. But something has happened within the last ten days in the Ontario legislature alone which ought to make clear to all members of this House the danger of leaving our franchise at the mercy of hostile legislatures. About two years ago, I think it was, that legislature passed an Act limiting the powers of this Government to appoint junior judges, by fixing a limited population in the counties in this regard. The result was that that power was taken from the Federal Government. Within the last two weeks, in what may be the dying hours of the Ontario legislature, that law was repealed. Does any one suppose that it was repealed for any other purpose than to enable the Federal Government to appoint junior judges again? I merely mention that to show the danger of placing the franchises of this Dominion at the mercy of the provincial legislatures in this country. I could mention other cases than that. Sir, there is a great principle involved. This Franchise Act was not enacted without a very great deal of consideration. Not once, but on seven different occasions, did Sir John Macdonald introduce the Bill which was afterwards passed in 1885, and he did so, as he stated, in order that the measure might be before the country and be properly considered by the electors before it finally became the law of the land. I need not remind those hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1885 of the full and complete discussion that took place upon the measure. We know that that period of obstruction, the first in the history of this Parliament under our present procedure, was inaugurated at that time by those who now occupy the Government benches in this House. We know that after the fullest possible discussion, lasting over a period of some months, this measure at last became law. No Bill was ever passed in this Parliament that received such criticism as this Bill received. No measure was ever enacted here of which it might be so truly said that it was made as perfect as such legislation could possibly be from a Dominion standpoint. And now shall it be said that we will take a retrograde step, that we will commit political suicide so far as this Parliament is concerned by giving up this right which is crystallized into an Act of Parliament and go back to provincial franchises with all their weaknesses and all their dangers? This is to be regretted not from the federal standpoint alone. I believe that the history of this country has shown that there is such a strong current of provincial thought that it is almost impossible for the Federal Government to resist it. In our provinces we have not the second chambers, as a rule, that they have in the United States; we have not the system of checks and counterchecks to hasty legislation. Therefore, so far as the central power is concerned, instead of weakening it, we should strengthen it by all honest and legitimate means in this Parliament.

Have said so much with regard to the Franchise Act itself, I wish to pass on to what the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has said in commenting upon the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) in this House a few nights ago. He stated that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) might not have been here had it not been for the present Franchise Act. The same might be said of dozens of hon. members on the other side of the House. In order to test the correctness of that statement, you would have to examine into the circumstances of every individual election held throughout the country, and you would find, I make no doubt, many of the hon. gentlemen upon that side of the House who, by energy and hard work were able to secure, perhaps, better lists than their opponent. Such has always been the case under the provincial lists, such has always been the case under the Dominion lists, such will be the case even if you come down to manhood suffrage and adopt a system of registration. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) a few days ago, hinted that there might possibly be a unanimity of opinion in favour of manhood suffrage. I shall have to change my mind before I agree to that principle, believing, as I do, that many of the evils which are now incident to the legislation not only of the United States but of England and of this country, are referable to the very low standard of property qualification that prevail in all these countries. But that is a matter that can be discussed, as it was in 1885, when the Bill is in committee of the whole House—it is a matter of detail. I have sought only to point out the danger that faces this Parliament when you come to enact legislation of this kind. Provinces will advance, provinces will change their franchises possibly for good, but possibly in directions that we would not approve in this House. But whether for good or evil, we are bound to affirm them; by this Act they will become the law of the land.

Now, just one word more with regard to what the ex-Finance Minister dwelt upon so long, the fact that this measure was brought forward for a certain purpose, that it was brought forward in advance of the legislation to which the country was earnestly looking forward. Now, Sir, I wish to join my voice with his in expressing my regret that the Government has not been able to bring down their measure of tariff reform, or tariff changes, at an earlier period in the present session. Sir, I sympathize with the Government, and acknowledge that the task they have undertaken is not a light nor an easy one. It is the most difficult work, perhaps, that a Government could undertake. Nevertheless, they have had opportunities, I think, beyond those that were enjoyed by the late Government prior to the legislation of 1894; they have had all the opportunities of going about the country and visiting the different industries, which was a right and proper thing to do, although they found much fault with us because a commission, of which I was a member, did the very same thing before bringing down the tariff revision of 1894. I can only say this, that I cannot believe that this measure was of sufficient importance to be interposed before the production of the more important tariff measure. I venture the prediction that this measure will scarcely be made law during the present session of this Parliament; and I rejoice to know that the circumstances of the country, the exigencies of party, the state of opinion in this Parliament, are not likely to render it necessary that the Government should bring down any such law during the present session.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is refreshing to have one of the leading members of the Opposition side of the House rise and direct his remarks to a discussion of the measure before the House. With the exception of, perhaps, the slightest and most casual reference to this question, we have had nothing from that side of the House with regard to the repeal of the franchise law. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) has attempted to show reason why the Parliament of Canada should continue to exercise the functions that it took upon itself in 1885, to provide for this Dominion a voters' list. I think that the verdict of this country will be, I think that the verdict of this House will be, that the Government now occupying the Treasury benches, in deciding to sweep this measure from the Statute-book, is acting in the public interest, and will be entitled to receive, and will receive, the thanks of the public. My hon. friend from Brockville attempts to impress upon the House the idea that the repeal of the franchise law of this Dominion and the substitution in place of it of the franchises of the provinces, will work inequalities of the most striking and pernicious character. He tells us that in the province of Ontario, if the elections are held upon the list of that province, and in accordance with the election laws of that province, we shall have the principle—I may say parenthetically the salutary principle—of one man one vote; while, on the contrary, in the province of Quebec, and perhaps in other provinces, that principle will not apply; and for that reason we shall have a law which is not uniform in its application or in its operation with regard to the elections throughout the Dominion. But the very next moment the hon. gentleman goes on to say that when this law was adopted in 1885 we took the franchises of the provinces, in Prince Edward Island manhood suffrage; in British Columbia manhood suffrage; and the incorporation of these franchises in the Bill made them Dominion franchises.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Will the hon. gentleman allow me. The argument was this, that even under manhood suffrage one man would only have one vote. In Ontario we had the principle of one man one vote, and in the province of Quebec we had the principle of one man several votes. So it was not the principle.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have fairly stated the hon. gentleman's position. He cites these two instances to prove that inequalities will exist in the operation of the law in these different provinces. I have fairly stated what the hon. gentleman has put before the House, and I was proceeding to say that the hon. gentleman, the next moment, stated that the Government in 1885, when the Dominion electoral franchise law was passed, did incorporate inequalities in that law. They set out with the assertion that the reason that warranted them in asking Parliament to assume the functions and the duty and the power of establishing a Dominion franchise law, was that it was necessary to have a uniform franchise. The hon. gentleman will not deny that that was one of the reasons assigned.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I hope the hon. gentleman won't charge me with interrupting him. I stated that uniformity was not alone the principle. Then I pointed out the danger there was of inequality. That was my point; it was not the principle of uniformity. Read Sir John A. Macdonald's speech in introducing the measure in 1885, and you will find he distinctly stated that it was not, but that, to use his own words, it was no pedantic idea they wished to follow.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman says it was not exclusively upon the assumption that the Government desired to secure uniformity, that this was not the exclusive principle that actuated the Government in the passage of this law. I was about to proceed and say that there were other principles that actuated the Government, principles that were not as creditable to the Government as the principle that it was desirable to secure uniformity. But this was one of the assertions made by the Government of the day as a justification of its conduct in introducing into this House the Electoral Franchise Law of 1885, the assertion that it was necessary to secure uniformity of qualification for the exercise of the franchise throughout this Dominion; but having introduced the law based upon that assumption, among others they proceeded themselves to violate, in the most glaring manner, the very principle they had laid down as one of the fundamental principles that governed them in their action. They proceeded to grant universal suffrage in two provinces; they proceeded to give, in the maritime provinces, a suffrage based upon a character of property that did not exist and was not used in other provinces; and they succeeded at last in placing upon the Statute-book a law which gave greater diversity of franchise than existed under the provincial franchises. They thus gave away their whole case, and they showed most conclusively that the assertion made, the assumption upon which they proceeded was a mere assumption, was a mere assertion, that did not actually govern their conduct as the consideration of this Bill proceeded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman tells us that this Bill that we have under consideration received the most exhaustive consideration and criticism, that the Bill, forsooth, was a perfect Bill when it was placed upon the Statute-book of this Dominion, because it had been subjected to three months of adverse criticism, and gone through the fiery ordeal of a consideration in the committee of the whole in those three months. Sir, the Bill was an infamous Bill when it was introduced, it was only slightly less infamous when it became law. The fight of the Opposition in this House for three long months, was to save the country from the imposition of this outrage, conceived for the purpose of giving to the Government of the day power which they unjustly wrested from the Opposition, power which enabled them to deal corruptly and improperly with the formation of the voters' lists of this country. The then Opposition may claim not that they secured for this country through their long debate on the Bill a good law; but they may claim that they secured by their long and vigorous fight the excision of some of the most objectionable features of this law.

What were the circumstances connected with the introduction of this Bill? What were the reasons that led to its introduction? What was the necessity that existed for bringing in this Bill? Under what provisions had we held our elections from 1867 to 1885? Had the country at large expressed any dissatisfaction with the mode in which our elections were held? Had there been any friction? Had there been any demand for change? Had there been the slightest indication, either on the surface or beneath the surface, that the people of the country required an electoral franchise law for the Dominion, or that the interest of the people would be served by such a law? We had a provision inserted in the British North America Act with respect to the mode of holding our elections, a provision that worked well, a provision the propriety of which was never questioned, nor was any question raised as to the desirability of continuing it. That provision is found in section 41 of the British North America Act, and it reads as follows :—

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or legislative assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of members, and the execution of new writs, in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

That is, we were to have as our law governing in these cases the law of the respective provinces relating to the election of members to sit in the legislative assembly. We were to have the voters' lists for use in Dominion elections that were to be used in provincial elections. I re-affirm the assertion I have already made, that there never was during the eighteen years that rule was in practice any evidence of the slightest dissatisfaction with it, the slightest evidence of the necessity of change, and the Government were not impelled by any necessity, apparent or real, to carry out the change they made. Now, of course the Government had a motive. The Government had a motive when it naturalized and introduced that American cutthroat piece of political villany called the gerrymander, and so arranged matters in this province of Ontario that one-half of the electors were able to elect two-thirds of the members to sit in this House. The Government had a motive there. The motive was to strengthen themselves; and they did it. They had a motive when the Electoral Franchise Act was introduced. The motive was not to do justice, not to meet a public want, not to meet a claim on the part of the public for the redress of a grievance, but the motive was to place upon the Statute-book—a law which would give the Government of the day unjust and illegitimate advantage. That was the motive; and that motive was in the results and fruits that followed fully secured. The Government attempted at first to give to all Indians of the Dominion a vote. They finally abandoned that proposition. They attempted at first to take power to appoint any man who had five years' experience as a barrister, no matter how disreputable he might be, no matter how pliant a tool of political parties he might be, to the position of revising barrister. The long fight the Opposition made prevented some of these attempted outrages. We secured a limitation of the Indian vote to a few tribes, partly civilized. We secured a provision that judges only where available should act as revising barristers. We minimized to some extent the evils that the Bill was intended and calculated to produce, but we never were able to eliminate its chief and most important features for evil.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Bill proposed to enfranchise all the Indians; that the Indians of British Columbia, the Indians of Manitoba and the Indians of the North-west Territories were all to be enfranchised?

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman understood me correctly. The Premier of the day, when asked that question, expressly asserted that such was the case—that "Strike-in-the-Back," "Eagle's Nest," "Pie-a-Pot," and all other Indians of the North-west were to be enfranchised. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in earnest or indulging in a piece of facetiousness, but that was his answer, and that was the provision of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is not in earnest.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am; I leave insincerity to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIN. When was this?

Mr. CHARLTON. In 1885; when my hon. friend's parliamentary existence was yet in embryo. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Bill with these provisions became the law.

Now, what were the practical results connected with the operation of the Bill? The Government appointed the revising barristers. The revising barristers held office during the pleasure of the Government. They might be honourable men, and in the majority of cases they were; they might in some cases not be as strictly honourable as might be desired. These men had in their hands irresponsible power. They were clothed with power to make the lists, to publish the lists, to use such information as they might deign to us in the preparation of the lists. Their decision could not be challenged except on questions of law, and the right of a man to be on the voters' list is always a question of fact. The preparation of the lists was so expensive that the Government shrank from incurring the expenditure of an annual revision, and we had only four revisions from 1885 to 1896. Those lists upon the occasion of the first revision were printed in the printing offices of newspapers supporting the Government. Then the Government changed the plan; they bought plant for the Government printing office at Ottawa, and printed the lists in their own office. When that point was reached, we had this most remarkable condition of things existing: we had a law that gave the Government of the day power to appoint its own officers to make the lists; then we had a further provision by which the Government of the day, if those officers did not make the lists to suit them, could stuff those lists at their own pleasure in their own office, and for the last outrage, if attempted, there was no possible remedy. It has been asserted, and I assert that voters' lists on numerous occasions have been tampered with and names placed on lists in the Government printing office that were not entitled to a place there. I claim that in one polling division in the riding of North Norfolk, twelve names that were struck off by the revising barrister, found their places upon the voters' lists when they were printed at Ottawa. What could we do with a thing of that kind? We were contending against this trinity of political infamies: the Gerrymander Act, the Franchise Act, and an unlimited amount of boodle.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, shame.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, we were, and it was only by the interposition of Providence that we were enabled to shake these men from the hold they had. The idea of a man standing up to-day to defend a franchise law that provides for the making of lists, for the printing of the lists, and for the manipulation of the lists in every respect by the Government that may desire to profit, and will profit, by any improper conduct with regard to the formation of these lists.

Mr. SPROULE. What do you think of the right of the Manitoba Government to make their lists?

Mr. CHARLTON. They have the right to make their own lists, and we have nothing to do with it. Now, one of the reasons assigned in justification of the present law was that it was proper and desirable to copy the English example. England had revising barristers, and it was said that England had a system which it was proper for us to imitate. We were told that the lists prepared in England were prepared for the election of members of Parliament, and that we ought to have such a system in Canada. Well, Sir, when we come to examine the English law, and to contrast the working of that law with the working of the Dominion Electoral Franchise Act, we will find that there are no points of resemblance between the two. The English lists are made by municipal officers, the overseers of the poor. I have here the English statute, 48 Vic., chap. 15. This law has been often amended and the last amendments were made in 1885. The statute, first of all, issues instructions to the clerks of the peace of the various counties, and, following the instructions to the clerks of the peace are the forms and the nature of the instructions given by the clerks of the peace to the overseers of the poor. These instructions cover the following subjects—Registration of county voters, general instructions explaining the persons entitled to be registered, the meaning of the expressions used, and the mode of making out and publishing the lists, the publication and inspection of lists, provision for notices and inquiries, for the publication of the lists of voters and the receiving of claims and of objections by these overseers of the poor, the work of forming the lists, of receiving applications to go upon the list, of receiving protests against being upon the lists; all this work was performed by the overseers of the poor who are municipal officers, and finally, there were the instructions to those overseers of the poor with regard to their attendance upon the revising barristers.

Now, the revising barrister in England was not a creature of the Government. He was not a Government appointee at all. He was appointed by the chief justice; he held his office for one year, and his functions with regard to the lists were purely and exclusively judicial. He supervised the work of the municipal officers, and upon appeals from their action he gave his decision. This English law was identical almost with the law of Ontario. The township councils there, corresponding in their functions to the overseers of the poor, made the list from the assessment rolls, held courts of revision, hear claims to be put on, hear protests against being on, and having made a perfect list, so far as their functions will permit them to do, the county judge, whose duties correspond with those of the revising barrister in England, is called in to revise their work upon appeals from their decision. I repeat, that we have in the province of Ontario a system with regard to the preparation of the voters' list almost identical with that that prevails in England. Nothing could be more widely divergent from the system prevailing in Great Britain than the Electoral Franchise law of this Dominion.

Mr. SPROULE. What does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) think about the registration system in cities and towns of Ontario, which is done under appointees of the Government?

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, Sir, I think that in regard to registration, in regard to any course that can be taken for securing the privilege of the franchise at the very earliest day to young men who come of age, is a movement to be approved of. Anything that will avoid such a scandalous condition of things as we had in 1891 when we held an election upon a voters' list two years old, anything that will prevent such a scandalous condition of things as existed in 1896, when we held an election on voters' lists two years old, is a welcome improvement. In neither of these elections could any voter in the Dominion of Canada under twenty-three years of age exercise the franchise. Almost anything that is imaginable is preferable to such an outrage upon the electorate as was perpetrated in these two elections. It is desirable that our young men should have their names upon the voters' lists as soon as possible after they attain manhood. If a man, otherwise entitled to vote, attains the age of twenty-one, he should be given the right to exercise the franchise as soon as possible, and he should not be deterred for two years afterwards.

Mr. HUGHES. How will you do that if you adopt the provincial lists?

Mr. CHARLTON. You will do it under the provincial law. Whatever mode is adopted by the province for the exercise of the franchise is the law that will apply for the election of members for the Dominion, and if it is a just law in the one case it is a just law in the other. I do not dispute that this House is properly invested with authority as to the trial of the right of its members to sit here, and as to all things relating to the economy of this House. Nevertheless, it must be borne in mind that we are all of us here the representatives of certain ridings. We come from certain provinces, and these provinces are invested by the constitution of the country with the civil right which enables them to secure representation in this Parliament. We represent our provinces here. We are not relieved from responsibility to these provinces; we are not relieved from the duty of looking after the interests of the provinces and the ridings we represent. I have always held that it pertained to the province to say what should be the method by which it should choose its representatives in this Parliament; that that was a civil right of the province; that while we exercised certain functions in the way of determining the qualifications of members of this House, and so forth, yet primarily we are sent here by our ridings, which are different portions of the province, the province being entitled under the British North America Act to be represented in this House, and that Act prescribing the number of representatives which each province should have in this House; and when we are asked: How will you do this or that, how will you have one man one vote in one province and another system in another province? I say do as they do in each province—adopt their franchise for the sake of harmony, and do not adopt a hard and fast rule that may conflict with the rule of the province; do not be guilty of the folly that we perpetrated in 1885 of providing two sets of machinery at enormous cost, perplexing the minds of the people, causing confusion, and in every way working detrimentally to the interests of the country. It may be said: this thing cannot last—you will have to go back to a Dominion franchise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. "Hear, hear," I hear. Some men are very wise in this matter.

Mr. CHARLTON.

They do not take the pain to look at the experience of other countries in the very same road that we are now travelling. That is of no consequence to them. Here is a law that they placed on the Statute-book in 1885 for a political purpose. It has served its purpose, and they are in favour of that law because it has been a good friend to them; and they say, forsooth, that it cannot be dispensed with. But I know it can be. Our friends have talked of the example of England, and I have pointed out that we have not followed the example of England at all—that the main features of our law are diametrically opposed to the main features of the English law. It is admitted that our federal union here is to some extent a copy of the first great experiment in the formation of a federal union in the history of the world. That experiment was the formation of the federal union of the thirteen colonies that first constituted the United States. That federal union is the example on which we have acted, on which the Australian colonies are about to act, and on which all federated colonies must act. In that example they can copy what is desirable, and avoid what is undesirable. The American people have not passed exactly through our experience, for they have never had what may be termed a national franchise law. They had a national constitutional convention in 1787, after the first Confederation Act had been found ineffectual. One of the first questions to be decided in that convention was, what should be the character of the machinery by which the members of Congress, the President and the Vice-President of the United States should be elected? How should they ascertain and apply the popular will? That question was debated for weeks. Four propositions were made. One was that the states should elect members of Congress as they now elect senators. Another was that each state should determine the mode in which they should be elected, what men should vote and what men should not vote. Another was that the United States should have a uniform franchise law to be applied in all United States elections, which was similar to our own law. That was rejected, as were the other propositions, and the simple solution of the difficulty arrived at was that the lowest form of franchise used in each state, the franchise for the election of members to the most lower branch of the legislature in the state, the most widely-extended franchise, should be the franchise used in United States elections. That law went into operation in 1790; it has been in operation 107 years; and there never has been the slightest friction under it or the remotest expression of a desire to have it changed. It has been recognized through all that period to be essentially just and to be the only form of franchise that could be worked easily, harmoniously and without friction. Imagine that country adopting a set of machinery for a national franchise, with its revising barristers, its revisions, its lists, its printing of these lists and its distribution of these lists among the 70,000,000 inhabitants of that country. Imagine the confusion that would reign between the list of the nation and the lists of the states. We have had such an experience in this country under this absurd law, and common sense and justice require that this Government should sweep it from the Statute-book at the earliest possible moment.

I do not know that it is necessary to enter with very much greater fulness into the discussion of this question; but I have this to say, that the Dominion franchise law is unique in its character among all the franchise laws in existence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The proposed one.

Mr. CHARLTON. The one which it is proposed to sweep away. There is no law in England corresponding to this. In no other British colony is there a franchise law that places it in the power of the Government of the day to make the list, to alter the list, to print the list, to stuff the list and trample on the rights of the people. I repeat that Canada in this respect occupies a unique position, a position so unique that the sooner we get out of it and return to the old system the better. We are not recommending a novel or untried system. We are simply proposing to return to the principle that was in operation longer than the existing franchise law—a system which was in operation from 1867 to 1885, and which gave evidence by its fruits that it was an excellent system and that no possible reason existed for the substitution of the one now in vogue. I hold, therefore, that this Government is not only warranted but is in duty bound to repeal this law.

Now, some question may exist on our own side of the House as to why the course proposed to be taken is advisable. Some of our friends may perhaps entertain the impression that somehow or other, and to a limited extent at least, the Dominion should exercise some degree of supervision in this matter. Such a position is entirely at variance with the position occupied by the Liberal party on this question from the time it was fought in this House for three months. From 1885 down to this moment the Liberal party has always squarely and unequivocally held the position that the franchise law of this Dominion should be the franchise laws of the different provinces. I will read one amendment that was offered in the course of that memorable struggle, which expressed the position of the Liberal party at the outset; and the party has continued to occupy that position down to the present time. The resolution, which was moved on the 3rd of July, 1885, was as follows:—

Moved by Mr. Charlton :

That the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of amending the same, so as to provide for leaving with the people the control of the voters' list by officers of their own selection; and for avoiding the useless expense of double machinery for preparing voters' lists, the extra expense contingent upon a Dominion Franchise Bill, and the confusion and annoyance to the people resulting from two distinct methods of preparing and revising voters' lists, by providing that each province shall be allowed to judge of the proper requirements for the exercise of franchise within its own limits (inasmuch as the diversities of conditions in different provinces render it difficult, if not impossible, to fix a uniform franchise for the entire Dominion that will fully meet the conditions and wants of each separate province); and that a uniform franchise for each province, for both provincial and Dominion elections, shall be secured, by providing that the voters' lists used in each province, in the elections of members of the Dominion House of Commons, shall be voters' lists in each province prepared under the laws of such province, and in use for the election of members of the House of Assembly of each such province.

That was the distinct position taken by the Liberal party in July, 1885, as regards the Dominion franchise law and the Liberal party has never in the slightest degree departed from that position. The position was a sound one then, it is a sound one now, and the country calls loudly to be relieved from the incubus that has rested upon it in connection with the operation of this Bill. But four revisions have cost the country more than a million dollars. The Government did not dare have an annual revision of the lists, and we usually held our elections on the old lists. The two last elections were held on lists two years old. In consequence of this great cost, in consequence of the cumbersome nature of the machinery, in consequence of the great inconvenience placed upon the electorate of the country in getting themselves placed upon the lists, in consequence of the cost to members of Parliament and candidates of revising the lists, averaging $600 or $700 per riding for each revision, in consequence of all this unnecessary trouble and expenditure to secure a result that would be better secured by a list which costs nothing at all, I hold that the Government are justified in sweeping away this measure and substituting for it the provincial franchises.

Mr. BENNETT. The motion of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is "that the further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the tariff promised by the Government for this session has been disposed of by this House;" and in rising to support that resolution, almost at the outset I congratulate two hon. gentlemen, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on the addresses delivered by them this afternoon. Let me tender, first, my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for North Wellington. Considering the new element in which he found himself, he did fairly well. The hon. gentleman found himself adrift, so to speak, in this respect that he was not able to indulge in his old-time abuse and vituperation of his political opponents, but the hon. gentleman has sufficient of the old leaven left in him to forget occasionally which side he is on, and indulges in a strain that reminded one of his former efforts, and in the course of his rhetoric he has even drifted into scripture. I must confess that my biblical lore will not compare with that of the hon. gentleman, but he recalled to my recollection the fraud that was perpetrated when Jacob, inspired by the evil to which unfortunately mankind is too prone, attempted to defraud his ancient father by passing himself off as his brother Esau. In like manner while the hon. gentleman this afternoon tried to masquerade as a protectionist and while the mask, though not very thick, perhaps might pass, still the voice of McMullen the free trader was there and that voice could not possibly be forgotten. The hon. gentleman, in his remarks on the Franchise Act, set a pace which excited emulation on the part of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who endeavoured to excel him, and I must certainly congratulate that hon. gentleman on the tone of his remarks this afternoon, characterized, though they were, by that acerbity which usually marks his utterances, and which no doubt is due to the fact that the hon. gentleman's exclusion from the Cabinet has not had the effect of mollifying his feelings. Why he should have been treated in the way he was is more than passing strange. In the first place the hon. gentleman had the financial status to entitle him to a place in the Cabinet, and in the Ontario representation that seems to be taken as the standard and not the question of ability at all, because we all recollect how for years and years the hon. Senator from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), while a member of this House, toiled and slaved in the interests of the party only to be cast aside at the last moment in favour of hon. gentlemen who had not a tittle of the claims on the party which he had, if we leave aside the financial point of view. Considering therefore the reflections in which the hon. member for North Norfolk must be indulging to-day, his remarks are not to be wondered at. As usual, he made an attack on the revising officer in his own particular riding, and I would remind hon. members of this House that upon another occasion the hon. gentleman made just as bitter and acrimonious remarks concerning the revision of the lists in his riding, for which he was at once severely taken to task. He was taken to task then because he made statements of a grossly libellous character, and he has made statements equally libellous this afternoon, on the Superintendent of the Printing Bureau at Ottawa, and the revising barrister of his riding. When the hon. gentleman was taken to task last year for his charges of wrong-doing on the part of these gentlemen, what did he say in reply? He said: I do not know that I am warranted in saying it was done in the printing office or that the authorities at Ottawa are responsible, because I imagine it might have occurred in this way, namely, that the revising barrister completed his investigations and left his clerk to make out the lists, and possibly the clerk might have been tampered with. Therefore the remarks of the hon. gentleman in this connection must fall to the ground. If he was honest enough to withdraw the insinuations he made a year ago, surely he will be honourable enough to-day to withdraw the reflections he has made on the revising barrister or the Superintendent of the Printing Bureau, and no doubt he will again attach the blame, not to the Superintendent of the Printing Bureau or the revising barrister, but to some other person, for tampering with the lists.

In reply to the sweeping denunciations of the hon. gentleman of the characters of some people, let me say that within the walls of this building, are the original lists made up by the judges in the different districts from one end of the Dominion to the other. The hon. gentleman can have access to those lists, he can examine the handwriting and make a comparison to ascertain whether the lists have been tampered with. There rests an excellent opportunity for the hon. gentleman to give free play to that curiosity which so thoroughly possesses him and discover for himself whether any wrong-doing existed.

The hon. gentleman at the outset charged that there was fraud perpetrated in the original making-up of the lists. I would ask the hon. gentleman, who revised the lists for the Dominion elections in the province of Ontario? Are they not the county court judges? Are they not the very men before whom will come the revision of these self-same voters' lists? One would imagine that in the revision of these lists there were employed none but parliamentary hacks, but the hon. gentleman knows well that even in his own constituency the lists are revised by the very same judge in the Dominion elections who revises them for the local elections. Now, what does the hon. gentleman say? He did not go into details. He did not place side by side the local lists and the Dominion lists, as they are prepared, and submit them to the judgment of the House, as they are prepared in the province of Ontario. Now, Sir, what is the system of preparing the local lists in the province of Ontario? After the municipal council is formed each year, it is their duty to appoint an assessor, and early in the year—some time in the month of February, I believe—the assessor, having received his list, goes about the different municipalities, to do what? In the province of Ontario every man is entitled to have his name on the list of voters for candidates for the local legislature who is of the age of twenty-one years and is a British subject, regardless of whether he has property or not. The assessor's list is made up to include the names of such persons, and is then returned to the clerk. Then there is held in the municipality a court under the control of the municipal council itself, when an appeal can be heard of those who wish to have their names on the list. This is held about June or July. But the matter is not concluded there. The next move is that any party that feels aggrieved with the conduct of the municipality has an appeal to the county court judge; and the county court judge, in turn, holds a court later on in the different municipalities of the county; and it is very often away on in the month of November or December when the list for the year is completed. Now, the hon. gentleman says that in the preparation of the Dominion voters' list, where the same county judge takes the self-same assessment roll and fills it up, after announcement that he will receive applications of parties entitled to be placed upon the list, it is the self-same judge who holds this court. The hon. gentleman would have us believe that when this judge holds court for the Dominion lists he is the villain in the play, and if he is deciding as to the local lists he is quite honest and above-board. What a farcical proposition to place before right-thinking men. One would suppose there was an imaginary line separating the Liberals and Conservatives, and on the Liberal side all holiness and purity, and on the other all wickedness and vileness. I propose to show you—and I am not going to cast reflection upon the Liberal party as a whole—how the revision of the voters' list is carried on in certain cases. I will say that in my own riding, man for man, the Conservatives are as respectable as the Liberals, and in the revision of the list, whether for the local or federal, the Conservatives certainly had more to redound to their credit than had the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, it is argued in the first place, that the cost is enormous and the hon. gentleman figures that a million dollars has been spent in the four revisions of the lists, or an average of a quarter of a million upon each. That that is the case I do not deny, but that the local lists will cost fully as much I am here to affirm and to prove. Why, Sir, one would imagine that these local lists were revised and completed throughout the whole province of Ontario without cost to anybody. The fact is, that while for the Dominion franchise the cost has been borne by the country, yet for the local lists it is borne by the several municipalities. The hon. gentleman says that the cost is all on one side. Let me tell him that, taking the average of ten municipalities to a riding—and that is a low average—after a close investigation and scrutiny, any revision of the local list must be at a cost of at least $100 to each municipality. And I will tell you why. In the first place, certain fees are allowed to the county court judge, who revises the lists. In the second place, while we have an inexpensive manner of summoning men to appear before the court under the Dominion franchise law—merely notifying them by letter to appear—under the provincial law you have to personally serve every man against whom you are appealing. The result is that the cost of a revision in any township runs up, as I know they have done in my own riding, to the sum of $100 or over. And that cost is borne by the municipalities. Now, take ten municipalities to the average riding, and you have a cost to each riding of $1,000. If in each of 213 ridings the same thing happens, there is an aggregate expense cast upon the municipalities of close upon $200,000. Now, the hon. gentleman says that heretofore we have only had this occasionally. But I would remind him that if there is going to be this close scrutiny of the local lists each year in order to meet by-elections and elections that come unexpectedly, that expense would have to be borne every year by the municipality, and not once every four or five years as at present.

Now, for the edification of the hon. gentleman, and in order to convince him—because I believe he is a doubting Thomas—that there can be good on our side of the House and villainy on his side, I have some newspaper references to the revision of the lists in East Simcoe. In the revision of 1894, knowing that the elections were coming on, we on the Conservative side in that riding put forth our best efforts to have a fair and honest voters' list. And, when the revision was over, we found how essential and necessary it was. I will read some references showing how the Liberals in that riding sought to carry on the revision of the voters' lists. The following is from the Orillia "Packet," of September 29th, and the judge is the same judge who revised the Dominion lists:

Judge Ardagh found a pretty stiff piece of work cut out for him, when he came, last Monday, to hold the voters' list court for the township of Orillia. The net results of His Honour's labours, assisted by representatives of both political parties, is as follows:—The Conservatives had fifty-five names put on and forty-one struck off. This does not make account of two names put on for which both sides had appealed. The net gain for the Conservatives on the day's doings is eighty-seven. Thirty-two cases were adjourned till October 16th. Of these only one is a Liberal appeal. Of the remaining thirty-one, twenty-eight are appeals against the names of men who cannot be found, who are returned by the pathmasters as not having done statute labour.

I fancy how the hon. gentleman shudders as he thinks of this being done by a good Liberal assessor and of having 126 Liberal names struck off the list or their admission refused; and, at the same time, I can believe that the hon. gentleman will writhe in agony to think that the Grit plot did not go through; because we only carried the riding by 124, so that if we had not been successful in nipping this nefarious plot in the bud the hon. gentleman's friends might have carried the riding. When the assessor was put in the box and placed under oath, he admitted that he had had names handed to him of men he did not know, whose place of residence he did not know, he knew nothing about them, but that prominent Liberals in the riding had handed him the names, and these names had been distributed hap-hazard here and there through the assessment roll. What was the idea? Why, to carry these from the assessment roll to the voters' list and leave to their friends in East Simcoe, if they had succeeded in getting the names on the list, to find on polling day men to fit the names, which is an old trick of theirs.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BENNETT. When the House rose at six o'clock, and before that time, I had been devoting myself to two phases of the Franchise Act; firstly, that the preparation of the list under the Dominion Franchise Act was as free and as fair as any preparation of the voters' lists under the local legislatures and under the municipal councils; and I made this further claim, that it is impossible to have at any time a voters' list that will be perfect in its entirety. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) pointed to the fact that in some of the recent elections the voters' list used were compiled some two years or a year and a half before. Well, all I have to say in answer to that is that naturally it is utterly impossible to have a voters' list revised down to each day, or even down to each month, or down to each year; and if to-day an election should take place in any one of the four divisions of the city of Toronto, the result would be that they would vote on a list compiled in the year 1894; because in the cities under the local Act, there is a kind of registration in force which bring about the result I have mentioned, and the registration only takes place immediately prior to the election being held. Now, a few words as to the cost. I contend that under a preparation of the local voters' list in view of an approaching Dominion election, great interest would be evinced by both political parties, that the same interest that now attached to a Dominion revision would appear in the event of a local revision, and that being the case,

Mr. BENNETT.

there would be cast an expense of at least $1,000 on each riding, or an aggregate of $213,000 odd for the whole Dominion, which would not come out of the Dominion exchequer, but would come directly out of the municipalities. As I pointed out prior to six o'clock, a great deal more expense is occasioned in revising a local voters' list than is occasioned in revising a Dominion voters' list. Now, I am free to admit that to pay $213,000 for a revision of the Dominion voters' list, is a matter to which every importance should be attached; but at the same time I do not believe that every principle of fair-play should be dependent upon what it would cost; and I may repeat here what I have said before in this House in a discussion of the Franchise Act, that if the local municipalities are not prepared to afford that spirit of fair-play that should be afforded to all classes of the electorate, this Parliament should fight to the bitter end any attempt to take away that right of citizenship, because the right of voting is the dearest right of citizenship to every elector. Now, suppose for instance, that to-day in the province of Nova Scotia there was to be an assumption of the local list rather than the Dominion list; the result would be, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it full well, the deprivation of a large number of electors of the right of recording their votes at a parliamentary election. Take the case of Annapolis county which, I understand, is represented by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, Mr. Longley. That gentleman was successful in carrying that riding for the local election; and why? Because he was able to deprive a large number of Dominion employees of their votes, but when it came to a federal election and all men had a right to vote in that constituency, the hon. gentleman suffered a defeat at the hands of the hon. member who represents that riding in this House. So you can go from one province to another, and the voters' lists have been and are used to-day, not to afford fair-play but rather to secure at all times and at all hazards a party advantage. Now, Sir, as has been pointed out in the course of the debate on the Franchise Act this session, there is no immediate requirement for the passage of this Act. The First Minister has announced that in all probability there will be no general election for four years to come, at all events; and in that view of the case, is it not better to postpone from the present time until a future session of this Parliament, any interference with the franchise as it exists to-day, and wait and allow the provinces to endeavour to assimilate their franchises and place them one and all on a common basis. Now, Sir, the feeling that the provinces are antagonistic to the Dominion, should be swept away, and it is not going to be swept away until they are shown the full responsibility that rests upon their shoulders. To the local legislatures the disbursing of a large sum of money by the Dominion in the matter of the preparation of a voters' list, is and must be a matter of serious import; and in view of the fact that the Dominion Parliament and local legislatures have one and a common interest, why should they not endeavour to meet upon a common basis, and say that in all these provinces the franchise shall be alike? If that is done it would be much easier for this House, or for the Federal Government, to embrace an opportunity that would be afforded by the provinces to meet upon a common basis. Now, Sir, in regard to the resolution that was moved by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) last week, in face of the fact that the Government have made the announcement that next Tuesday, the 22nd instant, they are going to bring down their fiscal policy, there is not perhaps that serious demand that there was at the outset of this debate for the resolution of the member for York. But, still I think, in view of the fact that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have in the past, and whose predecessors have for the past eighteen years, laid down the principle that a protective policy was in the best interest of this Dominion, the intervening days should be seized by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to impress upon the Government the necessity of the maintenance of that policy which has been in force for the past eighteen years. It is true that hon. gentlemen opposite take fits and starts, so to speak, in their announcements about the tariff. One hon. gentleman holds out the bludgeon, while the next comes along in the most entertaining way, and says, in the words of the fable: "Will you walk into my parlour, says the spider to the fly?" This afternoon we heard from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and I am sure that to the protected industries of this country his remarks can carry no consolation. That hon. gentleman, speaking of the tariff, said this, and I presume that he speaks with some little authority, because he speaks so often that he should have some authority:

No hostile feeling lies in the breast of the Government to any business interest that can hope to exist, but the duty of the Government will be to assail all the combined interests of the country.

Now, these hon. gentlemen have been for years before the public, on the platform, through the press, and in this House, declaring their policy. When one individual speaking for himself has made any statement, it may be fair to say that upon himself alone must rest the responsibility; but when the leader of a great party makes statements and makes announcements, it must be expected that he is warranted in making them, and that the party has a right to be bound by the statements that he makes. Sir, the more serious import is when hon. gentlemen do not make these statements at hap-hazard, but coolly and deliberately. Now, only a few years ago there was held in this city of Ottawa a great national convention of the Liberal party, and on that occasion the present First Minister made speeches of a very sweeping nature. Referring to the protected industries of this country, he said:

Let it be well understood, then, that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the Liberal-Conservative party now in power. Their ideal is protection; our ideal is free trade. Their important object is protection, ours is a tariff for revenue, and for revenue only; and upon this issue we engage in battle.

Sir, later on those hon. gentlemen went before the electorate of this country bound in what is commonly known as campaign literature, and in that literature they make a direct onslaught on certain large protected industries of this country. For instance, speaking of the cotton manufacture, which is a large industry in this country, in a pamphlet published by the Liberal party and issued throughout the province of Ontario, we find this statement:

Mr. Edgar stated in the House of Commons—and the correctness of his statements has never been challenged—that the raw cotton fell in cost, between 1890 and 1893, one cent and six mills a pound. This, on the enormous quantity imported of about forty millions of pounds, amounted alone to a profit of $660,000. * * * In other words, on the $4,500,000 worth imported a tax of $1,260,000 is paid, which goes into the treasury, and on the $13,000,000 worth of cotton manufactured, an equivalent tax of $3,640,000 is paid, which goes into the coffers of the combines.

The hon. gentleman assailed the cotton industry of this country as a combine, and this afternoon the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) declared that this Government would wage war directly against combines. No wonder that to-day in Cornwall, where there are magnificent cotton factories which every member of the House would do well to visit, those factories which have been running for years, are closed. I was there a few weeks ago, and it would be a matter for regret to every hon. member as it was to me, to see those immense cotton factories standing idle, the looms silent, while in the streets were the men, women and children who were usually employed there. The owners have taken hon. gentlemen opposite at their word; and to-day we have had it announced by leading members of their party that this is one of the combines that is to be attacked. True, the hon. gentleman did not say specifically: we are disposed and propose to assail the cotton industry; but hon. gentlemen have bound themselves in the past, both by speeches in this House and by issuing campaign literature all over the country, that if there is an industry in the country which they intend to strike, not with a gentle hand but with a rude hand, it is the cotton industry. Let me tell hon.

gentlemen opposite that if you go to Cornwall to-day you do not hear any voice of inquiry as to whether the Government are going to pass a Franchise Act, as to what amount is to be spent on public works, but the one and sole inquiry is, when will there be something definite and decisive known on the tariff which so vitally affects the cotton industry in which we are so generally greatly interested? So hon. gentlemen opposite to-day should be appealed to by hon. members on this side of the House, should be appealed to honestly and fairly as we have appealed to them in the past, and asked to allow the vast cotton industry, which has been threatened, and which has been affected by the threats which hon. gentlemen have made, to stand as in the past, and give to Canada what it requires, large manufacturing interests, whether they may be in Cornwall or in any other part of the Dominion.

But there is another industry which hon. gentlemen have threatened. Throughout Ontario, I care not where the party platform was put forward, and also on the floor of this House, there was the plea made that the agricultural implement industry was one of the vilest combines that ever existed in any country. What did hon. gentlemen promise? The other evening the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) quoted utterances made by the First Minister here and there, and what were his statements relative to the iron and coal industries? He pointed out that other articles entered into this industry, and said that we are unable to reduce the price of the manufactured articles by reason of the fact that the raw material is highly taxed, and if we come into power, by sweeping away the duties on raw material, we will be able to give the manufacturers cheaper raw materials and thus the price of the manufactured article will be reduced. How is that promise to be kept? Hon. gentlemen opposite have already announced that the coal industry of Nova Scotia is not to be affected; and manufacturers are told in the same breath that instead of obtaining free coal, their coal imported from the United States must be taxed as in the past. Not only is the First Minister responsible for those statements, but every prominent member of the Cabinet is responsible, for they have at all times made those same statements. I recollect well the vigorous language used by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) on one occasion, when rising in the might of his energy to denounce protection, not only did he declare it a system to be disapproved of, but he said that it was accursed by God and man. What is the hon. gentleman proposing to do to-day? He was one of those who was pleading for cheap farm implements for the farmers of western Ontario, and he was going to bring that result about by reducing the duties on coal and iron, and he declared that when they had been reduced the farmers would get the benefit; but to-day the farmers must be told, inferentially, that no favours are to be accorded to them. Well, I could go on and discuss one item and another in the tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite have from time to time assailed, and which to-day they are at issue upon, and so we must wait in expectancy to hear what announcements will be made. But if the protected industries of this country are injuriously affected by the statements made from time to time, the manufacturers may at least obtain a little consolation from the fact that in the Estimates brought down the Finance Minister has provided for equally as large a revenue as was provided in the past year. And not only so, but they have provided for even more, because while to-day their proposed expenditure for the next year is almost on a par with the expenditure of last year, this must not be lost sight of, that the Finance Minister has not brought down what no doubt will be bulky, heavy and vast Supplementary Estimates, which are yet to come. From that fact the industries of the country may take hope and courage, and may believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are yet going to keep up the tariff that has existed in the past, and which I hope will be continued in the years that are to come. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that the tariff must be and will be simply a tariff for revenue. All I have to say in that regard is this: If they propose to follow out a tariff revenue policy on the line of the English tariff, then recourse must be had, not to a tariff such as exists here to-day, but to direct imposition of taxes on certain articles such as are imposed in England, on coffee, tea, and other articles I might mention. But while the manufacturers and protected industries of Canada are held like Mahommed's coffin between the sky and the earth, while they are held in doubt as to what is to be done respecting them, hon. gentlemen opposite come to the rescue with the announcement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon, that even on such a trivial matter as the Franchise Bill they are not in accord and are not all of one sentiment. This afternoon that hon. gentleman in his position as one of the Liberal Nestors dealt with some of the refractory members and told them that while they might not all agree on certain matters, they should forget the past and endeavour to come in line on one basis. I ask the hon. member for North Norfolk, is he prepared to come in on this tariff Bill that the Government may bring down? If they are prepared to bring down a tariff Bill practically in agreement with the tariff which has existed for eighteen years, and it is accepted by the hon. gentleman, he must greatly belie his past record. He has not been one of those advocates of free trade as it is in England; the hon. gentleman in past years has been a free trader, and not only so but he has been something more, and on every occasion and at every opportunity he has endeavoured to voice his sentiments, and when the hon. gentleman's sentiments did not meet with very hearty recognition and support in Ontario or any of the other provinces, he went across the line, where he knew he would meet with a more hearty reception. I ask the hon. gentleman where he stands on the tariff question? Is he in favour of retaining and perpetuating the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, or the reverse? On 28th January last, the hon. gentleman went to North Tonawanda, as he had a perfect right to do. The hon. gentleman had a perfect right to go any place where he might expect to find an appreciative audience, and so he went there and made a speech on trade relations between the people of the United States and this country. I will not weary the House by reading the whole of his speech. Hon. members have heard the hon. gentleman so often, and I trust they will hear him often again, that I may dispense with the reading of his remarks in full, but I will read the vital and important part as showing the ideas on which the hon. gentleman believes a trade policy should be framed in behalf of Canada. His views were thus briefly expressed:

He then took up the question of annexation. The only way it can be accomplished would be to bring about a closer commercial policy. We feel that it is necessary to obliterate the present tariff, and that a more liberal and extended trade policy will have a most salutary effect on our prosperity. "We are a small country in every respect except territory," concluded Mr. Charlton. "and, as small bodies are attracted to larger ones, so also are we attracted to the larger country south of us."

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a correction. I do not know, Sir, from what source the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) quotes the language put in my mouth as being part of my speech at North Tonawanda. I disclaim that report of my language and I pronounce it false. I had occasion to call the attention of the pastor of the church at Tonawanda in which the lecture was delivered, to certain statements made in the Conservative press of Canada with regard to that lecture. The Rev. E. K. Sanborn, pastor of the church, wrote to the Toronto "Globe" and gave an epitome of the lecture which I delivered in Tonawanda. The reverend gentleman gave an explicit denial to the statements that were made concerning that lecture. These statements appeared first in the Toronto "World," and the "World" had the fairness to publish the refutation of the statement which came from the Rev. Mr. Sanborn. My lecture at Tonawanda was devoted to the consideration of Canadian matters; physical, political and historical. I took distinctly the ground that Canada had resources to accommodate a population of one hundred million souls.

Mr. FOSTER. Surely you are not going to give us all that speech again.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am going to give a few lines in order to correct the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett). I took the ground that while Canada wished more intimate commercial relations with the United States, that the people of this country did not desire to part with their autonomy, that their intention was to build up a nationality here, and that while they expected and hoped to live upon terms of amity with their neighbours, yet, they had no intention of adopting any policy that would sever the connection which exists between this country and Great Britain. I said at Tonawanda, that Canadians intended to shape their destiny in such a way as to serve their own interests in building up a nation on the northern half of this continent. That is an outline of my address at Tonawanda, and the statement to which reference has been made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is utterly and entirely false—and is maliciously false.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member (Mr. Charlton) cannot accuse my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) of saying what is maliciously false.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Charlton) cannot accuse another hon. member of making a statement which is maliciously false.

Mr. CHARLTON. I did not attribute it to the member himself, but to the author of the statement as it appeared in the press.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to say, by way of defence, if any defence is needed, that the clipping I read was from the file of the Toronto "Mail" of about the date of 28th January, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) was incorrectly reported by the Toronto "Mail," he has recourse against that newspaper. I have to say, that I never saw any denial, nor apology, either in the "Mail" newspaper, of which I am a fairly close reader, or in the "World."

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) must accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton).

Mr. CHARLTON. I will take occasion as a matter of privilege to read the letter of the Rev. E. K. Sanborn upon the first occasion that offers.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) will accept the denial.

Mr. BENNETT. I certainly accept the denial of the hon. gentleman. I thought I was doing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) a compliment when I gave him the credit for his frankness. I thought I was paying him a high compliment, because surely it cannot be that he has receded from the position he has taken in this House in the past. Everybody must recollect the attitude of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), in regard to the lumber duty, when he himself admitted on the floor of this House, that he cast himself adrift from his party, and upon his own responsibility did what he pleased. And, sitting in his place upon that occasion, the present First Minister, said, that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had that great privilege that is always accorded to every member of the Liberal party, to do exactly what they are doing to-day—each one think and act for himself. Sir, I was about to make an appeal to the hon. gentleman. In view of the fact that that great party that once was heard so much about in the country and had so little votes in this House—the Third party—now, that it is decimated and cut to pieces through over one-third of the whole party being lost at the general elections; I thought that perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) might cut himself adrift from his own party, and as a political Ishmaelite be embraced with open arms into their camp.

I cannot believe, and I cannot conceive, that hon. gentlemen opposite are going against their own interests on this tariff question, and I hope and trust that when the tariff is brought down, that, in the interests of the great manufacturing industries of Canada, should there be any slashing and cutting of the tariff such as was prophesied by the hon. member from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that hon. gentlemen opposite, irrespective of party, will join with us in protecting the best interests of the country as a whole. Sir, coming down to my own constituency, and its wants, and requirements—for I believe, secondly, it is the duty of every hon. gentleman in this House to ask for careful consideration in the matter of the tariff in regard to the interests which closely concern his own riding. I have, therefore, an appeal to make to the Government in regard to the carriage industry. In the town of Orillia there is an important carriage industry employing upwards of one hundred men. It has a large pay roll, and the owners of that factory have noticed with alarm that, year after year, the importations in their line from the United States have been increasing. I find from the returns, that while 832 buggies and vehicles were imported in 1895; last year, 1896, there were 1,564 imported, or nearly twice as many.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) be good enough to connect that argument with the motion before the House.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), as I understand it, is that the tariff is of much greater importance than the Franchise Bill, and surely a vital part of the tariff must be the interest of a large carriage industry in this country, and it is from that point of view that I direct the argument. Now, Sir, there is another vast industry in that northern country, which to-day is waiting with bated breath to see the attitude of the Government in respect to it. I refer to the lumber industry. What is the attitude of this Government on that question? The United States have announced, by what is known as the Dingley Bill, that upon every thousand feet of lumber passing from Canada to the United States, there shall be an import duty of $2. From all I can learn, and from what I believe to be the fact, the imposition of such an enormous import duty will result in practically driving out of the American market our present large lumber trade. The other day the Minister of Finance was waited upon by a large and representative delegation from that northern country. They asked that if the United States persisted in placing that duty on lumber, then that some steps should be taken by this country in a retaliatory way, and that our tariff should be so arranged that in the event of the American Government charging more than $1 a thousand upon Canadian white pine, there should be placed a prohibitory duty on saw logs exported from this country to the United States. I trust that that matter will receive the most careful consideration of the Government, and that it will result in this: that if the United States people are not prepared to deal fairly on the question of lumber duties, then, while it may not be a policy which we may wish to take, by way of reprisal this Government should stand firm and adopt the policy advocated. To-day the tariff is receiving a vast amount of attention from the business people of Canada, and I believe that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would be prepared to forego their holidays, if the Government would even this week, bring down their tariff policy. That, Sir, I suppose is hardly to be expected. I trust, however, that the Government of the day will carefully consider all the overtures that have been made to them from business men throughout this entire Dominion, that they will consider every argument that has been adduced by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and that they will also listen to the words of wisdom that have fallen from prominent members of the Senate on the Liberal side. In moving the Address last week in the Senate the hon. Mr. Cox said, very judiciously and wisely:

The importance to this country of the tariff legislation foreshadowed cannot be over-estimated. It is a matter fraught with consequences too serious to be influenced by the campaign speeches made by either political party under circumstances quite different from those that now exist.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will claim, and I think will be entitled to sympathy if they make a great political somersault. But I can only say that it is better for the vast manufacturing and all other industries of this country that hon. gentlemen opposite, from that sturdy advocate of free trade, the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) down to the lowliest and humblest member of the party, should take a political somersault rather than that there should be such an interference with the tariff of this country as to undo the good that it has accomplished in the last fifteen years, and destroy our bright expectations for the future so long as that policy is continued.

Mr. CALVERT. Mr. Speaker, as one member who has not occupied much of the time of this House, but who has been an interested listener to the arguments of hon. gentlemen on both sides, I desire to make a few remarks on the question now under consideration. I believe I am expressing the sentiments of my constituents when I say that I am heartily in accord with the principles of the Bill presented to this House by the hon. the Solicitor General. I think I can clearly understand why the late Government forced upon the people of this country an Act which I know did not meet with the approval of a large number of Conservatives. They did so simply because it assisted them in connection with the voters' lists. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) who has just taken his seat; but there is one point in his remarks to which I take exception. I cannot believe that his estimate of the expense in connection with the voters' lists is exactly correct. My hon. friend says that it costs about $1,000 in each riding. He has correctly stated that after a municipal council is formed, it selects its assessors; that the assessor then goes round and prepares his list; that after that a Court of Revision is held by the council, and that there is an appeal finally from the Court of Revision to the county judge. I have had the honour of representing a municipality in the county of Middlesex for a number of years; and during that time we never had occasion to appeal to the county judge, and I do not know of any municipality that has had to do so except on rare occasions. If it cost $1,000 for the municipal lists in each riding, then why under the sun should we insist on having a dual system, whereby the cost would be doubled? There is not only the cost of about a quarter of a million dollars for each revision under the Dominion Franchise Act, but also the cost to the Liberal candidates and their friends and the cost to the Conservative candidates and their friends, which together would involve a sum equal to if not more than the direct cost. In the constituency of West Middlesex the late revising barrister took the old lists of 1891 as a basis, consequently we were compelled to put on or strike off three or four thousand names; and when you take into consideration the large number of constituencies in the Dominion of Canada, the number of municipalities in those constituencies and the number of subdivisions in those municipalities, you can realize the amount of trouble and expense connected with the preparation of the lists. I saw an estimate that it cost the Liberal party $150,000 to prepare the lists in the last revision, and it must have cost the Conservative party an equal amount; so that you have a cost of $300,000 to the two parties, added to the $250,000 paid out of the Treasury, or over half a million dollars, for the preparation of the lists. As the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has said, we have a list prepared by the municipalities every year. He says that costs over $200,000 each year. I do not think it costs that much; but even assuming that it does, why is it necessary for us to prepare another list? But unless we prepare a list every year, which cannot be done except at enormous expense, we are compelled to vote on a list two years old, as we did in the last election. What does that mean? It means that thousands of young men who came of age from 1894 to 1896 are debarred from casting their vote, although compelled to pay their share of the expenses in connection with this iniquitous Act. Not only that, but thousands of men who sold out and left this country and took up their abode under the Stars and Stripes, are allowed to come back to this country and cast their votes against honest men who are compelled to bear their share of the expense. I need not dwell on that subject. I believe in the principle of one man one vote, which is in operation in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) asked why we should have the principle of one man one vote in Ontario when in the province of Quebec a man might vote three or four times. I am in favour of the principle of one man one vote. Why should a man, simply because he owns five or six pieces of property, situated in five or six constituencies, cast a vote for five or six candidates, while a man who may own property ten times the value, situated in one constituency, has the right to cast but one vote. I do not think it is right, but if the people of the province of Quebec are prepared to continue that system, I do not see why we in Ontario should find any fault with them. I am in favour of the principle which holds in Ontario. I think a man should vote where he lives, and I do not think he should vote simply because he owns a few pieces of property. If this Bill be passed, as proposed by the Government, we shall be free to vote in Ontario under the Ontario system. It may be necessary to have some amendments made. I do not think it embraces the privilege of manhood suffrage, as we have it in the cities and certain towns of Ontario. If that is not in the measure, I am very much in favour of having it inserted, because it will save a large amount of yearly expense. It will save the Liberal and Conservative candidates and their friends a great deal of trouble looking after the young men whom they are anxious to have placed on the lists, as they will have the privilege of having them registered a certain time before the election. It will consequently save the municipalities a large amount of money now expended by them in having these names printed on the lists year after year. I must say that I congratulate the Government on bringing down their measures as expeditiously as they have. They made certain promises to the people and those promises they are rapidly fulfilling. They promised to bring in an alien labour Bill, and such a Bill has been brought in by my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan). They promised certain changes in connection with superannuation, and a Bill providing for these changes has been submitted to us. Then, they promised a revision of the tariff and that subject will be shortly engaging the attention of the House.

I may be permitted to extend my congratulations to my hon. leader in connection with the settlement of the school question. I am quite sure that the settlement he has achieved will meet with the approval of every Liberal and of nine-tenths of the Conservatives in the west riding of Middlesex. Sir, the Liberal party have long since learned to recognize in our chieftain the qualities of a great leader, combining the marvellous gift of eloquence with that keen discernment so necessary for the proper consideration of public questions, and with a breadth of view which knows no provincial lines, but embraces this vast Dominion and the glorious Empire of which we form a part. And now, surrounded, as he is, by some of the ablest statesmen from the provinces, whose names are synonymous with integrity, sterling honesty and unfailing championship of the people's rights: I am heartily in accord with the Government on this, as well as other questions, and sincerely trust this measure will be adopted by the House.

Mr. CRAIG. I have no intention of delaying the House long, but merely rise to give some reasons why I support the amendment of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). I shall not discuss either the present law or the Bill submitted to us. I know that there are a great many objections to the present franchise law, and I am sure that most of the people of this country would be glad to see it improved. I have that feeling myself very strongly, but while I admit that, I am not prepared to admit that the proposed Bill is an improvement on the present Act. There are objections to the present law. There is no doubt it is expensive and difficult to work. There is no doubt it is not only expensive to the country at large but to the candidates as well, but admitting all that, if we are to repeal the present law, we ought to replace it by something better? Looking over the present Bill, I have come to the conclusion that it is not an improvement. However, I do not propose to discuss that point at present. I do not propose to go into the details of the measure and point out its imperfections, but what I wish to say is this, that in framing a new franchise law, some time should be taken and great care should be shown to have the law as perfect as possible. To my mind, the franchise should not be a party question at all, and I do not think it would be, if we looked upon it in the proper light. A good franchise law is important to every man in this country. What is its object? It is that every man who has the right to vote should enjoy that right. We know that that is a very difficult object to attain, and I repeat again that, in order to frame a good law, great care is required and considerable time and close study. It seems to me that the Government have not taken very much time to consider the Bill they have presented to us for our approval. Instead of going on and improving on the present law, they have gone back to an old law which we had some eighteen or nineteen years ago. Of course it was very easy and simple to say that this system which was in force some eighteen or twenty years ago, or perhaps eleven or twelve years ago, was a good one, and we will go right back to it. It is a very easy way of getting rid of the difficulty to say: No doubt that old law had its imperfections, but we have been always so opposed to the present franchise law, we have considered it, in the language of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) such an infamous measure that we are willing almost to take anything in its place. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think, with all deference to the legal authorities in the Cabinet, that that system is the one we should adopt in framing legislation. While I admit that the present franchise law has its imperfections, I desire to see it replaced by a better and not by a worse one. When I look at this Bill, what do I find? I find that it is very lengthy, that it contains 158 sections, that it makes some very considerable changes, and that considerable time and study must be expended to master its details. If we want to act intelligently in this matter, what should we do? We ought to study the systems of the various provinces in the Dominion and find out how they work, because we are called on now to pronounce in favour of these systems. And you must remark, Mr. Speaker, that these systems are all different. How then, when we have, as we shall shortly have, such an important subject before us as the tariff, which will occupy of itself all the remaining time of the session, can we be expected to study and intelligently discuss this question of the franchise as it ought to be studied and discussed and frame a law which will meet the necessities of the case. Let me point out one or two objections which occur to me at the moment. The first is that this Bill gives the provinces control of the franchise for this Dominion. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) argued that that was perfectly correct.

He declared that the provinces should control. Why? Because, he said, we come here to represent certain ridings, which ridings are part of the province, and therefore the provinces should make these lists. I think he should have carried the argument a little further. He should have gone on to say that these provinces are part of the Dominion, and therefore the Dominion should prepare the franchise for the provinces, and not the provinces for the Dominion. I think that that is a perfectly legitimate argument from the premises laid down by the hon. gentleman. I think it would be more reasonable that the supreme authority should frame the franchise for the provinces than that the provinces, which have inferior jurisdiction, should frame the franchise for this last court of appeal in the Dominion. It is a very strange objection, to my mind, this taking from the Dominion the control of the franchise and placing it with the provinces.

Another point is made with reference to one man one vote. Personally I should be very glad to see that principle incorporated in the Franchise Act; but, as was well pointed out to-day, we would not have that all over the Dominion, but we would have it in one province and not in another. But there is one great objection, to my mind, to passing this measure, and that is the temptation that would be offered the provincial governments to use this franchise for party purposes. Now, it has been urged as a very strong objection to this Franchise Act which we have at present, that the Dominion Government used it for party purposes. But I ask, what would be the difference between the Dominion Government using the Franchise Act for party purposes and the provincial governments using it for party purposes? Of course it is said that the provincial governments are too honest to do such a thing, but that the Dominion Government is not honest enough to be depended upon to resist this temptation. I hold that the Dominion Government is as honest as the provincial governments.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. I say that regardless of what party is in power. I am willing to grant that the Government in power here is as honest as the provincial governments. Not only that, but while we have one Dominion Government which might be tempted in this way, we have a great many provincial governments, and, I may say without slander, that some of them have not shown themselves above using the franchise for party purposes. I take it that it would not be hard to find cases where that has been done. And the objection is a very strong one, because when this is done we have no redress. Another great objection is that under some of the franchises existing under provincial laws a great number of citizens are disfranchised. They were disfranchised at a time when it was supposed they would vote for the Conservative party. I do not know whether, in committee, any arrangement will be made to give these men votes, but if this were done, it would show clearly how unfairly this Act could be used. Men employed on the Intercolonial Railway in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, men earning, perhaps, a dollar a day, were deprived of their franchise because they were in the employ of the Government, and because, I suppose, it was assumed that if they voted they would vote Conservative.

Mr. MACDONALD. The same in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CRAIG. Just so, and I think this is a very strong objection. If the franchise were framed in this House no hon. member would stand up and advocate the disfranchisement of men because they earned a dollar or a dollar and a half a day working on Government railways or in any capacity under the Government. These men have as good a right to vote as I have. I have mentioned these cases merely to show that provincial governments would have the opportunity of using the franchise for party purposes, and might deprive men of their votes for the benefit of their party.

My conclusion is that the Government should leave this whole question of the franchise over to next session. I maintain that they have ample work to do this session, and I say, further, that this is not a pressing matter. There is no need for a new Franchise Act just now. We have no hope on this side of the House—at least speaking for myself personally, I have no hope—of putting hon. gentlemen opposite out of office for three or four years, when the next general election comes on. I do not know why there should be such a hurry to have this Bill passed unless gentlemen opposite are afraid that they will not be able to agree and the Government will split to pieces before long. Looking from the outside, it seems to me that they ought to be able to hang together for three or four years. This being so, there is no need for this Franchise Bill. If we take it up next session, we shall have had time to consider it. It was a good thing to introduce it this session, in order that hon. members may have the opportunity of considering the matter. If it is possible to lay aside party feeling and frame a Bill for the benefit of the whole country, I shall be glad to support a measure of that kind. But it has been stated by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that the reason why it is absolutely necessary that we should have this franchise is because of the plebiscite. I think he was well answered by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who asked why the provincial voters' list could not be used for the plebiscite.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask if hon. gentlemen opposite intend to run the business of the House, or if they will leave it to the Government to do that?

Mr. CRAIG. We are going to help the Government to do it. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) if he is part of the Government? I have just been wondering where the Government is: I do not see any of them in their places. I do not suppose they have resigned, but they must have something very important on hand if they have not time to listen to this discussion. I see in their places the two Controllers, and I am very glad to see them. However, I submit that what I have said is a complete answer to the objection raised by the hon. gentleman for North Wellington.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, no.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman says "no." But I fancy he does not want to be persuaded. It would seem that he is not satisfied with the provincial lists, for the plebiscite, but would be quite satisfied with the provincial lists for elections for the Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAIG. Certainly.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) is a pronounced temperance man. But, while he is perfectly satisfied with the provincial lists to decide the question of temperance, he is not satisfied with the provincial lists for the elections of members for Parliament.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman says that I am a pronounced temperance man. I do not take that as an insult at all. He says, further, that I am quite satisfied to have the plebiscite held on provincial lists, but I am not satisfied to have members of this House elected on provincial lists. Now that is entirely out of the question, and I will tell you why. I object to going on with this Franchise Bill for the reason I have stated, namely, that I want as perfect a measure as possible when we do frame such a Bill, and I hold that the measure submitted to the House is not much of an improvement on the present Franchise Act. Now, I would only consent to take a plebiscite vote on the provincial lists, because the hon. gentlemen opposite say these provincial lists are all right to elect members of the House upon. I take them at their own word, they are satisfied. An hon. gentleman opposite says: I am not satisfied to elect members on it. But I say he is satisfied to elect members on it, and he should not object at all. I am satisfied to take a plebiscite vote on the provincial lists. I do not see what reason he has to object at all, yet he is the very man that says no. So I say to him: You are not satisfied to take a plebiscite on the provincial list, but you are satisfied to elect members of this House on the provincial list. Where is the common-sense argument in that? So, Sir, I will say further that if the tariff was not coming down this session I would be quite willing to go on and discuss this measure, and try to make it a good one. But I hold we will not have time to discuss this Bill; I hold that the tariff is the great question that is coming before the present session of this House. I hold that the country is not crying out at all for a new Franchise Act, but the country is asking the Government to give it a new tariff. I do not say they want a new tariff, but they know they have got to accept a new tariff, and they want to have it settled for good, if they possibly can have it settled. Now, Sir, it has been said by some, and I have seen it stated in some papers, that the Opposition have made up their minds to obstruct business. I deny that altogether. We have no intention of obstructing business. But I hold there is no need of obstructing business in the least. Why, there will be plenty of business to do. I understand an offer has been made that, instead of going on with the second reading of this Bill, the Government should bring down the Estimates and go on with them. That is not obstructing business. We have no desire to obstruct business. We are all anxious to get on with the business; we are all desirous that the House should close in time to allow the First Minister to go to England and represent this country there. The Opposition are just as anxious to assist him in doing that as the members of the Government side of the House are. And we say now to the Government, and we have said to them: If you bring down your Estimates, we are willing to go on with them. But we do think that it is not right to urge us to go on and consider the Franchise Bill, of which there is no need, before the tariff comes down. This is a Bill which there will not be time to consider after the tariff comes down. Then not only the Estimates might be gone on with but there is another Bill which could be taken up, the Superannuation Bill, which we have no objections to go on with. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said about all I want to say. As I said before, I did not rise to discuss this Bill, or the old Franchise Bill; I rose to give my reason for supporting the amendment of the hon. member for York. I think I have given good reasons why this measure should not be urged at the present time, and why it should be left until next session. I hold that this Franchise Bill is one of sufficient importance as to deserve more than a small part of the session, it should take almost the whole of one session in order that we might frame a good Bill. I want to see a Bill framed which will be satisfactory to both sides of the House; I want to see a Bill framed that will, if possible, give to every man in this country, who is entitled to it, the privilege of voting. I want to see a Bill framed which shall not be expensive to the Dominion as a whole, and which shall not be too expensive, or not at all expensive, to members who seek election to this House. There are plenty of expenses without the expense of that kind. I may say that I would be very glad if we could have a Bill of that kind to replace the measure now in existence.

Mr. FROST. I have been listening with a good deal of interest to the discussion on the Franchise Act. I have heard a great deal about the tariff, about the Superannuation Bill, about the Alien Labour Bill, and a number of other Bills which are coming down during the present session, but I do not know, apart from the tariff measure, of any Bill that is more important than the Bill for the repeal of the Dominion Franchise Act. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that there is not time during this session to study the present Bill that has been brought in by the Solicitor General. I can tell hon. gentlemen that the present Bill is practically a renewal of the former system of using the voters' lists of the various provinces, and it does not require so much study as they imagine. We have been studying the present Dominion Franchise Act for the last twelve years, and it has met with the universal condemnation of the people of this country. Every man who knows anything about the Franchise Act, knows that it was framed for the purpose of giving the Conservative party an advantage in the elections, and we know it has worked in that direction in every election since it was framed. The difference between the two Bills is practically this: We want to return again to the old, simple fashion of registering votes in fairness and equity, as against the present Dominion franchise with all its cumbrousness, and all its costliness, and all its many obnoxious features, which we have discovered during those twelve years it has been in existence. We know that the Confederation Act simply gave the privilege of using the provincial voters' lists, and for seventeen or eighteen years these lists were used to the general satisfaction of the whole country. There was no fault found with these lists, and it was not until the present Act was brought in that we heard anything against the old system of taking votes. Now the hon. gentlemen opposite know that the present Franchise Act did give them a decided advantage; and while in their Act, the revision was to take place every year, we know for a fact that owing to its costliness, which surprised the whole country, we have only had four revisions in the twelve years. Consequently we find that in taking a vote at a Dominion election we practically disfranchise thousands of young men throughout the whole country, and not only both political parties but all concerned in taking the vote, have been obliged to go to great expense in bringing thousands of people to the polls from all over the country, as has already been stated this evening by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Calvert). We have been obliged to see thousands of our neighbours who were entitled to vote, prevented from doing so because their names were not on the list. Again, we know that the Government took the revision of these lists entirely into their own hands; not only the revision of the lists, but their publication and their printing. Formerly the printing of the lists was done in newspaper offices, but after the Government Printing Bureau was established, they were printed here. I know for a fact that there have been scores of men who supposed in all fairness that their names were on the list, but who found to their dismay when they came to vote, that their names were not there at all, although their names had been presented to the revising officer by their associations. Now I have heard it stated to-night that it would require a great deal of time to consider this Bill; and one of the objections to taking it up is that the tariff is in the way, and that the tariff should be brought down first. Well, we have now an announcement that the tariff is coming down very soon, and it is coming down at a period not later in the session than has been the case in other sessions, and earlier than in some previous sessions. But there are some reasons why the tariff should be delayed, and this no one knows better than hon. gentlemen opposite. After the Government came into power in July, how much time have they had to discover the minds of the people with regard to this question? A commission went through the country, and even to this day there are men still anxious to meet that commission, so great is the interest taken in that matter. The Government could not possibly think of bringing down their Budget any sooner than they have done, and I am surprised that they have been able to do so much within so short a period of time. I know that three years ago hon. gentlemen opposite when in power issued a commission respecting the tariff, which travelled over the country for nearly a year. What did the tariff revision amount to? In the end nearly everything which it was proposed to reform was immediately put back before Parliament prorogued. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) referred to some industries. I do not propose to touch on any of the different industries, because I deprecate any discussion at this time when we are so near the day when the tariff will be brought down. It might be unfortunate to make statements that might have to be retracted or amended. It was to be regretted that the motion of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) covered so much ground which subsequently required to be travelled over by other hon. members in order to show it was necessary that the present Franchise Act should be set aside.

I am not one of those who has the slightest fear as to the Government satisfying the great mass of the manufacturers of the country. Prior to the time of the National Policy we had a great many industries in Canada. No country exhibiting at the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876 made a better display of implements and the products of her industries than did Canada at that time; and that display was made under a revenue tariff and under the administration of Hon. Mr. Mackenzie several years before any National Policy was introduced here. It may be said that the National Policy was the beginning of the industries of Canada. This I deny, because, as I have already stated, our industries were previously in a flourishing condition, barring a slight depression, which was felt all over the continent, but which was nothing like the depression that has existed here during the last three or four years. We have had a National Policy for eighteen years. Has the National Policy kept away depression? No, we have had four periods of depression in eighteen years, each more severe than any which prevailed before the inauguration of the National Policy. I say to-night, in the presence of this House, that I do not believe the manufacturers of Canada have any reason to fear any action of the Liberal Government. Surely we have hon. gentlemen in the Government to-day who are equal to hon. gentlemen who have been members of any past Government. Surely we have men who have had experience, men who possess the confidence of the country, and whom the country, in the face of a Dominion Franchise Act which was created for the express purpose of keeping hon. gentlemen opposite in power, returned to office. The country will be prepared to sustain these men in their honest desire to preserve the rights of Canada and carry out the honest desires and wishes of our people, and I believe the Budget when brought down, combined with all other features of a true National Policy which hon. gentlemen are seeking to carry out, will redound to the prosperity, to the greatness and to the future growth of this country.

I desire to reply to one or two suggestions made by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig). He spoke of provincial governments using the new Franchise Act for the purpose of advancing party purposes. I should like to ask, what has the provincial government to do with the present lists in the various municipalities? The provincial government has nothing to do with compiling them. Every list issued in Ontario is made up from the assessment rolls of the various municipalities, prepared by men who are connected with both parties. Again, we have a very easy system of getting a revision, by a court of revision, and as the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Calvert) has already stated, we seldom find an appeal taken to the county judge. Every man who wants to vote has the privilege of getting his name on the list. In what way a provincial government could utilize the list for party purposes is beyond my comprehension. I believe, and I hold it to be the opinion of this House, that the only remedy for the present Franchise Act, which is costly, cumbersome and unfair, and which does not give a free expression of the public mind, is to return to a simple system, which we have in our various provincial lists. That is what the people ask for; and that is the pledge which the Liberal party gave the country. That pledge will have to be redeemed, as all other pledges will have to be redeemed, and they will be redeemed one by one. What is the pledge the Liberal party made to the country? It was as follows:—

That the Franchise Act since its introduction has cost the Dominion Treasury over a million of dollars, besides entailing a heavy expenditure to both political parties;

That each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million;

That this expenditure has prevented an annual revision, as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural rights;

That it has failed to secure uniformity, which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction;

That it has produced gross abuses by partisan revising barristers appointed by the Government of the day;

That its provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion, and that in the opinion of this convention the Act should be repealed, and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

This is the pledge the present Government when in Opposition gave the people, that immediately on attaining power they would introduce a law to sweep away the present iniquitous Franchise Act. That is what the Government are now doing, and their supporters will sustain them in their action, and the sooner the present Act is swept away the better. It is said that we will not have any elections for three or four years. I would remind the House that we shall have by-elections from time to time, and we do not want to carry them out under a bad law. As soon as the new law comes into force we want every member entering this House to have been elected under it and to have thus secured a free expression of the people's will in the constituencies; and this can be done by reverting to the provincial lists, with conditions and amendments which may be made to those lists when this Bill reaches committee. I sympathize with the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) in his desire to have a free and fair expression of the people's will. I know what his fairness means. I know he is a man whose mind is free and open to what is reasonable and right, and I am glad to welcome him into the ranks of those who are willing to uphold what is right and what is true rather than those who will support that which is known to be insincere, unpatriotic and incorrect. I am therefore much pleased to hear the statement, and I hope that when the time comes, he will see that this Bill shall go through without giving it undue obstruction, and without—as we have heard from the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster)—fighting it foot by foot and inch by inch. What we want is to do justice to all. We do not want simply to do justice to ourselves. It might be said that if the Franchise Act worked well for the late Government it would work as well for the present Government. Well, that is not our principle. We are not built that way. We believe in doing justice even to our opponents, and we want all to have the advantage of straightforward and honest legislation. We want further to do away with the heavy expense which this Franchise Act has inflicted, not only upon the public treasury, but upon private individuals as well. I shall therefore not only vote against the amendment of the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster) but I shall do everything in my power to assist the Government in repealing the existing Franchise Act and putting in its place a law immeasurably superior, and which will render justice to all.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a few subjects to which hon. gentlemen who have spoken have directed their attention. I hold very strongly the view expressed by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that in the interest of our lagging industries, and in the interest of the welfare of our people, we should deal with the tariff before dealing with this franchise law. It is the tariff that the people of Canada are anxious about now, and there can be no urgent need for a new franchise enactment, because, at best, it can only be used for the present in isolated cases where there are byelections. The industries of this country are urgently demanding information regarding what the new tariff shall be. They are anxiously awaiting knowledge, as to the basis on which the commercial interests of this country will settle down in the future, and in view of the stagnation of business all over Canada, it does seem to me that we should deal with the tariff question at once, and leave this Franchise Bill in abeyance.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) has complained that the existing law was not fairly administered and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), had the same complaint, viz., that it was administered by partisans appointed by the Government. Well, the friends of these hon. gentlemen are now in power, they will have the administration of the law, and cannot these hon. gentlemen trust their Liberal leaders for a fair administration of it? If we who are in Opposition and have no say in the administration of the law, are satisfied to abide by it and to accept it as a fair and free expression of the will of the electors of the country, surely these gentlemen should have sufficient confidence in their own friends to allow them to carry out the provision of the existing Franchise Act. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) asked: What has the provincial government to do with making up the provincial lists? Is he not aware that the provincial government appoint their own officials to make a registration list before each election in the towns and cities of Ontario? and is he not aware that the same thing takes place in Manitoba, and that partisans of the provincial government—if partisans they may be called—are appointed to make up the provincial lists? In my opinion, the complaint about partisanship applies to provincial officers with tenfold greater force, than it applies to the Dominion officials who are now charged with the duty of revising the lists. The provincial lists in Manitoba are made up only once in four years, or at least before the provincial elections are held, and therefore there must be an old list some time in their history, if the Dominion Government holds an election under them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) did not propose to deal with the question of the tariff for fear he might say something that he would be obliged to take back in a few days when the fiscal policy of the Government is announced. He seems to have as much knowledge in regard to the line of policy the Government intend to take as many others of his friends have. He is, however, prepared to say "Amen" to whatever policy they bring down, whether it be free trade or protection, and so, for fear that he will be obliged to stultify himself and retract later on, he is afraid to say anything now about the tariff policy of his own friends in office. It is a strange position for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) to find himself in. I wonder that he is not possessed of more intelligence, and more independence to express his own views, if he conscientiously believes them to be right. Why does he not do so, and then endeavour to get his party in accord with them and convince them that they are wrong.

Mr. FROST. What I said was that the tariff was not up for discussion just now, and that there was no necessity for referring to it at the present time.

Mr. SPROULE. I am using the hon. gentleman's own language. He said he was afraid to deal with the tariff question, as the Budget speech would be down in a few days, and he might be obliged to withdraw something he said, because he did not know what line the Government would take. The inference from that is, that the hon. gentleman would endorse the Government policy whatever it was.

Mr. FROST. Perhaps you will be obliged to withdraw some things you have said on the other side, when you hear the Budget.

Mr. SPROULE. We are quite willing to take our chances on that, and to say here and now, what we believe to be right. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) objects to the present franchise law because, he says, that if a man comes of age within one week before a federal election, he ought to have a vote. That is the reason he gives for a new Franchise Act. Does the hon. gentleman think for a moment, that if we were depending on the provincial lists, his idea would be carried out in that respect? Why, if a federal election were held in Manitoba two years hence, the provincial lists under which it would be held would be three years old. We cannot compel the provincial governments to make lists for use in the federal elections, and so, we would be obliged to accept that old list, although it was three or, perhaps, four years old. Does the hon. gentleman not remember that the same thing exists in Ontario, and that if we held an election before the provincial elections, which will likely be held within a year from the coming summer, we would hold it on a list that was four years old, because their registration system only obliges them to make out a list once in four years in the cities and towns. If we adopt the provincial franchise, that old provincial list might be the only available list on which to hold a Dominion election. It is the same thing in the province of Manitoba, the same in the North-west Territories, I believe, and the same in some of the maritime provinces. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) complains that the Dominion electoral lists of 1891 were three years old, but if we now adopt the provincial lists, many occasions may arise when they also will be three years old at the time of the federal election. I may say, Sir, that, in my opinion, the Dominion voters' lists are objectionable in some respects. I have always thought that human ingenuity ought to be able to devise a means whereby we could have a Franchise Act under our own control, which was not quite so expensive as the present one. I believe that if the late Sir John Thompson had lived longer, we would have had an amendment to that law which would make it cheap to administer, and would have removed the objections that are to it. The present Dominion franchise law is objectionable, but in drawing a comparison between the cost of making out the lists under that Act, and the cost of preparing the provincial lists as they exist in the province of Ontario, hon. gentlemen opposite are very unfair when they try to figure out that the provincial lists cost nothing. Does it not cost the municipalities something to print the lists which are accepted as the provincial lists. Do hon. gentlemen not know that the municipal councillors have to pay the bill by levying a direct tax on the ratepayers of the municipalities. The revision of that list by the judge is a much more expensive one than the revision of the Dominion lists under the present law. It is no improvement upon the Dominion Franchise Act in that respect. The provincial list costs as much as the Dominion list, if not more, and is not as good a list. The only difference is that while the cost of the provincial list is paid by the municipalities and is raised by taxes upon the ratepayers, the cost of the Dominion list is paid out of the Dominion treasury, so that in this case you can get at the cost in a lump sum, whereas in the other case you cannot get at the cost, because it is spread over all the municipalities.

Hon. gentlemen say that they object to the present law because it is administered by partisan returning officers. That argument has been answered over and over again, and I am almost ashamed to find any man at this day standing up and saying that the Dominion list is not fairly revised, when the very same men who revise it are appointed by the provincial Government to revise the provincial lists. If they are partisans in the revision of one list, would they not be equally so in the revision of the other? For my part, I have never seen any indication of any revising officer in the province of Ontario doing anything but his duty in this respect. I live in a county where there is one revising officer who is not a judge. In most cases the revising officers are county judges, and I think no one will say that they are not fair in their decisions. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) insinuated as much; but I have never known even a hard-shell Reformer to accuse any revising officer of doing other than his duty. One of the revising officers in my county was a barrister of five years' standing, and, therefore, qualified to be appointed a county judge. He did as the other revising officers in the county, viz., explain before he commenced the revision the rules he intended to be guided by. This was explained to both parties before the revision, and I never heard any objections raised to his rulings or any unfairness charged against him.

It is said that under the existing law it is troublesome to candidates to look after the list. I have no doubt it is, and it is also troublesome to look after the provincial list, and if we are to be confined to the provincial list, then the trouble will be transferred to that list, because more attention will be paid to it. If any means could be devised whereby the candidate would be relieved from that onerous task, I candidly confess that I would like it very well ; but I do not think that is possible.

Now, I have serious objections to the Bill submitted to us. We have been told that one of the planks in the platform of the Reform party bound them to repeal this law, and that they are now only hastening to give effect to that pledge. I only wish they were as earnest and willing to redeem their other pledges. If they were, the country would not be labouring under the uncertainty which is to-day paralyzing trade, stopping the legitimate pursuits of the people, and keeping everything at a standstill. In the first place, this Bill is objectionable on account of its being a mixture of a franchise Act and an election law. The number of Acts repealed by it is 11 or 12. It is therefore very difficult to understand. I object to it because it deprives the Dominion Parliament of the right conferred upon it by the fathers of confederation in the British North America Act to make its own franchise law, and to say on what basis members should be elected to this House. In their wisdom the fathers of confederation thought we should have a Dominion franchise law, foreshadowing what has since taken place. Seeing how difficult it would be for people to understand the franchises of the various provinces, they thought it would be wise to have as far as possible a uniform law for the Dominion. I take for granted that no clause of the British North America Act was inserted except for a definite purpose, or except to be brought into operation. I take up that Act, and what does it say ? It says :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides,—

This is done because at the beginning, before the Parliament of Canada had any power to make a law, some method had to be used to elect members to this House, but it was not contemplated that that should be continued :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely :—The qualifications and disqualification of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections, and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution,—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

“Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides.” Of course, it was contemplated then that as soon as the Dominion Parliament commenced operations it would make a franchise law of its own that would be as near as possible uniform, and would provide how members should be elected to this House. It further says :

Provided that, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, at any election for a member of the House of Commons for the district of Algoma, in addition to persons qualified by the law of the province of Canada to vote, every male British subject, aged twenty-one years or upwards, being a householder, shall have a vote.

This is the commencement of a Dominion franchise law, because it goes beyond the provincial law. It is as clear as anything can be that it was contemplated that this Parliament should have a franchise law of its own. In my opinion, what the present Government should have done to enable the members of this House to fully comprehend the law they were proposing, was to put before us an epitome of the various provincial franchises, so that we could see what they are when we came to adopt them. We have not got them, and, therefore, we are not in a position fairly to judge what the provisions of this Bill are.

Now, the present law contemplates the abandonment of that right. That, it seems to me, is a retrograde step. If the law is defective by way of being too expensive, let us mend it and make it simpler, as I respectfully submit it can be, and let us retain our right to control the Dominion franchise. I object to this Bill because it leaves the provinces to decide what shall be the Dominion franchise, and allows them to so amend the franchise, from time to time, as to make it prejudicial to the interests of the party in power in the Dominion or the reverse. No doubt our hon. friend's opposite feel no apprehension in this respect, because their friends are in power in most of the provinces, but that is no reason for our giving away the control of our own franchise. In the past, provincial governments have amended their franchise laws in such directions as to fairly lead to the conclusion that they intended giving their friends an undue advantage in the Dominion elections, and it was to remedy this state of affairs that the Dominion franchise law was introduced. We know that Manitoba amended her franchise law so as to prejudicially affect the Government that held office in the Dominion. We know that some of the maritime provinces have done the same thing and that the province of Ontario likewise set the same example. There can be no question of that whatever. Take, for instance, the territory of Algoma and Muskoka. The law there practically gave manhood suffrage without registration, and under its operation, timber inspectors, road jobbers, and other Government employees and hangers on, in large numbers flooded that territory during election times. We have heard the objection from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to the Franchise Act of 1885, that it gave some of the bands of Indians the right to vote. But in Algoma and Muskoka, the Indians, both men and women were driven, almost like herds of cattle to the polls, and after the men had voted, they went to a separate room and exchanged garments with the squaws who then went to the polls, in their turn, and cast their votes, and this they did, under the control of the agents of the provincial government. Yet we are asked to hand over the control of our franchise to local governments, which could tolerate such proceedings.

There can be no question as to the truth of what I have stated, because it is a matter of record which nobody disputes. I could give the names of the gentlemen engaged in the work and of the employees of the provincial government who interested themselves in this matter. What we want is a fair and honest expression of the people's will, and in that view we should hesitate before adopting any system which is likely to give us the opposite. We should have uniformity in our franchise law, as far as possible. Pedantic uniformity we cannot, of course, always obtain, but at least there is a fair measure of uniformity in our present Dominion franchise law. What is proposed to be given us by the Bill before the House? We are asked to adopt a system, which will be conspicuous for its want of uniformity, and that alone, it seems to me, is sufficient to condemn it. Then as to the plea that elections are held upon old lists, under our present law, let me say in reply that in each province the lists are closed at a different period of the year. In Nova Scotia the assessments begin in November and are finished in July. In Ontario, they begin in April and May and are finished in December. In British Columbia, the provincial lists are made up just before the provincial election, and they are finally revised about the 30th of June. In Prince Edward Island the assessments are made out in December and finished about the 1st of May, and no Dominion officials are allowed to vote. In Manitoba the lists are made just before the provincial elections are held. In every province the lists close at different times. It will be seen, therefore, that it will be simply impossible to hold a Dominion election on lists on which everybody is inscribed who has the right to vote. The result would be that there would not be a single Dominion election which could be held on new lists. If the lists were new in Ontario, they would be old in some of the other provinces, so that it would be utterly impossible to have either general or by-elections on new lists throughout the Dominion. Let me quote from a very admirable work of Dr. Bourinot which gives us a little insight into the different franchises of the provinces. Any one looking over this work, must be struck with the differences in the franchises of the different provinces. Dr. Bourinot points out:

In the provinces every native-born Canadian or subject of Her Majesty, by birth or naturalization, who is a male person of the age of twenty-one years, not insane, not convicted of any crime, nor otherwise disqualified by any law, and who is duly entered on the official list of voters, can vote at legislative elections within their respective provinces, on the following conditions:—

In British Columbia.—For residents in the province for twelve months, and in an electoral district for two months of that time. Chinese and Indians have no votes. The system is, consequently, manhood suffrage.

In Manitoba.—Residents in the province for six months, and in the electoral division for one month before the issue of proclamation appointing the registration clerk therein. The system here is also manhood suffrage. Indians and persons of Indian blood, receiving an annuity or treaty money from the Crown, and all persons receiving salaries or fees from the Dominion or provincial governments to amount of $350 and upwards, have no vote.

In Ontario.—Residents in the province for nine months before the time fixed by law for beginning to make the assessment roll in which they should be entered as qualified to vote, providing they are at the time actually residing in the municipal district in which they vote.

By the Ontario law to-day, lots of men who own large amounts of property cannot vote under the lists at present. Why? Because no matter how much property a man may own, he will have his name put down where his property is, but at the time of election he may be living in another polling subdivision and not be able to vote at all, because he must vote in the polling subdivision where he is living at the time the election is held. That is not fair to the electorate of Canada nor to the property-holders of Canada. Now, the Dominion franchise law is objected to on the principle of one man one vote. No doubt that principle has its advantages, and I candidly confess that I have often felt it was a disadvantage that we should be obliged to bring in the outside voter. I think, however, we could amend the law and still give a man a right to vote if he had property in the country, somewhere, so that he would not be deprived of that right when the elections came on.

In Quebec.—Owners or occupants of real estate valued in cities at $300, or $200 in other municipalities, or which yields a value of $20 a year. Tenants paying an annual rental for real estate of at least $30 in a city, and $20 in any other municipal division. Also teachers under the control of school commissioners or trustees, rentières, or retired farmers, with a rental of at least $100 yearly.

These all have the right to vote but they vote on a different principle from that laid down in Manitoba or Ontario or British Columbia.

In Nova Scotia.—Persons assessed on real property valued at $150, or personal and real property together valued at $300. Persons exempted from taxation, when in possession of the property just stated. Tenants, yearly, of similar property. Sons of foregoing persons, or of widows, in possession of enough property to qualify as stated above, and actually residing on such property.

If these persons are not actually residing on the property at the time, they would not have the right to vote.

In Prince Edward Island.—Residents in an electoral division who have performed statute labour for twelve months before an election.

If they do not happen to do statute labour, they would have no right to vote in the election for members for this House. Now, I find that the variety of franchise in the different provinces is very great. Is it to be said that the wisdom of the House of Commons or this Parliament of Canada cannot devise a simpler, plainer, and more uniform franchise for the election of members to this House than by accepting the various franchises of the province, an epitome of which I have given? I think it can be done, and done without a great deal of trouble. Now, I object to the Bill for the reasons I have given. I objected to the old Dominion law, because I thought it was too expensive. I have only this to say regarding the Bill now before us, that there is no reason for pressing it through and bringing it into operation now unless hon. gentlemen opposite are so disloyal that they intend to abandon their leader and wreck the Government, and if I were to insinuate that they would feel insulted. There is no urgency in this matter. But there is urgency for making known the changes the Government intend to make in the tariff. The new tariff should be brought down. The leader of hon. gentlemen opposite has announced that they intend to continue the discussion of the Budget from day to day until it is finished, and the Budget is to be brought down next week. That is a step in the right direction. There is a frankness about that that we admire very much. But we say that there is no reason for delaying the tariff and taking up the franchise law. We hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will give us their Budget at as early a day as possible. There is no hurry so far as the franchise is concerned. If they delay they may be able to give us a better Bill than the one before us. Objectionable as the old Franchise Bill was, in many directions this is more objectionable. It involves the abandonment of a principle which I think should be held as sound. I hold that we should not abandon our rights or give them over to the provincial governments. It has been found in the case of the United States that the great trouble of their system is the weakness of the central authority. We here are drifting in the same direction when we are giving away our rights and allowing them to be exercised by the various provinces. We are weakening the hands of the central authority, and the day will come when it will be absolutely essential to ask to enlarge our constitution, if this continues very long, and strengthen the hands of the central authority rather than weaken it, as it is proposed we should do in the Bill before us.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. The Dominion Franchise Act, I have no doubt, was conceived with the ostensible desire of giving the people of this country a perfect piece of electoral mechanism. It was to be perfect in all its parts; it was to satisfy the longings of politicians who claimed that the Act was for the good of the country. These same politicians, however, were keen enough to remember that the good of the country meant the good of their own party. The Act was to bring with it a harvest of blessings, but both sides of the electorate have heartily cursed it. I am satisfied that I am not mistaken when I claim the Dominion Franchise Act has altogether failed to fulfil the promises of its creators. It was in name an Act for the enfranchisement of Canadians, but in nature and its operation it was an Act for the disfranchisement of Canadians. It was a scandal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Yes; it was a disgrace, and well do I know it; in the last Dominion election Canadians of full voting age had no place on the lists, which were stuffed with the names of thousands of Canadians who were either dead—or worse still, in the United States. The elections of last June and the by-elections were held on lists that were three years old, and, in these contested constituencies the doors were slammed in the faces of Canadians of 22, 23 and 24 years of age, and freely opened to excursionists from the other side of the line, who, having fulfilled their purpose, having return tickets, took the first train out of the country. I have long been against an Act which enfranchises the grave-yard and disfranchises the home. The Act, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) puts it, and I do not think he exhausted the English language in his explanation—proved too costly, not only for the taxpayers of the Dominion but for parliamentary candidates. Any measure that makes our politics expensive adds to the influence of money; and it is not a good thing that members of Parliament should enter this House a debtor to the rich men who have paid for the revision of their lists. These rich men will have a claim upon the Government which that member may support, and, sooner or later, all Governments are apt to honour the claims of wealth. I had hoped that the genius of this Government would have been equal to the preparation of an Act upon which honest men of all political parties could have agreed. There is no room for wrangling over the simple process of enfranchising every qualified Canadian.

There ought to be no wrangling. But, much as I hate the old Franchise Act with all its evils, I can see no good reason for falling in love with this substitute which the Government has offered us. The country expected an Act from the Government that would utilize to the utmost extent, or as far as possible, the municipal machinery in the making of a voters' list. There might be grave difficulty in the way of the Government working out such an ideal; but because it is hard for a Government to do the best, is that Government justified in doing its worst? The old Franchise Act had the one virtue of embodying the ideal of national unity in a law which made the basis of the federal franchise the same thing in every province of the Dominion. This Bill discards the one virtue of the old Act and retains all the evils which that law brought into our politics. Our old friend the revising officer will bob up serenely and disport himself in Manitoba; in Montreal a man will vote wherever he has property; in Ontario he will be able to vote only where he sleeps. Now I did not know anything of the qualifications in the maritime provinces until my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to the franchises in those provinces. But I object to any franchise Act which makes property the qualification in Quebec; manhood suffrage the qualification in Ontario, and manhood and the favour of a partisan revising barrister the qualification in Manitoba. And, in this connection, I think a good point was made by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) on the first day of the debate and to-night by my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Calvert) with regard to one man one vote. I favour also the idea so well put by my hon. friend the member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) this afternoon. I think these suggestions are all essentials in the framing of a Franchise Act. Is this Act the Liberal Government's answer to the expectations of the people? Because, if it is, I can tell the Government that the people will be greatly disappointed. I can tell them further, that the independent voters of this country, a force that is rapidly increasing in number, expected something very much better. I hold that the basis of a Dominion Franchise Act should be the same in every province of the Dominion, and for the sake of that principle, I will vote against this Bill, at least in its present form. I admit that the motion of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) is rather an ignoble way of putting this Bill temporarily out of the way. I would sooner have had a resolution squarely assailing the principal features of the Bill; but as I want to see the Bill either amended or killed, I am prepared to use any tools within my reach even if they are not silver-plated. If it were a question between retaining the old Act or adopting this as a substitute, I might hesitate. I suppose that even this proposal is less objectionable than the iniquity which it would displace. Surely this Government is going to offer this Parliament something better than a choice between evils. Surely this Government underrates its own power when it thus confesses its inability to devise some simple easily-worked-out system which will provide an honest voters' list at a small expense in every province of the Dominion. This Bill, to my mind, does not ensure an honest voters' list; it certainly leaves my Conservative friends with a good excuse for saying that the Government, in the preparation of this Act, were thinking more of advantages to its own party than to the general good of the whole country. I hope that this Act will fail in passing, and thus clear the way for legislation that will be just to all, and for ever leave the making of a voters' list above the strife of partisans. I do not know what the constitutional difficulties are, but it seems to me that it ought not to be impossible for Parliament to agree upon some system that would adopt the municipal or provincial lists so far as these lists comply with the Dominion law. This would clear the way for some simple plan by which a non-partisan authority could add to or take from the municipal or provincial qualifications, so as to make a complete list and comply with the law, which should be the same in every province of the Dominion.

Mr. MORRISON. I regret that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross Robertson) who has just taken his seat has not given us some slight idea of the reasons for which he hopes that this Bill will be defeated. On the several occasions upon which I have had the pleasure hitherto of hearing that hon. gentleman address the House, he has very succinctly and explicitly stated his grounds for the votes which he gave. On this occasion he has attacked not only the present Bill, but the old Franchise Act, and he has not, in one instance, specified upon what he bases his objections. Now, the hon. gentleman is as well aware as any one in this House, that epigram is not argument. I take it that when the hon. Solicitor General introduced this Bill he did it for the purpose of having a full and intelligent discussion of the measure; and I may say that I coincide with the hon. gentleman in the regret that the Solicitor General in introducing this Bill, did not consider it necessary to dilate a little more upon the principles underlying it. I think if the Solicitor General had taken that trouble a great deal of the discussion which we have heard would have been obviated, because then hon. gentlemen opposite would not have had the slightest pretext for indulging in what they no doubt are pleased to call argument, during the day or two that they have spent in discussing this Bill. I have heard every hon. gentleman opposite who has taken part in this debate, but I have failed to hear any of them give it that intelligent and logical treatment which it deserves. With the exception of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) I have not heard one hon. gentleman on the other side give a single valid reason why this Bill should not be passed; while even the hon. member for Brockville, in his argument, I submit with all due deference, indulged in fallacies and sophistries. His argument is entirely specious, and did not effectually assail any of the fundamental principles of the Bill. Now, I submit that the section in the Bill which is the crux of the whole disapprobation on the point of hon. gentlemen opposite, is section 7, which reads as follows:—

Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, the qualifications and conditions necessary to entitle a person to vote at a Dominion election shall be those entitling a person at the time of such election to vote at a provincial election in the electoral district for which the Dominion election is being held, or in some part thereof.

Now, that I conceive to be, in their eyes, the objectionable section of this Bill. But it is the section which contains the principle underlying this Bill, and the principle which I submit ought to underly any Franchise Bill, a principle which has been evaded and ignored by gentlemen on the other side in the various Acts of legislation respecting the franchise of this Dominion. In that short section lies the principle clearly enunciated which ought to be supported by every hon. gentleman in this House, and that is a principle leading to manhood suffrage. I am more than surprised at hearing the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) characterize the Bill in the terms in which he did. The hon. gentleman must surely have forgotten that under the common law, elections were in the hands of the people; that the principle, or quality, of manhood suffrage was invaded by the party which is the prototype of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they made their encroachment upon the liberties of the people of England in the year 1429, before which date manhood suffrage was the franchise in England. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been taking the cue, apparently, from that party, and upon every opportunity they have enlarged upon the invasion of that principle of manhood suffrage. That principle, which is admitted, was invaded owing to the aristocratic tendencies of the Government of the day in England, tendencies which are being perpetuated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and in this connection I must again say I was very much surprised to see the hon. member for Toronto rising in his place and attack this Bill, which contains the principle as set forth in paragraph 7. He is inconsistent, and I am waiting for some explanation of his extraordinary statement, that the Bill, including the principle contained in it, is perfidious and iniquitous.

I contend that at the present stage of the political existence of this Dominion an enlargement of the franchise ought to be given and ought to be recognized; that owing to the inter-communication between the various provinces, the increase in wealth, population and business, greater local power should be given to the different constituent parts of this Dominion. This cannot be done in a better way than by enlarging the franchise. This Bill gives to each province control over its own franchise. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) quoted from the British North America Act, our constitution, and I must say I was surprised, as he apparently knows of the existence of our constitution, that he appeared to be utterly ignorant of this principle enunciated in that Act, that the franchise ought to be controlled by the different provinces. That is the cardinal principle, enunciated and recognized in the British North America Act, and that is the principle which this Bill is following out in section No. 7. Hon. gentlemen opposite apparently are labouring under the mistake that the scope of this Parliament is paramount to that of the legislatures of the different provinces. I contend that in regard to matters of local import the scope of this Parliament is not paramount to that of the local legislatures. Why should it be so? Take the franchise itself. Who are in a better position to decide who shall vote or not, or even how often they shall vote or at how many places they shall vote, than are the people of the respective provinces? I have heard no hon. gentleman controvert that position, or indeed refer to it. We will take British Columbia—and I speak for that province, and I hope to hear hon. gentlemen from the various provinces refer to the franchise question in their respective provinces—in that province, should this Bill pass, the franchise would be very free and full indeed, and open, if at all, in my opinion to very few objections. The franchise in that province at present is exceedingly liberal, and so far as our province is concerned there is no possible objection to this Bill becoming law, and I venture to say that hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, if not hon. gentlemen sitting opposite, will find, if this Bill passes, their respective provinces will raise no objection to it. In British Columbia, according to the Elections Act, every male of the full age of twenty-one years, not being disqualified by that Act or by any other law in force in the province, being entitled to the privileges of a natural born British subject, having resided in the province twelve months, and in the electoral district in which he claims to vote for two months immediately previous to the time he claims to vote, and being duly registered under the Act, shall be entitled to vote. No Indians or Chinamen are permitted to vote. So far as this franchise is concerned, there cannot be any objection raised to it. Another point which strikes me very forcibly, and perhaps hon. gentlemen are not aware of the fact, is that the foundation of the voters' lists is the assessment rolls of the different constituencies. What is the assessment roll, and who has jurisdiction over it? It is a roll prepared under a provincial Act and the provincial legislature enacts concerning it. The very foundation of the franchise, then reverts back to the provincial legislature, and to provincial legislation. In order to make myself clear, I will repeat. It is that the provincial legislature enacts the law in regard to the assessment roll. The revising barrister under the old Act, in order to make his list complete and trustworthy, was of necessity obliged to refer to the assessment roll, a matter under provincial enactment. Therefore, having referred to a piece of legislation over which the provincial legislature has control, clearly the provincial legislature had some sort of control or influence over the franchise of the Dominion. The point I wish to make of that is this: that on that ground alone the Dominion Parliament had not full control over the whole of the franchise of the country, and, therefore, it must be conceded that the local legislature has some right to interfere and deal with the franchise. If that is conceded, I contend that the stand taken up by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the local legislature should not interfere in regard to the franchise or electoral lists fails. I contend that one of the cardinal principles enunciated by the British North America Act is that the franchise should be under the control of the local legislature of the provinces. That is one of the reasons I support this Bill. I contend that the principle enunciated in paragraph 7 is the cardinal principle, an invasion of which will work great harm. There is an abundance of precedents for the Government introducing a Bill of this kind. These precedents must be known and cannot have been forgotten by hon. gentlemen opposite, some of whom must have been members of this House during the introduction and passage of legislative enactments to which I now refer. The precedents for this Bill are as follows: Section 31 of the Imperial Act granting a constitution to Upper and Lower Canada. In that Act one of the grounds for disqualification was that a voter was within the description of a person disqualified by Acts passed by local legislatures. Undoubtedly there was a recognition of the principle that the provincial legislatures should have control of the franchise of the provinces. The next precedent for the introduction and passing of this Bill is the Act of Union between Upper and Lower Canada, 3 and 4, Vic. 1, chap 35, to which reference has already been made; 3 and 4 Vic., states:—

That until otherwise provided by the Legislature of the United Kingdom, the laws of Upper Canada, and the laws in force in Lower Canada in 1838 relating to the qualification and disqualification of voters, should be continued.

Mr. MORRISON.

There is the second recognition of this principle.

Mr. DAVIN. Does not my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) see that that enunciates a directly opposite principle to that which he contends for.

Mr. MORRISON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) does not follow the trend of my argument, and that I regret very much, because it is his misfortune. I was very careful in giving the hon. gentleman the citation, so as to afford him an opportunity of consulting it which he has not evidently heretofore done. The third precedent for the passage of this Bill is in the British North America Act, section 41 of which states:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union, relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely:—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, * * * shall respectively apply to election of members to serve in the House of Commons for the several provinces.

There is another precedent which is laid down in the British North America Act, section 51. The fourth precedent is, that in 1871 the Acts adopting the provincial franchise for the Dominion elections were passed. The fifth precedent is laid down in 34 Vic., chap. 20; the sixth precedent is laid down in 36 Vic., chap. 27, passed in 1873; and in 1874 the Dominion Parliament adopted the various provincial franchises. I contend, Sir, that these are ample precedents for the action taken by the Government now. I think we can pin it down to one reason which I will repeat. The voters' list as at present when finally completed by the revising barrister is the foundation for the franchise, and against it there is no appeal. That voters' list, when finally revised and passed by the revising barrister cannot be attacked, even on the trial of an election petition before a judge of the Supreme Court. It is incontrovertible evidence over which you cannot get. What is the fact in regard to that? The list may have been prepared by an official who may have acted in the most dishonourable way—I do not mean to suggest that any revising barrister that we have to-day has resorted to these methods, but I wish to point out that such a thing may happen, and there are gentlemen in this House who have said that it has happened. It has not been done to my knowledge and I am simply speaking for myself. However, what I say is, that even should that list be prepared in the most dishonourable way, there is no recourse against it. Whether the voter on that list be de jure a voter or not, on the day of election he can demand to have his vote taken no matter how wrongfully he may have got on that list. On the other hand, no matter how much entitled a man may have been to be on that list, if through the machinations of some of the officers his name is left off, there is no remedy to which he can resort. If this Bill, speaking for the British Columbia franchise, should become law, the voter finds that his name is not on the list, then he may appeal to the county court judge, and from the county court judge he has a further recourse to a Judge of the Supreme Court. That gives him the fullest and most ample remedy if his name has been left off the list, either intentionally or otherwise. The fact that under the old law there was such arbitrary power placed in the hands of any official—whether he used that power arbitrarily or not—is sufficient to condemn the law. I say that any Act, I care not by what name you call it or by what party it is introduced, which includes provisions so pernicious as the provisions of the existing law are admitted to be by both sides, should not be tolerated in a constitutionally governed country. To the extent even that the present Bill eliminates those pernicious provisions, it is infinitely better than the existing law. I simply rose to refer to section 7 which I consider to be the main point in reference to this Bill, and for my own part I should like to have heard of hon. gentlemen on the other side who have attacked the measure state their reasons against the principles involved in it. If this Bill is so objectionable as gentlemen opposite contend—and I have no doubt they are honourable and intelligent men and actuated by the best motives—surely they should have given some reasons for their objections. I am free to admit, that I am open to conviction, and I would be the very last man to vote for this Bill if it is all that hon. gentlemen opposite have said that it is. However, I shall not take their ipsi dixit for that. I expected that men who have the confidence of their respective constituencies, sufficiently to send them to this House, would have discussed a matter of such great importance as this, in an intelligent manner, and given the reasons for their opposition. With one exception, not a single member on the other side of the House has given us his grounds for his objection to this Bill. To that extent they are culpable and reprehensible for uselessly taking up the time of this House and of the country. I believe that the country, and the Government, and the House want an intelligent discussion on this question. I am a new member of this House, and it is inexplicable to me how an hon. gentleman like the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), could rise ostensibly to discuss the Franchise Act, and then direct all his remarks to extraneous matters, the discussion of which is entirely premature. It is inexplicable to me, how an hon.

gentleman like the ex-Finance Minister, should resort to what I deem an anomalous practice in the rules of debate in this House, and avail himself of the artifices which are at the disposal of any hon. member who chooses to use them. If hon. gentlemen opposite are in earnest in condemning this Bill, they should give us some reasons why it should be condemned. I am afraid, however, that if the debate continues in the same line as it has since it opened, we shall have a discussion on extraneous matters, such as the tariff, and the Superannuation Bill, measures not now before the House, and that no light will be thrown upon the principles of this Franchise Bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, before you proceed to the next order of business, I rise pursuant to a statement that I made last night that to-day I would make a personal explanation in reply to a certain charge that was alluded to by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) last evening.

If necessary to keep myself in order, I will conclude my statement with a motion. The statement referred to by the hon. gentleman last evening, as I understood him, was contained in a despatch to the Toronto "World" from Niagara Falls, dated February 11th. It is headed: "Annexationist J. Charlton has been causing a sensation at Tonawanda. The Yankees praise him, and people on the Canadian side are filled with indignation." The despatch reads as follows:—

Niagara Falls, Ont., Feb. 11.—(Special.)—John Charlton, the annexationist, is creating a sensation in the vicinity of Tonawanda and Niagara Falls. Mr. Charlton has interests in Tonawanda, and a short time ago delivered a lecture on Canada and its resources, intimating that the average Canadian citizen would favour continental annexation, which he himself did. The local American newspapers have taken up the cry; they praise Mr. Charlton and the Liberal party, who, they claim, are desirous of annexation, and honour the Conservatives by calling them loyalists. They publish alleged facts that the Canadians residing on the frontier would join them to-morrow, if it were possible. Great indignation is felt on this side of the river at the Yankees' presumption. Nowhere in Canada would annexation be more strongly opposed than on the Niagara frontier. As far as business transactions are concerned, the Canadians are on the best of terms with their cousins across the border, but apart from that, they are not of them. John Charlton may have made friends across the river, but he certainly has not on this side.

This despatch is of the same character as many others regarding myself which were published in Conservative papers from time to time, and in this, as in all other instances, the despatch was destitute of foundation and truth. I called the attention of the pastor of the church in North Tonawanda, where I delivered this lecture, to the character of the statements that were being made with regard to it by the Conservative press in Canada, and I requested that gentleman to furnish a statement as to what the actual character of the lecture was. The lecture was given at his solicitation, and was one of a series delivered in that church last winter.

Mr. DAVIN. Where is Tonawanda, may I ask my hon. friend?

Mr. CHARLTON. I may inform my hon. friend that Tonawanda is the second lumber centre of the United States, and the third lumber centre of the world. It is a place of very great commercial importance, and if the hon. gentleman will examine the map he will find that it is situated on the Niagara River, in the western part of New York. It was some time before my request was complied with, but on the 3rd of March, the Rev. Mr. Sanborne, pastor of the North Presbyterian Church in Tonawanda, addressed the following letter to the Toronto "Globe":—

To the Editor of the "Globe":

Sir,—My attention has been called to certain statements made in some Canadian newspapers regarding Mr. Charlton's lecture in this place on the evening of January 28 last, and I beg that you will permit me to refer to the matter in the columns of the "Globe."

Mr. CHARLTON.

The managers of the North Presbyterian Church, of North Tonawanda, N.Y., decided last autumn to arrange for a course of lectures. Mr. Charlton, who has relatives among the members of the congregation, was asked to give one of these lectures, and consented to do so. He expressed a desire to contribute his quota to the enlightenment of Americans about Canadian matters, and he announced as his subject, "Canada, Physical, Historical and Political." His lecture upon the subject chosen was distinctively Canadian in tone and sentiment. The statement that he expressed himself as favourable to the annexation of Canada to the United States is untrue. He did refer to the question, and said that in Canada it was neither a political issue nor a live question, and that while the present tariff conditions between the two countries continued, it could not even be said to be a remote possibility.

He spoke with some asperity of the narrow policy pursued by the United States towards Canada, and declared that the latter country, under its new Liberal Government, desired to adopt a friendly policy and to secure modifications of trade restrictions that would be mutually beneficial. While this, however, was the case, Canada had no desire to surrender her autonomy, but wished to work out her own destiny, ever maintaining relations of the utmost friendliness with her great neighbour. Mr. Charlton dwelt with evident pride upon the extent of the arable area and of the material resources of Canada, and surprised his hearers by declaring that the Dominion could sustain a population of 75,000,000 souls. He sketched briefly the romantic colonial history of the country and the growth of its institutions since the conquest. The outline he gave of the character of those institutions as at present existing, was an attractive one, though he admitted that possibly some modifications might be made with advantage. His remarks upon Canadian politics and parties were exceedingly instructive and interesting to an American audience.

It is true that Mr. Charlton's lecture was well received in Tonawanda. The spirit of friendliness and good-will that characterized it throughout was all that could be desired; but the ground was distinctly taken that Canada wished to become a nation and work out the problems of her future side by side with, but separate from, the United States, and that the traditional policy of the Liberal party was to seek to dwell together in concord and amity and to secure an extensive mitigation of the restraints upon the trade of the two countries with each other, based upon fair and mutually advantageous conditions.

HENRY K. SANBORNE.

Pastor North Presbyterian Church.

North Tonawanda, N.Y., March 3.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

That letter, so far as my memory serves me, gives a correct outline of the leading features of my lecture, and the statement which the writer makes denying the utterance of any annexationist sentiment by myself is absolutely true.

An investigation was held before C. J. Macdonald, post office inspector; charges were made by D. J. Riordan, under oath. The witnesses were Riordan, the postmaster and the postmaster's son. 4. There was a complaint by Daniel J. Riordan under date of 12th October, 1896. 5. The office is closed. 6. Yes, he was appointed to postmastership of a new office established at Thorne Cove, midway between Thorneville and Karsdale, on 1st of April, 1897. Postmaster's bond has not yet been received.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. WILFRID MERCIER.

Mr. LaRIVIERE (for Mr. Bergeron) asked:

1. By whom was Mr. Wilfrid Mercier, barrister, of Montreal, appointed a commissioner to hold an inquiry respecting the post office at Valleyfield, province of Quebec?

2. How much does he receive per day as remuneration and for travelling expenses?

3. Has he power to swear the witnesses and (4) to pay them?

5. Can he act as barrister, clerk and judge?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Under the authority of an Order in Council dated the 27th of November, 1896, issued under the provisions of chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, Wilfrid Mercier was appointed a commissioner to hold inquiry respecting the conduct of the postmaster at Valleyfield, his allowance being three dollars a day for living expenses, his actual travelling expenses, and ten dollars a day for his services, with such powers as are, by the said Act, conferred upon commissioners appointed thereunder.

BELLE RIVER BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the extension of Belle River breakwater, in Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The question is under consideration.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

Who was acting for the Government in the negotiations of a settlement of the school question with the Government of the province of Manitoba, and what were his instructions? Has he made a report, and if so, will the same be submitted to this House?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The negotiations for the settlement of the Manitoba school question were conducted by the Government themselves. No authority was delegated to any one.

POSTAL DELIVERY OF CONSERVATIVE NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

Is the hon. the Postmaster General aware that the postmaster of St. Timothy, in the county of Beauharnois, who, by the way, is absent, the office being held by his wife, refuses to deliver the Conservative newspapers which are addressed to bona fide subscribers? Will the Postmaster General take means to prevent such abuse?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The Postmaster General is not aware that the postmaster at St. Timothy, in the county of Beauharnois, refuses to deliver Conservative newspapers addressed to bona fide subscribers. If such abuse exists and the Postmaster General is notified thereof, he will deem it his duty to take prompt measures to put an end to it.

QUEBEC ORIENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BELCOURT (for Mr. Choquette) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to grant, this year, subsidies to the Quebec Oriental Railway Company?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I shall have to answer that question precisely as I have answered previous questions of the same character. The question of which railways are to be granted subsidies, if any, is under consideration.

GROSSE ISLE WHARF.

Mr. BELCOURT (for Mr. Choquette) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates, this year, a sufficient amount for the extension of the Grosse Isle wharf, as recommended by the report of Dr. Montizambert?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I can only say that this question will be answered when the supplementary Estimates, if any, come down.

WESTERN BLOCK FIRE.

Mr. BELCOURT (for Mr. Choquette) asked :

What public documents were destroyed by the fire in the Western Block? To what department did these documents belong? Over what period did they extend?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The Department of Public Works has lost the correspondence received from 1880 to 1892, with the exception of the correspondence relating to matters still pending and which being kept in another part of the building was saved. None of the books of reference were lost. All contracts, deeds, &c., were saved. The vouchers in the Accountant's office up to the year 1890 were destroyed, these, with the correspondence above referred to, being kept in the attic where the fire originated. All the plans in the Chief Engineer's and Chief Architect's offices were saved.

Files of this department, Marine Branch, containing letters and reports received from 1867 to 1879, inclusive, and also register books of correspondence received from 1867 to 1882, were consumed in the late fire. Some volumes of the "Canada Gazette" and a supply of forms used in connection with the various services of the department were also destroyed, and also a quantity of printed reports of the department, dating from confederation to the present time. Most of the letters received by the Fisheries Branch from 1867 to 1888, inclusive, were lost.

The North-west Mounted Police branch having its office wholly in the attic of the Western Block naturally suffered most from the fire. The same may be said of the records of the Departments of Marine and Fisheries and Public Works, which were destroyed and which were also filed in that attic. The Departments of Militia, Trade and Commerce, and Customs, being on the ground floor of the building, where the fire did not reach, did not lose any documents on that account.

Customs.—The Commissioner states as follows :—

I have to state that, so far as I am aware, there were not any public documents belonging to the Customs Department destroyed by the fire in question.

North-west Mounted Police.—The Controller of the North-west Mounted Police reports that the following documents in connection with his office were destroyed by the fire :—

1. Files of correspondence, 1877 to 1887, inclusive, and a few files of 1891.
2. Registers of correspondence, 1892 to 1895, inclusive, and one register of 1881.
3. Letter-books, 1873 to 1883, and six letter-books covering broken periods between 1887 and 1892.
4. All vouchers, financial statements, &c., 1879-80 to 1892-93, both inclusive.
5. Q. M. ledgers, returns, &c., all years prior to 1893-94.

Trade and Commerce.—The Commissioner states :

So far as this department is concerned, I am not aware that any documents were absolutely destroyed. Many that have been missing have turned up from time to time from other departments, and the probability is that there have been none of importance either lost or destroyed.

Militia and Defence.—That department reports that they did not lose anything by the fire, but that some of their books and vouchers were damaged by water. It is thought, however, that none of the damage will prove a serious loss.

MISS KELLY, WINDSOR POST OFFICE.

Mr. TAYLOR (for Mr. Hughes) asked :

Is Miss Kelly employed in the Windsor, Ontario, Post Office? Have her services been dispensed with? If they have, for what reason? Was there an investigation? What was the ground of complaint?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Miss Kelly was brought from West Huron and appointed temporary clerk in the Windsor Post Office after the by-election between Hon. J. C. Patterson and Mr. M. C. Cameron, but there was no public need of her services in the Windsor Post Office at any time, the strength of the staff of that office being much beyond the needs of the service, and the total amount of the salaries excessive. Accordingly, her services, being wholly unnecessary, will be dispensed with on the 1st of May next. This is the sole reason for her removal, and no person will be appointed to fill the position in question.

DISMISSAL OF JACQUES FOURNIER.

Mr. TAYLOR (for Mr. Morin) asked :

Will the hon. the Postmaster General say why he has dismissed Jacques Fournier, postmaster of Magenta, in the county of Rouville?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The answer to the question is "Yes."

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Postmaster General has not answered the question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Read it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The question is :

Will the hon. the Postmaster General say why he has dismissed Jacques Fournier, postmaster of Magenta, in the county of Rouville?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very smart, that is.

PUBLIC WHARF, IONA, VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Bethune) asked :

On whose authority, and by whom were the repairs made to the public wharf at Iona, Victoria county, in 1896, examined, and on whose report was the amount asked for for said repairs not paid? Who were consulted by those making the examination as to the extent of said repairs? Was the person authorized to repair the wharf consulted before reporting to the Government? Was the cost of obtaining a pile-driver, removing portions of the old wharf, debris, &c., taken into consideration?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). In answer to the first part of the question, I would say that on the authority of the department the repairs were examined by Mr. C. A. Hutchins, inspector of lighthouses and marine works for Nova Scotia, and on his report the sum of $148.72, which he considered a liberal estimate allowed, instead of $259.85 claimed. A report has also been received by the department from Mr. Daniel M. McDonald, wharf builder and contractor, of Baddeck, in which he estimates the value at $166.62. The department is not aware of any person being specially consulted as to the extent of repairs by those examining, nor did such consultation appear necessary as to the work spoke for itself. The department is not aware that the person authorized to make the repairs was consulted before a report as to cost of repairs was made to the Government. The cost of obtaining a pile-driver and removal of portions of old wharf, &c., was taken into consideration.

REGISTRATION OF PINPLATS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Whether the Government has received a copy of the following resolution, passed in Buffalo, at a meeting of the Board of Marine Inspectors, 12th March, 1897 :—

"At a meeting held at Buffalo by the Lake Underwriters to take joint action with all the Canadian underwriters, insuring grain cargoes from the Upper Lakes to Montreal; to have all barges known as pinplats, as their construction and material and model do not qualify them to carry grain on the Upper St. Lawrence River, as the results have shown it has been disastrous to all insurance companies insuring cargoes on board them, therefore, as a special request to the managers of the Canadian Inland Lloyds, we wish to have pinplats which have been engaged in carrying grain from Kingston, Prescott and Ogdensburg on what is known as the Upper St. Lawrence River to Montreal, not to class as standard barges in the Canadian Hull Register."

Do the Government intend to take any action on said resolution?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Department of Finance has received a copy of the resolution referred to, and the Department of Marine and Fisheries has an amount of correspondence in connection with the same matter. The whole subject is now receiving the very careful consideration of the Government.

REPORT OF HON. T. M. DALY.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Has the report of the Hon. T. M. Daly on immigration from Europe been received by the Government? If so, will it be laid on the Table of this House?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Government has received this report, and I beg now to lay it on the Table of the House.

THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE—COLONIAL TROOPS.

Mr. FLINT (for Mr. Domville) asked :

In view of the fact of the celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, on the 22nd June, and the invitation extended to the colonies to send troops to London to take part in the ceremonies, that other colonies have already sent forward corps, the Australian contingent of cavalry having embarked on the 17th ultimo;

That the active militia of Canada consider they should be represented, and that all arms of the service—cavalry, field artillery, and infantry should send a quota in the shape of a small column, to be composed of one squadron cavalry, one battery field artillery and one battalion infantry, with the necessary staff of Canadian officers;

That the move made to send a subscription regiment is viewed with disfavour by many commanding officers, inasmuch as it is not representative, and subversive to discipline and the best interests of the service;

That in order to make the best selection of men and horses no time is to be lost;

That Canadian cavalry would be the means of showing to the best advantage the horses of Canada, and opening up a market for cavalry chargers; and as the militia of Canada are anxiously awaiting the action of the Government, it is necessary to know at an early date :

1. What action the Government propose to take in the matter.

2. If active militia are to be sent over to London, what the force will be, and how selected.

3. And how soon will orders be issued.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). These matters are all at present earnestly engaging our consideration. I am not prepared to make a statement just now.

COLLECTOR DANIS, BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.

Mr. LaRIVIERE (for Mr. Bergeron) asked:

When was Mr. A. D. Danis appointed collector of tolls on the Beauharnois Canal? When was he appointed as paymaster of said canal? When did he cease to act as paymaster, and why? What is the yearly salary Mr. Danis received as collector of tolls? What fees as paymaster did he receive? Has he paid to the pension fund for eighteen years, and how much has he paid thus? Was he dismissed as collector of tolls, and when, and why? Upon whose complaint was he dismissed? Did he ask for an investigation, and was it promised to him? Why was not the investigation, as asked and promised, granted?

Was Mr. J. Bte. Laplante, advocate, of Valleyfield, appointed in the place of Mr. Danis as collector? Why was the nomination rescinded? How many solicitors are asking for Mr. Danis' position?

Has the position been offered to Mr. S. A. Brodeur, N.P., of Vaudreuil, on his promising to edit the Liberal paper of the place, "Le Progrès de Valleyfield"?

Is it true that Mr. Brodeur is ready to accept the conditions above referred to, if he gets the other position held by Mr. Danis?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. A. D. Danis was appointed collector of tolls on the Beauharnois Canal, October 1st, 1879. He was appointed paymaster of the Beauharnois Canal October 9th, 1879. He ceased acting as paymaster on the 30th June, 1886, in order to bring all the Quebec canals under one paymaster and that the office of collector and paymaster should be separate and distinct. The yearly salary Mr. Danis received as collector of tolls was $850, and he received as paymaster $50 per annum. He contributed to the superannuation fund from his appointment as collector from October 1st, 1879, to January 31st, 1897, and paid into the fund $311.16. His services were dispensed with as collector, January 25th, 1897, for taking an active and offensive part in the elections in June last, on the representation made on the personal knowledge of the Hon. Israel Tarte. He asked for an investigation, but none was promised him because it was not considered necessary. Mr. J. B. Laplante was not appointed in the place of Mr. Danis, nor was the position, so far as the department knows, offered to Mr. S. A. Brodeur upon his promising to undertake anything. The department is not aware whether Mr. Brodeur is ready to accept the position, nor does the department know that there were any other persons desiring the position that Mr. Danis had held.

Mr. LaRIVIERE (for Mr. Bergeron) asked:

Who is the collector of customs at Valleyfield? When was he appointed, and at what salary? What is the amount of money collected at the Valleyfield port since Mr. Danis' appointment? Is Mr. Danis the excise officer at Valleyfield? When appointed? What fees? How much money collected since appointment? Is Mr. Danis the present collector of customs and excise officer at Valleyfield the same Mr. Danis who was dismissed, after eighteen years of faithful service and contribution to the pension fund as collector of tolls, on the 25th January, 1897, and who is not yet replaced as such?

Is it the intention of the Government to increase the salary of Mr. Danis as collector of customs at Valleyfield?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). There are some statements of fact in the question, and I would ask the hon. member to leave it on the Table until he has changed it and put it in order.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. What change?

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the hon. member refers to a statement of fact in the latter part of the question, alleging that Mr. Danis had been for eighteen years performing faithful services and contributing to the pension fund. The hon. gentleman might ask whether that was a fact; but he sees the difficulty in answering such a statement of fact. I think the question had better be recast.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I will let the question stand until the hon. gentleman who put it on the Order paper is here.

Mr. FOSTER. Just drop those three words.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the Minister is ready to answer the question with those words dropped out, it can be gone on with; otherwise it had better be put into proper shape.

DISMISSAL OF MR. MARTIN, POSTMASTER OF BELFAST.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

What is the date of the dismissal of Martin as postmaster at Belfast, in Prince Edward Island? What was the nature of the charges preferred against him, if any? Has he been furnished with a copy of those charges? Has he been given an opportunity to defend himself against those charges? Has his case been examined by Mr. Palmer, the investigating commissioner? If not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). At the request of a number of the residents, the post office which had formerly been conducted in Mr. Martin's house, was removed to what was indicated to be a more convenient site, which occasioned a change of postmasters.

DISMISSAL OF DR. GEO. MITCHELL.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

1. Was Dr. George Mitchell dismissed from the position of physician to the Indians of Walpole Island, on charges of political partisanship?

2. If so, by whom were such charges made?

3. Was the said Dr. George Mitchell given an opportunity to answer such charges?

4. If not, why not?

5. Have the Government any rule to guide them in dismissing officials on charges of political partisanship with and without investigation into such charges?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. He was dismissed for political partisanship. 2. No formal charges of political partisanship were made against Dr. George Mitchell, but evidence was afforded the department that Dr. Mitchell was vice-president of the Liberal-Conservative Association, and as such took an active part in political affairs. 3 and 4. The facts were so notorious that it was not considered necessary to call upon Dr. Mitchell for a defence. 5. Where the partisanship is notorious and undeniable it is not deemed necessary to waste time and public money in holding investigations.

TUG "SILVER SPRAY" AND SCHOONER "MARY GROVER."

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked :

1. Were the tug "Silver Spray" and the schooner "Mary Grover," or either of them, seized for infraction of the revenue laws of the Dominion during the year 1883 or 1884, or either of said years?

2. If said vessels or either of them were so seized, what was the nature of the offence for which they, or either of them was so seized?

3. What was the name of the officer who seized said vessels or either of them?

4. Were said vessels or either of them released? If so, upon what terms?

5. Was an investigation subsequently held? If so, what was the name of the officer who conducted said investigation? Where was it held? What was the names of the witnesses examined at said investigation? Was their evidence reduced to writing and returned to the department, and is the same now on the files of the department?

6. Was final disposition made of the matter?

7. What was the name of the owner or owners of said vessels?

Mr. MARTIN.

8. By whom were the sworn entries made at Port Arthur or Michipicoten (or wherever the same were made) of the cargoes of said vessels?

9. Were the original entries and the invoices accompanying same returned to the Department of Customs, and are the same now on file in said department?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The department have been making all diligence to secure the information for the hon. gentleman, but he will understand that it is an old matter, and requires a good deal of search. If he will be kind enough to let it stand until the next occasion for putting the question, I will be ready to answer him.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before taking up the notices of motion, I should like to draw the attention of the House to a very important matter, and in order to put myself right, I will conclude with a motion. The matter to which I wish to draw attention is the condition of the proposed fast Atlantic service. The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated to this House a day or two ago that a contract had been made. I think the hon. gentleman said, with Messrs. Peterson, Tate & Company for the performance of that service. I think, Mr. Speaker, we have again reason to complain that this House and the people of this country should be obliged to obtain information with respect to matters of great and pressing importance from parties outside of this House, and in this as well as in other cases, from the other side of the Atlantic. The Parliament of the United Kingdom it appears is first to be informed of contracts made by this Government in relation to matters affecting this country. I do not raise this question at all in any factious spirit or with a view of calling the attention specially of the House to the discourtesy, I may almost call it, with which the Government treats the House as regards these questions. The late Minister of Agriculture asked the hon. Finance Minister the other day if an Order in Council had been passed granting a large sum of public money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in connection with services to be rendered at Montreal. The Finance Minister promptly informed my hon. friend that he could not tell him whether that was the case or not. But I find on looking at the London "Times" of April 1st a communication from the correspondent of that paper stating that an Order in Council had been passed granting a large sum of public money to that company. I think it is of very great importance that the Government should take the House into their confidence in relation to matters that are of great public interest, and the people of the country should not be compelled to learn what has been done in relation to important public matters either from the London "Times" or from announcements made in the Imperial Parliament. I may say that this question of a fast Atlantic service, as the hon. First Minister knows, has never been treated as a party question in this House. My hon. friend knows that the late Government after great deliberation arrived at the conclusion that it was of great importance to this country that we should obtain or realize the advantages that our geographical position presents for the purpose of a fast mail, passenger and freight communication of certain classes between Great Britain and Canada. The Government having arrived at the conclusion that great and important interests were to be subserved by the establishment of a fast service between Great Britain and Canada, which would have the effect of bringing a vast tide of travel of a very important character to Canada which otherwise we would not receive, that it would have the effect of carrying to a large extent the mails between Europe and America through Canada and across it, that it would have the effect of establishing a fast line of steam communication which, provided with ample cold storage, would give to our farmers enormous advantages in placing in prime condition within a few days agricultural products, especially perishable products, such as poultry, butter, eggs, meat, fruit and other articles, in the markets of Great Britain in the best condition—the Government having arrived after careful consideration at the determination that it was of great importance to this country to establish that line of fast communication, asked Parliament to vote £100,000 a year for ten years for the purpose of securing that object. Negotiations were undertaken with parties in Great Britain, and I was instructed, as High Commissioner for Canada, to give to persons interested in this matter all the support that possibly could be given in order to promote and secure a satisfactory settlement of this great question. I received an intimation from His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, who was president of the Naval Construction Armament Company—at that time negotiations were being carried on with the Government of Canada by the representative of that company, who came to Canada for the purpose, and I believe a provisional contract was entered into—that it was not possible to raise the capital required for that service unless the subsidy was increased from £100,000 to £150,000. I cabled at once to the late lamented Sir John Macdonald to say that the appropriation of £100,000 was found insufficient, and I stated the source from which I had received an intimation that the capital could not be raised unless £150,000 were provided. I was instructed in reply to say that if the service such as Canada demanded and required was accomplished, Parliament would be applied to and asked to extend the grant from £100,000 to £150,000 per annum for ten years. The gentleman who was engaged in carrying on the negotiations, whose name at present escapes me, the manager of the Naval Construction Armament Company, was taken suddenly ill and died; and those efforts that were then being made were interrupted. Subsequently, as the House is aware, the Government made a provisional contract with Mr. Huddart, under which they engaged to give that gentleman £150,000 a year for ten years for the purpose of securing this fast Atlantic service. Mr. Huddart was a gentleman of great energy and enterprise, connected with Australia and London, and who was greatly interested in carrying this measure to completion, because being one of the principal proprietors of the service between Vancouver and Australia, which would be immensely benefited by the fast Atlantic service, no effort was spared by him in bringing to bear all the influence he could exercise on the London market, connected as he was with great shipping firms and steamship lines that were likely to be interested in the project, every possible effort was made, but made in vain, by Mr. Huddart to successfully accomplish the work he had undertaken. Under these circumstances I was instructed to approach Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to obtain additional assistance, and the time which the Government of Canada allowed Mr. Huddart to arrange his organization was extended, in order that he might ascertain if we were to get assistance from the Imperial Government. In company with all the representatives of Australasia, I went to the Colonial Office and impressed upon the Colonial Minister, then the Marquis of Ripon, the great importance that Canada and Australasia attached to this fast service, which we believed to be of Imperial concern as well, in the light of drawing Canada and the mother country much more closely together. I need not stop to remind the House that, at present, we are not only unable to bring that great tide of travel and mail communication between Europe and this country through Canada; but I presume that a very large proportion of Canadians who visit Europe go by way of New York, in consequence of the greater facilities and the greater saving of time they accomplish by so doing. This matter was pressed upon the Liberal Government in England when they were in power, and I am bound to say that it was received with hearty approval by the Marquis of Ripon, and by the members of the Administration generally, so far as I was able to ascertain. The Liberal party in England had not then the support of a very large majority in the House of Commons, and they did not make that rapid progress with the measure that we thought desirable. They did, however, appoint a very influential departmental committee, representing the Treasury, the Post Office, the Admiralty and the Colonial Office, for the purpose of investigating this question thoroughly and reporting upon it for the consideration of the Government. The general election ensued and, as this House knows, the Conservative party in England were brought into power with a very large majority. I at once renewed my efforts with the new Government, and I addressed to the Colonial Minister, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, a letter pointing out the great importance that Canada attached to this project. I also drew his attention to the fact that it was a measure that had obtained the support of both political parties in Canada. I referred to the fact that, at the conference which took place in Ottawa at which the Australasian and South African colonies were represented in conjunction with the Imperial and Canadian Governments, a unanimous resolution was passed expressing approval of this fast Atlantic service. Mr. Chamberlain promised to give the subject his careful consideration, and, having had an opportunity of discussing the matter on more than one occasion with that right hon. gentleman, he arrived at the conclusion that the measure was entitled to the support of Her Majesty's Government, and said that he was prepared to ask the Imperial Parliament for such support as might be considered appropriate. What was asked for from Mr. Chamberlain was, that the £150,000 voted by the Government of Canada should be supplemented by Her Majesty's Government by an additional amount of £75,000. Mr. Chamberlain practically adopted this proportion, but he said that inasmuch as it had not been ascertained whether the service could be obtained for a lower amount than these two sums added together, it would be absolutely necessary that tenders should be asked for. It was pointed out to Mr. Chamberlain that Mr. Huddart had devoted a great deal of time and attention to this matter under an arrangement with the Canadian Government, but Mr. Chamberlain took the ground that it would be impossible for him to ask Parliament for a large sum of money unless new tenders were called for. That policy was, of course, adopted.

After the resolution was passed by the conference at Ottawa, my hon. friend the First Minister will remember that a motion was offered in this House asking for a grant of £150,000 a year for ten years for this service. I was able to say to the authorities in England that that motion had been passed by this House without division. I may incidentally call the attention of the House to the fact that from the inception of this important scheme it had not been treated as a party measure, but had received the support of gentlemen on both sides of the House, and ultimately was adopted with practical unanimity. I need not remind the House that at a time when the Opposition decided to take such a course as to render the Conservative Government then in power practically powerless to carry any measure; owing to the good offices of the present First Minister who was then leader of the Opposition, we were enabled to pass a Bill through the House amending the law which, up to that time, made it a condition that this fast service should connect with France as well as with Great Britain. Finding that such a thing was impracticable by the same line of steamers, the First Minister was good enough to aid the late Government in passing a Bill to change that, but making it a condition, and a very proper condition, that any contract entered into for this service should be subject to the approval of this House. That amendment was passed for the purpose of avoiding loss of time, and in order that we might ask for tenders, and the House whatever its complexion and whoever might be in power, would thus have reserved to it the right of approving of any contract made. Under that authority obtained by the support of both sides of this House, the Government invited tenders, and as hon. gentlemen opposite know, the result was that no tender was received for a less sum than the £225,000 sterling.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). You might possibly say that no tender at all was obtained.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will, I think, have to qualify that a little. I do not think it presents quite an accurate view of the case.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We differ in the interpretation of what constitutes a tender.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Technically my hon. friend is right. Any variation in a tender from the terms in which the tender is invited of course technically prevents that from being absolutely a tender. But, as the hon. gentleman knows, what took place was this. Certain questions were raised which became a subject of discussion between the Government here and the Colonial Office through the agency of the present High Commissioner. There were two tenders—one from Mr. Huddart and one from the Messrs. Allan. The Messrs. Allan's tender was a little lower, because it gave the amount in pounds sterling, whereas the other gave the amount in dollars. Much as the Government regretted that Mr. Huddart, with whom they had entered into a provisional arrangement, and who had spent a great deal of time and money in prosecuting the undertaking, was not in a position to undertake the work when placed in competition with the Messrs. Allan, they felt bound to give the precedence to the tender of the Messrs. Allan, because it was a little lower than that of Mr. Huddart, and because of the much more substantial and important reason, that we knew that the Messrs. Allan, in connection with the Glasgow firm who joined in making the tenders, presented an amount of capital and resources that would enable them at once to carry the work to vigorous completion. Under these circumstances, negotiations were entered into with the Messrs. Allan and the Colonial Office, and we arrived at a point which enabled us to agree upon a provisional contract; and all that was necessary, so far as the Government of Canada was concerned, was the signature of His Excellency the Governor General. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that an Order in Council was prepared authorizing the Government to make this provisional contract with the Messrs. Allan, subject to the approval of the House when it should meet, and so much importance did I attach to this work being carried rapidly and promptly to completion, that I took the liberty, when leaving office, of writing a letter to the hon. gentleman who succeeded me, suggesting that if the assent of the Governor General to this provisional contract were obtained, a year would probably be saved. It requires something like two years to construct, with due regard to economy, ships suitable for so great and important a service; and as soon as the assent of His Excellency was obtained to the proposal, it could be submitted for the approval of Her Majesty's Government. I had no doubt as to what the result of that application would be, because the matter had practically been settled between the Colonial Minister and myself, and the inviting of the new tenders had disposed of the only difficulty that stood in the way of the Colonial Minister applying to Parliament for the aid we required. I am sorry to say that this matter was not promptly carried out. Every person knows that the Messrs. Allan were the pioneers of the Atlantic service between Great Britain and this country; and, in addition to the fast ships, capable of maintaining an average speed of 20 knots at sea, which would require to be built under admiralty supervision, they had a great freight service at their disposal, with which they could implement the fast service in such a way as to make it most advantageous to Canada. The hope I entertained that this matter would be carried to a successful completion did not apparently meet with the concurrence of hon. gentlemen opposite. I cannot forget that when I made a statement on this subject to the House last session, my hon. friend the First Minister followed me with a hearty endorsement of the proposal. He stated that he had arrived at the same conclusion, that it was absolutely necessary that Canada should possess a fast Atlantic service, and his only doubt or hesitation in connection with the matter was as to the desirability of endeavouring to ascertain whether it would be practicable to obtain greater freight facilities in connection with that service. We cannot forget that in taking that position the hon. gentleman met with unexpected opposition on the part of some of his supporters, although I am inclined to believe that the great body of the gentlemen on that side of the House will be prepared to give a hearty and enthusiastic support to this measure—a measure which I say has been dealt with, not from a party standpoint, but which has commended itself to the approval and support of gentlemen on both sides of this House. I have heard it insinuated in various quarters that it would be impossible for us, even with a 20-knot service from Quebec in summer and Halifax in winter, to expect to draw a large amount of travel from the western states as well as from the various portions of Canada. I made some inquiry on that subject, and I found, on reference to the books of the Messrs Allan, containing an account of their passenger service, that at a time when their service from Canada could compete with that from New York, they booked passengers from the United States to the extent of $27,000 per month. I mention this in passing in order to show the House how important it would be for this country to enjoy the advantage of having the great tide of travel of that description brought to this country, one of the advantages of which would be that capitalists who would thus travel through Canada would naturally have their attention drawn to the great field for the investment of capital which this country presents.

I am only too glad to learn from any source that the Government are disposed to press this matter to a conclusion, but I confess that I am greatly disappointed when I find that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) is entrusted with the negotiations in this matter. I am surprised and disappointed that these negotiations should have been entrusted to a gentleman who, in addressing the Board of Trade in Quebec, and afterwards from his seat in this House, used strong arguments in opposition to the establishment of a fast Atlantic service, and whose arguments were therefore calculated, so far as the hon. gentleman's statements could have any effect, to discredit this service, not only in the estimation of this House, but of the Imperial Government or of any person who might attach importance to them. I do not question at all the good faith of the hon. gentleman nor do I propose to discuss his statements here, but it seems to me that if the Government were anxious to secure this great boon they would have done better to entrust the negotiations to some person who really heartily believed in the importance and value of the scheme. I think they would have done better to have placed the negotiations with the Imperial Government—with whom, I have no hesitation in saying, the whole question as to amount and everything else was practically settled—in the hands of some one more in sympathy with the project.

Curiously enough it seems that a new proposal has been made, which has been given in the "Globe" newspaper in minute detail. By this scheme, it is proposed to change the points of communications and select Milford Haven in Great Britain—which is a local question to be settled between the Government of Canada and Her Majesty's Government and the directors whoever they might be—and a port near the Strait of Canso. The "Globe," in publishing this proposal, said :

If the British syndicate which has been organized to carry out these proposals is a substantial one, and it is understood that it has all the money required, then the Government will probably make an examination of the proposal and the feasibility of this scheme.

The hon. First Minister disposed of this when he said that, under the Act which the House had passed in relation to this matter, it would not be practicable to take up this route, but I find that another paper, generally well informed as to the views of the Government—the Montreal "Daily Witness,"—in its issue of 13th of April, has an article on the question which ends with the following statement :—

The proposals submitted by the Milford syndicate are under the consideration of the Government.

The hon. First Minister shakes his head, and I accept at once the statement which he made before that the Government could not, under present legislation, consider this new scheme at all. I do not mean to say that there may not be something in the proposal, and what I fear is anything being brought up that may be calculated to delay what I regard as a very important measure and to prevent its being properly concluded. I draw the attention of the hon. First Minister to the condition under which, according to the "Globe," this syndicate line would be warranted in obtaining the consideration of the Government for its proposal, and that condition is that it should be shown to be a syndicate sufficiently powerful and possessing sufficient money resources to enable it to carry to completion any project it undertook. I should be very much surprised to learn that the hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Chamberlain), having made it a sine qua non to the Imperial Government contributing for this service, that new tenders should be asked for, to learn that he is prepared to ask the Imperial Parliament to ratify a contract with any persons upon terms which he absolutely refused to consider or entertain on a former occasion, after the service has been tendered for by the Messrs. Allan, with whom satisfactory negotiations had taken place by the late Government who asked the authority of the

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Governor General to sign the contract subject to the approval of this House.

Apart from that, unless this matter is to be treated from the standpoint of how not to do it, it is of the greatest importance that the gentlemen who undertake this contract should be persons possessing resources and standing and position sufficient to enable them to carry it to a successful conclusion. The hon. gentlemen opposite will agree in that opinion, and I am sure, alive as they must be, to the vital importance of any company undertaking so great a service being competent in every respect to satisfactorily carry out, their attention must have been drawn to the very clear and strong article over the signature of "Bona Fides" in the Montreal "Star" of April 3rd, in which elaborate proof is given, assuming it to be authentic, that Messrs. Peterson & Tate are parties utterly unable to carry out any service of the kind. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but the very fact that one of the leading papers in the country has given place in its columns to a laboured and clear statement of the financial position which these gentlemen occupy in England, supported by quotations from the best authority, is deserving the attention of the Government before committing this House to placing this important service in the hands of parties who might be found to be utterly inadequate to carry it to completion. I received by the last mail from England, I do not know from whose hand, a periodical called "The Syren." It appears to be a periodical of very good standing. It has an article on page 83 of the issue of March 31st, 1897, as follows :—

Poor Canada ! A "Times" telegram from Ottawa says : "In official circles here, it is stated that Messrs. Peterson & Co., steamship owners, Newcastle-on-Tyne, have entered into a provisional contract with the Dominion Government for a fast steamship service between Canada and England. The firm have undertaken to perform a 20-knot service for a subsidy much less than that for which the late Government were prepared to close with Messrs. Allan last year." We comment upon this subject at length in another column.

And in another column they point out the fact that Messrs. Peterson & Tate are not in a position to build the class of ships that are required, and that they would have to obtain a large amount of new plant and incur a very great outlay in order to turn out ships that would perform this service at all. This shows that this firm have not the exceptional facilities possessed by the Naval Armament Company and the White Star builders, the name of whose company I have forgotten for the moment, that turn out such ships as the "Teutonic" and the "Majestic" and that would be in a position to do the work infinitely more cheaply than a ship-building company that have never constructed such vessels. I do not know whether the Government will take us into their confidence sufficiently to tell us the terms of this contract which they admit that they have signed. Down to the present hour, in connection with this fast Atlantic service, everything that the Government has done has been proclaimed in and out of Parliament. This is a subject in which the whole country was so deeply interested that we felt we should fail in our duty to Parliament and to the country if we did not give the fullest publicity to every step in relation to it. I think, therefore, that this House has a right to expect that, as the Government have admitted that they have made a contract, they will lay a copy of that contract on the Table of the House, that we may be able to judge of it, and know our position in relation to a question of such vital importance to the country. I have no hesitation in saying that, anxious as I was to see Mr. Huddart obtain the reward of his energy and enterprise and of his large expenditure in prosecuting this work, yet, when, as High Commissioner, I was called upon to come over and confer on this subject with Sir Mackenzie Bowell and his Government, I said to Mr. Huddart frankly: The Colonial Minister makes it a sine qua non that there shall be new tenders, and I am bound to say to you in the spirit of friendship that the Government of Canada will not entertain any tender unless it is backed by such an amount of capital as to show that the parties are absolutely prepared, not to take the contract and endeavour to raise the capital upon it, but to carry it on to completion. So, Sir, I feel that nothing could more completely damn this enterprise than to enter into a contract with parties which have not all the resources to enable them to carry it to completion. But the fact that Mr. Huddart, with a contract from this Government for £150,000 a year could do nothing in the money market of the world to obtain the necessary capital, but that, after the most complete investigation, it was found absolutely necessary for the Imperial Government to supplement that with £75,000 a year, is the best proof that to undertake this service for a sum materially less than £225,000 a year must involve placing it in the hands of people who will not be able to carry it to a successful completion. Deploping, as I do, any delay—because it will take two years after the contract is made to construct the steamers—I felt it my duty to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to what I regard as the great importance of this question and to give a brief and general résumé of the facts already before the House, that they may take such steps as will secure not a contract but the early and successful carrying out of the work by parties who possess the necessary resources, knowledge and enterprise. I regret taking up the time of the House but I felt it my duty to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this point. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). For all practical purposes, I suppose, the House might as well adjourn, because the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has pretty well destroyed the chance of doing anything to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And this matter is of no value or consequence, I suppose.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will not say that, but the method the hon. gentleman has taken to bring up this question renders his remarks of much less consequence than they otherwise would be. Now, the hon. gentleman was good enough to accuse the Government of discourtesy, saying that they did not deal fairly with the House in not bringing down all the steps of an uncompleted negotiation. I think that most of my parliamentary friends will agree with me that for an hon. gentleman of his experience to bring this question up on a motion for adjournment, without giving the slightest notice to the Government of his intention to do so, was a most excellent mode of wasting the time of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought the question asked was sufficient notice that the matter was to be taken up.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This is the first time I have ever heard this doctrine of implication advanced by a gentleman in the position of the leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman knows that the custom has been, when gentlemen availed themselves of this special mode of calling attention to a question, to give the Government notice of it, if they want a detailed reply. I think a good deal of the pith of the hon. gentleman's remarks was contained in a sentence which dropped from him, perhaps, unawares, a few minutes ago, in which he protested against the people of Canada being allowed to get this contract for anything less than the million and a quarter, or so, which he was prepared to pay for it. If I am to judge by the hon. gentleman's expression, he would regard it as a high crime and misdemeanour for the present Liberal Government to succeed in getting done for two-thirds of the sum what he was prepared to pay for, on an extremely doubtful class of tenders, at a rate of $750,000 a year. I took occasion, when this matter was up before the House, without desiring to reflect upon either the Messrs. Huddart or the Messrs. Allan, to intimate to the hon. gentleman what I now repeat—that I, for one, do not consider the tenders given by Mr. Huddart or by the Messrs. Allan as tenders in any proper sense at all. And for two reasons: Both one and the other of these firms, as the hon. leader of the Opposition well knows, chose to annex to its tender certain conditions. In one case they were to have four months, and in the other six months, at the end of which time either one or the other of them might say to the people of Canada: We do not choose to go on; we do not find it convenient to go on. He recollects those terms occurring in their proposition. But in the case of the Messrs. Allan, he knows very well there were a number of other statements made which would have had the effect of putting it very completely at their option and not at ours, as to whether we got a 20-knot service, or a 19-knot service, or an 18-knot service, or a 17-knot service, or a 15-knot service, for the matter of that. Then changes were imported, and a lot of qualifications and a lot of conditions were inserted which, in my humble opinion, rendered their tender a wholly one-sided affair, so far as they are concerned, at any rate. Sir, the hon. gentleman and his friends are in a most desperate hurry now. I recollect some seven, or it may be eight, years elapsed since the date when the hon. ex-Finance Minister declared that his Government were a 20-knot Government, and therefore required a 20-knot service, before they ever called for tenders; and I recollect more, that when they did call for tenders they gave just five weeks' notice to enable all the world to compete. I think the tender under which the hon. gentleman proposed to give away, for ten years, $750,000 a year, was issued somewhere about the first week of May, and the tenders were to be accepted somewhere in the second week of June. Now, I must say to him that I think that tenders under those conditions were very little calculated to bring out anything like the number of tenderers that might have been expected for a service of this kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will allow me to say that that was represented as absolutely necessary, if the service was to be ready to commence two years from May.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Then all I can say is that the Government had come to that knowledge very late in the day. Now, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, everybody knows well, that if tenders for a service of that kind are to be of the slightest value, they must be for a sufficient length of time to enable plans to be prepared, to enable careful calculations to be made, to enable financial arrangements to be made; in other words, that a very much longer time than five or six weeks would have been necessary to enable persons without very special knowledge in that very difficult question, to come in at all; so that I regard tenders given under those conditions, and for that length of time, as not at all likely to afford to the people of Canada any sufficient or adequate protection or assurance that they would get a fair tender for the service. Now, what is the actual fact of the case? The actual fact of the case is this—and as regards the question of discourtesy, it is important—that, as the hon. gentleman perfectly well knows, this is a matter in which the British Government have a great deal to say as well as ours. As this contract, before anything can be done with it, must be submitted to this House for its approval, we certainly exercise no discourtesy towards this House in waiting until we know what the English Government are going to do before we proceed to lay on the Table the full details of a negotiation of this kind. I am quite certain the hon. gentleman, in our place, would have waited until he knew exactly what the English Government were going to do. What we did do was this: we found that a very advantageous proposition indeed for the people of Canada, at any rate, was being submitted, a proposition which, if it were carried out correctly, would have given us a better service, and would have given us better boats, would have given us far more accommodation, and would have got it for two-thirds of the money. Was it our duty or was it not, to confer with the English Government, the other parties to the matter, and ascertain whether they were willing to unite with us under those circumstances? Now, Sir, it is perfectly clear that Mr. Chamberlain and the British Government had the right, and always had the right, under such circumstances, to require new tenders; and I submit that it was a totally proper thing, under the circumstances which subsisted a matter of a year ago, for Mr. Chamberlain to say: Rather than commit my Government to the expenditure of $375,000 a year, and your Government to the expenditure of $750,000 for a term of ten years, I will ask for tenders. Then it would be for Mr. Chamberlain or any one else to say: After our tenders only succeeded in eliciting a proposal to do this service for something like $1,125,000 a year, after we find that that was the best we could do, when a vastly better offer was made, we must still continue tendering. Now, what is the object of tendering at all? The object of tendering is to get these things at a fair and reasonable price, and if you once get a tender, you may do just as in the case of an ordinary transaction, when you have put property up at auction; if you cannot obtain a certain sum for your own reserve bid, everybody knows it is a constant thing to accept a fair offer, when a fair offer is made; and that will be precisely our position. As to the position of Messrs. Peterson & Tate, they did not propose to construct these ships in their own yards at all, they knew perfectly well that they were not in a position to do it. So far as the information given us shows, they were persons who were to be relied upon, who were willing to make a reasonable deposit, and of whose solvency we had received assurances from parties of high standing; and they have made provision with proper ship-building companies, and they have made provision with parties of high financial standing to enable them to carry out this undertaking, always provided that we and the British Government consent to the moderate terms which they propose. That and nothing else is the position of the matter as it now stands. Of course, the hon. gentleman does not expect, has no business to expect, that I should proceed to follow him over the elaborate history which he gave us with respect to these same contracts. I dare say the hon. gentleman may have done his best, sincerely and honestly, to obtain this service for the people of Canada at a reasonable sum, although I do not altogether approve of all the steps he took with respect to it. But I do submit to him, and I submit to the House, that it is not at all the best way, if he is desirous, as he tells us he is, of promoting this service, to interpose a discussion at this stage without asking for papers, and before any papers can be brought down to him, and when he knows that Mr. Chamberlain has stated that the British Government has this thing under consideration. Does he suppose it will help to obtain this contract at a reasonable figure, that it should be telegraphed across that he objects to all these proceedings? Does he suppose it is going to help Mr. Chamberlain in his negotiations for him virtually to declare that he does not believe that the thing can be done for less than £250,000, because he was not able to obtain a better offer than that? Unless that is his view, I cannot conceive for what purpose he should have got up this discussion at the present moment, and without any notice. Now, it is quite true that numerous suggestions have been made to us at various times as to other routes, such as he referred to; but he knows very well the understanding with the House, which we did not feel justified in departing from, the understanding which his Government had and which is virtually the understanding on both sides, was that this service was to be from Quebec in summer, and from Halifax in winter. These other matters he has alluded to, we cannot consider, I do not think we ought to consider, at all until the question of the Quebec and Halifax service has been definitely disposed of. We will probably be in a position very shortly to intimate to the House what decision the Imperial authorities have arrived at. But I submit to him, and I submit to the House, that no possible good can arise from our discussing a matter which is actually being negotiated with the Imperial authorities—unless, as I said, the hon. gentleman, finding that we have obtained a considerably better offer than was made to him, wishes in advance to discredit all chance of our obtaining a large saving, to make a saving which, over the term of ten years that these contracts are proposed to extend, would amount to something like two or three millions to the people of Canada. That would be the result, and that is the only result that he can obtain from interposing in these negotiations at the present time. Had he given me notice of that, I should have been prepared with certain papers and documents to reply to him; and if he chooses to move for these papers, this matter can be brought up in a legitimate way and with some reasonable advantage, possibly, to the public service, at a later date; but at the present time, I must tell him that in my mind and judgment he is doing no service to the country at all by springing such a discussion on the House.

Mr. HAGGART. The House will notice that the hon. the Minister has not replied in any way whatever to the first complaint made by the leader of the Opposition. My hon. friend stated that as regards nearly every matter of importance, instead of the act of the Government being first communicated to Parliament, the information came indirectly through other channels, through an unimportant paper in Chicago, like the Chicago "Record," or by statements made by the President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in England, or by correspondence in a London paper setting out that an Order in Council had been passed respecting a fast Atlantic service, or by a communication made to the British House of Commons by the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, stating that a contract had been entered into by the Canadian Government, which was then under the consideration of the Imperial Government. The only reply made by the hon. the Minister is that when we were in power and occupied the Treasury benches the Government entered into a contract for this service without giving sufficient notification to tenderers, that only five weeks were given, during which time it was impossible to go into the necessary details and prepare tenders which would be of such a character as would bear inquiry. What are the facts in regard to this matter? No application was made by hon. gentlemen opposite for tenders; no statement was made by the Government that they had changed their minds as to the manner in which those vessels should be built. What was required was very simple information, upon which any shipbuilder could at once submit a tender, namely: the number of tons per vessel, the number of knots of speed, and the carrying capacity as regards passengers and cold storage. Five weeks was ample time to give tenderers. Why did not hon. gentlemen opposite give the same length of time to intending competitors? No, they entered into a contract forthwith. We do not know the class of vessels arranged for, or the tonnage. A representative of a company came over here from the old country and returned with a contract, and at the same time stated that if the Canadian Government, which was primarily interested, was satisfied to grant a large sum of money for the proposed service, why should not the Imperial Government supplement that grant with a subsidy? What the people of this country required was a service equal to the best that crosses the Atlantic. It was for such a service that they were prepared to pay $750,000 a year for ten years, and which led them to induce the Imperial Government to supplement that sum by a further grant of $375,000 a year for a like period. What do we know about the proposed service, or even about the parties? Whoever heard of Peterson, Tate & Co., before they entered into this contract? Whoever heard about the system of turret ships, which it is said is being foisted on this Government? The people of the country have had no time to consider this subject; the contract was entered into without tenders being asked and without Parliament being notified. These facts form the basis of our complaint. The justification put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite is that the contract will not amount to anything unless it is supplemented by the action and approval of the Imperial Parliament. How do we know what the form of contract will be, or what means are being urged on the Imperial authorities to lead them to modify their views as to the class of vessels required. Have we had any intimation from the Imperial authorities, or has there been any change in their opinions, since the time when they were unwilling to ratify our contract without calling for further tenders. No such information has been laid before the House, or at all events hon. gentlemen opposite do not deign to give hon. members information. If there has been a change in the opinion as to the requirements of the Imperial authorities regarding the proposed fast line, the announcement should be made to this House, and the people of the country should be given a chance to consider it. Tenders should have been openly asked for and inquired into and publicly accepted, and this course of entering into contracts secretly with persons unknown should not have been adopted, and five weeks' notice should have been given to intending contractors. These are the complaints put before by the leader of the Opposition, that instead of this House being informed by the Government as to what contracts have been entered into, some weeks elapse before the Government deign to give information to the House; further, we find that the parties with whom this contract has been entered into are unknown, that the character of the service and tonnage of the vessels is not known; and our contention is that the House should be taken into the confidence of the Government as to whether the class, speed and equipment of the vessels will be such as will prove satisfactory to the country.

Mr. HAGGART.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). If any proof were required of the inutility of a debate taking place at present on the fast line service, that proof has been afforded by the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. The hon. member is in utter ignorance of the facts connected with the letting of this contract, which he himself holds must be in the possession of hon. members before they can discuss it in a satisfactory manner. I only rise for the purpose of recalling the hon. gentleman's attention to what was stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and to which he apparently did not listen. The contract which the Government has signed is a provisional contract essentially. The contract which the Government has signed is one that must be submitted to and approved of in all its details by the Imperial Government before it comes into force; and over and above all, the contract, if approved by the Imperial Government in all its details, does not have the slightest effect or force until it is laid before this House together with the specifications, and contract and specification receive the approval of the representatives of the people in this Parliament. That being the case, what more does the hon. gentleman want? If he had listened to the speech of his leader, he would have learned the great and pressing importance of not losing any time in this matter, and I will not waste time by pointing out what was so effectively shown by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that when we did receive a proposition such as we received from eminent and responsible shipbuilders such as Peterson, Tate & Co., to carry out the Fast Atlantic Mail Service for a sum of money infinitely below that to which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were lately prepared to commit the country, there was but one duty laid on the Government, and it was that of submitting the proposition in the speediest and most effective way to the Imperial Government and afterwards to the representatives of the people in this country. That course has been taken. The people will not have any mine sprung on them, they will be satisfied that everything has been done and every measure taken to safeguard their interests and the interests of the travelling public. I can only regret the ignorance which the hon. gentleman stated he was possessed of when he told this House that nobody knew anything of the standing of the Messrs. Peterson & Tate. Sir, when the hon. gentleman comes to inquire, he will learn, that not only are they most distinguished shipbuilders, but that their record as financial men is one which he himself, when he learns the facts, will implicitly accept.

Mr. HAGGART. I got the record from the papers, the Montreal "Star." If you read that you will see the record.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Montreal "Herald."

Mr. HAGGART. The Montreal "Herald."

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to continue this debate, but I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to another matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. You cannot speak on any other matter than the fast line.

Mr. FOSTER. Cannot you hitch it on to the fast line?

Mr. McNEILL. I suppose I could, if necessary. I should like, with the indulgence of the House, to call attention to the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow the rules of the House to be so often broken.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would suggest to the hon. gentlemen opposite, that for the convenience of some private members, we might by mutual consent take up private Bills and advance them a stage. It is obvious at this moment that we cannot do anything else, and then I suppose the House will adjourn at six o'clock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would conduce to the convenience of the House to adopt the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then, with the unanimous consent of the House, we shall proceed to call the order for Private Bills.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 28) respecting the Ontario Pacific Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.—(Mr. Snetsinger.)

Bill (No. 30) respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (No. 31) respecting the Trail Creek and Columbia Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 32) respecting the Columbia and Kootenay Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

CALGARY AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Osler) moved second reading of Bill (No. 33) respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to call attention to the fact, that this Bill has not been distributed. As this Bill entirely affects the constituency which I represent, and as a number of petitions have been presented in regard to it, I would ask to have it thoroughly understood, that by my agreeing to the second reading, there shall be no prejudice to amendments in the Railway Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. According to the orders before us, this Bill seems to have been printed in English and distributed, but probably the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) has not obtained his copy from the post office. There is no reason that I know of, why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is not free to move any amendment he wishes in committee. This Bill will have to be posted over vacation, and it will be eight days at least before it can be considered in committee. The only objection the hon. gentleman can take is, that it has not been printed in French, but I suppose he will not press that.

Mr. OLIVER. If the mover of the Bill were here, I would ask for explanations, but as he is not here, I do not want to block the second reading of the Bill, and I do not want to prejudice my case in committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ADJOURNMENT—THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I suppose under the circumstances the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will consent to the adjournment now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the House adjourns, I may perhaps be allowed to refer to the matter which I desired to mention a moment ago. I desire to call to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now acting as Minister of Militia, this paragraph which appeared in the Ottawa "Citizen" this morning:

The War and the Colonial Offices are considering General Gascoigne's request for leave to send a Canadian regiment, 600 strong, to the Queen's Jubilee. The officials speak most appreciatively of the request as an evidence of Canada's desire to do the highest possible honour to the occasion; but they feel that the difficulties for such a number are insuperable, among them being, that the acceptance of Canada's offer would upset all the proportions allotted to the other colonies.

Of course, we do not know what the proportions allotted to other colonies may be; but, taking 75 men for each of the seven colonies of Australasia, we would have 600 men as just the right proportion for Canada. I have observed for some time past that there is a tendency among Imperial officials in the mother country, when reckoning the colonies, to count in this way: Canada, one; New South Wales, one; Victoria, one; Queensland, one. Now, this is not doing Canada justice at all. I desire to call the attention of the House to this matter because it is one of great importance and which will be of increasing importance to Canada as time goes on. The computation should not be in that line, but in this line: Canada, eight; New South Wales, one; Victoria, one; and so forth. It is surely too absurd to assume that because the British North American colonies have confederated, because they have advanced further on the path towards Imperial unity, than any other group of British colonies, the individual colonies composing that confederation are not to count for as much as the other colonies which have not advanced so far as we have. This group of colonies is the highest product, if I may so express it, of the forces which make for Imperial unity—the highest evolution produced by those forces; and it would be surely absurd to count the individual colonies composing this confederation, as less than those colonies which are not so highly developed.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not in order to make a speech when the adjournment of the House is moved for the purpose of concluding the business. The hon. gentleman should confine his remarks to the smallest possible limit.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not going to make a speech. I was just about concluding what I had to say. I was about to call attention to this, that when this reckoning was adopted in connection with the Colonial Conference held here a few years ago on the question of preferential trade within the Empire, a Minister of the Crown stated in the Imperial House of Commons that there had been a very considerable difference of opinion among the colonies on that question—that there was far from a unanimous feeling on the question; and why? Because, he said, the division was five to three. How did he arrive at that conclusion? By counting Canada one, New South Wales one, Tasmania one, and so forth. That is to say, the whole Dominion of Canada was held as of only equal value with the little colony of Tasmania. I think it cannot be too strongly pressed upon the attention of this House, that it is absolutely necessary in the interests of the Dominion that we should have it recognized in England that we are not to be counted as merely equal in value to one of the unfederated colonies, but that each of the colonies of this confederation is to be held as having a value of its own equal to that of each of the other separate colonies in those groups of colonies that have not been federated. I hope that when my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) comes to deal with this question, if we are to have an outburst of Imperial sentiment and of loyalty strangled by red tape, he will see, at all events, that the execution is performed in an orderly and decent manner.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). All I would say to my hon. friend is this: that the paragraph he alludes to I have not yet had an opportunity of seeing. In fact, at present, I am unable to find time to read many newspapers at all. I think he and the House will agree with me that we must really wait until we are officially communicated with by the Imperial Government through some other medium than the Ottawa "Citizen," before I can be expected to refer to the subject. I will lose no time in giving the fullest information to the press and to all parties concerned when the British Government's answer arrives, and is made known to us. With respect to the other point which my hon. friend has alluded to, I am and have always been disposed to insist on the superiority of Canada, and the officials of Canada over every other colony. There I am heartily in accord with him. As to the relative proportion of guests or military contingents that the British Government may choose to invite on this occasion, I must remind him that we are after all guests, and we cannot prescribe to the British Government how many guests they will have. That is for them to say. I have observed that in one respect, at any rate, they are perfectly willing to admit the greater population and resources of Canada. When it comes to the question of contributing to any purpose such as a Pacific cable, they are always willing to recognize our supremacy, and to give us the proud privilege of paying four times as much as any of the other colonies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. While concurring with the observations made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I would like to ask him whether the statement which I see current in the press that Major General Gascoigne has offered the Imperial Government to send 600 men, is a correct statement?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, it is not a correct statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a very ludicrous one, I must say.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. MARTIN. I am sorry the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) is not in his place, as I would like, before this motion is carried, to ask him in regard to a statement which was ordered by this House last session, in reference to the expenditure on railways by the Dominion, all over the Dominion, and in each of the provinces. I have called his attention to the matter several times this session. I am sorry that statement has not yet been laid on the Table of this House, as it is very important to the province from which I come that it should be forthcoming. I find that many of the members of this House and I learn that some members of the Government are under a misapprehension as to the amount of the railway expenditure in the province from which I come, and I think the statement I ask for, when brought down, will put this matter right. I am anxious, before the discussion takes place in this House on the motion for papers and correspondence relating to the proposed railway construction in Prince Edward Island, that that statement should be laid on the Table, as I believe it is very necessary in order to disabuse the minds of hon. members in regard to the railway expenditure by the Dominion Government in that province.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). When the hon. gentleman mentioned the matter before, I called the special attention of the Minister of Railways to it, and the Minister gave instructions to have the return pushed on. I hope he will have it at an early day.

TEMPORARY GOVERNMENT LOANS.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) whether he can answer the question which I put at the beginning of this day's sitting with regard to temporary loans, and which I now repeat :

What temporary loans are now current? What is the date on which they began to run respectively, and when do they end? With whom have they been contracted, and at what rates?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). My hon. colleague the Minister of Finance is not present, but I take the liberty, in his absence, of giving the hon. gentleman the information, which I find on my hon. colleague's desk :—

1. £1,000,000 sterling, being £400,000 contracted by the late Government and renewed, and £600,000 contracted by the present Government.

2. 1st January, 1897, and 1st July, 1897.

3. £600,000 with Bank of Montreal at 3½ per cent per annum, and £400,000 with National Provincial Bank of England at 3 per cent per annum.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 20th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of François Arthur Marcotte, Esquire, for the electoral district of Champlain.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.—(Mr. Casey, for Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 39) respecting the Canadian General Electric Company (Limited).—(Mr. Casey, for Mr. Lount.)

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

François Arthur Marcotte, Esq., member for the electoral district of Champlain, introduced by Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Adolphe Caron.

THE ELECTION IN SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the House to a state of things in one of the constituencies of the North-west Territories which is, I hope, unparalleled in Canada. It is a state of things alarming and disgraceful and in which, it is to be feared, more than one prominent member of the Government is implicated; and it is, therefore, of the first importance that the attention of Parliament should be called to the state of things that exists at the present time, and has existed, in the constituency of Saskatchewan. And it is therefore of the first importance that the attention of Parliament should be called to the state of things that exists at present and has existed for some time in the constituency of Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member propose to make a motion?

Mr. DAVIN. I do. In June last we had an election, and the hon. First Minister ran in the constituency of Saskatchewan, and was elected. He was elected by a small majority, and not merely was there ground for protesting the election—my hon. friend was in no way, I believe, personally concerned in that—but we could have claimed the seat. Nevertheless, in response to urgent appeals from leading Liberals in Prince Albert, the answer came from the leaders of the Conservative party that they did not wish to disturb the hon. First Minister in his seat. I do not know whether this was the right course to adopt or not, but at any rate it was the one which was taken. The hon. First Minister then elected to sit for Saskatchewan, and there was anxiety to have the new Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) sit for the constituency of Saskatchewan. It was felt desirable that he should have a seat in the North-west Territories, and suggestions were made to the Liberals in Prince Albert and other parts of Saskatchewan that he should be nominated and run for that constituency. Many people thought he would run, but the feeling was so strong, a certain under-current that I need not further particularize, was so effective, that the prospect of having the Controller of Customs run for the Saskatchewan division became dimmer and dimmer until it entirely disappeared. Then the condition of the Liberal party in that constituency was such that a brother of the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) had to be brought from Calgary to act as peace-maker, and he filled that role with such success that he left the Prince Albert Liberals in a worse state of internecine war than that in which he found them. Well, if we are to trust to circumstantial evidence as well as openly-stated telegrams, the hon. First Minister then entrusted the mission of peace to a mutual friend of his and of mine, a leading official in the Indian Department, whom he sent to Prince Albert to arrange for the candidature of Mr. Newlands. This official, under the impression that he was calling on the present member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), called on a brother of that hon. gentleman, and it so happened that this brother, although close to the hon. gentleman in kin, is less than kind, at all events from a political standpoint. In fact, of all the Liberals in Saskatchewan, he was the most opposed to the nomination of his near relative, the present member for that constituency. It was a very interesting story at the time; and from the high and lofty view taken by the First Minister when we bring before this House the dismissal of public servants for interference in elections and active partisanship, I am greatly surprised that the hon. gentleman did not punish this official, who, by his own orders, had been guilty of what certainly the hon. gentleman himself would pronounce gross misconduct. Anyway this leading official, one of the leading officials of the North-west Territories, went to the Saskatchewan on a political mission, and so determined was he to keep his mission secret, that he did not take any of the other Liberals into his confidence, but went at once, as he thought, to the hon. member for the Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). By mistake, however, he went to his brother instead, and was told by the brother, after he had heard the whole story, that he was entirely of different views. Then the whole thing was given away and got into the papers. On the 29th of September, the Saskatchewan "Times" gave an account of this matter which nobody has ever dared to contradict. After quoting a telegram that was sent from Prince Albert to the Winnipeg "Free Press," the Saskatchewan "Times" went on to say:

The above despatch from the "Free Press" correspondent here is correct in every detail, but the correspondent might have extended his report with all the particulars, as the whole transaction is now public property. The story leaked out in the following rather amusing manner. The Indian official mentioned in the despatch arrived in Prince Albert, and, wishing to keep his mission as quiet as possible, called on but very few Liberals. He had known Mr. J. O. Davis in the old days in the police force, and was not aware there was any other Davis a merchant and politician in Prince Albert. So, early on the morrow after his arrival, Mr. Indian Official called into Mr. J. O. Davis's store and imparted to that gentleman the information that he was Mr. Laurier's emissary to try, if possible, and unite the opposing factions of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan.

This high official, taking this prominent political part, and he a Reformer—why, Sir, it is incredible. There must be something wrong. This certainly cannot be believed.

He, of course, produced credentials from his chief, and proceeded to discuss matters political, and finally, after doing all the talking, intimated that, if Mr. Davis would not recede from his position and allow Newlands to get the nomination, they would have to do something for Newlands; and, as Mr. Barker, inspector of registry offices, was growing old, it was proposed to get rid of him and give the position to Mr. Newlands, and if this was agreeable, Mr. Davis could count on the support of the Government.

Here is another feature of the policy of the Government emphasized. Not merely are they to give positions to men because of political action, but they are to knife officials in order to make room for them.

The chagrin of Mr. Laurier's emissary may be better imagined than described, when he was told that he had given the whole thing away to a man whose greatest living desire was to see T. O. Davis and H. W. Newlands defeated. These are the facts, which are well known to the public, but have not hitherto appeared in print.

Well, time passed on, and still the Liberals of Prince Albert could not agree. The soothing hand of Mr. Sifton, of Calgary, had been irritating, and the irritation had gone on increasing, and the result was that month after month, week after week, day after day, the happy family of Liberals in Prince Albert and the Saskatchewan grew more and more irritated and determined to fight among themselves, and the irritation culminated in a contest between Mr. McPhail and the present member for Saskatchewan. What happened? The present member was elected, and it is notorious that there was good ground and good evidence to support the personal charges made against him and which would have disqualified him. What then took place? Mr. McPhail filed his petition, and Mr. Davis came down to Ottawa, and the hon. Finance Minister, it is said, telegraphed for Mr. Macarthur, and then Mr. Sifton took a hand, and the result was a corrupt bargain, under which Mr. McPhail returned, and with lightning speed got his petition withdrawn. And the result is now that the Liberals, the respectable Liberals in Prince Albert and in the Saskatchewan—I am not now speaking only for the Conservatives, but I can say that I am speaking for the respectable Liberals—

Mr. GUAY. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Though my hon. friend (Mr. Guay) seems surprised at that, I can tell him that there are respectable Liberals in the Saskatchewan; and not merely in the Saskatchewan, for I have been recently reading in some of the papers of the province from which my hon. friend comes, language expressing of their shame at the state of things they find here at Ottawa.

Mr. GUAY. State it.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend need not be a bit afraid; I am going to lay this whole matter before the House. And I had hoped, considering the view we have frequently had of such things from my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is now about to leave the House, I really had hoped that he would remain and second my motion.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Great is your faith.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Saskatchewan "Times" of March 23rd, 1897, contained an article headed "The Protest Settlement Reviewed," which article is as follows:—

An interesting and highly important document now lies snugly ensconced among many other important papers, the property of Mr. J. R. McPhail, late Liberal candidate in opposition to Mr. T. O. Davis. The brief notice given out last week, that the protest proceedings in connection with the election of Pushful Thomas to the Commons has been dropped, was a decided surprise to a very large number of people of all shades of political belief. Mr. McPhail's solemn protestation, that he had ample evidence on hand to unseat and disqualify his late opponent, was taken seriously by all his friends, and much more seriously by his enemies, Davis's party, and, as a matter of fact, which can be ascertained on unimpeachable authority, we are in a position to state that he did possess evidence of the most damaging description, which, had it been disclosed in court, would have shown Grit methods of conducting elections to be the most corrupt on record, and without doubt would have relegated T. O. Davis to political obscurity. That in the face of the gross corruption collected by Mr. McPhail, and sworn to by him and others in the petition he lodged, the protest should now be dropped, came, we repeat, as a surprise. The distress of mind which the protest caused Mr. Davis, his frantic efforts to get even with his persecutors by instituting criminal proceedings against several of McPhail's supporters, and the untiring manner in which the member and his friends, actively assisted by the Liberal Government at Ottawa, worked to secure the withdrawal of the protest, could not be regarded otherwise than as an open and unqualified confession of guilt, and being so understood by the general public, there was very general surprise and indignation when the matter was allowed to drop. Mr. McPhail himself, there is no doubt, was willing to proceed, but one by one his Grit followers forsook him. He was wired from Ottawa to meet and talk over the matter with the Finance Minister. He obeyed the summons, and appeared from that day to see things in a different light. Meanwhile, Mr. James Macarthur received notice from Hon. Clifford Sifton that the actions of himself and McPhail were a stab at the Government, and seeing any schemes he might have had for a senatorship swiftly fading, with T. O. Davis as member, devised the plan of writing out several propositions. These were submitted, first to A. L. Sifton, the Calgary peace-maker, and then sent to Brother Clifford at Ottawa. The document comprising these resolutions is that alluded to above; and, by the courtesy of two gentlemen who were accorded the privilege of seeing it, we are in a position to publish its contents.

Now, Sir, this is the document:

The Dominion Government agrees to accept J. R. McPhail as Government candidate at the next general elections, pledging themselves to do all in their power to secure his nomination and election.

Thos. O. Davis agrees to, and does, sign a promissory note in favour of J. R. McPhail for the sum of $..... (The blank was filled in by a comparatively large sum of money.)

The following gentlemen are hereby constituted an advisory committee to act with the present member for Saskatchewan:—J. R. McPhail, Jas. Macarthur, Alexander Selkirk Stewart, Graham Neilson, William Knox.

And it is further agreed, that no appointments to office, letting of tenders and other matters connected with the representation of Saskatchewan in Parliament, shall be made or performed unless sanctioned by at least four members of the advisory committee.

The article goes on:

This is enough of the agreement to show the wondering public why the protest was dropped. It is, we believe, sufficient to convince the electors that they are represented at Ottawa by a man who, to all intents and purposes, is not only tied body and soul to support the Government, whether right or wrong, but has also allowed himself to be securely gagged and handcuffed to a half a dozen Liberals of the town of Prince Albert, who are, as will be seen by this agreement, really the member for this district.

So far as the patronage is concerned, I think, Sir, this is an agreement which strikes at the independence of a member of this House; and it is a matter, therefore, that this House should take cognizance of. I hold that the Government ought to have an inquiry, examine witnesses, whose names I shall give them, witnesses who are ready to come here and be examined—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that when an hon. member makes what, so far as I can judge, are charges against another hon. member affecting that hon. member's independence and so on, that it is only proper to give notice of a motion—

Mr. DAVIN. I gave the hon. gentleman notice.

Mr. SPEAKER. I mean the regular notice. The Orders of the Day show no notice of motion to have been given. I thought, until the hon. gentleman came to what seemed to be personal charges that he was indulging in a general discussion of—

Mr. DAVIN. I will content myself with calling attention to—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I thought the hon. gentleman was indulging in a general discussion of the condition of affairs in Saskatchewan, and would conclude with a motion to adjourn. But I think he will see that if he makes a charge, as he seems to be doing, that that is a subject for notice of motion, and that a motion on that subject should follow.

Mr. DAVIN. I will content myself with calling the attention of the Government and the House to what is going on in Saskatchewan, and will personally make no charge whatever.

Mr. SPEAKER. But if the hon. gentleman allows a newspaper or any one else to make a charge through him, that will be the same thing. The hon. gentleman must not be the mouthpiece of any one in making a charge any more than he must make a charge himself without notice. He must assume the responsibility as the—

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) cannot interrupt.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course, I have no desire whatever to disobey or to attempt to disobey in any way any ruling of yours, and, if I speak, it is solely as to the point of order. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary to give notice if an hon. member seeks to call attention, for the behoof of the Government, for the behoof of this House, at the first moment when a serious state of things comes under his notice. It would be necessary, of course, to give notice if I was going to conclude with a motion to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, with great respect for your ruling, that it is not necessary to give notice, but that it is a matter of duty without notice at all, when a serious state of things like this comes to my notice, to rise at the very first moment in the House and call the attention of the House and the Government to it. Suppose, for instance—and I may argue the point of order—that some wrong is done to the Prime Minister in this matter, is it not of the utmost importance to the country and to a man occupying his position that the earliest opportunity should be given him to deal with it and disavow it? For instance, here is a statement which I meet that a corrupt bargain has been made between the Government and certain persons in Saskatchewan. If there is no truth in that, if the Prime Minister is in a position to disavow it—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not object at all to the hon. gentleman saying that a corrupt bargain has been made by the Government. That is not a personal matter exactly; it does not affect the independence of any hon. member of this House. But I still feel that the hon. gentleman is rather confusing the right that any hon. member has to get up and raise a question of privilege which affects himself with the raising of a question of privilege against an hon. member without notice, which, I think, cannot be allowed, at any rate, unless a case of great urgency has been shown to exist.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The point that is now under your consideration, Mr. Speaker, is a very grave one indeed, and I should like to have the opportunity of stating that so far as my acquaintance with parliamentary practice goes, I think it has been the invariable practice in this House, when a grave charge affecting either an hon. member of the House or a member of the Government of this country has arisen, for an hon. member to draw the attention of the Government and of the House at the earliest possible moment to the matter, and the opportunity is given—which is most desirable in the interest of the character of the House and the Government—the hon. member who may be affected by that statement to make such explanations as perhaps may entirely dispose of the whole question. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious matter indeed to interpose when an hon. member is bringing forward a matter of such grave moment as is the matter now under consideration of the House, affecting so seriously the position of an hon. member on a very grave question, and the hon. member thus affected be prevented by closing a discussion from having an opportunity of making his explanation. I have very great respect for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on any question; but I think the present question is one that requires to be very carefully considered before the House adopts the course indicated, that does not strike me to be either in the interest of the Government or of this House or especially of any member affected by statements so confidently made.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Charges made against an hon. member of this House unfortunately have not been made for the first time, but the practice when we occupied seats on the other side of the House was, not to make such charges under colour of a motion to adjourn, but such charges were made on the personal responsibility of an hon. member. I did not propose to take notice of the charges when I heard that the hon. member intended to conclude with a motion to adjourn the House. But if any hon. gentleman wishes to make a charge against any member of the Government or any member of this House, there is a proper way to do so, and conform to the rules of the House, viz.: to make a personal statement on his responsibility as a member of the House, conclude his statement with a charge, and that charge must then be investigated. That practice has been followed time and again; but I never heard an hon. gentleman make a statement out of scurrilous newspapers, and attach so much importance to them, and yet dare not say from his place, I make that charge personally. The hon. gentleman would have the Government and the House act on idle gossip. The Government will not act on any idle newspaper gossip, but if the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) makes charges on the floor of the House from his place as a member of this House against any hon. member of this House they will receive the attention of this Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid the rule laid down by the Prime Minister would unfortunately prevent discussion from this side of the House of any act of the Government or of any members supporting the Government, no matter how well known it was and how much it was being commented on in the newspaper press and by the public. He in fact says that no charge of misconduct against the Government or any supporter of the Government shall be ventilated in this House unless the charge is made on the personal responsibility of a member.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). He did not make any such statement.

Mr. FOSTER. And that he, as a member of the House, prefers a distinct charge. I have been a member of this House since 1882 and I never have seen such a rule invoked, and I hope there never will be such a rule invoked in the interest of good government. It is one thing if I with my knowledge of certain things, having looked carefully into them, have come to the conclusion that there is a case of malfeasance on the part of a member of the Government, and I determine that it is my duty as a member of this House to prefer that charge and have it tried. But, Mr. Speaker, you know and every hon. member knows that not a day passes when in the recrimination and in the criticism of party politics there are not cases occurring on the part of the Government which have obtained notoriety in the newspapers, which go from mouth to mouth throughout the country, upon which we have no certain knowledge but that they are being bandied from mouth to mouth, and from party to party, and when it is not in the interest of good government, and especially in the interest of the Government for the time being, that it should have an opportunity to clear its skirts of complicity or of any fault in that matter. It is a kindness to the Government to call these matters to its attention and give members of the Government a chance to deny them, if it can be done, or to palliate them, if they can be palliated; and if I were sitting on the other side of the House behind the Government, and a charge of this kind was being ventilated in the newspapers and talked over by brother members, I should consider it a kindness to me if it was so brought up that I could meet it with a square denial, if such were within my power. We are now told by the hon. Prime Minister,—and I hope, Mr. Speaker, your judgment will not carry so far,—that we cannot rise and say that it is a matter of common repute that the Government entered into a bargain to “saw-off” the protest in Saskatchewan, and that there is prima facie evidence that this had been done, for here is correspondence published in the public press, which has become current in this country. Forsooth, it is argued, that we cannot call that to the attention of the Government, and if it casts reflections on the member sitting for that constituency, as it must, we cannot call it to his attention so that he may rise and show it is altogether unfounded, if it is unfounded. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I think you will have to look very carefully into your judgment on this question, or parliamentary government comes to an end if our mouths are closed, because this Government is not by any means immaculate. It has made many mistakes already and will make many more, and we propose as an Opposition to call the attention of Parliament and the country to those mistakes, and surely the Prime Minister will not say that before we make any such charges we must put them into form, make them on the honour of a member and ask for a committee.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is not the statement made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. The Postmaster General will have some cases. When he sat on this side of the House he was a great stickler for the freedom of Parliament, he did not want the Opposition to be gagged, and no gag seems to have been able to stop his mouth. The hon. gentleman no doubt would have been very glad if his mouth had been gagged to some extent. He would then have been not left to the imputation which he carries upon his brow to-day, and will carry all the years that he sits there as a Minister; that he made protestations of principle—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us hear what the point of order is.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The point of order is this. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is assumed to be addressing the House on the point of order raised, as to whether the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was right in proceeding as he did. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is not addressing the House upon that point of order, but is dealing with an irrelevant matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I am presenting my case, Mr. Speaker, and I am addressing the House on what was your assumed ruling, but which you have not authoritatively given.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has taken up a question relating to the hon. the Postmaster General which has no bearing upon the point of order that has been raised on the motion before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, will you allow me to put my argument, and to point out that your ruling, as I understand it, was this: that you would not allow a member on this side of the House—that is a member of Parliament, we will say—

Mr. SPEAKER. A member on either side.

Mr. FOSTER. On either side; that is quite right. Your ruling, as I understand it, was, that you would not allow a member of Parliament to bring anything to the attention of Parliament which implicated the Government, or any member on the other side of the House, in a proceeding which had not been right.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) has entirely misapprehended me. I stated particularly, that I did not see any cause whatever for interfering with the charge of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) against the Government. But, I said: that when a special and particular charge was made against the independence of an hon. member of this House, I thought notice should be given to him, and that a motion should be made in support of that charge by any member who wished to bring it forward. My ruling had nothing whatever to do with the charge against the Government. •

Mr. FOSTER. But, in a charge made against the Government, the foundation of that charge may have reference to an action which concerns a certain member's seat. It seems to me to be impossible to make a charge against the Government—that is, to ventilate a grievance as against the Government—without bringing in the name of the member whose seat, and the preservation of whose seat, if the documents are correct, seems to have been the only motive for the action that the Government took. Therefore, by implication, the member's position is to a certain extent attacked. But, there is a wide difference between that, and between making any charge against a member of malfeasance in office or of doing a thing which he should not have done as a member, thereby affecting his seat in the House. In a great many cases, none of these charges could be made without to a certain extent implicating members of the House in an inferential way. I understand that there is a large difference between that, and between making a distinct charge against the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davies). That is not, as I understand it, the object of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin). He wants an explanation. He does not want to believe this thing himself, and he simply puts it before the House so that the Prime Minister, and the member who by implication is concerned in this matter, may have the opportunity of explaining to the House. It is in my opinion a very grave matter, and one which cannot be allowed to rest here.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. Would you allow me to cite what we find in Bourinot, page 415.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has spoken, but I would be glad if the hon. member (Mr. Casey) would allow me the benefit of his discussion of whatever may throw light upon the point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. Bourinot says this:

In 1878, a member brought to the notice of the House, on such a motion (a motion to adjourn the House), that certain Dominion officials were taking part in the provincial elections of Quebec. In 1891, Mr. Laurier initiated in this way a long debate on the formation and policy of the new Administration, formed on the death of Sir John Macdonald, Premier of the Ministry consequently dissolved ipso facto.

You yourself, Mr. Speaker, will probably remember, that grave charges were made against Sir Adolphe Caron by a member of this House and a long discussion ensued thereon. The member making the charges refused to take the responsibility of pledging his honour, and I believe, that hon. member sits in the Chair of this House to-day.

Mr. CASEY. There is, as the hon. member (Mr. Davin) has said, a great difference between making a charge against the Government which necessarily involves a personal charge against the member, and the procedure of making a direct charge against an individual member on the honour of a brother member. There is exactly the difference between a cowardly attack and a straightforward attack.

Mr. DAVIN. Is this to the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who has brought this matter up, has chosen to lay before the House, a number of newspaper assertions directly attacking the honour of a fellow-member and his fitness to sit in this House. I understood you to rule, Sir, and your ruling was certainly in consonance with all the rulings I have ever heard in this House—and I have sat here more years than the leader of the Opposition, or his first lieutenant, who spoke of their long experience in the House. Sir, your ruling was, that any such statements attacking the honour of a fellow-member, should be made as a question of privilege to secure an investigation into these statements, and that notice of such motion should be given to the House and to the member concerned. I do not think there is any room for dispute as to the correctness of that ruling. That has been always the practice of this House. We all know, that the quotation of newspaper gossip at great length, attacking an individual member's character, has never been allowed in this House, unless it were to be followed up by a motion for inquiry, and that it never has been allowed without notice to the House and to the member attacked. The attempt to make it appear as a kindness to the Government, does not affect the point of order. Those hon. gentlemen who have been discussing the point of order have been taking advantage of it to make speeches against the Government on general questions, and I do not propose to follow them in that respect, nor even to defend the Government. I will further call attention to the precedent quoted by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He said, that a debate had been brought up, on a motion of adjournment, on the conduct of certain Dominion officials and the general policy of the Government, and so on. Those were certainly matters which this House had a right to inquire into, and they did not affect the personal character or standing of any member in this House. There is a vast difference between the cases. I am sure, Sir, that the House will agree with me, that when we talk of the privileges of Parliament, the privileges of each individual member constitute the privileges of Parliament. This is not a question especially concerning either the Government or the Opposition. No individual member who respects himself should allow these vague and unfounded attacks—as we must presume them to be until they are proven—until some member takes the responsibility of making them. No individual member who respects himself can allow this kind of discussion to go on, without protesting, and without, Mr. Speaker, sustaining you heartily in the ruling you have made.

Mr. DAVIN. I apprehend that now I can go on, and for the behoof of the Government, proceed to call attention to the state of things in the Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is not going on with the personal charge.

Mr. DAVIN. No, Mr. Speaker. Now, Sir, an affidavit has been filed in the Saskatchewan by two respectable citizens, W. R. Fish and S. J. Donaldson, and that affidavit is as follows:—

In the matter of the petition lodged by Jno. R. McPhail against the election of Thos. O. Davis as member of the House of Commons for the district of Saskatchewan, and the agreement entered into between Jno. R. McPhail and Thos. O. Davis, M.P., and the Dominion Government, which caused further proceedings before the courts to cease, we, W. R. Fish and S. J. Donaldson, of the town of Prince Albert, in the judicial district of Saskatchewan, do solemnly declare, that on or about the 18th day of March, A.D. 1897, we called upon J. R. McPhail at his office in the town of Prince Albert, and were shown by him a document, which he informed us was an agreement between Thos. O. Davis, M.P., Jno. R. McPhail and the Government of Hon. Wilfrid Laurier; that we were permitted by Mr. McPhail to read the document; that we did read it, and noted very carefully its provisions, which were as follows:—

(1.) That the Dominion Government accepts Jno. R. McPhail as Government candidate at the next general election.

(2.) That Thos. O. Davis, M.P., agrees and promises to pay to Jno. R. McPhail the amount of expenses incurred in connection with the protest.

(3.) That Wm. Knox Graham Neilson, Alexander Selkirk Stewart, Jas. Macarthur and Jno. R. McPhail are hereby constituted an advisory committee to act with Thomas O. Davis, M.P., in all matters pertaining to the representation of Saskatchewan in the House of Commons and with the Dominion Government.

(4.) That no appointments to offices, &c., &c., are to be made by the Dominion Government, unless sanctioned and recommended by at least four members of the above committee.

That the signature of Jno. R. McPhail and Thos. O. Davis to this document were attested by Jas. Macarthur as witness.

That the Dominion Government and Thos. O. Davis, M.P., agree to conform to above conditions, provided Jno. R. McPhail does not proceed with the protest against the election of Thos. O. Davis, M.P.

And we make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

W. R. FISH.

S. J. DONALDSON.

Declared before me at Prince Albert, in the North-west Territories, this second day of April, A.D. 1897.

A. McNABB, J.P.

The paper says:

As the "Times" anticipated and predicted would be the case, the "Advocate"—

That is, the organ of the Liberal party there—

—made an effort to overcome the bad effects produced by the publication of the details of the now notorious McPhail-Davis-Laurier Government protest settlement. The intent to deceive its readers into the belief that no agreement exists or was entered into, was a most absurd one. The "Advocate's" article, entitled "The 'Times' Fake," was no reply at all to the straight, plain and truthful statements made by the "Times" concerning the reasons why the protest proceedings were stayed. Our contemporary's assertions that "It has interviewed leading Liberals, who say no agreement was made," and "We are assured by gentlemen who are in a position to know, that there never was any agreement between Messrs. J. R. McPhail, T. O. Davis and the Laurier Government." is silly in the extreme.

The paper asserts that those gentlemen have been kept in the dark, and re-asserts all its previous statements, which the affidavit supports.

Now, Mr. Speaker, very great misconduct on the part of the Government is charged by this newspaper, supported by this agreement and by the affidavit of those who have seen this agreement; and hon. gentlemen may be perfectly assured of this, that we have come to a time in this country when you cannot burk or bamboozle public opinion for any length of time. It is futile to say, "Oh, we will not regard this, because an hon. member does not rise in his place and move to have the matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections." Why, Sir, who is the first man who should rise in this House and move to have the matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? The Prime Minister himself should be the first man to ask for an inquiry, in order that his own Government, if innocent, should have an opportunity of clearing its skirts. But I know—because I had the means of observing what took place—that the gentlemen mentioned here came to Ottawa and had their interviews here; it was arranged in Ottawa that this protest should be dropped; and though they hurried back to Prince Albert, they must have worked by telegraph, because by the time they arrived there, the motion had already been made to take the protest off the files, and the $1,000 deposit had been withdrawn.

Sir, it is for the honour of the country that I should bring this matter forward; and I find, on looking at May and at Bourinot—and if necessary I could fortify myself with precedents from our own "Hansard"—that the course I have taken is the parliamentary course as well as the course of common sense, and the proper course in the interest of the dignity of this Parliament and of the good government of this country. I move, seconded by Mr. Taylor, the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into any very long details in connection with this matter. I may say, in the first place, that I did not know that it was going to be brought up by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I had no intimation of his intention until I met the hon. gentleman in the corridor to-day, when he told me that he was going to bring it up. I told him I was unwell, and did not intend to be in the House to-day. The hon. gentleman seems to be greatly bothered about protests; however, I do not think I should be held responsible for all the newspaper gossip in the country. I have seen this newspaper notice that he has been quoting from, but I do not see that I should be held responsible for anything of that kind. The facts of the case are these: There was a protest against my election; I had a summons to have the preliminary objections disposed of; and Mr. McPhail, the petitioner, was notified. The case came up before Judge McGuire, a judge of the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories, and it was thrown out for want of evidence. These are all the facts of the matter. I had the pleasure, shortly afterwards of reading a letter which the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) sent in connection with this matter to a gentleman named Mr. Gunn, who showed it to me. The hon. member, I believe, offered to furnish the necessary money to proceed with the protest. I suppose the hon. gentleman, having a protest against his own election, would like to have some way of sawing-off. I have no doubt that is what is the matter with him. The gentleman to whom the letter was sent would take no action in the way proposed. I know nothing more about the matter than that. I was not present when the hon. gentleman brought it up to-day, and I only heard a few of his last remarks. If I had been notified, I might have gone more fully into it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I trust that this motion will not be put until the Government take the opportunity of giving some answer to the very grave statement that has been put before this House. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of this House to the fact that the hon. gentleman who sits in this House as the representative of the constituency referred to has taken his seat without venturing to challenge the statement that he is not the representative in this House of that constituency.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, the statement has been made, and an affidavit has been read, of parties who, I am informed, are respectable residents of that district, and who swear that they have seen statements made by which that hon. gentleman has surrendered his position as a representative of this House, and confided the duties and responsibilities—

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. leader of the Opposition is taking exactly the line for which you, Mr. Speaker, ruled the hon. member for Assiniboia out of order. He is declaring that the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) is not the member for Saskatchewan, but has surrendered his seat in the House by the course of action he has taken. I think these are the very same words as were uttered by the hon. member for Assiniboia and which you ruled out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear how the hon. gentleman made out that the hon. member for Saskatchewan had resigned his position.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). He said he was not a member.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. Postmaster General is mistaken. I did not say he was not a member, but I said that he had taken his seat without challenging the accuracy of the statement made upon affidavit by respectable persons who had seen the document signed by that hon. gentleman, by which he surrendered his right to sit in this House as the representative of the constituency, and remitted to a commission the discharge of those duties which the constituency elected the hon. gentleman to perform. I say that that is one of the gravest charges that can be made, and if the hon. gentleman thought fit to take his seat without challenging its accuracy, he must be held in the estimation of every hon. gentleman in this House as having surrendered his right to a seat in it. I draw attention to this, as a matter of grave significance, that the hon. gentleman who leads this House should have permitted a statement of this kind to obtain currency and credence for a single moment without disclaiming all lot and part in any such transaction, either on behalf of himself or any member of his Government. The hon. First Minister owes it to the House, to himself, and to the great party he represents in this country, to take the earliest opportunity of removing any such imputation made against him, not merely by newspaper report but sworn to in the most solemn manner.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not know what are the feelings of the hon. gentleman in these matters, but so far as I am concerned, I tell him frankly and within the hearing of everybody in this House that I am too long in political life to take any stock in newspaper reports, and I will not be driven from any position I take in this House by anything stated in the newspapers. Whenever an hon. gentleman chooses to attack my position or the position of those who support the Government, upon his honour and responsibility, then every attention will be given to the charges made. With regard to the statements made by the hon. member from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I take no stock in them, for this very good reason. On the face of them, and as I well know, they are false. He stated that a gentleman in the civil service had gone as an emissary of mine to Prince Albert in order to induce Mr. Newlands, who was a possible candidate for the Saskatchewan district, to withdraw in favour of Mr. Davis.

Mr. DAVIN. What I said was that he went to get Mr. Davis to withdraw in the interests of Mr. Newlands.

The PRIME MINISTER. It does not matter much which way you put it. The hon. gentleman said that this high official was sent in order to get Mr. Davis to be accepted in place of Mr. Newlands, or, in other words, that Mr. Newlands should withdraw, and that the price which should be given him for withdrawing was that he was to be put in the place of Mr. Barker, the registrar, who was to be superannuated. Sir, Mr. Newlands, for reasons of his own, did not run, and Mr. Davis was accepted and ran and got elected. Mr. Barker has not yet been superannuated but is still registrar, and Mr. Newlands is still as he was before. That disposes, therefore, of the imputation that Mr. Newlands had withdrawn for a consideration. The hon. gentleman later said that there had been a compromise or agreement between Mr. Davis, Mr. McPhail and the Government, and that Mr. McPhail and Mr. Davis had come to Ottawa and had seen me in the month of April. I state here, on my honour as a member of this House, that I never saw Mr. McPhail in Ottawa, that I have not seen him since 1894 when I was in Prince Albert. This shows what credence is to be given newspaper reports. The House of Commons could not carry on its business if newspaper reports were to be accepted. The most nonsensical reports and rumours are published in the papers. There are some published to-day, and there are always people found gullible enough to swallow them.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. leader of the Opposition grows extremely virtuous and indignant in Opposition, but when he was a subordinate member of the Government, he did not feel quite so strict on some of those points. It appears, after all, that his charge that the hon. member for Saskatchewan is not the member for Saskatchewan rests on an assertion which even the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) does not undertake to endorse personally, namely, that the hon. member for Saskatchewan exercises his patronage through a committee of his supporters in his riding. I am not discussing the truth or falsity of the statement—but what does it amount to, if true? The loud-voiced gentleman who leads the Opposition states in his most pompous tones that such conduct on the part of an hon. member is tantamount to a surrender of his position as a member of this House—that no man who exercises patronage through a committee of his supporters is worthy to be called a representative. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite how many of them, when they had the disposal of patronage, did ask a local committee to advise them on such questions?

Mr. HUGHES. I venture to say that no hon. gentleman on this side ever signed a document giving up his rights.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps not, nor have we the slightest tittle of evidence to show that any hon. member on this side did. We have not even the assertion of any hon. gentleman in this House, made on his personal responsibility, that any hon. member on this side, signed such an agreement to give up his rights. But we have had it proven that an hon. gentleman who was and is still a member of this House, but who then supported the Government and is now in Opposition—the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was guided in the disposition of the patronage in his county by an executive committee of his supporters, and that this executive committee not only exercised the patronage for that county, but, on their own confession, sold the patronage. Did the hon. leader of the Opposition then declare that his supporter had so conducted himself as not to be worthy of a seat in this House? That was one of those frequent occasions when the hon. gentleman was more profitably occupied than being a member of this House or a member of the Government, but he must have been aware of the facts, and he should be a little more careful, when he tries to throw clubs at gentlemen on this side, that he is not throwing boomerangs.

Mr. QUINN. I cannot boast of having had a seat in this House for the length of time the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has enjoyed the honour, and perhaps it is on this account that I do not look at the facts put on record by the hon. gentleman who has brought up this charge, in the same light as the hon. member for West Elgin does. No doubt it is because I have not the same experience of the manner in which affairs of this kind are conducted, but as one of the younger members of this House, listening to the language of the hon. member for West Assiniboia and taking communication of the affidavit which has been read before this House, it is certainly a startling proposition to me, when a charge, involving not only the honesty of a member but the honesty of the Government, is placed before this House supported by the affidavit of two respectable, or presumably respectable, citizens, the original affidavit, it is true, not being here, but having been published in the public press of the district in which the occurrence is said to have taken place, the Government and the member of this House incriminated, or attempted to be incriminated by this charge, shall fold their arms, and say: Because the hon. member will not choose to make this charge on his honour believing it to be true, it is not necessary for us to answer. Now, what are the charges that have been made? The charge is directly made here that the Government of this country entered into an agreement with one of the members of this House that he should be the figure-head before the country as representative of that constituency but that he should surrender into the hands of other persons, the power, the dignity and all the privileges of the position. The Government of the country is charged with having recognized an agreement of this kind. A member of this House is charged with having handed over to a committee the right to represent that constituency in any place except in this House, and yet he has not one word to say in defence of himself as against this charge. The affidavit is not directed against the individual alone, but, as I say, involves the Government because it says:

(1.) That the Dominion Government accepts Jno. R. McPhail as Government candidate at the next general election.

(2.) That Thos. O. Davis, M.P., agrees and promises to pay to Jno. R. McPhail the amount of expenses incurred in connection with the protest.

(3.) That Wm. Knox Graham Neilson, Alexander Selkirk Stewart, Jas. Macarthur and Jno. R. McPhail are hereby constituted an advisory committee to act with Thomas O. Davis, M.P., in all matters pertaining to the representation of Saskatchewan in the House of Commons and with the Dominion Government.

So that, as a matter of fact, by this agreement, the committee are the representatives of this division instead of the hon. member who sits in this House, and that not alone with the consent of the member himself, but with the consent of the Government, to act as a committee with the Government in all matters appertaining to the representation of Saskatchewan in the House and with the Dominion Government.

(4.) That no appointments to offices, &c., &c., are to be made by the Dominion Government, unless sanctioned and recommended by at least four members of the above committee.

That the signature of Jno. R. McPhail and Thos. O. Davis to this document were attested by Jas. Macarthur as witness.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a most serious charge, and the fact of that committee having been named or appointed in this district, probably throws light on the actions of the Government in discharging persons who have been employed under the Government heretofore and have enjoyed their positions for many years until the present Government came into power. Is it not possible that many of the employees of the Government who have been dismissed from office have been the subject of investigation, not of committees appointed by this House, but by committees formed in the manner indicated in this affidavit? Is it not possible that not merely one member sits here not by virtue of the votes that have been given, but by virtue of his subjection to a committee appointed in his own district whose behests he is bound to obey no matter what the consequences may be to himself or to the country? Is this state of affairs to be allowed to continue with simply the answer: We will not pay attention to it unless the charge is made by a member of this House. If so, it will be a revelation to many new members of this House who are listening for the first time to what they must regard as the law of parliamentary government in this country. It is a most extraordinary interpretation, and I, as a humble member and a new member, protest and ask for a proper answer to be given by the Government, that they either assume the responsibility, or deny that any such agreement exists or that they recognize it in any way.

Mr. FLINT. I think that nothing more clearly shows the wisdom of the rule which was invoked from the Chair than the course of the discussion as far as it has gone. The object and purpose of that rule is not to prevent discussion of grave matters of this nature by the House at proper times, but to enforce upon those who bring these matters to the attention of the House and the country that they should take such fair and reasonable steps as shall give those who are charged with any violation of constitutional usage, or of the rules of Parliament, or of the rights or privileges of members of this House, notice of the nature of the charge and of the specific lines of evidence upon which the charge will be pressed. We have here the statement of the hon. member whose name was more particularly associated with this so-called charge, that, until the moment of the meeting of this House he had no notice that it would be brought forward, that he had no intention of being present in the House to-day, being unwell; but, owing to the fact that others solicited his presence, he was in a few minutes before the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) took his seat, and we have, consequently, the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Davis, Saskatchewan) in the House that these so-called charges had not even been heard by him, and he has had no fair or reasonable opportunity to either accept them or deny them, or to accept them in part or deny them in part. Consequently, I think, it will be accepted by gentlemen on both sides of this House, that, however ingeniously the matter has been brought within the rules of the House upon the motion to adjourn, there is an unfairness to the other hon. members of the House in the way the matter has been brought forward. But, assuming for the sake of argument, that the so-called charges have been fairly brought forward, let us see what they amount to as put—no doubt in the strongest light—by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) who has just taken his seat. We have the affidavit of parties unknown—unknown, that is, to the members of this House as to their character or standing—alleged to have been taken before some official in the distant constituency of Saskatchewan, alleging the contents of a document a copy of which they do not pretend to give in their affidavit or declaration, and which, taken upon the face of it even assuming that it is correctly reported, simply gives the substance of an agreement between two individuals, one of whom happens to be a member of this House. If this agreement is supported by evidence, there is nothing in it which ought to be a subject of inquiry at this stage by this House. It is simply an agreement, or appears to be, from the second-hand testimony that we have in regard to it, between an hon. member of this House and other parties outside of this House with whom he proposes to consult in regard to the distribution of patronage. Whether that is an offence against parliamentary law or constitutional law still remains to be adjudicated upon. It may be a matter of unwisdom, or it may be a matter of good judgment on the part of the hon. member to consult with certain parties in his constituency as to the disposal of patronage. But I call the attention of the hon. member who has brought this matter forward that there is not one scintilla of evidence that the Government or any member of the Government or representative of the Government is in any way identified with this so-called agreement. Consequently the only party that could be attacked in this House under the form of a resolution to adjourn, namely, the Government, who are open to attack in a question of this kind—the Government are not at all identified or connected with this so-called agreement. Therefore, I think that the rule which was framed with the object of protecting members of this House should be adhered to, and that those who allege that something wrong has been done, and those who allege that any hon. member of this House has been connected with wrong-doing should bring forward their charge in such a manner that it could be properly inquired into by a committee of this House. As the charge stands at present, it is unsupported by any evidence whatever worthy of the name, it is entirely a second-hand report, coming through partisan newspapers. I sincerely trust that if hon. gentlemen opposite take the grave and serious view which they profess to take of this question, some of them will make such an inquiry into this matter from independent sources and bring it forward in a shape in which it can be dealt with by the hon. member for Saskatchewan, and by other hon. members of this House.

Mr. DAVIN. Before you put this motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reply. Now, what is the character of the defence? It is: We won't go into it. A part of the defence of my hon. friend, who is a distinguished luminary of the long robe, is a plea of confession and avoidance. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) made a speech. If any man was in a position to exonerate the Government, he was: he was in a much better position to exonerate the Government than the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister could honourably and truthfully get up and make the statement he has made, which, of course, I entirely believe. He can make that statement, and yet members of his Government may have made a corrupt bargain. There is very little patronage connected with the office that the Prime Minister holds; but one of the members of the Government that are charged in this article and are mentioned in the agreement referred to in the affidavit—one of those members exercises a very large patronage in the North-west Territories; and that is the Minister of Interior; and he should be here to deny what is attributed to him. But in default of the presence of the Minister of Interior, we should have the Finance Minister to deny the statement that he is implicated; and in default of the Finance Minister or the Minister of Interior repudiating the charge, then we should have had a direct statement from the member for Saskatchewan that no such agreement was made. The member for Saskatchewan got up, and what did he do? Why, he told us that he was elected, that there was a protest against him, and that that protest had been dismissed. Because why? For want of evidence? No, because it did not go to trial; but because the petitioner withdrew from the position of petitioner. Then the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) got up. He started out with an attempt to bend the bow of Ulysses; he attempted to wield the club of Hercules, he attempted to imitate the manner of my hon. friend who leads the Opposition. Well, Sir, he was hardly heavy enough to do it. He was like a super in a cast for Othello wanting to play the principal part, and he was hardly equal to it. He spoke of his long experience in the House. Well, Sir, his experience is longer than that of any other hon. member, but I observe of the hon. gentleman that the older he grows and the more experience he gets the more ineffective he becomes every session. Those gentlemen who have defended the Government have only referred to the allegation in the affidavit that the hon. member for Saskatchewan had made an agreement to give away his patronage; they did not refer at all to the allegation that an arrangement had been made whereby the Government was to place the giving away of the contracts into the hands of this committee. Is that incredible? Is it not on record that the Minister of Public Works was hardly fresh in his office when a supporter of his was giving away a contract through a friend, and then we had the hon. Minister of Public Works indulging in proverbial philosophy, and the immortal line, "business is business" is for ever connected with his name. Well, Sir, business, evidently, up to the hilt and up to the chin in this agreement; business is business so completely that there is no attempt on the part of the Government to deny it. Sir, I cannot for one minute accept the proposition that some hon. gentlemen lay down on that side of the House. If an hon. member brings a charge before the House, as it is his duty to do at the earliest possible moment, it is an advantage to the Government if the Government is free; if the Government's skirts are clean, what I have done here to-day is an advantage to the Government. They could get up and they could clear themselves of this charge that I have made against them. I have frequently admired the ability of the tactics of the leader of the Government, but there is one thing that I do not think he executes well, and that is a precipitate retreat. I must say that he does not shine as brightly as usual when he executes a retreat. I cannot compliment him on the way he has retreated from facing the music on this occasion; indeed, he never attempted to show fight. There was plenty of room for it, however. There are the charges, and there they remain, and there they will remain, and they will sink into the minds of the people, not merely in the North-west, but all over this country. If those charges remain unanswered, then when the Government comes to face the constituencies, come it early, or come it late, they will find, if they do not answer these charges that they will be as mill-stones around their necks.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Prime Minister—because I see the Minister of Finance is not here—if he is not going to give us the supplementary Estimates for the current year before he makes his Budget speech. We ought to have the supplementaries both for the current year and for the next year. I have not much hope for the latter, but I think we ought to have the supplementaries for the current year.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). So far as my memory serves me, it is altogether unprecedented; I never saw the Supplementary Estimates brought down before the Budget Speech.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very sorry my hon. friend has so bad a memory. If he will take five minutes to look over the records of the "Hansard" last year and the preceding year, he will find they were brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps so.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Let me remind my hon. friend opposite that I have petitioned, most earnestly, but unsuccessfully, my hon. friend to give us the supplementary Estimates before his Budget speeches.

Mr. FOSTER. Those were the supplementary Estimates for the succeeding year. I remember when I told him that I could not give them to him, that it had not been the practice to do so, and my hon. friend said: It is a very bad practice.

THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.— MILITIA CONTINGENT.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask the acting Minister of Militia what conclusion has been arrived at in regard to sending a detachment of Canadian troops to the old country to take part in the Queen's Jubilee. Has there been a plan agreed upon for volunteer regiments or corps from Toronto and Montreal to go to the Jubilee, in addition to the 200 troops which I understand are to be sent by the Government?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Her Majesty's Government were exceedingly pleased and gratified by the evidence given of the patriotic feeling which actuated those gentlemen who desired to send a volunteer battalion or two to the Queen's Jubilee, but they much regretted that it was impossible to receive them on the present occasion. Our representation, therefore, must be confined to the contingent of 200 men, which will be made as representative as possible of the various branches of the service.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fitzpatrick for second reading of Bill (No. 7) to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons; and the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, when a few days ago I made a suggestion to my hon. friend the mover of the amendment now before the House that it should be withdrawn, I did so under the impression that an understanding had been arrived at by which the Bill was not to be further proceeded with, but other business was to be put before the House. In that, it appears, I was mistaken, and consequently the motion made by my hon. friend is still the motion which is under consideration. But I may say that the point of that amendment which was supported by a strong pressure on the Government that they should give precedence to the Budget, has lost much of its force from the fact that the announcement has already been made that the Budget will be brought down on Thursday. I will not, therefore, offer to the House any argument in support of the motion made by my hon. friend for the reason stated, but I will proceed to take this opportunity of directing the attention of the House to the measure which is now submitted for its consideration. I do not intend again to press the unreasonableness at the present session of pressing this measure upon our attention, because I still hope that my hon. friend the First Minister will find it convenient, after we have entered upon the important business of the session, the granting of supplies and dealing with those branches of the public service that are pressing for consideration, and demand immediate attention, to allow this measure, in regard to which no hon. member has presented a single ground for forcing it through the House at the present session, to remain for further consideration. I also venture to express the hope that my hon. friend in giving that careful consideration, in the light of the discussion that has already taken place, and in the light of the general expression of public sentiment given through the press, will take the opportunity before the measure is submitted for our serious consideration and with the object of passing it into law, will fully weigh whether it is not possible yet to devise a measure of a much more practicable character than this, one that will accomplish all the good that is claimed from this measure by its promoters, but will also be unattended with a great many of the objections that have been so forcibly stated in this House and out of it. We have been told by hon. gentlemen that there is nothing new in this measure, that this principle of having the franchise of the various provinces used for the election of members of this Parliament is one that has been long in operation—that this was the law of 1867. Every member of this House knows that, ex necessitate rei, we had to adopt the franchises of the various provinces for the election of members to the first Parliament of this Dominion. The House is also aware that under the Confederation Act provision was made that the franchises of the various provinces, obviously necessary to be used in the first instance, could be superseded by the adoption of a franchise law for this Parliament. The House is further aware that a measure was introduced, but not pushed to a conclusion, under which the election of 1872 took place in the same manner as the first election of members to this House; and that in 1874 a Bill was introduced which materially changed the position of this question, for while still adopting the franchises in operation in the various provinces, provision was made to give this House and the Government a large amount of control in the administration of the Act. I do not intend to detain the House by considering at length the subsequent Act of 1885. I was not then a member of the House; but I believe that Act received a very long and protracted discussion and was subjected to very exhaustive criticism on the part of hon. members. I may say, however, that that Act secured the great object sought to be obtained by a Franchise Act for this Dominion and for the election of members to the House of Commons, and that was uniformity. With the exception of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, affecting a comparatively small number of voters and the return of a comparatively small number of members to this House, it was a uniform Act. It was an Act under which the representation was made equal in all the various portions of the Dominion, and members of Parliament felt that, with the exception of those two small provinces, all members of this Parliament met on a common ground, were elected under a common franchise, and sat in conformity with a uniform principle. There was another very important matter, and it was that the revising officers who were appointed under that Act were men of standing and of character. The Government was responsible to this House for the selection of men of standing and of character to discharge the responsible duties of revising officers. But, there was a still more important feature in the franchise law of 1885, and that was, that there was an appeal from the action of the revisers to a judge, and no voter could be struck off the list, and no voter could be put on the list by any of the revisers without a final adjudication before a judge. That security I consider of the very greatest possible importance, because we all recognize in relation to all the provinces, that we have a judiciary of which the country may be, and is, justly proud. I frankly admit that there is one objection to the existing franchise law, and that is, the great expense which has attended its operation. That expense led to the want of frequent revision, which was a very objectionable thing in itself, and I am quite prepared to say that it is the duty of this House to deal with the question of a franchise for this Dominion in such a way as to obtain a plain and simple workable law, equitable in all its bearings in the various provinces, and unattended by that expense which I regard as the main, if not the only objection to the present law.

Now, Sir, as to the Bill introduced by the Solicitor General. We all know that there is no uniformity in it, and that under its operation the very reverse of a uniform franchise will be introduced. The federal members from Prince Edward Island and Manitoba will occupy relatively the same standing, because the franchise in these provinces is practically the same; but the members from other provinces will be elected on an entirely different franchise. There is no uniformity, I say, and the members of this House under this Bill will be elected by half a dozen different laws, all bearing upon elections for this House and all differing in character one from the other. The members of this Federal Parliament will no longer occupy that independent position which they now occupy, of being elected upon a uniform franchise. But there is worse still. Under the proposed Bill this Parliament parts with its right—a right which I hold to lie at the very foundation of the independence of this Parliament—this Parliament parts with the right of declaring under what franchise its members shall be elected. Is it desirable, Sir, that the members of the Parliament of this great Dominion shall be selected under laws over which they have no control whatever? Sir, it does not require a laboured argument to prove that the adoption of such a principle is highly objectionable. For this Parliament to part with the control of its franchise is, in my judgment, a fatal objection to this Bill, and one which the more it is considered the more it will be regarded as striking at the first principles on which the representation in the legislature of a great country should be based. In future, if this Bill should pass, we will have seven laws, each differing from the other, under which members are sent to this House. We will not only have all these different franchises, but we will have these provincial laws changed from time to time by parties over whom we have no control, and who will not be obliged to consult the wishes or interests of this Federal Parliament. I wish to again refer to the incident which occurred in the province of Nova Scotia as an illustration of the danger of our parting with control over our own franchise. At the time when we were subject to the provincial franchises, an incident occurred in Nova Scotia which ought to be sufficient to prevent this Parliament from ever considering for a single moment the question of remitting this power to a local legislature. After the provincial elections in Nova Scotia were over, they passed a law intended to affect the election of members to this House, and which they did not intend should operate in regard to their own elections. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) evidently feels that the local legislatures will not pass Acts which will not be regarded as wise and judicious, because these Franchise Acts will bear upon their own elections. But what does the hon. gentleman say of what was done by the Nova Scotia legislature? We had the scandal there exhibited, of the law being changed after the local elections so as to affect the Dominion elections, and without any intention of using that franchise in their own elections. In fact, they repealed that law before the provincial elections were held. That such a thing has ever occurred ought to be sufficient to deter any party in this House from placing the franchise under which members of this House are elected in the hands of a legislature which would do such a thing. But, Sir, that is not all. As I say, these laws are liable to be changed from day to day, and they will be changed. Every person knows that there is no guarantee that the existing Franchise Acts of the various provinces will continue to be the law after this Bill comes into operation. Every person who follows these questions knows that independent of any desire to do wrong, independent of any desire to take such an unfair party advantage as was done in the Nova Scotia case, the very fact that the opinions of members of the various legislatures differ so radically on this question of the franchise, is the best evidence that from day to day we will have very serious changes in the provincial law bearing upon this matter. An hon. member, in the course of this discussion, has referred to the fact that a great deal has been said in the British House of Commons, and in other places, as to the question of minority representation. So distinguished a man as Mr. Courtney has urged with great force and great ability in the Imperial House of Commons the adoption of minority representation which, if adopted by any of the provinces of Canada, would be a complete and radical change, under which a minority in every constituency could, by a certain means, secure a certain amount of representation in Parliament.

Now, I put it to my hon. friend the introducer of this Bill, what the position would be supposing the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec should become converted to that doctrine, and should adopt minority representation. The hon. gentleman knows that such an action on their part would upset the whole theory upon which the franchise and the constitution of this country are based, that is, to a large extent, the principle of representation by population. It would introduce a great amount of confusion into the whole system. I will not elaborate that point; I have only to mention it, and pass on.

But I will take another point. We know that a resolution in favour of enfranchising women, moved in the Imperial House of Commons the other day by the member for Glasgow, obtained the support of a majority of the House of Commons. Now, I ask my hon. friend the First Minister whether he thinks it would be right or fair for the province of Quebec, the province of Nova Scotia, or any other province to enfranchise women, and all the other provinces to be left without that advantage, if it may be so called? The very fact that you have a resolution passed in the Imperial House of Commons by a substantial majority, affirming the desirability of enfranchising women, is the best evidence that it is not at all unlikely that in some of these provinces at an early day, the law under which this Parliament is to be elected will enfranchise women. Then you will have a portion of the members of this House in the position of being elected under a franchise which includes women, and the rest of the members deprived of the benefit of having the weaker sex included among their constituents.

I mention these as insuperable difficulties against the Bill proposed, which sweeps away the uniformity that now exists and gives us an absence of uniformity which must lead to a great deal of confusion. Why should a person who lives in one province where he enjoys the franchise for a representative of the House of Commons, find himself disfranchised on removing to another province? He is the same man, and he has the same ability, the same right, and the same desire to exercise the franchise; and yet he finds that he has ceased to be an elector when he has crossed the boundary line separating one province from another.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). That is the case under the present law.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think not to the extent that it would be under the law now proposed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Not that it will be, but that there is a possibility of it. The hon. gentleman is only arguing against a possibility.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I say absolutely. I say that the man who enjoys the franchise in one province and moves to another will cease to be an elector in a great many cases. At present we have practically manhood suffrage in Ontario, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and Manitoba, and we have a property franchise in Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. This shows that a very large number of electors enjoy advantages in one province which they will cease to enjoy in another.

But my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood) brought up a most serious and important objection, I think an insuperable objection, to which I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). He pointed out that under this law a man in the province of Ontario would have but one vote, while a man of the same character, standing and wealth in the province of Quebec would have six votes or perhaps more. So that you are not only going to destroy uniformity, but you are going to give the province of Quebec a very much larger number of individual votes. For instance, in the city of Montreal, where there are a great many men of wealth, who have votes in half a dozen different places, and where it is perfectly practicable for them to poll all their votes in one day, these men will have under this Bill six times greater power than men of the same character, standing and means in the province of Ontario. I think my hon. friend will see at once that this is a most fundamental objection to the enactment of such a law.

Now, I do not intend to occupy any more of the time of the House than is absolutely necessary to glance at certain objections to this Bill. What is wanted is a simple law, a plain law, which the great body of the electors of this country can understand and follow. But any person who reads this Bill with the care with which I have read it, will come to the conclusion that instead of simplifying matters, it has confused everything, and that it would take a long time for any ordinary elector to so study its provisions as to be in a position to carry it out with that clearness and readiness which are essential in a matter like the franchise.

The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) said that one of the greatest objections to the existing law was its fraudulent character, and that it was desirable to adopt measures that would prevent anything like fraud or dishonesty in the conduct of our elections. There is not a member of this House who does not realize the vital importance of having an honest election law, and one that will be fairly and honestly administered. I was very much astonished on a former occasion, when this question was under the consideration of the House, to hear the hon. First Minister refer to ballot stuffing. There is something worse in my judgment than even ballot stuffing, and that is stuffing the voters' lists, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that I think he can hardly have been following what has taken place in connection with the charges of ballot stuffing in the province of Manitoba when he ventured to speak of ballot stuffing with regard to that province. The hon. gentleman, I presume, does not require to be told that having expended some $5,000 of public money in the prosecution of that charge, having put the law in motion in that province, and the Attorney General having arrested some twenty or more parties accused of that charge, the result was that only one single conviction was obtained out of the whole twenty cases. Instead of its being proved that any such general violation of the law had taken place, the very reverse was proven. One man was convicted on his own testimony, and it is believed that that testimony was due to the fact that the Conservative party had refused to allow him to blackmail them. He then went to the other side, and on the evidence of this one man, a blackmailer, they succeeded in obtaining one conviction out of twenty or more cases, in which people had been treated with the greatest harshness and cruelty possible, through the law being put in force against them without cause. One after another of those accused was acquitted and only one conviction obtained, and that, under most questionable circumstances, and after an expenditure of $5,000 by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I may say that I hold in my hand the report of a speech of the leader of the Opposition in the Manitoba House, Mr. Roblin :

Mr. Roblin said before proceeding to the orders of the day there was a matter of importance to the province and to himself, as a loyal citizen, which he would like to bring before the House. He referred to the rights of citizenship. The speaker then read from a speech made in the House of Commons on Friday last by the Hon. Mr. Laurier, regarding the elections held in this province last summer. This statement should be taken in connection with what was put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne. This, the speaker thought, fully justified him in bringing this question to the attention of the House. With the knowledge which he possessed regarding the infamy that has followed in the tracks of our provincial Election Act, he could only qualify this Act as an infamy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

There we have a description of this Manitoba Act which the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) invites us to make the law of this Dominion for the election of members of this House :

By it, not only are the people of this province deprived of their rights, but the very law shields the men who are guilty. Mr. Laurier's intention is to substitute the present Dominion Elections Act with the Act which is a standing disgrace to this province.

And I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen who want an honest law, one that will prevent fraud, to this statement :

By it, at the last provincial election, above 100,000 men have been robbed of their franchise, and now Mr. Laurier, seeing how much it has helped his friends in this province, now proposes to give it wider scope and adopt it for the Dominion.

And when it is remembered how small is the number of votes in the province of Manitoba, the House can readily grasp the statement made by a responsible member of the local legislature that it has defrauded 100,000 electors in that province of their votes. What has been the result of all these prosecutions for alleged ballot stuffing :

What has been the result of all these prosecutions for alleged ballot stuffing? Only one man is convicted, and that upon his own evidence. If the Attorney General has obtained from his protégé, Frechorn, all the evidence that has been revealed before the courts, he should communicate it to the House, so that we might be in a position to refute the vile slander of Laurier's on this province. Is Laurier aware that, after his Government had granted $5,000 to this government to prosecute those suspected of ballot stuffing, only one man has been convicted?

Mr. Roblin gives us in graphic detail what the real character of this Manitoba Act is, and I would not trouble the House with it were it not that we are invited to make this Manitoba Act the law of this Parliament for the election of members to this House. Mr. Roblin states from his place in the House :

What does Laurier propose doing? He intends, if he can, to have the provincial and infamous law imposed on the whole Dominion. This Act was introduced in 1890 or 1892. He had fought this Bill at every stage because he knew that the government intended by it to legislate away the rights of a large number of voters. As it was first introduced, it would give power to an agent to prepare the voters' list without any one knowing who was on it. He had, however, succeeded in having this clause struck out. As it now reads, the Lieutenant-Governor can appoint a registration clerk, who is not bound by time, so that a court of revision can, and often is, appointed and sitting before the list is completed. It can be easily seen what an opportunity this affords to a man who is blinded by party ties or interests.

There is a case which is well known, where a clerk so appointed admitted that he had prepared his list from that of a Liberal scrutineer used at previous election, and this is the Act which Mr. Laurier intends foisting upon the Dominion. Another thing that has been done is to place bogus names on the list after it was declared completed. This was done to his friend from Emerson, who, when he heard of it, had subpoenas issued and given to a constable to serve, but the constable made a return that he could not find these men, for the very good reason that they never existed. Yet some of these names were retained on the list.

And why do you suppose did they decide that these names should be retained on the lists? Because the revising officer declared that unless it was proved that the subpoenas were served he would not strike the names from the list, and as these people never had any existence, it was not very easy to prove that the subpoenas had been served.

The Act say the clerk shall post up, thirty days before the court of revision is held, the list of voters. Is this ever done? No, it is not. The speaker then read a correspondence between Mr. McDonald, president of the Conservative Association, and the registrar of Brandon, Mr. Maclean, to show that in the case of the election held at Brandon, the court of revision was held before the list was completed. Mr. McDonald asked that the court should adjourn until the list was completed, but this Mr. Maclean refused. It is to avoid a repetition of such infamous conduct as this that he is now addressing the House. His friends opposite are opposed to the Dominion Act on account of its cost, but more particularly because it works out against them. Under the provincial Act there is no appeal from the revising barrister, while under the Dominion Act there is an appeal to a judge.

He had in his possession the names of 200 voters which were given to Albert Monkman to place on the voters' list for Dauphin, yet this Monkman refused to say whether he would or would not place them on the list. From this it can be seen that all that was required were seven Albert Monkman's, and where would be the votes opposed to the present government? This was no hearsay story, for he had in his hand a sworn statement to this effect. In the little town of Morris, in 1892, there were 108 names of French Canadians kept off the lists, but fortunately they were righted by the court of revision, yet it was through no fault of Dr. McTavish that these Frenchmen were not disfranchised. Again, this McTavish, in a small settlement, left off the list 55 names of men well known to him. Later on, however, thanks to the returning officer, Mr. Dawson, these names were added. The same state of affairs obtained in many other districts, such as Hamiota. It is only in constituencies where it is known that the Conservative vote will not affect the result, that this is not tampered with.

Right here in Winnipeg, in 1896, 800 names were omitted from the voters' list so as to ensure the election of a supporter of the government. The Greenway Government owes its return to power more to revising officers than to the votes of the people.

In North Winnipeg, 400 names were left off the list at the last provincial election. When Mr.

Laurier made such a slanderous statement as he is reported to have done, he should be informed of this. The registration clerk in Winnipeg has been charged by Mr. Haggard with perjury. When we have a law which permits, which in fact encourages, such deeds of infamy, it is high time to ask that such a law should be repealed or amended. It was for an honest franchise that he was to-day contending. Should Mr. Laurier's intention be to submit this Act for the Dominion Act, it would be a lasting disgrace to the country at large.

Now, Sir, I do not require to say another word in order to prove to the House that nothing could be more unjust, nothing could be more calculated to destroy the character of this House in the estimation of the country than to provide that the members of this House shall be elected under such an infamous Act as this is described to be. But, Sir, this is not all. I have under my hand a statutory declaration by D. H. McFadden which also, I think it my duty to read to the House:

Dominion of Canada.
Province of Manitoba.
To wit:

In the matter of the Emerson Voters' List.

I, David Henry McFadden, of the town of Emerson, in the province of Manitoba, veterinary surgeon, do solemnly declare, that—

1. I was first elected to the provincial legislature of Manitoba in the year 1892, by a majority of fourteen votes, as representative for the electoral division of Emerson.

2. The aforesaid constituency of Emerson was represented by one James Thompson from 1888 to 1892, and who, in 1888, was elected by a majority of fourteen.

3. The aforesaid Thompson was my opponent in 1892.

4. Donald Forrester, barrister, of Winnipeg, was appointed registration clerk and W. E. Perdue, barrister, Winnipeg, revising barrister for the Emerson division, to revise the voters' list previous to the last provincial election.

5. The said registration clerk opened an office at Emerson according to the terms of the Election Act of this province. Every night I had a clerk go to this office and make an exact copy of the list as it was from day to day altered or added to, and continued this rule up to the last day for receiving applications to be put on the list. Late in the evening of that day, I had the said list completed as it was made out by the registration clerk.

6. When the list was printed and distributed, according to the provisions of said Act, I found 13 names on the printed list which were not on my copy of the list, the names being as follows:

Poll No. 10.

No. on List.

- 13 Campbell, Arch.
- 48 Leith, Alex.
- 49 May, Chas.
- 62 McEwan, M. W.
- 88 White, Wm.

Poll No. 11.

- 14 Hargrave, P.
- 22 Munro, Alex.
- 34 Pullar, James.
- 47 Singer, Joseph.

Poll No. 12.

42 Lister, Frederick R.
46 McDonald, J. C.
47 McKievor, D. W.
57 Turner, Joseph.

as appears by the revised list of electors of said electoral division of Emerson, now produced and shown to me, and marked as Exhibit "A."

7. I at once made diligent inquiries as to these particular voters and as to their right to be placed upon the said electoral list, but could find no evidence that the said voters, or any of them, ever resided within the electoral division of Emerson. I then made application to the registration clerk to have these names struck off the said list of voters.

8. As to the description of residence of these individual voters, it was limited to townships, no section or other particulars being given in the list as to where these parties, or any of them, resided. I had summonses issued by the revising officer and placed them in the hands of responsible parties, actual residents and familiar with all other actual residents in the several townships quoted in the lists, with instructions to make every endeavour to serve these individual voters.

9. At the court of revision the parties whom I had so instructed to serve said summonses, appeared and stated that they could not find any of the said voters to effect service of said orders; and further stated that they could get no information that the said parties, or any of them, resided in the township set opposite their respective names in said list of voters. None of the parties sought for attended the court of revision, and, when application was made to strike their names off the said list, the revising barrister, the said W. E. Perdue, ruled that he would not strike them off the list until it was shown they had been individually served with a summons to attend the said court, and he allowed all the said names to remain on the list as finally revised, and the said names still remain on the said list as bona fide electors of said division, although they are not now, and never have resided in said electoral division.

10. Amongst the names struck off the said list of electors was the name of Donald Forrester, the registration clerk. As he resided and practised his profession as barrister in the city of Winnipeg, application was made to strike his name off. When challenged, he admitted his ineligibility, and the revising barrister had, therefore, no alternative but to strike his name off, which was done.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

D. H. McFADDEN.

Declared before me at the town of Emerson, in the province of Manitoba, this first day of April, A.D. 1897.

W. W. UNSWORTH.

A Notary Public in and for the prov. of Man.

Here is a registration clerk entrusted with the construction of the lists, and he actually, without having a shadow of a claim to vote, puts his name on the list with thirteen other names manufactured, names of people who had never lived in the district and did not live there then; and when the gentleman who was to be defeated by these manufactured votes asked to have them struck off.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

and produced the men who had been instructed to serve the summons to prove that this could not be done because no such persons existed, the revising barrister refused to strike off the names on the ground that these people had never been served. That one fact shows the monstrous, the frightful character of this law and the desperate methods practised under this Act, which methods will be practised in the elections for this House of Commons if this Bill becomes a law, as proposed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). This same statement that I have just read has been repeated in substance by Mr. McFadden on the floor of the legislature of Manitoba, and without any attempt, so far as I am aware on the part of any person to contradict him. Mr. McFadden is reported as follows:—

Mr. McFadden said the Conservatives had not been very successful at the last election. Mr. Greenway can well afford to make little of the gentlemen of the Opposition. This Election Act is all right, if they can get honest revising officers. But they cannot get them. The Emerson list was copied day after day, and the clerk was asked if it were complete, and he said, yes. After the list was printed, however, a lot of names were put on, and because he, the speaker, could not swear that he had subpoenaed these names objected to, and of course he could not do that, because they never existed, they were allowed to remain on the list.

There is Mr. McFadden's testimony. Now, Sir, it requires no argument to show the frightful position we will be in if we adopt the Manitoba law. The hon. gentleman knows that a very striking evidence of the character of this Act is furnished by the character of the legislature of Manitoba. Why, Sir, I think that in the whole of that legislature there are only five or seven Conservatives.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I think it larger than the proportion of Conservatives in this House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to this fact, that when we ran the Dominion elections we divided the province of Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You have fallen from grace since then.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knows that, notwithstanding the most desperate and stringent efforts in that province, where the difficulties were naturally and necessarily greater than in any other portion of this Dominion, we divided the province in the Dominion elections; and yet out of the whole legislature there are only five or seven Conservatives returned in the provincial elections. I think no better evidence could be given of the fraudulent character of this Act under which the local elections are run, and the necessity of having a Dominion Act in order to insure something like justice and fairness. Now, Sir, I can find nothing in this Act—and I have read it through with a great desire to discover all that was good in it—I can find nothing in this Act to recommend it. I will make one exception; there is one clause, and it is the only thing in the whole Act that I can find to recommend it, and that is the clause that provides that when there are two or more by-elections they shall all be held on the same day. I admit that is a good clause; but the hon. gentleman who compiled this law must have felt that in putting in that clause he was casting the greatest censure possible upon this Government. Why, Sir, has this Government done what this Bill requires, in providing that the by-elections shall be held on the same day? No, Sir. There never was a more scandalous manipulation of by-elections than has taken place recently. Look at what is taking place to-day in the county of Colchester. How long has that seat in Colchester been vacant? The hon. gentleman knows that the seat for Colchester has been vacant for between three and four months—though I do not remember the exact date. I ask the hon. gentleman why is it that the county of Colchester, in that small province of Nova Scotia, which requires all its representatives in this House to obtain fair consideration—why is it that that important constituency, one of the finest constituencies in the province of Nova Scotia, has been disfranchised by the Government? Can the hon. gentleman give me any reason except a desire to obtain some unfair, some unjust, some improper influence in the control of that election? The election in Colchester is held back until the local elections are suddenly sprung upon the province, and it is now held upon the same day as the local elections. What does the hon. gentleman say with reference to my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Marcotte)? Does not this Bill brand the Government with being guilty of an act of gross impropriety in providing that, in justice to the rights of the people of this country, the by-elections should be held on the same day? The hon. gentleman knows that months after that seat was vacant in the province of Quebec, he was afraid, as I have not hesitated to say on a former occasion—he was afraid to challenge the independent opinion of the province of Quebec; but he was ready to rush an election down in Gaspé, in a remote part of the province, where exceptional influences of a powerful character could be brought to bear. Before the late member was scarcely cold in his grave a writ was issued and sent down there, while the independent electors of Champlain were denied the sacred privilege of putting their verdict on record, because the First Minister was afraid to give them the opportunity of expressing their opinion. Why, Sir, have Colchester and Champlain remained vacant since the 25th of March, while the House has been nearly a month in session? I say that these important constituencies have been disfranchised for nearly a month. Is that just? Is it right? If so, why does the Government not propose to continue that practice? As I suggested the other day, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was obliged to bring in a Bill to protect the Government from the temptation to which the First Minister admitted they were subjected in regard to the civil service; and so I say to-day that the Solicitor General is obliged to bring in a Bill to prevent this Government from acting unjustly to this House and to the people of this country, and to compel them to hold by-elections on the same day. Sir, I hope this Bill will never become law, and I do not think it ever will. In saying so, I pay a great compliment to the First Minister, because I believe that after sober second-thought he will come to the conclusion that a wiser and better Bill can be brought down, one that will reflect more credit upon the Government, and be more beneficial to the country than this one; and it is on that ground that I say I do not think this Bill will ever become law. But if it should become law, I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should protect the Government once more against themselves, and provide not only that they should hold all the by-elections on one day, but within a certain limited period from the time the seats become vacant. I must say that, judging from the past, they ought to be only too thankful to be again protected from themselves, and protected from the position they occupy here to-day of being challenged and condemned for keeping two important constituencies unrepresented in this House for a month after this session began, although the seats were open months before.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I will now deal with a very important branch of this Bill. The desire constantly expressed by hon. members who are now on the other side of the House has been that every possible effort should be made to render any corrupt practice in regard to elections as impossible as legislation could make it. That is a sentiment I think, Sir, that will receive the ready assent of hon. gentlemen in all parts of this House, and I am quite sure anything in the form of relaxation of the measures that have been found necessary to secure purity in elections will be readily admitted to be very desirable, and that any movement in the other direction will be found to be very objectionable. I find that in several respects this Bill makes a new departure and adopts a line that has never been adopted by hon. members in this House, namely, that it proposes to relax the clauses of the Election Act to secure the purity of elections and to open the door to a great deal of corruption. I will draw the attention of the House for a moment to clause 72 of the present Bill, which makes a very important and radical change in the law as it is at present. The clause reads :

72. Where there is no voters' list, if a deputy returning officer rejects the vote of a person entitled to vote and does so in good faith and believing upon reasonable grounds that such person is not entitled to vote, the deputy returning officer shall not therefor be liable to any penalty.

Under the law as it stands there is no room for the judge to interpret the intentions of the officers. If he violates the law he is held responsible and he suffers punishment under the law. Under this clause, however, in cases where there is no voters' list, it makes the deputy returning officer the absolute judge, and he can say to any person, I will not accept your vote ; if he declares that he did so in good faith, believing upon reasonable grounds that the person is not entitled to vote, he is relieved from the penalty that now attaches. I can scarcely imagine any more dangerous innovation so far as purity of election is concerned. The law lays down the circumstances under which a person is entitled to vote. The returning officer has no option in regard to accepting the vote, provided the person is willing to take the necessary oath which the law imposes, and the question as to whether it is a good or bad vote depends upon judicial proceedings taken afterwards. But in this Bill it is proposed to throw on the judge trying the case the responsibility of deciding, not whether the act is a legal or illegal act but what was the intention of the returning officer. I am sure it is only necessary to call attention to this clause and the effect of it to show that it can only operate so as to relax the security which every candidate now possesses, in that the acceptance or rejection of votes does not rest on the will and disposition of the returning officer.

Then we come to a matter which I think is still more important and is involved in clauses 126 and 130. Clause 126 is as follows :—

126. If, on the trial of an election petition, it appears to the court that an act constituting in law a corrupt practice was committed by a candidate, or with his knowledge and consent, but without any corrupt intent, and in an ignorance which was involuntary and excusable, and that the evidence showed the candidate to have honestly desired, and in good faith endeavoured as far as he could, to have the election conducted according to law, the candidate shall not be subject to the penalties and disabilities which he would but for this section incur.

Under the law as it now stands, if a candidate is found guilty of personally being engaged in a corrupt practice, he has to take the consequences of it ; but this clause is another modification of the Act as it now stands on the Statute-book under which the party pleading that although corrupt practice was committed by a candidate, or with his knowledge and consent, if he had not a corrupt intent, he shall go free. Who is to judge of the intent ? If the candidate commits the corrupt practice he must take the consequences, and under the present law he is obliged to bear the penalty, severe as it is ; but with this relaxation of the law all the candidate has to plead is that he had no corrupt intent, that it was involuntary and excusable. I contend that this clause again opens the door to great relaxation in the present law, and every one knows how difficult it is to frame laws that provide complete security against corrupt practices either on the part of candidates or of persons conducting elections. Then in clause 129 we have another novelty introduced. It is copied from the present Act, and is as follows :—

129. Every person other than a candidate found guilty of any corrupt practice in any proceeding in which, after notice of the charge, he has had an opportunity of being heard, shall, during the eight years next after the time at which he is found guilty, be incapable of being elected to and of sitting in the House of Commons, and of voting at any election of a member of the House of Commons, or of holding any office in the nomination of the Crown or of the Governor General of Canada.

That law, hon. members will see at once, is rendered practically nugatory by the additional clause, which for the first time makes its appearance in an Act for the election of members to this House—clause 130, which reads :

130. No person shall be subject to the disabilities set forth in the next preceding section by reason of a merely technical breach of the law, or by reason of any act which is not an intentional violation of the law and does not involve moral culpability or affect the result of the election.

This is throwing a very serious and new duty upon the judge who tries an election case. He has not only to decide what the law is and enforce the penalties which the law provides, but he has to take into account the moral culpability of the party, which involves, I say, a complete relaxation of the clause as it now stands on the Statute-book so as to a large extent render it nugatory.

I do not intend to go more at length into this Bill. I have drawn the attention of the House to what I regard as very great defects in it, and in fact I am at a loss to find anything in this Bill, from cover to cover, that is calculated to recommend it to this House. I direct the attention of hon. members to another point, and that is, that this Bill, so far as I am able to judge, has found no support anywhere. I may be wrong ; but I consider it to be a duty which devolves on me to read the Government papers as well as the Conservative papers, and I fail to find a single paper that approves of this Bill. I have failed to find any portion of the press to which this Bill apparently commends itself. In the Montreal "Gazette" and in the "Mail and Empire" I find the strongest possible objections raised to it not only on the grounds which I have presented to the House, but on the grounds of relaxing the penalties for offences against the law and threatening the purity of elections. Then I take the "Globe," which generally is able to give a tolerably hearty support to anything that emanates from hon. gentlemen opposite; but I find in that newspaper this statement:

The Confederation Act provided that the provincial franchises should be used until otherwise ordered.

Then it speaks of the change, and says:

The argument, that if we return to the provincial franchise, the law will be subject to the caprice of the provincial legislatures, is worthy of a little more consideration. The provincial legislation on the franchise has doubtless contained some faults, but none worse than the Franchise Act of 1885.

The best the "Globe" can say of this Bill, is that it does not contain anything worse than the present Act, which has been denounced in such round terms by hon. gentlemen opposite as being entirely indefensible. Then the "Globe" says:

Really, however, one of the gravest objections to the Franchise Act of 1885 was the unfair use to which it might be put by the Government and its friends, of whatever party they might be composed. Another was its expense.

I think I have proven to the House, that however open the Act of 1885 is to be made use of by the Government and its friends, this Bill would be a thousand times more open to that charge, because legislatures over which we have no control would be able to do in the Dominion elections, what I have already shown they have done in regard to the local elections. The "Globe," after having spoken in the most forcible manner in favour of manhood suffrage says:

The basis of the federal franchise certainly ought to be: one man one vote.

So, Sir, I find that even a paper so strongly supporting the Liberal Government as the "Globe" does is anything but satisfied with the character of this measure. Then, the Montreal "Star," an independent paper, under an article which is headed "It satisfies no one," denounces this measure which we are now considering and points out its grave defects. It says:

The "Globe" makes the boast that by the new law three-fifths of the people of the Dominion will elect their members of Parliament under manhood franchise and one man one vote, and prophesies that before the next general election the remaining two-fifths will probably have fallen into line, and that we shall have a law that will give absolute equality in all the provinces.

I think, Sir, there is a great deal in that. At the present time a very large portion of the members in the province are elected under manhood suffrage practically. In the province of Ontario it is now practically manhood suffrage; in British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, it is the same, and with the exception of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, you have manhood suffrage throughout. The tendency of all the local legislatures being to broaden the franchise, the probability is, as is indicated by the "Globe," that at a comparatively early date, within five years, we shall have practically manhood suffrage in the various provinces of the Dominion. If that be the case, it becomes worthy the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, as to whether they should not endeavour to obtain an easy worked and inexpensive law by which a franchise Bill shall be obtained that will be common to every part of this Dominion. In speaking of the expense of the Franchise Act, I may draw the attention of the House for a moment to the fact, that the operation of the franchise law in Manitoba is anything but inexpensive. The total cost to the province of Manitoba was as follows: Registry clerks' fees, $6,284. Expenses for final revision, $1,717. Cost of printing, $6,227; making a total cost for that small province of $14,228, or a little over $355 for each constituency. In the courts of revision there were 1,955 names added, and 944 struck off, making the total vote 49,199, at a cost of $14,288, or about 29 cents for each name. Printing the lists and a number of other expenses would devolve upon the Government here. Then, Sir, I find in the St. John "News" the following statement:—

But the proposed new Act, instead of being a simple measure, turns out to be a bulky Bill of 156 clauses, making 68 printed pages, and in many respects it is quite as complicated as the present law. More than this, the general principle of the Bill, which is the adoption of the various and divergent provincial franchises, is not to be commended. A man living in one province will be a voter who would not under similar conditions be a voter in an adjacent province. The principle that it shall be left to the local legislatures to say who shall and who shall not vote for members of the Federal Parliament, is decidedly wrong, and may lead to abuses and injustice. A Bill based on the principle of simple manhood suffrage, with certain necessary restrictions, would have been better and much more in consonance with the spirit of the age.

I find also that the Manitoba newspapers object to this Bill in the strongest possible language. They point out the extremely corrupt character of the franchise law in Manitoba and they object to having that applied to the Dominion. The Manitoba

"Free Press," a paper supporting the present Government, has the following statement with regard to this measure:—

"The new franchise law," says the Toronto "Globe," "means that we are done with stuffed voters' lists." On the contrary, it means that in Manitoba, at least, we are to have, for the first time, stuffed voters' lists for use in Dominion elections. The "Free Press" does not presume to speak of the lists elsewhere than in this province; the laws under which they are made may be the best, and they may be honestly compiled. The "Globe" may speak for Ontario, and other papers for other provinces; for the present we do not presume to go outside of Manitoba. Here, too, they may be honestly compiled, but that is in spite of the law, which distinctly permits dishonesty. It is some years now since the "Globe" took the trouble to learn enough about the Manitoba Election Act to declare that it was bad, and that it would hinder the reform of the Dominion law by putting a weapon of defence in the hands of the Tories. These were not its exact words, but they convey its exact meaning. It may have forgotten in the intervening years what it then knew, and we shall take the liberty briefly to recall to its recollection the salient features of the Manitoba law.

It provides that lists shall be compiled by registration clerks appointed by the government. These are not barristers of repute in their profession or of standing in the community, as provided by the Dominion Act which is now being repealed because it is thought to be so objectionable. They may be any persons whom the government choose to appoint, and as a matter of fact, have been for the most part active workers of the party to whom the pay of a registration clerk is a consideration. They have no public or professional reputation to sustain, and are, therefore, all the freer, in earning their money, to earn also the gratitude of their employers. We need not go beyond this to convict the law of all the badness charged against it. It has long been a Liberal principle that the making of the voters' lists should be free of government control, and an excellent principle it is. In passing the Dominion franchise law, the Conservatives, no doubt, calculated to reap party advantage by means of the control exercised through the revising barristers, and, holding the view they did, the Liberals were quite right in denouncing the Act. But the control was insignificant in comparison with the control reserved by the Government of Manitoba. As a matter of fact, there were few complaints made against the revising barristers, which shows their work was fairly well performed. Perhaps this has been largely due to the checks provided by courts of revision and appeals to judges. Here the registration clerks are at liberty to compile the lists in any manner they choose, free of restraint or constraint. The "Globe" may form a shrewd conception of the results produced, if it will carefully bear in mind the general character of those registration clerks.

I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to that as coming from one of their own newspapers, the Winnipeg "Free Press," which is not likely to overstate the case; and that confirms in the fullest and clearest manner the authentic statements which I have read as having been made in the legislature of Manitoba.

Now, I have already said that manhood suffrage is enjoyed in a large portion of the Dominion, and I think it is well worthy of the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, even at this late period, whether it would not be infinitely better to adopt the principle of manhood suffrage throughout the Dominion. I am sure there is no person who wishes to see our elections carried on in a proper and suitable manner, and the members of a great parliament like this elected on a common principle and placed on a common footing relatively to each other, who would not a thousand times prefer a Bill providing for manhood suffrage to the measure now before us—a measure open to such serious objections that it renders confusion worse confounded. I believe that if the public sentiment of this country were taken, it would be found greatly to prefer a simple manhood suffrage, guarded by residence and a proper system of registration. I may say that in 1859 manhood suffrage was the law in Nova Scotia. I will read the principal clauses of that law as they are very short:

All natural-born and naturalized subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, having been, and being, domiciled as hereinafter limited, and being males over the age of twenty-one years, shall be entitled to vote for members to serve in general assembly, that is to say, provided they shall at the time of voting have had their usual place of abode for at least year next before voting in the counties for which they shall vote for county members, and in the townships for which they shall vote for township members; and provided also, that such naturalized subjects so voting, and such natural-born subjects as were not born in Nova Scotia, shall, in addition, have resided in the province for at least five years next before voting; and provided also, that persons voting on residence shall only be entitled to vote in the electoral districts in which they reside at the time of voting, and which district must be in the counties and townships respectively for representing which the candidates are to be elected at that election; and no person who shall have received aid as a pauper under any poor law in this province, or aid as poor persons from any public grant of government money within one year before the day of polling, nor any Indian, shall be entitled to vote on residence.

It will be seen that there was not only manhood suffrage, but one man one vote; and I think I may say that the legislature of Nova Scotia at that time held as high a character for the ability and independence of its members as it has ever done in any period of its history. As I said on a former occasion, there is no country in the world to which, in my judgment, manhood suffrage could be entrusted with greater propriety than to Canada. Every gentleman who is acquainted with the mass of the people of this Dominion knows perfectly well that for intelligence and independence, no electorate could be found anywhere that would surpass that of Canada. I have said on a former occasion that manhood suffrage in the Dominion of Canada would be a much higher franchise than the franchise that exists to-day in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, where many thousands of the electors have not the slightest idea of many of the questions before the country nor any knowledge of the relations of the political parties. Everybody knows that from the frequent electoral contests that take place in Canada, the great mass of the people are not only thoroughly intelligent, but thoroughly well informed on political questions, and in a position to give an intelligent expression of their opinion upon them. I therefore do hope that before this measure is pressed to a conclusion, the Government will give careful attention to the advisability of adopting a simple franchise, adapted to the whole country—one that will be inexpensive, and that, with a proper registration, will remove almost every objection that has been urged against this measure.

Now, Sir, I am at a loss to understand why hon. gentlemen opposite should denounce so fiercely the present law. I look upon it as an act of base ingratitude on their part. Why, Sir, what has the present law done for them? We had the local franchises in this country in 1867; the Liberal party were badly beaten. We had them in 1872; again they were badly beaten. We had them in 1874, when, as hon. gentlemen opposite know, they got a snap verdict from the country before the country understood the question that was under consideration. But that was the only occasion down to 1891 on which they succeeded. Out of seven elections, they were beaten every time but one under the very provincial franchises they now propose to bring into operation. Now, since this law has been on the Statute-book, we have had three elections. And in the last of these they succeeded, going to the country without a policy, without a principle, without anything except the prestige of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Laurier) which, I confess, was a very great source of strength, and I look upon it as an act of great ingratitude to the present law that they should denounce the very means by which they succeeded in obtaining office. I am quite sure that the more hon. gentlemen opposite think of this question, the more they will find that the adoption of such a Bill as this will be fraught with great injury to the country, will give great dissatisfaction, and be attended by none of the advantages which we all agree an election law should possess, and they will find, I believe, sufficient talent and ability among themselves to devise a cheap and inoffensive measure that would apply to the whole of Canada and that we need not be ashamed of, and under which all members elected to this House would stand on the same footing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I ventured at a public meeting which was held a short time ago, to express my opinion that the hon. gentleman would receive one of the surprises of his life after Parliament met and he found the Liberal party redeeming the pledges they had made previous to the elections, and I am vindicated to-night in the speech he has just made in which he expressed his unqualified surprise that the Liberal party, who, for some ten or twelve years past have pledged themselves in and out of the House to the introduction of just such a Bill as we have before us now, should have redeemed that pledge on this occasion. The Liberal party are mindful of their pledge and not unmindful of the handsome majorities they have received, and in redeeming that pledge they are carrying out the wishes of the large majority of those who voted for them at the last general election. The hon. gentleman is to be congratulated on the mild and quiet way in which he to-night addressed himself to the subject under discussion. He commenced in the afternoon with his usual vigour, but as time went on he became milder, and after dinner we found him resuming the discussion in a still milder tone. For some unaccountable reason we found the hon. gentleman evincing a mildness altogether foreign to his character, and which only can be accounted for by some extraordinary influence? What is the cause? How is it he is not thundering to-night as usual on the delinquencies of the present Government? How is it that he has not been charging hon. members on this side with having lost the confidence of the electorate? How is it he does not tell us that the remarkably intelligent province from which he has the honour to come has listened to the weary diatribes which he and his friend and lieutenant beside him (Mr. Foster) have uttered since the session began and has shown that it saw some strength in their arguments. Sir, the whole secret of the mildness and quietness with which the hon. gentleman addressed the House can be found in the telegraphic despatches which have just reached us from the province of Nova Scotia. Sir, to the three weeks of wasted time for which the hon. gentleman was accountable he has just got his answer from his native province. He sent perhaps the most brilliant and able of his lieutenants down there to take charge of the campaign. He resorted, I have no doubt, to those devices than whom no one knows better how to use, to carry the elections, and although the Liberal party in that province were deprived of the assistance of my hon. colleague, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), who has been compelled to remain in this House, yet, under the leadership of the Hon. Mr. Murray, that province has returned to its local House, out of thirty-eight members, thirty-two to support Liberalism and five to support the Tory party. Sir, I think the hon. gentleman is to be commiserated.

Mr. CRAIG. From the sea alone.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Slowly but surely, not from the sea alone, but from all parts of the Dominion comes in the answer that the people have lost confidence in him and his policy. Unequivocally and unreservedly they pronounce their faith in the Liberal party. Unequivocally the people of the province of Nova Scotia have pronounced their continued faith in that party which has ruled that province for the last fourteen or fifteen years.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a case of misplaced confidence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Thirty-two to five is the best answer I can give. If I were to argue here for a week, I could not give a better one, or make it stronger. That great city in which the hon. gentleman's voice has been heard so often records a majority of 600 in favour of the three Liberal candidates, and the whole province has gone with a sweep and declared emphatically, beyond contradiction or doubt, that Toryism and Tupperism, as my hon. friend beside me has said, is dead in the province of Nova Scotia. But how about the great county of Colchester, and how about the historic county, which, almost since confederation, has returned, constantly, members to support the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs? Where is that county to-day? Even it has turned its back upon him. Cumberland has gone, Colchester has gone. The hon. gentleman was deploring that Colchester was not represented in this House, and I am pleased to be able to inform him that hereafter during this session and Parliament, Colchester will be well represented by a member supporting my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier). Well, the hon. gentleman is to be commiserated. He has fought long and talked loud, and he would do well now, with his mature years, to recognize the handwriting upon the wall. He would do well to recognize the fact that in this great Dominion the young men are declaring themselves Liberals, that Canada is saturated with Liberal principles, and that from the Atlantic to the Pacific there is to-day one universal feeling, that Toryism is dead and buried. I offer my commiserations to the hon. gentleman. I feel somewhat sorry for him. His ranks are being decimated slowly but surely. Standing behind him is a small phalanx of the old guard, but day by day we find their numbers diminishing and others taking their places on the opposite side. I can only hope for the hon. gentleman that those who are nearer and behind him will remain true, for if they do not he will not be left with even a corporal's guard when the session is over.

I congratulate the hon. gentleman sincerely on one fact, that he has shown an example to his lieutenants and followers in this debate by endeavouring to discuss the merits of the Bill, and because he has done so, I propose to say a few words in reply. Towards the close of his speech he spoke of it as being an extremely bulky measure.

Mr. DAVIES.

No one knows better than the hon. gentleman himself that, although the Bill is somewhat bulky, it is a necessary consolidation of a large number of existing statutes, and that unless these statutes had been consolidated in the Bill, it would be almost impossible for the ordinary man to understand the election law at all. In this bulky Bill of sixty pages there are only very few sections which are new or which introduce a new principle. The other sections merely consolidate the existing diverse statutes on the election law. So that we have to confine ourselves, not to a discussion of the consolidation part of the Bill, but simply to a discussion of those new principles which the Bill introduces. Now, the hon. gentleman took some time just before dinner to show the iniquity of the present provincial franchises. He took as an instance the province of Manitoba, and he argued at some length basing his argument upon statements of the leader of the Opposition in that province and another member of the Opposition named McFadden, to prove that there was no earthly good to be found in the Manitoba election law at all. It was, to use his own language, a most infamous Act. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to look through that Act; I have examined it somewhat critically, and I find that, taken as a whole, this Act of the legislature of the province of Manitoba, is, on the face of it, about as good an Act as could well be conceived of. I find, Sir, that it confers the franchise upon those of the male sex:

Who are of the age of twenty-one years and are British subjects by birth or naturalization, and who, at time of the proclamation of the appointment of a registration clerk, have been three months resident and domiciled within the electoral division, and have been one year resident and domiciled within the province.

And my surprise was intensified when after I had heard the hon. gentleman, for nearly half an hour, denouncing this Act as an infamous Act, to hear him wind up his lengthy speech by calling upon this House to adopt the very principle of manhood suffrage that was embodied in the Manitoba Act. How does the hon. gentleman reconcile these things?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) surely is not serious. I was not objecting to manhood suffrage being embodied in the Act, it was the administration of the Act, the corrupt administration of the Act, which I proved up to the hilt, and which the Manitoba "Free Press," supporting the hon. gentleman denounces as loudly as I do.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then, I am glad to receive the confession of the hon. gentleman that it is not the Act itself that he denounces.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Act contains this corrupt organization and administration.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Manitoba Act is all right, it appears.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it is all wrong, except the principle of manhood suffrage.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It embodies the very principle that the hon. gentleman, in his closing words, contended for, the principle of manhood suffrage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It does.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And because we ask that this principle should be adopted, so far as Manitoba is concerned, for elections to this House, he denounces this Bill as an infamous Bill. The hon. gentleman said that he did not give his own evidence but quoted the opinion of the leader of the Opposition in the legislature of Manitoba. And I do not wonder the hon. gentleman quoted that language; when I heard it read, I thought it suited him exactly. I will not accuse the hon. gentleman of exaggeration, but I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the quotation which he read with so much gusto. What was that quotation which he seriously asked this House to adopt as correct? The criticism which he read as coming from Mr. Roblin, the leader of the Opposition, was that under this "infamous" Act, 100,000 electors had been disfranchised during the last election in Manitoba. What will this House say when I tell them that the whole population of Manitoba is about 200,000 or about 40,000 families. Yet it seems 100,000 electors have been disfranchised in the province.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to say that I presume that is a clerical error in the report which I read, and that 10,000 was the number intended.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will take the hon. gentleman's explanation. He admits that it was a clerical error. But when he was quoting it, when he was rolling it with such intense gusto under his tongue, did he suggest that there was a clerical error? The thing contains its own refutation; its absurdity stands out upon its face. But, as the hon. gentleman has withdrawn it, I will say nothing more to the House, except that I hope that those who quote his speech, including the statement he now corrects, will also quote his correction. His argument based upon this 100,000 falls to the ground in the proportion that 100,000 bears to 10,000; and, so far as the 10,000 is concerned, I think the House will not ask me to trouble it by continuing the argument. Further, the hon. gentleman quoted an ex-parte declaration of a gentleman named McFadden as showing that the Franchise Act was, as he termed it, an infamous Act. What did Mr. McFadden say? And I would ask the hon. gentleman in this connection, if he thinks it becomes a distinguished statesman of his standing, a man of far more than ordinary calibre, as he is, when addressing his followers and this House upon a Bill that goes to the foundation of representative institutions in this country, to content himself with reading ex-parte declarations of some member of the provincial legislature as to the existing state of facts. The thing is beneath him. He should relegate it to some of those gentlemen behind him who seem to think that they fulfil their duties here when they occupy an hour or two of the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not saying anything against many of the hon. gentlemen behind the leader of the Opposition, among whom are many personal friends of my own. But those who have sat here for the past few weeks cannot shut their eyes to the fact that there has been a kind of contest among some hon. gentlemen opposite to see which could occupy the longest time of the House, irrespective of the force of the arguments they presented. Now, what was the gist of the statement made by Mr. McFadden, after all said and done? It was that the election Act was all right, but the only trouble was with the administration of the Act. Well, Sir, we are not adopting the present administration of the Act; that may change from day to day. I will not concede there were any improprieties in the administration of the Act in Manitoba. We know very well the extent to which members of the Opposition will go, when they are beaten in a general election, in order to account for their defeat. They will give all manner of reasons as accounting for their defeat except the fact that the people did not vote for them, which generally is the real reason. But they avoid that and talk about the way the law is administered. But I wish to address myself seriously to some serious arguments of the hon. gentleman which seemed to have some weight. I do not think anybody pretends that the Bill presented by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is a perfect Bill. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is quite willing to accept any suggestions as to details which come from gentlemen opposite to improve the Bill. All we do say is that the principle of adopting the provincial franchises as the basis of the Dominion franchise is a principle for which the Liberal party has fought for the last ten or twelve years, and a principle to which, after five years of ceaseless agitation, our opponents, the Conservative party gave in their adhesion, and to which they publicly declared their conversion. Why, Sir, what are we arguing about? I say unreservedly that upon this point as to the principle upon which the basis of the Dominion franchise should be built, that principle it was contended by the Liberal party should be the provincial franchises, and for five years that principle was conceded by our opponents, and they admitted that it was the proper principle. There was no difference between the parties. It was not a contentious principle until faction made it so; it has not been a contentious principle for the last five or six years. When the hon. gentleman argued, therefore, that the principle we have adopted was a vicious principle and a wrong principle, he was opposing the declarations of the party which he now leads, declarations made in this House from time to time, and most notably by the late leader, Sir John Thompson, to whose remarks I will refer in a moment or two.

Now, he says the Act of 1885 was a good Act in several respects, he says it gave practical uniformity. He instanced the exceptions, every properly and very justly, of Prince Edward Island and of British Columbia; but he failed to go further, as he ought to have gone. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman this question, when he is thinking this out, as he ought to think it out, and as I have no doubt he does try to think it out in the seclusion of his study—I would like to ask him this question: Is there uniformity in the Act of 1885, leaving Prince Edward Island and British Columbia to one side? Were the franchises for the city and the county the same? Did not a man who possessed the right to vote in the city, pass into the county and lose that right to vote? Certainly he did. The same qualifications did not exist. The hon. gentleman knows well, no one, from his large experience, knows better, that in all British representative institutions it has not been sought to obtain pedantic or absolute uniformity, that it is not thought desirable to have pedantic or absolute uniformity; but that the franchises change with the changing conditions of the people, as they ought to change. In the city you have a franchise, one amount, one fixed franchise; in the country districts, an entirely different one. In one province we have one franchise, in another province another franchise—just to suit what was thought to be the conditions of the people, and to offer an opportunity to give expression to the mature wish of the people in each province. That has been the case with us, and that is the case, not only in the mother country, but in all countries possessing British representative institutions. I ask the attention of the hon. gentleman for a moment to the state of the franchise in Great Britain and Ireland. Is the franchise the same in England as it is in Scotland? Is it the same in Scotland that it is in Ireland? Is it the same in the city as it is in the boroughs? Why, the hon. gentleman knows there is no such thing as uniformity known, or recognized, or legislated for in the great country from which we take our cue. Such a thing as uniformity is not known, and such a thing as uniformity would be unjust, because the conditions of the people in cities and boroughs, in Ireland and in England, and in Scotland, are entirely different, and you must legislate in conformity with the actual conditions of the people.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman put a point which was a very strong one, if it was correct. He says: I call the attention of Parliament to the serious fact that we are legislating to-day to part with our right of declaring how its members should be elected. Sir, we are doing nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman surely is wrong. The House is legislating with the full knowledge of what the franchise will be in each province of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman says this may happen, and the other thing may happen. Sir, it has been the boast of our elastic British constitution that as conditions change, we will change the legislation necessary to meet them; and if conditions change in this Dominion of Canada, if any of the horrible things happen which my hon. friend predicts, if the great province of Ontario confers the franchise upon a class of people that we do not approve of, surely it is open to this Parliament to change the Act. We do not part with the power. We adopt the franchise as it is to-day, we adopt the provincial franchise as long as we think it suitable for our interests, but we do not deprive ourselves of the power of regulating our franchise if we choose. What was the fact before? When this confederation was first brought into existence, we had a scheme, a system, very similar to the one which we are now asked to adopt; we had the provincial franchises as the basis of the Dominion franchise. That system worked for eighteen long years, and I venture the assertion that it worked with hardly a hostile criticism from any part of the Dominion. Who revoked that system, and why was it revoked? Was there a call from the people to revoke it? Dare anybody stand up and say that during the first eighteen years of this Dominion that franchise was an infamous one, or proved a curse, or was not a blessing? Why, we know that the voice of the people was obtained through that system better than it has even been obtained after the Bill of 1885 was introduced. We propose, not something entirely novel or new, but we propose, after having had some twelve years experience of that Franchise Bill of 1885, that we should return to the system that worked so admirably from 1867 up to 1885. But the hon. gentleman says: Suppose a minority representation was introduced in the great province of Ontario, where would you be then? Well, supposing it was, I cannot see how that is going to affect us. The principle of having a minority representative would not apply to us. It is only the franchise vote which would be polled in accordance with the electoral law of the Dominion to elect one man for each electoral district, and not put a minority man here. That argument does not apply, and cannot apply. And the same answer may be given to his suggestion that possibly the province of Ontario, singled out here again as perhaps the most advanced province of the Dominion, might confer the franchise upon females. Well, Sir, supposing it did. This Parliament might be perfectly well satisfied to adopt that, perfectly well satisfied to let it be. But if Parliament was not satisfied, the remedy would be in their own hands. The argument which the hon. gentleman suggests, that we are parting with our powers in this matter, is altogether inaccurate, because we are simply adopting the franchise as it at present exists, we claim the fullest and amplest power to alter, revoke, or modify it from time to time, as the circumstances of the case may call for.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will probably allow me to ask him a question, because I do not read the Bill as he does. I understand him to say that this Bill proposes that we should take the franchises as they exist now in the various provinces, and make them the basis of the Dominion franchise. But that is not the Bill. The Bill reads :

Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, the qualifications and conditions necessary to entitle a person to vote at a Dominion election, shall be those entitling a person, at the time of such election, to vote at a provincial election in the electoral district for which the Dominion election is being held, or any part thereof.

So that whatever the law may be in the province at the time the Dominion election is held, shall be the law for the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Precisely, the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct. He has read the Bill just as it is, and just as I read it. But I was addressing myself to his argument that Parliament was parting with its right of declaring how its members should be elected, and I was showing him that while we are adopting this system of provincial franchises which are to apply to the Dominion for the time being, we do not part with our powers; we can retain and recover those powers at any moment we like to exercise our privilege.

The hon. gentleman quoted with approval a speech delivered by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) the other day. That hon. gentleman presented a well-reasoned argument against the principle of this Bill. He argued that one vital defect in it was, that while in Ontario there was the principle adopted of one man one vote, that principle did not apply to the province of Quebec, and one man there if he possessed half a dozen qualifications for votes in different electoral districts could deliver as many votes as he could visit different electoral districts on election day. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that that was an extraordinary position and might result in an extraordinary state of facts; indeed, he more than broadly hinted that underlying it was the awful question of French domination, and he told this House that the province of Ontario would never submit to anything of the kind. One would suppose from the hon. gentleman's argument that some special advantage was being conceded by this provision to the province of Quebec. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman that the province of Quebec sends to this House a fixed number of representatives. It does not matter whether one man votes in two or half a dozen places; it does not alter the representation in the House, and if the province of Quebec in its wisdom seems to think the better plan is to give property the right to vote through its owner in every place which he can visit on election day, it is the business of the province itself: it does not alter the representation in this House, nor does it give the province of Quebec a scintilla of advantage over Ontario.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yet the "Globe" hopes that the province of Quebec will change its present system to one man one vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not surprised that the "Globe" should advocate the one man one vote principle, and that it would like to see it extended to the province of Quebec. But the "Globe" does not pretend to dictate to Quebec. The "Globe" knows very well that in the matter of provincial franchise the people of the province of Quebec are supreme, and if they choose to retain the principle they now have, the "Globe" will not complain, much as it may argue that the plan of one man one vote is a better one. But my hon. friend is a veritable Rip Van Winkle. The hon. gentleman was a member or leading supporter of a Government which distinctly admitted its adherence to the principle he now condemns. Does the hon. gentleman remember when he sat on this side of the House what Sir John Thompson, his leader, stated? Did he not say that in order to achieve simplicity and avoid the enormous expense of a Dominion franchise, the Conservative party had solemnly agreed to accept as the basis of a Dominion franchise the provincial franchise of the Dominion?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Sir John Thompson never at any moment declared or expressed the opinion that this Parliament should depart from the principle of governing its own franchise. Once you depart from that principle, it is no longer a Dominion but a provincial franchise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is confounding two things. I am talking about the justice of taking the provincial franchise as the basis for a Dominion franchise. I am arguing whether it is proper or right to adopt as a basis for a Dominion franchise the franchises of the several provinces. That is a separate and distinct question in itself. Is it right or wrong?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). You propose to make some changes in this Parliament?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman says that is wrong. Why? He says it is wrong because in the province of Quebec a man may have five or six votes, whereas in Ontario a man has only one vote. But you have conceded that point already; you have declared that that principle was the only one you would adopt.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We never declared that. The Bill never came before this House, and never was voted on.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not saying it was voted on. But I say that the hon. gentleman's leader used the following language, which has already been quoted by the Solicitor General, but which under the circumstances, I may be pardoned for quoting again. At page 3367 in the "Hansard" of 1894, in reply to Mr. Laurier, Sir John Thompson said:

We propose important changes in the Franchise Act, and, without making a speech upon them or giving reasons, I would briefly state that we propose to adopt, as the basis of the franchise, the franchises of the various franchises of Canada.

That was the proposition. No one cheered more heartily than the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) on that occasion. He was here supporting Sir John Thompson through thick and thin; that was his own declaration made through the mouth of his leader. He now comes forward and warns us—about what he says: If you attempt to give six votes to a man in the province of Quebec, as you would do if you adopt the Quebec franchise, and only one vote to a man in Ontario, the great province of Ontario will not submit to it. But the hon. gentleman has been asleep for six years; he is, as I have said, a veritable Rip Van Winkle. The hon. gentleman accepted through the mouth of his leader five or six years ago the declaration I have read.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I never accepted it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman did not accept it, he took mighty good care to hold his tongue, and he took a position in the Government without making any explanation in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask a question. Are not the franchises of the provinces the basis of the present list?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. HUGHES. They are.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. The basis of the present list has been the fiat of the revising officer. Upon this point, and keeping as close as possible to my hon. friend, for I do not want him to escape, I may say that Sir John Thompson introduced a Bill based on the principle which he enunciated in answer to the question put by Mr. Laurier. What did Sir John Thompson say? For I will give my hon. friend the benefit of all the qualifications applied by Sir John in introducing the Bill. He said:

The change is also proposed in this Bill which I indicated a few days ago, that the questions upon which so much difference has arisen in the past as to the basis of the franchise, shall be adjusted by adopting the franchise of the several provinces. While I admit that this is a new departure, I deny what has been so widely asserted, that it is in any important or practical degree a surrender of any principle that we have contended for in times past. The number of differences which exist between the provincial franchise and the Dominion franchise as established by our own Act, are so few as not to be worth the contest and the expense which are involved in keeping them up, and the adoption of a general system which will apply both to the local and Dominion legislatures, has recommendations as regards simplicity and facilities for economy, which cannot exist under a dual system, such as we have been keeping up for the past few years.

Can anything be more clear? The only thing Sir John Thompson claimed to retain was the right to administer those franchises through Dominion officers; but the principle that the franchises of the provinces should constitute the franchise of the Dominion was unreservedly enunciated and unreservedly accepted. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that I was more than surprised, after we had heard this and for years had heard no repudiation of it, to find that this Bill, based upon the very principle they accepted, and on which Sir John Thompson announced his desire to frame a measure is called a contentious Bill to which they cannot agree. I can understand that if an hon. gentleman took up the position adopted by Sir John Thompson, namely, that Dominion officers should be appointed to make up separate lists from the provincial franchises, then he would have a point. Whether we should incur that expense or not is a point I am willing to debate. If the hon. gentleman thinks it worth while to have two sets of revising officers, two sets of lists based on one franchise, involving a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars for their revision, we are prepared to discuss the matter, grapple with it and take issue on it. But do not let my hon.

friend escape from the dilemma in which he is by intimating, when he sat in silence behind Sir John Thompson, cheering his words—

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I never cheered his words.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then the hon. gentleman gave a silent assent, and a mere assent from him is sometimes better than the most vigorous cheering on the part of some other members who sits behind.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The Bill was introduced. I was not a member of the Government at the time, and I had the right then, as every private member has a right, to take whatever position I pleased on a Bill introduced by the Government of which I was a supporter. I never supported the Bill. Sir John Thompson never wanted to introduce provincial franchises over a Dominion franchise. And further, that in adopting the provincial franchise we never made for uniformity alone, and uniformity alone was not the sole principle. We allowed manhood suffrage in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia under the Act of 1885. We held to the right of this Parliament to say just what this franchise should be. My point was, that you cannot, and I do not believe you will say: that one man in the city of Toronto having six votes in the adjoining constituencies can only vote once, while an elector in Montreal can exercise his right to vote seven or eight times in the adjoining electoral districts.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) that he was not in accord with the leader at that time, and that he reserved to himself the right to differ from that Bill if it had been brought to the vote. I accept unreservedly the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) to that effect; but, what of all the rest of the party? Were they like him, sitting there giving an apparent assent, while in their hearts they dissented? Was the Government of the day not bound by the leader's statement? Were the gentlemen with whom he (Mr. Wood) was afterward associated, and who are now sitting on the front Opposition benches, not bound by the statement of their leader? What did the organs of the Conservative party say outside the House in addition to what the members of the party said inside? Why, the "Mail" and the "Gazette" were out with flying colours declaring that in this the party had made an advance towards the Liberal line, that all was peace and harmony, and that they were prepared to accept the great principle for which the Liberal party had so long contended. And, after the announcement by the leader of the House unquestioned, after the announcement of the leading party organs, after the absence of a whimper of dissent from even the rear rank of the party, we now hear my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) announce: Although I did not say anything then, I was entirely opposed to it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) is entitled to that, but all I can say is that he stands alone. I do not believe he will find another man who stood behind the leader of the Government at that time who will have the courage to make an announcement similar to his. It was stated the other night that this Bill was a contentious one, and I said then, and I repeat now, that I was surprised at the statement, because I thought that all contention on this subject had been buried when the leader of a great party solemnly and constitutionally announced from his place in the House that the party had come to the conclusion to adopt the provincial franchises as the basis of the Dominion franchise. I believed that under British constitutional usage, I might accept that statement of the Prime Minister as conclusive. But it appears that I was mistaken, and we have now to deal with a state of affairs that I venture to say cannot be paralleled in any other representative institution.

We have had another gentleman (Mr. Foster), a leading member of the Administration of Sir John Macdonald, a Finance Minister for many years, now the lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition; we have had him deliver a speech for three mortal hours, not upon the Bill, for he did not speak upon the Bill for ten minutes, but upon all manner of conceivable subjects which he could drag in, and weary and take up the time of the House with. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) did do the House the honour, during the last five minutes of his speech, to refer to the question before the Chair. And, Sir, with that supreme indifference to accuracy which distinguishes the hon. gentleman, and that calm superiority to facts when they stand in the way of his argument, which has made him a past master in this kind of debate, and with that faculty he possesses of half stating the truth and keeping back the other half; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) tried to lead this House to believe that this Bill was a perfect enormity. He would have you believe that he had never assented to the principle that I read from Sir John Thompson's speech; and his (Mr. Foster's) followers listened to the latter part of his argument, feeling assured that he would be prepared to advance some solid arguments against the Bill itself. Well, I have often admired the skill and ingenuity with which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) applies himself to an argument he understands, the way he will skate over thin ice, the way he will half state a fact, the way he will twist and turn facts in order to make black white and white black. Sometimes he merits my admiration and astonishment.

Mr. HUGHES. And sometimes you are surprised.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am surprised, but I do submit to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that in discussing a Bill of the importance of this, he might at least possess himself of an elementary knowledge of the Bill itself. I am not asking too much when I ask that. I do not ask for a lawyer's acquaintance with the different details of the Bill; I simply ask that he would possess himself of some little elementary knowledge of what the Bill is about. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) called upon his followers to fight this Bill line by line and section by section; and why? Because he said: It is a contentious Bill, and being a contentious Bill, it should not be introduced this session, and may not be required for four or five years. And the hon. gentleman, with that superior wave of the hand which he sometimes adopts, gave as his reason that it is a contentious Bill, and stated in the most solemn tones: It proposes to hand over to some other power the delimitation or the fixing of the boundaries of the electoral districts. Now, did every anybody hear anything so ridiculous or absurd. There is not a line, not a phrase in this Bill which would justify any such statement. He evoked it from his own inner consciousness; he built up this bogey for the pure purpose of frightening his followers into line. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman could have read the Bill. But somebody may say to me: you cannot be representing him correctly. Well, Sir, when I heard him at first I thought it was a 'lapsus linguae,' but when he enforced the argument through sentence after sentence, I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was in the position he very often is, of not knowing what he was talking about, and covering his argument up in a great cloud of words. What did the hon. gentleman say?

The principles of that Bill, if I understand it rightly, propose to take our constituencies and the power of forming these constituencies from the gentlemen who sit here as a Dominion legislature, and hand it over to the provincial legislatures.

Did ever anybody hear anything so ridiculous? There is not a line in the Bill which would justify such a statement. It is pure imagination, wild and reckless imagination, absolute and utter disregard of facts, and indifference to accuracy which the hon. gentleman, as I say, is a past master in. He says further:

It also gives to a power entirely out of our own control the right to say what shall be the boundaries of the constituencies of gentlemen who sit in this House.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. CASEY. Did he say that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, he did. There is the "Hansard," page 776, and the hon. gentleman is as agile and as slippery at getting out of a key-hole as anybody in the world, but out of that he cannot get; it is there in the "Hansard."

I ask hon. gentlemen sitting behind my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), who have been accustomed to take their political gospel from him, and who have been used to form their opinions upon serious statements made by him in debate, how can any one of them follow him after the exposure that has been made of the ridiculous reasons he gave as to why this Bill was contentious. When one shows that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was entirely mistaken, when one shows that not only one of the dire predictions he made could be fulfilled, because they have no basis in fact, where is the hon. gentleman's argument gone, that this is a contentious Bill. I have shown that this principle is the principle accepted by both political parties. I have shown that the only real and tangible reason which the hon. gentleman put forward why this Bill should be opposed has no existence except in his own fertile imagination; and, having done so, I think I may fairly appeal to the House that, so far as the arguments of the hon. gentleman stand, there is no reason why it should not receive its second reading. I acknowledge that if this Bill were a gerrymander, as the hon. gentleman wanted his followers to believe—if it gave an outside party power to tamper with the boundaries of our constituencies, every man on both sides of the House should rise up in rebellion against it. We have had enough gerrymander Bills in this House. The Liberal party in the great province of Ontario have suffered for eighteen years, aye, nearly twenty years, from the curse of an infamous gerrymander; and a repetition of that gerrymander was introduced here a year or two ago with the hope of legislating me out of this chamber, but it miserably failed, I am glad to say. The Liberal party do not propose to follow in those steps. The Liberal party present a Bill to this House which, though it has its defects, I acknowledge, is based on a principle which has been accepted by both parties, and accepted in a way which, when crystallized in a Bill, ought to insure the passage of that Bill through the House without any factious or contentious opposition.

Now, the argument was used against the Government of the day that we are seeking by this Bill to gain political advantages. How absurd that argument is. Why, we gain no political advantages from this Bill. It takes away from the party in power the political advantages which the present law gives them. To-day, Sir, we could appoint a revising officer of our own in every one of the 215 electoral districts of this Dominion, and have the law administered, if we were bad enough to do it, according to the rule by which hon. gentlemen opposite administered it when in power, that is, for their own purposes.

Mr. WALLACE. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the present Government could appoint 215 revising officers? I think the law is that they cannot dismiss one, any more than they can a judge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Do you mean to say that they hold office during good behaviour?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then, the law as it stands, is ten times as infamous as I ever thought it. If it is true—I do not think it is—that hon. gentlemen opposite have passed a law making these revising officers permanent officers, holding their positions during good behaviour, and if it is the fact, which I think will not be challenged, that they have appointed party heeled in most of the electoral districts to carry out their purposes—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No. Name.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will not go beyond my own province. For years and years the law was administered in the province of Prince Edward Island by the county court judges; yet, because they administered it fairly, you dismissed them from their positions, and appointed the president and the secretary of Liberal-Conservative associations. Men who came from the committee rooms of the Tory party sat upon the bench to determine what men should vote for them.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is aware that nine out of every ten of the revising officers in Ontario are county court judges.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not aware of it; and, so far as they are county court judges, no unfair criticism can be passed upon them. I am speaking of those I know of.

Mr. SPROULE. How can the hon. gentleman say a large majority of them?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because I believe the majority were so. I was not aware that the majority of the revising officers in Ontario were county court judges. I am told that in the province of Quebec it is not so. But I am speaking of the part of the Dominion I know of.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman spoke of them as a whole, and said the large majority of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, the hon. gentleman can give his explanation so far as the province of Ontario is concerned. I can make my statement so far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned, and I know of what I speak, and the same rule applies to many parts of Nova Scotia.

Mr. POWELL. Will the hon. gentleman state what constituencies in Prince Edward Island his statement applies to?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. East and West Queen's, West Prince, and King's—every one of them. There was not a county court judge in any one of these ridings in the province of Prince Edward Island who was not dismissed, and there was not a revising officer appointed whom they did not take right out of the committee rooms—some of them the secretaries and presidents of the Tory associations in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman aware of any wrong action having been done by any one of those officers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not talking about wrong actions.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) They are just as honourable as you are, Sir.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not talking about the class of men they appointed. I am talking about what they hoped to do—what their intentions were when they appointed them; and I say that when they gerrymandered the Island and appointed these revising officers, they had only one object in view—

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) To give you a good, safe constituency, wasn't it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But they did not accomplish their object, owing to the independence of the people.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Will he please tell the House what president and what secretary of a Liberal-Conservative association were appointed revising officers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Smallwood was the secretary of a Liberal-Conservative Association for the past ten years.

Mr. MARTIN. Where was he revising officer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Either in East Prince or in West Prince—Mr. Charles R. Smallwood.

Mr. MARTIN. Who was the president?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. McQuarrie and Mr. Stewart.

Mr. MARTIN. Neither statement is true.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, there is no use of bandying a lie across the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Neither Mr. Stewart nor Mr. Smallwood was a secretary or president of a Liberal-Conservative Association.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know whereof I am talking. Mr. McQuarrie was the president of the Prince County Association, and Mr. Smallwood has been the secretary for the last ten years.

Mr. MARTIN. So far as East Queen's, the district I represent is concerned, the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not mistaken. I ran in West Queen's myself, and Messrs. Smallwood and Stewart were the two revising officers—one for the east and one for the west. But we need not get down to parish politics.

An hon. MEMBER. Come out of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was not in them, but I was trying to pull those out who got themselves in. I was arguing that the Government were not trying to gain any political advantage by adopting the provincial franchise. The provinces of the Dominion are not all under the control of the Dominion Government, though no doubt, with the growing intelligence of the people, they soon will be. But at present they are not. The great province of Quebec has been for years under Tory rule, British Columbia is under Conservative rule, and New Brunswick, I believe, has a composite government, neither Liberal nor Tory but a mixture of both, so that the Liberal party are not the ruling party in the different provinces, nor have they the control of the lists in those provinces. I say that the introduction and carriage of this Bill would involve the surrender of powers which the Government of the day now possess under the Dominion Franchise Act, with respect to the appointment of revising officers and all the other extraordinary and indefensible powers conferred upon the Government of the day. There are many good reasons for our adopting the provincial franchise. In the first place, because of its simplicity. The lists are made up by a class of officials who live in and understand the country and know the people. They are made up with little expense, and there is no danger of confusing the electors by having two different kinds of franchise. Everybody will admit that it is for the benefit of the electorate that the mode of voting and the means of ascertaining whether a man has a vote or not, should be made more simple, and if you have the one list which entitles a man to vote under the provincial franchise and under the Dominion franchise, you simplify the matter so that it comes within the knowledge of the meanest and poorest elector. He is not confused by being told: you are on the provincial franchise but not on the Dominion franchise. Again it is desirable to adopt this measure because it is a much more inexpensive plan. Hon. gentlemen opposite concede that. Our present law has cost this country for the imperfect revisions we have had during the past few years—not a revision every year but every two or three years—over a million dollars of public money, and that does not begin to represent what the revision has cost the people. I am speaking within bounds when I say that it cost from $200 to $500 to the individual candidate himself for each revision besides the million dollars spoken of as a cost to the country. The burden had become intolerable, and it was largely on that account, that the Liberal party advocated the adoption of the provincial franchise. This measure should be adopted because experience, the best test in the world, has shown that the principle of adopting the provincial franchise is a good one. From 1867, when confederation was first called to existence, up to 1885, that system was in vogue and it worked without complaint. If experience has proved it a good system, if it is inexpensive, and simple and easily understood, it has three qualifications which ought to recommend it to the people. Under these circumstances I had the honour in this House, some years ago, of moving that if the provincial lists were not adopted as the basis of a Dominion franchise list, if the House was determined to retain the making-up of those lists and the appointment of officers. I said that I for one was in favour of manhood suffrage as the franchise which should be adopted, and I adhere to that view now; but inasmuch as the great province of Quebec is wedded to its own system and will not accept manhood suffrage. I cast my vote in favour of the adoption of the provincial franchises. We will thus save a million dollars squandered in this attempt to build up a separate list, and will introduce a simple, plain, easily understood system, under which the electors, as a whole, can record their votes in favour of the candidates of their choice.

Mr. ROCHE. We have heard a good many hon. gentlemen opposite accuse members on this side of occupying a great deal of time in talking on almost every subject but the one before the House, but if the hon. gentleman can point to a speech delivered during this debate so utterly foreign to the question under discussion as was the first part of his own remarks. I should like very much to see it. A goodly portion of the balance of the hon. gentleman's speech consisted of braggadocio, and rather loud voiced bravado, of which he seems to be a master, and taking the cue which is likely to be followed in the near future by his own supporters, he accused hon. gentlemen on this side of taking a somersault on this question, and thus sought to prepare the House for the great somersault which he expects his own followers to take in the next few days.

It is not my intention to devote many minutes in replying to the hon. gentleman, because possibly the hon. gentleman would disdain a reply from an humble member like myself and also because there was not much to reply to in the hon. gentleman's remarks. Coming, however, as I do, from the province of Manitoba, that province whose legislation has created a good deal of acrimonious discussion in this House and throughout the country in the past few years, I desire to enter my protest against the adoption of this Franchise Bill, first, because I object to the principle involved of having the control of the franchise surrendered by this Parliament and delegated to the provinces, and secondly, because the Manitoba Franchise Act, which is intended to substitute for this law, so far as the election of members from that province is concerned, is a most iniquitous Act and rightly termed so by the hon. leader of the Opposition. It is an act which is administered in a most hostile spirit to the Conservative opposition in that province. It certainly brings disgrace and discredit on those who were instrumental in placing it upon the Statute-book of the province. That Franchise Act is one, which, when we look at the manner in which the lists have been compiled through its operation, is certainly deserving of our severest condemnation. Any person living in that province and being aware of the character of the lists that have been prepared and of the character of many of those registration clerks, appointees of the Liberal Government, some of whom have had to flee their country for their country's good, may be pardoned if he uses rather strong expressions in condemnation of the same. Now, it is only necessary for me to tell you that at the time that Act was under discussion in the Manitoba legislature, that old time Liberal, Mr. Fisher, formerly president of the Provincial Liberal Association and for many years past holding a seat in the legislature, condemned it in unmeasured terms. He declared this Act to be, to use the time-honoured phrase of his, a monstrosity of monstrosities, and said that if everything were true that had been said against the present Dominion Franchise Act, it was still a king compared to the Greenway Act. When I also bring to your memory the fact that the Toronto "Globe," the mouthpiece and family bible of hon. gentlemen opposite, also condemned the Act, and warned the provincial Liberals that in enacting such legislation they were but placing a stumbling-block in the way of the Liberals in this Dominion Parliament who were agitating against the Dominion Franchise Act, you can form some idea of the iniquitous character of that Act when it met with such condemnation from those particular sources. Now, in the few remarks it is my intention to address to this House, I do not intend to discuss the question as affecting any other province, but purely from a Manitoba standpoint. In doing so it will be necessary for me to briefly review the history of the present Manitoba Franchise Act. In the days of the Norquay Administration, the Act provided that the lists should be compiled by officers termed enumerators, who were to be, as far as possible, municipal clerks. Let me read a clause of the Act :

An enumerator appointed under this Act shall be a clerk of a municipality lying wholly within the limits of the electoral division in which he is to act, or, in case of refusal, neglect, inability or other reason, such other person as the Lieutenant-Governor in council may select.

The Liberal Opposition, led by Mr. Greenway, opposed that Act and especially that clause, taking the ground that in all cases the lists should be prepared by municipal clerks, and the municipal lists should be the proper lists used in the election. Mr. Greenway, in opposing the Act, said :

He (Mr. Greenway) was in favour of having the voters' lists prepared by municipal clerks, and maintained that this could be easily done, as the greater part of the work was complete when the lists for municipal elections were prepared. * * * He objected to the government taking in themselves the appointment of enumerators. They might appoint partisans, who might put obstacles in the way in order to exclude from the lists names to which they objected. The greatest freedom should be allowed, and there should not be any taint of suspicion as to the manner in which the lists were prepared. * * * If a partisan enumerator were appointed, how easy it would be for him to ignore certain information which he might obtain in reference to certain individuals whom he might wish to exclude.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am free to admit that there was a certain amount of force in the objections offered to that clause by Mr. Greenway. But with how much greater force does that objection apply to his own Act of the present day? He objected to the appointment of enumerators. But these are the officers he has to-day, only he calls them registration clerks. To show what was the opinion of the Liberals in that province, I will read a resolution moved by Mr. Martin, a gentleman whom members of this House have heard of, a gentleman to whom, whatever may be said concerning him, gentlemen opposite owe their positions to-day, though they have treated him very cavalierly and used him very ungratefully, tossing him aside like an old glove, after having used him for their own purposes, and now he is being looked after by his old opponents, the Canadian Pacific Railway, that he fought for so many years. Mr. Martin, on the third reading of the Bill, moved :

That the said Bill be not read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend the Bill by striking out clause No. 14, which provides for the appointment of enumerators, and substituting therefor a clause providing for clerks of municipalities making up the voters' lists.

This, then, was the policy of the Liberals in 1886. They voted for it in the legislature to a man. In the elections which were held in December of that year, every Liberal candidate and the Liberal leaders from every hustings in the province declared that, if returned to power, the Liberal party would wipe out the Norquay Act, and make provision for the municipal clerks to compile the lists and the judges of the land to revise them. In January, 1888, Mr. Greenway was called upon to form an Administration. And in the session of the following year, I think, in a moment of honesty, he attempted to redeem his pledges. He did pass an Act embodying these principles of having the voters' lists compiled by municipal clerks and revised by the judges of the land. That Act was a very fair Act, and received the endorsement of every member of the legislature irrespective of party. It was an Act that had stood the test of experience in other provinces. It provided that the lists should be compiled by municipal clerks who were directly responsible to the people, and who, if they attempted any unfair dealings, the subject of their dismissal would be a live issue in the next municipal election, so that self-interest alone would prevent them from following crooked methods. But did Mr. Greenway allow that Act to grace the Statute-book of Manitoba very long? Not at all. It was too fair an Act to suit his purpose. He wished to barricade himself behind a partisan Election Act, and one year afterwards, without giving an opportunity for the feasibility of this Act to be tested in a general election, he wiped it off the Statute-book and enacted another embodying every feature condemned by himself in the Norquay Act and in the present Dominion Franchise Act. Nay, more, embodying features much more iniquitous than were to be found in either. Instead of lists being compiled by municipal clerks they were to be compiled by registration clerks, the nominees of the Liberal candidates, whose only qualifications for the position were that they were political partisans, and now in every riding, the lists are compiled under the direct supervision of the Liberal candidates. The Acts of the registration clerks have been notorious. Where judges have acted as revising officers, which is by no means as frequent as it should be, these registration clerks have been reprimanded and condemned. Judge Ardagh in Winnipeg and Judge Ryan in Portage la Prairie, may be named in this connection. The latter, holding a revision for the riding of Beautiful Plains, reprimanded the registration clerk in open court, declared that he had never had such trouble in a court, and that had he known the difficulties he had to face, he would never have accepted the commission of revising officer. The action of these clerks has been such that hundreds, nay thousands, of Conservatives have been disfranchised. The leader of the Opposition has enumerated several instances, notably that of North Winnipeg, where 400 electors were left off the list. The whole Hebrew vote, amounting to 250, were left off because it was expected that they would vote in a body for the Conservative candidate, whereas the Icelandic voters were put on without applications because they generally vote Liberal. Twenty-seven Conservative employees of the Ogilvie Milling Company were left off simply because they were Conservatives, and every Liberal employee was put on without application on their part. And when the registration clerk was asked how these men were put on without application, he had to admit that their names were taken off an old scrutineer's book. As a matter of fact, it was an old canvass book. These men had been marked as having voted for the Liberal candidate, and their names were put on without any application, while the names of Conservatives in the same milling company were left off. In the local constituency adjoining my own, I sent in 35 names that were left off. The hon. gentleman knows what that means, when you take into consideration the sparsely-settled nature of that country. Over 100 other names in that constituency were left off in like manner. In the local constituency where I reside dozens of names were left off the list of men who had voted for ten, twelve or fourteen years previously. It seemed almost an impossibility, even at the court of revision, to get those names on the list without a personal attendance, which necessitated time and labour, and travelling eight or ten miles, and sometimes even thirty or forty miles. In this case the court of revision was held at the extreme eastern end of a county fifty miles long, and in the town where the Liberal candidate resided, to suit his own convenience. In the previous election three courts of revision were held in the same county. In the constituency of Dauphin 200 names were left off the list. In one instance an engagement was made with a registration clerk to put the Conservatives upon the list. A man was to appear at a certain hour with their names, and the registration clerk was to be there to receive the names. But it turned out that he could not be found, and it leaked out afterwards, and they thought it was a sharp trick, the gentleman's own son gave him away by stating that his father had been hiding in a hayloft all the afternoon. In the riding of South Brandon the election was run upon an unrevised list, no time was allowed to have the list printed and to have a court of revision; and therefore the list was not revised at all. In the city of Brandon, on the other hand, a court of revision was held before the lists were printed and distributed, much against the protestations of the Conservative candidate who desired that the court of revision should be postponed in order that the electors might see if their names were on the list. This was refused, and the court of revision was actually held before the lists were printed and distributed. These, Sir, are a few of the instances which prevailed throughout the length and breadth of Manitoba. Is it any wonder that Conservatives hailing from the province of Manitoba should view with alarm the substitution of such an Act as that in place of the present Dominion Franchise Act? The franchise is the whole basis of constitutional freedom. If we have cooked lists prepared by partisan officials the liberty of the people is gone. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal about hon. gentlemen opposite fighting for civil and religious liberties. They say they want to make this a great issue. Now I ask those hon. gentlemen: Are these the kind of weapons they desire to fight their opponents with? You might as well tie a man's hands behind his back and then wade into him a la Corbett. Which is the greater evil, to threaten a man that unless he votes for such and such a candidate, pains and penalties will be inflicted upon him, or to refuse him the right to vote at all in this free country, although he may be fully qualified? I think the latter is much the greater evil, for in the cases I have cited the registration clerks do as they please, while in the former case, in spite of all threats, a man may vote as he pleases and no one can know how he voted. I am but voicing the sentiments of every Conservative elector of Manitoba, yes, and of the independent and fair-minded Liberals of that province, who are certainly disgusted with the methods followed by those registration clerks at the last two provincial elections, methods which are also condemned by the independent press. If hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to push this Act through and make it the law of the land, let them at least exempt the province of Manitoba from its operation until such time as the leader of the Government can use some of his powers of conciliation and sunny methods on the leader of the Government of Manitoba, so that the latter may give it an Act that will allow a Conservative resident of that province to have an equal say in provincial elections with a Liberal elector. Before taking my seat I wish to revise the figures given to-night by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with reference to the Colchester election:

9.50 p.m. Latest corrected returns give Muir, Conservative, a majority in Colchester, N.S.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not my intention to reply at any length to the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche). I fancy the House will be disposed to agree with me that if he had confined his speech to the announcement he made at the close, he probably would have accomplished all for which he rose. Now it has been the custom in the province of Manitoba for Conservatives to denounce the Franchise Act. The reason for that is that the Conservatives of that province have had some such reason as the Conservatives of Nova Scotia have to-day, to find an explanation for the reception they have met at the polls, when they went before the electorate. That explanation is found in the fact that the Conservative party of Manitoba does not stand well with the people of the province; it is because we find in the legislature, composed of 40 members, there are only five or six Conservatives. It is in consequence of facts of this nature that Conservatives find it necessary to denounce the Franchise Act of Manitoba. That Act has been criticised adversely from time to time, but it provides for one man one vote; and I am free to say, because I have observed it for years, that any person who desires to have his name recorded on the list, can have it so recorded. One reason why they find so much fault is because they have been so badly defeated for a number of years past that many of them do not care to have their names placed upon the voters' list at all, and have practically allowed the preparation of the list to go by default. The manner of preparing those lists, as I say, is perfectly fair, and all residents of Manitoba who are entitled to vote, can have their names placed on the list if they so desire. In regard to the insinuation about registration clerks having left the country for the country's good, I may say that I am not aware of any cases of that kind. There was one young man appointed as registration clerk who left the country for another cause altogether. It was not because he had done anything wrong in connection with the preparation of the voters' list, and no insinuation has ever been made against him on that account. The history of the preparation of the voters' lists may be searched, and I am satisfied that in every case it will be found that they have been fairly well prepared, and I think the Manitoba Franchise Act will stand a fair comparison with the Franchise Act of any other province in the Dominion. Suppose we compare the Franchise Act of Manitoba with the Dominion Franchise Act. We have, as I say, in Manitoba the principle of one man one vote. In the city of Winnipeg, Judge Ardagh, who revised the Dominion list, denounced it as one of the worst lists he had ever had anything to do with; he said it was almost impossible to prepare a correct list with the material before him. Why, there is scarcely a man who has died in that country for the last ten or fifteen years, and whose name was on that list, whose vote was not polled in the election when the election day came round. As I said, I do not intend to offer any extended remarks on this question, but I merely wanted to point out that if the Manitoba Act does not work as well as our opponents desire, it is because they do not take advantage of the provision of the Act to see that their names are recorded at the proper time.

Mr. HUGHES. I notice that a kind of holy calm has fallen upon the other side of the House; I notice, also, that the froth has all vanished from the top of the cask. When the Minister of Marine and Fisheries arose, he had worked himself up into a suitable effervescence, carried away with the telegram that Colchester had gone in favour of the Liberal party. I notice that the hon. gentleman's head is not now half as high as it was before.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is all right, we carried it. The majority is a little smaller, that is all.

Mr. HUGHES. We have been wondering why this Franchise Bill was placed on the orders before the tariff question. I have been quietly sizing up the situation, and I can give a few reasons why it has been so placed. In the first place, I think the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) stated that the Prime Minister was going away early in June, but that there were at least twenty hon. members on that side of the House who were capable of leading the Government. They all think they are capable of doing so. I notice that to-day they have been practicing, and truly the hand of the master has been shown to be wanting. We have seen hon. gentlemen from the back benches come down to the front seats, and junior members of the Government, who were formerly characterized by hon. gentlemen when in opposition as those hanging around the Privy Council door waiting for lunch to come in, seeking to get their little experience in leading the House. There was another object sought to be attained in bringing in the Franchise Bill before the tariff measure. It was the desire to hold off the tariff measure until certain provincial elections had been decided and certain by-elections were under way, so that people might be influenced by promises made by the Finance Minister publicly in some instances, as has been asserted by friends of the Government in order to influence certain people in connection with the elections. There is another reason, and I believe this is the most potent cause. We have seen dissensions among hon. gentlemen opposite. Talk of dissensions in the Liberal-Conservative party before last June! I believe all the dissensions in the ranks of the Liberal-Conservatives would not rival the dissensions in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. We find them torn apart on the tariff. Free traders and protectionists are wrangling over the question at the Council board, and rumours are abroad that the Cabinet is being disrupted. We see in the newspapers a rumour that three members of the Cabinet have withdrawn; but I notice two hon. members stick fast to their post.

An hon. MEMBER. They will not give up the salary.

Mr. HUGHES. No, nor the position.

An hon. MEMBER. It is a novelty.

Mr. HUGHES. May it remain a novelty. We find them torn asunder and driven apart on the policy in regard to Crow's Nest Pass Railway. We observed how long the face of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) became when the Solicitor General made his famous address in regard to the Manitoba school question.

Mr. GIBSON. What did you think of it?

Mr. HUGHES. Of his address?

Mr. GIBSON. No, of the school question.

Mr. HUGHES. I have already expressed my opinion.

Mr. GIBSON. You spoke one way and voted another.

Mr. HUGHES. If the hon. gentleman will come down to the front benches so as to be heard and practice, he will perhaps become one of those described as hanging around the Privy Council door, and may become a Minister either without portfolio or without salary.

Mr. GIBSON. I am not a hanger-on like you.

Mr. HUGHES. This infamous gerrymander to which hon. gentlemen opposite have been referring in connection with the Liberal-Conservative party is responsible for a great deal; had it not been for this infamous gerrymander we would have had a staunch Liberal-Conservative representing Lincoln, and the hon. gentleman would have been at home.

Mr. GIBSON. I want to correct the hon. gentleman, and to make this statement, that the Tories sent 400 marked ballots against me from the city of Toronto, and I could trace them; and except for them I would have come here not with a majority of 429, but with a majority of nearly 1,000.

Mr. HUGHES. All I have to say is this: if the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) knows whereof he speaks and has evidence of the fact, he is unfit to occupy a seat in this House unless he follows up and exposes the men.

Mr. GIBSON. Give us time.

Mr. HUGHES. No man with any principle, knowing the facts of the case, should allow such a matter to pass or should dare to stand here without bringing to justice the men who have been guilty of such an act. I do not propose taking up much of the time of the House in discussing this Bill. The object of the discussion has been served because the tariff has been promised for Thursday, and this debate the only point on which the Government are nearly united has taken up the spare time. But the difference in the two parties in regard to the Franchise Bill—I am speaking now of the leaders of the two parties—is not as marked as one would suppose. The policy of the Government seems to be this: they want to let control of the Dominion franchise rest with seven different subordinate bodies, taking the lists of the provinces as the lists for the Dominion. The policy of the Liberal-Conservative party is this: that while we are now ready to accept and have always accepted the election lists of the provinces as a basis of the Dominion franchise, we are not willing to surrender to the provinces the control of the Dominion franchise. Our policy is this: we wish to retain the control, to define who shall vote and what the qualification shall be. We want to conform as nearly as possible with the election lists of the various provinces, and that I well know was the policy of Sir John Thompson at the time he introduced the Bill two years ago in this House. It could very easily be arranged that the Dominion should retain control of the machinery of the election lists and still use the local courts and local lists as a basis. It must be remembered that in many parts of Ontario to-day there is a system of registration in force, especially in cities such as Toronto and Ottawa. In the preparation of the lists in those places there must be expense which will not be involved in connection with new municipal lists. Now, in the ordinary county municipalities, it would be a very easy matter to use the courts for the present provincial lists, as the Dominion courts. But as was said by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, why not accept one broad franchise for the Dominion—let it be manhood suffrage if you will, but under Dominion control. In Ontario, although possibly not to such an extent as in Manitoba, in the preparation of the provincial lists and the Dominion lists as well, we have to contend against the whole machinery of the local Government; license commissioners, division court clerks, license inspectors, all this array of officials are at the beck and nod of the provincial Government, and it is part of their official duty to look after the preparation of the lists. The Liberal-Conservative party on the other hand, through its associations, has to depend on its own exertions, and in that manner the cost is enormous to them. I was much surprised to hear the Minister of Marine refer to the gerrymander in the province of Ontario, for I can tell him, that in that province, in the general election of 1886 and in the general elections of 1890,

Wm. Ralph Meredith, leader of the Liberal-Conservative party, polled 2,500 votes at one time, and at another time 5,000 more of the popular vote, than did the Reform party, and yet, the Reform party was strengthened in its position in the legislature by reason of their infamous gerrymander. I can also inform the hon. gentleman from Manitoba (Mr. Richardson), that in the last general election in that province, the Liberal-Conservative party, despite the fact that all those names referred to by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) were left off by the registration officer, only elected seven members to the House, although they polled 2,500 votes more than did Mr. Greenway's supporters. That, however, shows that the Liberal-Conservative party is not dead yet. It also shows that others than Liberal-Conservatives understand how to gerrymander. Reference has been made to the fact that the province of Nova Scotia has remained true to the Liberal party. I find, Sir, that when the Reform party took office in that province, there was a surplus to the credit of the people of $300,000, but after ten or twelve years of Liberal rule, the people are burdened with a provincial debt of $2,000,000. Taking the area of Nova Scotia, that represents an expenditure added to the provincial debt of about $100 to the square mile. I believe verily, that the greatest failure as a politician and the weakest government in Christendom could maintain office, by dragging a small province like that with a population of 500,000 into debt in ten years, to the tune of $100 for every square mile, or $5 per head for every man, woman and child in Nova Scotia. If the policy of the Liberal party in the Dominion is to be pursued along similar lines they may retain office for a time, but so soon as the people are aroused to the true position of affairs they will not hesitate to turn them out of office. The hon. the Minister of Marine told us that an attempt was made to gerrymander him out of this House. Well, we all remember that when that statement was made in the House before, the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald), in one of the best speeches it has ever been our privilege to listen to, pointed out, that the Minister of Marine was wide of the mark, and that in place of standing up like a man and placing his case before the House, he had gone around privately and sought to instil the idea that he was being unfairly dealt with. The facts proved by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) were, that in redistributing Prince Edward Island they had given the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) an easy riding, and one in which he was sure of election. As to British constitutional usage, the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that while in England and Scotland and Ireland the franchise differs, yet the general tenor of the franchise in Great Britain is the same for similar conditions, and the Central Government in England absolutely controls its franchise, and does not leave it to the dictates of any body in Scotland or in Ireland. The Imperial Parliament itself determines its franchise, and that is the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada. We admit that the present franchise Act can be reformed, and we were prepared to have reformed it had we remained in power. Sir John Thompson's Bill would have reformed it in many important directions, and if our friends opposite will bring in a proper measure retaining the control of the franchise in this Parliament, I am satisfied they will meet with a generous support from this side of the House. If on the other hand, they propose to hand over control of our franchise to the provinces, then I for one will say, that I am prepared to meet it at every step with the most determined opposition.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to a statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as regards Prince Edward Island. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) intended intentionally to misrepresent the facts in Prince Edward Island, but he evidently was so eager to make a point in favour of the Bill which he supported, that he went down to the province of Prince Edward Island for arguments, and perhaps unintentionally misrepresented the facts. He told the House that the presidents and the secretaries of the Liberal-Conservative associations were pitchforked into the positions of revising barristers in that province, and he instanced the name of Charles R. Smallwood. Now, would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) be surprised to know that Mr. Charles R. Smallwood was not a revising barrister at all. I think the hon. gentleman, in his eagerness to make out a case fell into a mistake, and I would advise him to be a little more careful. I have the report of the Auditor General, and I will read to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and to the House a list of the revising barristers in Prince Edward Island, and if he can reconcile that list with the supposed names of gentlemen which he led the House to believe were revising officers in that province, I shall leave it for him to do so. For King's, the name of the revising officer is John S. Macdonald. Was he either the president or the secretary of a Liberal-Conservative association in Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I believe he was.

Mr. MARTIN. I leave it to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) to answer that question, but my information is that he was not. In East Prince Judge Macleod is the revising officer. Was he a president or a secretary of a Conservative association? For West Prince, N. McQuarrie is the revising officer. The hon. gentleman may say something about him—I do not know, but at least in four points out of five he is wrong—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was the president.

Mr. MARTIN. For East Queen's, A. A. McLean is the revising officer. Was he either a president or a secretary? For West Queen's, W. S. Stewart; was he a president or a secretary? So there is not one case in Prince Edward Island, with the possible exception of Mr. McQuarrie, that justifies the hon. gentleman in making the sweeping statement he has made to the House. I would not have made any reference to this matter only I think it is unfair that the hon. gentleman should always go to Prince Edward Island in order to bolster up a weak argument. If the hon. gentleman thinks he can misrepresent the facts in regard to Prince Edward Island, so long as I have the honour to hold a seat here, I will try to set him right. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to the gerrymander of Prince Edward Island. With all due deference to him, I say that the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island are the last party who should refer to a gerrymander, because they are guilty of the most iniquitous gerrymander in Prince Edward Island that has ever been perpetrated in any province of the Dominion, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows it. The hon. gentleman also knows very well that some years ago the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island disfranchised most of the Dominion officials in that province in order to obtain a temporary victory; and what do we see to-day? We see in the local legislature, where the Liberal party is in power, that the very act which they placed on the Statute-book a few years ago to disfranchise the Dominion officials, they are now going to repeal. Why? Because they have turned out the Conservative officials and are replacing them with their own supporters, and they need those votes at the local elections in Prince Edward Island, which is near at hand. I am very sorry I have to correct the hon. gentleman, but I could not do much less than I have done, as I could not sit silently in this House whilst any imputations were made against the revising barristers in Prince Edward Island, who performed their duties honestly and well. With regard to this Bill generally, I did expect, after all we heard from the Liberal party while in Opposition about the National Policy and what an incubus it was upon this country, that it would be the first Act they would repeal. The first session of this Parliament is passed. Last session we were told that we would have a session early in the year, when a new tariff would be submitted to Parliament; but, strange to say, the meeting of Parliament was postponed from time to time. I think it was first called for the 4th of March ; and then it was postponed to the 25th of March. Probably there was more than a scintilla of superstition in their minds with regard to the ides of March. Now we are expected to see in the passing of this Franchise Bill the fulfilment of all their promises. We are told that the law is fulfilled in the one word love ; but this Government expect to fulfil the law and to carry out all their promises in regard to the tariff and every other measure advocated by them for the past eighteen years, by passing this Franchise Bill. If any improvement can be made in the existing Franchise Act, by all means let it be done ; but there is time enough for that. There are a couple of years before the Government in which they can attend to it. But if the Government had a proper appreciation of the business interests of this country, the first thing they would do would be to try to put in practice the theories in regard to the tariff which they have preached into the ears of the country for the last eighteen years. To say the least of it, I think it is rather bad for them to jeopardize the best interests of the country by not submitting a tariff Bill at an earlier period. It is nearly a year since they attained power. One session is past ; another session they are wasting away, and still the tariff is kept in the background. I think the business interests of this country should be attended to before the political exigencies of any party ; but the political exigencies of the Liberal party, especially in Nova Scotia, have been made to do duty on this occasion. I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but merely for the purpose of correcting my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I know that he only made the statements he did in his eagerness to bolster up a cause that he feels is weak.

Mr. McMILLAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MAIL CONTRACTS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. MILLS asked :

What are the different mail routes and mail contracts now existing between the town of Annapolis Royal and the town of Liverpool, in the counties of Annapolis and Queen's respectively? What is the name of each contractor and his bondsmen? What is the length of each route? What is each contract price, and whether daily, semi-weekly or tri-weekly?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I must ask the hon. gentleman to put a motion on the paper for that. It is rather a voluminous return.

DEPOSITS FOR CANAL TENDERS.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

1. What are the different amounts of deposits asked for with the different tenders for the Iroquois section of the Galops Canal, the enlargement of Farran's Point Canal, the Cardinal section of the Galops Canal, and the North Channel between Galops and Prescott?

2. Are the amounts of these deposits larger than the amounts asked by the department formerly to be deposited with tenders on works of similar magnitude?

3. Has the department adopted a new course in asking for larger deposits on the above sections of the St. Lawrence Canals?

4. Is it the intention of the Department of Railways and Canals in calling for tenders for all future work to insist on such proportionately large deposits?

5. Has there been any Order in Council passed determining the amounts of the deposits to be made with tenders for the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The amount of deposit asked for the Iroquois section of the Galops Canal is $50,000; for the enlargement of Farran's Point Canal, $27,500; for the Cardinal section, $75,000; for the North Channel, $37,500. 2. No. 3. No. 4. For work under $250,000 the amount of deposit required will be 10 per cent; over that sum, 5 per cent. 5. I may say that tenders were asked during the late Administration requiring 10 per cent deposit with tenders, and having been so adopted as the usage in the department, it was continued until, on complaints being made and the matter being inquired into, it was concluded desirable to recur to the former system of requiring only 5 per cent deposit on tenders over $250,000. We now require only 5 per cent deposit where the amount involved in the contract does not fall under $250,000.

ISLANDS IN THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to dispose by sale of any of the islands in the Upper St. Lawrence during the present year? If so, will such islands be sold by private sale or public auction?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is not the intention of the Government to dispose, by sale, of any of the islands in the Upper St. Lawrence during the present year. The whole subject is under the consideration of the Government.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to introduce the metrical system of weights and measures into this country?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is not the present intention of the Government.

WINTER MAIL SERVICE, MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

What sum does the Honourable Postmaster General intend to place in the Estimates, for the winter mail service between the mainland and the Magdalen Islands?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The sum of $300 is included in the main Estimates for the service in question.

POSTMASTER OF CAPLIN RIVER.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked :

1. Has Théophile Poirier, of Caplin River, been dismissed from the office of postmaster of that place?

2. If so, was there any complaint against him? What was the nature of the complaint, and who made the complaint?

3. Was there an investigation held? If so, before whom? What was proven in the investigation, and who were the witnesses?

4. Was the inspector of the postal division sent to investigate the matter?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The postmaster in question has not been dismissed.

POSTMASTER OF DABLON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked :

1. Has Guillaume Larouche, of Dablon, been dismissed from the office of postmaster of that place?

2. If so, was there any complaint against him? What was the nature of the complaint, and who made the complaint?

3. Was there an investigation held? If so, before whom? What was proven in the investigation? Who were the witnesses?

4. Was the inspector of the postal division sent to investigate the matter?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The postmaster in question was dismissed because of political partisanship, on a charge made by Mr. Savard, M.P. The evidence being conclusive, no investigation was necessary.

SUNNY BRAE AND MELROSE MAIL SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER asked :

How many tenders were received for the conveyance of the mails between Sunny Brae and Melrose, and the name of each tenderer, and the amounts respectively tendered for? To whom was the contract awarded?

Mr. LAURIER.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I would ask the hon. gentleman to be good enough to put a motion on the paper for that. It involves the preparation of returns of some length.

POST OFFICE AT PIRATE HARBOUR.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER asked :

Will the Government lay immediately upon the Table of this House the petition and correspondence with reference to the closing and re-opening of the post office at Pirate Harbour, in Guysboro' county?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). There is no objection to the return being laid upon the Table; but an order of the House will be necessary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Can they not be laid upon the Table without a motion?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There will have to be a motion.

MILITARY SCHOOL, ST. JOHN'S, P.Q.

Mr. MORIN asked :

For what reason did the Government cancel the contract with Wright & Co., of St. John's, P.Q., for drugs, medicines, &c., for the requirements of the military school at that point, and award it to Doctor Sabourin; and on whose recommendation was it done?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am informed there was no contract between the Government and Messrs, Wright & Co., of St. John's, P.Q., for the supplies mentioned.

CULVERT—CHAMBLY CANAL.

Mr. MORIN asked :

What amount has the Government expended up to this date in the construction of a culvert of the Chambly Canal at St. John's, P.Q., and how much will the cost exceed the grant voted?

How much has been paid to Messrs. Jacques and Henri Cartier, of St. John's, in connection with this work, and what is the work they have to do?

Is this Mr. Jacques Cartier the same person who is a member of the town council of St. John's?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The amount expended up to this date in the construction of a culvert on the Chambly Canal at St. John's, P.Q., is $9,828.36; the cost will exceed the present grant by about $7,000; the amount paid to Jacques Cartier, foreman, is $152.50; the amount paid to Henri Cartier, as night watchman and night foreman, is $116.20. I am informed that Mr. Jacques Cartier is a member of the town council of St. John's.

CHAMBLY CANAL—TENDERS FOR STONE.

Mr. MORIN asked :

Who are the parties who sent in tenders to the Government, last fall, for the stone required for the Chambly Canal ; to whom was the contract awarded, and at what price?

Was the contract given to the lowest tenderer, and if not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The following are the parties who sent in tenders last fall for stone required for the Chambly Canal:—Gervais Brothers, J. Tanguay. Contract was awarded as follows:—Gervais Brothers, for stones (field) about 1 cubic foot, at 80 cents ; J. Tanguay, stones (field), large pieces broken by explosives, average size one-half cubic yard, $1 ; Gervais Brothers, stones (field), small size, 75 cents ; Gervais Brothers, stones (quarry), average size one-half cubic yard, rough, $1.10 ; J. Tanguay, stones (quarry), medium size, $1. The contracts were given to the lowest tenderer in each case.

MILITARY SCHOOL, ST. JOHN'S, P.Q.

Mr. MORIN asked :

Who are the parties who tendered, last fall, for the supply of coal and wood for the military school at St. John's, P.Q. ; did the Government give the contract to the lowest tenderer, as was the invariable practice under the Conservative regime, and if not, why not ; and is it the president of the Liberal Club at St. John's who has secured the contract?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am afraid I must ask the hon. gentleman to amend his question. He appears to have introduced statements which may not be entirely correct. If he will amend it in that respect, I shall be happy to answer it.

BUOY SERVICE, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) for Mr. Martin, asked :

1. On what date does the contract between the Government and Edward McKay for buoy service at Murray Harbour, in Prince Edward Island, expire?

2. Has the contract been cancelled ? If so, when?

4. If contract is cancelled, have the contractor and his securities been notified?

4. Have new tenders for the service been called for, or a new contract entered into?

5. If a new contract has been entered into, who is the contractor? For what sum is the contract let, and is it let by tender?

6. Have any charges or complaints been made against Edward McKay for neglect of duty, and have they been investigated?

7. Has Edward McKay been paid for his past service according to contract? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. The contract is for three years, to terminate on the 3rd of June, 1898. 2, 3, 4 and 5. The contract has not been cancelled, and new tenders have not been called for. 6. Charges and complaints for neglect of duty have been made against Edward McKay, and an investigation was authorized, but no report has been received from the commissioner. 7. He has been paid $75 on account. Balance of $25 is withheld, pending an investigation.

SUBSIDY OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved for :

Copies of all letters, petitions, memorials and suggestions received by the Government, or any member thereof, since the 23rd June, 1896, to amend the North-west Territories Act with a view of enlarging the powers of the executive of the North-west Territories and to increase the subsidy of the North-west Territories.

He said : This is a motion of a character such as I have from year to year brought before the House, sometimes with successful results and sometimes without anything being accomplished. Last session, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), brought forward a motion of a similar kind and nothing resulted from it. Subsequently, a session of the North-west Assembly was held and a memorial was passed which was forwarded to the Dominion Government. That memorial asked for several things, that there is no sign so far that the Government intends to grant. During last session, in regard to one part of the question that that memorial deals with, a member of the executive of the North-west Territories came down to Ottawa, and one of the papers in the Territories had an article on the subject, in which it said :

Mr. Ross's first visit furnishes the Government a fair occasion to prove that the new-born confidence of the people in the Territories has not been misplaced. The attitude of the late Government towards our legislative assembly was of late years most unfriendly. Year after year, the chairman of the executive journeyed to Ottawa to lay the fair and just claims of the North-west Territories before the Government, and year after year these just claims were contemptuously disregarded. The assembly appealed time and again for some definite subsidy, to do away with the hand-to-mouth system, and allow the framing and institution of a progressive policy for the administration of local affairs. A deaf ear was turned to these appeals. Mr. Laurier has thus an early opportunity to demonstrate that he intends to deal justly and generously by the Territories.

Well, Sir, nothing was done last session by the Government of the Prime Minister who was thus appealed to by name, and there does not appear any evidence, from the Queen's Speech or from the Estimates now before us, that there is an intention of doing anything. There is, however, plenty of time for the Government to reconsider its position, and to decide to do something to show itself, as we are told by that paper, more generous than the previous Government. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, in justice to that previous Government, that everything that was done for the North-west Territories was done by them. They have done a great deal in the Territories, and from time to time, at my instance, they did advance the bounds of the powers of the North-west Territories, and they did other things for us, not merely at my instance in regard to these other things, but at the instance of myself and my colleagues, and those of us who went to wait on the Government as petitioners. But, Mr. Speaker, it was on the floor of this House that we accomplished the giving to the North-west Territories of what was properly described in this House last session by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and as described in this memorial passed by the legislative assembly: as practically responsible government. In 1887 the Lieutenant-Governor of these Territories was a Czar, and the assembly had practically no power whatever; but in 1887 the Territories were represented in this House, and from that moment the members of this Parliament moved in the direction of giving responsible government to the Territories. One of these members from the North-west Territories had a Bill on the paper providing that full responsible government be given to the Territories, and thereupon, Sir John Macdonald brought down a Bill under which he gave us what was called an advisory council. That advisory council was found not to work well, nor did it give such power as should have been given to the Territories, and so we subsequently got what was called an executive committee. That executive committee had most of the powers of the government of a province, but the means of getting it into existence is awkward, and the means of continuing it, if one of its members should be destroyed by death or resign, is also awkward. You have not, properly speaking, a responsible government there, although you have all the powers, with two or three exceptions, that are given to the provinces. For instance, under the present system I do not think you could possibly have party government. I do not think you could raise party issues under the present conditions, if it were found desirable to do so; because these four men are not a government chosen by one man who is asked to construct a government for the Lieutenant-Governor, but they are chosen by the assembly, and although there is one first among them called the chairman of the executive committee, nevertheless, he has not at all the power of a Prime Minister. I may tell you that the memorial passed unanimously in the assembly, and I wish to call the attention of the Government here to what it says:

The assembly is of the opinion that to remedy this undesirable state of things—

Which I have just now described.

—it is not necessary to have recourse to granting a full provincial status.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the assembly does not want to have the full provincial status given to them. I am not going to discuss that. Probably I do not know why they do not want it; perhaps I cannot gather from the debates why they do not want it. I myself now hold the same opinion which I held in 1887: that the best thing that could be done for these Territories would be to give them full responsible government. That is my opinion, but when you have the whole assembly of the North-west Territories stating that they do not want full responsible government, it would be very improper on the part of a member of this House, and very improper even if this whole House were unanimous, to force full responsible government upon them. Therefore, although I have not changed my own opinion, I am not here to-day to ask for anything more than the people of the Territories have themselves asked for. I shall point out later on the very important consequences that follow from their not asking for full responsible government. When the change was made by the late Government shortly before it went out of power, whereby the amount of money placed at the disposal of the North-west Territories Assembly was given en bloc, and not voted as a specific vote, a course should then have been taken by legislation to devise a safeguard which no longer exists in consequence of that change. It is, of course, necessary to have certain safeguards—for instance, over the expenditure of money; because the Government of the North-west Territories has its pupil-like character of which it has no wish to divest itself; and we, in voting the money, must be in a position to ask this Government to show us how every farthing of the money has been spent, and whether it has been properly and judiciously expended; that is, of course, speaking broadly.

Now, they want two things—they want a change in the powers they exercise, and they want a larger subsidy.

They are of opinion that the time has come that their executive government should be put on a firmer basis, by substituting for the executive committee an executive council.

I have described what they have at present, and of that the memorial says:

It is evident that the assembly, having the power to vote money for distinct services, should have the right to control the proper carrying out of its intentions.

As in the present more developed state of the country, which has as much or more need for an intelligent and permanent administration and supervision of its resources and requirements as any other part of Canada, it is impossible for the assembly to act as an executive council; they have been obliged to make provision in their several ordinances to entrust the administering of their laws to the Lieutenant-Governor, acting by and with the advice and consent of the committee created by federal law for the purpose of advising with relation to expenditure only. They cannot, however, be sure that in taking the only possible steps within their power to meet the necessity, they have not exceeded their powers.

That is a very important thing. There is to my mind, as there is evidently to the minds of the whole assembly, a clear doubt whether, in adopting ordinances providing a modus vivendi, so to speak, they have not exceeded their powers; because they are to some extent in the position of an inferior assembly amending the legislation of this supreme Dominion Parliament. Besides, the memorial points out:

The present machinery does not admit of development, as for instance, in the direction of division into departments with responsible heads. The executive committee also has not the right to advise the Lieutenant-Governor in matters not contained in the ordinances, notably the appointment of justices of the peace, and the convening and dissolving of an assembly.

Now, what they suggest is, that the Parliament should amend the section of the North-west Territories Act of 1891 (54 and 55 Victoria) which is substituted for section 13 of the North-west Territories Act, chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes. That is the section which defines the powers of the assembly, and enumerates the various subjects on which it may legislate. They suggest that in that section this change should be made:

The legislative assembly shall exclusively have power to make ordinances for the government of the organized Territories in relation to the classes of subjects next hereinafter mentioned, that is to say.

While Parliament cannot divest itself of its paramount right of legislation in the Territories, it is desirable that it should not, as it often has done, unintentionally perhaps, by legislation partly or wholly repeal the powers given to the Territories under that section 13, as may easily be done under the law as it is at present.

Then they suggest that we should add a clause to the North-west Territories Act giving power to the assembly, notwithstanding anything in this Act or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, to repeal the Territories Real Property Act. The object of that is this. You have given them the right over property and civil rights. They can legislate on subjects dealt with by this Real Property Act. They have already made ordinances on those subjects. I am not sure that you have not on your Table at the present moment a Bill dealing with matters of this kind. But it is palpable that, if their ordinances varies in the least from the legislation of this Parliament on that subject, it is ultra vires. So that what they ask for there is, I think, reasonable, and what the Government can hardly refuse, if it intends that the powers given them shall not be illusory.

Then, they suggest the repeal of section 17 of the North-west Territories Act of 1894, and to insert:

There shall be a council to aid and advise in the government of the Territories, to be styled the executive council of the Territories, and such council shall be composed of such persons and under such designations as the Lieutenant-Governor shall from time to time think fit.

It is palpable that this is a demand for responsible government pure and simple; and if you grant that request, the only difference between the Territories and the provinces would be that under clause 13 the assembly of the Territories would be deprived of the authority to legislate on one or two subjects, and one or two other powers which a provincial legislature has—for instance, the power to borrow money; but maugre these two or three subjects, you would give them responsible government if this third request were granted.

Then, they wish to have sub-clause C of subsection 7 of section 13 repealed—that which relates to insurance companies. They very properly say that there is no reason for depriving an assembly of men who are just as intelligent, enlightened and experienced as the men in any assembly of any province, of the power of giving a charter to an insurance company. It is palpable that that very elementary right of a civilized community should be within their power.

Then they wish to have inserted a clause in the North-west Territories Act giving to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council the power to appoint sheriffs, and so on. That is a mere detail, and I do not attach much importance to it. If the Government go as far as the Act, they will probably give them these powers.

Then, they suggest that, subject to conditions, the following subsection should be inserted:—

The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the Territories, and repeal sections 103, 104 and 105 of chapter 50, R.S.C., in so far as they are inconsistent with the powers asked for.

Now, you will see that in the Estimates brought down, on page 67, under the head of "Government of the North-west Territories," you have "Insane patients, Manitoba, $30,000." What happens at present is this, that any insane patients we have are sent to Manitoba, and there is no reason whatever why we should not take charge of our own insane. Lunatics from the Territories are, under an agreement between the federal authorities and the province of Manitoba, which expires in 1898, sent to the asylums of that province, and at present there are in such asylums 74 persons costing one dollar per day. Surely the assembly is only rational in contending that they could perform such service as well and more cheaply than Manitoba. An insane man is found in some part of the Territories, and instead of sending him to an asylum in Calgary, or Regina or Moose Jaw, or Medicine Hat—wherever the asylum might be—he is sent 300 or 400 miles further into Manitoba, and the clumsy expedient is used of charging the Territories with the cost, under the agreement by which the Manitoba institution takes charge.

As regards hospitals, the assembly already provides, as far as its means will allow, for the assistance of a hospital built and kept by private charity, and we have at Medicine Hat and at Calgary a magnificent hospital in each place. We have a hospital at Medicine Hat due to the enterprise and philanthropy, in the main, of John Niblock—a hospital which, I have no doubt, some of my friends on both sides of the House have visited and which all who have visited it must admit is not merely a credit to Mr. Niblock's energy and philanthropy, but to the philanthropy of the North-west Territories also and the passenger public, because there are wards in it that illustrate the benevolence of those who have visited it from time to time. And let me say, in passing, that I greatly regret, when I bring forward a subject of this kind, that we have not the Minister of the Interior in his place. There is a just claim on the part of this hospital, outstanding now for some years, against the Department of the Interior, and I have strong hopes that the Minister of the Interior will do it the justice of seeing that this claim is paid.

The assembly also wants the repeal of section 21 of the North-west Territories Act of 1894 and that an Act should be introduced respecting roads and road allowance of the North-west Territories, with similar provisions to those contained in chapter 49 of the Revised Statutes of Canada respecting roads and road allowance in Manitoba. The object of this is to do away with the uncertainties and difficulties connected with the laying out, improving and acquiring roads by expropriation and to give to the assembly the right to delegate such powers to municipalities.

Then they desire that a clause should be added giving the assembly the power to repeal, alter, vary or re-enact the provisions for the appointment of justices of the peace and their qualifications. That question, however, is one of detail which I am not going to discuss, because if the Government decide to do the large things asked for, that will follow, no doubt, as a matter of course.

The other large subject dealt with by this memorial of the assembly is the subject of finance. That has been from time to time placed before this House. It was ably placed before us last session by my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and nothing new has since taken place that would add to the arguments which he put before this House. I shall just call attention to what the memorial contains on that subject. At present, if you look at the Estimates, you will find that the main grant is for schools, clerical assistance, printing, &c.; and as the hon. member for Alberta pointed out last session, the chief thing to be provided, out of that $242,000 is schools. This is what the memorial says on that point:

Owing to the vast area of the Territories and the widely scattered nature of the settlement, all the business of the local government is rendered more expensive and proportionately to the population than in any province. As regards roads this is apparent, but with respect to schools it will be found equally true. By considering that, under the most favourable circumstances, less than half the area in each township is available for homesteading, and that, as a rule, only a small amount is taken up, it will not create surprise to see that in 1895 it took 341 schools, with 401 teachers, to educate 11,972 enrolled pupils, with a daily average attendance of 6,600, and that, out of these schools, 223 were only open during the summer months, with a daily average attendance of 11.

Let me call the special attention of the Government now to this argument on behalf of our claim for a larger subsidy:

In 1891, the population was 66,769; the number of schools in operation was 224. In 1892, the number of schools in operation was 237, and the parliamentary grant was $208,700. In 1895, the number of schools was 341, being an increase in four years of over 52 per cent. In 1896, the population was 104,221, or 10 per cent per year added to the census of 1894, being the ratio of increase between 1891 and 1894, and the grant from Parliament was $242,879, not including $25,000 supplementary vote to recoup the assembly for relief expenditure undertaken for and on account of the Dominion Government, being an increase in five years in population of 56 per cent, and in annual grant during the last four years of 16 per cent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). What was the amount of the supplementary vote?

Mr. DAVIN. $25,000. Thus while the population increased 56 per cent, the increase of the annual grant was only a little over one-quarter of that.

Now, in the Territories the conditions of the Government are somewhat analogous to those of Manitoba; and, therefore, a comparison between Manitoba and the Territories is a natural one. Nothing could be more natural than that we should ask, as we asked in 1887, as we asked in 1888, and in 1889, and in 1890, and in 1891, and every year including last year through my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), that we should be treated on precisely the same footing as Manitoba. Now, if we were so treated what would be the result? The population of the Territories in 1891 according to the census of that year, was 66,799. According to the census taken by the North-west Mounted Police in 1894, the population was 86,851. According to that ratio of increase, namely, 30 per cent, the population in 1897 is 112,906. Now, if we were treated on the same basis as Manitoba, according to subsection B of section 5, of chapter 46, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the per capita grant would be calculated on an approximate estimate of the population two and one-half years from 1897, which, at the rate of increase that I mentioned in an earlier part of my remarks, namely, 10 per cent a year, would be 141,132. Now, the per capita grant of 80 cents a head for 141,132 would give you the sum of $112,905. Then on the debt account, on a presumably actual population in 1887 of 141,132, the amount would be 5 per cent on $32.44 per head, making $183,133. An amount for the support of government and legislation is given to Manitoba of $50,000 a year. Is there any reason why we should not get $50,000 also for the same purpose? No reason whatever. Then, Manitoba has been held to be entitled to an indemnity of $100,000 a year, because the administration of its lands it withheld from it. But what are the lands of Manitoba compared with the lands of the North-west Territories? What are the claims, therefore, of Manitoba as compared with the claims of the North-west Territories in this particular? The Territories, of course, have a much stronger claim to compensation, inasmuch as besides the land grants to railways in and for the Territories, what has been done with our lands? Why, Sir, we have been a quarry to which they have come from every quarter to get land grants. If a railway seeks a land grant, it always looks to the North-west Territories. Land grants have been given for the general benefit of Canada, and for the special benefit of the eastern provinces and British Columbia; land grants have been given within the Territories for railways constructed for and in Manitoba for which no sufficient land grant could be found in that province. The province of Manitoba has been given all lands designated as swamp lands. Now, if you come to consider what should be given us, we should get a far larger grant than $100,000 on this account. It really ought to be $300,000. But suppose you only add $50,000 to what is given to Manitoba, and you get a land grant that should be given us of $150,000. So the amounts we should get would be:

Provincial subsidy.....	$112,903
Debt account.....	183,133
Support of government and legislation...	50,000
On account of lands.....	150,000

Making a total of..... $496,038

And what do we get here in these Estimates after this matter has been—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). What do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to be reading from? From what does he get these figures?

Mr. DAVIN. I am giving the hon. gentleman a calculation that is not now given in this House for the first time. It was given here last session, it was given even before that. I am referring to the same calculation made in the memorial that has been transmitted to the Government after having been passed unanimously in the North-west assembly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was what I wished to know. I understand the hon. gentleman is reading from the memorial.

Mr. DAVIN. These are the figures in the memorial.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman referred to the speech made by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and I was not sure whether he was reading from that speech or from the memorial.

Mr. DAVIN. I referred to the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) had brought this matter before the House, as had been done every year. But I wish to point out that $150,000, the sum I have last mentioned, was not mentioned in the memorial. The memorial points out that Manitoba gets $100,000 and says that we are entitled to more, but does not mention a sum. To reach an aggregate, I supposed that it should be made $150,000. So, instead of $242,000, we should get $496,000. I pointed this out, two years ago, I think, when the present Government was not in power, and when my hon. friend was sitting in Opposition—and at that time I got help from hon. gentlemen who are now sitting, as the Prime Minister says, enthroned like the Olympian gods, in a place where they used not to sit. I used to get help from them. I do not know whether he (Mr. Davies) gave me help, but there were gentlemen on that side who used to give me help in contending for what I did contend for from year to year. And, in fact, two years ago, we had more than a million dollars due us by the Dominion Government. If we had a commission such as sat the other day in regard to taxation in Ireland, it would be found that the North-west Territories, like Ireland, had been paying a large amount of taxation that we ought not to have had to pay.

Mr. COCHRANE. Do not suggest a commission, or we shall have one.

Mr. DAVIN. This would not be a very expensive commission, and its work would not take very long. The calculation is easily made, because we have all the facts. And if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will only make the calculation, he will easily reach the result. Let him for a moment fancy that he has taken a brief for the Territories. I am told by the chairman of the executive of the North-west Territories that something like this memorial has been sent to every member of the Government and that they are in possession of it. Let the hon. gentleman read that. I know he is an able lawyer,—let him fancy that we have given him a brief and put a large fee in his pocket and that he is to make out a case for us. Let him read it in that light and he will be perfectly astonished what a case he can make out for the Territories and against the lethargy of his own Government, because this is the second session, and, apparently, up to the present, they have done nothing.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. It will be carried in a short time. By the way, what mavis singing-bird was that I heard? Now, I have something to suggest that I think will be welcomed by every territorial statesman, I mean the members of the provincial assembly, and it will be welcomed by every man who has the interests of the Territories at heart. I doubt, Sir, if there is any arrangement that has been made by this Parliament that has worked more successfully and to better advantage than the arrangement that was made by the Parliament of Canada that we should have an Auditor General perfectly independent of the Government of the day. I think it has been a great advantage to the people, it has been in the interests of economy, and I believe it has been of advantage to the Government in the past, and is an advantage to the Government to-day, so far as they desire to act economically. Now, let us suppose that the Government intends to accede to the prayer of this memorial, and to give the North-west Territories the kind of government they demand; but even if they do not do that, what I am now about to suggest that they should do is to provide an auditor that will be appointed by the Government of Canada, and will be perfectly independent of the Government of the Territories. Of course, when the time comes that a full provincial government would be given to the Territories, that arrangement would cease, and we would expect that the Territorial Assembly, when it would take up its full manhood, would re-appoint that auditor, or at all events, appoint somebody in his place, and continue that very useful official; and also appoint him under an ordinance such as our Audit Act, that would make him independent of the executive of the day. I think that would be in the interests of the Territories. But at the present moment, we are bound, here in this Parliament, to see that such an auditor exists. We have no means at present of knowing how the money is spent that we vote to the Territories. That executive and that assembly are only a function of the Dominion Government as long as they do not get full provincial autonomy. At present they do not want full provincial autonomy, as I have already pointed out to my hon. friend when I quoted the memorial.

Mr. DAVIN.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). A fuller measure of economy might involve the right and the duty of raising money by taxation; and they do not want that.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think there will be any necessity for it, because they do raise money for taxation at present, that is, they raise a local fund of $30,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How?

Mr. DAVIN. By licenses; they have a local revenue of $30,000—I think it is about that sum. But I would like to point out to my hon. friend that they say they do not wish to get full responsible government. This is their language:

The assembly is of opinion, that to remedy this undesirable state of affairs, it is not necessary to have recourse to granting the full provincial status.

They do not ask for it, and this memorial passed unanimously. The money they spend is money voted by this Parliament, and therefore it is logical that this Parliament should know how that money is spent. Some years ago we voted a specific sum for all the work that was done in these Territories, and the sums used to lapse. I was one of the persons, with Mr. Haultain and others, who went to the Government to get that done away with, and we got a system adopted whereby you now vote a block sum, such as we have here—a grant for schools, clerical assistance, printing, &c., to be paid half-yearly in advance, $242,000. Now, I want to see a far larger sum voted, I want to see this House do justice to the Territories, and vote them a sum of $500,000, which sum is the very least that will enable them to manage these Territories effectively. But whether we vote them that much or not, as we are voting money, we ought to have an audit independent of the executive, and an independent audit will be welcomed by the executive. If they do not welcome it, there is the more necessity for it; if they welcome it, then there is necessity for it, and it should be given at once. What we should have is a Dominion auditor, an officer up there paid out of the territorial fund, paid by the executive, but whose appointment would be independent of the executive. That would give us an account of how the moneys are spent that we now vote en bloc, and we have no account of how they are spent; whereas when we voted them in the manner I desired to see abolished, and which I was contributory to abolishing, we did know how the money was spent. As long as we vote the money, we ought to know how that money is spent. Now, it is well known that contracts for large sums have been given, and I believe that it has been done elsewhere also, within recent months—but contracts for considerable sums have been given without tenders being called for. Well, if that is so, a part of this money that we are voting is spent in that way. It may be spent well, but we ought to know that it is spent well, and we ought to have an auditor to overhaul that. I am not sure that we should go beyond our function if we were to insist that contracts for any considerable amount should be invariably based upon tenders. I hope the Government will go into this question, I hope the Government will listen to the prayer of this memorial, I hope the Government will give an adequate sum, I hope the Government will alter the character of the executive and make it of a responsible character, to the extent that they demand. But in doing that let the Government make a constitution that will be consistent. If you make a constitution short of perfect provincial autonomy, such as these gentlemen desire, and still keep them in 'statu tutelari,' then you are bound as long as they are spending money that we vote here, to have an officer who will give us an account of how that money is spent.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sure the people of the North-west Territories will be very glad to know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who has just sat down, is advocating their interests so strongly, and I have no doubt they will accord him almost that measure of appreciation that he received at the late election, in the coming election that is likely to take place in his constituency. I do not wish to argue all the different points he has raised: I will only say that on the general question the hon. gentleman and myself are at one, namely, that the Territories are entitled to a greater measure of consideration at the hands of this Government. I can only hope that the hon. member will be able, by his arguments, so to influence those who sit on the same side of the House as himself, that, what they were able to do when they had the power and did not do, that is, grant the fuller measure of justice to the Territories that the people of those Territories desire and expect, they will support the new Government in doing when the opportunity arises. This question was brought before the House on a previous occasion. It is before the Government again. Gentlemen representing the Government of the North-west Territories are here now. It is quite within the knowledge of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) that members of that Government are here for the purpose of claiming additional subsidy and additional powers. I should like to point out to the House that while the hon. gentleman made a lengthy appeal on behalf of the memorial which those hon. gentlemen are advocating, he also made an insinuation against the gentlemen themselves, and thereby attempted to weaken their case with the Government of the day, for he insinuated that the Government of which they are the head was not spending the money in its hands in a manner that was for the best interest of the country and the people, and that they had to be watched; in fact, it was absolutely necessary they should be watched by a special auditor appointed by this Government. I say that while the hon. gentleman was, on the one hand, declaring that their wishes should be granted, on the other hand he was trying to make light of the position of those gentlemen and to weaken confidence in them so that their representations would not be agreed to. In this case, as in others, the hon. gentleman has been blowing hot and cold; one reason that we have not been able to get what we desired in the past.

I submit that the position of the North-west Territories at the present time, in so far as the control of the funds voted to them by Parliament is concerned, should be, if it is not, exactly the same as that of a province. Certain money is voted to responsible representatives of the people of the Territories for expenditure, under the control of responsible advisers, and there is no reason why that Government should not have full control of the funds, as has the legislature of a province. When the hon. gentleman says that the North-west Government do not ask for full provincial powers, and advances reasons why they should not be given control of money, which only they can properly control, he shows a desire to weaken and not strengthen their case. They are the only people who can know to what purposes this money should be applied, and how it should be applied. When this Parliament votes money to be expended by the Territories, the control ceases, or should cease, as regards this Government as to how the money should be expended. It is now expended by the North-west Government, and with all respect to the hon. gentleman, I believe it will continue to be expended on the responsibility of the executive of the North-west Territories, and solely on that responsibility. As to the provincial powers not asked for: Allow me to say that there are certain powers now exercised by the Government of the North-west exactly to the same extent as they are exercised by a province. This has been done with the consent of the Government here, with the consent of Parliament, and by reason of the necessities of the case, and this is likely to continue. The first of these is the expenditure of money that comes properly within the control of the assembly. The other matters are in relation to education, in regard to which the Government of the Territories has as full powers as the legislature of any province: in regard to legislation with respect to property and civil rights, as to which the Territories have the same rights as a province, and also in regard to municipal organization, in respect to which also the Territories have the same powers as a province. The points in which they lack the power of a province are points of detail rather than of principle; except this one, that the Territories have not a fixed subsidy, and have not power to pledge the credit of the country for a loan. These are rights belonging to a province, and they are not asked by the representatives of the North-west Government. The reason why they do not ask for a fixed subsidy is no doubt owing to the fact that the extent of the country and its progress would act against their interests rather than in their favour if there were a fixed subsidy granted; that is to say, the country would outgrow the subsidy so quickly that if there were a fixed subsidy, instead of proving advantageous it would be distinctly disadvantageous. That is the reason why they do not want a fixed subsidy which would be the equivalent of a provincial subsidy, and that is the only important power they do not ask as compared with the province of Manitoba, which occupies the same position as the Territories as regards the control of lands. I will not occupy the time of the House at any greater length, but in conclusion I will say that the gentlemen representing the North-west Territories, who are here now, are entitled personally to the full confidence of the Government in any negotiations that may take place their representations are entitled to full consideration, and I have every confidence that they will receive that consideration at the hands of the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. I think we have had a somewhat extraordinary exhibition by an hon. gentleman who seemed to be tearing mad because he could not agree with me. The hon. gentleman was ready to rip himself up because he had to agree with the propositions I laid down. It was certainly a most extraordinary position, that the hon. gentleman on being obliged to agree with me should have got mad. It would seem that the only kind of speaking to which he is accustomed is scolding, and as he had not an opponent, he had to scold a friend, and some one who advocated propositions with which he agreed. I hope the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) for the credit of the North-west, will reconsider his parliamentary demeanour, and not treat the country to such an exhibition as we have just had.

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to reiterate what I stated. I agree with the general propositions of the hon. gentleman, but I resent, and resent strongly, the mean insinuations he conveyed against gentlemen who represent the North-west in negotiations now going on.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has not improved his position by his explanation. He resented something that was not in my remarks. He became as mad as a March hare, although this is April, because he could not find anything in my remarks to find fault with, and then he insinuated something that was not in my remarks. I referred with the greatest respect to my friend the chairman of the executive. I know those two gentlemen from the North-west are here. I have never in the past, here or elsewhere, been blinded by that extraordinary sentiment that I have seen some persons blinded with, that they must claim credit for this, that and the other. I have never entertained any such feelings as that. Anything proposed for the good of the country or for the North-west Territories, I have been ready to help forward; so that when the hon. gentleman, last session—although I think his behaviour in a certain way then was extraordinary for a young member—made a motion. I rose and supported him. I did not manifest the miserable, wretched, insect spirit he has manifested here, and that ranks him not on a level with hon. legislators in this chamber—

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid both hon. gentlemen in their last few remarks have not been quite in order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) spoke of mean insinuations in regard to the speech of an hon. gentleman, and the hon. gentleman who is now addressing the House is going pretty far in the use of language which should not be used by one hon. member to another.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to you for calling me to order at any time that I in any way transgress the rules of this House. But, Mr. Speaker, with great respect for you—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Chair. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) must accept the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIN. Ruling about what?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That you are out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. Pray, in what way out of order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Speaker has explained that to you.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to know from you, Mr. Speaker, how I was out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) went beyond what I think is parliamentary decorum. Perhaps I should have pointed out before that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver), who spoke before him, transgressed in the same way. I do not think, however, that one transgression justifies the other, although perhaps one may have caused the other.

Mr. DAVIN. Am I to understand that it is henceforth the rule in this House of Parliament, that it is a breach of the rules to say of a member that he shows a miserable insect spirit?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes. I wish to say to the hon. member (Mr. Davin) that such is my ruling. Language that one gentleman would not use to another in any other place without being offensive, should not be used by one hon. member towards another in this House. That is the simple rule which I would like to see followed.

Mr. DAVIN. Shades of Disraeli. I wish we had Mr. Disraeli here; I wish we had Mr. Gladstone here as a witness. I am very glad to know, Sir, that the Parliament of Canada has risen to such a high dignity that we have a Speaker who lays down laws that would condemn Disraeli and Gladstone—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. When a ruling has been given by the Speaker, there is only one course open to any hon. member who objects to that ruling, and that is, to appeal to the House against the decision. I shall not permit any more discussion upon the ruling that I have made.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I won't show an insect spirit and appeal to the House. If I were to appeal to the House on the subject, I think I would show an insect spirit, and I suppose I do not break the rules of the House if I refer to myself as possibly likely to show an insect spirit.

Mr. CASEY. Not at all. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and I can say in regard to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) that I have never shown an insect spirit, nor a worm-like nature, and I have never growled and grovelled. I can say a whole lot of things like that, but, Mr. Speaker, I bow entirely to your ruling. What I hope, then, is that we shall not have apotheosized in this House the demeanour of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I hope that when a member comes to this House and endeavours to do the best he can for the country, and when he makes a proposition that an hon. gentleman opposite to him cannot controvert, that that hon. gentleman shall not abuse him and get mad. If the hon. gentleman does so, I will have henceforth to declare that that hon. gentleman shows a god-like temperament. Now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) said that he hoped that if I should be able to induce this Government to bring in a Bill giving the Territories these things asked for in the memorial, that then hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would be ready to support such a measure. There is nothing whatever in the past history of the Conservative party to indicate that any good proposals for the North-west Territories would not meet with as fair consideration at their hands as it would at the hands of the Liberal party. The most determined opponents that we have had in the past, and the harshest critics in regard to the Northwest Territories were gentlemen—not gentlemen of an insect spirit; but gentlemen of magnanimous soul like the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and like the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey). Sir, I have not the least doubt whatever that if a good measure is introduced by this Government it will require no effort on my part to induce my friends on this side to support it; but you may be perfectly certain that I will use any influence I may be supposed to have with them.

Now, with regard to the suggestion that I have made. I suggested that there should be an auditor in the North-west Territories, precisely in the position of the Auditor General here. Is the existence of an auditor such as we have here, any reflection whatever on the present Government?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is there not an auditor there now?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not understand that that there is an auditor in that position.

Mr. FOSTER. All these accounts are audited by our auditor.

Mr. DAVIN. They were audited in that way when we had the sums voted individually, but I am not aware that they are audited in that way now. At any rate, we should have an auditor in the North-west Territories where the audit could be done more efficiently than the present auditor can do it. What I suggest is an auditor there placed in precisely the same position as our Auditor General. We have no authority in Canada that has power to give us an auditor here except ourselves, and if we have an auditor what matter who gave him the independence that he possesses. It is an advantage to the Government to have such an auditor here, and I have often heard Sir John Macdonald say that it was a great advantage to him to have an auditor that was perfectly independent of the Government. And because I suggest that we should have in the North-west an auditor in precisely the same position as our auditor here, an hon. gentleman gets up and says that I made an insinuation against these two gentlemen in the North-west Territories. Well, Mr. Speaker, these two gentlemen are members of that North-west Government, and they will compare with any two gentlemen in any provincial executive. The head of that executive, Mr. Haultain, is a personal friend of mine. He is a man than whom there is not in any Government in Canada, or in any Government in the world, one more honourable. When I am advocating giving these gentlemen enlarged powers and larger grants of money to spend, is it to be supposed for one moment that I would make any suggestion that would be derogatory to them? I am under the impression at the present time, although I may be wrong, that there is not the same audit there that there used to be, and if there is not, then I say there should be. I may say further, Sir, that in performing my duty here, I have never been afraid of what construction any person inside or outside of this House would put upon my conduct. My record in this House, battling for the interests of the North-west Territories is not the record of a man who has shown any petty political spirit, because when my own friends were in power I have asserted my opinions against my party proclivities. I hope that if the present Government does not do justice to the Territories, the members from the Territories supporting that Government shall follow my example in that. I do not know that we shall hear any protest from the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) against the indifference of the Government he supports, to the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) professes to be an independent, but as an hon. gentleman on his own side of the House told me, he professes to be an independent, but he is the worst Grit among them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I will not give the name. That name is perfectly sacred with me. Now, Mr. Speaker. I am quite surprised that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who is the only member of the Government present, has not said anything in regard to this motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I had no opportunity. I intended to have spoken.

Mr. DAVIN. The Speaker rose after the hon. gentleman sat down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend was too quick for me.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg pardon—I did not see my hon. friend (Mr. Dobell). I apologize to him. Nobody recognizes more thoroughly than I do the important part my hon. friend plays as a member of that Government; and, as he now comes back after doing great things in London, it would have been impossible for me to ignore his presence if I had known it. But I am surprised that no Minister rises to speak on this motion. We have to-day what we have lately been accustomed to have in this House, day after day—empty Ministerial seats. We are told that the Ministers are caucusing, patching up Cabinet differences and Cabinet squabbles; and while they are doing that here, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has gone to patch up Liberal squabbles in Winnipeg. That is why we have empty Ministerial seats in this House. We have only one Minister with a portfolio present, and he was going to allow the motion to be put without saying anything upon it. I shall be very glad to let him say anything now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was not going to let the motion pass without making a remark or two; but the hon. gentleman was rather quick in getting on his feet, and I had not an opportunity. The hon. gentleman has asserted his independence in this House. I recognize his claim to independence, but there is this peculiarity about it, that while he asserts his independence, he does not support his assertion by his vote.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. That is a statement of fact about myself, and I say it is not true to fact. I say on the contrary that I have again and again supported my speech by my vote, and I dare the hon. gentleman to prove what he has stated. It is not true.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I have sat in this House as long as the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has made a statement, and unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to controvert it, he should accept it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not prepared to controvert it if he says that on any occasion he voted against the Government of which he was a supporter. I shall be particularly pleased if he will point out the occasion, and show us the "Hansard" in which the vote is recorded.

Mr. DAVIN. I will satisfy the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Passing, then, from this matter, which does not affect the question before the House, to the substantive motion which the hon. gentleman has made, I quite appreciate the importance of the subject-matter of that motion. It is a motion for papers relative to the claim of the North-west Government for increased executive powers and increased statutory allowances. The question was brought before this House at the first short session of this Parliament, when my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) made a lengthy statement containing a very large amount of information on the question, and he was supported by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davin). The Government have not only had the advantage of these statements, but they have had the benefit of receiving from the North-west executive a memorial setting forth in detail what the claims of that Government are. The hon. gentleman in his speech followed very closely the terms of that memorial—in fact, reading it to the House. That memorial has been presented to the Government by Mr. Haultain and Mr. Ross, and they have had interviews with the Government, in which they have pressed very strongly the claims they have made. But it is obviously impossible at the present moment to have an intelligent discussion, much less to form an intelligent conclusion, until the papers are in the hands of hon. members. There is no objection to the hon. gentleman's motion passing, but I will call his attention to the fact that while he elaborated the importance of an audit in the North-west, he has ignored the fact that there is an exhaustive audit of the vote of this House for the North-west, made by the Auditor General of the Dominion, and contained in his Annual Report. If the hon. gentleman will turn to that report he will see, from page H 15 to page H 40, the details of the expenditure which this House voted in a lump sum. But in addition to that audit by our auditor, there is the audit of the North-west legislative assembly on their own behalf; and if the hon. gentleman examines the account for last year, he will find that something like $2,200 was expended for their audit office. So that the hon. gentleman may rest assured that, whether the sum voted is sufficient or insufficient, there is an ample check by the Dominion audit and the North-west audit to insure the proper expenditure of the money. In addition to the memorial which has been presented to the Government, and which has been supported ably by oral statements and arguments by Mr. Haultain and Mr. Ross, the Government have had the advantage of having the claims of the North-west presented to it by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) and other members of this House who support the Government. There is no danger, therefore, of these claims being lost sight of. Whether any legislation on the subject can be carried through this session or not will depend largely, I suppose, on the length of the session. We have to carry our Estimates and our tariff, which will occupy a great deal of time; and if hon. gentlemen find it desirable to shorten the session so as to enable prominent members on both sides to attend the Queen's Jubilee, it may be that we shall not be able to carry through many measures that we would like to bring down. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman any definite assurance at the present moment, because the matter is being and has for some time past been carefully considered by a committee of the Government here; but the papers he asks for will be brought down as early as may be, and I shall be glad to have them thoroughly discussed in this House, because I recognize the importance of the question. The hon. gentleman will remember that an autonomy almost equal to provincial autonomy has already been conceded to the North-west Territories. With the exception,

I think, of the power to legislate on railways and one other item given to the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act, we have conceded to them every power which a province now possesses. But they do desire some change with reference to the executive powers which have been conferred upon them, and there is no doubt that the process of legislative evolution is going on there, a constitutional evolution which this House will, at the proper time, I have no doubt, recognize by granting the fullest statutory powers to enable it to be brought to a successful completion.

With regard to the matter in point, the subsidy which was voted by this House to the North-west Territories, that is also being considered in great detail by the Government. The custom heretofore which has prevailed, and which has been objected to by gentlemen from the North-west, was this. The North-west executive presented in detail their claim for a subsidy, but an arbitrary sum frequently was deducted from the amount of that claim, and they then had, out of the smaller sum granted, to rearrange and appropriate amounts for the specific purposes as they best could. An improvement, I hope, will be obtained in this regard, and while we must and will recognize fully the claims of the North-west to generous treatment, we must also recognize that there are limits to which that treatment can extend. The whole subject is now, and has been for weeks past, receiving consideration at the hands of a committee of the Government.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has for a long time been a perennial spring of joy and amusement to this House. His humour has always borne that peculiar stamp which distinguishes the humour of Irishmen from that of even the most talented men of all other countries, and perhaps the most remarkable instance of this is the fact that the hon. gentleman poses constantly as the representative of the North-west Territories. When we remember that at present his majority, as representing one of these great North-west Territories constituencies, is a unit, and that the unit which returned him to Parliament was the vote of a partisan returning officer, we must recognize that his claim is a very Irish one indeed to represent the North-west Territories. Still, we have enjoyed for many years his attempt to be a westerner. He has been wild enough perhaps, but he can hardly be classed as western or as woolly, and in attempting to represent the wild and woolly west he has only afforded amusement to the House. This was all very well while his friends were in power, because at that time the coruscations of his humour were under some restraint, but now, since, unfortunately for him, he is sitting on the wrong side of the House, those coruscations are almost too frequent to be either dazzling or amusing.

Mr. DAVIN. Or pleasant.

Mr. CASEY. They are pleasant in themselves, but like honey or some other things we could name, too much of them is not as pleasant as a mere taste once in a while. He assures the House to-day that he has never been bitten with a sentiment, to use his own peculiar Hibernian way of putting it, of a certain kind, and he has made reference to insects. Now, insects bite sometimes, as well as sentiments, and I am not at all sure that my hon. friend has not been bitten with a certain kind of insect called the gadfly, which is known to drive those it bites into great disorder of mind and conduct. I should certainly judge from his reply to the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) that something must have bitten him, if not a sentiment, then a gadfly.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. I understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker, is that no hon. gentleman should use insect illustrations. My hon. friend is transgressing that ruling by implying that the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is a gadfly, and, in the character of a gadfly, bit me. I do not care a pin about it, Mr. Speaker, but your ruling must be respected.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman will say that the statement of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) is offensive to him, I shall consider his point.

Mr. DAVIN. It is not in the least offensive to me. At that distance my hon. friend, or any other insect, would not annoy me.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend's interruption is rather clever. He wanted to draw in the hon. member for Alberta again, but I wish to assure him that there are no flies on the hon. member for Alberta, neither gaddies nor any other kind, and that the gadfly which appears to have been biting my hon. friend must have been one of his own imagination. It must have been an insect spirit, in other words, which must have bitten him. I hope the hon. gentleman will obtain a supply of insect powder and get done with this gadfly, and the rest of us will have peace to attend to serious matters of discussion.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIMS OF WOOD MOUNTAIN SCOUTS.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That in the opinion of this House the time has arrived when the claims of the Wood Mountain Scouts to secure scrip or land warrants for services rendered by them during the rebellion, should be settled.

He said : The claims of these scouts have been again and again brought to the attention of the Government, and it is therefore not necessary that I should elaborate them. These gentlemen of Wood Mountain did yeoman's service during the rebellion. They were placed in a position of great danger—a position in which they might have been taken between two fires. It was a position also of great responsibility, because the object of employing them was to prevent the half-breeds of the United States crossing the line and joining our half-breeds here. They performed that service most effectively. They kept the half-breeds of the United States from coming over and joining Riel, and had these half-breeds come across the rebellion, instead of costing $5,000,000, might have cost $10,000,000. The amount required to give these men scrip is but a small one, and as the Militia Department has got the material before it, I hope the Government will come to the conclusion that the time has come to settle these claims.

Mr. OLIVER. Before the motion is adopted, I wish to say a word on the general proposition connected with it. The question of scrip payments following on the North-west rebellion has been brought before the country and this House from time to time until perhaps a good many people are tired of it. At the same time, I want to say that, as far as the opinions of a large number of people of the North-west are concerned, there are claims for recognition of services in the North-west rebellion, just claims, that have not been recognized yet; and I can only say that it is right and proper they should be recognized. I hope that, with a new House and a new Government, the matter will be finally dealt with. I am not familiar with the claim alluded to in this motion, but I will say that, so far as the Mounted Police force which served in the North-west rebellion is concerned, their claim for recognition for their services in that campaign has hitherto been ignored or rejected—I do not know which. But I want to say as a member of this House that I consider that force had good and sufficient and reasonable claims to recognition, and that, in my humble opinion, those claims should be recognized even at this late day. The fact that a man has rendered service to his country is, it seems to me, not something that passes away by effluxion of time. The fact that this service was rendered so many years ago and the fact that it has not been recognized do not detract from the value of the service rendered, from the necessity and propriety of that recognition, or from the credit that will be due to those who give it. There was a certain distinction, an invidious distinction, made between two classes of men who served and served equally well in suppressing the rebellion, that is, between the volunteers who came from the east and the North-west Mounted Police. I should say, I believe that volunteers from the west were included, as well as those from the east, and received recognition in the way of medals and scrip. But the men who stood beside them in the fight and who endured with them the hardships of the campaign did not receive either medals or scrip. That was an invidious distinction between two classes of men who rendered equally good service. I have not been able to find out why that distinction was made, and I do not believe that there was any good reason for making it. But I am bound to say that the fact of its being made has tended to prejudice the North-west Mounted Police in the minds of the people, the idea being that when such a clear, palpable distinction was made there must have been a reason for it. It is a conclusion which is inevitable. Eminent services were rendered by two classes of men of exactly the same kind, and the Government see fit to recognize one and refuse recognition to the other; certainly the public generally were bound to come to the conclusion that the Government had good reason for what they did. And that conclusion has militated seriously against the name and fame and welfare of the Mounted Police force of the North-west Territories ever since that day. Now, I say it is high time that the slur then cast upon the Mounted Police should be removed. For, there was no cause for that slur. The matter should be investigated or the Government should move in the matter. There are other claims for recognition for services in suppressing that rebellion which have been ignored on account of petty and trivial technicalities, very little to the credit of those who were influenced by them. I think the time has come for straightening up all these matters, all these obligations—for I consider that they are obligations—for the recognition of the services that were rendered, not to the North-west Territories, but to the whole of the Dominion of Canada by the sons of the Dominion. The time has come to sweep aside technicalities and recognize these services. At that time, Mr. Speaker, it was recognized that great services were necessary, the country being in a critical condition. Those great services were rendered, and the least the country should do is to recognize them. I have stated that the country did recognize these services in the case of a great many of the men who took part in the campaign. There is nothing that could be more agreeable to the mind of a patriotic citizen than that the men who left their homes and turned out to risk their lives and fight for the welfare of their fellow-citizens and the credit of their country, should be recognized handsomely. But, inasmuch as it was right and proper that this recognition should be given, so the slur that is cast by it not being given to a certain branch of the force is all the more disgraceful and should be removed all the more quickly. I have pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in supporting the hon. gentleman's motion.

Mr. SPROULE. I have pleasure in seconding the motion, for the same reason that I have seconded other motions of that kind that have been brought before this House. I am quite satisfied from the knowledge I have of the work of the Wood Mountain Scouts, that they took as able and active and important a part in quieting the rebellion as did any other portion of the militia; and why some of the men who took part in suppressing the rebellion were rewarded and others left out, I could never well understand. It must be said for the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that he has at different times brought this question to the attention of the House, and that he has, in a measure, succeeded. He succeeded to the extent of getting a commission appointed to inquire into these cases, and a number of men who had been previously left out were included amongst those who were considered deserving of recognition according to the ruling of the Government. But there were still a few who were left out. Now, why should they be left out? If nine-tenths were granted compensation, why not the whole? I must say I looked over the matter several times and I never could understand why the Government did not go so far as to compensate the whole of these men, and I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia is entitled to the gratitude of the people of that country for the way he has fought in their interest every time he has had an opportunity in this House. It cannot be said that when his own friends were in power he failed to impress the matter upon their minds as he is doing to-day. On previous occasions he has spoken at greater length and with greater emphasis than he has at present. I think he deserves credit for the fight he has made, and I hope that the Government will take into consideration the case made out for these people and will give them the same recognition that was accorded to other scouts that took part in the suppression of that rebellion, so that justice may be done to all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Before the question is put I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to the fact that the House has not been placed in possession of sufficient information to justify them in coming to a vote upon this question one way or another. The hon. gentleman has contented himself with almost formally moving the motion. Unfortunately the Premier is engaged elsewhere on important business which prevents him being in the House, and my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who of course would have this matter particularly under his charge, is not here either. Therefore I take it that it would not do to ask the House to come to a decision in the absence of these gentlemen and the information necessary to form a judgment. I think I shall meet the views of the hon. gentleman and the circumstances of the case if I move that the debate be adjourned. When it again comes up these gentlemen will be present and able to announce the policy of the Government upon the matter, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESENT* GOVERNMENT.

Order being called for the following notice of motion in the name of Sir Charles Tupper :—

Copy of Schedule B, showing recommendations of the Treasury Board as submitted by report of Council to His Excellency the Governor General on the 6th and 7th July, 1896, and intended to be approved by him, laid upon the Table of the House last session, with a statement of the action taken by the Government on each of these appointments as made by the said Order in Council approved by His Excellency, or, where no action has been taken, the reason for such a course.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). May I ask the hon. gentleman if he intends to preface his motion by lengthened remarks?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should like the Premier to be present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I took the opportunity of saying some time ago to the First Minister that I intended to speak on this motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not wish to stop the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I extremely regret his absence, because it is very important that he should be here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will note whatever the hon. gentleman says.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very sorry that the First Minister is not here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I regret to say that his absence is quite unavoidable, a matter of very grave importance is detaining him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Mr. Speaker, as my remarks on this motion were to be so mainly directed to statements made by the First Minister, perhaps I had better allow this motion to stand and take it up again. I suggest to my hon. friend who is leading the House, that I should have as early an opportunity as possible of making this motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The motion will stand nearly at the top—there are very few motions before it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope I shall have an early opportunity of making the motion.

Mr. DAVIN. Why not put it at the top?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no other formal motion before it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under the circumstances, at the request of my hon. friend opposite, I will allow the motion to stand.

DISMISSALS OF POSTMASTERS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, papers, petitions, &c., in connection with the dismissal of the late postmaster at Little Sands, province of Prince Edward Island.

He said : I may say, Mr. Speaker, that since I placed this notice on the Order paper, I have learned that a gentleman has been dismissed from the office of postmaster in Prince Edward Island, who had occupied that position for 30 years, I mean Mr. David Ross, of Kinross in Prince Edward Island. I can assure you that the action of the department has caused great surprise in Prince Edward Island, because we had never supposed hitherto that the office of postmaster was a political one. It never was so considered in Prince Edward Island. The people down there are surprised that the exigencies of the Liberal party are such as to require the dismissal of an official of so long standing as the gentleman I have named, whose appointment antedates confederation, as well as many others who attended to their duties and performed them faithfully and well, without any political or other reasons being given, and entirely because some other persons wanted the positions. We were told by the leader of the Government that he was a Liberal of the English school. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it would be very hard indeed to find in the annals of modern Liberalism in England anything to parallel the dismissals to which I am calling attention ; you will search in vain the annals of the Liberalism of to-day in Great Britain to find anything like the indiscriminate discharge of officials all over Canada, especially of officials like postmasters, whose salaries, as everybody knows, are very small. They were never accounted as political partisans, and the office was never held to be a political office, and in Prince Edward Island there has never been any charge of political partisanship made against the gentleman mentioned in my motion. Instead of being Liberals of the English school, the policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite shows that they are Democrats of the American school, that they are adopting the spoils system which is in force to the south of us, as a result of which we find dismissals of postmasters going on all over Canada. I think every hon. member of this House will agree with me in saying that the exigencies of the Liberal party must be desperate indeed when they have to descend to making these dismissals. I cannot believe that the Postmaster General himself is fully aware of the circumstances in Prince Edward Island; I think if he were, he would proceed with more caution in making dismissals. I know in a very small section in the riding I represent, within a circle of six miles, no less than three dismissals have taken place, and that is going on all over the province. In these cases there have been no charges of political partisanship or anything else as far as I can learn. The dismissals have been made simply because the party had made so many promises to their followers and their heelers, that they are now obliged to create vacancies so that they may fulfil their promises. I think the action of the Government is degrading the civil service of this country, especially the postal service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection whatever to an order of the House, as asked for by the hon. gentleman. With regard to the observations which he made of a sweeping character, I think, so far as they have any application to this particular case, they were quite irrelevant, and in so far as they had any application to any transactions in the Post Office Department, they are wholly unwarranted by any facts. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in my department no man has been dismissed without sufficient cause, and I am prepared, upon the floor of Parliament or any other place, to defend and to justify every administrative act that has taken place since I assumed charge of the department. I deem it proper to make these remarks in order that the hon. gentleman's observations may not pass by unchallenged.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MACLEAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Railway Act. He said: I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the provisions of this Bill. The first and main clause reads:

Upper berths in sleeping cars when not occupied or engaged for the night shall not be lowered; and any company violating this provision, after complaint has been made to the porter or conductor, shall be liable to a fine of ten dollars, which may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction.

A similar provision has been adopted by various states in the neighbouring Union, and that law has been found to work satisfactorily. It is without doubt a great convenience to those who travel in sleeping cars, that the upper berth should be closed while it is not in use. There is really no hardship sustained by the railway in this; and if the railway companies suffers nothing, and if the convenience of the passenger is increased, then let us adopt this law. It is perfectly constitutional for this Parliament to pass this law; and from the expressions of opinion in the public press and from letters I have received from travellers who use the railways a great deal, I know that public opinion will sustain this clause of the Bill. Now, with regard to the second clause, I might say that the transportation problem, next to the trade problem in this country, is to my mind the most important that this Parliament is called upon to solve. We have had a great deal of talk in this House about the constitution and the interpretation of the constitution, but in my opinion, it is not at all so important as the transportation problem. I have attempted on several occasions to deal with the problem by Bills of more or less importance, but as yet I have not met with a great deal of success. However, we are making some progress; we are engaging more and more the attention of this House, and to-day in the Railway Committee, we have made considerable progress in this direction. Hon. gentlemen say: Why do you not go in for a Bill dealing with the whole transportation problem? Well, I have tried that, but have not been very successful up to the present time, and there is nothing left for us but to take up the question in detail. We now propose in dealing with the railway passenger rates to get at the facts. We shall know when the returns provided for in the second section of the Bill are rendered, what amount of free transportation is given by the railways, and what preferred passenger rates are given to certain classes in the community. The second clause of the Bill provides:

The said Act is hereby further amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 301:—

Every company shall, within one month after the first day of January in each year, make to the Railway Committee, under the oath of the president, secretary or chief executive officer of the company, true and particular returns—

(a.) Of all annual and trip passes issued by the company during the year next preceeding, with the names of the persons to whom they were issued, the reasons why they were issued, and the distance of travel included in the said passes;

(b.) Of all special passenger rates given to various organizations, trades or professions, or to any other persons, together with the number of miles of passenger travel included under such special rates.

One reason why the people of this country have not got lower passenger rates is, because so many free passes and so much preferred transportation rates are given by the railway companies. If we know from this return the extent of this, the persons who pay 3 cents a mile would be in a much better position to command more equitable treatment than they now receive. When the Bill comes before the Railway Committee, as I hope it shall, I will be prepared there to give further reasons for the adoption of the measure. I shall content myself to-night, with merely moving the second reading, and that it be referred to the Railway Committee.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.

Mr. MACLEAN.

SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 13) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction. He said: Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to the provisions of the Bill, the second reading of which I now beg leave to move. The object of this Bill is to afford additional protection to females. One of its provisions is to raise the age of consent from 16 years to 18 years. Another provision is to make the male responsible for seduction under promise of marriage, from the age of 18 instead of from the age of 21, as at present. The third provision is to increase the age of responsibility for abduction for immoral purposes from the age of 16 to the age of 21.

These three provisions are provisions which in my opinion should command the assent of this House.

I am quite well aware that reasons will be urged against the adoption of all these provisions, especially the first two. It will be claimed that females over the age of sixteen years have sufficient experience to enable them to resist wiles of the character to which they are exposed, and are not entitled to the protection of the law. There is one feature of the usages of society in Canada, and in all other civilized countries, which entitles the young female to special consideration; that is the fact that society deals with the female much more severely and unjustly than with the male. Lapses of this kind on the part of the female consign her to a position in society from which she can never recover. She becomes an outcast. The results of an indiscretion of this kind are more terrible in her case than any punishment that may be inflicted on the male, in whose case the offence is commonly regarded by society as a very trivial one. For this reason the female is entitled to a greater degree of consideration under the law than the male. The female between the ages of sixteen and eighteen in this country can scarcely be claimed to have attained the full years of experience that will enable her to understand as perfectly as she will later in life the temptations to which she is exposed, or to guard against those temptations as later in life as she will certainly do.

The same reasons which will doubtless be urged against this Bill were urged against the measure now on the Statute-book, providing that the age of consent shall be limited to sixteen years. I had the honour of promoting that measure in this House. It was discussed here for several years before it passed this House. After it passed the House of Commons, it had to run the gauntlet of the Senate, and it was discussed in that body for two or three years before it became law. That Bill originally provided for the age of consent being fixed at eighteen years, but it was finally fixed at sixteen years. Those who were in the House at that time will no doubt remember that that Bill, when first introduced, met with a great deal of badinage. It was treated as a huge joke. For one or two sessions the House would hardly consent to treat the matter seriously, and jeers and gibes were the fortune of the promoter of the Bill. Finally, the Bill became law. It has now been on the Statute-book for ten years, and its operation has unquestionably been salutary, and in the public interest. Nobody now questions that it should have a place on our Statute-book, or would suggest that it should be repealed, and that the protection which females enjoy under the laws of Canada should be removed. I think we may now take a step in advance, and increase the age of consent to eighteen years, as proposed by this Bill. If good, substantial, tangible reasons exist for giving protection to the female up to the age of sixteen years, I can scarcely understand why the same reasons will not apply with equal or almost equal force to the proposal to extend that limit to eighteen years. From sixteen to eighteen years is an age of inexperience on the part of the female; there can be no doubt about that. In this country, and more notably in many other countries, if the seduction of a female is visited by the punishment of death by a brother or a parent, it is customary that conviction cannot be obtained. Society holds that the brother or the father or the friend of the female who has been robbed of her virtue, has the right to visit the crime with the punishment of death; and in many countries the fear of the guardian or the friend of the female taking justice into his own hands and inflicting this summary punishment, acts as a salutary restraint—such restraint which it is proposed by this Bill shall be imposed legally and decorously and in a proper manner.

It is not necessary to say much about the serious affect of the canker of vice, and the great importance of preserving chastity and public virtue. Anything that will conduce to that condition in society is commendable and salutary, and should be applied by all means. The object of this Bill is to protect the female, and to restrain those who have designs against her virtue—to serve the public good by holding out the prospect of punishment to the male who will not be otherwise restrained from giving full rein to his vicious propensities. There are many states in the American Union that have the age limit which this Bill proposes to establish. The State of New York, with a population of over six millions, has the age of consent placed at eighteen years. I do not know that it is necessary to give a list of the states which make the age limit eighteen, but there are ten or twelve of them, and there are others that have fixed the limit at seventeen, and others again that fix it at sixteen; and I believe that those which have the age limit at eighteen have more advanced legislation than the others have. It is proposed to amend section 181 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to two years' imprisonment, who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character, of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years.

The Bill proposes to substitute eighteen for sixteen. It is proposed to raise the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen.

The second section of the Bill proposes to amend section 182 of the Criminal Code. Sec. 182 reads as follows:—

Every one above the age of twenty-one years is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to two years' imprisonment, who, under promise of marriage, seduces and has illicit connection with any unmarried female of previously chaste character and under twenty-one years of age.

The original Bill provided for the punishment of seduction, under promise of marriage by a male over the age of eighteen. I understand that some of the Senators were afraid that some of our young men, at this age of indiscretion, might commit a crime for which they were scarcely responsible, and thought it would be better to advance the age to twenty-one. I think, however, that any young man who deprives a woman of her virtue, who commits the flagrant offence of seduction under promise of marriage, is old enough at the age of 18 to know that he has committed a base act, and to comprehend the provision of a law which makes the act punishable, and I believe if it is proper to impose this penalty at the age of 21, it is just as proper to impose it at the age of 18 on the part of a male.

The third section of the Bill proposes to amend section 283 of the Criminal Code. That section reads:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to five years' imprisonment, who unlawfully takes, or causes to be taken, any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her. It is immaterial whether the girl is taken with her own consent or at her own suggestion or not. It is immaterial whether or not the offender believed the girl to be of or above the age of sixteen.

The provision is aimed at the punishment of the offence of enticing girls into brothels or houses of ill-fame or enticing them out of the country under false pretenses, for the purpose of robbing them of their virtue and making them inmates of dens. If a girl, 21 years of age, has been inveigled from her home—made to enter a brothel, I am unable to see why her parents or other guardian should not be able to reclaim her under a provision of the law, and why punishment should not be inflicted on the wretches who have abducted her, under any pretense whatever, and consigned her to a life of shame. For that reason the Bill proposes to raise the age when abduction is punishable from 16 to 21.

These are the provisions of the Bill I have the honour to submit to the House. I believe that all the hon. members are in favour of our establishing every safeguard possible for the purpose of conserving public virtue and punishing crime on the part of any individual, the purport or result of which is to sap the foundations of public virtue and render the chastity of females in this country less secure than it is at present.

Mr. CRAIG. With the general purport of this Bill I have full sympathy, and I have entire sympathy with those who are advocating this measure. I am not, however, able to agree in the whole Bill. While I have no objection at all, personally, to the first section which provides for raising the age of consent in women from 16 to 18, and while I think that is a part of the Bill which will commend itself to the judgment of this House, because 18 is not very old for a girl, I cannot support the second section of the Bill which provides for reducing the age of responsibility in the man from 21 to 18. It seems to me that that is a step in the wrong direction. The law, as it stands, is aimed at a man over twenty-one who seduces a woman under promise of marriage. But suppose we reduce the age limit from twenty-one to eighteen, then the man, instead of the woman, would require to be protected. Take a young man of nineteen, we might easily imagine cases in which he might be led into temptation and induced to commit the crime mentioned in this Bill by the woman herself, so that I think the age is very properly put at twenty-one. I say further that if we raise the age from sixteen to eighteen in woman, we are going far in that direction to protect the woman, because a woman at eighteen years of age, we know from experience and observation, is just as old as a man of twenty-one. I think it would be a most unfortunate step to take to reduce the age of responsibility in a man from twenty-one to eighteen. I can support the first section, but am compelled to oppose the section reducing the age of responsibility in a man from twenty-one to eighteen. Instead of having a good effect, this would have a bad effect. As to the third section, I have not looked into it particularly, but do not see that there is any particular objection to it. I think, therefore, that I might support the first and third sections, but as the Bill now stands I shall have to vote against it.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I quite agree in the remarks of my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig), but I do not see any objection to this Bill taking its second reading and being discussed in Committee of the Whole. The first clause, I think, might be very fairly accepted, but to the second clause I have the very same objection which has been urged by my hon. friend from East Durham. I do not think that it would be wise in any way to accept the modification proposed by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Under the civil law in the province of Quebec, and I think it is the same in the other provinces, but I can speak only for Quebec, a man cannot contract marriage legally under the age of 21 without the consent of his parents. Such being the law of the land, if a girl is so imprudent as to accept the promise of marriage of any boy under 21, she has only herself to blame for the consequence which may follow; and if you are to amend the law so as to make a man responsible for any promise of marriage he may give, being under 21 years, in my opinion such a change would not be conducive to morality but the very reverse. It would lead necessarily to blackmail in many cases and to boys being entrapped. The best age to be fixed, I think, is that already fixed—21 years. If a girl wants to accept the promise of a man, let her accept the promise of a man and not of a boy, and, by the law a man is not a man and able to give consent before he is 21 years of age. Barring thus, one criticism, I think the first clause should be admitted. As to the third clause, I am not prepared to give an opinion at this moment. It should be reserved for a future occasion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. CASEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 14) respecting drainage on and across the lands of railway companies. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I am merely following what I understand to have been the drift of opinion in this House on the last occasion when the House considered this subject. In consequence of many petitions from municipalities to this House in former years, and of complaints made to myself by individuals who wished to drain their lands across railways, I introduced on two former occasions Bills to make the Dominion railways subject to provincial laws concerning drainage. These Bills were attacked by the Government of the day, by many friends of the railways, and by many disinterested members of the House, on the ground that it would be far better to have a law which was applicable to all railways in the Dominion, so far as they were under the control of this Government and Parliament. Consequently, I have, this year, prepared a Bill intended to apply to all these railways, framed upon the basis of the law already for years in force in the province of Ontario. That Ontario Railway Drainage Act of 1890 made use of municipal machinery to a large extent and referred, almost entirely to drains constructed by municipalities under the different drainage Acts of that province. In making a Bill which is to apply to all Canadian railways, I have been compelled to drop the use of a good deal of municipal machinery, since our legislation cannot command that machinery in the same way that provincial legislation can. But I have preserved the main principles of that Bill, and I now ask this House to accept the measure.

I may say, in general terms, that the first object of the Ontario Act, and of my Bill, is to provide a cheap and quick settlement of all disputes between land owners and railways in connection with the question of drainage. It is to be admitted that drainage across the property of a railway company must be proceeded with much more cautiously than drainage across ordinary land. The road-bed must not be spoiled, and the safety of the road must not be endangered. For these reasons, and these alone, I think, special legislation is required. That special legislation was provided, as I have said, in Ontario. But when farmers and municipalities tried to take advantage of it by bringing their disputes to an issue, it was held by the courts, so far as any such cases have heretofore gone, that the provincial parliaments had no jurisdiction over Dominion railways. So that as a matter of fact, in the province of Ontario, that legislation, which has been in force since 1890, has been of no effect whatever, and has been of no use to those who desire to take advantage of it. My own opinion, given for what it is worth on a constitutional point, is that on a question of drainage the right of the provincial authorities to legislate seems very strong. But I do not set that opinion up as against the judgment of the courts; and, at present, all the decisions in existence go to show that that power, so far as Dominion railways are concerned at all events, rests with this House. In consequence of these decisions the old system of appealing to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council on any question of dispute as to such drainage had to be continued. Farmers and municipalities find that system a tax upon them which, in some cases, they have borne, and, in some cases, they have refused to bear, preferring to put up with the inconvenience and loss which they suffered, rather than incur the necessary expense without any certainty of getting a quick and proper decision on the question if they came here.

I wish to urge upon the attention of the members of this House what it means to come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. In the first place many municipalities, even in Ontario and Quebec, are very far indeed from Ottawa. When we come to the case of other provinces, the question of an appeal to the Privy Council seems even most absurd. An appeal to Ottawa from British Columbia, from Manitoba, from Nova Scotia, from New Brunswick, or from Prince Edward Island, on a question as to whether farmer Jones, or the township of whatever-you-like-to-call-it, has the right to drain across a certain railway, is entirely out of the question. To send a delegation here and hire a lawyer to appear would cost more than to suffer the inconvenience or even, in many cases, to abandon the land which it is proposed to drain. There is not at present any means of obtaining justice or, rather, of obtaining a decision—let me put it on that ground—on these questions of drainage, where such questions arise at a great distance from Ottawa. Gentlemen in this House have told me—and there may be hon. members present who know of such cases—that they have known farmers who have abandoned their farms simply because the railways refused to give them an outlet for their drainage, and they could not afford to come here and have that question tried out.

Suppose they did take the alternative of coming here, what would they have to encounter? They are met by the permanent counsel engaged by the different railways, some of the ablest professional men in Canada who, on account of their age and experience, and by reason of having been long in that position of railway counsel, have more or less the ear of Ministers, whoever they may be at the time. They have their ear, and they have it justly, because they are known to be men of standing and position in their profession. It is very hard to expect a farmer or a poor township to engage counsel sufficiently able to contend with these railway counsel before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Then, again, that Railway Committee is composed of the Minister of Railways and such other Ministers as may be associated with him, very few in number, perhaps none of them, except the Minister of Railways himself, much versed in railway matters, probably none of them knowing much about the needs of drainage in a country neighbourhood.

The tribunal is one which should not be occupied over such works; it should be discussing questions of railway policy, and not questions of railway drainage. The location of the tribunal puts it out of reach of the most of those who need to have recourse to it. The conditions of trial before that tribunal are unnecessarily costly and unfair, to the rural litigant, at all events. For all these reasons, I ask the House to support the principle of the Bill which I now propose. Let me tell the House briefly what it amounts to.

In the first place, it declares the abstract right of all land owners to drainage across railway property to the same extent as across any other property, subject to the terms of this Act itself, which are intended to make provision for safeguarding the rights of the railway. When a municipality or an individual wishes to obtain drainage across a railway track, the first step in either case is to secure an engineer to make a plan of the proposed drainage works, so far as they affect the property of the railway company, together with profiles of any necessary structures, and an estimate of the cost. This plan, report and profiles are to be sent to the manager of the railway company, with a request to know whether he agrees to them. If he agrees, the documents showing that agreement are to be filed as herein provided, and form a basis for closing the whole matter. If they are not accepted by the manager of the railway company, he shall notify the other parties, and must then send an engineer within a certain time to confer with the engineer of the municipality or land owner, on the spot where the work is to take place, and see if they can not come to an amicable conclusion. If they do, their agreement is valid, and becomes a settlement of the case. If they do not agree, two courses are open to them. They may agree upon a third engineer to act as umpire, or third arbitrator, and go on, with his assistance, to settle the case then and there, or at such future time as may be appointed. If they do not do that, the party not satisfied in the case appeals to the Minister of Railways, who shall appoint a third engineer, a competent man in his opinion, to act as such umpire, or third arbitrator. The decision of these three engineers, in either case, shall be final and without appeal. The Act itself provides that no such drainage works shall be carried on in such a manner as to render the road-bed of the company unsafe or to do any permanent injury to it. I need not go into all the details on that point, but the rights of the railway in that respect are fully safeguarded. After it has been decided that the work shall be done, if it is so decided, the question arises of how it shall be done, and there is ample provision in the Act for obtaining the consent of the railway company to its being done by their own men, or by persons hired by the other party, as the case may be. If the railway company, or the other party to the case, does not act up to the provisions of this Act by appointing an engineer of their own, or if the engineer so appointed does not act, the Minister of Railways can again step in and appoint an engineer to act for such party, who shall have all the rights and duties of the engineer who should have been, or was, originally appointed. I think those explanations are sufficient as to the principle of the Bill, though I should like to have given you some more details, but there will be an opportunity for that in committee.

Mr. CASEY.

I have great confidence in the soundness of the provisions of this Act, as the action on which it is based was passed in Ontario under the eye of our present Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, who was then Premier of that province. I have no doubt they were well considered by him before he allowed them to pass into law as a provincial Act; and I have no doubt that he still believes the principle of that Act to be sound. I had intended to ask for this Bill, as for my Bill in regard to railway employees and passengers, a special committee; but as it is a much longer Bill, and involves a question of jurisdiction between this legislature and another, I have been advised by the Government to allow it to go to the Railway Committee, and to have the question of jurisdiction submitted to the Minister of Justice before it passes through. Of course I am quite content to submit to his arbitration on that subject. I have no doubt that he is the best authority on that point that we have in Canada, and if his verdict is against the constitutionality of such an Act, then some other means must be taken of getting the relief proposed for the farmer or the municipality concerned. In that case I should have to revert, probably, to my other proposal to make Dominion railways subject to provincial legislation such as it may be. I have therefore the honour to move, seconded by Mr. Hurley, that this Bill be now read the second time, and I propose to follow that up by a motion that it be referred to the Railway Committee. I had, as I say, strong objections to sending it to that committee, and have them still, for that matter. I have not found that a committee of that kind, a rather tumultuary committee, inasmuch as there is an absence of the sense of dignity which prevails in a session of this House, is not the best tribunal to pry into and try the fitness of the details of a public Bill. I do not believe it is one of its functions to discuss a public Bill, but in deference to the expressed wish of the Government, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I am willing to let this Bill stand the ordeal, believing in its intrinsic merits to carry it through.

Mr. HURLEY. I have presented a petition to this House from the county council of Hastings in favour of some legislation in this very direction. The township council has had considerable difficulty there with regard to drainage. A great deal of the land has been drained by private individuals, and the work was found very expensive, so I think there will be in the future little land drained unless there is an easier way of carrying out the undertaking. Difficulty has arisen in regard to the amounts to be paid by the owners of the different farms. I know two or three farms, which were not considered of very good quality, that were expected to be benefited by drainage, and yet they have been abandoned by their owners rather than pay the taxes levied. I am aware that the reeve of one of the principal townships in Hastings has been called upon to pay $600 for a drain across his farm, which a man could dig for $60. The county council thought fit to send a petition asking for legislation in this direction, and especially asking in regard to drainage across railway tracks, which is often found more costly than all the other parts of the drainage put together.

Mr. LISTER. The Bill under consideration is one that affects a very large section and a very large number of the people of this country. For the western part of Ontario, where the land is flat, and where it is absolutely necessary that it should be drained for the purpose of cultivating it, a law of this kind should be passed. The Bill which my hon. friend introduces is substantially a statute passed by the province of Ontario, whereby the owner of the land can bring any railway corporation under its provisions and compel the corporation, the same as an individual, to do what is necessary to give the owner of the land drainage. Our courts in Ontario have held that the law passed by the legislature is ultra vires of that legislature, holding that that legislature has no power to pass an Act affecting railway companies incorporated by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, or which has been brought under the control of the Dominion of Canada by the provisions of the British North America Act. Such being the case, the farmers, at all events of western Ontario, are left practically without any remedy. Within my own knowledge farmers in my own county have for years been trying to get drainage for their lands under the tracks of railway companies. The courts, as I have said, have decided that these railway companies do not come under the laws of the province, and the difficulty has been to get the companies to do what they ought to do under ordinary circumstances. The law being as at present, the owner of the land was without any machinery by which he could compel a railway company to allow him even to go upon railway property and drain. The consequence has been, as my hon. friend stated a moment ago, that the farmer was either compelled to come to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and ask for a judgment of that court, or he was bound and compelled to accept the terms dictated by the railway company, and I need hardly say in many cases those terms have been exceedingly harsh. Petitions have been presented to this Parliament, over and over again, by the farmers of the country asking that some legislation should be passed by Parliament; but as yet no steps have been taken, the answer on one or two occasions being that those people have a complete remedy by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council is many hundreds of miles away and in some cases thousands of miles away from the people interested, and the simple mention of that body deters those people from coming here for that redress which I am sure that committee would give them. There is no injustice in compelling a railway company to stand in the same position and on the same footing as an individual. Under our law, by a very simple process, if a man requires drainage for his land, he serves on the owner of the adjoining lands, or the municipality if it is necessary to go across the road, a notice, and if the parties cannot agree to the terms on which the ditch shall be constructed, then an engineer is brought in, and his award is final and binding on all the parties. It may be said so far as the railway companies are concerned: we owe a duty to the travelling public, that it is absolutely necessary that no person should interfere with the railway tracks in any way whatever. That it is quite true so long as the measure provides that this work shall be done under a competent engineer or under the superintendency of a Government engineer, or of an engineer of the railway company, and the rights of the public are perfectly protected. So I can only repeat what my hon. friend has said, that this is a measure demanded by the people, that it is in the interest of the people, that it cannot injure the railway companies in any degree whatever; and while this may not be the exact law that is required, a reference to a committee, as has been proposed, may enable us to bring before this House a measure that will be acceptable to the people at large and to the railway companies of the country as well. There is no doubt whatever that the time has come when it is necessary there should be legislation upon this question.

Mr. SEMPLE. I certainly think that the measure introduced by the hon. member for Elgin should pass. Frequently owners of lands through which railways pass have been subjected to great inconvenience and loss of money from not having an outlet for the surplus water that passes through their farms. I no one case where a large portion of the farm is often covered by water. The owner has asked the agent of the railway company to be allowed the privilege of draining across the railway track, and has offered to have the work carried out to the satisfaction of the manager or the foreman of the company, and to place tiles and do the work in a first-class manner, but the railway company will not allow the work to be done. This involves a loss both to the country and to the farming community, and a Bill like that introduced by the hon. member for Elgin has become a necessity.

Mr. BRITTON. There is no doubt in the world that some such legislation as this proposed is necessary in the interests of the farmers at all events in the province of Ontario, about which I know perhaps more than I do about any of the other provinces. It is not exactly the question that damage is often done by railways crossing farms and backing the water up on the land, for as to that, the courts are open to the farmers and they can either get damages or compel the construction of a culvert. But the railways have been constructed in many of the western parts of the province through unsettled lands or partly settled lands, and at the time of construction the farmers did not need to drain this land. Under the Ontario law the owners of a particular area can by petition to the council have an engineer sent, and if the engineer recommends it, they can have a drain made sufficient for the purpose of draining this swamp land. It so happens, however, that by reason of the railway crossing between this area and the outlet, the drain has to be carried a long distance to some stream, and so there is an enormously increased expense entailed in order to reach a proper outlet. Sometimes this drain benefits the railway company, but the man who needs the drain has to pay the increased expense, without having redress to the extent of a single farthing against the railway company that blocks the way. The railway companies now simply stand by, and so far as Dominion railways are concerned, they are beyond the jurisdiction of Ontario legislation, as my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) has pointed out, and cannot be compelled to pay a part of the expense. This constitutes a grievance. I have read with some care the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey), and notwithstanding the care with which he has drawn it, it will no doubt require a great deal of attention in the committee, and unquestionably considerable amendment in order to make it workable without doing any injustice to the railway companies of the Dominion. The point now is, to affirm the principle of the Bill, and that I do most cordially.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

TRADE MARKS.

Mr. LOUNT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 45) in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS Explain.

Mr. LOUNT. I had supposed that this Bill might have been introduced without explanation, but probably it is not out of order and may be useful for the further consideration of the Bill that something should be said at its introduction so that members of the House may be able to form some opinion and come to some conclusion respecting the propriety of the measure. The Bill is intended to enlarge the Act respecting Trade Marks and Design. By the third section of the present Act it is provided that:

All marks, names, brands, labels, packages or other business devices, which are adopted for use by any person in his trade, business, occupation or calling, for the purpose of distinguishing any manufacture, product or article of any description manufactured, produced, compounded, packed or offered for sale by him—applied in any manner whatever either to such manufacture, product or article, or to any package, parcel, case, box or other vessel or receptacle of any description whatsoever containing the same, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be considered and known as trade marks, and may be registered for the exclusive use of the person registering the same in the manner herein provided; and thereafter such person shall have the exclusive right to use the same to designate articles manufactured or sold by him.

By the operation of the Act it is confined solely to trade marks of persons or individuals, and is made a valuable interest beyond any doubt, if there is any valuable interest to those who adopt trade marks, labels or devices used by them in their trade or calling. But while it has advantage to the individual it does not go far enough in the opinion of the trade organizations of this country, and so far as my instructions go and from the best information I can obtain, the trade associations, which have their headquarters largely in the city of Toronto and which have a legislative committee considering all these questions in relation to trade, feel that it would be in the interest of their associations that the Act should be enlarged so as to enable those associations and unions to take advantage of trade labels and trade devices. I for my own part must say that the question is one that is open to. I will not say criticism, but open to mature consideration perhaps before it is enacted as law. At the same time I am of the opinion that it is a Bill which should be fairly and carefully considered by the House, and the association of trade unions should have an opportunity to be heard and their interests subserved and advantaged if such interests commend themselves to Parliament. I am aware that this is not the only occasion when this question has been under consideration. I am not in a position to say whether or not it was before the last Parliament, though I understand that the former hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) brought the matter up for consideration. I must say from my study of the present position of this matter, that I believe the inspection which is asked for by this Bill is in the right direction. I learn from the Minister of Agriculture, or rather from an officer in his department having special regard for the registry of trade marks, that these associations have been in the habit of registering their trade marks, but it is a matter of very grave doubt whether or not such registration is legal, and it is open to the danger of litigation at times to determine its validity. I desire, as far as I can by this Bill, to remove from the realm of doubt the right of registration by these associations. I understand that it was determined in the United States courts, in the case of Weiner vs. Graton, that trade associations of this character have not the legal right to register such marks. The provisions of this Bill will establish beyond peradventure the right of these associations to be recognized. I may say, Sir, that the trade associations of the city of Toronto have had this matter for several years under their careful consideration. Their legislative committee, which is composed of a large and intelligent body of representative men, in the interests of trade and in the interests of the working classes, have from time to time endeavoured to obtain such legislation as this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LOUNT. I am delighted to find from the cheers on the other side that the rights of the working classes are not lost sight of. Hon. gentlemen opposite, having in mind the next elections, are very loud in their expressions of opinion favouring the interests of the working classes.

An hon. MEMBER. Give them free sugar.

Mr. LOUNT. What hon. gentleman spoke so sweetly? I am not aware that this Bill has any reference to sugar, but I have no doubt there will be found some sweet features in it before it passes into law. I trust that hon. gentlemen opposite will not permit their enthusiasm to subside, but that they will continue it until this Bill passes the House. What I was about to say when interrupted was that the associations that I have mentioned, having considered this question very carefully, have placed in my hands this measure for the consideration of the House, and I venture to believe that the House will unanimously endorse their request.

An hon. MEMBER. What are the features of your Bill?

Mr. LOUNT. I shall be delighted to give the features of the Bill later on, but I know there is a burning desire to hear from the Finance Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not here.

Mr. LOUNT. I propose to block the way just a little time, by discussing this important measure.

An hon. MEMBER. Obstruction.

Mr. LOUNT. The tariff is a very important question, and it is agitating the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, but if they possess their souls in patience until it is launched, they will be able to draw some conclusions from it. In the meantime, in my opinion a matter perhaps more important than the tariff is the safeguarding of the interests of the labouring classes of this country, and I trust I shall obtain an enthusiastic endorsement of this measure from hon. gentlemen on both sides. I have no doubt that the House is full of intelligence and wisdom, and perhaps an humble member like me cannot give it much information, but I shall for a few moments believe that hon. gentlemen are in benighted darkness on this subject, and therefore I shall give them new light.

By section 8 of this Act the trade mark is to be registered, and such registration makes it property vested in the person so registering. By section 11 of the same Act the Minister of Agriculture is made for the time being the judge and jury who is to determine whether or not a trade mark is an infringement of any other trade mark. By section 16 the trade mark is capable of assignment. Now, I understand that the Minister of Agriculture of the late Government gave his judgment that trade associations or unions had no right to register trade marks, labels, and so forth. Now, this Bill provides:

Section 3 of the Trade-mark and Design Act, Chapter 63 of the Revised Statutes, is hereby amended by adding the following subsection thereto:—

(3.) All marks, names, brands, labels, packages or other business devices which are adapted for use by any association or union of workmen in its trade, business, occupation or calling, for the purpose of distinguishing any manufacture, product or article of any description manufactured, produced, compounded or packed by or through the labour of any of the members of such association or union of workmen, and applied in any manner either to such manufacture, product or article, or to any package, parcel, case, box or other vessel or receptacle of any description containing the same, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be considered and known as trade marks, and may be registered for the exclusive use of the association or union of workmen registering the same in the manner herein provided, and of the members of such association or union; and thereafter such association or union of workmen, and its members, shall have the exclusive right to use the same, to designate articles manufactured by or through the labour of the members of such association or union of workmen, which for the purposes of this Act shall be considered the proprietor of such trade-mark.

The purpose of the Bill is to place a trade association or union in the same position and to confer upon it the same rights and privileges under the law as individual persons with regard to trade marks. For my part, I cannot see why an association or a union of men should not have the right to use a trade mark for their advantage, and to have the protection of the law in using it, as well as an individual person; and, from the enthusiastic support which this Bill appears to receive from both sides of the House, I judge that there is no opposition to it, and that the trade associations of this country will receive from this House that consideration which it has always shown for the tradesman and the worker, and that this Bill will be passed into an Act before this session closes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TRADE AND OTHER LABELS.

Mr. LOUNT moved first reading of Bill (No. 46) respecting Trade and other Labels. He said: Mr. Speaker, the explanation which I have already given of the previous Bill largely explains the purpose of this measure, which is intended to be as it were first cousin to that Bill. It is intended to protect trade and other labels, and to make it an offence to violate any of the provisions respecting them. It is a Bill necessarily following upon the Bill already introduced.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 47) in further amendment of the General Inspection Act

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. McMULLEN. Under the present inspection law, an inspection of cheese is provided for, but the intention is, by this Bill, to clothe the inspector with power to act as a referee in disputes between buyer and seller. Through the western portion of Ontario, during the last year or two, very serious disputes have arisen between the sellers and buyers of cheese. It is well known that cheese fairs are held at several centres in that district—Woodstock, London, and Listowel,—which are attended by representatives of the different cheese factories and by the buyers. Very often sales are made subject to inspection. A buyer will send around his inspector for the purpose of examining and grading the cheese, and when he comes to the factory and makes the inspection, sometimes the sellers and the buyers disagree as to the quality. In some cases the buyers are disposed to grade the cheese very much below what the seller thinks is its grade, and it often happens that, in a receding market, the inspectors are very much more exact in their grading than they possibly might be if the market were advancing. The result has been that very serious reductions have taken place in many cases, resulting in a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst the patrons. At a meeting which I attended in my riding last January, and at which there were representatives from fifty-seven factories, a resolution was passed strongly urging the appointment of an inspector of this kind. Some factories, during the past season, have lost at least $500, others perhaps more and some less than that, but the unfortunate feature of the present condition is this, that a great many of the patrons of those factories are disposed to withdraw their patronage altogether, and a good many factories are in serious danger of standing idle. That would be a very serious matter, because the cheese industry is unquestionably exceedingly important, and any legislation to protect it against any injustice on the part of buyers or any want of confidence in the buyers' inspectors ought to have our unqualified support. I am not charging the buyers of cheese throughout the country with dishonesty. They may possibly have branded all the cheese they bought during the last season honestly according to what it should be branded in their opinion, they may have done what was perfectly right, but the object of my Bill is to secure to the patrons of cheese factories a price proportionate to the merits of their cheese and give them confidence in the inspection of their cheese. When a number of factories have been used by buyers in this way, they the patrons feel that they have been imposed upon, and the result is they are disposed to drop the manufacture of cheese altogether. If there is any one industry that we should endeavour to encourage throughout the province of Ontario, at least, it is the manufacture of cheese, which is to-day becoming a leading branch of the great industry of dairying, and if we neglect to provide the necessary legislation to protect those engaged in that industry, we certainly, by our omission, may lead to very serious injury. The object of my Bill is to clothe the Government inspector with authority to decide in matters of dispute between the parties. I do not propose to make the inspection of all cheese compulsory, but leave it optional. The cheese may be inspected, or it may not; but where a buyer makes a bargain and then comes with his inspector and pronounces the standard of the cheese below the standard anticipated by the patrons of that factory, the patrons will have the right to telegraph for the Government inspector to come and certify as to whether the grade which has been placed upon that cheese by the inspector of the buyer is a proper and honest grade or not. If the Government inspector, after careful investigation, decide that the grading has not been honest, but that an attempt has been made to take advantage of the seller, then the buyer would be required to take the cheese at the price agreed upon when the purchase was made. If, on the other hand, the inspector decided that the grading of the cheese is honest and fair, the seller then will have the option of taking the price offered by the buyer or of withholding the cheese and trying to secure a better price in some other way. This is the object of the Bill, and I hope it will receive the support of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Since notice has been taken of this matter in the public press, I have had communications strongly endorsing the Bill and strongly urging that it should become law. The cheese-buyers themselves, will, I think, be quite willing to accept it. I am sure they will be anxious to cultivate the confidence of those with whom they are brought in contact in business transactions, and I feel certain that this Bill, if it becomes law, will be a means of having disputes settled amicably and peaceably and will tend to produce that confidence in the manufacturers which is absolutely necessary if the trade is to prosper.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GRAIN STANDARDS IN MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to make any changes in the mode of selecting, allotting or regulating the grain standards for Manitoba and the North-west Territories, during the present session of this Parliament?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). This matter is now under consideration. The grain committee of the Winnipeg Board of Trade recommend that inspectors should be instructed to grade according to the wording and meaning of the Act or Orders in Council appertaining thereto, dispensing with samples, except when the crop from climatic or other reasons is abnormal, in which case they recommend that the grain inspectors of Winnipeg and Port Arthur should, with the chairman (pro tem) of the Winnipeg Grain Board, be a permanent board to establish, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, grades for that season.

COAL OIL, ST. JOHN'S, P.Q., BARRACKS.

Mr. MORIN asked :

Who are the parties who sent in tenders to the Government, in November last, for coal oil to light the barracks at St. John's, P.Q.; giving names and prices?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Tenders for the supply of coal oil for the permanent corps at St. John's, P.Q., were as follows:— J. A. Lomme, 17½ cts. per gallon; J. G. Hebert, 18 cts. per gallon

MR. A. R. McDONALD.

Mr. ANGERS (for Mr. Pouliot) asked :

Is it true that Mr. A. R. McDonald has been appointed by the Government inspector general of the Intercolonial Railway, with a salary of $3,000 per annum?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No such appointment has been made.

GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. When do the Government intend to remove the drill shed off the lot they sold to the town council of the town of Gananoque for the sum of one thousand dollars?

2. Is the Government aware that by not having moved the drill shed as agreed with the said council, that they are causing great damage to the high school lately erected on part of said lot?

3. Has the Government exceeded the time on which they agreed with the said council when they sold the lot to them, to remove the same?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. The shed will be removed as soon as the department has secured a new site for the building. 2. The department is aware that the school board wish for the removal of the shed, and they were allowed in 1895 to take down a portion of one end to facilitate the erection of a school-house. 3. The time allowed for the removal of the shed was necessarily prolonged because of the difficulty to find a suitable site for the building.

TENDERS FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Will the Minister of the Interior lay on the Table copies of the schedule calling for tenders for Indian supplies in Manitoba and the North-west Territories for the fiscal years 1896-97 and 1897-98?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) to move for these papers; they are very bulky.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Premier is quite mistaken. These papers are already distributed. I am in possession of the papers, and I only ask the question so that it may be laid upon the Table for the information of members.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will look into the matter again.

POSTMASTER, ALLANDALE, N.B.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Has D. Connolly, postmaster, Allandale, York county, been dismissed?

Was any charge made against him?

If so, was he granted an investigation?

For what reason was he dismissed?

Who has been appointed in his place?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The postmaster, Mr. Connolly, has not been dismissed. There was no charge made against him, and, consequently, there was no investigation. But the conveniency of the office was referred to the post office inspector for his report, and on his report, the office was, in the public interest, removed from the residence of Mr. Connolly to a more convenient position. This involved the appointment of Mr. Dominick Doherty to the new post office.

QU'APPELLE MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the contract for carrying the mail between Qu'Appelle station and Fort Qu'Appelle has been let? Were tenders called for? If so, in what papers did the advertisement for tenders appear?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The contract for the Qu'Appelle and Qu'Appelle station mail service has not been let. Tenders have been invited. Instructions are given to inspectors in all cases to advertise in the public interest in such manner as they deem advisable. The department has no information as to what steps have been taken in regard to advertisement, but I am satisfied they will be in every respect satisfactory.

MR. JOHN SPENCE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

1. Whether one John Spence, of the Inland Revenue Department, has been superannuated, and if so, the date of his superannuation?

2. Did the said John Spence make application to the Inland Revenue Department to be retired and placed on the superannuation list, and filed the medical certificate required by the Act along with his application, and whether said application and certificate are on file in the department?

Mr. DAVIN.

3. Are applications for other retirements under the Act, on file in the department; if so, why was an exception made in this case?

4. Did the Deputy Minister recommend his superannuation on the grounds of efficiency or economy?

5. Was there any complaint against Spence of inefficiency or misconduct?

6. If there is no evidence on file of his having applied for superannuation, and if the office has not been abolished and that no complaint is on file against him, and that his retirement was not recommended by the deputy head on the grounds of efficiency and economy, under what clause of the Act was he superannuated, and is he now permitted to draw a retiring allowance?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The following are the answers to the gentleman's question in their order:—1. John Spence has not been superannuated. 2. No such documents are on file in the department. 3. Applications made officially to the department are on file. 4. The Commissioner of Inland Revenue was requested to make a list of officers who had attained the age at which they could be superannuated. 5. No; the only complaints against him were that he did not agree with his subordinates. 6. He is not superannuated, neither is he drawing a retiring allowance, and he continues to perform the duties of his office on his regular salary.

THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Is the Government aware that the State Legislature of the State of New York, one of the United States of America, bordering on the River St. Lawrence, has appropriated the sum of $30,000 to be expended in purchasing and beautifying some of the islands on the American side of said river, for the purpose of establishing public parks which are to form the United States' share of an international park proposed to be established in the River St. Lawrence?

Is it the intention of the Government to purchase from the Indian Department some of the Canadian islands, and set them apart for park purposes? Also to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to beautify the same, and to meet the propositions made by the American authorities to establish an international park in the said river, extending from Kingston to Prescott, on the Canadian side, and from Cape Vincent to Ogdensburg, on the American side of said river?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government has no official information that the State of New York has appropriated any sum of money to be expended in purchasing and beautifying some of the islands on the American side of the River St. Lawrence. Eleven of the islands on the Canadian side were set aside by the late Government for the purpose of turning them into a park. Two of these islands were subsequently sold. The present Government has stopped the sale of these islands. The question of appropriating money for the purpose of turning these islands into a park is now receiving the consideration of the Government.

INDIAN AGENT WM. BATEMAN.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Has Mr. Wm. Bateman, of Port Perry, Ont., been removed from the position of Indian agent to the Indians on Scugog Island ?
2. Was there an official inquiry into Mr. Bateman's conduct before he was dismissed from the position of Indian agent ?
3. Who recommended the dismissal of Mr. Bateman, late Indian agent to the Scugog Island Indians ?
4. What were the charges preferred against Mr. Bateman, late Indian agent for the Scugog Island Indians ?
5. Who is Mr. Bateman's successor as agent to the Scugog Island Indians ? Can Mr. Bateman's successor (whose name, I believe, is Williams) write or read ?
6. Was Mr. Williams, in his recent visit to pay the Scugog Island Indians, accompanied by his brother who sells liquor in Port Perry ?
7. Did Hon. John Dryden communicate with the Government, or any member thereof regarding the dismissal of Mr. Bateman or the appointment of Mr. Williams as agent to the Scugog Indians ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). 1. Mr. William Bateman has been removed from the position of Indian agent to the Indians of Scugog Island. 2. There was an inquiry, a departmental inquiry, not by commission. 3. As to who recommended the dismissal of Mr. Bateman, this is a question as to which the Government does not feel bound to answer. 4. The charge preferred against Mr. Bateman was offensive partisanship. 5. Mr. Albert Williams is the successor of Mr. Bateman. The department has no reason to doubt that Mr. Williams will discharge the duties of his office efficiently. 6. The department has not yet received any report of the visit referred to, and has no knowledge of any one accompanying Mr. Williams on that occasion. 7. The department has no knowledge of any such communication having been made.

FISHERY GUARDIANS, NORTH VICTORIA.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Who are the fishery guardians under direction of the Federal Government in the waters of North Victoria, Ontario ?
2. Why were the services of those fishery guardians formerly in the service of the Government in North Victoria, dispensed with ?
3. On whose report were the former fishery guardians in North Victoria, i.e., those in service last year, retired ?
4. Was there an investigation into the conduct of the fishery guardians in North Victoria ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. The overseer in the district referred to is Archibald Bradshaw. 2. The services of the officers referred to were not dispensed with. This answers also questions 3 and 4.

Mr. HUGHES. All wrong.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) had better take charge of the department.

DISMISSAL OF EUGENE BLANCHET.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is Eugene Blanchet, of Fraserville, P.Q., employed on the Intercolonial Railway ?
2. If so, in what capacity and since what date ?
3. Was the same Eugene Blanchet dismissed from the service of the Intercolonial Railway after an investigation about the year 1879 ?
4. If so, what was the cause of his dismissal ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The man named Blanchet is not in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway, but was dismissed, I believe, in 1879. The offence of which he was found guilty was the sending of time-sheets which were irregular.

OPENING OF THE CANALS.

Mr. PENNY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the privilege of putting to the Minister of Railways a question which is of vital importance to the city of Montreal, and that is, when may we expect the canals along the St. Lawrence to be opened ? Ships have already started from the other side, and the merchants of Montreal would like to know when they may expect the canals to be opened in order that they may be able to load these ships.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say to my hon. friend that the department is fully sensible of the importance of having this work completed, and the repairs which are now proceeding finished at the earliest possible date. Instructions have been given to those who are in charge of the work to prosecute it vigorously, both day and night. I think I may assure the hon. gentleman that an hour will not be lost in bringing these works to completion. It would be quite impossible for me to give him any positive assurance as to the date upon which the work will be completed ; but I am given to understand that it will be quite impossible to have the canal ready before the end of the present month. That, I think, is the best information that I can safely give the hon. gentleman upon this subject.

THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE.

Mr. HUGHES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I take the opportunity of drawing the attention of the hon. the acting Minister of Militia to the fact that two important regiments of city corps, the 6th Fusiliers of Montreal and the 43rd Regiment of Ottawa, are not represented in the published list of regiments to furnish the quota to the Imperial contingent. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if that is a fact.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I may say to my hon. friend that I have not got the list by me at present, and therefore I cannot speak authoritatively. He may be correct in his statement. All I can say is that we should do our best to make it as representative as possible. But as we have got applications from about 2,000 officers, and we can only send twenty or thirty, there are difficulties in the way of meeting everybody's wishes.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That the House resolve itself into committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this motion to address to the House such observations as may seem to be necessary at the present time in explaining the financial position of the Dominion ; and also to submit to the House the details of the tariff policy which, in the judgment of the Government, is best calculated to promote the welfare of the people of Canada. I feel sure that, as I proceed, I shall have abundant reason to ask the generous indulgence which the House is always ready to accord to one who, for the first time, undertakes a task of so great magnitude, a task which to me, I confess, is all the greater when I remember the long line of able and distinguished men who have preceded me in the office of Minister of Finance. My first duty will be to deal with the affairs of the fiscal year which ended on the 30th of June, 1896; and this portion of my speech must of necessity be somewhat of a statistical character. It will not be necessary for me to occupy the time of the House at great length in regard to the year 1895-96, because the House has already been placed in possession of the principal points of interest through the public accounts and the appropriation accounts which have already been laid on the Table. In each of the three classes into which our revenue is usually divided, namely, customs, excise and miscellaneous, there is a marked increase over the year of 1894-95. The amount of that betterment I will give in detail :

Service.	1895-96.	1894-95.	Increase.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Customs.....	19,833,279 48	17,640,466 00	2,192,813 48
Excise.....	7,926,005 94	7,805,732 71	120,273 23
Miscellaneous.....	9,859,305 30	8,531,930 76	327,374 54
Total.....	36,618,590 72	33,978,129 47	2,640,461 25

The total revenue of $36,618,590 fell short of the estimate made by my predecessor in his financial statement of 31st January, 1896, to the extent of some $370,000. Now, taking the report of my hon. friend the Controller of Customs as my authority, it will be found that on nearly all the general lines of imports we have received increased revenue over the year 1894-95. The following, however, are the main items of increase, sugar, of course, being the principal :—

Grain of all kinds.....	$ 42,902
Flour and meal of all kinds.....	38,361
Carriages	211,737
Coal and coke.....	56,222
Cotton, manufactures of.....	111,794
Drugs, dyes, chemicals and medicines...	21,786
Flax, hemp and jute, manufactures of...	41,297
Fruits and nuts, dried.....	17,915
Fruits and nuts, green	11,549
Hats, caps and bonnets.....	13,472
Iron and steel, and manufactures of.....	223,123
Leather, manufactures of.....	11,683
Oils, coal, kerosene, and products of.....	18,597
Oils, all other.....	14,377
Paints and colours.....	10,024
Provisions, viz., butter, cheese, lard and meats	17,059
Seeds and roots.....	14,608
Silk, manufactures of.....	97,527
Soap of all kinds.....	10,351
Spirits and wines.....	84,754
Sugar of all kinds.....	894,428
Wood, and manufactures of.....	21,033
Wool, and manufactures of.....	231,569

Of the comparatively few classes of goods on which the customs revenue declined, the following may be cited :

Arrowroot, biscuit, rice, macaroni, &c... $	38,395
Fancy goods.....	14,131
Glass, and manufactures of.....	18,485
Gutta percha and india-rubber, manufactures of.....	20,265

The second principal source of taxation, excise, shows an advance in the receipts from this important branch of our service. Of the different items included under this heading, tobacco and snuff proved the only cases in which the revenue fell behind that of the previous year. The following statement will exhibit the quantities taken for consumption, and the duties accrued thereon, of the several excisable items :—

Article.	Quantity.		Duty.		Increase.
	1895.	1896.	1895.	1896.
Spirits, galls.	2,545,054	2,344,767	$3,870,752	$3,973,300	102,548
Malt, lbs.	50,659,627	51,690,278	759,929	775,354	15,425
Cigars, No.	106,131,294	108,290,260	635,028	648,462	13,434
Cigarettes, No.	66,628,440	80,461,900	99,943	120,692	20,749
Tobacco and snuff, lbs.	9,568,437	9,392,487	2,267,738	2,228,697

Showing a decrease in tobacco and snuff of $39,041.

It is worth noting at this point that according to the report of the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue the per capita consumption of spirits and wines in 1896 reached the lowest point since confederation. The per capita consumption of spirits being .623 gallons; and of wines, .070 gallons against an average of 1.037 gallons of the former and .131 gallon of the latter. The following statement gives the average per capita consumption from 1867 to 1896, and the per capita consumption for the years 1895 and 1896 :—

	Spirits.	Beer.	Wine.	To-
	Galls.	Galls.	Galls.	bacco.
				Lbs.
Average from 1867...	1.037	2.900	.131	2.170
do 1894-95.	.666	3.471	.090	2.163
do 1895-96.	.623	3.528	.070	2.120

From the miscellaneous sources of revenue the most important increases occurred in Post office, $171,225.39; interest on investments, $33,953.62; and casual, $121,412.32.

On the whole, therefore, the revenue in 1895-96 showed a buoyancy and expansion in marked contrast to the year 1894-95

Having so far given our attention to what was received into the treasury, let us now turn to the other side of the account, the expenditure. My predecessor estimated that the outlay for 1895-96 would amount in round numbers to $37,000,000, and that the receipts and expenditure would about balance. The actual expenditure was within $50,000 of the estimate and amounted to $36,949,142.03, but as the revenue fell short of expectations, instead of both sides of the account balancing there has again occurred a deficit amounting this time to $330,551.31. Compared with the expenditure of 1894-95, the year that elapsed on 30th June last, was remarkable for a distinct decrease in the public outlay, a decrease amounting to $1,182,863.02. The decreases were pretty generally spread throughout the various services, but the following are the most important heads :—

Premium, Discount and Exchange.....	$ 34,099
Civil Government.....	25,599
Legislation	36,882
Penitentiaries	64,372
Immigration	75,453
Militia	437,300
Mounted Police.....	113,111
Public Works, Consolidated Fund.....	442,548
Railways and Canals, Consolidated Fund	126,272

Ocean and River Service.....	$ 23,640
Indians	74,995
Customs	21,299

As against these reductions the following increases must be noted :—

Interest on public debt.....	$ 36,135
Sinking funds.....	52,976
Superannuation	45,846
Mail subsidies and steamship subventions	21,648
Government of North-west Territories...	27,076
Post Office	71,363
Railways and Canals, collection.....	122,099

Notwithstanding the contraction of the expenditure the net outcome of the year was a deficit in the ordinary running expenses of the country as above stated of $330,551.31. The deficit for the year 1894-95, you will remember, was $4,153,875.58.

Having reviewed the main features of the accounts of the Dominion for the year ended 30th June, 1896, I must now ask your attention to the condition of affairs of the present fiscal year of which nearly ten months have elapsed. First, let me give you as briefly as I can, my estimate of the result of the year's operations, taking the actual figures for the period elapsed, and adding thereto the figures appertaining to the period from 20th April to 30th June of the previous year, making such allowances as the altered circumstances prompt.

Taking up the revenue side first I find that up to the 20th April—that is up to last Tuesday night—we received as ordinary revenue $30,254,403.74. Adding to this for the purposes of estimate, the actual receipts between 20th April and 30th June of last year $7,892,251.81 would give us probable receipts to the amount of $38,146,655.55. But this I consider beyond the mark for this reason. The income from excise has been unduly swollen by reason of duties paid in anticipation of tariff changes, that must necessarily affect the revenue for the balance of the year, and in our customs receipts there has been a development in the last couple of months that must likewise affect materially the year's results. I am convinced, therefore, that to arrive at a safe and reasonable estimate I must drop $850,000 from the $38,146,655, given above. In round numbers, therefore, our income to 30th June next will, I expect, reach $37,300,000. Let us deal now with the expenditure in a similar manner. Up to the 20th April, instant, we have expended $25,463,830.05. In the period from the 20th April to the 30th June, 1896, we expended $12,393,949.37. Summing these two up, we have the estimated expenditure to the 30th June next as $37,857,779.40; or say in round numbers, $37,850,000. I have just estimated the revenue to be $37,300,000; so that you will see, Mr. Speaker, that if I were to take these figures as being exact, we might expect to close the present year with a deficit of not a very large sum.

As I have already stated, the actual expenditure for the year 1895-96 was $36,949,142, or in round numbers $37,000,000; so that the anticipated result of this year's expenditure will be greater than that of last year by $850,000. Now, I think it will not be out of place at this point to state the reason for this increase. Taking the detailed services, I find the responsible increases to have taken place on: Interest on Public Debt, Legislation, Militia, Public Works and Post Office. What are the reasons for the increase in each of these services?

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend permit me. Do I understand him to say that he estimates the deficit to be $850,000?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No. If I were to accept the figures that I have given as exact, they would lead me to expect that we might reach the end of the year with a deficit of perhaps $500,000 or $600,000. I wish to say further, that that might be too sanguine a view, and I would not wish to be bound closely by it. I think we will have to make further allowance for the uncertainties of our trade during the two remaining months. I shall not be far astray if I say we will come out of the year with a deficit well within a million dollars, and I shall not be surprised if it does not exceed $600,000.

In the case of the Interest on Public Debt we had to discount additional treasury bills to the extent of $600,000, necessary to meet liabilities incurred previous to the present Ministry coming into power.

In Legislation, you will remember, we had an extra session of Parliament last August.

In Militia, owing to the undoubted desire on the part of the late Government to make a show of retrenchment, the usual militia camps for 1895-96 were omitted, making it all the more necessary in the following year that this important service should receive the more attention.

In Public Works, the appropriations were cut down below what was needed for works actually in progress, with the result that we have had to pay during the current year for work done in 1895-96.

In the case of the Post Office, a similar cause produces a similar effect. Accounts for 1895-96, for work done chargeable to that year, were held over and not paid until the present year.

This current fiscal year, Mr. Speaker, is the one in which we enter fully into possession of the legacies left us by our predecessors in office, and may I repeat what I have already stated on the floor of this House, in some observations which I had the privilege of addressing during the summer session. I then said:

It will not be until this fiscal year is completed, until we have paid the debts of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and entered upon a new year for which we shall prepare the Estimates ourselves and have full and complete control of them, that we shall be in a position to make comparisons.

My hon. friend who leads the Opposition declared in some remarks on the closing day of our summer session, that this country was face to face with a deficit in the first year of the present Ministry of not less than something like $3,000,000. I ventured to say to my hon. friend then, that I thought he was playing the part of an alarmist. Notwithstanding the legacies that have been left us by hon. gentlemen opposite we have been able to keep within their leader's estimate, and to go below it, to the extent of $2,500,000.

While on the subject of the current year's affairs, I may refer to the extent of our temporary indebtedness. On the first of July last treasury bills to the extent of £400,000 sterling were negotiated by our predecessors in office. These were renewed on the 1st of January last, and to meet the requirements of the country a further sum of £600,000 in treasury bills was issued; so that to-day our temporary loans amount to £1,000,000 sterling, maturing on the 1st of July. In the course of some remarks at the close of last session, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) who preceded me as Finance Minister, stated his belief that before this year was out I would have to borrow on the market at least $10,000,000 to make things square, and that the money so borrowed, would in the main, go, not for capital expenditure, but actually to meet our daily needs. The position of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) as an ex-Finance Minister entitled that prophecy to consideration, but I hope he will be pleased to know that he was very far astray. Instead of having to borrow as he anticipated $10,000,000 to meet current expenditure, he may be pleased to be assured, that all we have had to borrow is £600,000 sterling, and that that sum was necessary, not for one service only, but to put us in funds for all the charges against both capital and ordinary expenditure.

So far, Sir, I have dealt with the expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund. I now turn to the debt and capital expenditure of 1895-96 and 1896-97. The capital expenditure for 1895-96 was incurred under the following heads:—

Railways and Canals.....	$2,519,174 51
Public Works.....	114,825 58
Dominion Lands.....	82,184 15
Militia	1,000,000 00
Total.....	$3,716,184 24

We also paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, $68,669.49, and on railway subsidies, $834,745.49; making a total of altogether, $4,619,599.22.

To arrive at the increase in our debt for the year, we have to add the following items that affect the debt. Quebec railway subsidy, shown first as liability in 1895-96, $2,394,000; making a deficit for 1895-96 of $330,531. Then there are sundry amounts chargeable to consolidated fund amounting to $137,185.19; making in all, $7,481,335.72.

From this, however, we must deduct the expenditure for sinking fund, and a small refund of $542.52 on account of the Northwest rebellion expenditure, making $2,055,830.04. Taking this from the $7,481,335.72, above mentioned, we have $5,425,505.68, which represents our increase of debt for the year 1895-96, and that debt stood—that is the net debt—on the 30th June last stood, at $258,497,432.77.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend going to make any further explanation with reference to the Quebec debt of $2,394,000?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know that any explanation is called for. My recollection of the facts, is, that the amount was originally placed to the credit of the province of Quebec and they were entitled to draw the interest. It was granted to them, if my memory serves me, as practically a refund of railway subsidies, and I think there was much to be said in favour of treating it as a railway subsidy, and placing it in the Public Accounts along with other railway subsidies. Very possibly that was not the view, and at all events it was not done; but upon a subsequent occasion—the hon. member will perhaps remember the year—an Act was passed whereby the capital sum was placed to the credit of the province of Quebec, and that province was free to withdraw that capital sum whenever it so desired. If that was the fact, it properly became an obligation of the Dominion, and should have appeared in the debt account.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend will agree with me that that was not a liability which was incurred in 1895-96. In reality, it belongs to 1883-84. It is simply a change of book-keeping.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I quite agree that it is not a new liability. It is an old item, which I think my hon. friend should have included in the debt account some years ago.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a fair question for argument.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not wish to convey the idea that it is a new liability. It is, as the hon. gentleman says, a mere matter of book-keeping. If it was an obligation of the Dominion, I think it should have appeared in the debt account.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend will remember that a change took place under legislation which was passed the year before last, in this House and in the Quebec House, which was the only reason for making a change in book-keeping.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Passing to the current fiscal year, our expenditure for capital purposes, which up to the 20th April reached $2,823,078, will probably, by the end of June next, be in the neighbourhood of $3,425,000.

To arrive at the probable effect of the whole year's operations on the net debt, we will have to add to this the probable deficit, which may perhaps be placed as low as $550,000, though I hesitate to commit myself to an amount so low. But if we take that figure as correct, we would then have to charge against capital account $3,975,000. But as this includes the amount of our investments for sinking funds, which, while an expenditure on one hand, must be regarded on the other as an asset, we must deduct the estimated investments to the 30th of June, $2,214,000, leaving an anticipated net increase of the debt of, in round numbers, $1,750,000. In all the foregoing I have kept well within the limit of fair estimate, and any marked improvement in our revenue between this and the 30th of June next, will of course ameliorate to that extent my estimated deficit, and increase of debt.

Having, Sir, occupied so much time with the two preceding years, I now turn to the year 1897-98. With regard to the expenditure of 1897-98, my expectation is that while undoubtedly supplementary Estimates will be brought down, the savings in the Estimates—that is, unexpended balances which always arise owing to expenditures not being carried out as proposed, and to amounts being carried over by re-votes and otherwise—will be considerable. At this moment we are not, of course, in a position to state what the amount of our supplementary Estimates will be, but I hope they will not be large. If we take into account the savings to be made in the way I have indicated, I think they will nearly represent the outlay under the supplementary items; and it would not be far astray to estimate for the year an expenditure of about $38,250,000.

On the basis of the present tariff, and looking at the probable results of the present fiscal year, it would appear as if the revenue for 1897-98 would be in the neighbourhood of $37,500,000, which would on its face leave a deficit of $750,000. It is of course neither desirable nor desired that there should be any deficit. We have had deficits now for three years in succession, and we all agree that we should, if possible, avoid a continuation of such an unsatisfactory condition of affairs. Before I conclude, I will show what steps we propose to take to make up the additional sum required to meet the anticipated deficiency. Taking the capital expenditure for 1897-98 at $5,000,000, and deducting the expenditure for sinking fund investments of $2,300,000, it would appear that the results of the operations of the year 1897-98 would increase the net debt to the extent of about $2,700,000.

Before passing on to another subject, I may perhaps occupy the attention of the House for a few moments while I dwell upon the fact that the expenditure asked for next year, in comparison with the expenditure of the present year, appears to be beyond what would be supposed to be required. If hon. gentlemen will recollect, in the year 1895-96, the last year for which full returns have been issued, the expenditure was in round numbers $36,949,000. This diminished outlay was arrived at, I think I am justified in saying, by the postponement of necessary expenditures. As before pointed out, the militia camps were dispensed with, and bills of various departments were held over. The expenditure, therefore, of that year cannot at all be regarded as a normal expenditure. It will be recollected that in the Estimates that my hon. predecessor in office laid on the Table of this House during the first session of 1896, he asked for a service on consolidated fund account of $38,300,000; and, in addition to that, although it has been said that they were not settled upon by the Government and were not presented to the House, there were supplementary Estimates to be brought down, of which we have heard something in past debates. I know that my hon. friend has desired it to be understood that those Estimates had not received the sanction of the Government in all respects, and he has not been willing to be held responsible for them; but at all events he will, I am sure, admit that a considerable portion of those Estimates had become public property, inasmuch as hon. gentlemen who had the confidence of the Government thought proper to assure their friends in different parts of the Dominion that the expenditures contemplated under those Estimates were to be made. When we came into office, we found large estimates prepared in the departments, and we cannot suppose that they were prepared without any intention of their forming part of the expenditures of the year. If we add to the main estimate of $38,300,000 above given the probable amount that would have been asked for in supplementary Estimates for 1896-97, it will be found that the expenditure asked for by me next year, say $38,250,000, is much less than the probable sum that would have been asked for had hon. gentlemen opposite remained in power.

Mr. FOSTER. Rather speculative.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend says that is rather speculative, and he laughs at the idea that those supplementary Estimates represented expenditures. I regret that he does so, because he laughs at his friends who on every hustings throughout the Dominion represented that those expenditures were to be made; and, as many of those gentlemen are no longer here to meet him, I do not think he should laugh at them in this way to-day.
Mr. FIELDING.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having said so much in explanation of our financial position, it becomes my duty to turn my attention to what I am sure is a more interesting part of the subject; that is, the new tariff that we are about to submit. Before I proceed to speak of that tariff, I think it is well that we should reflect for a moment on the history of the present tariff, commonly called the National Policy.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a new version, I suppose.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend will find that it is not my habit to give new versions of things which are always the same. I cannot hope, Sir, to offer anything that is new on the subject, because I know it has been well threshed out in this House again and again by men abler than myself. But I do think that at a moment when we are about to turn away from the policy, which I regard as a mistaken policy, we shall do well to make some reference to the present policy and the circumstances under which it came into existence. I suppose it will not be questioned that at the time of the union of the provinces, one of the most serious obstacles which the promoters of that great movement encountered was the difficulty on the tariff question. The lower provinces were firm believers in the policy of free trade, as the words were understood; at all events, in favour of the policy of a low tariff. The upper provinces—Old Canada—had a tariff which the maritime people regarded as somewhat high, though I am bound to admit that, in comparison with tariffs of later years, it was very moderate. But I am sure the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who was intimately and prominently connected with the movement for confederation, will bear me out when I say that the tariff question was one of the great causes of difficulty in bringing about the union of the provinces. The hon. gentlemen who desired to promote that movement found it necessary to give to the people of the maritime provinces the most sacred and solemn assurance that if this union could be accomplished, the maritime provinces would not have to assume the burden and responsibility of a high tariff. True, you will not find that in the British North America Act, but I venture to say it was an unwritten treaty between the promoters of the union and their friends in the maritime provinces, and it is but fair to say that, in the beginning that treaty was observed. The first tariff of confederation was a moderate tariff, and although a year or two later it became necessary to change the duties somewhat in the interests of revenue, there was no substantial departure from the terms of what I have described as the unwritten treaty with the lower provinces. It was not indeed until 1876, or about that time, that the question of a high tariff gravely occupied the attention of this House. True, in 1870 or 1871 the question of protection had been mooted, and a policy of protection, as respects a limited list of articles, had been agreed upon temporarily, but that policy was abandoned in 1871, and from that time down to the moment at which the Government of the late Sir John Macdonald retired from office, no further movement was made in the direction of what was called a protective tariff. It was not until the Government of Sir John Macdonald had been defeated and Mr. Mackenzie was in power, it was not until a period of great depression had come upon the country—and not upon Canada alone but the world at large—it was not until there were conditions more calculated to make people anxious in Canada, as well as elsewhere, as to the business prospects of the country, that any serious movement took place in Canada for the establishment of a protective tariff. Now, it is well known that the manufacturers came to Mr. Mackenzie between 1874 and 1878, and proposed to him that he should increase the tariff. No doubt they thought that they were correct, no doubt they believed that prosperity would result from the adoption of a protective system, and, therefore, desired that Mr. Mackenzie should yield to their views. But we all know that Mr. Mackenzie refused to do so. Now, I believe that Sir John Macdonald was up to that time as good a free trader as Mr. Mackenzie. I have seen no evidence that he ever deliberately adopted the policy of protection with the intention of adhering to it as the fixed policy and principle of the Conservative party. On the contrary, I believe that he was tempted to yield to it for the moment by the clamour that was raised by the protectionists, and the belief that he might be returned to power. But if we refer back to the discussions of these days, we will find that in the resolutions submitted and the speeches made by Sir John Macdonald and his followers, the whole question of protection was treated in a very gingerly way indeed, and the resolutions for which the Conservative party voted at that time were resolutions which might mean almost anything. They were protectionist, it is true, but the platform was one which enabled a Minister of the Crown to go down to the maritime provinces and offer himself for election on it as the champion free trader. I mention this to show that the policy of protection was not deliberately adopted even by the Conservative party, but was the outgrowth of political difficulties in which the leaders of the Conservative party, I think erroneously, permitted themselves to be led away from the old faith; and I venture to say now that, in the light of history, many Conservatives of this country look back upon that departure with regret. Though they supported the National Policy believing it would be instrumental in developing the best interests of the country, they will admit to-day that it was a policy of disappointment, and that, in all probability, Canada would have prospered more if she had adhered to the policy of a low tariff.

I have pointed out that the Conservative party adopted the policy of protection at a time of considerable depression, when there was too much disposition, I am afraid, on the part of the people to take up any rostrum which seemed to give a promise of a better state of things. But we may well ask ourselves to-day what were the inducements that were held out to the people to accept that policy? I shall not detain the House by going through all the predictions which were made and the expectations which were created, but some of the things which occurred at that time may well be mentioned. One of the most important and one of the most common arguments used was that a protective tariff, though probably not a very good thing in itself as a permanent policy, might be a good policy to adopt temporarily. If you will give, they said, these infant industries protection, they will, in a very short time, become strong and vigorous and be able to stand alone without protection. Well, Mr. Speaker, we are able to deal with that argument to-day in the light of experience. We have had eighteen years of pretty high protection carried into effect under conditions as favourable as could be wished for in Canada, and what has been the result? These infant industries have grown bigger and their voice stronger, but their voice still cries out that if the nursing bottle be taken from them, they will immediately perish from the face of the earth. And so we find that the prediction made then that the policy of protection was only intended to encourage infant industries, and that for a very short time, has not been realized.

Then we had another strong temptation to adopt the National Policy. There was a very strong desire among the people for a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and hon. gentlemen opposite thought they could do nothing better than use the reciprocity cry to help them to make the National Policy acceptable. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) went down to the maritime provinces, where the idea of reciprocity was very agreeable to the people, and gave the electors there the assurance, with all the vigour we know he is capable of, that if they would accept the National Policy, in two years he would undertake to bring about reciprocity with the United States. On another occasion, later on, my hon. friend extended the time one year—he only wanted three years to bring about a reciprocity treaty. Well, we have had eighteen years of the National Policy and I am sure my hon. friend will not dissent when I say that in the last year of the Conservative term of office, they were farther away from reciprocity than they ever were during any previous year of their existence.

I think that the National Policy may very properly be tested to-day in the light of all these promises. But there was another promise made which was of greater importance. I think that the strongest argument used by my Conservative friends in advocating the National Policy was that it was going to increase the population of our country. I think that this test of population, which has so often been applied before, may well be applied for a few moments again, because I think the lesson is full of importance and cannot be applied too often. The policy which was inaugurated in 1879, and which had been previously known in 1870, for a short time, as the National Policy, told the people in very glowing terms what it would accomplish and lead to. It was to remove distress whether in agriculture or manufacturing,—and distress did exist, as had to be acknowledged, during the period that Mr. Mackenzie was in power—and it was to lead to great prosperity and the rapid up-building of the country. Immigrants were to flow in and employment was to be furnished for all. The present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said that this was the supreme test of prosperity:

If we are to have a country at all,— said he, as reported in the "Hansard" of 1877, page 167—

—it must be by bringing people into it. It is our policy to bring people into our country and to furnish employment for them when here, and that is the only policy by which Canada can hope to attain any position of importance in the world. We must have a large and extended immigration and give work to people when they come here.

Taking population as the test of prosperity, the results of the census of 1891, the last official figures to hand, were certainly disappointing. I have here the official figures. In the province of Ontario, in 1871 the population was 1,620,851. In 1881 it had increased to 1,926,922, an increase of 18·6 per cent. In 1891 the population had grown to 2,114,321, an increase of 9·73 per cent, as compared with 18·6 per cent in the previous ten years. In the province of Quebec the increase of population from 1871 to 1881 was 14 per cent, and from 1881 to 1891, 9·53 per cent. In the province of Nova Scotia the increase in the first period was 13·6 per cent, and in the second it was 2·23 per cent. In the province of New Brunswick, from 1871 to 1881, the population increased 12·4 per cent, and in the next ten years it increased 0 per cent. In the province of Manitoba the increase from 1871 to 1881, was, of course, very large, as this was in the early history of that province. The increase in those years was 247 per cent. In the next ten years the increase was 144 per cent. Of course, I do not think the same force would attach to this comparison, because the country having just been opened up, the rush of population would naturally be somewhat larger than afterwards. But I am sure that even in regard to Manitoba the census returns must have been sadly disappointing. The province of British Columbia increased in a larger degree from 1881 to 1891, than in the previous decade, the increase for the earlier period being 36·4 per cent, and for the later, 98·49 per cent, a large increase in that province, as we should acknowledge. In Prince Edward Island, the increase from 1871 to 1881 was 15·8 per cent, and from 1881 to 1891, it was 0·17 per cent. In the Territories the comparison is not given so closely, and I cannot give the percentages. The increase disclosed by the census of 1881 for the whole Dominion was 18·97 per cent, and by the count of 1891 it was 11·76 per cent, a decrease in progress of a little over 7 per cent. The growth of the country, therefore, in point of population was much slower under the National Policy than it was during the period before that policy was put in operation. Eliminating the new portions of the Dominion, and considering the provinces of old Canada, which include the whole population except about 400,000, the results are still more disappointing. According to the census figures that I have given the increase in these provinces was exceedingly small. In point of population the growth of the older provinces from 1871 till 1881 was more than three times as great as it was during the decade spent wholly under Conservative rule and wholly under a protective tariff. The population of the maritime provinces in 1871 was 767,000, and in 1881 it was 870,000, an increase of 103,000. In 1891 the population of those provinces was 880,000, an increase of only 10,000 people in ten years. At the rate of 2 per cent per annum, the natural increase of 870,000 persons would be 174,000, instead of the actual increase which we find. In other words, the increase for ten years in the maritime provinces was less than the natural increase for one year. The aggregate population of the three chief cities of the maritime provinces, Halifax, St. John and Charlottetown, in 1881, was 73,712. In 1891 it was 74,113, an increase of 400 souls in ten years. This National Policy was to do great things for the farmer. The number of farmers and farmer's sons engaged in farming, by the census of 1881, was 656,712, and, by the census of 1891, it was 649,506, a decrease of 7,206. The numbers increased in British Columbia and the North-west Territories, but the old provinces show a decrease in the number of farmers, during this ten year period under the National Policy, of 36,042. The decrease of farmers in Ontario was 2.5 per cent, in Quebec 4.6 per cent, in Nova Scotia 15.9 per cent, in New Brunswick 15.8 per cent and in Prince Edward Island 1.3 per cent. The rate of natural increase which can properly be credited to a country like Canada is about 2 per cent per annum, or 20 per cent in ten years. So, by adding one-fifth to the population of 1881, and by adding also the immigrants, we get the population that should have been found here in 1891. The natural increase on the whole population of 1881 is 865,000, and the number of immigrants officially certified as entering the country during the decennial period ending 1891, was 886,000, making a total increase of population of 1,751,000. But the actual increase found by the enumerators was only 509,429, thus showing a loss of 1,241,000. If the anticipations of the promoters of the National Policy had been realized our own people would have remained with us and all these immigrants as well. So that, estimating the loss of population as compared with the gain we would have had if predictions had been fulfilled—it might fairly be claimed that the natural increase of those who went away should also be taken into account, but even omitting this—that loss amounted to about one and a quarter millions of souls. The total foreign-born population in 1881 was 609,348, or 14.3 per cent of the total population. In 1891 the total was 645,507, a little less than 14 per cent, the increase in numbers being 36,159. The number of immigrants already stated as arriving in the country in the ten years from 1881 to 1891, was 886,000. So, the loss of immigrants was 850,000. These general results are borne out by the details. The census found fewer Irish and Scotch in Canada than ten years ago. The Scotch decreased by 8,000, and the Irish by 36,000. During the same period no less than 655,000 immigrants left Ireland and went to the United States. The immigration into Manitoba and the North-west from 1881 to 1890, both inclusive, numbered, according to the blue-books, 258,814. The population in 1881 was 118,706, which with the 258,814 of official immigrants, should have enabled the enumerators to find at least 377,520 residents in the Territories and Manitoba; all they did find was 254,164, a loss of over 122,000 settlers. As the Department of Agriculture reckoned each settler as having a value to the country of $1,000, there is a loss to the country of 122 millions, if we are to accept those figures. The following are some of the places in Ontario where there was not only a failure to retain the natural increase, but an actual decline in numbers: Cobourg, Goderich, Dundas, Bowmanville, Amherstburg, St. Catharines, Port Hope, Ingersoll, Napanee, Strathroy, Paris, Prescott, Whitby, Kincardine, Mitchell, Port Perry, Thorold, Dunville, Harriston and Fergus. Most of these had a steady growth from 1871 to 1881; and if the predictions of the National Policy had been even partially fulfilled, all these towns, among the most thriving in Ontario, would have prospered exceedingly and furnished a home market to the farmers that they were led to expect. Dundas was a prosperous manufacturing town, and increased by several hundreds up to 1881; but that growth was stopped and it declined in population until, in 1891, there was some two hundred less than in 1881. Now, I believe these census returns are of the utmost importance, and they are a proper subject of discussion, because it was claimed that the National Policy was to be the instrument whereby the population was to be increased, whereby our young people would be prevented from going away, whereby immigrants would be brought to the country; yet from these figures, which I have shown are official, I fail to see how any thoughtful man could doubt, from the moment those returns were published, that the National Policy had failed to accomplish its purpose. Prior to the publication of those returns, many intelligent people who had not given the subject serious consideration were no doubt convinced in their own minds, partly through party zeal and partly, I suppose, from reading the public press, that the National Policy was filling up the country; but when these census returns were brought down, then every thoughtful man in the country must have understood that the National Policy had been a very great failure, and indeed a bitter disappointment to every man who had honestly supported it. My hon. friend who leads the Opposition was High Commissioner in London at the time; and in his official report, in 1892, he felt obliged to make this sad statement:

Mr. FIELDING.

I need hardly say that the returns of the census in Canada were received here (in London) with a certain amount of disappointment, as it was quite expected that the population would exceed five millions. What effect this may have on immigration, I am not prepared at this moment to say.

I am afraid, Sir, that it had a very serious effect on immigration, because we know that the immigration returns for recent years have been far from satisfactory. I had a conversation recently on this subject, Mr. Speaker, with a very prominent member of the Conservative party, who is the head of one of the great manufacturing enterprises in Canada. I do not imagine for a moment that he was less loyal than he had been to his party; at all events, I knew him as a Conservative then, and I believe he is a Conservative still. But that gentleman, in discussing the subject, said to me : The returns of the census were to me a bitter disappointment. We cannot stand, he said, another census in Canada like that. If we should find as a result of the next census that there is no better showing, then, he said, I shall lose all faith in the future of Canada, and I shall have to look to some other country as a field for my capital and my enterprise. We hope and believe that by a change of policy the census returns of the present decade will not show such a bad result, and we hope and believe that when the second census is taken, and when we shall have an opportunity of comparing ten years of Conservative rule with ten years of Liberal rule, the results will not be such that any one of our leading Liberal manufacturers or capitalists will have to say that he is losing faith in the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the manner in which this tariff revision should be brought about, I want to read to you, not that it has any element of novelty, but because it properly fits in at this stage of my speech, the platform adopted by the Liberal party in the great convention held in the city of Ottawa in 1893 :

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare,—

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service ;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations ;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property ;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few ;

It has checked immigration ;

It has caused great loss of population ;

It has impeded commerce ;

It has discriminated against Great Britain ;

In these, and in many other ways, it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

Mr. FOSTER. Here endeth the second lesson.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There are some excellent lessons yet to come.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people ;

That to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government ;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote free trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States ;

We believe that the results of the protective system has grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties is now clearly defined.

The Government admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes ; but they say that such changes must be based on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the electors of Canada, in due course, gave their verdict upon that and upon other issues, and subject to such changes as changing circumstances may require, and as to which I shall have something to say as I proceed, we accept the Liberal platform of Ottawa as the declaration of principles which we are bound to follow in our tariff reform.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had just finished reading the Liberal platform adopted at the Ottawa convention, in which the party placed on record its desire for tariff reform. It has been a common complaint of our opponents that the policy of the Liberal party on the tariff and in the direction of tariff reform was a policy that was adverse to the interest of the manufacturing industries of the country. We have in times past protested against this view, and we still protest against it. We do not admit that a high protectionist tariff is necessary for the development of manufacturing industries in Canada. One would almost think from the manner in which this argument is so frequently used by our opponents that there were no manufacturing industries in Canada before the days of the National Policy. The fact, I think, is that while perhaps we had not so many large industries as we have to-day, we had on the whole a more healthy and satisfactory condition of manufacturing industry before the days of the high tariff than we have had since. That, Sir, I think has been the experience of many of the communities of Canada.

It is true that we have changed our methods of dealing with manufacturers, and the change, I think, has not been for the better. We developed manufacturing in the good old days in the good old-fashioned way. An honest workman opened his modest shop in a growing town. He made the things which the community wanted. He made honest goods and earned a reputation for the articles he produced. He had the good sense not to attempt to make things not suited for the market and which, with his limited equipment and the small area of the market, he knew it would be foolish to attempt to make, articles of a very advanced character. But he made the things which for the moment served the community, and as days rolled on the community grew and his shop grew with it. He enlarged the field of operations; his reputation for making honest goods at fair prices helped to build up his industry. By and by sons came to him and joined him in the factory, and their youth and energy enlarged the scope of its operations. The shop was enlarged; new machinery was introduced; more help was added, and so growing with the growth of the community, there were built up legitimate manufacturing industries in many parts of Canada. That was the development of manufactures in a legitimate way.

And now the times have changed. We have had another way of developing manufactures, and it will not be unprofitable for us if we look at what the results have been in many cases. The old fashion workman never dreamed of asking bonuses, exemptions, or favours or anything of that kind; he expected to pay his way like a man and to earn every cent he got. But now under the high tariff policy the first step in the direction of a new factory is to have the bonus hunter set out on his way. He expects to receive as a matter of course exemption from the taxation which every other citizen expects to pay as a matter of course. Not content with having an Act of Parliament to license him to charge high prices for his goods, he thinks the city, town or village must give him further help by way of a site for his factory or by some grant of that kind; and if perchance the people of the town shake their heads and do not think they should help him in that particular way, he will remind them that there are other towns quite ready to do so and he will intimate that if they do not grant the bonus, the rival town not far away will grant it. And so this system of protection, always selfish, always greedy, sets these two towns by the ears to bid against one another, to be rivals and jealous of each other, instead of cultivating those friendly relations which should exist. Then the factory is built in one town or the other. If it is fortunate enough to have a market for its products, if the business has not been overdone, undoubtedly for a short time this factory will prosper, and it will take advantage, I am sure, of the high tariff and charge the consumer every penny the law will permit. For a little while this will go on, and then we will reach the next stage of the protective movement; then we will reach the stage at which excessive competition comes, the competition which results from over-production at home. After a short struggle it will be discovered that his factory, heralded with such a flourish of trumpets, can no longer find work for its people or a market for its goods; so the factory closes up, and the workmen in whose interest we were told the National Policy was framed may go abroad and find work as best they can. Has not that been the history of many a National Policy factory in Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then we pass on and reach the next stage, which inevitably follows the stage of over-production. Then the big manufacturer comes in and buys up the little factory for a song. The stockholders, many of whom are generally people of small means, have to suffer the loss of their investment, and the factory, then in the sheriff's hands, passes into the hands of some wealthy manufacturer, who will be willing to pay therefor in order that he may control the market with the products of his larger factory. We have had that development, and all over Canada we have had complaints of that condition of affairs, which was referred to in the Liberal platform as the "development of monopolies, trusts and combines."

I submit that the development of the olden times, if it was slow, was a more wholesome development, and that there is a better chance for the development of manufacturing enterprises in the end under a moderate tariff than there is in the end under the high tariff policy. The big fish will eat up the little ones. Under the National Policy the small manufacturers were driven to the wall; the large ones may hold on for a while, but even for them in most instances the end comes, because the whole business rests on an artificial basis. I say, therefore, that the manufacturing interests of Canada should not be misled by the cry that they are identified necessarily with the success of a high tariff policy, and I believe many a manufacturer has now made up his mind that it would be better for him if we had a very moderate revenue tariff than the artificial condition brought about by the National Policy.

Let us remember, Sir, that the protectionist had more than the advantage of the rate of duty imposed on the articles he manufactured. Nature is to a certain extent a protectionist, because she has placed advantages in the way of the home manufacturer. In the first place, he has the advantage of what I may call convenience. It is more convenient to buy things at home than to send abroad for them, and other things being equal, any one in Canada would prefer to buy them at home. Then he has the advantage which I will call the protection of transportation. It costs not only time but money to bring things from abroad, and when you consider freight, insurance and other expenditures connected with the handling of goods, that particular element affords a large measure of protection for the manufacturer of the country. There is another advantage, which I will describe as the protection of patriotism, a desire which ought to exist, and I hope if it does not exist now, it will soon among Canadian people, and it is to encourage home industry in every legitimate manner. I do not forget that at several tariff hearings we were informed by gentlemen who came before us urging the retention of a higher tariff, that one of the great difficulties under which they laboured was that the people of Canada would not buy Canadian goods, that the people of Canada had prejudices against Canadian goods and actually preferred to buy foreign articles. I hope, Sir, it is not true. I am unwilling to believe that it is true, but I give it to the House as I received it on the testimony of the protected manufacturers of this country who came before our tariff commission. Well, Sir, if that has been the result of the National Policy, I can hardly imagine a more severe arraignment of that policy. If after eighteen years of encouraging manufactures by all the methods that were known to the ingenious Finance Ministers of the Conservative Government; if after eighteen years of boasting that this was indeed the golden era of Canadian patriotism; if we have to recognize it as a fact that the people of Canada to-day have no faith in Canadian goods and have a prejudice against them, and actually prefer the goods of foreign nations, then I say, it is a startling result to the National Policy. It is just possible that if the people could not be induced to buy Canadian goods under a high tariff policy, perhaps we may induce them to buy Canadian goods under a policy which looks to moving in the direction of a lower tariff. I feel that we have every reason to hope that that would be the result of any changes that we are able to make. In other matters we have found in this House, that coercion failed where conciliation succeeded, and if you have not been able to make the Canadian people buy Canadian goods by Acts of Parliament designed to compel them, let us try some other way. Let us admit a little of the free air of competition into the manufacturing industries of our country. Let us make the manufacturers feel that they should sell their products to the people of Canada, not because there is a law on the Statute-book to oblige the people to buy them, but because the articles themselves are good, and because they will stand on their merits irrespective of any National Policy.

I feel therefore, Sir, that we can say to the manufacturers of the country, that they have much to hope for from a reform of the tariff which will move in the direction of lower taxation. If upon these advantages to which I have referred, if you take the protection, as you may call it, a protection of convenience; if you take the protection of transportation which is considerable, and if you take that protection which I think the people ought to give—the protection of the patriotism which would make them desire to buy Canadian goods; and if on top of all that you put a moderate revenue tariff, in which nearly always there is a considerable measure of incidental protection, I say, that by all these means you have given the manufacturer of Canada a fair chance to live, and there is no reason why he should not live and prosper and flourish under such conditions.

Now, Sir, the question arises as to how far we shall be able to apply at once, or at an early day, these principles of tariff reform which we have in the past declared we wished to carry out. We have heard it stated at times, that we should immediately undertake to bring in a radical free trade tariff. It is but fair to say that we generally hear that observation, not from free traders, not from friends of the Liberal party, but from hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House, who are not supposed to be free traders, and who are not supposed to be friends of the Liberal party. However, these gentlemen kindly undertake to tell us, that in view of this, that and the other thing, it is our duty to bring down at once a tariff based upon free trade.

No man who ever spoke in the name of the Liberal party of Canada, ever announced that we were going at one step to adopt the principles of free trade to that extent. We never found in the old motherland, when they had to deal with the same question, that they at once came down to the basis of the low taxation which they reached in later years. But, Sir, we have an opportunity of calling some witnesses on this point. I well remember that immediately after the last elections in 1896, the London "Times" in a very able article on this question, pointed out that it was unreasonable to suppose, and that nobody should suppose, that the result of the Canadian elections must of necessity lead to the immediate adoption of a free trade policy. After some observations on the subject, the "Times" spoke as follows:—

The present generation has grown up to manhood under a protective system. The conditions of any other system are unknown, and Mr. Laurier's Administration will do much, if, by cautious and tentative beginnings, it can bring about an intelligent reconsideration of much that has been taken for granted. If Mr. Laurier's accession to power means anything, it means that in so far as experiment is possible, the way will be prepared for a change in the fiscal system of Canada, when such a change shall have become demonstrably profitable to the community.

The "Times" is supposed to be a tolerably firm believer in the principles of English free trade as intelligently applied to any colonial condition. But I may quote another English writer who is even more marked as an exponent of free trade principles. I allude to Lord Farrer, whose free trade views will hardly be questioned by any one. In a recent pamphlet Lord Farrer says :

The colonies must, for some time at any rate, raise revenue by duties, and these duties can hardly fail to be, to some extent, protective.

Again, no reasonable free trader wishes to see a system of protection which has been in force for years, and under which industries of various kinds have grown up, abolished at a single blow. Such a step would be both unjust and unwise.

What free traders desire is a much more moderate and safer course.

They wish to see the colonies abandon protection as a theory, and gradually reduce the most obnoxious of their present protective duties. This would probably, by increasing importation itself, increase revenue, and make further reductions possible. Gradually the colonies would thus approach, and ultimately attain, the state of things which obtains in the United Kingdom, without undue sacrifice of revenue, and without injustice to existing interests. But it is out of the question to do this except cautiously and by degrees, as indeed it was done in this country. This is what we may hope for under the new regime in Canada.

These views have a practical bearing on the question of how far we may go in the direction of tariff reform. I have sometimes heard the expression used, that the manufacturers had vested rights in these matters. I wish to protest against such an expression. No manufacturer has any vested right under the National Policy. Every man who invested a dollar under the National Policy did so with his eyes wide open to certain important facts. He was well aware that from the beginning down to the end, the National Policy was condemned by one of the great political parties in Canada. He was well aware that every effort had to be put forth by governmental influence, and such influences as the manufacturers themselves are well aware of, in order to obtain from the public an apparent endorsement of that policy. I would be justified in saying that at no time from the beginning of this question to the present day, has there ever been a substantial majority of the people of Canada, looking at the question on its merits, who believed in the principle of high protection. Accidental circumstances doubtless brought about the election of a majority of members who supported that policy, but at all events I can say, that from the beginning of the discussion to the end, the Liberal party of Canada—always a great party, nearly always one-half the people, and in more recent days very much more than one-half the people—placed themselves upon record as condemning the principles of the National Policy.

Now, the manufacturers knew of this, and they must have known that when they put their money into these factories they were taking their risks. There was a speculative element in this whole National Policy business, and the men who play the game and gather in the winnings ought to be prepared, when the turn of the tide comes, to pay the losses and try to look pleasant. Therefore, I say, if it suited the people of Canada, as represented by this Parliament and by this Government, to strike out of the fiscal policy of Canada to-day every vestige of protection, the protective interests would have no right to complain. They had taken their risk, and they should be prepared to abide the consequences. But, Sir, while that would be stern justice, unfortunately there is no disposition on the part of this Government to destroy—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Scoundrels great and scoundrels small.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friends opposite are in such an amiable frame of mind that they venture to applaud before I have finished the sentence. They are very happy in being able to anticipate what we think. I say there is no disposition on the part of this Government to deal with the manufacturing and protected classes in that spirit, although I do submit that if it suited the view of the majority of the people of Canada to adopt a policy which would simply reverse the principle of protection and establish free trade, while it might be and would be a dangerous thing if done at once, so far as the protected interests are concerned, they would have no right whatever to complain. But, Sir, we are dealing with more than the protected interests of the manufacturers. The evil of protection, like most other evils, is wide-reaching in its influences, and it has become so blended and interwoven with the business of Canada that if we should attempt to strike it down to-day, we should do harm not only to the protected interests, which have no claim upon us, but to other interests which are not directly connected with the protected interests. It would be folly not to remember that we are dealing not with the protected manufacturers only, but that the interests of labour have to be considered as well as the interests of capital. We have to remember that the trade of the country is so permeated by this system that, in the matter of banking alone, there are vast interests associated with this question. I hesitate not to say that if we should to-day, by some rash step, do that which some hon. gentlemen say we are bound to do, but which intelligent men know we are not bound to do, and would not do, we would not only break down the manufacturing interests of the country, but we would deal a blow to other interests of a wider and more serious character.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, come to the point—you make us tired.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McMILLAN. Do not let this moment of weakness put you into such a rage.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If I were quite clear as to what point my hon. friend wishes me to come to at once, I am not sure that I would not be pleased to gratify him. However, I wish to say, and to emphasize the fact, that it has never been the policy of the Liberal party, as declared by any member of the Liberal party occupying a responsible position, if they came into power, to destroy at one movement all the manufacturing industries, or to so change the policy as to place them in peril. We are willing to be tried by the policy of the Liberal party as plainly understood, but we are not willing to be tried by the Liberal policy as expounded by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Now, Sir, I have referred to-day to certain conditions which have altered, and I wish to speak briefly of these. The convention of the Liberal party was held in the city of Ottawa in the month of June, 1893. At that time we had every reason to believe that the people of the neighbouring republic had resolved to enter upon a more liberal trade policy. A few months before that date a presidential election had taken place in the United States, in which the issue of tariff reform was prominent; and, whatever may be said of the matter in view of later events, in the light of that day it did seem clear that the people of the United States had resolved to enter upon a policy of tariff reform. The Democratic party, which had just entered upon power, were at that very time engaged in propounding their policy of tariff reform. We thought the moment was opportune for us to place on record in the clearest and most emphatic way our desire, as representing a great party in Canada, to carry out a policy of tariff reform, and particularly to extend, if possible, our trade relations with the neighbouring republic, if they were disposed to reciprocate. There was more than the action of the Democratic party to encourage us in the belief that something could be done in that direction. Before that time the Republican party, who were in power, pledged as they were in the main to a high protective policy, had qualified their adhesion to reciprocity treaties; and we had reason to believe, and did believe, that even with the Republican party in power it would be possible to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States if steps were taken in a proper way to secure such a treaty. However that may be, we were disposed to believe that the day was close at hand when more friendly relations would be established between the people of the great republic to the south of us and the people of Canada. Unhappily, Sir, the present indications are that the American people—if we may judge by the action of their House of Representatives—have changed their minds on that question. If we may take the expression of that House as being a fair exposition of the views of the American people, speaking not with reference to any particular article of the tariff, but speaking generally, the people of the United States appear now disposed to adhere to the policy of protection.

I believe that some of us in Canada make the mistake of imagining that our neighbours frame their tariff chiefly with reference to how Canada will act and what effect it will have on Canada. It may be very flattering to Canada to think that; but I rather think that they frame their tariff with reference to the world at large, and that a very moderate part of their attention is directed to what is taking place in Canada. Though I believe that some parts of the Dingley Bill were made to suit the interests of certain people who feared Canadian competition, I do not think we ought to assume that it is simply a measure of hostility towards the people of Canada. I think it only fair to mention that leading public men in the United States have intimated to men on this side of the line that while the Republican party feel bound to uphold the Dingley Bill, they do not of necessity mean to refuse to enter into improved trade relations with Canada. On the contrary, it has been urged that that is part of their policy, and they point to the fact that when the late Mr. Blaine was in power, though a high protectionist, he was disposed to negotiate reciprocity treaties with any countries which were disposed to deal with the United States. But while I think there is some ground for hoping for an improvement in our trade relations with the United States, we cannot but recognize the fact that the Dingley Bill, whatever the motive of it may have been, and I do not question the motive, will undoubtedly, if it becomes law—which seems highly probable, although I think it will be amended in some particulars—affect the trade relations between Canada and the United States to a very considerable degree. In view of that, we feel that we are justified in stopping to think what would be the effect of our policy if to-day, while on the eve of negotiations on the subject of reciprocity—if our American friends are willing to negotiate—we should, in advance of such negotiations, reduce our tariff down to low figures. I believe that there is nothing inconsistent with sound free trade principles in a Government endeavouring, in dealing with a neighbour, to hold in its hands whatever levers it may possess in the negotiations; and I say so to-day, not in the spirit of retaliation, because I say, Sir, that we ought not to retaliate upon the United States in the way some people advocate. There are men, well meaning men, in Canada—Liberals, some of them, let us admit—who say that we should meet the Dingley Bill on the principle of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and a dollar for a dollar. Such is the demand of many men in Canada to-day, but we submit it would not be wise to adopt that policy. We submit that it is a wiser policy to wait and see what shall be the outcome of the present uncertainty in the United States in relation to their trade policy and of the negotiations which we are willing to enter into with respect to reciprocity. We submit that pending such negotiations and pending the settlement of the American tariff question and a clear understanding of what will be the effect which their policy may have upon the affairs of Canada, it is the part of prudence that we should to-day hold our hands and not extend to that country the measure of tariff reform which we would be anxious to extend if they would meet us on liberal lines.

But there are those who say that if we do not care to deal with the tariff in its relations with the United States to-day, we ought not to disturb our existing tariff at all. I have heard it argued that what we should do is to let our own tariff stand as it is to-day. I cannot subscribe to that doctrine. The Liberal party has pledged itself to give tariff reform, and the country expects the Liberal party to fulfil that pledge. And if the events across the border have taken such a course as to justify us in withholding action in relation to our trade with that country, that is no reason why we should not proceed to deal with tariff reform in its relation to those countries which are prepared to deal with us. We are prepared to declare to this House and the world, that we will trade with those people, whoever they may be, who are willing to trade with us. We do it as individuals with our neighbours; we would buy from the neighbour who is willing to buy from us. What is a nation but a combination of many thousand individuals? And if an individual would be justified in dealing with the neighbour who wants to trade with him, why should not the nation be justified in adopting the same principle? We recognize the fact that if the Dingley Bill becomes law, it will have some effect on our trade. We do not complain of it; we have no right to complain of it. The American people have an undoubted right to frame their tariff policy with a single eye to their own interests, and we must recognize that without murmur; but they are an intelligent people, and intelligent enough to recognize the fact that if they have the right to frame their policy with a single eye to their own interests, we have the right to frame our policy with a single eye to what we believe to be our interests. Therefore, while we say to our American brethren that we will not yield to this spirit of retaliation which is in the air, and for which there is, perhaps, very considerable justification, while we are not willing to put up the barbed wire fence which already exists three or four strands higher, there is no particular reason why we should take it down to-day. This leads to the conclusion that we must be prepared to deal with this question from the point of view of having one tariff for the countries which are willing to trade with us and a different tariff for the countries which are not. So far as our tariff has relation to those countries which have no particular desire to trade with us, we recognize that there are in it some items of sufficient importance to justify us in making reductions, not to please foreign countries, but to please ourselves. There are things we want to buy from foreign countries, and our desire to obtain these things on fair and reasonable terms is paramount to every other consideration in dealing with the tariff question. But with the exception of these articles to which I shall refer as I proceed, I have to tell the House that it is not the intention of the Government—speaking of the question generally, and not with reference to any particular article—to propose any great reduction in the tariff as applied to those countries which are not disposed to trade with us. We propose, therefore, to have a general tariff, and that general tariff will be, to a large extent, the tariff of to-day—but the tariff of to-day freed from some of its enormities, freed from some of the injustices of which the people complain, freed from many of the specific duties, freed from the conflicts, annoyances and irritation which have created war between the importer and the customs authorities—the tariff of to-day, in that sense, but not the tariff of to-day exactly, for if you remove from it all the evils I speak of, it is certainly not the tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite favour. We propose to adopt a general tariff, and then we propose to adopt a special tariff having reference to the countries which are desirous of trading with us; and as a matter of course, not by the express words of the resolution, but by the condition of affairs which exists, that preferential tariff gives preference, above all others, to the products of Great Britain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having thus stated the guiding principles in the matter, I propose to invite your attention to the general tariff; and in doing so, I wish it to be distinctly understood that, as I have already explained, the duties are considerably higher than we intend they shall be, as applied to countries which are willing to trade with us. And if, as I read the items, hon. gentlemen think that the rate upon any of them is too high, I beg them to believe that before I close I shall have something to say which will show that in respect of our relations with Great Britain and in respect of our relations with any other country that is willing to meet us on equal terms, we shall be prepared to offer a measure of tariff reform of the most substantial character which is not contained in this tariff which I am going to read. With these observations, I now beg to invite your attention to the rates of duty in the general tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I take the liberty of asking my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) if he will kindly repeat the last sentence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid I have almost forgotten it myself. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would state the point—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The point was as to the mode in which the hon. gentleman intended to have the tariff, which, I understand, he is about to state to the House modified by some subsequent—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I thank the hon. gentleman for reminding me. I stated that the tariff that I am about to read to you is the general tariff, but that before I conclude, I shall be prepared to make a statement in relation to a special tariff that will apply to Great Britain and any other country which is prepared to accept the conditions that that tariff imposes. Let me say, Sir, that the classification of goods that we have in this tariff does not materially differ from the form of the tariff which is now in force, that is to say, where the late Government gathered goods into one class for convenience, we have thought it well, generally speaking, to follow that method of grouping. There is an advantage perhaps, and perhaps some disadvantage also, in having a very elaborate tariff. Undoubtedly, if one were beginning from the beginning, he would make a tariff that would be much simpler than the present one. As one of our newspaper writers very happily said, a man who undertakes to remodel a house will not find it so easy and satisfactory a job as if he had the opportunity to build from the foundation. We have to adapt ourselves to our conditions. I think it would be an advantage in one way to have fewer items in the tariff. But the evil of multiplicity of items is not so great if you can avoid a multiplicity of rates; and we hope that on investigation of our tariff it will appear that we have, to a certain extent, removed this difficulty by gathering a number of items of a like character and bringing them under one rate. Probably there is room for improvement in this direction, but we hope something has been done to make the tariff more convenient and more simple. The first item is :

Mr. FIELDING.

Ale, beer and porter, when imported in casks or otherwise than in bottles, 16 cents per gallon.

The duty on this remains unchanged. And I think I should say that, if I am not to weary the House with details, I will only mention those duties that have been changed. There are no changes until we come to the duty on spirits, which are increased by 15 cents a gallon—I would remind hon. members that I am dealing with the customs duties now.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will have to read the items to get them in "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE—

Ale, beer and porter, when imported in bottles (six quart, or 12 pint bottles to be held to contain one gallon), 24 cents per gallon.

Cider, not clarified or refined, five cents per gallon.

Cider, clarified or refined, 10 cents per gallon.

Lime juice and fruit juices, fortified with or containing not more than twenty-five per cent of proof spirits, 60 cents per gallon; and when containing more than 25 per cent of proof spirits, $2 per gallon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where there are changes I take it the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) will mention the fact.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is an increase in the spirit duties all along the line of 15 cents per gallon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I spoke generally to suggest that the hon. gentleman should mention when changes occur.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Very good. I am in the judgment of the House, but it seems to me that if I am to read all the items, even when no changes occur—

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman might mention the item by number and tell whether there is a change or not. Has the hon. gentleman the numbers there, as in the present tariff?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not exactly; the numbers will not quite correspond, and in some cases the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would not get much help from the reading of the number.

Lime juice and other fruit syrups and fruit juices, n.o.p., 20 per cent ad valorem.

Spirituous or alcoholic liquors distilled from any material, or containing or compounded from or with distilled spirits of any kind or any mixture thereof with water—

The item reads substantially as in the present tariff, and the duty is $2.40 per gallon, instead of $2.25 as at present.

Spirits and strong waters of any kind, section B of this item, $2.40 per gallon and 30 per cent instead of $2.25 and 30 per cent.

Alcoholic perfumes remain the same, 50 per cent when in bottles or flasks, containing not more than four oz., and when in bottles and flasks containing more than four oz., $2.40 per gallon and 40 per cent, instead of $2.25 per gallon and 40 per cent as at present.

Nitrous ether, sweet spirits of nitre and aromatic spirits of ammonia, $2.40 per gallon and 30 per cent, instead of $2.25 per gallon and 30 per cent, as at present.

Vermouth containing not more than 30 per cent, and ginger wine containing not more than 26 per cent of proof spirits, 90 cents per gallon, instead of 80 cents per gallon, and if containing more than these percentages, $2.40 per gallon, instead of $2.25.

Medicines or medicated wines containing not more than 40 per cent of proof spirits, $1.50 per gallon.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a new item ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Wines of all kinds except sparkling wines &c., remain the same as at present.

Champagne and wines generally remain unchanged.

Mr. FOSTER. Tax the poor man's whisky.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend's sympathy for the poor man on account of his whisky is, of course, exceedingly interesting. The next section relates to animals, agricultural and animal products. This class of products are imported largely from the United States, and we think that pending negotiations for freer trade relations with that country, we should leave these items largely unchanged. There are, however, a few exceptions to that.

In the case of corn, we place it on the free list, except for the purpose of distillers.

Flour is reduced from 75 cents to 60 cents per barrel, and wheat from 15 cents per bushel to 12 cents per bushel.

Corn meal, 25 cents per barrel instead of 40 cents. We propose to abolish the regulation which permits the grinding of corn in bond for so-called human food. That system has been the cause of very considerable complaint. It has been represented to us that it is almost impossible for gentlemen engaged in the milling industry to subscribe to the affidavit which they are required to take in order to obtain the necessary rebate. By the law as they now stand, they are supposed to pay duty on the corn, and then, upon evidence, or upon affidavit, that they ground the corn for use as human food, they are entitled to have a rebate of 99 per cent of their duty. It is alleged that when a miller has sold corn for human food, he is not in a position to follow it through the country and guarantee that it is always used for human food. The same thing has occurred with regard to seed corn. Seed corn was admitted free, and it is alleged that that privilege has also been abused. We simplify the matter by putting corn on the free list except in the case of corn for the purpose of distillation which, under regulations to be made by the Government, is still to pay the same duty of 7½ cents. There is also one other item in that large class to which I ought to refer. At present the duty on uncleaned rice is three-tenths of a cent per pound, and 1¼ cents per pound on cleaned rice. It is the duty on the cleaned rice which affects the price in Canada ; our people do not eat uncleaned rice. We make no change in the duty on the cleaned rice, but we do make a change in the duty on the raw material. We say that instead of receiving the raw material at three-tenths of a cent, they should pay ¾ of a cent. The fact is that while the duty on cleaned rice remains the same, although the price will not be increased to the consumer, the manufacturer will have to pay a larger price for his raw material, and that increase will go into the public treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. But you do not cheapen the food.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, we cheapen a good many things in this tariff, but we have to have a little regard for the revenue in order to meet the obligations of my predecessor. We pass on to the class of articles known as fish and fish products ; and as these remain substantially the same, I will not detain the House by reading them.

Illuminating oil, brings us to the item of coal oil. There is no item in the tariff which has been more discussed in the House. I think there is a very strong desire in the House to have a very considerable reduction made in this item, and it has been our desire to grant a reduction. We are free to say that in view of the representations made that we are not disposed, or do not feel warranted in going in that direction so far as we would like to do. We reduce the duty on coal oil one cent. Crude petroleum for fuel which is now 3 cents will be 2½ cents. Barrels containing petroleum remain at the same rate 20 per cent. We propose to make another change, which is especially sought by the trade, and that is to abolish the restrictions that now exist in regard to sale from tank vessels. If the trade desire to use tank vessels, there is no reason why dealers should not be permitted to do so. Lubricating oils remain unchanged, at 20 per cent. Olive oil, now 30 per cent, is reduced to 20 per cent.

In regard to bituminous coal, we do not propose at this stage of the tariff measure to make any reductions in the duties on coal. Reference was made some time ago in this House to certain observations I made in Montreal in replying to a deputation representing the coal interest. It was regarded by many hon. members in this House sitting opposite as an exceptional course to adopt that I should, in anticipation of the Budget, make a statement on that subject, not exactly a statement perhaps as to the amount of duty to be imposed, but a statement sufficiently plain to indicate the lines on which we would proceed. I do not require to enter fully into the circumstances under which I made that statement. I quite realized at the moment that I must submit to some misunderstanding prevailing as to my action, but we feel assured that the wisdom of the policy pursued by the Government will be in due course vindicated before the House. I believe it was in the interest of all concerned that certain doubts and misunderstandings which existed at Washington in regard to the position of Canada on the coal question should be removed.

An hon. MEMBER. Particularly Mr. Whitney.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I believe that statement served a useful purpose in removing doubts and misunderstandings.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I must say that I am surprised the hon. leader of the Opposition should have the courage to mention Nova Scotia. I was disposed to be exceedingly good, nice and gracious in the matter, and never mention the words. Now that the hon. gentleman has called attention to the subject, I suppose it will be in order to say that something happened in Nova Scotia two or three days ago. The hon. gentleman is not so proud of Nova Scotia as he used to be in the old days. But so far as the interruption imputes that my remarks in Montreal were made with any regard to Nova Scotia elections, or after any communication had with the Nova Scotia Government, I have already stated, and if it is important I will repeat it, that there is no foundation whatever for any statement of that kind. However that may be, I believe and the Government believe that a good purpose was served not only as regards the interests of the Dominion but in regard to all interests by having that statement made in Montreal in anticipation of the Budget speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And the Nova Scotia elections, which had been postponed for the purpose.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Nova Scotia elections, we are told by the hon. gentleman were postponed for a purpose. I do not know the source of his information. I think the hon. gentleman does not know the people of Nova Scotia so well as he imagines he does; but one thing is certain, that Nova Scotia knows a good deal about the hon. gentleman, and voted accordingly. I was about to say, Sir, that the purpose for which my statement was made was a purpose having in view the best interests of the Dominion, as time will show.

Mr. FIELDING.

I believe that American public men are at this moment reconsidering their action in regard to the duty on coal, and whatever they may do in relation to their general policy, there is reasonable probability that they will reconsider their action on this point. I have strong hope, amounting to expectation, that in the end they will reduce the duty proposed in the Dingley Bill to 40 cents per ton, which is the duty in the American tariff to-day. I stated in Montreal, and I repeat now, that it is the desire of the Government to reduce the duty on coal. I stated at that time that if the American Government would leave the duty at 40 cents per ton, instead of increasing it to 75 cents as proposed in the Dingley Bill, our Government were prepared to meet them on that line and reduce our duty to meet their duty. I repeat that statement now. I have strong hopes that the Americans will eventually settle their duty at 40 cents per ton. If placed at 40 cents, I undertake to move that our duty be made 40 cents per ton, and I have strong expectations that this will be the end of the matter. But I think in the interest of the coal trade of the Dominion we should not act to-day on the assumption that the change will be made, and so, having clearly and distinctly stated that we are ready to reduce our duty to 40 cents if the American duty remains at that figure, we propose to defer action and see what they are going to do about it. I quite realize the possibility that the Americans will not be in a position to deal with the question, or at all events may not deal with it, before our tariff Bill goes through the House. If that should prove to be the fact, we would be prepared to come down to the House and make a further statement in relation to the coal duties.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to ask why, on the same principle, the hon. gentleman does not maintain the duty on corn, so as to hold it as a set-off later to balance the duty on barley?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot argue that question; there is good and sufficient reason for pursuing a different policy.

Mr. WALLACE. I understood the Minister of Finance to announce that he proposed to reduce the duty on olive oil from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. A large quantity of it, however, is at present free.

Mr. FOSTER. The item at present reads 30 per cent for olive oil prepared for salad purposes, all other olive oil is free. Is the same wording used in regard to the proposed duty of 20 per cent.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The item is n.e.s. 20 per cent instead of 30.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend reads it that way he will add 20 per cent to the duty because olive oil n.e.s. is free.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think my hon. friend is mistaken because such is not our intention. It has been represented to us with regard to cement that the barrels of cement are not always equal in weight, and that it is better to have the duty at so much per hundred pounds. We have therefore placed the duty at 12½ cents per 100 pounds.

My hon. friend the Controller of Customs has offered to read for me, and if the House has no objection he will do so.

Mr. FOSTER. None at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman's colleague takes up the consideration of these items, would he allow me to ask him, whether I understand, that in case the American tariff should be retained at 75 cents on coal as passed by the House of Representatives, that the hon. the Finance Minister intends to carry out his declaration at Montreal, not only to retain the present duty of 60 cents on bituminous coal but to impose a duty on anthracite as well.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has possibly not correctly understood the declaration at Montreal. However, without debating that, I will answer his question: that under these circumstances it would be the intention of the Government to carry out my declaration at Montreal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And impose a duty on anthracite coal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And impose a duty on anthracite coal.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. At the request of my hon. friend I will continue reading.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the hon. gentleman passes away from these items would he kindly say what the 12½ cents per 100 pounds on cement would amount to on a barrel?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The barrels vary in weight and if a barrel contained 325 pounds it would be something about 40 cents. The hon. gentleman can figure that out for himself.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. the Controller knows there has been considerable dispute about the barrels.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. In the new item it is provided that whether the cement comes in bags or in barrels, the packages shall be included in the weight for duty.

With regard to the iron duties, I regret that my hon. friend—who you can imagine has had a very great deal of work lately, and whose strength has almost given out to-night—is not able to explain these changes as he would have done it much better than

I can. But, in short, I may say that the policy of the Government is this. They have felt that pig-iron, wrought-iron and scrap-iron, being the base of so many important manufactures in the country, it was desirable, in the interest not only of the manufacturers, but of the consuming public, that there should be some reduction in the duties. Though iron comes from our friends across the border, we have made the reductions in our own interest, and not to promote any interest of theirs. While we have thought that our duty as a Government and as prudent business men, required us to lower those duties which will give relief from a heavy burden to many of our manufacturers, at the same time, in order that the industries engaged in the business of manufacturing iron may be enabled to go on, we offer them, not what they had before, but we propose in a measure to compensate for the withdrawal of the share of protection involved in the high duties, by giving them somewhat larger bounties than they had before.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Hon. gentlemen are somewhat amused at that, but I cannot help that. I have simply told you the truth.

We combine items 286 and 227 the first of which was at 22½ per cent and the other at 30 per cent, and make a uniform duty of 30 per cent. This includes builder's hardware, cabinet makers, upholsterers, carriage hardwares, including butts, hinges, locks, curry combs or curry cards, horse boots, harness and saddlery, n.e.s. This is one of those items several of which we have arranged, that will make the work at the Custom-house very much simpler than it has hitherto been, and I trust will remove a great deal of friction that has existed among so many varied and different rates on articles which might be interpreted by one custom's appraiser to come under one head, and by another to come under another head.

Item 277 of the old tariff bore a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, while item 345 bore 35 per cent. I may say that many of the articles enumerated in this list caused great difficulty in the matter of appraising and it has been represented that different appraisements took place at different ports, which, any gentleman can understand is a most undesirable thing. We think we are warranted in combining those two classes which the judgment of the House heretofore thought should be divided, one bearing 25 per cent and the other 35 per cent duties. We combine them to effect the great purpose we have and we make a uniform duty of 30 per cent. This item includes, generally, cutlery, including carver knives, and forks of steel, butcher and table steels, oyster, bread, kitchen, cook's, butchers, shoe, farrier, putty, hacking, and glazier's knives, cigar knives, spatulas, or palette knives, razors, erasers or office knives, pen, pocket, pruning, sportsman and hunter's knives, manicure files, scissors, trimmer's, barber's, tailor's, and lamp-shears, horse, and toilet clippers, and all like cutlery, plated or not, n.o.p. For additional simplification we provide that if any of the articles are imported in cases or cabinet, the cases or cabinets shall be dutiable at the same rate as their contents. In many cases it was found that a merchant would pay one rate of duty on what was in the case and another rate of duty on the case itself. We thought it better to have a uniform rate of 30 per cent.

In item 283 there is a considerable reduction. It comprises axes, scythes, sickles, reaping hooks, hay and straw knives, hoes, wringers, forks, post diggers and other agricultural implements. These are implements used upon the farm, and have been hitherto at 35 per cent; we have reduced them to 25 per cent. Item 357 was electric light carbons, or carbon points of all kinds, the duty on which was 2.50 specific per 1,000; we have abolished this specific duty and established an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. Then we have an item which might be considered a new item. There are some very large carbons that are being used now by miners and others, and there is a very important industry, having a rapid development, in our country. It was difficult under the old tariff to determine what the rate of duty should be. I think they have come largely into use since the tariff was framed. Recognizing that, therefore, we have taken them from the list of electric light carbons, and on all carbons over six inches in circumference, and with a view to the use which is made of them, we have reduced the duty 15 per cent ad valorem.

We combine tariff items 401 and 402, which reads "cotton fabrics, white or gray, bleached or unbleached." Item 401 under the old law was dutiable at 22½ per cent and item 402 was 25 per cent, and we make them both dutiable at 25 per cent.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear, legalized robbery.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Speaker, I take the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite as an indication that I read that item in a sufficiently loud tone to be heard by them. It is perhaps well to bear in mind what effect will be had upon that article when another schedule is brought before the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which I suppose they will be delighted to hear read after the cheers which they have given. Here is item 403. I may as well prepare the hon. gentlemen opposite to be ready for another cheer. This item reads cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, which under the old tariff was 30 per cent, is now 35 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Hon. gentlemen opposite will also bear in mind that a future announcement will have an important bearing on that article.

Items 424 and 425, which were dutiable at 25 per cent, are now made uniform and put at 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an increase.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, but we must have revenue from something, and we are trying to get it in as fair a way as we can in the interests of the country. Tariff items in the old tariff 414 and 408 are combined. One was 30 per cent ad valorem and the other 32½ per cent ad valorem, and we make them both 35 per cent ad valorem. I might explain, as the hon. gentleman will readily see, that this has been done as in many other cases, for the purpose of simplifying the tariff very much, and regard is also had to the fact that they are articles upon which it was thought, taking them generally, they might bear a duty.

Item 413, jeans, sateens and coutiles, was 25 per cent, and is now 30 per cent. Items 404 and 405 have been combined. They were under specific and ad valorem duties, which were very high, and which would run probably up to 50 or 60 per cent, and we have reduced them to an ad valorem basis. We have given them the highest rate of duty, I think, that we maintain in the tariff, and we have them at a uniform rate of 35 per cent ad valorem.

The next item to which I invite the attention of hon. members is the old tariff item 437: "Yarns, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat or other like animal, costing 20 cents per pound and under, 5 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem." We have for reasons which we thought good and in the interest of the country reduced that duty to 15 per cent ad valorem. I suppose the combined duties before would probably amount to over 30 per cent. The reasons for this change will no doubt be given when the item comes up for discussion. I think, however, that this is a reduction in which a very large number of manufacturers in this country are concerned; and if there are some whose interests are different, we have placed in the free list an article on which I think they will receive some compensating advantages for this reduction, which I frankly admit is a large cut, but which has been made in the interest both of the manufacturers of the country and the consuming public.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have to express my thanks to my hon. colleague (Mr. Paterson) for having so kindly relieved me and to the House for having permitted him to continue the reading of the tariff, and thus relieve me from what would otherwise have been a very great burden, and I shall take up the list where my hon. friend left off.

In item 420, of the old tariff which relates to binder twine I have an announcement to make which, I am sure, will be received with satisfaction by the House. We propose that binder twine, which is now 12½ per cent shall be immediately reduced to 10 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friends had better not laugh too quickly; he laughs best who laughs last. The duty on binder twine is reduced from 12½ per cent to 10 per cent at once, and dating from the 1st of January, 1898, binder twine shall be on the free list, and all the articles entering into the manufacture of binder twine shall also be placed on the free list for the purposes of manufacturing.

I come now to the items of sugars, syrups, and molasses, and in that connection I may associate tea. In dealing with a large class of the items to which I referred in a general way, I made no mention of tea. There is a 10 per cent discrimination in tea with regard to importations not being direct. That 10 per cent remains. I know there has been a popular idea that the Government would have to impose a duty on tea. Well, I have the pleasure of announcing that we do not propose to do so.

With regard to sugar, I find also that the same general idea prevails in the minds of certain people, who know all about the Government's policy, that there was to be a high duty on sugar. The duty on raw sugar now, used for refining purposes, is ½ cent per pound, and on the refined it is $1.14 per 100 pounds, the difference being 64 cents per 100 pounds. We propose that the duty on raw sugar shall remain as it is to-day because the revenue is derived from raw sugar. That means that we shall get the same amount of revenue. But the price to the consumer is regulated by the duty on the refined article, and that is to-day $1.14 for 100 pounds. We propose to reduce that $1 per 100 pounds, so that the duty shall hereafter stand at 50 cents per 100 pounds for the raw sugar and 50 cents additional for the protection, if you care to use that word, to the refiner, as against 64 cents in the present tariff. By this step we do not take a dollar from the public revenue, but we give to the people cheaper sugar to the extent of $400,000 per annum. The duty on glucose or grape sugar, item 393 of the old tariff, is now 1¼ cents per pound. Representations were made to us that satisfied us that that duty was an excessive one. We propose to reduce the duty on glucose to ¾ cents per pound. It may be mentioned that the manufacturer of glucose will get some compensation in the form of free corn. The duty on sugar candy, now ½ cent per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem, we propose to make 35 per cent ad valorem. Item 463 of the present tariff, cigars and cigarettes, the weight of cigarettes to include the weight of the paper covering has now a duty of $2 per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. We increase the rate of duty on cigarettes to $3 per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. The duty on cut tobacco, item 464 of the old tariff, is 45 cents per pound and 12½ per cent ad valorem. We increase that duty to 50 cents per pound with 12½ per cent, an increase of 5 cents a pound. Manufactured tobacco, n.e.s., and snuff, item 465 of the old tariff, the old duty is 35 cents per pound and 12½ per cent. We make it 45 cents and 12½ per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. What increase does the hon. Minister expect to get from that change?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I shall be glad to present to the hon. gentleman in a little while a general statement of expected revenue, so I trust he will excuse me if I do not mention that item now. I shall not detain the House by giving the free list. It will be enough to say, in general terms, that we do not make any material change, except for the purpose of placing certain things on the free list to which reference has been made. Speaking generally, and subject to correction, the free list remains the same. Unenumerated articles, as in the present tariff, will stand at 20 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask the hon. gentleman what he has done with item 320 of the old tariff: "Corset clasps, spoon clasps, or busks." &c.?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think my hon. friend will find that is included with others.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Items 320 and 321 were cut out altogether. The articles named in them will take their rating among the different classes of goods to which they belong.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The usual provisions are made with regard to classes of prohibited goods. I am sure the House will be glad to have me deal with the question put to me at an earlier stage by the hon. leader of the Opposition as to the method by which we propose to establish a different tariff for those countries that are disposed to deal with us.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Would the hon. Finance Minister say if he leaves the free list exactly as it is now?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not exactly.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There are certain items on the free list providing that where goods are imported by manufacturers they shall come in free; but if imported by a merchant to sell to a manufacturer duty must be paid. I think this is class legislation that should not be allowed to exist in any country. The smaller manufacturer is placed at a disadvantage—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). If I am not in order, I will not continue. The small manufacturer who is not able to import these goods may buy them from a merchant who imports them, and so he has to pay the duty, while the large manufacturer who can afford to import the goods in large quantities—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I am simply putting a question in shape for the hon. Minister to give an answer—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The large manufacturer can import these goods free while the smaller manufacturer must pay the duty.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I asked the hon. Minister if he would answer the question, and he said that he would.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I sympathize to a considerable extent with the feeling of the hon. gentleman as to the embarrassment that arises from having a duty so arranged that an article comes in at one rate for one purpose and at another rate, or perhaps free, for another purpose. I will only say that I think in some cases it will be found we have removed these anomalies; but I frankly confess that a number of them remain as we did not find ourselves with sufficient time to deal with them as we would desire. I think a time we are reducing the duty on manufactured goods, and thus, perhaps, giving the manufacturer an anxious time, is not the best time to take away from him any privileges he had in the way of concessions on his raw material. So we are disposed to allow these things to remain at present, though I confess I do not like them any better than my hon. friend (Mr. Wood, Hamilton) does.

Mr. DUGAS. Did I understand the hon. Minister to say there was a duty on raw leaf tobacco?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think that, so far, no mention has been made of that, but I may have occasion to mention it before I sit down. I propose now to read one of a series of resolutions dealing with the particular subject of the reciprocal tariff. Of course a number of the resolutions are of a purely formal character, and I shall not detain the House with them; but one or two are of special importance, and one is of paramount importance, as follows:—

Mr. FIELDING.

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom may then be imported direct into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor General in Council.

That the Controller of Customs may make such regulations as are necessary for carrying out the intentions of the two preceding sections.

We propose to mention the articles on which we do not propose to grant the special concession, and that all the other articles not being so enumerated, should be entitled to the benefit of that concession. Our proposal is that as respects all the articles not excepted in the way I have just mentioned, there should be a reduction, not all at once, but in two steps, one part of the reduction taking effect instantly, and the second part taking effect a year later; and with these two steps we propose there should be a reduction of one-fourth as respects the duties upon all articles imported from Great Britain, or from any other country which will deal favourably with us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. From the statement of the hon. gentleman, I do not quite understand what he means by "dealing favourably with us." It appears to me very important that we should understand what the hon. gentleman means.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps the resolution which I had the privilege of reading my hon. friend did not catch as fully as I desired. It reads as follows:—

That when the Customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole—

I wish to emphasize that, because we may find that they admit our products at one point on favourable terms and that at another point on terms which we may regard as unfavourable. They might admit one article at a fair rate, and some other article at a high rate. Therefore we want to average the thing and say that if their tariff is favourable to us on the whole, then we propose to regard them as coming under this privilege.

—are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

I hope I have answered my hon. friend.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose it is owing to my obtuseness, but I do not yet understand the hon. gentleman. As I understand him, suppose a country receives the products of Canada upon the same terms as it receives the products of the United States and Germany, is that country regarded as receiving the products of Canada upon the same favourable terms as the reduction that the hon. gentleman proposes will be extended to it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The question will be whether, on the whole, the terms are as favourable as we ourselves offer in our reciprocal tariff. Now, I beg, with your permission, to read the terms of schedule "D" referred to in the enacting clause:

On all the products of countries entitled to the benefits of this reciprocal tariff under the provisions of section—

Left blank. The number will have to be filled in corresponding to section 15:

—the duties mentioned in Schedule "A" should be reduced as follows:—On and after the 23rd day of April, 1897, and until the 30th day of June, 1898, inclusive, the reduction shall, in every case be one-eighth of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A," and the duty to be levied, collected and paid shall be seven-eighths of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A." On and after the 1st of July, 1898, the reduction shall in every case be one-fourth of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A," and the duty to be levied, collected and paid shall be three-quarters of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A"; provided, however, that these reductions shall not apply to any of the following articles, but such articles shall in all cases be subject to the duties mentioned in Schedule "A," namely; ales, beers, wines and liquor, sugar, molasses and syrups of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane or beet root; tobacco, cigars and cigarettes.

These are items which are large producers of revenue, and we think it is not desirable that there should be two rates of duty as respects these articles. With the exception of these articles mentioned, and they are very few, this preferential rate should apply to all the products of Great Britain and to all the products of any other country which is willing to put itself on the same terms as Great Britain, or on terms which will be regarded by the Government of Canada as coming within the privilege designed by this resolution. I have another resolution that I desire to read. The Liberal platform from which I read an extract to-night, declared that a protective tariff had fostered monopolies, trusts and combines. These combines, I am afraid, have not wholly been destroyed, I think there are some of them in Canada now; and I propose to give them a certain notice that they may govern themselves accordingly. Therefore, we propose a resolution which we hope will be useful. I know how difficult it is to reach the combines. I know how ingenious they are, and there is the barest possibility that they will be able to climb over this resolution. But that is no reason why we should not make an effort to deal with what is regarded as a great evil in the community. I propose this resolution:

That whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that as respects any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association, or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of such article, or the dealers therein, or any portion of them, to enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, and that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article when imported, then the Governor in Council shall place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it, as to give to the public the benefits of reasonable competition in such articles.

Perhaps, Sir, before I go further, I ought to say something to the House in answer to the suggestions of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) as to the amount of duty to be gained or lost by these changes. I have to confess frankly that it has not been found possible to make a very elaborate calculation on that point; it is difficult to make a calculation of what amount of duty will be lost or gained under the scheme which I have the honour to submit to the House. As respects a few items, we believe that the reductions made in the duty will undoubtedly involve some loss of revenue; as respects the tariff generally, with the exception of these few items, we think that, while the reductions will be very considerable and of great value to the people, they will be balanced to a large extent, if not altogether, by the expansion of trade which we believe will follow the adoption of this policy. It is not to be assumed that because the duties are reduced therefore, the revenue will be reduced. On the contrary, it is quite conceivable that by a policy of reduction of duty you may increase your revenue; in like manner, it is conceivable that by a policy of increasing your duties, you may not increase your revenue to the extent that you anticipate. Speaking generally, our expectation is that upon a large number of the items, in fact, upon the tariff generally, with the exception of a few items the reductions will amount to a very considerable sum to the consumer; but there will be such an expansion of trade that practically there will be no loss of revenue. But that would not be true of all the items. There are a few items on which, undoubtedly, we shall lose revenue, and perhaps in the statement I make I shall omit to mention something which ought to be considered, because I have frankly to tell the House that the matter is one in which it is somewhat difficult to be precise. I think, however, that in the matter of iron, owing to the large reduction which we make, for example the reduction on pig iron from $4 to $2.50 in our general tariff, with a further reduction of one-eighth of that duty, and later on another eighth under the Reciprocal Tariff, there will undoubtedly be, in the beginning at all events, some loss of revenue. Making a rough estimate on that matter, I candidly admit it is only a rough one, I think we may lose on the item of iron $217,000. I think perhaps on the item of woollens we may lose $275,000; on cottons something like $66,000. On the item of corn we will lose about $207,000, less the amount which will be paid by the distillers, which I estimate to be in round numbers, $60,000. Deducting $60,000 from $207,000, the net loss will be $147,000. If we add these to the items already mentioned with respect to iron, woollens and cottons, we have a gross loss of about $700,000. I do not profess to offer this to the House as a very correct statement, I admit it is difficult to estimate, and we have to do it very broadly and with great doubt as to how it may turn out; but I think we will not be far astray when we say that for the first year we may lose on these items about $700,000.

We will gain something by the policy we propose, and I will refer to the resolutions I have to propose with respect to the excise duties. The duty at present imposed by the excise law on spirits is $1.70 per proof gallon. We propose to increase that to $1.90 per proof gallon. I know there is a desire on the part of some hon. members to still further increase the duty on spirits. It is naturally an article to which a Finance Minister turns in his desire to obtain revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. Takes to drink.

The FINANCE MINISTER. Some Finance Ministers do; as for myself I drink water. But every hon. member who has had any experience of public affairs knows that you may push your spirit duties to a point where you will not get increased revenue, or at all events you will get it at a high cost. I am free to confess that we are rapidly approaching that point in Canada. I do not suppose that we can place the duties much higher than we propose at the present time. If it is considered expedient to still further increase the duties, the experience of other countries leaves ample room for doubt as to whether by increasing the duties you will increase the revenue. I do not profess to give any absolute judgment on the point, but there is some doubt in my mind whether we would derive any increased revenue from the spirit duties if we increased them materially above what we propose. Some branches may be found on which increased duties may be levied, and if such is the case, some Finance Minister will call it into operation.

We propose to reduce the duty on vinegar from 6 cents to 4 cents per gallon, but at the same time we impose a duty of 4 cents per proof gallon on acetic acid. Those industries have come into conflict, and the manufacturers of vinegar and acetic acid do not agree. I have reason to believe that on the whole this will be measurably satisfactory to all as a fair compromise. It is also proposed that the Government may exempt acetic acid when used for mechanical purposes.

From the imposition of an excise duty on foreign raw leaf tobacco, we get an important item of revenue, as I shall proceed to show, and at the same time we confer considerable advantage on the growers of tobacco in Canada. How far it is possible for our growers to displace foreign leaf was much disputed before the tariff commission; but if the Canadian producer can as a result of this duty get some advantage, we see no reason why he should not have the same opportunity afforded him as has been afforded to other industries. Our main purpose is to get revenue, but at the same time there is no objection to the growers of tobacco in Canada receiving advantage from this resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. How much duty do you expect to receive from this increased duty on raw leaf?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. From raw leaf tobacco we expect to receive the comfortable sum of nearly $1,000,000. We expect to get from increased excise duties on spirits, $509,000, increased excise duty on cigarettes, $100,000, and from increased customs duties on spirits, tobacco and cigars about $173,000. If we should realize our expectations on all these items, and of course there is a probability that the effect of the increased duties may be to diminish consumption—if we would get our full estimate of the amount from increased duties on spirits, cigars and tobacco, the sum will reach $1,700,000. Of course I quite realize that we may not collect this sum, because it is well known that with increase of duties the difficulties of collection become greater. I have also stated that we shall lose about $700,000 through reductions in iron, woollens and other goods. I have mentioned in the earlier portion of my speech that if we were continuing the old tariff, we would need about $750,000 more than it would provide. So if we take three-quarters of a million, which we might probably need in that regard, and $700,000 we may need—perhaps that is a large estimate—to make up the loss we will sustain from the reduction of the duties—we will come out about even. The bounty on iron is also to be taken into consideration, and may vary the figures a little. It has already been stated that we are making very material reductions in the duties on iron. The iron industry was not specially favoured in the original National Policy. At all events in later years we know that hon. gentlemen opposite felt they were justified in entering on a policy for the special development of the iron industry, and in doing so they granted bounties on iron and steel billets, as well as raising the duty to a very high point.

We have reduced the duty and we propose now to make up to some extent, for a short time, the loss to the industry by increasing the bounty. How far it was a wise policy to undertake the development of the iron industry in Canada in the way the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) attempted, in the face of many difficulties, and in the light of our experience—how far that was a wise policy may well admit of argument. But, it is not worth our while to argue it to-day. We know that large sums have been invested in this industry. We know that large iron industries exist in the country, and while we may not approve of the policy under which they are established, we have no desire to see them snuffed out now. As in dealing with all other industries, we have shown a very large measure of consideration, so we desire to show fair consideration to the iron industry. Therefore, we say, if it is in the interests of the people of Canada that there shall be a reduction in the duty on iron we are prepared to accept the responsibility of advising that the bounties on iron should be increased for a term of years in order that this industry may have a fair chance for existence.

We have substituted a bounty on the steel ingot for the bounty on the billet, and I am inclined to think that will be more satisfactory to all concerned. We propose the following resolution:—

1. That it is expedient to repeal Chapter Nine of Fifty seven fifty eight Victoria, being: "An Act to provide for the payment of bounties on iron and steel manufactured from Canadian ore" and all regulations thereunder made by Order of the Governor in Council.

2. That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may authorize the payment of the following bounties on steel ingots, puddled iron bars and pig iron made in Canada, that is to say:

On steel ingots manufactured from ingredients of which not less than fifty per cent of the weight thereof consists of pig iron made in Canada, a bounty of three dollars per ton;

On puddled iron bars manufactured from pig iron made in Canada, a bounty of three dollars per ton;

On pig iron manufactured from ore, a bounty of three dollars per ton on the proportion produced from Canadian ore, and two dollars per ton on the proportion produced from foreign ore;

3. That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may make regulations in relation to the bounties hereinbefore mentioned in order to carry out the intention of these resolutions.

4. That it is expedient to provide that the said bounties shall only be applicable to steel ingots, puddled iron bars and pig iron made in Canada prior to the twenty-third day of April, 1902.

5. That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing bounties shall be payable only on iron and steel for consumption in Canada, and that the Governor General in Council may, at any time by proclamation, impose export duties on such iron and steel if the same shall be exported from Canada; such duties to be not greater than the amount of the bounty payable on such iron and steel.

Perhaps I may say in that connection that those who have no knowledge of the subject may too hastily assume that iron can be satisfactorily made in Canada from Canadian ore. It is not a peculiarity of the iron trade here, but it is known in the iron business generally, that it is found advantageous to blend different kinds of ore, and, therefore, the Canadian producer of iron would not be able to make iron of a satisfactory character if he were compelled to use only the Canadian ore. We recognized that fact, and propose to pay this bounty with due regard to the proportion of the Canadian ore which they may use. We give them the bounty for a term of five years from this date.

There is another provision. We always regard the action of a foreign country which grants bounties on products shipped to Canada in competition with our industries, as a somewhat unfriendly action. We believe that a bounty fed article is improperly brought into competition with our products, and we accordingly feel aggrieved. Now we are willing to pay a bounty on iron manufactured in Canada for consumption in Canada, but we have no idea of paying the manufacturers of pig iron or other iron a bounty to enable them to supply the world with cheap iron. Therefore, we say that the bounty shall be applied to iron produced in Canada for consumption in the Dominion, and if this iron is shipped beyond the Dominion we have the right to impose an export duty upon it equal to the bounty paid by the Government of Canada.

I think, Sir, I have now presented to the House all the resolutions which are of importance, although there are a number of others that are of such a formal character that I shall not deem it necessary to read them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question, as the subject is a very important one. In granting the advantages which he has stated he proposed to grant to goods imported from the United Kingdom, how does he propose to get over the Belgian and German treaties which actually prohibit Canada from discriminating in favour of Great Britain against either Belgium or Germany, or any of the countries that have most-favoured-nation treatment?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman. That is a subject which I had next on my notes, and I was about to speak upon it. This question of the favoured-nation clause in Imperial treaties has been more than once before this House. There are very many of these treaties but I think as respects the majority of them no question need arise. It will, I believe, be admitted that in most cases the terms of those treaties will not interfere with our liberty of action. Any question that may arise must come as respects the Belgian treaty of 1862 or the treaty with the German Zollverein of 1865. Both of these treaties do seem to provide, that it shall not be the privilege of any colony to admit the products of Great Britain into its market without extending similar privileges to all countries having the favoured-nation clause.

How far we ought to acknowledge that as a principle that could be properly applied to a self-governing colony like Canada, might well be a question for consideration; but, Sir, I am not disposed to raise that question to-day. I wish to draw attention to the fact, that there is an important distinction between the policy which seems to be forbidden by the Belgian and German treaties, and the policy which I have the honour to submit to the House. By the Belgian and German treaties, any colony would be forbidden to make a preferential agreement with Great Britain alone. We do not by our resolutions offer anything to Great Britain alone. We recognize the fact that Great Britain by her liberal policy is in a position to avail herself of this offer immediately, but we make our offer not to Great Britain only, but to every nation which is prepared to accept it. We make it to every country which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

Now, I shall not undertake to pass any judgment upon this very important question of the most-favoured-nation clauses of these Imperial treaties. It is an international question, and it is well that we should reserve our final judgment upon it. We recognize that it is a question upon which we shall ultimately have to consult with Her Majesty's Government, and I need not say that any view that may be taken by Her Majesty's Government will be considered by the Government of Canada with the respect that is due to any representation that might be made upon any subject, but above all, on a question of an international character. I say that it does not seem fair and reasonable that we should be obliged, while we are offering certain terms, not to Great Britain only but to all countries which will place themselves in the same position—it does not seem to be fair and reasonable that we should be obliged to extend the privileges of this schedule, which we call a reciprocal tariff, to nations which are not willing to do anything in return.

I admit there may be difficulties in the way. It may be possible that the view we take of this matter is not the correct view, but we say it is only fair and reasonable in the interests of Canada, in the interest of fair trade between ourselves and Great Britain, that we should to-day take the position, that the favoured-nation clauses do not apply; and that this resolution which I put upon the Table of the House will only extend to such countries as are prepared to give admission to our products under fair terms.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) to the fact that the treaty is not made between Canada and other countries. The treaty is made between Great Britain, Belgium and Germany, and applies to all countries that have most-favoured-nation treatment with England. The express terms of one of those treaties, at all events, is that England will not permit any higher rate of duty to be charged upon articles coming from those countries than is charged upon like articles coming from Great Britain herself. If I am correct in my reading of the treaties, the proposal of the hon. gentleman is entirely delusive, and will have no effect whatever.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have to thank my hon. friend for the information that Canada has not made these treaties. I thought, of course, that we all understood that Canada does not make treaties directly but does so only through Her Majesty's Government; and therefore there is not very much information in what my hon. friend has said on that point. What I understand, subject to the ultimate judgment of men who know more than I do—I do not speak as an oracle—with regard to the Belgian and German treaties, is that Great Britain will not allow any colony to offer concessions to Great Britain without at the same time offering them to those countries.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nothing of the kind.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. While my hon. friend is willing to settle that question in that airy way which is so delightful—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The treaty speaks for itself in express terms.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even if it does, the world moves, and possibly the step we are taking to-night may have the effect—and that may be one of the advantages of it—of drawing the attention of Her Majesty's Government and of the English public to the position of those treaties, and thus opening up the question. Meantime, Sir, recognizing the difficulties, recognizing the possibility that our judgment may be mistaken, and recognizing the obligations we may owe as part of the Empire, we intend for the present to take the view that inasmuch as we offer these conditions to other nations, if they do not see fit to accept them, the responsibility rests upon them and not upon Canada.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he has taken any steps in his Budget to provide for an export duty on logs or on pulp-wood ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is well aware, and the House is well aware, that numerous representations have been made to the Government on this question of export duties, as applied not merely to logs, but to a number of other articles. It is a large question and one which we believe should be approached with great consideration and deliberation. We are not prepared to-day to declare our final judgment on that question. In the tariff which I submit to the House, we do not propose an export duty on any article, except on iron which has received a bounty. We do not think it would be prudent at this moment to take the step which the hon. gentleman's question suggests. At the same time, we reserve our judgment on that point, and the matter may come up again at a later stage of the session.

We have of late read and heard expressions of opinion that the trade of the country has been very much upset, not so much by uncertainty as to the nature of the tariff, as by the delay in the announcement of it ; and while there seems to be some hesitation in the extension of trade at the time our fiscal system is under review, yet I cannot regard the existence of this period of suspense as wholly hurtful. Warehouses which have been over-full will be drained of their stocks, long credits and over-drafts will be considerably reduced, and in the end business will be established on a firmer basis ; and once the details of the tariff are announced, trade will not only seek its accustomed channels, but will flow in increased volume. Throughout the whole Dominion the prospects look encouraging. In Manitoba and the North-west Territories, in consequence of better harvest and better prices for grain, the cloud that has been overhanging for some time seems to be lifting, and with the removal of restrictions and a better administration by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), I look forward to that country going rapidly ahead. Further west, our distant province of British Columbia is experiencing an impetus from the development of her rich mineral deposits. In the older provinces there is the promise of a prosperous year, and, as I have said, business is only waiting for the details of the tariff to be announced, to resume its accustomed channels in increased volume.

In conclusion, permit me to sum up the chief points of the policy which I submit to this House. The Liberal party, in its platform at the Ottawa convention, declared itself to be in favour of a reduction of the tariff. That pledge we have fulfilled to-day by substantial reductions in our general tariff, and still further by the large reductions made in our reciprocal tariff. The Ottawa platform pledged the Liberal party to endeavour to bring about the desired reform with the least possible disturbance of business, and with no injustice to any class. That pledge we have fulfilled to-night by placing on the Table of the House a tariff which in its every line shows that the Government have approached the subject with the utmost consideration, and with a desire to disturb in the least possible degree the various business interests of the Dominion. The Ottawa platform pledged us to have particular regard for a reduction of duties on British goods, and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) moved in this House a resolution affirming that policy. We have fulfilled that pledge to-night in the most ample manner. The Ottawa platform pledged the Liberal party to use all honourable efforts to bring about better trade relations with the United States. We have already taken the first step in that direction by commissioning two Ministers of this Government to visit Washington and make known the fact—if it was necessary to make it known—that Canada is willing to negotiate with our American neighbours for a fair and reasonable reciprocity treaty. If our American friends wish to make a treaty with us, we are willing to meet them and treat on fair and equitable terms. If it shall not please them to do that, we shall in one way regret the fact, but shall nevertheless go on our way rejoicing, and find other markets to build up the prosperity of Canada independent of the American people.

We present to this House a tariff which has the advantage of being simpler than the one that now exists, and I feel assured that it will to a considerable extent reduce that friction which has so long existed between the merchants of the country and the Custom-houses. We submit a tariff which largely abandons the specific duties that have been so unjust to the poorer classes. We submit a tariff in which the large free list is practically not disturbed, but has large additions made to it. We give to the country the great boon of free corn, which will have an important effect on the development of our farming interests, and particularly the dairying interest, to which we must look in a very large degree for the prosperity of our farmers and the increase of our exports. We give to the country a reduction of the duty on coal oil, and the removal of burdensome restrictions respecting the sale of coal oil. We give to the farmer his fence wire at a low rate of duty for the present year, and place it on the free list from the 1st of January next. We give him his binder twine on the same terms—a lower rate of duty for the present, and free binder twine from the 1st day of January next. We give the medical and dental professions a boon, which the younger and less wealthy members of the profession will appreciate, when we put all surgical and dental instruments on the free list. We recognize the great mining industry of the country by placing on the free list all machinery exclusively used in mining enterprises. We do not confine it to mining machinery made in Canada, but we say it is more important to develop the mining interests of Canada than even to make a few machines in Canada, and so we put mining machinery exclusively used for the purposes of mining enterprises on the free list. We give the people the benefit of reduction on breadstuffs, flour, wheat and cornmeal. We give the manufacturers the benefit of cheaper iron, and much complaint has been made by them in the past of the burdens imposed upon them by the iron duty. We revise the duties on rice in such a manner that they will not add a cent to the cost to the consumer, yet they will add materially to the public revenue. We give the people a reduction almost all along the line. We provide the necessary revenue to meet the great needs of the country by increased taxes on articles of luxury, such as spirits, tobacco and cigars, and without any increased taxation on the necessaries of life. If hon. gentlemen opposite have ever had the free breakfast table they talk about, we make it freer to-day by reducing the duty on the sugar that goes on the breakfast table from $1.14 per 100 pounds to $1, which is a material reduction. And last, but not least, we give to the people the benefits of preferential trade with the mother country. This question of preferential trade has been mentioned in the House in times past. Leading public men have advocated preferential trade, but always annexing to their suggestions a demand with which it was well known England could not comply. All the advocates of preferential trade, at all events all who have taken an active part in that movement, have assumed that, as the first step, England must consent to put a duty on corn. We know that England does not view that project with favour. We know that no more unpopular project can be offered the English people than to ask them to put a duty on breadstuffs. It may be, as time rolls on, and at an early day, they may change their views. It may be that they may see it in their interest to make this distinction, and they may offer some preferential rate to the grain of Canada. If they can be induced to do that by fair argument, I have no doubt it will be a good thing for Canada. But why should we wait for England to take action? England has dealt generously with us in the past. England has given us a larger degree of liberty perhaps than is possessed by any other country on the face of the earth. She has given us liberty to tax her wares even when she admits our goods free, and we have taxed them to an enormous degree. Why should we wait for England to do more? Somebody must make a move in this matter, and we propose that Canada shall lead the way. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says that our project of freer trade with England is a delusive one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is it delusive. When I place these resolutions on the Table of this House to-night, they go into effect, and I speak with pride, in the name of the Liberal party, and the hon. gentlemen around me will share that pride, when I say that to-morrow morning, at every custom-house in Canada from ocean to ocean, the doors will open on terms of preferential trade with the mother country. I cannot doubt that this tariff will commend itself to this House and country, and when this policy shall have passed its various stages, when it shall have passed into law, then the members of the Parliament of Canada may feel that, in this glorious year of jubilee, they have made a noble contribution to that splendid parliamentary record which Tennyson had in his mind when he pictured the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria:

And statesmen at her council met,
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand; and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet.

The following are the resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to revise and consolidate the Acts and parts of Acts now in force respecting the duties of customs, and that for this purpose it is expedient to repeal the following Acts or parts thereof not heretofore repealed, viz. :—

57-58 Victoria, Chapter 33, intituled: "An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the Duties of Customs."

58-59 Victoria, Chapter 23, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1894."

59 Victoria, Chapter 8, intituled: "An Act further to amend the Customs Tariff, 1894."

And to provide otherwise by enacting that the following be substituted in lieu thereof:—

1. That unless the context otherwise requires,
(a) The initials "n.e.s." represent and have the meaning of the words "not elsewhere specified";

(b) The initials "n.o.p." represent and have the meaning of the words "not otherwise provided for";

(c) The expression "gallon" means an imperial gallon;

(d) The expression "ton" means two thousand pounds avoirdupois;

(e) The expression "proof" or "proof spirits," when applied to wines or spirits of any kind, means spirits of a strength equal to that of pure ethyl alcohol compounded with distilled water in such proportions that the resultant mixture shall at a temperature of sixty degrees Fahrenheit have a specific gravity of 0.9198 as compared with that of distilled water at the same temperature;

(f) The expression "gauge," when applied to metal sheets or plates or to wire, means the thickness as determined by Stubbs's standard gauge.

(g) The expression "in diameter," when applied to tubing, means the actual inside diameter ;

(h) The expression "sheet," when applied to metals, means a sheet or plate not exceeding three-sixteenths of an inch in thickness ;

(i) The expression "plate," when applied to metals, means a plate or sheet more than three-sixteenths of an inch in thickness.

2. That the expressions mentioned in section two of "The Customs Act," as amended by section two of "The Customs Amendment Act, 1888," whenever they occur herein, or in any Act relating to the customs, unless the context otherwise requires, have the meaning assigned to them respectively by the said sections two ; and any power conferred upon the Governor in Council by "The Customs Act" to transfer dutiable goods to the list of goods which may be imported free of duty is not hereby abrogated or impaired.

3. That subject to the foregoing provisions and to the requirements of "The Customs Act," Chapter thirty-two of the Revised Statutes, as amended, there shall be levied, collected and paid upon all goods enumerated, or referred to as not enumerated, in Schedule A hereto appended,—the several rates of duties of customs set forth and described in the said schedule and set opposite to each item respectively or charged thereon as not enumerated, when such goods are imported into Canada or are taken out of warehouse for consumption therein.

4. That subject to the same provisions and to the further conditions contained in Schedule B hereto appended, all goods enumerated in the said Schedule B may be imported into Canada or may be taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, without the payment of any duties of customs thereon.

5. That the importation into Canada of any goods enumerated, described or referred to in Schedule C hereto appended, is prohibited ; and that any such goods if imported shall thereby become forfeited to the Crown and shall be destroyed, and that any person importing any such prohibited goods, or causing or permitting them to be imported, shall for each offence incur a penalty of two hundred dollars.

6. That the export of deer, wild turkeys, quail, partridge, prairie fowl and woodcock, in the carcase or parts thereof, is hereby declared unlawful and prohibited ; and any person exporting or attempting to export any such article shall for each such offence incur a penalty of one hundred dollars, and the article so attempted to be exported shall be forfeited, and may, on reasonable cause of suspicion of intention to export, be seized by any officer of the customs, and, if such intention is proved, shall be dealt with as for breach of the customs laws ; Provided, that this section shall not apply to the export, under such regulations as are made by the Governor in Council, of any carcase or part thereof of any deer raised or bred by any person, company or association of persons upon his or their own lands.

7. That regulations respecting the manner in which molasses and syrups shall be sampled and tested for the purpose of determining the classes to which they belong with reference to the duty chargeable thereon shall be made by the Controller of Customs ; and the instruments and appliances necessary for such determination shall be designated by him and supplied to such officers as are by him charged with the duty of sampling and testing such molasses and syrups ; and the decision of any officer (to whom is so assigned the testing of such articles) as to the duties to which they are subject under the tariff shall be final and conclusive, unless upon appeal to the Commissioner of Customs within thirty days from the rendering of such decision, such decision is, with the approval of the Controller, changed ; and the decision of the Commissioner with such approval shall be final.

8. That in the case of all wines, spirits, or alcoholic liquors subject to duty according to their relative strength of proof, such strength shall be ascertained either by means of Sykes's hydrometer or of the specific gravity bottle, as the Controller of Customs directs ; and in case such relative strength cannot be correctly ascertained by the direct use of the hydrometer or gravity bottle, it shall be ascertained by the distillation of a sample and the subsequent test in like manner of the distillate.

9. That all medicinal or toilet preparations imported for completing the manufacture thereof, or for the manufacture of any other article by the addition of any ingredient or ingredients, or by mixing such preparations, or by putting up or labelling the same, alone or with other articles or compounds, under any proprietary or trade name, shall be, irrespective of cost, valued for duty and duty shall be paid thereon at the ordinary market value in the country whence imported of the completed preparation when put up and labelled under such proprietary or trade name, less the actual cost of labour and material used or expended in Canada in completing the manufacture thereof or putting up or labelling the same.

10. That all medicinal preparations, whether chemical or other, usually imported with the name of the manufacturer, shall have the true name of such manufacturer and the place where they are prepared permanently and legibly fixed to each parcel by stamp, label or otherwise ; and all medicinal preparations imported without such names so affixed shall be forfeited.

11. That packages when imported shall be subject to the payment of the following duties, viz.:

(a.) All bottles, flasks, jars, demijohns, carboys, casks, hogsheads, pipes, barrels, and all other vessels or packages, manufactured of tin, iron, lead, zinc, glass or any other material capable of holding liquids—and all packages in which goods are commonly placed for home consumption, including cases, not otherwise provided for, in which bottled spirits, wines, or malt liquors or other liquids are contained—and every package being the first receptacle or covering inclosing goods for purpose of sale—shall in all cases, not otherwise provided for, in which they contain goods subject to an ad valorem duty or a specific duty and ad valorem duty, be charged with the same rate of ad valorem duty as is to be levied and collected on the goods they contain, and the value of the packages may be included in the value of such goods ;

(b.) Provided that all such packages as aforesaid containing goods subject to a specific duty only, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged with a duty of twenty per cent ad valorem ;

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the laborious efforts of yesterday have had the effect, for the present at least, of keeping my two hon. friends, brave coadjutors in presenting the long tariff disquisition to this House yesterday, from taking their accustomed places in the House. However, I shall hope that perhaps a little later in the afternoon we may be favoured with their presence; and if we are not, we have at least the presence of our hon. friend who, on a memorable occasion in one of the Ontario counties, in a burst of confidence to certain persons who were more than friendly to him, and before a certain set of other persons who, in about his own words, were trying to stab him in the back, declared that when the Liberal party got into power he had little doubt that he would be asked to take the position of Minister of Finance. So, if the present Minister of Finance and his coadjutor are absent, I have the great pleasure of presenting my remarks to the Finance Minister in esse. The House was no doubt a good deal amused as well as interested in the performance of yesterday. From four o'clock until near midnight, with the exception of the dinner hour, we were treated to a succession of kaleidoscopic variations—dissolving views, as is suggested by an hon. friend behind me—which certainly had the effect of keeping us awake; because at no one particular point in the address was any person able to conclude what would be the next step in the programme. The arguments certainly did not lack in diversity. True to themselves and to their party history, the Government of my hon. friend the Prime Minister carried into their tariff to the very end that same delightful love of change and variety, that same indefiniteness and uncertainty, which in the last six years, to go no further back, has been one of the chief characteristics of the party then in Opposition, and now occupying the Treasury benches; and to-day I doubt if there is a single man sitting on those benches who up to this hour has any definite idea of what is either the scope of that tariff or what its effect will be upon the industries of this country. I have to confess candidly that I have not been able to make up my mind yet on these particulars, either of them. I know I am at a disadvantage in attempting to criticise the tariff presentation of yesterday; for up to the present time I am without a sight of one single resolution or item which was brought down yesterday by the Finance Minister. Neither in manuscript nor in print have I been able to see it where I could authoritatively place my fingers upon it and know that I would be certain in directing criticism upon any one item. Contrary to all precedent in this House, and I believe in any other constitutionally governed British assembly, the items were not even all read. They were slurred over, some parts given, and some not given, some read in part and some allowed to go without reading, until, as I say, it is practically utterly impossible for any one at this present time to say what is the tariff, what are the different items and rates, and what are the tendency and scope of the changes that have been made. Under these circumstances I must certainly direct my criticism to the general lines—I will not call them principles—which underlie this tariff revision.

But before I go to that, I have a word or two to say with reference to the first part of the speech yesterday, in relation to the finances of the country. I fear that there will be a little divergence of opinion between the Minister of Finance and myself with reference to the outcome of the current year and of the succeeding year. I am happy to know that we agree pretty closely upon the outcome of 1895-96. There is a reason for that. The figures were all down and in hand and printed, and speculation was practically outside of the question. With reference to the year 1895-96, there is nothing at all that I can find fault with, if I were disposed to do it, in the presentation given by the hon. Minister of Finance. Barring a little item with reference to the $2,394,000 of the Quebec subsidies, and which, after a question from myself, the hon. gentleman and myself agreed in, across the floor of the House, there is nothing I would have the least disposition to find fault with, and I am happy to know that the Liberal-Conservative Government, which was in power in this country from 1878, went out of power with a record on its financial side so well-grounded and favourable as that which has been given to us by the Finance Minister of the day himself with reference to 1895-96. As if he intended to knock himself over in order to have the pleasure of picking himself up, he gave his own answer to all that rather long and tedious discussion about the utter failure of the National Policy and the bitter disappointment that it had been to the country, by showing, under the testimony and seal of the public documents, that in its eighteenth year of work, after a period of great depression extending from 1890 to 1895, the state of the revenue, the state of the finances, the state of the country were, in every respect, what a conservative and honourable Finance Minister could characterize as being firm and as showing both buoyancy and expansion, so far as the revenue and the progress of the country are concerned. What does that show, according to the statements of the hon. Finance Minister himself? First, that an expenditure was made in that year of $50,000 less than I had estimated for in the Budget of the preceding year, $900,000 less than the Estimates which were brought down and passed and placed into my hands to expend, and $1,200,000 less than was expended by that same Government in the year preceding, giving for ever a quietus to the argument, which has been over and over again advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Liberal-Conservative party had played with the finances of the country recklessly when political contests were coming and political support had to be called upon. In that last year, 1895-96, the revenue came to within $330,000 of what I had estimated it, and would have reached my estimate if it had not been for the unfortunate apple of discord which hon. gentlemen opposite, by the stand they took in the elections which terminated in June, 1896, threw into the business arena, causing uncertainty, causing men to be cautious in their business operations, and which diminished the revenue by the fear of an eventuality which might occur. Sir, it showed more than that. It showed a deficit which, in the lean and depressing years, at first amounted to $1,200,000 and then to $4,100,000, a deficit, be it remembered, which was only possible by the fact that large reductions were made upon raw sugar, and that consequently the deficit to the public was represented by a corresponding gain to the pockets of the people through the non-imposition of the heavy duties upon sugar. And that deficit of $4,000,000 in 1894-95 was brought down to almost an equilibrium, leaving but $330,000, or less than a third of a million, on the wrong side of the account in the year 1895-96. And what my hon. friend might have said but did not say, probably because it escaped him, or was not germane to the work then in hand, which is the better supposition, is that whereas the Liberal-Conservative party, with that much-abused National Policy which accompanied its birth and which was held by it just as firmly in 1896, had increased the exports of this country which had been lowered in 1878 to $71,500,000 under the old tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and raised them in 1896 to $121,500,000, high-water mark in the trade history of Canada, and $7,500,000 over the preceding year. He might have said that that same policy and party, now so much abused, had increased the imports of the country, which had been lowered to the paltry sum of $80,000,000, under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, to $110,500,000 in 1896, $5,500,000 over the increase in the preceding year. So that the increase in trade amounted to $80,500,000 from 1878 to 1896, and in 1896 showed a total gain of $13,000,000 over 1895, and left the trade of Canada at the highest point it has reached since 1867. He might have said also that the Liberal-Conservative party, when it went out of office, left the credit of this country unimpeached and unimpaired and standing in the great money markets of London at high-water mark. He might have added that the customs taxation, which has been so much and so ignorantly talked about, was, under the Liberal-Conservative party and its policy, in the year 1895-96, but 18 per cent upon all goods entered for consumption in this country, and the average from 1892 to 1896 was but 17½ per cent. He might have equally added that the customs quantum paid in per head by the people was, in 1895-96, $3.94, and in the period of five years, which I mentioned before, $3.95 per head, bearing in mind that in 1875, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, it reached $3.95 per head, and in the average of their regime was $3.45 per head. That, Sir, I think, is a very good showing and a very good record for a much-abused party and a much-abused policy.

But I might go just a step further and point out some of the items with reference to which the trade of this country made an excellent showing in 1895-96. It has been said that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party was a bad one for the farmer and bad for agricultural products. Who does not recollect having heard that indictment out of the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite? To-day we have our vindication. The agricultural schedule stands. That policy worked so well that the exports of agricultural products under it continually increased, and without going back to ancient history—taking the period of 1895 and 1896—we find that cheese, bacon, hams, apples, wheat, flour, horses, sheep and cattle were exported to the amount of $37,600,000 as against an export of $22,000,000 in 1890. We find that agricultural products and the products of animals taken together were raised from an export in 1890 of $37,000,000 to an export in 1896 of $50,500,000, or pretty nearly 40 per cent of an increase.

In the export of manufactured articles the year 1895-96 shows a very large increase. In 1890 the exports of these articles amounted to $5,741,000, and in 1895 they had risen to $7,768,000, while in 1895-96 they increased to $9,365,000, showing a very great and notable increase. Now, these are what I mentioned, taken together, as proofs that the National Policy, as carried out by the Liberal-Conservatives, was worthy of its conception, worthy of the maintenance the Liberal-Conservatives so firmly and strongly gave to it, worthy of the confidence it maintained in this country from 1878, and which, aside from all other issues, and in the face of my hon. friend opposite, it maintains on both sides of this House and among both political parties in this country to-day. So much for the record of 1895-96, on which between my hon. friend and myself there was a most delightful harmony, so far as the financial statements were concerned.

But I fear that that harmony must be subjected to a slight discord when we come to speak of the financial outcome of the year 1896-97. My hon. friend estimated the revenue for this year to be $37,286,655. My estimate is different. I propose to place it on the record, and, at the end of the year, time, the great arbiter, will decide which of the two is nearer the fact. Up to April 20th, 1897, $30,254,403 had been gathered in. From April 20th to July 1st last year $7,892,251 had been collected. If we add these two together, we get something like the estimate that my hon. friend made of what he would probably receive during the current year. But my hon. friend seems to forget that he has been borrowing from the future within the last six weeks, and borrowing very largely. If he had made his Budget speech on the 1st of March this year, he would have had to show a loss of $700,000 during this as compared with the same period of last year. But on the 20th of April he can show an excess of $1,528,000. Thus there has been a gain up to April 20th, 1897, and the whole of it accruing within March and April, of $2,228,065. Does my hon. friend think that he can eat the hare and have it running around at the same time? Now, I am not going to be so cruel as to say he will have to pay back all that borrowing, but I am going to say that he will have to pay back the most of it, and that the months that are to come between this and July 1st will be lean months for his revenue. The conclusion I come to is that while you have to deduct the borrowing from the amount which last year accrued between April 20th and July 1st, and which would leave $5,564,000. I am willing to concede that possibly the conditions of uncertainty being removed, there will be a betterment of three-quarters of a million dollars. Adding that you make, for the remainder of this year, $6,414,000, which added to what has already been received would give, in round numbers, a revenue of $36,600,000. So that my estimate is that the hon. gentleman will receive, not $37,296,000, but—and I think he will be happy and fortunate if he does receive that—about $36,600,000. So much for revenue.

On the other side of the account, my hon. friend estimated that he would expend $37,857,000. Well, Sir, he must remember that, up to April 20th, in his expenditure of $25,463,830, he is about a million dollars ahead of the same period for last year. If he goes on expending in the same ratio—and I do not think he will find his hands strong enough to repress the exuberant ideas of some of his colleagues, notably the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair)—he will find that the ratio of increase will go on for the remaining term. So I add for increase $750,000, and so make up my estimate of the expenditure for the year, which is $38,600,000. Now there appears an important difference in calculation. On the calculation of my hon. friend, his deficit would be about half a million, which he was good enough to say might be doubled—not a very close estimate. On my calculation the estimated deficit is $2,000,000 instead of $500,000. So, when we come to calculate the addition to the debt, my estimate is that the capital expenditure going up to $4,300,000, the deficit and sinking funds balancing each other, there will be a net addition to the debt, not of $1,750,000, as my hon. friend said, but of over $4,000,000. Now, he ridiculed the idea that he would have to borrow in the money markets of the world during the current year $10,000,000. He declared that I had said that he would have to borrow $10,000,000 and spend the most of it for current expenditure, and not on capital account. If I said that, I strained the point. I could not have meant that the whole $10,000,000 would be spent in that way, for I had just made the calculation as to consolidated fund expenditure and capital expenditure, upon which I based that estimate, and, in the face of my own calculation, I could not have thrown the whole expenditure upon consolidated fund. If the statement was made it was to that extent an error. But, if my calculations are right, what my hon. friend will have to borrow in the markets of the world is at least $10,000,000 during the current year 1896-97. Thus there is a very great disparity between our calculations. There is no need for us, I suppose, to recriminate. Both estimates will have to go before the great arbiter time, to see which is correct.

Now, I do not think it is necessary or wise for me to follow my hon. friend further than the year 1896-97. Conditions change so rapidly with our friends opposite, that I would not like to trust myself upon that shifting sand and make any calculation. He has given us his estimate that he will have a net debt increase of $3,750,000, that he will have expenditure of $38,250,000 for 1897-98. If so, he will have to cut down the estimates very considerably, and he will have to be much more repressive, much more coercive than the doctrines of gentlemen opposite, who believe in sunny ways and conciliation, would lead me to suppose he would be.

So much, then, with reference to that point. I want to pass on now for a moment to the next, and ask a question by way of introduction: What pledge that my hon. friends gave to the country during the last year aye, or the last seventeen years as to their action on the finances and on the tariff, up to the present moment, has been carried out? That is a fair question for discussion; I will not discuss it in a heated manner, but so far as I can, I will take a cool and analytical method, premising what I am going to say by this remark, that the only safety republican institutions have, and constitutional government has, in a country like this, is the safety to be found in the perfect honesty with which political parties will keep the pledges which they make. Sir, if it be admissible in this country for the leader of a party, or a party, to take its stand upon certain pronouncements which it calls its principle, to nail those principles to the masthead, to carry them through the country, and get the reins of government confided to them on the contract implied between their pledges and the people who trust their pledges, and afterwards, by stress of partisan necessity, deliberately and utterly to go back upon those pledges, and then to look into the face of the electorate, saddened and outraged by the deception which they see has been practised upon them, with an impudent leer, or the smart remark: "Ah, well, we got ahead of you fellows, anyway, by it"—if that is to hold in the public life of this country, then I have not understood, and do not to-day know, the temper of the freemen of Canada. More than all, Sir, if the man who is chosen by his fellows as their leader and mouthpiece, either through ignorance of the conditions that prevail inside the country or out of it, or from a thoughtlessness in asserting what he does not know that he can carry out, poses before the public on a line of policy which he declares is immutable and firm, and will be put into practice if he is intrusted with the reins of power, and if he then fails to do it, how can the electorate of this country continue confidence to the leader of a party under those conditions? I simply premise these things. They are true, my hon. friend knows they are true. Now, I proceed to the analysis as to whether these pledges have been made, and whether they have been kept.

First, Sir, with reference to the expenditure of this country. Has there been a time within the last fifteen years when my hon. friend opposite, the leader of the Government has not taken his stand on the ground of condemning the party opposed to him, the then Government of the day, taken his stand upon the bed rock principle that the expenditures of the Liberal-Conservative Government were heavy, were too heavy, and ought not to increase; and that if the Liberal party came into power, they would be cut down? Can there be any dissent to that? If one gentleman on that side rises to dissent, I have simply to place before him the statement of his leader, who, in the last campaign, put the top stone upon it, in that canvass that he made through this country from one end of it to the other, in speeches that he made in the city of Toronto and in Montreal, and in two of which he made statements that I will read. But first, I will give the statement of the convention of 1893, with reference to it:

Moved by Mr. Gibbons.—We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand strict economy in the administration of the Government of the country.

Now, Sir, in Brantford, and in Toronto, the present leader of the Government, standing then for his party, the impersonation of the principles of the party, so far as it had principles, standing as the bright and special impersonation, chivalric and brave, of those principles, declared:

Do you imagine there is any justification for this extraordinary expenditure? The Conservatives tell us there is a justification. Population has increased, they say. O yes, it has increased 9 per cent, but the expenditure has increased 100 per cent. There can be no justification for such an expenditure when, as has been stated, the great bulk of it is a corrupt expenditure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I knew you would emphasize that with a good cheer:

Moreover, they tell us that, if we were in power, we could not retrench and economize. But I do not believe that it will be a difficult task. It would not be a very difficult task to economize to the extent of one, two, three—and Mr. Mills told his constituents, a few days ago, that it was possible to retrench to the extent of four millions a year.

In Toronto he said:

Has the expenditure gone down? No, it has gone up. It went up two, three, five, ten millions, and more, until it is now thirty-eight millions; and the Conservatives do not shrink from it, but swallow it all. If we come into power, we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie, and I say that, although we may not be able to bring back the expenditures to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount two, yes, three million dollars per year.

That is the statement of the impersonation of the principles of the Liberal party on the question of expenditures. And, Sir, there were good honest people, farmers, artisans, business men, all through this country, who looked up into the face of the leader of the Opposition, lauded by his followers as the chevalier sans peur et sans reproche, and said: That is what we want, that is what we want, an honest man to head an honest party, to bring down the expenditures of this country. Those were the terms of contract, the people signed the contract, it has been repudiated by the leader, and faith is outraged, and confidence is slain, and the political life of this country is degraded.

Mr. McMULLEN. We do not have thieves, anyway.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for North Wellington, as I understood him—he will correct me if I did not—said: We do not have thieves, anyway. He does not deny it, Mr. Speaker. He means that we had thieves on our side of the House. Let me tell him that his leader herded with thieves, took thieves' money and placed it in deposit to keep his men from being turned out at election courts; took thieves' money, knowing afterwards that it was thieves' money, allowing his party to profit by it, sitting there to-day and not making any proposition to restore it to the impoverished Quebec treasury. He slept with Pacaud, and Pacaud tolled the public contracts for his party benefit. Does my hon. friend want to know anything more about thieves? The hon. gentleman had better not appeal to time. Time passes, and time will make some revelations yet.

But, Sir, I have a political primer here, a primer of tariff reform, published in the "Prince Edward Islander," which bears the ear marks,—shall I call them,—of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is a primer of tariff reform, a primer which shows the Liberal policy, and says:

The Liberal party says that several millions may be lopped off the present expenditure without injury to the public service; Hon. David Mills estimates the probable saving at $4,000,000, et cetera, et cetera.

Now, Sir, has this been done; has the expenditure of the country been reduced? Let us see. The estimates brought down for 1895-96, and for 1896-97, were yesterday laid before this House. The estimate brought down by my hon. friend for 1896-97, consolidated fund, was $39,698,935. That is what has been brought down—that is not all the hon. gentleman should have brought down. My hon. friend omitted, purposely, so that the amount should not seem so much larger at first, to provide last year, as he should have provided, for the parliamentary session which we are at present holding, like an ostrich hiding its head in the sand and thinking its body does not obtrude. Everybody knew that that money must necessarily be expended this year. In the parliamentary history of Canada such a thing has never before been done: it was called to his attention, but he did not estimate for it. That amount has to be added. An estimate of $39,698,925 was brought down. This year my hon. friend has brought down an estimate for $38,111,663. But my hon. friend has not brought down any Supplementary Estimates whatever yet, and in order to show a saving in the Estimates, he compares the amount brought down, not taking into account any Supplementary Estimates, which will be a large amount, with the previous estimate submitted by himself, and the hon. gentleman attempts to show that the Government are making a saving.

But the point of contest is not as to what saving the hon. gentleman will make next year as compared with himself during the present year, but it is as to what saving this party is going to make as compared with the party that has gone out of power. That is where the contest lies. And it will be found that for the current year there will be added to the $39,698,925 by way of Supplementary Estimates certainly half a million, three-quarters of a million or one million of dollars—certainly half a million must come down—and I think the estimate for the current year will exceed $40,000,000.

The hon. gentleman may say, we will not spend it all. If he does not—and I do not suppose he will spend it all—he cannot save so large a margin as to save himself and his hon. friends from this position, that the Liberal party, through its leader and responsible advisers, declared they would cut down the expenditure by one, two or three or four millions of dollars, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite are going to incur an expenditure which will be at least $2,000,000 in excess of the expenditure during the last year of the Liberal-Conservative party's administration. I will not follow the hon. gentleman into the details of this estimate, because it is impossible to do so satisfactorily until the Supplementary Estimates are down, and they are not before the House at the present time.

If hon. gentlemen will take the expenditure from 1887 to 1896, a period of ten years, under the head of consolidated revenue fund, they will find that the expenditure of the Liberal-Conservative Government averaged $36,850,000, and last year's expenditure was $36,950,000. So that the Liberal-Conservatives' record of expenditure is this: That in ten years the average has been $36,850,000, and during the last year of their administration the expenditure was within that average up to a paltry sum of fifty thousand or sixty thousand dollars. On capital account, the average expenditure of the Liberal-Conservative party was $3,639,427, and in 1895-96 it was only $3,781,311, or about the average, and one million of that amount was due to an extraordinary expenditure on militia, which if it had not been incurred, would have left the ordinary expenditure on capital account at about $2,700,000, or $1,000,000 less than the average for the years from 1887 to 1896. That is the record of our expenditure.

What will hon. gentlemen opposite probably expend? The Finance Minister has submitted for the current year an estimate of $39,698,925. To that estimate he will add about $800,000 by Supplementary Estimates yet to be brought down, and that will make the total Estimates in round figures, $40,500,000, or $2,700,000 in excess of the Estimates for 1895-96. For next year the hon. gentleman estimates the expenditure at $38,111,663 without any Supplementary Estimates. I think the hon. gentleman will find before he gets through that he will have to ask for $1,900,000 in Supplementary Estimates, which, added to the amount I have stated, will make a total estimate of $40,000,000, which will be $2,200,000 over the estimate of which I spoke a moment ago. When the hon. gentleman comes to capital expenditure he will find that whereas our estimate was $3,936,220 for 1896-97, his estimate already down is $4,528,469, and adding about $200,000 in Supplementary Estimates, will give a total $4,750,000 on capital account before the current year is through. For 1897-98 hon. gentlemen opposite have already on the Table of the House Estimates for $6,386,696, which I venture to say will be raised to $7,000,000 when the supplementaries are brought down. What do we find? The estimates on capital account for 1896-97 are $800,000 higher than 1895-96, and for 1897-98 $4,000,000 higher than that. Adding consolidated fund and capital together will give on my calculations, an estimated expenditure for 1896-97 of $44,000,000; and for 1897-98 of $45,500,000. Take off the usual percentage for lapsed balances, and these gentlemen are going to expend on both these branches, from $42,000,000 to $44,000,000 per year, against $40,000,000 which we spent in 1895-96.

In the light of those facts, am I correct or not in stating, that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), his pamphlets, and his speakers, and his platform, have not carried out the faith they pledged to the honest electorate when they led them to believe by actual English words, made as strong as the English language could put them that if the party of the Conservatives were turned out and the party of the Liberals were put in, the expenditure would drop by one, two, three or four millions per year.

Well, Sir, have they kept their pledge with reference to taxation? With reference to taxation, they led this country to believe that the rate of taxation was very high, and that if they got in it would be diminished. What have been the customs duties raised by the Liberal-Conservative Government from 1891 up to 1896 ?

In—
1891-92	$20,550,000
1892-93	21,161,000
1893-94	19,379,000
1894-95	17,887,000
1895-96	20,219,000

Total for the five years.... $99,198,000

Or an average over the five years of $19,800,000 per year.

That is a percentage of 17½ per cent upon all goods entered for consumption in the country, and, as I said before, the average per capita customs rate is $3.95, as compared with an average of $3.44 from 1874 to 1878, and which rose in 1875 to $3.95.

The whole question as to whether my hon. friends opposite are going to reduce the taxation, hinges upon their expenditures. If you gentlemen expend more than we did on your consolidated revenue fund account, you must raise more revenue; and if you raise more revenue you cannot reduce the per capita rate. You are already preparing to spend millions more each year, and you must raise the per capita of expenditure in order to meet it—unless the present Finance Minister, with a light heart and a jaunty air is going to sail out upon the financial sea for the next three or four years, thinking that he can spend millions over what he receives, and pay current expenses out of loans. But I cannot think so poorly of hon. gentlemen opposite as to think they will introduce and carry out that system. Then, if they pay their way as they go on consolidated fund account, they will have to raise the per capita rate of the customs, and consequently raise the taxation. Therefore, that pledge falls to the ground.

What, Sir, about the pledge as to the debt? I do not know but that I ought to read something of the hon. gentlemen's announcements with reference to the debt, but they are fresh in their memory, and I am inclined to believe that our friends here have not forgotten them, so that I do not think it is any use warming up old porridge. Let us take it for granted, that one of the strong indictments against the Conservative party which they made was, that the debt was increasing rapidly and too heavily, and that a stop ought to be put to its increase. I appeal to my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who sits opposite me, whether he has not tuned on that minor key many and many a time in this House of Commons. But, Sir, what are they going to do about the debt? Are they going to stop it growing; are they going to reduce it; are they going to keep it from leaping up by bounds? Their own actions answer. Sir, the net debt in the following years was :

Net debt in 1890.....	$237,533,000
do 1896.....	258,497,000

Increase in that term..... 20,964,221

Less $2,394,000, which was a liability incurred in 1884—if it were ever incurred—and which by a method of book-keeping has now been transferred to the year 1895-96. Deducting that, it gives $18,570,000 as the increase in the net debt from 1890 to 1896, or an average of $2,652,900 each year.

Now, Sir, with the statement that I have made as to expenditure, and the statement I have made as to revenue, which are within sight in the year 1896-97, these hon. gentlemen will come out, not with a debt increase of $1,750,000, as my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) stated yesterday, for this present year, but they will come out with a debt increase of nearer $4,000,000, and with a deficit, not of $500,000, but of nearer $2,000,000. Therefore, the debt must be increased.

And as to the debt for 1897-98, with $6,000,000 and odd for capital expenditure already estimated, and more to come, and a deficit by the acknowledgment of the Finance Minister which you must add to that, deducting only the sinking fund, there will be an increase of many millions of debt in 1896-97. So that, if there were any contract made between the people of this country and hon. gentlemen opposite, on the ground of the pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite that they would decrease the debt of this country, or at least would prevent it from rolling up, then that contract so signed by one party has been ignored by the other, and they are going on the straight road towards piling up millions of debt each year.

And, Sir, what else can we expect from the various hints that come to us from different quarters; from certain things that have transpired in the province of Nova Scotia; from certain things that have transpired in the province of Prince Edward Island; from certain things that are transpiring, not only as to old claims of provinces which now, when their friends are in power, they think ought to get recognition, but of the multitudinous claims rushed upon hon. gentlemen opposite to the amount of more than $50,000,000 (by the statement of the Prime Minister himself) asked for public expenditure in this country. I am afraid, Sir, when I consider the weakness that hon. gentlemen exhibited when that hungry rush was made upon them by the back benches for offices filled by honourable men, when instead of holding themselves firm against that indecent rush they gave up their better and more matured opinions, and made of the civil service of this country a sink of distrust, and spying, and general discontent and uncertainty. If they could not hold themselves firm against that rush from the back benches to turn honest men out of office and put their own followers and partisans in, can they hold against that infinitely greater rush from the back benches, aye, and from benches very close up to the front benches, which sees millions in the public works and contracts of this country, and which is already organized and coming from near and far to exploit the public treasury? Can they hold themselves against that, and keep down the expenditure and keep down the public debt? Their actions so far say, no; their actions hereafter will, I believe, as emphatically say, no.

Now, Sir, leaving the financial side of the question, let us go a step further and ask, with reference to this tariff presentment which we had yesterday: Have they kept their pledges? Did they make any pledges when in Opposition, and when canvassing the electorate?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hardly. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Did they make any explicit promise?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We promised to turn you out.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has struck the key; he strikes it true and straight every time; he says "We promised to turn you out." That was their policy; that is as much as they care, so far as the country is concerned; and it was well summed up by my hon. friend the Premier in the early part of this session, when we put his pledges right before his face and eyes, and he saw them, and saw that he had broken them, he had no other retort than to say: "Well, we are on this side, and you are on that; we are in, and you are out."

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is what the country wanted.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend struck the key, and I can depend on his doing that every time. The outs wanted to get in—that was all. Did they make any promise with reference to the tariff? Had they any principle on which they declared they would revise it? Did they in explicit English words say what they were going to do?

An hon. MEMBER. They said it in French.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe they said it in both languages. My hon. friends opposite will say that I am going to be tedious if I am going to read some of those pledges; but my public duty impels me so strongly that I must brave even their displeasure for about half an hour.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read the prohibition pledge.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I never heard anything more appropriate than that piteous request of my hon. friend. He knows himself better than I do, and out of the depths of his tempted heart there comes the piteous beseechment: "Read the pledge to me."

If my hon. friend, after the sitting of the House, will come into a private room with me and tell me all his necessities and temptations, I will administer the pledge.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am afraid you have lost the password, and could not take me outside.

Mr. FOSTER. I never had that password; mine was another one. These pledges, Sir, are found in the sayings of prominent members of the party outside of the Premier as well as in those of the Premier himself. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in 1890, declared:

I say, our protective system was a huge mistake, in so far as it was honest at all,—

Now, I want to pin my hon. friend. They have adopted our tariff, and I presume it is honest. So he has no leg to stand on even there.

—and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery. A small ring, clique of combiners and protected manufacturers, have, as I have told you, been permitted for years past to make a prey and plunder of the people of Canada.

Again, he said:

I stand by the declaration I have made, that protection is nothing more or less than deliberate, legalized and organized robbery; and, more than that, if you do not stamp it out,—

Is he stamping it out?

—it is the very high road to political slavery first, and industrial slavery afterwards.

Here we go, on that high-road, under the leadership of my hon. friend himself, who had adopted nine-tenths of the high protective tariff. He declares:

Our policy, from first to last, has been to destroy the villainous system of protection by free trade, revenue tariff, or continental free trade.

But it is a new doctrine that the hon. gentleman is going to destroy it by giving it a dose of itself. He says again:

They demand our policy. Well, Sir, they shall have our policy, and here I believe I speak for my hon. friends beside me. Our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I knew my hon. friend would strike the key again. My hon. friend joined protection and corruption together; where are they to-day?

Sir, we strike, and we will strike, for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation; and I tell hon. gentlemen, that we will not rest until the slavery that has been imposed upon us has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are as free as Canadians ought to be free, to make the most they can of the opportunity God has given them.

Again:

Our policy, from first to last, has been to destroy this villainous system of protection which has been grinding out the vitals of this country.

The Minister of Finance said last night that no Liberal had ever declared that they were going to destroy protection all at once—that it was only Liberal-Conservatives who said that. Well, Sir, at one time the present Premier was a protectionist, and to that extent a Liberal-Conservative. But the present Premier declared in 1893, after the convention :

I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. Our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection. He declared in Victoria :

If the Liberals were successful, they would cut off the head of protection at once, and trample on its body.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), in that mild and dulcet tone that he often assumes, declared :

We have been attacking this policy year by year. This is an accursed system, a system accursed of God and man.

And now the party that was elected to curse it, who were led out on to the mountains and shown the whole enormity, and were bidden to lift up their voice and curse, have lifted up their voice, and behold ! they have blessed it. In 1895 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said :

Call it protection, call it feudalism, call it slavery—I care not ; it is the same thing. It differs only in degree ; it is bondage.

We are under it still ; they have adopted nine-tenths of our tariff.

The system of protection has been the bane and the curse of Canada—the bane and the curse of Canada, I repeat.

And so on, all through and through. But there was one remark of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce which is instructive. He felt that he was going to have difficulty if his party came into power ; he knew that some of them would not be for carrying out their pledges ; he felt that there was a battle of Armageddon straight ahead, and he felt constrained to warn his internecine opponents of what would come. Drawing his warning from the defeat of the Democratic party in the United States, he said :

There are two lessons which, I think, the Reformers of Canada should learn. One is presented for our example and warning in the fate that has befallen the Democratic party in the United States. It shows to all who choose to read the signs of the times, that when a party places itself at the head of a great popular movement, if that party tenders the people a stone instead of bread, it is half-hearted in the prosecution of the great aim it sets before it, and will be deservedly swept out of power by the very people who have sustained and advanced it.

Now, I do not know that I can avoid the temptation of reading something from my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). He made a tour of the maritime provinces, he spoke in St. John to the faithful assembled, and the faithful reported him. I catch now the eye of the hon. gentleman who is editor of one of the papers in St. John (Mr. Ellis), who is a staunch Grit down there, and to-day in his heart feels that his party leaders have not quite come up to his expectations. But anyway that did not prevent him from giving a fair report, and the "Telegraph" newspaper had another, and the two reports are exactly in agreement. My hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, there declared :

This country cannot be made poor ; it must continue in wealth and prosperity. But he was not satisfied to be contented with a mere existence, but desired to see Canada take the fullest advantage of its great resources. This could only be accomplished in one way, by means of free trade. This was the key with which they would unlock the golden door of prosperity. * * *

The Liberals maintained that any trades which required subventions to keep them alive, not only do not contribute to the natural wealth, but actually hinder the prosperity of a country. What has been the fate of some of these bounty-fed industries here? Where are the tall chimneys that were promised under the National Policy? * *

Our policy is to eradicate every vestige of protection from the revenue, so as to take nothing from the people but what is absolutely necessary for the purpose of revenue. Every dollar of protection is to be eliminated, for the evil of the protective system lies not merely in the money that is paid to the Government for its revenue, but in the enormous sums which the protected manufacturer is enabled to extort from the people. The manufacturer will keep the prices up to the margin of the cost of the imported articles with the duty added, so that for every dollar of duty that goes to the Government for revenue, two dollars or more finds its way into the pocket of the protected manufacturer. Under the system which the Liberals will inaugurate, this robbery will come to an end, and our people will be permitted to buy their goods in the cheapest markets.

Yet there is the tariff of 35 per cent, in case after case and case after case, as brought down by this Government. Taking up the question of the tariff, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who spoke at that meeting, said :

He said that in a job like the Curran Bridge affair, $200,000 or $300,000 might be lost, but one turn of the tariff screw and millions were lost. Where hundreds were corrupted in the Curran Bridge matter, the present tariff system corrupted thousands. * * *

In the Conservative party there was a large number whose minds were not settled on the tariff question. In the old days, when there was no tariff, there were better times. The policy of to-day was sucking the life-blood of the country, and especially the maritime provinces. (Applause.) There were thousands of men in the Conservative party who are looking at the lost factories, the destroyed industries, &c., and we say to them : You have not accomplished anything by hanging on to this old nag of National Policy. If the citizens went on in the Liberal principles, St. John will be hailed as the free trade centre of the country.

In this Prince Edward Island "Primer," which was given out by the faithful for the conversion of that tight little island, what did they say :

The Liberal policy is to so adjust the customs tariff that all the taxes paid through it shall go into the Treasury, and not into the coffers of a few favoured industries.

Where is my hon. friend to-day with his rice protected? Now, I touch a sore point in the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), with his sugar protected, with his 35 per cent upon hundreds of articles, with his tariff raised from 5 to 10 and sometimes 15 per cent over the old tariff. Where is my hon. friend's argument? Does he not feel a twinge of conscience that he ever edited a production of that kind and sent it out to the people of Prince Edward Island, and then so soon go back on the policy he there announced :

The Liberals further say, that while all citizens, according to their means, should be taxed for the support of the national Government, to tax them for the support of private enterprises, and under cover to take money from one citizen's purse to enrich another, is a gross injustice and legalized robbery.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend and his Government perpetuate that gross injustice and robbery by the very tariff they ask this Parliament to assent to to-day. I do not know whether I ought to or not read the part in this "Primer" which refers to coal oil—kerosene oil—which used to be a pet subject of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is in his St. John speech, it is in every speech made on every platform, everybody who has heard him knows of the coal oil outrage and robbery. Why, he calculated the percentages. He put them in at 125 to 145 per cent. Coal oil—yes; when we were in power, we reduced it 11-5 cents. My hon. friends struggled awfully and reduced it 1 cent.

But I have better evidence than that. I have what is the most formal pledge a party can make—a resolution which, when in Opposition, they submitted to the House. In 1894, anticipating an election, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved this resolution :

That while recognizing in the reductions proposed an admission, to that extent, of the evils inflicted upon the people by the system of high protective duties, this House is, nevertheless, of the opinion that the amendments suggested, being based upon the principle of protection and not solely upon the requirements of the public service, are inadequate to afford satisfactory relief from the burdens of excessive and unfair taxation :

That the highest interests of Canada demand the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade and hasten the return of prosperity to our people ;

Here follows the point :

That, to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government ;—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Be ready now :

—should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large, and should be imposed for revenue only.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says that is good gospel, and my hon. friend voted for it then, and in his heart believed in it and believes in it to-day. Will he have the courage, when the vote is called on this tariff, to stand up and pour out his heart or will he truckle to political exigencies? Will he blindly follow the leaders who are betraying the party faith in this matter of protection?

That it should be adjusted so as to make free, or bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and to promote freer trade with the whole world, and particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends are eclectics. They belong to that peculiar school that when they subscribe to an article of faith which has five clauses, they satisfy their consciences if they keep one clause and drop or break all the others. I do not know but that I ought now to read a statement by the leader at the convention when they were arranging their platform, which statement is published in a brochure issued for campaign purposes. It is quoted from Hon. Wilfrid Laurier's convention speech :

There is taken out of the people of Canada over $20,000,000 every year in customs taxes. If every cent collected through the operation of the protective policy went into the Treasury, it could be borne, but for every one dollar that goes into the public coffers, two dollars or three dollars go into the pockets of the protected manufacturers. I, said Mr. Laurier, object to this. I say that not a cent should be collected beyond what is required to meet the country's necessities. We will tax for revenue, but not one cent for protection. Taxation is an evil that nothing but the requirements of the Government can justify. When we are in power—and I don't want to sell the skin of the bear until the bear is shot; yet I think the Tory bear is about to be skinned—we will free the people from protection, which is a fraud, a delusion and a robbery. For it is robbery to take money from one man and give it to another.

There can be nothing stronger than that in the English language, and having read that, it is not necessary for me to read more.

Now, Sir, these were the pledges of the Liberal party up to and down to the elections of June, 1896. Then, what do we find?

These gentlemen, having obtained power, and having obtained it on these pledges, began to feel less virtuous. There were evidences of shakiness. These evidences came to the ears of some of the faithful, men who honestly believed in the pledges that were made. I know some of these men, and I could look at them at this moment in the House, who declared that they had heard such rumours but they did not believe them, that if the Liberal party betrayed their rank and file in that way, they would hear from them. And I am expecting to hear from them within the next four weeks. Evidences of shakiness began to be seen. The first was that hon. gentlemen opposite refused to define the principle upon which they would ultimately base their tariff. They said, and with some reason: We cannot arrange this tariff in the heat of a session and just after we have come into power. Most of it had already been arranged by resolution; they had already declared that they knew all about it. But you must make some excuses for men when they come to the practical test of doing, and we could not press them too much as to the actual detailed definition of their tariff. But if they had been honest in their pledges, if they had honestly meant to carry out those pledges, they would have had no hesitation in saying to the people's representatives assembled here last July: We propose to revise the tariff; it will take us some time to get the details in order, but we are going to revise it on the principle of a revenue tariff, pure and simple—or of free trade, pure and simple—or whatever principle they chose. That they were not prepared to do that is an evidence that they began to waver the very moment they had attained what my hon. friend so ardently hoped for—power. Well, Sir, this wavering was seen in something more, it was seen in the issuing of a tariff commission. For seventeen years, these gentlemen knew all about it. According to them the Liberal-Conservatives could not gauge public opinion, but they themselves knew public opinion, knew it very well. The Liberal-Conservatives, they said, were not in touch with the business currents of Canada, but they, then in Opposition, were business men and knew the drift and set of that current accurately. But when they were placed in power, to gain delay, and for other purposes, they issued a tariff commission. That was evidence number two. They deferred the session. That was evidence number three. There were hints of betrayal of the policy in the leading papers to such an extent that the Montreal "Witness," which has fits of sturdy independence—and I wish that the fits were more chronic—and the "Farmer's Sun," the organ of the Patrons of Industry, with whom the Liberal party made a contract, began to mutter with discontent. Said these papers: They talk of betraying their pledges. Let them beware. We will not believe that the Liberal party will be untrue to their pledges. Does my hon. friend wish me to read some of these statements? I think I must do so.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Dispense.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not any of that beverage to dispense. My hon. friend will have to pay his own way. What says the "Farmer's Sun"?

The McKinley tariff was in full blast when the Liberals met in convention at Ottawa. They declared, nevertheless, for a revenue tariff for Canada, and, to quote a resolution moved by Mr. Fielding, denounced "the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people," and maintained "that any tariff changes based on this principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours."

A tariff almost identical with the McKinley tariff is before Congress. But, because their party is now in power and wants the support of manufacturers, a great many Liberals have come round to the Tory view, and say that in consequence of the high protection proposed in the States, we must have high protection in Canada. Hence the tariff the Government are going to make this session, these people argue, are going to be based on the principle of protection; in other words, Mr. Fielding must proceed with the tariff on the lines which he condemned in 1893, and we shall get no substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

The Liberals who talk in this strain, are apostates from the faith. If the Dingley Bill were ten times more restricted than it is, why should we keep up our high duties to still further injure the Canadian farmers? If I am to be prevented by Act of Congress from selling my cattle, barley, beans, wool and eggs in a free American market, is that any reason why the Canadian Government should make me pay exorbitant prices for coal oil and barbed wire, cotton goods, implements, wall paper, harness or stoves? It is, or ought to be, a first-class reason why Parliament should deliver me from the home combines and let me buy the necessaries and conveniences of life and production as cheap as possible, whether in the United States or in England. Such was the Liberal doctrine from 1878 until last June.

It goes on to say:

To tell the Canadian farmer that, inasmuch as Laurier has failed to get reciprocity, which the party had hoped to get, and as the Americans intend to restore the McKinley on his produce, therefore it is advisable that he should continue to pay an extortionate sum for anything he has to buy, especially if he buys in the States, is the last sort of language we expected to hear from men who professed to be free traders.

Sir, that sounds very much like language I have heard used by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The article goes on:

If his Bill should be unsatisfactory as a measure of tariff reform, the Government will at once begin to go down hill in this province. The notion prevalent among trimming Liberals that "our friends will swallow anything," is a mistaken one. The Liberal farmers, as men like Dr. Landerkin and Mr. James McMullen must know, are not in the humour to put up with a deliberate breach of faith, whilst the independent element cannot be expected to do so.

What said the Toronto "Globe" before it got the tip to go slow upon the matter of the tariff revision?

The repeal or reduction of the raw material duties will, no doubt, be one of his first acts.

* * * Notwithstanding the terrific tariff and the bounties, therefore, we are still an almost infinite way from the protectionist ideal of making all our own iron and steel goods at home, while the tax that was to give Ontario coal from Cape Breton as cheap, or cheaper, than the foreign, turns out to be a fine of $300,000 a year on the manufacturers in this province. That Ontario can flourish as a seat of industry under these cruel imposts on the two fundamental articles of all industry, can be believed by no one, unless he allows his partisanship to put out the eye of his understanding.

A very picturesque phrase, indeed. Well, Sir, not only are these papers so talking and so thinking, but as I said, the "Witness" has been for the last ten days calling to the mind of its leaders the pledges which they made, and refusing to believe the dubious hints that are going about the streets of Montreal that after all the protective element will be taken into the tariff, refusing to believe what they had heard, declaring that:

With all this we are in agreement; and we earnestly hope, and have faith, that the Liberals will not betray the cause of free trade and tariff reform and play into the hands of the protectionists, though we are not certain that it would not be politic to cease for a time to urge reciprocity with the United States.

And its final article on "No Surrender," winds up with this:

If the readers of the Liberal journals which published this plank of the party in June last so frequently, voted for the Liberal candidates in reliance upon the word of these journals that the party would be true to its pledges, they must feel sadly betrayed as they read the editorials of these same journals to-day, excusing and defending in anticipation an expected surrender to the protected interests. For our part, we confidently expect the Government to carry out the policy outlined in the above tariff plank of the Liberal platform.

Well, Sir, the final act came, as it must in every case take place, and yesterday we had the Budget brought down to the House. I forgot to mention one other episode, however, which showed that same spirit of wavering, and gave hints of a betrayal of pledges, the celebrated coal episode, but as that has been so well discussed and so thoroughly, I simply mention it as one of others, and will not further transgress upon the patience of the House with regard to it. At last, Sir, the eventful day comes, and the Finance Minister of the Liberal party, which has been out of office and subject to that fiery discipline which makes for principle and purity of motive for eighteen years, finds itself in the position of coming before Parliament and the electorate, and being judged as to its worth, judged as to its faith and honesty, judged as to whether it meant to do anything more than simply canvass, judged as to whether it ignorantly did what it did, and will now frankly confess that it did it ignorantly. For there are but two horns to the dilemma; either the hon. gentlemen made these pledges on principle, and believing that they understood the conditions of this country and foreign countries sufficiently well to tell us unmistakably that they knew what was right and what was wanted by this country—either that, or else they simply were catering for public support irrespective of what they would do after they came into a position of power and responsibility. Will they admit the plea of ignorance; they discredit themselves as statesmen and public men. Will they admit the other, which they are practically doing by going back on their pledges? then they must confess that they are putting themselves in the position of breaking faith and betraying confidence, and that they were not worthy of the support of the Canadian electorate. Yesterday, then, we had the announcement, and yesterday we had a spectacle in this House which, I am quite certain, was never seen before in this Dominion Parliament, and which it will be very difficult ever to put upon the boards a second time in this same Parliament. There was, first, Sir, an elaborate historic reminiscence, which had nothing to do with the principle of the question at all, the sum and substance of that reminiscence being that in 1867 there was a tacit agreement that at that time, at least, the duties should be moderate—an unwritten treaty, my hon. friend characterized it. Well, whatever may have been the thoughts which statesmen may have communicated to each other and which they carried out in practice afterwards, whether you call it an unwritten treaty or a private understanding, no man has any right to make that an argument for the absolute maintenance of that status for all the years of progress of the great Dominion which at that moment was being founded. What pertinence, then, had that argument to the question in point? To-day we are twenty-seven years of age, then we were but in our infancy, then we were four provinces, and now we are this broad Dominion. In 1867 the conditions surrounding us were as widely different from the conditions of to-day as light is from darkness. In 1867 the conditions internally were as different as possible from the conditions of this country internally to-day. That to change a tariff, in rate or principle, which was thought to be the best for the opening years of confederation implies that there is a breach of faith if that change is made in the years of progress and development, is an argument which I think my hon. friend will scarcely adopt at another presentation, and which is scarcely worthy of being brought into the financial utterance. Then, Sir, he says that there were certain causes why protection was pushed up over this unwritten law, and brought into the arena of fruitful discussion. Yes, there were. My hon. friend would not have to go far to find them, he would find a number of them sitting close to himself. If my hon. friend will reach out his left hand about two feet from himself, he will find one of those disturbing causes, for I believe it is on record that in 1877, Mr. Joly, M.P., declared :

The admission of grain free of duty is against the interests of the farmer of Canada, and I am decidedly in favour of protection for the home markets of this country.

Now, if my hon. friend will reach out his right hand about two feet he will strike another one of those impelling motives of that early time, for at that period, in 1871, the Hon. Mr. Laurier declared :

It is humiliating to have to admit that after the existence of three hundred years, this country is not able to supply its own wants. Although nature has been marvellously prodigal in her gifts, and has done so much to make this a manufacturing country, we are yet dependent on foreign countries. It is our duty to foster our national industries.

And in 1876 another impulse was given by the same Mr. Laurier who declared :

It is asserted by many, and assumed by others, that free trade is a Liberal principle and protection a Conservative principle. If I were in Great Britain, I would be a free trader ; but I am a Canadian born and a resident here, and I think that we require protection. We have within ourselves the ability to create an industry. If it is shown that we cannot maintain it, unless by legislation, either in the way of premium or prohibitory tariff, then I should be ready to take that into consideration.

And if he will turn to the seat behind him he will find another one of those impelling causes, who, in 1876, in the person of Mr. Wm. Paterson, M.P., declared :

The Administration should protect our agricultural interests. Such a duty would not bear in any way upon the consumers and would be of great advantage to the interests concerned. The small duty upon grain would benefit the farmers of this country. It is well known that we pay a bonus to the inhabitants of other countries to come into Canada and settle in our midst. I believe, by a defensive tariff that you would not have to pay to bring those men here. Adopt it, and you will find that the steam whistles of our factories will be the call for them to come. The other year, the Finance Minister, in revising our tariff, gave some encouragement to one industry which it never had before. The result was that one thousand men who were engaged in that industry in Germany, were literally transported by the change in the tariff to Canada and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit.

He will find another of those impelling causes sitting over to his right several seats away, in the person of Mr. John Charlton, M.P., who, in 1876, declared :

I believe the agricultural interests would be benefited by protection. I would make a market by bringing the manufacturer to the door of the farmer. The home market is of the greatest value.

How often it happens that an historical reminiscence flies back into one's family and plays mischief therein. My hon. friend thought he was contributing something for the information of the Liberal-Conservative party. What was he doing ? He was giving an opportunity to show that the brightest minds in his own party at that time were impressed with the National Policy, the intellectual and moral element which take their ground and tone from the trend of public opinion and in the halls of Parliament represent the quality of that trend. I have not the least doubt in my own mind that the National Policy victory of 1878-79 was due to the help the old line Liberal-Conservative party got, if not from the votes of those men, from their teachings and their followers in the Liberal party. And yet, we, forsooth, are to be lectured by this new Minister of Finance because there were certain conditions from 1871 to 1876 which operated to impel the people of Canada and the statesmen of Canada on to that ruinous road of protection to our home industries.

Well, Sir, after that reminiscence was over, the hon. Minister of Finance went on to declare that the National Policy had resulted in bitter disappointment and in utter failure. I noticed when he made that statement he received no cheers from the back benches, and I felt such a throb of sympathy in my heart for him that I made an appeal to some hon. gentlemen to cheer, and we had to keep up the spirits of the Finance Minister as best we could by applauding him on the other trends of his argument. He then went on to show the reasons that had acted as an inducement to the adoption of the National Policy, and how illusory they were. First, it was that infant industries should be for a time temporarily assisted. But he declared that the argument was without force because when the infants grew up they still called for the bottle as lustily as when they were at the mother's breast. The hon. gentleman does not seem to have grasped the idea of the changed conditions. The National Policy in the methods of its working, in giving protection at the start, gave a protection which was sufficient to afford our industries vantage ground against competition whatever it was at that time. If ten years afterwards the competition were ten times as keen the very principle of protection would demand that the vantage ground should be a little stronger entrenched in order to keep the industry, grown up or not, on the same vantage ground as regards the strong and merciless competition of trade from other countries all over the world. The second inducement was with a view to secure reciprocity with the United States. I will invite my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) to fight this matter out with the Finance Minister. With respect to this subject both political parties have met with some disappointments. We have been hopeful at times, afterwards we have been depressed, but I have no hesitation in subscribing to this, that there is not on the political horizon, and has not been for the last fifteen years, any very strong indications that reciprocity was a boon likely to be granted to Canada for anything she could give in return, anything she could fairly and advantageously give. And although the statesmen of both parties have tried and have had hopes, and have put those hopes along the line of action, yet it has been in every case to meet with disappointment. The disappointment of hon. gentlemen opposite who made the pilgrimage to Washington a little while ago, is I think, just as keen as was the disappointment of some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who made former visits to Washington on the same business.

But the hon. gentleman's great argument was that there had not been an increase in our population. He showed that the National Policy had been discredited and proved a failure, because when it was supposed that our industries would employ labour, our people had nevertheless left, and our immigration had not been as large as had been confidently expected. I want to put the obverse. Suppose there had not been the National Policy and none of the industries and employment furnished from 1867 to the present time, would we have got as large immigration, and would we have retained as many of our people as we have retained? People do not leave this country because it is not a free country, because the climate is not good and the soil productive, because its institutions are not excellent, or because of any disability in the country naturally, but when men leave this Dominion and go to the United States they go to seek employment or a wider life in some respect than they can secure here. Reduce the employment offered, and would there be a less number of people going to other countries? And the hon. gentleman's argument is not fair when he says he is disappointed with respect to increase in population and the tide of immigration, and that these are due to the National Policy. That is a perfect non sequitur, an argument which is without logic. It may be that certain things happen, that many other things happen, but it takes logic to make one apply to the other in the relation of cause and effect, and the hon. gentleman has failed to do that.

But the hon. gentleman indulged in another reminiscence, and that was about the good old way—when a man established himself at cross-roads, people came to his shop, when he had sons they joined him in the business, the people had confidence in his work, his business increased, and he lived and prospered without a bonus. The hon. gentleman regretted that that is not the method to-day. The hon. gentleman may deplore this fact, but he may rest assured that he will never bring back the old cross-road methods of manufacturing. In Germany, France and England, where there are free trade, protection and revenue tariffs, you will find the old method of business going out of date, and combinations of capitalists prevailing, under which labour is divided into departments so as to insure cheapness in the manufactured product.

That is the tendency of to-day. Free trade does not change it; protection does not change it. Take any basis you like and frame a tariff in a country, and you will never bring back the old cross-road methods of doing manufacturing business. To-day we have changed conditions, and we have to suit ourselves to these changed conditions. But, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) went on to prove that there was protection enough without protection. Now, I do not wonder that his free trade friends yonder should feel a little sore because protection has been kept. Why is it kept? Why do you want 35 per cent on anything, when the Finance Minister told you yesterday that there was sufficient protection in Canada in three things: First, the convenient market, second, the cost and charges of transport, and third, patriotism. Well, Sir, that leads me to remark on the first of these, that convenience has not the same meaning now that it had 25 years ago. The range is very widely spread. To-day it is a fact, that you can send products a thousand miles and land it for less money than you can send it for 200 miles from the interior of the country. Can we change all those conditions? We have not changed them, and so the argument of convenience does not amount to so much as at first sight it would seem. Neither does the argument with reference to transport, which is about the same. Nay more, does not my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) know, that if he attempts to ship a cargo of something, we will say from the western part of Ontario and bring it to Toronto, that he will pay more for the carriage of it than his competitor in Chicago will pay for having it brought from Chicago to Toronto? Can he change all these things? Is he trying to change them? He must change them before his argument on transport amounts to much. But what does transport and convenience both amount to, when you are putting the raw muscle upon the raw material, and making it into the manufactured article, and sending it a thousand miles or two thousand miles across the ocean to market, if you pay one-half for the amount of labour there that you have got to pay to the yeomen labourers of this country. What does it amount to? It amounts to naught, and that, acting as a protection simply does not protect, and the yeoman labourer of Canada must have his industry closed down, or he must work for the starvation wages of the competing country.

But, Sir, as I said, my hon. friend cannot make much of this. Now, can he make much of his argument for patriotism? I am afraid that he brought up a family matter there again. My hon. friend is not asleep.

The PRIME MINISTER. I might.

Mr. FOSTER. I dare say he might. I dare say that sometimes he would like a gentle opiate to sooth the pangs of conscience which must often come to him when he hears of broken pledges. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) had a phrase which he used in the city of Boston; it was one of his nicely turned phrases. In short it was this: the mistake, the fatal mistake, is to think that allegiance, British allegiance, is the basis of trade. He was speaking to his Boston audience. He was declaring, that what he intended to do when he came into power, was, to give them a free road into this country and to get a free road into that country as far as he could. He wanted reciprocity with the United States of America, and he was willing to give them unrestricted reciprocity. He was combatting the argument, that may be, in Canada the loyal sentiment would set into trade channels towards the mother country. He declared it was a fatal mistake to think, that allegiance, British allegiance, was the basis of trade. But what else did he say? Here, in this House, in the country, over and over again, he said: I would just as soon have an American sixpence as an English shilling. That is the way he put it, although I never could tell what he meant by it. What he probably did mean to say was, that he would just as soon have American as English money. How often has he said, that he is loyal but his loyalty does not ooze out of his fingers, and that when it comes to Canadian interests he is going to look after them, and let Lord Salisbury look after British interests. Patriotism under that calculation, will never bring the Canadian people to buy Canadian goods. I grant, to some extent, that Canadian people in certain cases, would rather have foreign than Canadian-made goods. There are natural causes for that. Men buy what they have been accustomed to buy; that is one reason, and it is hard to switch them off from that custom. Men buy for fashion sake, men buy in other cases for the name's sake, and for one reason or another, English goods, foreign goods, will be brought in, and higher prices will be paid for them even though they are no better than Canadian goods. But to say that that was a result of the National Policy, as my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) argued, was another complete non sequitur. He tried to base an argument against the National Policy, because for instance, people were not patriotic enough to buy Canadian goods. Well, Sir, there is one thing which has been done in the last ten years, and that is, that the National Policy has removed nine-tenths of that prejudice against Canadian goods. The National Policy and the Liberal-Conservative administration of it, has at least given Canadian capital, and Canadian labour, and Canadian enterprise, an opportunity to show to the Canadian people, that just as good things can be made in their own country as can be made in other countries. Well, Sir, up to this time during the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), there was noticeable a blank look of sullenness on hon. gentlemen opposite. Just a few countenances were a little irradiated, but most of his friends began to think: well, after all, we believe they are going to carry out their pledges. They felt that they must have been mistaken when the whole trend of the argument was so irresistibly conclusive against, not only the inception but the continuation of the National Policy. Then gloom settled down upon these Tory-Grits that the Montreal "Witness" speaks of, who are about to betray their party, and a light and cheerful countenance was discernible only in the case of my hon. friend yonder (Mr. Mc-Millan), and two or three others of his kindred spirits.

The Minister of Finance was wonderful in resources last night. He could argue straight and dead against a thing, and he could turn around when he saw that his followers were becoming depressed and argue just the other way. And, so he took a different trend and the kaleidoscopic changes came swift and fast; red, and green, and black, and scarlet, and then a sort of a dazzling combination that no man on earth could fitly characterize. To use a classical phrase:

He wiggled in and wiggled out,
With many a twisting turn and bout,
And kept the hunters still in doubt
If he were in or he were out.

I cannot state the authorship, and I do not know whether it is a rhyme or not, but at all events it suits the subject.

Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) came to the crucial point. After having demonstrated that the National Policy in its inception was a failure, and in its carrying out was a failure, and after showing reasons why there was sufficient natural protection here without putting on any more protection, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) at last came down to the point, and he asked: How is this to be brought about? Well, he had to buoy himself up. He went over to London and got a writer from the "Times" who declared, that you must not be too pedantic in your theories; you must bring about changes slowly. He then got hold of Lord Farrer, who evidently is a thinker on a parity with himself, and who declares: That it is quite sufficient if he will just disown the theory,—never mind the practice. And, Lord Farrer was lifted to the seventh heaven, because he had private information that the Liberals of Canada had got so far that they had disowned the theory of protection, but the practice of protection they intended to sustain.

Having buoyed himself up on these two erudite and far-distant authorities, he came to his own reasons. He argued that the National Policy men had no vested rights—"The Liberal-Conservatives say they have, but we say they have not, and we have a perfect right to shut down on them here and now, and they have no right to say a word against it." He made the astonishing assertion that the trade of this country, based on parliamentary enactment, was simply speculation and gambling, and that if the people of this country, constitutionally governed as it is, issue their fiat, and through the Government of the day, enact it into law, no more attention is to be paid to their action than you would pay to the throw of a gambler's dice. The National Policy man, he says, goes into the business as a gambler; if he wins, the gain is his; if he loses, let him pay up and look pleasant. I hope, Sir, that doctrine will never mark the statesmanship of this country. I hope that whenever this Parliament of Canada lays down a basis of action, and invites capital and labour to go in on that basis and build up their industries, and in the course of time a change of opinion comes, it will never even be argued that the Government of that time is not to take account of what the view of the commonwealth was at a preceding time. I hope my hon. friend will not persist in that doctrine. It is a doctrine which, as applied to this case, cannot be sustained by argument or by reason, and will not be sustained by the country.

Then he puts in a plea for keen competition. He said that manufacturers ought to have keen competition; they were lazy in their methods, behind the time, not up to date, and it would be well to let in the keen air of free trade competition. Then, my hon. free trade friend began to look pleasant, and said to himself, "It is coming our way this time; they are really going to carry out their pledges." But there came another turn. The hon. gentleman invoked the platform of 1893, reading it in a Delphic double sense, so that in one sense it was principle or death, and in the other it was expediency and life. And so, proceeding and ringing the changes on it as he did, when he got through I noticed that the face of my hon. free trade friend was a perfect brown study—he did not know on which end he was standing. At last, after all this going in and coming out, all this strong and conclusive argument, and all this fulmination as to the wickedness and the wrong of the protective tariff, it came out that what the hon. gentleman proposed to do was to adopt, to all intents and purposes, the tariff of the Liberal-Conservative party, which was put on the Statute-book in 1894. How many changes have been made in it? Go through it and read them. Leaving out wines, spirits and tobacco, take the articles in the tariff, item by item; read over and count up those that are changed and those that are unchanged, and you will find that nine-tenths of the tariff remains exactly as we left it in 1894. my hon. friend took nearly two hours of argument yesterday to show was bad in its inception and worse in its action.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER. What then is the result, when we come down to absolute action on the part of the Government of the day, as announced to the House through the Finance Minister? There are two results. First, that the Liberal party, headed by my hon. friend, the First Minister, has declared, through its Finance Minister, to this House and the country and the world its deliberate adoption of the principle of protection. It has embalmed that principle in its tariff; and if it has, in some few cases, lightened the duties upon special articles, in other cases it has added to the protection which was upon these articles under the old tariff. Whatever may be said in palliation, or excuse or extenuation, that fact is one which remains from this time forward on the statute-books of the country, that there is to-day in this Parliament, as between the two sides, practically no difference upon the expediency of the principle of protection as the guiding principle of our fiscal system. Not only is their principal and main tariff schedule founded avowedly, founded absolutely on the principle of protection, and comparatively high protection, but the only novel feature which they have about their tariff of to-day, and it is certainly a novel feature, is one which is only possible because of the adoption of the principle of protection. If my hon. friends had taken free trade and embalmed its principles in their tariff, they could have had no second tariff schedule. If they had adopted the principle of a revenue tariff on free trade lines, they could have had no reciprocal or second column in the tariff which they ask this House to pass to-day. From the time that protection was born in this country until to-day, there were two purposes it had in view. The first was to stimulate the industries of this country, in the competition, becoming every day more merciless, with foreign countries,—an outside competition added to the inside competition which has always been growing keener; and the second was to enable this country, when the opportune and proper time came, by lowering to a certain extent some of the items in her protective tariff, to gain for herself reciprocal trade privileges with other countries which are willing to give something in return for something we are willing to give them. Without a protective tariff no such reciprocal commerce could take place between this country and any other country, so that the very purpose for which a protective policy was adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party and maintained by it for eighteen years is to-day, in its entirety, swallowed whole by the Liberal party. After eighteen years of virulent denunciation and abuse of that policy, to-day they embalm it upon the statute-books of this country as their own.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, thought it was necessary for him to make some excuses why they did that, and I wish the House to attend carefully to these excuses. The House will see what his reasons, if we can dignify them by that name, were. What was his first statement? It was that in 1893 things were different from what they are now, referring to the United States of America. What was his next statement? It was this. In 1893 it looked like tariff reform in the United States, and so the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, while it looked like tariff reform in the United States, was what? Either one of principle or one of speculation. If it were one of speculation they built up their platform upon the mere supposition that may be the United States of America was going to relax its protective duties and so grant reciprocity. The speculative principle is strong in my hon. friend the Finance Minister. All trade is a speculation. If this was a matter of speculation, their idea was: It looks as if we might get reciprocity with the United States; things are not quite so hard as they were, and we may gain reciprocity by proclaiming ourselves a free trade or revenue tariff party. That was the reason, if there was any reason. But did you hear the Finance Minister, five minutes afterwards, declare that it looks to-day as if reciprocity might be got from the American Congress, and so they are going to keep up the tariff walls instead of taking them down? When it looked as if reciprocity were possible of attainment in 1893, they declared for the lowering of the tariff walls in order to get reciprocity. When it looks like reciprocity coming in 1897, they keep up the tariff walls in order to get reciprocity. Where is their consistency, where is their argument, where is their reason? But I take higher grounds than that; I do not put it down as low as the Finance Minister. I am one of those who believe that in 1893 the Liberals founded their policy on what they called and believed to be a principle. If the principle was good in 1893 under the McKinley tariff, it is equally good to-day under the Dingley Bill proposed, which is only 5 or 6 per cent more on the average than the McKinley Bill of 1893. Is it possible that what I stated the other night by way of rejoinder to an hon. gentleman on the other side, is true—that a principle with hon. gentlemen opposite is not sacred if it has had a day or two to cool, that they change with the passing days? Whichever horn of the dilemma the Finance Minister takes, whether he says it was on a speculative basis that their policy was framed in 1893, or whether he says it was a matter of principle, his argument is lame. If it was a question of principle then the principle remains; if it was a question of speculation, then the action of to-day should be exactly the same as the action of 1893, which was to lower the tariff walls in order to get reciprocity. Now, Sir, what is there in the excuse that the United States have changed? What was the state of things ever since the Liberal party have been denouncing protection in Canada? High tariff in the United States. Did gentlemen opposite ever stop in their denunciation, because, for instance, under the high tariff in the United States we would not throw down our tariff wall? Never. And the hon. gentleman who leads their party to-day introduced his illustration of Chinese duelling as his reply to an argument of that kind, that because the United States chose to hurt themselves, we should hurt ourselves in like manner. In 1893, when they sat in convention and formulated their party policy on the tariff, the McKinley Bill was in operation, and the McKinley Bill put an average duty on dutiable imports of 49·58 per cent, or nearly 50 per cent in round numbers. To-day, when they are deciding as to what they shall do, the Wilson Bill is the law of the land in the United States. If it is to be the law of the land no longer, its place will be taken by the Dingley Bill, which, under the proposition sent to the Senate is only a little more than 50 per cent on the average of dutiable goods. Does that make a difference in principle sufficient to completely change the foundation upon which the tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite shall be based? Are they so much affected in their policy by a difference of 4 or 5 per cent in the protection of the United States, when at least it will go to 50 per cent? Hon. gentlemen must answer that question, if not here, to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite must recollect that there are sensible, honest, intelligent people in this country who are watching them, who cannot believe up to this day that it can ever be said in a British country that a great party would spend its whole life-time in opposition in support of a certain policy, and the very moment it came into power would take up the exact converse which it had been opposing for eighteen years. "I am a Liberal of the old Liberal school," is the boast my hon. friend the leader of the Government has often made, the boast he makes nearly every time he gets upon the platform. Can he point out to me an English Liberal of the old Liberal school who would put himself in the position that the hon. gentleman and his party have taken? An English Liberal of the old Liberal school has the sturdy love of principle and honour which would prevent him doing that, which would prevent him from leading his party along a line which means the repudiation of every promise given to the electors when the party making the promise stood in front of them asking them for their votes. But there is one phase of this matter as to the keeping of pledges—no, I beg pardon, as to the breaking of pledges—which demands special notice, and that is the compact made between the Liberals through the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Patrons of Industry. The Patrons of Industry, without going into their history, without saying a word as to the basis of their organization, as to the objects they had in view, or as to the means they adopted to achieve those objects, at the opening of the contest between the Liberals and the Conservatives were a large and important organization in Ontario. The present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) catered for the Patron vote. He catered for it by bringing in proposals and trying to make them legislation in this House, knowing that he could not make them legislation, knowing exactly what he was doing and the purpose for which he was doing it. In this seat or hereabouts, in tones of virtuous indignation, he railed against the Governor's General's salary. The Patrons do not want Government House here at all, so their platform said. It was monstrous, he thought, that a salary of $50,000 should be paid by the poor people of Canada to the Governor General. That salary ought to be reduced, and the hon. gentleman introduced a Bill to reduce it. Why? Was it a good thing to do then? Then it is a better thing for him to do now, when he has got the power to do it. Will he do it?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. He has accomplished his purpose. He is where he is. What cares he for the principles of a month or a year or two years ago. The Postmaster General catered to the Patrons in another point. He was not going to have any passes used by members of Parliament. A man could not be independent who took a pass. Oh, it was a terrible thing to take a pass. The very fact that you had it in your pocket made you a slave of the railway company. Whether all your brother members had them or not, it affected your independence, and it was wrong. He is where he can prohibit it now, if he has any influence with his Government. Will he, has he, attempted it? He has gained his purpose; he is where he is, and the Patrons are where they are. The Patrons have an abhorrence of the Senate, they want it abolished. Has any Liberal behind the Government benches yet moved to abolish the Senate, or are they diligently appointing their friends to vacancies, and praying for other senators to die that they may appoint other friends? You have heard of that Bashaw with three tails. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a song thereon and applied it to my late friend, Sir Leonard Tilley; and he thought that a Bashaw with three tails was nothing to a Cabinet Minister with a son-in-law. How does he think it is now? Is it better to be a Bashaw with three tails and sporting in Turkey, or to be a Minister with a son to whom he gives an office?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Or a cousin.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, but I never sang the song of the Bashaw. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a remnant of a bright historic period which had much of virtue and worth about it. He is, where he is; but he has a fraction of Tory principles in him yet. He has failed in this respect, and he feels his failure; but my impression is yet, that his seat is not comfortable to him when, as an English gentleman and a knight, he passed his word to the electorate of this country and to-day sits there without dissent and goes back on his word. The Postmaster General was so virtuously indignant that there should be some members of this Parliament so lost to all sense of independence as to accept from the Government an office if one were to be vacant, or as to contemplate, when their seats become vacant by effluxion of time, going into the position of a judgeship or something else—so virtuously indignant was he that he introduced first, a resolution, and then a Bill, to make it a high crime and misdemeanour for a single member of Parliament to take an office within a year after he had actually resigned, or ceased to become a member of this House. He is to-day a member of a Government that can make that principle law if they like, or if he likes. Has he done it? No,

Sir. But hon. gentlemen opposite have bought off men who supported them, to the mutual pleasure of the man who was salaried and to their own comfort as well; to the pleasure of the man who was salaried because otherwise he would have had to take his seat in the House, and, as a true gentleman and a man of honour, to have found fault with the Government on a line consistent with the pledge he made in this House years ago. But where is the Postmaster General? Where is he? Sadly the echo answers: Where is he? An important member of a Government committing the very sin and crime that he denounced when he was on this side of the House and introduced his Bill. But all the time the Postmaster General had an eye to the windward of the Patrons of this country. Everything of this kind was catering to the Patrons. But other men catered. Sir Richard Cartwright, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I have an item here to show, wrote a letter to the Patrons. He loved them—so far as love is possible in his somewhat austere composition, and he poured it out right royally. He loved them most of all when he was up west in a certain constituency when he declared:

As for the Patrons of Industry, their platform and that of the Liberal party were identical as regards Dominion issues; and he counselled that no division of the vote that opposed great abuses and wrongs, should be permitted. Do not allow divisions to creep in and imperil the great cause of an aggrieved people by dividing the vote that should be massed against the common enemy.

And the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) loved the Patrons, and declared:

All its principles were identical with those of the Liberal party, and for every one of them Mr. McMullen had stood a staunch supporter and defender during all of his parliamentary career.

My hon. friend was giving a helping hand to the hon. member for North Wellington:

No good reason could be given for withdrawing from him the support of a single Patron elector in North Wellington, and he desired to raise a voice of warning against permitting a division of that portion of the electorate which stood opposed to existing abuses.

Sir Richard Cartwright is said to have spoken—at least he is reported in the "Globe" of January 29th, 1895—at Kingston, and amongst other things he said:

He desired, above all things, that there should be no quarrel with those who had joined the Patrons of Industry. Their platforms were the same; their cause could only be made doubtful by division. That was what the Conservatives were praying for.

And a Mr. Schell, called upon after the hon. gentleman had ceased speaking, also thought that:

It would be a misfortune if the Liberals and Patrons should be divided. Their platforms were identical, and their objects the same. He believed the majority of the Patrons of South Oxford would be willing, as he was himself, to stand by the nominee of the Liberal Convention.

Mr. FOSTER.

Now, I think that shows pretty well a close degree of consanguinity, so far as political relationship can go. What is the platform of the Patrons? In 1895, January 23rd, the Grand Board of Patrons of Industry issued a manifesto outlining the demands made by the Patrons in connection with Dominion affairs. I am not going to read it all, but I will read some of it, for it is very instructive:

No member of the House of Commons shall receive a free pass from any railroad or steamship company; any member accepting such a free pass to be disqualified for membership in the House of Commons or for any position in the gift of the Government for a space of five years. The present Postmaster General was at one with them on that.

The Government House at Ottawa shall be abolished.

He did not quite go so far as the abolition of Government House, but he wanted to abolish a very considerable portion of the salary of the incumbent of the Government House, which would probably have had the very same effect.

The system of superannuation, gratuities and pensions, except for military service, should be abolished.

There is a Bill for its abolition, but, strange to say, it is a Bill that does not abolish superannuation.

The Mounted Police of the North-west Territories should be abolished, except for unorganized districts.

We have no intimation that the Government is preparing that programme.

The Military College at Kingston shall be abolished, and the expenditure on the militia force of the Dominion in times of peace shall be limited to $300,000.

That, I believe, is not contemplated by my hon. friend, at least, it did not appear in the Queen's Speech.

The granting of subsidies and bonuses to railroad and steamship companies and other corporations shall be abolished.

I have not heard that that is in contemplation. The Crow's Nest Pass business is, I believe, not quite settled, a grave struggle is taking place. A very prominent member of that Government, when in the North-west, promised everybody that the Government would take hold and build it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, it was my hon. friend who promised it, with the significant remark—

Mr. DOMVILLE. Don't make any charges.

Mr. FOSTER. With the significant and patronizing remark which he made upon the platform: My hon. friend the Minister of Railways, in his official position, cannot make these promises, but I am here to make them for him.

The entire number of civil servants at Ottawa will be reduced.

I believe the statutory increases have been taken off, and some officers have been dismissed. How far it is to go, I do not know.

The High Commissioner in Great Britain will receive a stated salary, without any addition for assistants, or perquisites.

I have not heard and do not gather from the Estimates that this plank in the platform is being carried out:

The number of Cabinet Ministers will be reduced, and the Canadian Senate will be abolished.

My friend the Postmaster General was strong on that, and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), whom the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) thinks deserves well of the Patrons of his county who should stand by him, was also at one time strong on that plank. A noble pair of brothers, they stood side by side in the House, and their voices were lifted up together in sweet unison in a prayer for Parliament to do that same thing, to reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers and at the same time the salaries of those Ministers. But since the Postmaster General draws the salary, and my hon. friend is drawn by the Postmaster General, we hear nothing of these things.

But, Sir, we come a little further on to something more explicit still in the Patron platform:

Liquors should be taxed to the fullest revenue producing extent, and the following be admitted free into Canada:—cottons, tweeds, woollens, workingmen's tools, farm implements, fence wire, binder twine, coal oil, iron and corn; and, in addition, the tariff will be for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall as far as possible on the luxuries and not on the necessaries of life.

Now, Sir, what have the Patrons been given by my hon. friend? They asked that cottons should be made free. The cotton schedule is made higher. Does any hon. gentleman deny it?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Most assuredly we do.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman denies that they have raised the duty on white cottons and gray cottons.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may deny it. I must take his denial, but it is written in the tariff presented last night.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman stated at the commencement of his speech that he did not understand what he was talking about.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, we get a little of that undiluted chivalry of the good old Tory in the depreciation of everything else that does not centre in the possessor's own brain. The Minister of Trade and Commerce feels sore—I know it, he knows it.

An hon. MEMBER. Not so sore as you do.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman had the reversion of the Finance Ministership. At least he is authority for my statement; he said so, it was reported in the public prints. He will not deny it. I have been told on very good authority that he came down all harnessed and ready to take it, that at the last moment it was thought better, on account of certain qualities of the hon. gentleman, that he should remain a little in the background and that a new and younger man should take the place. But the cotton schedule is made higher.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is not.

Mr. FOSTER. The cottons known as white and gray, bleached and unbleached, which under the old tariff were at 22½ per cent, have been raised to 25 per cent. That is the answer given to the Patrons. Tweeds and woollens—have they been made free? No. They have been changed somewhat, but they have been kept at what the Finance Minister described as the highest rate in his tariff, 35 per cent. The Patrons asked that they be free. By the way, why was 35 per cent put upon woollens and a specific duty taken off, and why was the duty on cement increased? Can any one tell the reason?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mu- lock). The duty on cement is not increased.

Mr. FOSTER. There speaks another hon. Minister who is incorrect. The duty on cement was 40 cents per barrel. The standard barrel is 450 pounds.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It does not say standard barrel.

Mr. FOSTER. It is every barrel. It applies to small barrels as well as large; but in the course of competition, with the duty at 40 cents per barrel, the trade soon "got on" and used a large barrel. The standard barrel is 450 pounds. Some barrels have come into Montreal with 475 pounds in them. A duty of 12½ per cent makes on a standard barrel very nearly 20 per cent advance, and on a barrel containing 475 pounds 25 per cent advance.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Rubbish.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member from King's elegantly says it is "rot."

Mr. DOMVILLE. Not ex-King's, but for King's.

Mr. FOSTER. The Patrons ask that workmen's tools should be made free. They have not been made free—they are taxed. They also asked that farm implements be made free. They have been kept at the same rate. The only reduction the farmers have obtained on farm implements was the large reduction we gave in 1894, when the duty was reduced from 35 to 20 per cent, and it is kept at 20 per cent to-day despite the request of the Patrons of Industry. But while they have kept the tax up on farm implements, they are taking good care to look after those "scoundrels great, and scoundrels small," by giving them reduced iron and reduced raw material. Fence wire, they have made free. It did not bear a protective duty; it bore simply a revenue tariff rate. Hon. gentlemen opposite have, therefore, not gone against the principle of protection; they have simply dropped a revenue tariff item. As regards binder twine, the same remarks apply. Twelve and a half per cent was the lowest possible special rate that could be put on under a revenue tariff, for unenumerated articles bore 12 per cent. It has been thrown out, but this did not include the principle of protection. It was a low revenue tariff rate, and hon. gentlemen opposite have given the farmers exactly the reduction we gave in 1894, a reduction of 12½ per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not until Hobbs of London has unloaded what he has on hand.

Mr. FOSTER. You must always take care of the boy. Coal oil was to be free. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries stumped the country from one end to the other on a coal oil can, and on the top of it he has elevated the percentage of the protection away up in the hundreds. He has gained many Patrons and farmers' votes, because they put confidence in him, that when he became a powerful member of a powerful Government, his pledge would be carried out and coal oil would be made free. Is it made free, and how much of the high percentage have they shaved off? They have taken off one cent a gallon, and coal oil is left very high still.

Iron was asked to be free by the Patrons. It has not been made free. It has been lowered, but for every dollar that has been lowered on the basic irons, there has been a bounty by the Liberal party endorsing a policy which for all these years they have fulminated against; and they have made the bounty on iron higher. That bounty system, which, if anything, is gall and wormwood to absolute free traders, is the system which they have adopted.

Corn they have made free. Seven and a half cents per bushel has been taken off, and whilst they have pleased some of the Patrons and some of the feeders, they will find that they have not benefited others who look to the coarse grains which they grow for a large proportion of the income from their farms, and who will find that free corn very largely interferes with it.

And finally, the Patrons asked for a tariff for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall upon the luxuries and not upon the necessities of life. The answer of the Government has been given to them in the tariff. Every line and word of it is, first, a protection tariff, nearly as high on the average and higher on some items than the tariff of the Liberal-Conservative party. Now, Sir, have the Patrons a cause against my hon. friends opposite? The Liberals have in the campaign curried favour with the Patrons, subscribed to their doctrines, flattered them that they were at one in the carrying out of their aims; and, when they came into power, when the very first opportunity is afforded them of carrying out their pledges, not one single pledge that was asked by the Patrons and in reference to which the present Government stated that the platform of the Patrons and the Liberals were alike; not one single pledge has been honoured, not one important abatement of the protective tariff asked has been given, and the only thing that has been done to drop three revenue tariff items to a low rate.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Carried.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Domville) has all he can carry.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. member for York has more than he can carry.

Mr. FOSTER. What else has been done in this tariff? It was asked by the Patrons, and it was a plank of the Liberal platform, through and through, that luxuries should be taxed to the utmost limit, and that they should be the first thing upon which a revenue tariff should be levied. What has happened? I have been speaking up to this time of the principle of the main tariff that these hon. gentlemen have made the tariff of this country. It will be moderated in so far as they can get reciprocity treaties with countries unknown, or with countries which to-day do not have them. But the tariff is a high protective tariff, according to the thinking of hon. gentlemen on the other side. They have raised by a very slight amount the duties upon luxuries, but in their proposition for a reciprocal tariff which they declare they hope to carry out to perfection, they have made a piece of machinery which will take one-fourth the duty off these luxuries. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, shakes his head in dissent, but let me tell him this. To-day, upon silverware we have 25 per cent. It was increased by hon. gentlemen opposite in the main tariff to 30 per cent. But if they are honest in carrying out the reciprocal idea, they have made a provision for taking one-fourth of that duty off, which will reduce silver-ware to 22½ per cent, or 2½ per cent less than it was under the old tariff.

Jewellery in the old tariff is 25 per cent, they advanced it to 30 per cent, but they have arranged a piece of machinery, which if it means anything will drop one-quarter of that duty, and make jewellery 22½ per cent.

High-priced linens were 25 per cent under the old tariff, but they have arranged a piece of machinery which if it is carried out, will reduce that to 22½ per cent. Silks under the Conservative tariff are 30 per cent, but they have arranged for a reduction of one-quarter, if they are honest in it, which will make the duty on silks 26¼ per cent.

Therefore, the demand of the Patrons, that the duties should be raised on luxuries, and the pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite that they would raise the duty on luxuries, have not been carried out. My hon. friend the Prime Minister chuckles as he sits there, because the pledge has not been carried out. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) one word to say against the fact that I state: that if he is honest in getting reciprocity with any country which produces jewellery, his machinery will reduce jewellery one-fourth, and bring it down to 22½ per cent. No, Sir, the hon. gentleman cannot answer it.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is mistaken about my chuckling. I laughed at the manner in which the hon. gentleman answered himself about cotton.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite see that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is chuckling because he thinks I have involved myself in a difficulty. It is the hon. gentleman that has involved himself in a difficulty, not myself, as I will show him a little later on.

Have they made any change in the classification, against which they had many hard things to say when in Opposition? No. The first word the Finance Minister uttered last night, was, that the classification would remain practically the same as in the old tariff Act.

Have they made any change upon principle in specific duties? None. Is it a principle with hon. gentlemen opposite that ad valorem duties shall take the place of specific duties? They have said so. If it is, why they have left six-tenths of the specific duties that were in the old tariff, perhaps nine-tenths of them. They had a principle in Opposition, namely, ad valorem vs. specific duties. No man was keener in it than my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but to-day they have shown that they have no principle, and that they are simply rigging the tariff on expediency. Here a specific duty, there an ad valorem duty, and here a specific duty again. Principle does not rule; it is simply a patch up and make up of an expediency tariff.

If there was any principle that hon. gentlemen opposite held in Opposition, it was the principle of the good old English school: that bounties were an abomination. To-day, they take up the system of bounties, and they heighten the range of the bounties of the old Government and of the old policy.

Such are some of the leading characteristics of that tariff. Now, I have one word to say, and only one, with reference to the increases in the duties on spirits and tobacco. The duties that existed on these articles were, in my mind—I may be wrong—up to the highest point of revenue production. Whenever you get beyond a certain point in a rate of duty on liquors or on cigarettes, cigars or fine tobacco, you get to a point where you lose revenue instead of gaining. No man would have been more willing than myself to have made tobaccos and liquors bear a stronger proportion of the services of this country; and in both of my tariff revisions, I went into that matter most thoroughly, and I came to the conclusion—I may have been wrong—that we had on liquors, cigars and cigarettes the highest revenue-producing duties. To add 15 cents a gallon to the duty on liquors, to add dollars to the cigarette duty, and to add largely to the tobacco duty, is not, I think, going to add to the revenue. If it does not, what is the purpose of putting on these increases? If they will give an impetus to smuggling, to which there is already a sufficient impetus, and will not help the revenue, why put them on? I am afraid my hon. friends have made a mistake in that, and will find by experience—which, after all, is the only thing that can teach—that when they come to make up the revenue and so put against it the added cost of watching the borders, their expected increase of revenue will prove imaginary.

My hon. friends have kept the principle of protection in the tariff, but they have made some interference with it which I am afraid will be fatal to the industries themselves. If they are going to adopt the principle of protection, and keep sixty cents a ton on coal for a large interest in one province, why should they imperil the great and widely-distributed woollen industries of this country, which are spread from British Columbia to Cape Breton—which come nearer to that cross-road development of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance than any large industry we have? These small woollen mills are everywhere scattered throughout the country, a market for the farmers' wool, and a supply for the farmer's wear. I reduced the duty on woollens by 5 cents on the pound, keeping 5 cents a pound on 25 per cent; and under that reduction of duty some mills have been closed and the industry has been hard put to it. My firm belief is that with 5 cents a pound off, and simply a 35 per cent left on we may bid adieu to the greater part of the widely distributed woollen industry of this country.

I hope not, but I fear that such will be the case.

About buggies, carriages, pleasure-carts, and the like of that : there is an article of manufacture which has to-day in this country a hard struggle to maintain itself against American competition ; and it has found it impossible successfully to maintain itself against that competition without the imposition of specific duties on the low-priced article. That specific duty has been cut off ; and with simply the ad valorem duty on I must express the fear that the business of carriage, buggy and pleasure-cart making in this country, so far as honest making is concerned, is a thing of the past, and that what will be done hereafter will be the assembling of parts or the importation of the made article.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Bicycles.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has something the matter with him. I do not know what. I would take it very kindly, Mr. Speaker, if you would try to find out. The same remark applies to carpets, although the duty on yarns has been reduced, which may mitigate the reduction on carpets to a certain extent. A similar remark applies to confectionery, a large interest in this country. Thirty-five per cent was sufficient protection for the confectionery business when sugar was free ; but when half a cent a pound is put on sugar, and only the ad valorem duty is kept on confectionery, and what applied as a specific duty upon it to counterbalance the rise in the duty on the raw material is taken off, I fear that that industry will fall a prey to the confectionery industries of others than Canadians.

The manufacture of shirts, collars, and cuffs forms an industry in this country which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) may smile at ; but I can take him down to the French constituencies in and around Montreal, and I can show him one of the most widely spread home industries you will find in Canada, which is to-day distributed amongst hundreds and thousands of habitants' houses where the women add to the daily fare and the keep of their homes by working on these articles at a moderate rate. I say that with simply an ad valorem duty that business goes to Troy or to Germany and Belgium, or to England. This may be a small thing, but it is the multiplicity of these small industries which constitute the comfort and well-being of the masses of the people ; and if we are to keep a protective tariff at all, no man in this country feels the impost added to the cost of his shirts and collars and the like of that, compared at all with the derangement and destruction of an industry which goes into the homes of hundreds and thousands of people in the rural districts around the cities and villages of this country.

Mr. FOSTER.

I might go on particularizing, but I simply make these statements with regard to these few things. But when the duties on these are being reduced, when out of these homes the means of livelihood have been taken, when the hundreds of small woollen mills are put to it in the fight with merciless competition, with small vantage ground, what excuses the keeping of 60 cents a ton on coal, which the Toronto "Globe," relying on the word of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), relying on the pledged word of the Minister who leads this Government, declared should as a raw material come in free ? What can be said to these other maimed and maybe destroyed industries, when this great industry, which Mr. Hardy, in the presence of the Prime Minister on the platform in Brantford, declared was run by a New York or Boston syndicate, is left untouched ? Did we expect that the coal duties would be taken off ? Yes, and why ? Because we had faith in the pledged word of the Prime Minister of to-day, the leader of the party, who a few months ago said :

We are told we must not destroy the manufacturing of Montreal. I say we are not going to destroy the industries of Montreal.

I contend, on the contrary, that an application of the ideas of the hon. Minister of Finance will inaugurate an era of prosperity such as Montreal has not seen since the inauguration of the National Policy. The present system raises the maximum of taxation, not only on the consumer, but also on the producer. They have a tax on iron, which is also the raw material of every industry, and a tax on coal, which is also a raw material of every industry, of 60 cents a ton ; and, although I have not the latest quotations in coal, I am afraid that this tax is equivalent to 40 per cent. Now, I am asked, What are you going to do ? I have just told you. We are going to have a tariff for revenue and to abolish the duties on raw materials. I say that, if we were to have a revenue tariff, raw materials would be free. Raw materials are not free to-day under the protective system. There are certain raw materials which are free. Wool is free ; thank heaven, they have not thought of taxing it, and cotton is free also. But iron is not free, nor is coal ; and while cotton and wool are the raw materials of some industries, coal and iron are the raw materials of them all. If you have a revenue tariff, these will be free.

Had not Mr. Hardy a good right to expect, when he promised free coal to the people of Brantford, that his promise would be implemented ? But the hon. First Minister had an able coadjutor, who sits beside him to-night in the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who has been looked upon as the strong man of the Cabinet, and he declared standing in this House :

Now, if there be a principle of political economy clearer than another, it is the principle that the worst tax which could be imposed is a tax on a necessary of life like coal. Moreover, it is a tax exceedingly partial and unjust in its effects. It is one which will fall specially on the poorer-class of the community in the depth of winter, and it is absolutely sectional, pressing heavily on the people of Ontario, and not at all on the great mass of the people in the other provinces. While in that province it is a standing grievance, it is a most doubtful benefit to Nova Scotia.

And the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries declared :

Protection is false and delusive, and if the coal industry cannot live without being propped up by protection, then we say it is as well for the country that the coal industry should go.

Had not Mr. Hardy proper ground for believing that, under those pledges, he was perfectly right in saying to the people of Brantford, on the eve of one of the most strongly contested elections they ever had : Elect our man, support our party, and coal will be free ; $800,000 of a tax will be taken off, which the Toronto "Globe" says is nearly all paid by Ontario.

To-day what have we ? These gentlemen have not only not taken off the duty on this necessary of life but have commissioned their own man to declare that not only will he keep the duty on coal which is now dutiable, but that, under certain contingencies, he will add a duty on anthracite coal, of which one and a half million of tons are brought into the country yearly and are consumed mostly by the farmers of the country, especially of Ontario. But coal has not been reduced by these gentlemen who pledged themselves to reduce it, and who to-day, when in power, sit calmly there and see their broken pledges brought before them and feel within their inmost hearts that they have not kept faith with the people who trusted them and voted for them on the pledges they gave.

And rice—how shall I harrow up the soul of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) by bringing up this matter of rice ? 17½ per cent was on the uncleaned, and I brought that duty up to three-tenths of a cent, and kept the protection on the finished article the same as it was, and I received Hail Columbia from my hon. friend. It was an outrage that the food of the poor people should be taxed 1¼ cents. Why is it taxed now ? I asked that question of the hon. Minister of Finance, and he replied : We must have revenue. Why, that is what I said in 1894. I was getting more revenue by bringing it up from 17½ per cent to three-tenths of a cent, and the answer of my hon. friend—it is down in the "Hansard"—was : I can show you how you will get much more revenue than that—put a lower duty on the cleaned rice ; so many millions of pounds are used in the country, you will get cheap food for the people and four or five times the revenue. Does not the same answer apply to-day, or is a principle just three days old no longer a principle ? Now, I come for a moment to that second phase of the question, but before I touch that, I wish to read to you Resolution No. 16, which is as follows :—

That whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that as respects any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of such article, or the dealers therein, or any portion of them, to enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, and that such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article, when imported, then the Governor in Council shall place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it, as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

That is a power which, I humbly submit, no Government ought to ask in its own interests, in the interests of clean and pure Government, in the interests of satisfactory justice in this country. Who is to be the judge ? A partisan body of men are to be the judges in each case. Should they put themselves in that position ? Now, I am not arguing from any partisan point of view.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Of course not.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some hon. gentlemen, I suppose, who will not believe me, but I make the assertion conscious of its truth. I, as a member of the Government, would not have that power put in my hands because it is not a proper power for the peace of a Government, for the good of a Government, or its standing in the country. The very moment the Government begin to work on that, what happens ? Here is a large manufacturing industry which is run by persons who are of an opposite political faith from the Cabinet which sits as the judge. Now, we may have all the faith possible in human nature, but we know that there is partisanship in Canada as between two parties, and strong partisanship. And what is the first effect of that ? It is that a man who is charged feels that he is going before a prejudiced jury or a prejudiced judge, and that is not well for the body politic and the commonwealth. There is in it, if the Cabinet is willing to be corrupt, the most powerful engine for corruption that could possibly be devised. The simple threat by an unprincipled member of the Government to a large corporation that he is pretty well convinced that they are in a combine and that it had better be settled, would have a magic effect. No Government ought to court that power, and no Government ought to be given that power. I am just as strongly opposed to wrong combines as any man. And I will tell hon. gentlemen opposite, and they must know it when they look into the matter from a business point of view, that it is a pretty difficult thing to judge when a combine is really a combine. The ways of business are wonderfully complicated.

But if you have not, by means of the law and a penalty put down combines, what is the reason that you cannot? Provide that the judges who try the case shall, as a penalty, wipe off what duty they think would cure the difficulty. You then have a non-partisan body which commands the respect of every body, and to whom any party may appear with an idea that they will get justice. Surely the law is that which is to be invoked in these matters, and not the partisan decision of a Cabinet Council, no matter what side of politics may be in power. And so I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to think whether they cannot attain the same end and avoid these two great difficulties that I have spoken of. I think they can be avoided by making the judges of the land the judges and not a partisan body such as the Cabinet of the day. Now, and lastly—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that my hon. friend is loath to have me stop. Lastly, I wish to say a word with reference to this reciprocal business—just a word or two, for I will leave the main body of the discussion to be taken up by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) who sits by my side and who is thoroughly conversant with it. I want to draw attention to the extreme indefiniteness of this resolution:

1. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the Reciprocal Tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the Reciprocal Tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the Reciprocal Tariff shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

And so on. Now, I call the attention of the House and the country to that as the most extraordinary provision that I ever knew to go into the tariff of any constitutionally governed country. What does it do? It constitutes the Controller of Customs on his report to the Governor in Council the arbiter of the tariff-making and treaty-making power, so far as commercial matters are concerned, of this country, without reference to Parliament at all. The disturbance caused would be complete. No one would know how trade would stand, no one would know what would be the conditions of trade six months ahead. No conditions are definitely stated, but it is simply provided that if the Controller of Customs believes and so reports that a certain country should be put on the reciprocal list, that country goes on the reciprocal list, by the simple proclamation, I, suppose, of the Governor in Council. Is this Parliament convened for anything or not? Is the tariff-making power and consequently the revenue-collecting power a right which Parliament should most jealously conserve? Are we to give it over to the control of a Controller of Customs on his report to the Cabinet of the day? Surely this Parliament has not fallen so low as to do that. Can you conceive of the British Parliament so legislating or of the British Government proposing, such legislation? Why, Sir, not even in France, and they have a great deal of latitude in matters of tariff, is such latitude allowed. The Government there are bound strenuously by a minimum tariff every rate of which is given, and they have, even then, to submit to Parliament what they make as a reciprocal arrangement with other countries. I am not going to follow this line further. I call the attention of the House to it, and I say that so long as we sit here as the representatives of the people, we cannot concur, and it is not for the interest of trade, outside entirely of the rights of the House, that we should delegate the whole question of trade arrangement and reciprocal treaty-making to the hands of the Government upon the report of the Controller of Customs or any other member of the Government.

But, Sir, what does all this amount to? I have here a very interesting little extract which shows again the facility with which opinions may change. It will be remembered that in 1893, Mr. McCarthy introduced a resolution, in which amongst other things, he affirmed:

That in the opinion of this House, the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated, and also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted duty free, and of those nations which, under treaty obligations with Great Britain, would be entitled to the same advantages granted; however, so as not unnecessarily to prejudice the business of the country, nor to do wrong to those who have imported and paid duties in accordance with its provision.

That was brought to a vote. Mr. McCarthy in drawing his resolution, drew it on the line of existing treaties. When he spoke of reducing duties in favour of the United Kingdom, he included those nations having favoured-nation treaties with Great Britain. What was the attitude of my hon. friend the Prime Minister of to-day on that question? His attitude was this:

I know that for many years we must raise our revenue by customs duties; but I tell the Finance Minister that the difference between him and us is this: That whereas he forms his tariff for protection and with revenue as merely an incident, we will frame our tariff, not for protection, but for revenue, and we will impede and interfere with freedom of trade only so far as it is absolutely necessary for the purposes of revenue, and for nothing else.

I know that for a great many years to come the American people will continue to levy their revenue by a customs tariff; but I say this to the hon. gentleman: That henceforward, not only as long as the Democratic party are in power, but I believe also, that when the Republican party comes back to power, that no more shall revenue be levied for the purpose of protection, but it shall be levied only for the purposes of a revenue, and for nothing else; because, as I have said to the hon. gentleman, the tariff of protection has been denounced by the American people as a fraud and a robbery.

I tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that when they take up that question of discrimination against England, they are raising against reciprocity an objection which England long ago abandoned.

In which the hon. gentleman was not correct.

I do not intend to be bound by the proposition which follows, and to which I must take exception.

He voted for it, but he took occasion before he voted for it, to say: If the Government is turned out, I will not be bound by it.

The proposition which follows is this: That the tariff ought to be amended also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets products are admitted free of duty, and of those nations which, under treaty obligations with Great Britain, would be entitled to the same advantages.

The hon. gentleman said he was not prepared to be bound by this resolution:

But if the proposition of the hon. gentleman were to carry, we would create a state of things such as it would be impossible to negotiate a treaty with the United States of America. I will say at once to the hon. Minister of Finance—and he can take what advantage he pleases from my words—that, if this motion were to carry, and if the Government were to be defeated on it, the Opposition would not be committed to the proposition that the duties should be reduced on goods from Britain and countries with which Britain has commercial treaties.

What change! Then he would not be bound by it, it would hurt the prospects of getting reciprocity with the United States. To-day his Finance Minister gravely tells us that there is a prospect of getting reciprocity from the United States. To-day the Prime Minister has bid adieu to all his fears, and is ready to vote and place upon the Statute-book a measure which he condemned in 1893. But, Sir, there is one thing that this Government has not done. This Government has not taken the House into its confidence, and to-day this House is utterly in the dark as to the scope of this latter proposition of the Government, and consequently as to the bearing upon the tariff upon any industry outside of wines, liquors, cigarettes, tobacco and snuff. The same fatal uncertainty and change which have followed these gentlemen through all their course of Opposition, so that one never knew, from day to day, what they would advocate next or where they would be when they came to act—the same fatal uncertainty is embodied in this tariff to-day. No man in this House or in this country knows where the Government stands in regard to it. I ask the Prime Minister to-night if he will tell this House, before we are called upon to vote, whether he considers that if this resolution passes and becomes law, he is bound to give the same treatment to Belgium and Germany and to other countries that have with Great Britain most-favoured-nation treaty clauses. It is of the utmost importance to the action of this House to know it; it is of the utmost moment that the country should have a clear idea upon this subject. The Finance Minister last night did not give that clear idea; is the Prime Minister willing to give it to-night before we are asked to come to a vote upon this? In all honesty he should do it, we should have the conditions fairly before us.

The PRIME MINISTER. If you want my answer now, I say decidedly that it does not apply to either Belgium or to Germany.

Mr. FOSTER. Then we are glad that we have now an authoritative statement. I hold in my hand a return which was brought down to the British Parliament as a return to an address of the English House of Commons. The return asked for was:

A return of the treaties of commerce in force between the United Kingdom and foreign nations which preclude preferential fiscal treatment of British goods in the colonies and dependencies of the British Crown, showing when such treaties were concluded, what notice is necessary for their termination.

That is accompanied by a report of Sir Edwards Hertslet, an authority, and he reports as follows:—

The following treaties between this country and foreign powers expressly "preclude preferential fiscal treatment of British goods in the colonies and dependencies of the British Crown":—

Treaty with Belgium, 23rd July, 1862, article XV.

Treaty with the Zollverein, 30th May, 1865, article VII.

The treaty with Belgium of 1862 contains this stipulation:

"Article VII. Articles the produce or manufacture of Belgium shall not be subject in the British colonies to other or higher duties than those which are, or may be, imposed upon similar articles of British origin."

This treaty is terminable after twelve months' notice.

The treaty with the Zollverein of 1865 contains this stipulation:

"Article VII. The stipulations of the preceding articles I. to VI. shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions the produce of the States of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other country of the like kind; nor shall the exportation from those colonies or possessions to the Zollverein be subject to any higher or other duties than the exportation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

This treaty is also terminable after twelve months' notice.

While these two treaties remain in force, the express stipulations above quoted are extended to all countries whose commercial treaties with Great Britain contain a most-favoured-nation clause, and apply to British colonies.

Sir, that matter was brought up in the British House of Commons, brought up for an authoritative answer, and the answer made by Sir E. Grey on the 30th of June, 1895, was the Government's answer. He says :

These treaties (1) Do not prevent differential treatment by the United Kingdom in favour of British colonies. (2) They do prevent differential treatment by British colonies in favour of the United Kingdom. (3) They do not prevent differential treatment by British colonies in favour of each other.

My hon. friend, if he wishes to inquire further into this, can read Lord Ripon's despatch which deals with this question exhaustively. I then put the case as to whether he is right in his assumption, or whether I am right that these two treaties carry with them the same rates in Canada as are given to Great Britain, and that being an Imperial treaty, it is a treaty that must be carried out. Sir, I think that includes the countries that have most-favoured-nation treaties, of which Canada forms a part with Great Britain, and there are some eight or ten of those. But it goes wider than that. There is an Act upon the Statute-book here called the French Treaty Act, and one of the articles of that Act reads this way :

Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters, should be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

And the Commercial Treaties Act passed in 1895, declares that :

These advantages granted by that treaty of 1894 to France should extend to foreign powers with most-favoured-nation treaties with Great Britain, including Canada and also Great Britain herself, and British colonies.

My contention is, therefore, that when the hon. gentleman makes his assertion that what he proposes to do is to make a treaty—no, not a treaty but to give preferential treatment.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is the gist.

Mr. FOSTER. And a very small gist—to give preferential treatment with Great Britain in this colony of Canada, without its carrying the duty to make that same to Belgium, Germany, France and the allied countries, so far as the most-favoured-nation treaties are concerned—I say that my hon. friend's position is wrong. He must be prepared to say, that in this jubilee year he will signalize it by refusing, as an integral part of the Empire, to be bound by an Imperial treaty. These Imperial treaties are strong and binding, they were made by Britain, the mother power, for herself and her colonies, and so long as they remain, that is not a well-grounded loyalty which will refuse to be bound by them. My hon. friend has either to repudiate these Imperial treaties or he has to act in accordance with them. What will he do? Repudiate them with the light and jaunty air of the Minister of Finance, who said: Well, the world still moves, you know? Will he repudiate them, or will he loyally be bound by them? I carry this no further, except simply to state this, that my hon. friend either has hung a pretense upon the pole of impossibility, and with it is carrying out the programme of prolonging that policy which he has put before this country successfully for a number of years, of holding up promises to the eye which are not realized in performance. He is either doing that, or he is prepared to repudiate, in this jubilee year, Great Britain and her Imperial power as a treaty maker. Sir, I do not count loyalty on that score. It may be that this Dominion of Canada, if it could make preferential terms with Great Britain and with her alone, would be willing to do it to an extent which might press hard upon the industries of Canada itself, but whilst from the warm blood of loyalty that courses in her veins, she would make that sacrifice for Britain, it is another thing when we are asked to place our industries at the competition and mercy of a number of nations, some of them the largest manufacturing nations of the world, getting no benefits for them at all, compared with the benefits which Great Britain gives us. Before my hon. friend launched on legislation of this impossible kind, he should have raised the principle and settled the principle as to whether we can do that or not. Then his legislation would follow. Did I hear the Finance Minister say last night that when the offices here opened this morning British goods would come in at 1/8 per cent reduction on the main tariff from British Columbia to Cape Breton? Has this been done?

Mr. FOSTER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It has.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman has done a thing which he has not the slightest power in the world to do. In the first place, that resolution is not passed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. When was it put to the vote—when did it pass? I say it has not passed. There is no authority to act under that resolution until it becomes law. It is different from the agreement for convenience we have made with respect to items of the tariff for the purpose of protecting the revenue. This, Sir, is the making of a preferential arrangement with Great Britain, and it demands the assent of this House before it can be put in operation. But suppose the hon. gentleman has the power, and the resolution passed, has the hon. gentleman issued the order to the Customs-house officers? If so, by what right has he done so? Has the Governor General in Council, on a report of the Controller of Customs submitted to Council, set his sign manual to an order authorizing the issuing of a proclamation for this to be done? If he has not, hon. gentlemen have no power on earth to do it. Who is to decide? It is to be on the report of the Controller of Customs, submitted to the Governor General in Council, endorsed and put into legal form, and not in a hole-and-corner notice given by the Controller of Customs, but by proclamation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Not at all; this is the same as any other tariff resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. If I concede the point that under an agreement respecting changes in duties this may be so, and may have the force of law, constitutionally this change proposed has not the force of law. But if I admit that under the agreement under which we have heretofore acted in regard to changes in duties and concede that that has the force of law, I press the second point, namely, that there is only one mode by which effect can be given to this proposed change, and that mode is by Order in Council on the report of the Controller of Customs. I will ask my hon. friend if that has been done?—if with respect to this matter there has been a report made by the Controller of Customs to the Governor General in Council, and if it has been acted upon?

The PRIME MINISTER. The tariff has been applied as it always has been applied in these matters. The tariff comes into force now, and the hon. gentleman knows it as well as I do. I am surprised at hearing him speak in this way. This course has been taken time and again. The tariff resolutions are brought here, and they go into force by executive action at one.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman does not meet my second point at all. There is the rule laid down. Action must be taken on the report made by the Controller of Customs, and assented to by the Governor General in Council. I ask if this has been done?

The PRIME MINISTER. I say the tariff was brought down and applied as all tariffs are. The hon. gentleman has done it time and again.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows he has not passed an Order—he has confessed it, and at all events he has not denied it. If the hon. gentleman has given orders through one of the officers to the Customs-house officers of this country to-day to let in British goods at one-eighth per cent less than the regular tariff, he has made an order which he has no authority to give.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the kind attention with which you have listened to my remarks, which have been somewhat lengthy—

Mr. CHARLTON. And the House too.

Mr. FOSTER. Now I ask the hon. gentleman, who will probably reply, to excuse me from the great pleasure of listening to him as I have to go to the city of Toronto to-night.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). If the hon. gentleman is really obliged to go, all I can say is that he carries with him my most sincere sympathy. Before the hon. gentleman rose I knew how hardly hit he had been, but he need not have shown it quite so plainly in his speech. But as the hon. gentleman must go, I will wait until he has an opportunity to return, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

- MONDAY, 26th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 58) respecting the Temiscouata Railway.—(Mr. Domville.)

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That the order for second reading of Bill (No. 57) to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act be discharged, and the Bill withdrawn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. The Bill of which this is an amendment, as the House knows, was originally prepared by myself and adopted by the Government of Sir John Macdonald. That is the Bill dealing with pensions in the North-west Mounted Police. I had a Bill dealing with this subject, and saw on the paper a notice of that kind in my name. It was on for a long time, and when the Speaker, from day to day called my name, I raised my hat, and said "stand." I thought that I had given a memorandum to the Clerk of the House, and thereupon I put in my Bill; but the notice was really given by my hon. friend the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) although my name was put down for it. I wish now to have the order discharged, so that my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) may be able to place his Bill on the paper, and have the precedence to which he is entitled.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BILLS.

Mr. CASEY moved:

That the report of the Special Committee to whom were referred Bills No. 2 and No. 3, be now adopted.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). What is the tenor of that report?

Mr. CASEY. The report merely asks that the quorum be reduced from six members to five, and that we shall have authority to employ a shorthand reporter to record such evidence as we desire to take.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman say what number of members are on the committee?

Mr. CASEY. Ten.

Mr. FOSTER. That seems a small quorum.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRASER moved:

That the order of this House of Friday, the 23rd instant, referring to Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Maritime Milling Company (Limited), to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, be rescinded, and that the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved:

That the order of this House of Friday, the 23rd of April, instant, referring Bill (No. 44) respecting the Welland Power and Supply Canal Power Company (Limited) to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, be rescinded, and the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to mention to the House that it would be very convenient if hon. members would make up their minds, when moving for the reference of Bills to committees, which committees they should be referred to. The question is usually left in the hands of the Chair, and

Mr. DAVIN.

I can only judge from the title of a Bill to which committee it should go. So that if hon. members will be good enough to make up their minds in the first instance as to what committee each Bill should be referred to, it would save a great deal of trouble of this kind.

Motion agreed to.

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION ACT.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 59) to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889. He said: This is the Bill to which my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) referred a few moments ago. I gave notice of this Bill, and, as the hon. gentleman has told you, he introduced a Bill on my notice. I cannot understand this, and I consider it a very serious matter. Had it been a new member of the House who had made this mistake, I could have understood it; but I cannot understand a gentleman of the long parliamentary experience of the member for Western Assiniboia making a mistake of that kind. I have heard the hon. gentleman rise in this House and quote authorities on parliamentary procedure, and yet we find him doing something which even a new member, probably myself, would not have done. I beg to move for leave to introduce this Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for his reference; but I may say that if the hon. member would write his name plainly, the Clerk above stairs would not probably make such a mistake as has been made in this instance; and if the hon. member had been in his place, from day to day, when the Bill was called, and had seen me lift my hat and say: "Stand," then the mistake would not have happened. The very moment the matter came to my knowledge and I reflected over it, I went to the Clerk, and asked him how it could be put right, and how Mr. Davis could best be placed in a position of precedence. I think the moral is that gentlemen should either take care or learn to write their names plainly, and also that they should be in their places.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I would like to explain to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. DAVIN. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If it is a matter of personal explanation, the hon. member may speak.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). The hon. gentleman has referred to the way in which I wrote my name. I wish to draw his attention to the Notice of Motion as printed on the 13th of April:

Mr. DAVIS—On Thursday next—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Act authorizing the granting of Pensions to the North-west Mounted Police Force, Chap. 26, 52 Victoria."

If the hon. gentleman could not read my writing, he could probably read print.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to say to the House that I am very glad that the misunderstanding which occurred in reference to this Bill has been set straight—that the hon. member for Assiniboia took the first opportunity in his power to withdraw from the mistake which he had made, and that the hon. member who gave notice of the Bill has had an opportunity to introduce it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I observe that this is a public Bill, and, therefore, the motion is not regular, as the necessary notice of it has not been given; but, as the Bill has already been moved once, we can receive the motion with the consent of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 60) in further amendment of the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The chief object of this Bill is to relieve the settler from the burden of actual residence in obtaining a second homestead. The application of the Bill is limited to this class of settlers. Parties who performed their homestead duties and received homesteads in 1889 are entitled by the Act to receive a second homestead. As the law now stands, they are compelled to reside on the second homestead, which obliges them to abandon the improvements they have made on the first. This is a very great hardship. Again, homesteads are often taken up by the sons of the settler, and this provision has led many to evade the law by spending six months of the year on the homestead, not in actual residence, but simply sleeping on it, making the improvements, and then applying for their patent. I may say that this provision has always been a fruitful source of insanity in Manitoba and the Territories imposing upon people the necessity of living alone for six months each year for three years. In many other respects the results have been very injurious. Therefore, it is sought by this amendment to remove this difficulty. It does not involve any loss to the Government, financial or otherwise, but is simply to relieve settlers of this burden of actual residence under such circumstances.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 61) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The object of this Bill is different from the object of the Bill which my hon. friend has just introduced. Its object is to still keep on the Statute-book certain privileges that were taken away by the Act of 1891 as to homesteading affecting what is called the two-mile limit; to continue for a few years more the two-mile limit which was abolished by the Act of 1891. Clause 6 of the Dominion Lands Act enabled a homesteader, when residing two miles from his homestead, to fulfil his duties and then enabled him, by cultivating a little more, to get a homestead. They cultivate a little more than was required from the ordinary homesteader—15 or 25 acres more, making altogether 40 acres. This also provides certain privileges for the ranchers. At present a rancher, no matter how much cattle he has, no matter what the size of his herd, and what number of sheep he may have in his flock or what may be the number of his band of horses, cannot, under the construction placed on the Dominion Lands Act, get a homestead entry unless he cultivates a certain number of acres. Some of these gentlemen have their ranches on lands not capable of arable cultivation at all, and it would be useless for them to fulfil these conditions. Therefore what I provide is this, and it is a new provision; but I may say that although the construction which has been placed on the Dominion Lands Act has been adverse to those gentlemen getting a patent, my own belief always has been that no difficulty need necessarily have been found in arriving at the conclusion that under that Act, a patent might have been given. However, the ruling has been that these men cannot get a patent, and some of the best men in the Territories, men of wealth, men who have improved our stock, men who have been living in the country fourteen or fifteen years do not own an acre of land. That is a condition of things which ought to be got rid of. This Bill provides that he will be entitled to a homestead if he has resided on the quarter section which was the subject of his entry for three years prior to his application for a patent:

That within the first of the three years and in each of the two succeeding years he has cultivated not less than one acre for garden purposes;

That he has fenced sufficient land to be considered a bona fide settler;

That he has fifty head of stock;

That he has erected stables and outhouses sufficient to winter fifty head of cattle.

If he has fulfilled these conditions, though he may not have ploughed an acre, he is clearly a settler. That is not asking very much, and I may tell the hon. First Minister, who is a lawyer himself, that if he should turn his attention to the clause he will come to the same conclusion as I have reached, that under existing clauses probably a patent might be given. Those ranchers might be able to have it as a matter of right and not as a matter of favour.

The second section deals with, what I have spoken of, the two-mile limit, and the third section provides :

In the case of a homesteader who has served in the North-west Mounted Police Force, five years' service in the said force may be counted as equivalent to one year's residence on his homestead.

My object is to encourage men leaving the force to go into farming. I think that that will be an inducement to them. If it fails as an inducement, it will do no harm ; if it succeeds, it can do nothing but good.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE MOUNTED POLICE ACT, 1894.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 62) to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894. He said : The first section provides for filling the vacancies in commissions, and it provides that promotions shall be from the ranks or else that the man appointed an officer in the force shall be a graduate of the Royal Military College. This view is one which everybody familiar with the North-west and those interested more closely in the Police force hold, and I know that when I happened to mention this subject in other years in the House my views found an echo on both sides. A part of this clause is redlined because unless the Government adopt this Bill I cannot go on with it as it is one a private member could not carry. The second section provides that the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall apply to all commissioned officers of the force and their service shall be computed from the time they enter the ranks. I believe the Superannuation Act at present applies to the officers of the force, but it is only based on a calculation founded on their service from the time they became commissioned officers. It is palpable that if a man has served twelve or fourteen years in the force and is Sergeant-Major and retires, his retiring allowance will be very much better than, should he become an officer, anything he can get for his superannuation allowance after serving three, four, five, six or seven years, so that I think it is only a matter of justice, and it is a logical sequence from the previous clause. If the previous clause commends itself to the Government, this clause also will.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. SPEAKER. An error has been made in the printing of the routine proceedings and strictly speaking, under the order of the House passed on the 12th of April, private Bills and questions put by members should come before Government orders. If the House wishes we will go on with private Bills, and if the Government has not been misled by the printed notice, we will go on with questions. But if the Government have not the replies to questions at hand, we had better leave them alone on account of the error.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). If agreeable to my hon. friend, we will go on with public Bills. With regard to the questions, I would ask to have them put over until to-morrow, because we did not take them up to-day.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am very much pleased to see that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is once more in his seat. When he vanished into space on Friday night, I had almost begun to fear that he would deprive us of his presence on this interesting occasion. I am very glad to welcome him back. The hon. gentleman's speech was like himself—clever, but disingenuous. He resurrected dead issues and distorted living facts to a degree unusual even for him. But, Sir, I am not disposed to criticise the hon. gentleman too severely. I think every allowance should be made for him on this occasion—every allowance. In the first place I am aware that it is a severe trial for any one, even a very well-conditioned person to find himself outflanked and outgeneralled, and, for a person of the temperament of my hon. friend, I admit it was a peculiarly severe trial. Now, it is not for me to pry into the secrets of hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not know what their domestic arrangements are, but for the sake of old acquaintance, I would say to the Opposition Cæsar that he had better take care of his hon. friend.

“ You Cassius is a lean and hungry man.
Trust him not, Cæsar, he is dangerous.”

And while I know, as every one knows, that the leader of the Opposition, like his great prototype, is so compact that he is not readily accessible to fear, yet I think that if I could hypnotize that hon. gentleman, if I could do a little thought-reading and get at his inner thoughts, that hon. gentleman is pretty often saying to himself :

Would he were fatter ! But I fear him not :
Yet, if my name were liable to fear,
I do not know the man I should avoid
So much as that spare Cassius.

Now, if I were so disposed and if time were no object, I think I could repay the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in his own coin ; and it might possibly amuse the House, it might even possibly do him some good. But I am not so disposed, and so for the present, I purpose to part with my hon. friend with this one remark. Sir, if it be true that the sight of Satan reproving sin is a thing which causes wise men to reflect, what can be said of such a spectacle as the hon. gentleman presented to us the other evening ? Surely, Sir, the spectacle of a gentleman of the character and antecedents of the hon. member for York, gravely rising in his place to lecture this House on loyalty, on consistency, on the high standard of honour which should mark the dealings of one public man with another, is a spectacle which, as Mr. Thomas Carlyle was wont to say, is of a sort to make, not merely angels, but the very jackasses weep. However, Sir, I have more important work in hand, work of far greater weight than to analyse the character and proceedings of the hon. member for York. I recognize, Sir, and I think by this time that, far and wide, it has been recognized by all men who are capable of forming an opinion, whether on this side of the Atlantic or the other, that a crisis and a turning point have arrived in the history of Canada. Mr. Speaker, the task which lay before the Government when they undertook to revise the present tariff was, as I think every man on both sides of this House will admit, one of very great difficulty and very great delicacy. I do not for one moment admit that I or my hon. friends have been false to the pledges that we have made ; but I do admit that there was before us a divided duty. We were bound by every declaration that we had made, we were bound by our oath of office, to devise and bring down a tariff which should give, in due degree and in due time, substantial relief to the great bulk of our fellow-countrymen ; we were bound, likewise, by the same obligation in bringing down that tariff, to exercise our utmost care and skill so as not violently to disturb existing interests ; and I trust before I take my place again, to be able to show to this House and to show to this country that this Government has made at least an honest endeavour to redeem both pledges.

Mr. Speaker, it was inevitable from the nature of the case that there should be some disturbance if we were to give any substantial relief at all. It was also inevitable, I fear, from the nature of the case, that we should give some dissatisfaction, particularly to those of our friends whose anticipations had been raised perhaps a little higher than circumstances warranted, and who thought that it would be possible, by one stroke of the pen, to wipe away the evil doings of eighteen years and to start exactly from where we had been in 1878. Sir, that was not possible ; but I think I may say to those of our hon. friends, and there are some of them, I know, who think that the Government has not moved fast enough or far enough, that if they will carefully and calmly study this tariff they will find that we have advanced a good deal further than at first they supposed. Now, I am not particularly anxious to defend this tariff in the abstract. I do not pretend to say, nor did my hon. friend the Finance Minister pretend to say, in introducing it, that this was an ideal tariff ; I do not pretend to say, nor did he pretend to say, that this was the sort of tariff which we would have liked to present to this House if he were acting, so to speak, tabula rasa, if we had an absolutely free field before us, if we had not to consider existing conditions which necessarily hamper and retard our progress towards the end we have in view. Sir, I do not pretend to say the tariff which we had the honour to submit for the consideration of this House, was a tariff which could be compared, nor would it be fair to compare it with such a tariff, as exists in the mother country. It is hardly as favourable a tariff as that which existed for many years in Canada, from the commencement of confederation in 1867 down to the present day. I do not pretend it is, we do not say that we have introduced an absolutely perfect tariff ; and although I must warn my hon. friends that a very clear, and a very strong, and a very plain case must be made out to warrant any alterations in the tariff resolutions once brought down, yet I am free to say, and I am sure my hon. friends beside me will endorse it heartily, that if it be made plain to the Government that in dealing with four or five hundred different items, we may have possibly made a mistake, or that, still more, we may have committed an injustice, we will not be too proud to rectify the mistake and correct the injustice.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. But don't let hon. gentlemen deceive themselves; they won't find many mistakes, they won't find many injustices, and it is with that knowledge that I make this offer. Sir, I do not mean to say that from an abstract point of view there may not be something, possibly a good deal, to be said against the tariff now in your hands; but I submit that the question at issue is not, is this the best possible tariff in an ideal point of view; the question is, is it, under existing circumstances and conditions a fairly good tariff? Does it fairly redeem the pledges which the Government and their followers have made to the country? Sir, I undertake to say, for my part, that whatever may be said against this tariff, it is a vast improvement on what I may call, without breach of parliamentary rules, the Foster tariff, which was in existence previously. Now, let me ask the House: What was the position in which we found ourselves when we undertook this task? Sir, we found the ship of state, to a great degree, water-logged and dismasted; we found her drifting on the rocks of civil discord, and in the hands of a crew in almost open mutiny. Well, Sir, it is no small thing for us to be able to say that we have made salvage of the ship, we have weathered the rocks, we have driven the mutineers overboard or under the hatches, and there we mean to keep them; and lastly, what my free-trade friends will remember and lay to heart, we have turned the ship's head in the right direction, and toward the open sea. More than that, Sir, and a very important thing it is, they will find when they come to study the tariff, that after you have deducted the taxes on the articles of food which we specially reserve for a special purpose, for the purpose of enabling us at a future day to deal, and I hope to deal successfully, with the people of the United States to establish better trade relations with them—they will find that in this tariff we have purged the late tariff from those monstrous iniquities, from those 40, 50, 60, 70 and 80 per cent duties which were found in it, disguised under the mask of specific and ad valorem duties. That in itself is a declaration of principle, that in itself is a great improvement, that in itself is an evidence that we are determined to carry out the pledges that we have made, the first of which pledges was that, so far as we could do so, taxes should be imposed in a fashion which would be just between man and man, and that the rich man in Canada should not be permitted to pay less than the poor man, which was the inevitable effect of many of the specific duties that we have abolished. I am perfectly well aware that, as a matter of business in collecting the revenue, and still more am I aware that for another and not so estimable a purpose, for the purpose of disguising and concealing from the public at large the real weight and burden of the taxes laid upon them, specific duties are always preferred.

Now, Sir, under our tariff the people will have at least that advantage; they will all know what they pay, they will be able to know what the tax amounts to; and let me say, speaking from experience, that it is a far harder thing to inflict a heavy protectionist tariff under ad valorem than under specific duties, and therefore it is a matter of some practical importance that we have succeeded in purging the present tariff to a large extent from specific duties, which had the pernicious effect to which I have alluded. We have paved the way for further reductions, no insignificant advantage. We have given a very substantial advantage to England and English trade. We have materially lightened, or at all events measurably lightened, the burdens of the people, and I think in these respects at all events, we are perfectly consistent with the motions moved by myself, by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), and with other motions which at various times were submitted by us in former Parliaments.

In some respects the speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was, though he did not see it, an exceedingly severe condemnation of the National Policy at large. What was one of his contentions? I will deal with others later on. The hon. gentleman assailed us, in the latter part of his speech at all events, for lowering duties from 40, 50 and 60 per cent. I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman ever seriously reflected what the maintenance of duties of 40, 50 and 60 per cent means to the Canadian public and to Canadian consumers. Sir, in the first place, this was a confession that after eighteen years those industries which required so monstrous a protection had proved utterly incapable of supporting themselves; it was a confession that if they were to exist at all, they could only exist as perpetual pensioners on the people of this country. Let us consider what a duty of 40 per cent and upwards really means. Every one knows that in the great majority of cases of manufactured articles the cost of raw material averages something like one-half of the total cost of the finished article; and if that be so, when you grant a duty of 40 per cent and upwards, it follows that the state says in effect to the manufacturer, or perhaps I should say the manufacturer says to the state: if you are willing to pay all the wages of my workmen, if you are willing to pay the interest on the capital and plant invested in establishing the business, I will conduct the business and be content with the profits derived from the sale of the manufactured article. That is in effect what hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing—not certainly in the cases of all Canadian industries, but in the cases of those particular ones which owe their existence to the monstrous scale of duties to which I have alluded. What would the ex-Minister of Finance have said to my friends the Patrons of Industry or other farmers of Canada if a deputation of farmers had waited on him to say that if he and the Government of which he was a member could see their way and were willing to give the farmers a fair interest on the value of their farms and buildings, and were likewise willing to pay fair wages to the farm hands they employed, including themselves when they were doing manual labour, they on their part would be perfectly willing to pay for the seed and to undertake all the labour of supervising the farm, and to be at the expense of marketing, and be content with the proceeds as their reward? And that in effect is an exact parallel to the results in the case of those industries to which I have alluded, and which alone are likely to be injured by the reforms we have introduced. Sir, I should like to ask the ex-Minister of Finance whether, in his judgment, it is more meritorious to produce a pound of iron or a pound of sugar or a yard of cloth or cotton than it is to produce a pound of beef, a pound of cheese or a bushel of wheat; and if he is not prepared to lay down that rule, then I say there was no excuse for the policy he and his friends established and continued with respect to a certain knot of manufacturers. I say a certain knot of manufacturers, because I am perfectly aware there were always a large number of manufacturers who were not existing owing to the protection afforded by the protective tariff, and who were far better off twenty years ago—and they know it now—under the revenue tariff which existed from 1867 to 1878. It might be asked in this connection: When you establish such enormous duties as those, who is it that pays? Money does not drop from the heavens, it has to be extracted from the consuming population of Canada; and, so far as the possible advantage to be derived from increasing the home market is concerned, it is my deliberate conviction that as regards that class of highly protected manufacturers, so far at all events as the matter can be regarded from a purely economical standpoint, it would pay the people of Canada better, if they wanted to increase the home market, to have employed an equal number of men in digging post-holes and filling them up than to have protected industries under a 50 per cent tariff; at all events, in that case we would have had all the benefit of the home market for the simple payment of wages, instead of paying interest on capital and plant sunk as well.

The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) began his speech by declaring that he did not understand the tariff, and he was rather ill-tempered with me because I ventured to say that the hon. gentleman's remarks proved the truth of his statement. The hon. gentleman proceeded to allege that we had raised the duties, and he did that with full knowledge of the effect of the reduction under the second schedule of our tariff. When he thought, on the other hand, that he had a point to make at our expense, the hon. gentleman was perfectly capable of referring to the second schedule as showing a reduction. With one breath the hon. gentleman declared that our tariff was highly protective, and scarcely were the words cold on his lips before the hon. gentleman gave a long list of industries which we had destroyed by our tariff. Now, I never did think very much of what I may call National Policy arithmetic; but I thought the ex-Finance Minister was capable of solving this abstruse arithmetical problem: if you add 2½ per cent and you take away 6½ per cent, there is not a material increase in the duty.

Mr. FOSTER. But if you cannot take it away.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We have taken it away.

Mr. FOSTER. How?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was taken away on the morning of the 23rd of April, if the hon. gentleman wishes to know the date, and will continue to be taken away. Sir, the hon. gentleman on the article of cottons, I think, had entirely overlooked the fact that the great bulk of cottons now imported into Canada come under the operation of schedule No. 2, and in all probability, after the present time they will all come under its operation. When the hon. gentleman talked of the operation of this tariff as regards cottons, I think he forgot this important fact, that we imported four and a half millions dollars of dutiable cottons last year, and of those it may be interesting to know that three and a half million dollars' worth came from England, as against one million dollars' worth imported from the United States. And I altogether mistake the quality and temper of English manufacturers if free trade England, with from six to ten points in her favour, will not be able to drive American cotton manufacturers out of the market.

Turning away from the alleged increase of our duties, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) dilated upon another triumph of the National Policy. It was, he stated, buoyant and expansive; or perhaps he said "expensive," and these were the proofs of it. It had made a most creditable showing—its last dying speech and confession, I suppose, was going to be quoted to its credit.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me to correct him. I did not use these words with reference to the National Policy. I quoted them from the Minister of Finance, who applied them to the revenues. The hon. gentleman can use them if he likes. I would be willing to maintain them.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I accept the correction, but most assuredly, the hon. gentleman claimed it as a great triumph of the National Policy, that when he left office in 1896 he was only $360,000 short; although he had cooked accounts to bring that about. I cannot be mistaken in that. If I am, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) who holds the speech in his hands will correct me.

Mr. FOSTER. Neither of you can prove that.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Now, Sir, what are the actual facts of this triumph of the National Policy? In 1894 they had a deficit of about $1,250,000; in 1895 they had a deficit of $4,000,000, or thereabouts; which, by certain methods and means which I propose to enlarge upon a little later, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had succeeded, he says, in reducing to $360,000 in 1896.

I will give the House a brief history of what the National Policy did for us, and I advise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to remember it and ponder on it. When I last had the honour of addressing this House as Finance Minister in 1878, the total expenditure of Canada was $23,500,000, and in 1895, after seventeen years of the National Policy, the total expenditure of Canada was $38,100,000, in round numbers. In other words, we had added very nearly $15,000,000 to our annual expenditure and taxation in the period of seventeen years. During that same period, as the hon. gentleman well knows, the total increase of the population of Canada was scantily 40,000 per annum. Forty thousand people a year with all the immigrants thrown in was added to our population, and $1,000,000 a year nearly were added to our public expenditure under the fostering influence of the National Policy from 1878 to 1895. I purposely exclude the year of 1896 and for good reasons, and I desire to call the attention of the House to the justice of the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) with respect to 1896. That hon. gentleman claimed great credit because the expenditure was reduced to $36,950,000 in 1896, and I shall call the attention of the House to two or three important facts in that connection. For a very considerable period anterior to 1896, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had been gradually creeping up with the expenditure at the rate of something like half a million dollars a year. Here are the figures:

Expenditure in—

1890.....	$36,343,000
1891.....	36,705,000
1892-93.....	36,814,000
1894.....	37,580,000
1895.....	38,132,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Then, he suddenly drops to $37,000,000 in 1896. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) for 1897, as it may be remembered, brought down main estimates to this House involving an expenditure of $38,300,000, and he had besides in his desk supplementary estimates chargeable to consolidated fund, to the tune of $3,180,000, making altogether $41,500,000 between supplementaries and main estimates. The hon. gentleman, when it suits him, is fond of averages, and let him take these three. First, the actual expenditure for 1895, second, the actual expenditure for 1896, and third, his own estimates with supplementaries included for 1897; and what do we get? Sir, we get an average annual expenditure for the three years of $39,150,000.

Now, I would like to ask this House: what would they say to a railroad manager who in bringing down the accounts of a great company for the year 1895 should have brought down charges to the tune of $38,100,000; for the year 1896 to have brought down charges of $37,000,000, and for the succeeding year, charges to the amount of $41,500,000. I certainly do not want to hurt the feelings of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), but I would say, that most of his shareholders would regard this as a very dexterous specimen of the art of cooking accounts. That is precisely what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) did. If you choose to analyse his expenditure for 1896, you will see that he did not effect an honest reduction on the expenditure of 1895. What he did was this. He saved nearly half a million on militia estimates by the very simple expedient of giving the militia no drill that year, and thus making the bulk of the expenditure on that branch of the service very nearly useless. He saved another half million dollars by starving the public works of the country, by refusing, and by ordering—as I am informed by my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte)—the people in the Public Works Department not to spend any money.

Now, if those had been genuine savings; if they had been savings that could have been maintained, I would give the hon. gentleman all the credit for them. But they were savings that could not be maintained, and he knew it. He himself had spent nearly $1,550,000 for militia in 1895, and he was going to spend $1,600,000 for militia in 1897, according to his own main estimates. What right has anybody to pretend, that it is an effective and permanent saving to spend $1,100,000 less in 1896? Sir, it was simply a case of carrying over for political reasons, to the year 1897, expenditures which should properly have been charged to 1896.

And in the case of public works, I would just present to the House a short sketch of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) did. Five years ago he required $1,927,000 for his public works; four years ago he required $2,000,000 (and I am giving the actual expenditure); the succeeding year $1,750,000; and then he comes down for 1896 to $1,250,000.

There is no mistake as to the cause; no mistake as to the reason, but it may interest the House to know what the practical results of this misplaced and false economy are. Everybody knows that we have in Canada a great number of public works, particularly on our various sea coasts, which require constant attention to keep them in a proper state of repair; and if the Minister, for a political reason, chooses deliberately to starve the public works in any particular year, he runs the risk (which my hon. friend has found to be more than a risk, to be a very serious fact for him), he runs the risk for the sake of saving a few thousands or a few hundreds of dollars in one year; of unnecessarily incurring the expenditure of many hundreds of thousands of dollars in the succeeding year or two.

Sir, I lay stress upon that because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) laid great stress upon it. I wholly deny his right to treat the expenditure for 1896 as a true and fair statement of the average annual expenditure to which the Dominion had attained, and I hold him responsible—for reasons I have given before—not merely for his main estimates, but for the supplementary estimates, part of which were indeed rendered necessary by the false economy of 1896, and a large part of which were brought down and placed in the hands of members all over the country for the purpose of enabling them to say, that the Government of the day had placed large sums in the supplementary estimates for the benefit of particular constituencies, and that they were only prevented from giving full effect to their good intentions, by the obstinacy of hon. gentlemen now on this side of the House.

The hon. gentleman likewise entered into a long calculation, with which I have not the slightest intention of wearying the House, as to the average additions to the debt, and he dwelt upon the iniquity of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) in demanding nearly twice as much as he did. For what purpose has my hon. friend been demanding these large sums? For the purpose, and no other, of fulfilling obligations which the late Government had entered into, and left unfulfilled in our hands. For the purpose, and no other, of completing works which they had commenced, which are in process of construction, and which could not possibly be suspended. What is the crime of my hon. friend whom he specially denounced as a dangerous person? The crime of my hon. friend is that, instead of dawdling over the work for ten years more, as would have been done by hon. gentlemen opposite if they had remained in power, he proposes to complete the canal system in two years, and to give to Canada and the North-west and this continent, a magnificent system of internal navigation which will make the rest of the money that has been expended a source of real profit to the people of Canada. It is for the purpose of carrying out that sound, judicious and genuinely economical policy, that my hon. friend has to ask for four or five millions instead of the two millions or thereabouts which the hon. gentleman expended in his time.

Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to quote the language which I have heretofore used on the subject of protection. I stick to every word of it. I am not ashamed to stand up in this House and say that I hold protection to have been a curse to this country. I have said so before, and I say so now; and I have to add, what I have stated in my place before, that I am prepared to take any lawful and honourable means of extirpating protection. I am not going to be too particular whether we do it by a revenue tariff, a reciprocity treaty, or by a substantial preferential treatment to the mother country. It may be an interesting bit of history for the hon. leader of the Opposition to know that when this tariff has attained its full maturity, when it is fully developed—if you make allowance for the special reservations which we have made for the purpose of enabling us to treat on fair terms with our American friends, and if you bear in mind the slightly important fact that we have to provide about $40,000,000, instead of $24,000,000, as in 1878—I break no seal of official secrecy when I say that this tariff, when it will emerge, will be to a very great extent,—in fact, substantially—on lines which it is perfectly well known I was prepared to recommend to the Cabinet of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie in 1876; and that certain political exigencies—to the great injury, I believe, of the country as well as the Reform party—prevented my then intentions being carried into effect.

Now, I come to a vastly more important matter than any of what I must call the hon. gentleman's somewhat picayune criticisms of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. gentleman could not rise to the situation. He found it necessary to criticise very severely the offer we have made to grant to those governments who treat with us on fair terms a large reduction in the taxation schedule. Now, Sir, I am not going to speak dogmatically or ex cathedra on this subject. I recognize fully that this is a complicated question. We have to deal, if not with a mixed issue of law and fact, at any rate with a mixed issue of law and public policy. I know that jurists and statesmen of the highest repute have differed, and differed very widely, as to the interpretation that is to be put on the most-favoured-nation clause when dealt with on the basis of reciprocity; and, unless my memory is at fault, I think that in the course of the discussion, which took place in this House—as to whether the most-favoured-nation clause had anything to do with a reciprocity treaty, the view I took—which was that it had nothing to do with it, but that the two were wholly apart—was subscribed to by the late Sir John Thompson. Sir, it will interest the House, I think, to know what has been said by persons whose positions undoubtedly entitles them to very considerable respect, as to the proper interpretation to be given to the favoured-nation clause. Quoting from Wharton's "International Law Digest," the first thing I find is this definition :

A covenant to give privileges granted to the "most-favoured nation" only refers to gratuitous privileges, and does not cover privileges granted on the condition of a reciprocal advantage.

Now, that is plain and straightforward, and common-sense; and it is further fortified by a despatch of the American Secretary of State in 1884 on the same subject, which reads as follows :—

Your despatch of the 8th ultimo has been received. You report that Mr. Carter, the special envoy from Hawaii to England and Germany, had succeeded in inducing the German Government to yield the point assumed by those governments, that the most-favoured-nation clause in their treaties with Hawaii entitled them to equal privileges in regard to imports with those obtained by the United States by the reciprocity treaty with the same country, and that no definite understanding had been reached with England, although it was probable that the proposition made by that government would be accepted.

If that statement be correct—and I see no reason to doubt it—it would follow that under closely analogous circumstances the German Government having possessed a favoured-nation clause withdrew their claim after a remonstrance from the proper authorities. Then, Mr. Evarts, a fair authority on matters of that kind, in speaking in reference to the claim made that nations possessing the most-favoured-nation clause should be entitled to the same privileges as were conferred on the United States Government by Hawaii, proceeds to say :

This is the precise thing the treaty does not intend. Its intention is to secure exclusive benefits to both contracting parties through special privileges granted by each to the other. To admit the claims of a third party to come in and enjoy all the benefits conceded by both principals, without any payment in equivalent special privileges to either, would be an unprecedented thing.

There are numerous other statements to the same effect, bearing on this particular contention that the most-favoured-nation clause necessarily confers the right to share in the benefits of a reciprocity treaty.

Sir, I need not say that we are not disposed to admit that this view can be conceded without long debate and without full trial. Now, the fact is, that the hon. member, if he will excuse me for saying so, did not see the point at issue. I will waive, for argument's sake, the underlying question whether reciprocity has anything to do with the most-favoured-nation clause. But I submit two points to both of which he will do well to address himself. I take the point, in the first instance, that when Great Britain, in 1862 and 1865, made a treaty such as she is reported to have done with the Zollverein and Belgium, Great Britain obviously meant that treaty to apply to those colonies dependent on the mother state, and which had not been conceded self-governing powers, and the right entirely to regulate their own fiscal policy. That would be a natural and fair construction, but I will not insist too much upon that, though the question requires discussion. But I say, with respect to the offer we now make, that it is not a preferential offer at all in the true, legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the world. The Americans may avail themselves of it and so may the Germans and the Belgians. The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and the same conditions on which England may take advantage of it. Where is the preference there? The hon. gentleman may tell me: Legally you may be correct, but in fact you do give a preference, for England is the only country, except one or two small colonies, that admits your goods on these terms. Be it so. It may be true that, under our policy, preference is really and effectively given to England just as it was true that, under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, England and the importation of England's goods was discriminated against to an extraordinary degree. I have here the Trade and Navigation returns which show the practical working of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. These returns show that, in the very last year of their term of office, we exported to England apparently $66,000,000 worth of our products, we exported to the United States $44,000,000, we bought from England $32,000,000, and from the United States $58,000,000 worth. There, if you will, is a genuine practical discrimination to an enormous extent, against England and in favour of the United States, under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have always said that the National Policy was a Yankee device, imitated from the Yankees, and in fact a benefit to them chiefly, and there is the proof of it.

Mr. HUGHES. What was the hon. gentleman's proposal at Washington?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was that if the Americans were willing to give us full and fair reciprocal advantages, I would recommend trading with them for the benefit of Canada and the Empire too; and I think the hon. gentleman may find out, before he is many years older, that very probably—although, I admit, it is a little roundabout way—this is not a bad way to get it. Sir, I contend that the construction which I have just laid before the House as to the real bearing and meaning of our offer is the true and legal construction, although I leave it to my legal friends to elaborate that point more in detail.

I submit that reason, equity and common sense are on our side in making that contention.

Sir, it is a well known fact that it is a fundamental principle of law that "he who seeks equity must do equity," and a nation that seeks to avail itself of the reduction offered in our tariff should be prepared to grant us corresponding advantages. We exclude no nation, and I call again the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to what I have read to the effect that the Germans have admitted substantially the truth of that position with regard to the treaty between Hawaii and the United States. The hon. gentleman is terribly exercised as to what we are going to do in case the English Government do not see things exactly as we do, and it would be a pity to keep the hon. gentleman in suspense. We mean to fight this point by all legal and constitutional means until we get a decision; and after we have done that, if the decision should go against us, we mean to appeal to the British Government and nation to do us justice by repealing this clause and denouncing these treaties which should never have been enacted to our manifest detriment.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it not have been better to find that out first?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. With all due deference to my hon. friend, he will find that we were not born yesterday, and know what we are about. Perhaps that truth is dawning on the minds of some hon. gentlemen opposite, and if not, they will learn it very shortly, unless I am entirely mistaken. I now quote, not from the "Times," but from an article in the "Blackwood Review":

Lord Salisbury publicly stated his opinion, a short while ago, "that before a very long time has elapsed some means will be found of mitigating this evil," that is, the evil inflicted by what he calls "those two unlucky treaties."

Again the hon. gentleman is in trouble. He fears we will be defeated on the legal question. He is afraid that Great Britain, with a magnanimity certainly unparalleled, will insist, 'coute qui coute,' on our admitting German goods, goods from a country which gives us no advantage, on the same terms as her own. Well, if the worst comes to the worst, if Great Britain does insist, and we, as loyal subjects, have to obey, in what will the consumer be worse off? We import at present $5,000,000 of German goods, and we will have given these to our consumers at a half a million dollars cheaper than at present.

Mr. FOSTER. Then if Great Britain refuses to do otherwise than call for the treaties being carried out, you will exceed your offer to Canada.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not say that. I say that Great Britain may extend it to Germany. Great Britain may compel us, in her capacity of suzerain and sovereign state, to give to Germany and Belgium the same privileges which we offer to her, and we may not be able to resist her sovereign will, unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to head a rebellion on that issue. I have known gentlemen of his persuasion many years ago, when they did not get their own way, demonstrate in Montreal and elsewhere the value of their loyalty when it came in conflict with what they supposed was their interests. I do not believe that the practical and probable results of the hon. gentleman's contention, if it be correct, will be so serious to the people of Canada.

But it may interest hon. gentlemen to know how these disloyal and traitorous proposals of ours have struck the average English mind. I am happy to be able to enlighten him. I have recently had placed in my hands some rather interesting reports of the way in which journals, such a journal as the London "Times," for instance, looks upon the proposal made by Canada that the goods of these countries, and notably the mother country, which gives us special advantages in trading with them, should be admitted at a reduced rate. It is a pity these journals had not an opportunity of consulting the hon. gentleman before they penned the following articles:—

The London "Times" stated that the new departure is most gratifying to all who desire to see the Empire knitted more closely together, that it is the most remarkable step yet made towards the fiscal confederation of the Empire. While it would be premature to pass judgment upon the most-favoured-nation clause, we have no hesitation—

Will the hon. gentleman mark this——we have no hesitation in saying, that if such stipulations stand in the way of a free and fair arrangement of duties between this country and Canada, the earliest opportunity should be taken to relieve us of such obligations.

"The earliest opportunity should be taken to relieve us of such obligations."

We regret to see the attitude of Mr. Foster. It is unfair to attempt to discredit the proposals as a refusal to be bound by Imperial treaty. There is much doubt whether these treaties have any bearing on the proposals. But even so, the Imperial Government has an undoubted right to alter the fiscal arrangements with foreign nations which appear obsolete and inexpedient. Immediate enforcement of the new tariff, when the parliament resolutions passed, subject to statutory sanction afterwards, is in accordance with the established rule of the House of Commons,—

Although it was not necessary to pass any resolution. Here is some good advice. Is my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) here?

We cannot believe that the old followers of Sir John Macdonald will, on merely partisan grounds, endeavour to obstruct the adoption of this plan for a closer union with Great Britain. They should rather welcome the conversion of a Government to their ideas.

Well, it was not a conversion, it was my hon. friend's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) idea. Besides, it was the idea of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). But that is a pardonable error.

No doubt, it is unpleasant to politicians to see a policy they claimed (very improperly) as theirs, suddenly made effective by their rivals.

Mr. FOSTER. Part of that was parenthetical, was it not?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, I am honestly reading.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it again.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will read it again.

No doubt, it is unpleasant to politicians to see a policy that they claimed—

It was my interjection that they claimed it without any reason:

No doubt, it is unpleasant to politicians to see a policy they claimed as theirs, suddenly made effective by rivals. We trust that, when the momentary chagrin is forgotten, there will be no desire to prolong carping criticism or carry out the threat of strongly opposing the new tariff, which is the most striking step as yet made towards commercial union between the mother country and the colonies. Of no little significance is the fact that it is taken by the first French Canadian statesman, the Liberal and Catholic Prime Minister of the Dominion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), in order to give the House the benefit of being able to form a judgment as to the statement that he has just read from the London "Times," if he will be kind enough to favour the House with a transcript of the communication to the London "Times," or the London press on which that was based?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am not aware what communications passed, but I take it for granted that the London "Times" is tolerably well advised. It has two or three correspondents here, and I think it is tolerably well advised.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I beg to say, on behalf of the Government, that no transcript whatever went from the Government to the press.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Gentlemen opposite seem to be very anxious to prevent any light being thrown upon this important question. I did not assume that the Government had sent any transcript. But, if the information forwarded to the London "Times" by its correspondent here on that question is as inaccurate as on other important questions it is impossible for us to form a judgment on the question without having it before us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think I can relieve the hon. gentleman's mind. I think he will find that the opinion of the "Times" is pretty un-animously echoed by the English press.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not confine it to the "Times." I assume that what went to one newspaper went to the others. But, to know the value of any statement of the London press we must know on what it is based.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I assume that it was based on the resolution introduced in this House. I will read the hon. gentleman, if he will allow me, an extract from another London paper, the "Daily News:"

The "Daily News" regards the new tariff as the outcome of American legislation. Mr. Fielding spoke out manfully and accurately upon the relations between this country and the colonies. Too many colonists have hitherto failed to appreciate the fact that, while receiving colonial goods free, we have allowed our colonies to tax our goods. The new policy is advantageous and likely to lead to development in the direction of free trade. The new Canadian tariff is not avowedly and in terms a measure for the benefit of Great Britain, but England will profit more than any other nation. As free traders, we rejoice in this consequence of the Dingley tariff; as patriots, we welcome this significant display of attachment from the greatest of our colonies, and as Liberals, we congratulate the leader of the Liberal party of the Dominion.

And here, Sir, is from a special article of the "Times:"

If every British colony should follow suit, and the day comes when free trade exists from one frontier of the Empire to another, it will be a mutual satisfaction to recall the circumstances of the first step in the initiation of that policy.

Now, Sir, it is always well to hear from all sides, and I have got an interesting quotation from another "Times." This is from the London correspondent of the New York "Times." I do not think he will be accused of wishing to alter facts to suit us in particular. And he is a man of long experience and great opportunities of forming a conclusion:

For the first time in my experience, England and the English are regarding Canadians and the Dominion with affectionate enthusiasm. When the net benefits to England of the Premier's tariff come to be figured up, I do not know that they will bulk very large; but the spirit of preference for the mother country directly appeals to the imagination here. Englishmen have always been peculiarly sore on this point of her colonies rearing protection walls against British trade, and nobody can blame them for it. This change, therefore, will make Mr. Laurier, when he comes here in June, far and away the most conspicuous and popular of all the visiting Premiers of the Empire.

Sir, I have more, but I spare my hon. friends. However, I think that I have said enough to show that it is not likely that our proposals will be regarded as highly traitorous and disloyal when they come to be laid before the English Parliament and public.

Now, Sir, a word or two with regard to the true inwardness of this tariff of ours. I beg to point out, and I particularly point it out to our friends who think that we have not gone fast enough or far enough, that its effects are going to be considerably more far-reaching than may at first appear. Now you will remember that up to the present time many of the duties have been absolutely prohibitive. You could not import many things from other countries in the teeth of the tariff which we have modified. Those duties, as I have pointed out, were concealed in most cases under specific or mixed specific and ad valorem duties. Those have gone by the board altogether with the solitary exceptions which I alluded to in the early part of my speech. I want the House distinctly to understand that when tariff schedule No. 2 comes to be applied, although there is a nominal maximum of 35 per cent, and although a fair time is given to all parties concerned to adapt themselves to the change so that no man may be rashly harried or disturbed by our changes, still when you make the deduction of 25 per cent the practical result is that you have a maximum of about 25 or 26 per cent, and that a very large portion of our imports will come in under a reduced schedule of something like 20 per cent. Now I venture to say that although that is attained by easy stages, and with due caution, so as not to cause a commercial crisis, this is substantially a revenue tariff, and the Government have redeemed their pledges which they made to the electorate of this country. Sir, let me say to my hon. friends that I have advocated reciprocity. And why? Because I knew that after protection had prevailed for a certain time, reciprocity was the easiest half-way house to a revenue tariff, and, in the long run, to free trade. I know and recognize the need of giving milk to babes and meat to strong men; and if some of the infants opposite squall a little in anticipation, they must take their dose all the same. I do not deny that to those who merely glance at the outside of our tariff, there is room for criticism. I am perfectly willing to admit that I was mistaken in one respect. I do not think that anybody who has heard me in this House would contend that I have willfully or unintentionally minimized the injury those gentlemen have done to the country; but I am bound now, after full consideration, to admit that I have since discovered that they did even more mischief than I had ever accused them of doing. Sir, this National Policy has proved a most broken reed for our people to lean upon, and they know; and I believe, and it came out at every turn in the course of the tariff investigation held by my colleagues and myself, that the manufacturers of Canada never made a greater mistake than when they turned their backs on the revenue tariff of my honest and hon. friend the late Alexander Mackenzie. I believe that had we continued to go on under that revenue tariff, the growth of manufactures in Canada would have been wholesomer, sounder and larger than it is to-day, and the population of Canada would have been greater by many thousands of people. Not one but many have admitted to me that they regretted exceedingly that they had ever departed from the standard of a revenue tariff established in 1878. Sir, I must say that I cannot understand how any man who sits down and reads our public accounts, I cannot understand how any man who considers the returns of our census, I cannot understand how any man who has examined the evidence given before our tariff commission, can fail to come to the conclusion to which I came, that of all the mistakes, and they have been many and colossal, which those hon. gentlemen opposite committed, the greatest, so far as the interests of Canada were concerned—though perhaps not as concerned their own interests—was their adhesion to the protective tariff of 1879. But, Sir, that protective system left its fruits. Now in this, as in many other cases, the secondary consequences are even more injurious to the public than the immediate consequences. Up to that time there was a wholesome abhorrence of taxation on the part of the bulk of the people, but after being misled by sophistical leaders, it came to be supposed that the more we taxed ourselves the richer we were going to be. That removed every safeguard and every barrier which stood between us and extravagance and corruption, and verily we had our reward.

Now, Sir, I want to call the attention of the House to a few brief facts bearing on some of the remarks made by that hon. gentleman. I do not pretend to say that it will not be found possible to exercise still more judicious economy than we have yet been able to exercise in several departments. But I want to call the attention of this House to a few matters affecting the present financial condition of Canada in a very remarkable degree. We are confronted to-day with the fact that if our obligations were discharged, if we expend the various sums that we must expend in order to complete our unfinished public works and to fulfil the statutory obligations those hon. gentlemen have placed on the Statute-book, the annual expenditure of Canada can hardly be less than about $40,000,000, in my judgment an inordinate sum for a country of our age, and circumstances, and population, to be called upon to raise or to spend. But I want to call attention to this other important fact, that of the total expenditure, about three-fourths is interest on mortgages, to all intents and purposes. If hon. gentlemen will take up the ordinary estimates, they will find that the very first item that strikes them is a charge of $19,320,000 for sums authorized by statute, almost all of which are absolutely beyond our control. If they carry their eyes a little further, they will see that there is a further charge of about ten millions rendered necessary for what is called collection of revenue, that is for the maintenance of our railways, of our post offices, of our customs and of our excise and other similar services. Now, practically it would be equally true to say that in the small remaining amount of nine or ten millions, a large percentage is for services over which we can exercise very little control. We cannot afford to disregard treaty obligations that we have entered into with the Indians, we must provide for the proper government of the North-west Territories; we cannot allow our lighthouse service to get into disorder; and we are obliged to maintain and to keep in proper repair the public buildings from one end of this Dominion to the other. The consequence is that we find when we sit down to the task of retrenchment, that our retrenchment must be exercised not on an expenditure of thirty-nine or forty millions, but on an expenditure of about eight or nine millions. Sir, these are important facts, these are disagreeable facts; I would, with all my heart, that it were otherwise. But I am bound to tell the House, and I speak with some knowledge of the subject, that although I believe some considerable reductions may be made, still in a general way, what the House has to look for is better government and better results, rather than any great decrease in the expenditure of eight or nine millions in a country like this. I want the House to understand, I should like the country to understand when they talk of a revenue and expenditure of $40,000,000 they would be more correct if they talked of a revenue and expenditure of $9,000,000 or $10,000,000. If they will bear that simple fact in mind, they will understand some of the difficulties with which the Finance Minister and my hon. friends have to contend. I may add, however, that if we had a true statement of the expenditures hon. gentlemen opposite have incurred, and a true estimate of all they proposed to incur, the estimates made by some of my hon. friends so far as regards possible reductions would have been fulfilled to the letter. I may ask, and ask fairly, who is, after all, to blame for this state of things? When we left office in 1878 the total annual expenditure was less than four and twenty millions. When we returned to office it had grown to $40,000,000 without any corresponding growth—and I say it advisedly—not merely in population but in wealth and resources, for most assuredly what we have gained in one direction has been almost entirely taken from us in another. The truth is that hon. gentlemen opposite gambled on a growth that did not come. They incurred expenditures which they were not warranted in making; they imperilled our whole future for the purpose of gratifying their immediate political interests, and we are obliged to pay the creditors. They lost population we might have had here. If this growth on which they counted did not come, I tell them now and here that it was largely on account of their own deliberate misconduct. It was necessary, if Canada was to compete fairly in the markets of the world, that our farmers should produce cheaply. All hon. gentlemen opposite did was to make Canada a country in which production was dear. It was necessary if Canada was to prosper, to bring more people here, and especially have more people in the North-west, and it was necessary to concentrate them when there. The result of their policy was to drive people out of the North-west and scatter those they did bring in, not in one strong province, but along a line of many thousand miles. Sir, briefly, the whole result is this, we had a huge outlay and a very insignificant return.

Now, I do not at all mean to say that perhaps some items of this huge debt and expenditure were incurred for purposes that might have been good in themselves on certain other conditions. My point is this, that those hon. gentlemen blundered, and blundered uniformly and frightfully in endeavouring to carry out what, if carried out, under other conditions and by better methods might have resulted to the advantage of Canada. I will not hold hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for our first mistake when, in 1867, we let slip one of the most grand opportunities given to any country, a chance which, if used and handled properly would have enabled us to have greatly reduced the burdens and taxes of the people, and greatly augmented our revenue at the expense of the neighbouring country, and, at the same time probably it would have done more to bring the Americans into a situation and disposition in which they would welcome a reciprocity treaty than anything that could have been done.

I note that the hon. gentleman before me (Mr. Foster) demanded what precedents we had for our action, particularly what precedents we had for our action, I suppose, in regard to the offer we are about to make to Great Britain. I have to say to the hon. gentleman this, that our position is in most important respects utterly unprecedented, and we had a perfect right to make our own precedent in this matter. Canada is not, and it is well to remember it, not in a normal position at all. Sir, we are called and spoken of sometimes as a self-governing dependency. We are that, and we are much more. The Canadian confederation is of vastly more importance as regards the Empire than any single colony can possibly be. It has greater duties, and to those duties, as I contend, are and must be attached greater rights. We have to maintain peace and order throughout half of the continent, as other colonies have to do in other portions of the Empire; but we have also to deal wisely and prudently with a neighbour which represents one of the most powerful nations on the face of the earth. Again, I say that the duties imposed on us give us corresponding rights, and we have a right to ask for a much freer hand as representing the confederation of Canada, in the peculiar position we occupy in North America, than any other ordinary colony of Great Britain can ever fairly demand. We have a duty to ourselves, we have a duty to the Empire, and to the adjoining nation to fulfil.

The hon. gentleman alluded to the mission to Washington, undertaken by myself and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Sir, I have to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that we returned from Washington perfectly convinced of two things. We returned from Washington perfectly convinced of the fact that the foolish conduct—I use the word advisedly—perhaps not so much on the part of the leader of the Opposition as of some others of our predecessors, had placed immense difficulties in the way of an immediate and honourable settlement with the United States. But I do not want on this occasion to introduce, unnecessarily, what may be called contentious matter, and therefore I forbear going into details of the various methods and ways in which those hon. gentlemen had created bad blood between ourselves and the United States. If there be any hon. member who wants to know the extent to which they went, I recommend him to peruse a certain very interesting speech, which he will find delivered in the year of grace 1888, and recorded in "Hansard" at pages 690-92, delivered by the present leader of the Opposition, to show to his followers how near we had gone to the very verge of actual war with the United States. But, as I have said, it is not my present intention to dwell on that point. We returned from Washington seeing and feeling that great mistakes had been committed, but seeing and feeling likewise that it was not impossible, if a more prudent and statesmanlike course were adopted, by showing the Americans that we are willing to trade with them on fair terms, by showing that we desired to be good neighbours of theirs, that we had no wish in the slightest degree to irritate and annoy them, to obtain at a little later day and under more favourable circumstances a treaty which would be honourable to both parties. In regard to the United States, I hold, as I have always held, that it is the duty of the Government of Canada to be both courteous and firm. I am not going to advise yielding unnecessarily to the United States, but I have not the slightest hesitation in asserting and declaring here that both in our interest and in the interest of the British Empire, it is of the highest possible moment to cultivate feelings of good neighbourhood with the United States, and while I hold office and while I have a word to say in our affairs with the United States, I shall advise our friends and our press, and I would bring to bear any influence I possess to ensure that in our dealings with the United States we should deal with them as a people with whom we are very closely connected, and whom we desire to reunite, if possible, if not on friendly trade relations, at all events on friendly terms with the rest of the British race. Sir, we are glad, we desire to trade with the United States on fair terms. We welcome them if they choose to accept our offers; but, Mr. Speaker, if the United States see fit to refuse—and they have the right to refuse, if they see fit to frame their tariff in a way which makes it impossible to trade with them, all I can say is, that we will frame our tariff as we believe the interests of Canada require.

We do not, and we have not yielded to the popular clamour to the extent of retaliating on the United States. We do not retaliate on the United States. Where it is in the interests of the people of Canada to admit United States goods at a lower rate, as in the matter of corn and of iron, we have dared to do it. Nor have we raised the duties against the United States. We have undoubtedly offered better terms to these countries who trade with us fairly, but that offer has been made to the United States just as freely as it has to any other country; even to Great Britain herself. Sir, I say that in dealing with the United States, above all other peoples, good sense and good temper are needed on our part. We will not cringe nor snarl, but we will do our best—without underrating the great value of the trade with the United States—we will do our best, if we must do so, to enable ourselves to develop our own trade and our own resources, utterly and completely independent of any other power.

As to England, I submit that the case is very different. Our Government intend to bring the matter of our relations with Great Britain to a head, and if the Opposition in this House possess real courage and patriotism, they will accept the advice tendered to them by the London "Times." I say, Sir, that instead of carping at the proposal, they should be glad to help it forward. Sir, in time past these hon. gentlemen have made every hustings ring, have made the floors of Parliament ring with their professions of loyalty and devotion to the old flag. They have a chance to prove their loyalty now. They have repeatedly declared their desire to show independence of the United States.

Sir, here is their chance if they wish to show independence of the United States. They have declared, some of them, that they wished that Canada should assert herself. Canada is asserting herself now. Let them stand by us, shoulder to shoulder, and help us to assert ourselves in the eyes of the world.

Mr. HUGHES. We do not know how long you will stick there.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Does the hon. gentleman want to know how long we will sit here?

Mr. HUGHES. I asked, how long you would stick to your present policy.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) had taken the trouble to examine the various speeches delivered in this House, he would find that this was the line formerly adopted by us, the Liberal party, and endorsed by us as a party, and voted for by us as a party, and voted down by hon. gentlemen opposite as a party, four, or five, or six years ago.

Now, Sir, let me ask one question which arises out of some of the remarks which I have addressed to the House. What is possible if this appeal of ours is responded to, as I have reason to believe it will? Well, many things are possible. There is not a little reason to believe that our example will be responded to in other quarters, and it may well be, that the United States, after a while, after second, sober, better thought, will consent to treat with us (and maybe with England) on better terms than they have heretofore treated. Sir, I do say that it is a great step, if our proposition is responded to, toward making the British Empire a reality as well as a name.

I say that it is a great step toward the federation of all the countries that owe allegiance to the British Crown, and I repeat, even at the risk of some misconstruction, that I am not without hope, that in its ultimate issue it may lead to a practical alliance between all the members of the English race. I will grant, that all this may not be in accordance with the declarations of certain of what I must call, extreme free traders; but even so high an authority as John Stuart Mill will be found declaring in many places throughout his works, and notably in his chapter on Navigation laws; that while it is true, all other things being equal, and were a condition of profound peace possible to be maintained, it might be desirable to utterly disregard the navigation laws; still, he for his part admitted, that there were other considerations for nations and statesmen than the mere bare consideration: where you can buy in the cheapest market and where you can sell in the dearest.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

And it may be that the English Government, rising to the magnitude of the position, rising to the weight of the Imperial cares which are flung upon them; it may be that they will respond in a manner yet unthought of or unknown, to the offer which we have lately made to them. Of one thing I am sure, and it is, Sir, that it is time that we should know exactly where we are and where we stand in this matter. As I have said, if British statesmen respond, it is well. If not, it is well too. We have shown our good-will towards them and we are not going to be frightened at the notion of a deluge of cheap German goods, and the direful necessity of compelling the Canadian consumer to pay a few cents less per yard or per pound for them than he does at present. For my part I think that better results are likely to follow. I grant it will require some time to develop these results. I am prepared to be misconstrued, I am prepared to be misrepresented—I have an abiding faith that hon. gentlemen opposite are equal to that task at any rate. I say, Sir, that these hon. gentlemen will find before they are much older, that we have struck a chord which will re-echo from one end of the country to the other. They will find, and others will find, that the Dominion of Canada is a factor to be recognized. We demand only what is just. We demand what is advantageous to the whole Empire, and I well believe that we will speedily obtain it. The proposal may possibly be modified in some respects, but in one shape or other, I think that you will find that that proposal will prevail. You will find, that that proposal will lead us further on, and with patience and statesmanship, if the people sustain us. I believe that great and important issues will be found to depend on our action of last week.

More, Sir, for my part, I think that it will be found that in the passage of that tariff, we have at one and the same time rung the death knell of protection and rung in the chance of federating the Empire on a solid and secure basis.

Lastly, Sir, and it is not the least important portion of our scheme, there is a reasonable chance of delivering Canada from the dead-alive condition in which Canada was till very lately. I can understand how a native of Ontario, or how a native of Quebec, could possibly, honestly advocate protection. But with the facts of the last census staring us in the face, I cannot understand how an inhabitant of the maritime provinces can possibly believe that there is any good value in protection for their people. What is the condition there? How do hon. gentlemen opposite account for the facts which were stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) the other night? What is the matter with the maritime provinces? Has the cradle ceased to rock in the regions by the sea; have the inhabitants attained that state of beatitude in which there is no marriage or giving in marriage; are the people of the maritime provinces too good to live; what on earth can the cause be? Sir, it was not always so. If all tales be true, it was not so when good Sir Charles was young, but I fear that he has been succeeded by a more effete generation. I would like to ask the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), how he explains that in spite of all the beneficent effects of the National Policy, and the vigorous exertions of the great Liberal-Conservative party in New Brunswick, the total addition to the population of that province in ten years, is barely six and thirty souls; and I am credibly informed, though I will not pledge myself to the fact that more than that number have been during that interval been added to the inhabitants of the principal lunatic asylum in the city of St. John.

Sir, in sober seriousness, let me ask this House whether they consider a state of things that now exists creditable or honourable to Canada? Here we stand five millions strong, with half a continent at our disposal, and we have scarcely at this moment one single family to the square mile of habitable land under our control. Our population has been increasing during these eighteen years at a much lower ratio than the populations of older and more densely peopled European countries. In this very House I can look round on over 200 representatives from various parts of Canada, and I doubt if you could pick out twenty men in this assembly who have not at this moment some near and dear relative living in the United States. I ask if that state of things should continue. I say it should not; and I believe that it will be proved shortly that we have turned over a new leaf, that we have taken a new departure, and that the 23rd of April will be marked in the Canadian calendar as doubly a red-letter day—as being first of all, the day on which my hon. friend introduced his tariff—and most appropriately it came into force on St. George's Day—the day on which Canada awoke from an evil trance, and shook the scales from her eyes and the fetters from her limbs—the day on which Canada set her face towards higher aims and a nobler destiny, towards honest government, towards the true development of her resources, towards placing the relations of the Empire upon a sounder basis, and towards a fiscal policy which, whatever its faults may be, honestly aims at fair play and equal justice to all classes in this Dominion.

Mr. McNEILL. As my hon. friend mentioned my name and suggested that perhaps, for party reasons, I might be inclined to support a policy of which I did not approve, or to oppose a policy of which I did approve, would he be kind enough to tell me whether he considers this offer to England an offer of preferential trade?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I tell the hon. gentleman that this is an offer of preferential trade to all countries that are qualified to come in—that it is, in fact, a preferential offer to England, because that is the country of all others which will profit most by accepting the offer; and a remarkable contrast to the practical result of the National Policy, which succeeded in almost destroying our trade with Great Britain, or at any rate, in reducing it from $60,000,000 to $30,000,000 in a very few years.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the statement made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his speech delivered this afternoon, that this is a very grave crisis in the history of Canada, and I do not think he at all over-stated the importance of the measure that is now placed before the House. I confess, Sir, that I listened with the most profound astonishment to the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I did not suppose it possible, whether in one section of the Empire or another, for a great Parliament such as that which the Dominion of Canada possesses, to have presented for its consideration a Bill of such an entirely illegal and unconstitutional character. I have no hesitation in saying that you will search the history of parliamentary government throughout the British Empire in vain to find any parallel for the position in which we find ourselves in relation to the Budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance. Unfortunately, this country has been suffering in the most severe manner for a year in connection with the change of Government. This country has had its commercial and financial transactions seriously hindered and embarrassed by the fact that a year ago it was known that we were on the eve of a general election, and that it was quite possible that a party pledged to destroy every vestige of protection, to radically change the fiscal policy of Canada, might be brought into power. The result of that election more than accounts for the small deficit with which the last year closed. The uncertainty that existed was abundantly sufficient to account for that deficit. But, Sir, the long-suffering people of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I say that those who for the last twelve months have been on the tenter-hooks of expectation, those who felt that their dearest interests might be imperilled, those who felt that the means of sustaining themselves and their families might be swept away, looked forward with confidence and hope and expect-tation to the hour when the Finance Minister of Canada should terminate all this uncertainty, which was producing such a paralysis of the trade and industry of the country—paralysis of trade, because the importer was afraid to import until he learned whether the articles that he was going to import would be subject to a higher or a lower duty. He was afraid to import, with the prospect before him that every vestige of protection being swept away, a lower duty would be imposed on the goods that he would place on the market, and that he would be undersold by those who competed with him under a lessened tariff. Those engaged in carrying on the great manufacturing industries of this country were afraid to carry on those industries with their wonted vigour, for fear of this threat to tear up, root and branch, the fiscal policy of this country under which their moneys were invested and their works carried on. But, as I say, those who have suffered long and patiently for the last twelve months, believed that when the Finance Minister rose in his place in this House and delivered the Budget speech, then, at all events, all uncertainty would be at an end. They would know the worst, they would know what the fiscal policy of Canada was, and they would be in a position to govern themselves accordingly. Sir, that hope has been disappointed. We have had the Budget speech, and I do not believe there are any two Ministers on the Treasury benches, to say nothing about the rest of the House—I do not believe that there are any two gentlemen who have been engaged in concocting this extraordinary Budget who, taken separately, would give you the same statement as to what this tariff really is to-day. I have had some little experience myself. I have had the honour of holding the high position of Minister of Finance in this country, and, as I say, after having had forty-two years' experience in public life, since I have been connected with the examination of these questions, I confess that when the hon. Minister of Finance sat down, I had no idea as to what the fiscal policy of Canada was to be. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Foster), whose career as Minister of Finance is well known as that of one of the most able and successful Finance Ministers who have ever held office in this country—my hon. friend, looking at this tariff, reading it as I read it, naturally supposed, when he found a proposal utterly at variance with the law, diametrically opposed to the constitution of the country, and impossible of execution, that the hon. Minister of Finance and his colleagues had concluded to get over the difficulty of their free trade promises by holding out this delusive expectation that, under these extraordinary clauses, the former tariff would not be changed materially and a free trade policy introduced. While speaking from that standpoint, my hon. friend was perfectly right, and he addressed himself to the discussion—as I would have done—in the light of the declaration that the tariff was to remain practically the same as it was before. To use the words of the Finance Minister, there was to be no material change in the tariff. My hon. friend was warranted in accepting that statement and in treating these absurd and unconstitutional clauses, as clauses placed there for a purpose, and to be abandoned and relinquished by the Government because they knew they were impossible of execution. Judging from that standpoint, my hon. friend dealt with this question in the light of the adoption by the Government of practically, to a large extent, the policy that had been previously pursued.

Had my hon. friend no other ground for coming to that conclusion? I think, Sir, you will agree with me that he had. He saw opposite to him the First Minister of the Crown who had pledged himself as solemnly as ever man did to the people of this country that there should be no material injury inflicted upon the manufacturing interests of Canada; and unless that statement was to be falsified, my hon. friend was perfectly right in assuming that there was to be no material change in the tariff, and that the statement of the hon. First Minister to that effect was to be accepted as correct. Now, I find that we are not alone in arriving at that conclusion. Those who will take the trouble to look at the "Globe" newspaper which, I need not tell the House is one of the ablest journals in this country, than which there is no paper better informed on these questions and in a better position to judge of the character of statements of this kind, will find that in its issue of April 23rd, it said as follows:—

The tariff resolution is everywhere discussed. While here and there one may find a Liberal member who thinks the duty on some article in which he is interested has been kept too high or kept too low, the great bulk of the supporters of the Government are enthusiastic in favour of the new tariff.

Just as they would be in favour of anything that comes from hon. gentlemen on the front benches. But the "Globe" went on to say:

Last night the full significance of the new scheme had not been grasped by those even intimately acquainted with the workings of the tariff.

There is the declaration of the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, given to the public of Canada, that when the hon. Minister of Finance resumed his seat after his long Budget speech, no one in this House or out of it was able to say what the tariff of this country was really to be. That demon of incertitude which has pursued the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite throughout the electoral campaign still holds them in its grasp, and even these supporters of the Government most intimately acquainted with fiscal questions were not able to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion as to what was intended.

Now, I listened to this most remarkable address with the most profound astonishment, because it violated the most plain, clearly understood and well known laws governing the Parliament of Canada. It was in antagonism with the constitution of the country and in violation of everything that hon. gentlemen on either side of the House had a right to expect from a Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman treated us to the usual jeremiad on the policy of protection. Only that the vigour and the spirit were lacking with which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) used to deal with this question, we could imagine that, in a diluted and weaker state, he was giving to us again his oft-told tale of the blue ruin and destruction caused by the National Policy. The hon. gentleman undertook to give us the history of protection and was not altogether accurate, as he must have learned to-day from listening to the speech just delivered by his predecessor (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman told us that in 1876 the question of protection to Canadian industries was first raised. In that the hon. gentleman was right. If he will go back to the "Hansards" of 1876 to 1878, he will find that the Opposition to the Government of which Mr. Mackenzie was then leader and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Finance Minister, were imploring that Government, from day to day, to come to the rescue of a sinking and impoverished country and give sufficient protection to the industries of Canada. The hon. gentleman ventured to say the other night, and I have no doubt that he believed what he said, that Mr. Mackenzie was approached by the manufacturers of Canada and begged to raise the tariff, but that he heroically resisted. What did that hon. gentleman think of that statement in the light of the declaration made from that seat a few moments ago by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the tariff as it has now been tabled in this House was practically the same tariff that he wished to introduce in 1876, but was prevented by political considerations. Why, Sir, that was not news to me. I knew that in response to the urgent appeal from this side of the House and the universal demand of the dying industries of this country, that the Mackenzie Government had made up their minds to increase the tariff and come to the rescue of these suffering and ruined industries, but that they were prevented by Hon. Mr. Jones's arrival in Ottawa just before the tariff was brought down, who threatened that if they did not abandon the proposal to which they had all agreed and which has been declared to-night by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as the tariff he was prepared to introduce but for political considerations, the whole Nova Scotia brigade on the Liberal side would go into opposition and turn them out. That is the history of that event which the hon. gentleman seemed to be quite ignorant of. The fact is that from 1867 to 1873 Canada was fairly prosperous. And the reason was to be found not in a high tariff, but in the fact that the industries of the great republic to the south of us were completely paralyzed and disorganized by a civil war, and this afforded us as ample a protection for our industries as any person could desire. That internecine struggle came to a happy close, and the industries of that great republic resumed their wonted condition. But, oppressed with a gigantic debt which the war had imposed upon them, the United States immediately resorted to high protection as the means of meeting their national engagements and wiping out their debt. Thus Canada found itself with a Chinese wall of protection raised against it, shutting out everything from this country, while the low tariff that we then possessed left this country a slaughter market for the industries of the United States, and everything in the shape of Canadian industry was practically paralyzed or driven out of existence. It was under that condition of things that the cry for fair, legitimate and necessary protection to Canadian industries was raised by the Liberal-Conservative party. And, Sir, those who will read the speeches delivered on the floor of the House in criticising the Budgets of the Minister of Finance, will find that steadily, year by year we advanced in that direction. We pointed out the absolute necessity of adopting a protective policy and we pledged ourselves in the face of Parliament and the country that if we were entrusted with the administration of public affairs we would take the earliest opportunity of carrying out that policy. I need not tell the House that a more deplorable condition of things, perhaps, never existed in any country—from fiscal causes certainly than Canada presented. I need not tell the House that hon. gentlemen then in power found themselves utterly unable to obtain the means from the low tariff that was then in existence, though they increased it by 2½ per cent. to find the necessary money for the ordinary expenditure of the country. They were obliged year after year to face huge deficits, rolled up not for the purpose of carrying on public works or for any expenditure of that kind, but occasioned by the lack of means to carry on the ordinary business of the country. There was a condition of universal stagnation, a condition in which all the progress that had been exhibited under Liberal-Conservative rule disappeared, and, from one end of this country to the other, stagnation and poverty and decay were present. Under these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the Liberal Government which brought into power by one of the most overwhelming majorities that any party has ever had in this country, or relatively, perhaps, in almost any other country, found itself, at the end of its term in 1878 driven from power by one of the most unanimous verdicts that any Government in any country ever was subjected to. If I remember aright, the journals will show a majority of from eighty to ninety taking the place of the overwhelming majority with which the Liberal Government had been brought into power in the general election of 1874. I can give no better evidence to the House of the deplorable condition in which Canada was and the determination of the free and independent and intelligent electorate of this country to drive from power men who had shown themselves so utterly incapable of discharging their duty to the country. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) knows well that in 1879, as soon as Parliament could be convened, the Liberal-Conservative Government brought down the policy of protection and placed it upon the Statute-book of the country. And, Sir, our opponents did us the justice to say on the floor of the House that we had honourably and faithfully redeemed our promises, at all events. I was astounded when I heard the hon. member for South Oxford, who cannot have forgotten that deplorable condition of Canada during the five years during which he filled the position of Finance Minister, regret that he could not go back to the tariff in existence in 1878. Did he wish that once more the deplorable spectacle should be presented in this country that was presented during that period when he held office before? Great objections were raised to our policy. The first was, instead of increasing your revenue you will decrease it, because the goods will be manufactured in the country instead of being imported and paying a duty. I need not take the time to contradict that statement, because the facts prove that we had a buoyant revenue and were enabled to deal with the public service of this country in a manner that had never been hoped for by our predecessors under their low tariff. The next objection was: Oh, but the people will have to pay so enormously for this protection that you are going to give to the manufacturers. The answer was: The policy will bring capital into Canada, it will bring people into Canada, it will have the effect of producing competition among the manufacturers at a very early day; that will regulate itself, and we will enjoy the advantage of having Canadian work done on Canadian soil without the people having to pay any more, or even as much; because, as I need not tell you, Sir, who have been conversant with the facts, under the policy of making Canada a slaughter market for the United States, the moment an industry was crushed out, and they had the field to themselves, they put up the prices, consequently the people had to pay higher. I can give no better illustration than sugar. Under the Liberal policy sugar refining was closed down, the vast machinery was rusting and going to ruin, and labourers were standing idle. But as a result of such protection as was necessary to put those industries on their feet, everybody knows that in addition to the benefit of large expenditures of money among our people, they had sugar at a rate less than it had ever been before. Now, I do not intend to take up the time of the House with reference to that further than to give a brief and admirable résumé of what occurred for the benefit of hon. gentlemen who, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce, have forgotten what occurred so recently as 1895. For the benefit of that hon. gentleman and of others troubled with short memories, I will read a comparison laid upon the Table of this House by my hon. colleague the late Finance Minister, who took the period from 1874 to 1879, and compared it with the period from 1889 to 1894, the latter period of four years covering the greatest depression that Canada has experienced from 1879 down to the present time. Sir, the showing is replete with information at a crisis like the present, and it ought to sink deep into the minds and memories of the people of this country:

I give that to the House as an unanswerable evidence of what this country experienced under the two 5-year periods of the greatest depression that existed from 1874 down to the present time. Now, I can give you no better evidence of the increased credit of the country under Liberal-Conservative legislation than the fact that when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, at that time Finance Minister, went out of office in 1878, the last loan that he put on the market was a four per cent loan at 96½; and when the late Government went out of power I need not tell the House that our 3 per cents had touched 107, or a premium of 7 per cent. Now, the hon. the ex-Finance Minister dealt so fully and exhaustively with the financial portion of the question that it is not necessary that I should refer to it at any length upon this occasion. But I may remind the House that the exports of last year, after eighteen years of the National Policy, reached the highest figure that they have ever done in the history of Canada; I need not remind the House that the increase in trade over the previous year was no less than fifteen millions. Our trade with Great Britain increased over that of 1895, by $6,640,995; the increase of trade with the United States over that of 1895, was $2,302,225. Now, if you turn to the exports, you will find that the exports to Great Britain increased in the last year $4,822,353 over those of 1895; while our exports to the United States were $1,547,475 less in 1896 than in 1895. Sir, the Minister of Finance ventured to say to this House that many Conservatives looked back with regret at the departure made in 1879. Why should they? On what ground, I ask him, does he venture in this House and in the hearing of the intelligent people of the country to say that Conservatives look with regret on the departure in the fiscal policy of this country made at that time? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that if ever there was a record of which every Liberal-Conservative may be justly proud it is the record of those eighteen years. He knows that the country passed out of the depths of poverty into a condition of the greatest prosperity. He knows that the country instead of being in that stagnant and impoverished condition which it occupied during the five years regime of the Liberal party, the country presented evidence from one end to the other of the tremendous value of the policy of protection. But, Sir, I require no further evidence of the triumph of the Liberal-Conservative party than that which the hon. gentleman himself presented to the House when he gave truthfully and fairly the statement he did give as to the financial condition of Canada when the Government was handed over to the hon. gentlemen. There are the figures to speak for themselves. Every evidence that can carry conviction to a mind open to conviction shows that no Government ever had greater reason for satisfaction than the late Government as regards the condition in which they handed over the affairs of this country to hon. gentlemen. But the hon. gentleman was fair enough to say that not only was the country vigorous and prosperous, but the trade was in a condition of buoyancy and expansion. There are no terms in the English language by which stronger testimony can be given as regards the position of the Liberal-Conservative party than those used by the hon. gentleman.

The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), true to the extravagant denunciations which he has been so long accustomed to make in regard to the Liberal Conservative party, said that they found the ship of state water-logged, running upon the rocks and the crew deserting her. I did not know we had been charged with showing any very great activity in deserting the ship.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It was a mutiny, I think.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was rather new to me to learn that hon. gentlemen opposite complained that we were too ready to give up the ship of state. But when we did surrender the ship she was in a condition of which any commander might well be proud; we handed the ship over in a condition such as any commander would be glad to receive her. I am sorry the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not present, as I hate to criticise the statements of an hon. gentleman when he is not in his place. That hon. gentleman ventured to charge the ex-Minister of Finance with having cooked the accounts. I regard that charge as one of the gravest that can be made against a public man. Any Finance Minister who will cook accounts is unworthy to hold such a high position, and I would remind the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, that on the floor of this House I established by testimony, the most clear and incontrovertible, that he was guilty of the offence with which he improperly charged my hon. friend. For the purpose of establishing a deficit against his predecessor, when he came into office in 1874 he did an act such as I trust no Minister of the Crown would ever attempt to perform—he actually took bodily out of the estimates $500,000 voted by Parliament on capital expenditure, and transferred it to revenue account, so as to create a deficit. I am only repeating, in the hon. gentleman's absence a charge which I have again and again made in his face, and which I challenged him to take before the Committee of Public Accounts, where I would establish it by the highest testimony that could be produced. So I think the hon. gentleman forgets himself when he attempts to charge my hon. friend with that act which no man, so far as I am aware, who has ever filled the position of Finance Minister, has done, except himself.

My hon. friend stated that the tariff was going to be practically the tariff of to-day. When the hon. gentleman made that statement he made a statement which relieved the minds and feelings of hundreds of thousands of the most intelligent and most important men in Canada. When the hon. gentleman said that the tariff was practically going to be the tariff of to-day, he said that which made those who had been inclined at times to doubt the sincerity and honesty of his leaders, who on the most important public occasion he gave his solemn word that the industries of this country would not be disturbed, and led the people to believe there was some faith to be reposed in man after all. My hon. friend accepted that statement, and based his speech on it, because he assumed this monstrosity, to use the language of my classical friend from Oxford, this "amorphous botch" on the hon. gentleman's budget was a thing not of practical utility, but put there as a little soothing panacea for free traders, who were not satisfied with the adoption of that tariff of the day by a party which had pledged itself that the moment it got in power it would wipe out every vestige of protection and give free trade to the country. It is no wonder that the "Globe" in the quotation which I have already submitted states that down to the close of the discussion on the subsequent night, even down to the time when the ex-Finance Minister rose to address the House, no one could quite satisfy himself what the tariff really was. Is it any wonder that people were unable to understand this tariff? Is it any wonder that the "Globe" says that people intimately acquainted with questions of fiscal policy and finance could not quite make out what the hon. gentleman intended? I will read for the information of the House the statement to which I refer, because it cannot too constantly be put before hon. members, as it covers the terms which the hon. gentleman calls the preferential features of the tariff. He said:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

Does any one know what that means? Could the hon. gentleman himself tell, much less those who heard him? Could any one tell what this jumble of inconsequential words meaning nothing, was intended to represent? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) must, therefore, excuse my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) for having assumed, as I assumed, that it was impossible that a Finance Minister in the Parliament of Canada should insult—I do not hesitate to use the word—the intelligence of this House by putting such a thing as that before us. We ought to assume that hon. gentlemen opposite have at least some little respect for the intelligence of their own followers, if they have none for the intelligence of gentlemen on this side of the House. I defy the members supporting the Government to give any rational explanation of what these words mean. They can mean anything or they can mean nothing, and they were accepted evidently as a soothing syrup to the free traders, who believed in the assertions of the Cabinet Ministers as to their free trade policy. I invite the attention of the Finance Minister to what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who stated: It is not a preferential tariff at all, there is nothing preferential about it. In that, the Minister of Trade and Commerce contradicts the very words of the Finance Minister. It would appear that these gentlemen had found out from some source or other that they are prohibited from giving Great Britain preferential treatment, and consequently the Minister of Trade and Commerce comes to the rescue of the Finance Minister, and tells him that he did not know what he was talking about when he put this construction on the resolution. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells us, that it is not preferential, that it is open to every country in the world and discriminates against none. Which of these two hon. gentlemen are right? Their statements are as different one from the other as day is from night, and it is important that this House should know which of them gives the true meaning of this extraordinary clause. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us, that not only is this so-called preferential tariff open to all the world, but he hopes and expects that the United States of America will be included in it, in addition to Belgium and Germany, and all those nations which have the most-favoured-nation clause in their treaty with Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought know, if they do not, that which every tyro knows who has given attention to the discussion of constitutional questions, namely, that they have no power to do what they propose. Is it treating this House with respect, for the Government to gravely propound to Parliament to pass a law which they know they have absolutely no power whatever to enact? Listen to what the "Globe" says, in an article headed "The position of Great Britain:"

This is the central principle of the tariff, and upon it all the batteries of the Opposition will be brought. Already Sir Charles Tupper, with scarcely concealed satisfaction, has expressed his belief that Great Britain will be forced by her treaty obligations to refuse the concessions made. Should the Government have waited to be told by me, that Great Britain cannot permit this to be done? No gentleman should take the position of Minister of Finance in this country, and undertake to deal with questions of such overwhelming gravity, until he has taken the trouble to inform himself with reference to matters of this kind. The "Globe" continues:

Sir Charles does not seem to appreciate the situation. The new tariff is in force.

Sir, that makes it a thousand times worse. When you are shown that it is impossible for you to do a certain thing, that it would be a theft, that it would be a robbery, that it would be anything you like, and your answer is : Oh, but I have done it ; I do not mind that it is unconstitutional or illegal, I have done it and it is beyond recall ; when such an answer is given what are intelligent people to think ? Yes, Sir, that was the answer given me by the Finance Minister when I told him that this could not be done. He said : Oh, but it is done, and to-morrow morning every customs officer from Cape Breton to Vancouver and on to Victoria on to the shores of the Pacific, will admit British goods at a reduction of one-eighth on the general tariff. Was such an exhibition ever made in the presence of an intelligent Parliament ? I say, that if the Government of which I had the honour to be a member, had come before Parliament with a proposal of that kind, we would have been laughed out of the House, and properly so too. We would not only have subjected ourselves to the derision and contempt of our opponents, but we would have earned as well the derision of our own supporters. For a member of a government under the parliamentary system in one of the great dependencies of the British Crown, to stand in this House and say : We are utterly regardless of anything but our own sweet will and right or wrong, law or no law, treaty or no treaty, constitution or no constitution, we will carry this out ; for him to say that, is unparalleled in the history of a British colony.

There is a feeling throughout Canada, which prevails not in one party but in all parties, of the most ardent desire to do everything that will show our devotion to the British Crown. There is a feeling amongst all our people of intense satisfaction at the very suggestion of anything that will draw more closely together the relations between the mother country and this great Dominion. That feeling, Sir, is abused. It is taken advantage of by hon. gentlemen opposite, who, instead of dealing in a statesmanlike manner with this great question of the unity of the Empire, drawing this great Dominion and the mother country more closely together, take the means of defeating and preventing any such thing being done. Why, Sir, listen to this from the "Globe." It is, in short, rank rebellion on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, who are putting themselves forward on this occasion as the only exponents of loyal devotion to Great Britain. It says :

The new tariff is in force. Great Britain is getting the benefit of the minimum rates. She may object to getting this advantage over her trade competitors, but how is the objection to be enforced ?

This is precisely the position the hon. gentleman himself took, and he finds that he has apt scholars.

Does Sir Charles Tupper think she will send troops to Canada to compel us to tax her goods as highly as those of the United States ? The situation is somewhat ridiculous for Sir Charles Tupper. Canada controls her own customs-houses, and an order from Downing Street to increase the duties on British goods would hardly go with the collectors of the Dominion, unless countersigned by Controller Paterson.

Why, Sir, it appears, according to this great luminary of the party, from which hon. gentlemen opposite gather so much light and comfort, that it is not a question for the Governor General or for the Imperial Government, whether a British treaty is to be observed in this country, but for Controller Paterson. Well, Sir, nobody in this House has a greater respect, amounting almost to a personal regard, than I have for that hon. gentleman. I have long witnessed his independent action on the floor of this Parliament. I have long ago satisfied myself that whether he does what is right or what is wrong, he does what according to the light he has, he believes to be right and proper. But, to say that any man in this country, I care not who he may be, from the highest to the lowest, is to be placed by the Government of this country in a position to overrule, to violate the constitution of the country, is to say that he can be guilty of an illegal act, an act which has not the force or the sanctity of law. Sir, I will read the words of the treaties which bind and govern us in this case, and if the hon. gentleman had read these treaties a little more frequently, if he had read them earlier, he would have been saved from occupying one of the most humiliating positions that I have ever seen any gentleman occupy during my parliamentary career. The treaty with Belgium says :

Articles, the produce and manufacture of Belgium, shall not be subject in the British colonies to other, or higher, duties than those which are, or may be, imposed upon similar articles of British origin.

Is that plain ? Is that clear ? Is that open to any misunderstanding ? Can any intelligent man say he does not know what that means ? And yet you are saying that you have ordered every custom-house officer in Canada to violate the plain spirit of that law. We are not an independent country, thank God ; we are under the ægis of the British Crown ; and I say that the man who undertakes to flaunt his own illegal and unconstitutional acts upon this country, in violation of that sovereign power to which we all are proud to owe allegiance, is guilty of an act of as great disrespect as it is possible for a citizen of this country to exhibit towards the great parent state. The German treaty declares :

The stipulations of the preceding articles, I. to VI., shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher, or other, import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other country of the like kind, nor shall the exportation from those colonies or possessions to the Zollverein be subject to any higher, or other, duties than the exportation from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

What is the result of that, Sir? Why, Sir, the moment that treaty is violated, where are the exports of Canada to Germany or to Belgium or to any one of the numerous countries that have the most-favoured-nation treatment? They are shut out, as a matter of course. They are in a position to say "You have violated the treaty." They will call on the Imperial Government to make good all the damage, all the derangement, to their trade, that has arisen in connection with that violation. These treaties with Belgium and Germany operate with equal force while they last, with reference to all the countries with which Great Britain has the most-favoured-nation treatment. What does the hon. gentleman think is to be the result of all this? As if to make assurance doubly sure, this question was asked from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Parliament—I am now reading from the "Hansard" of the House of Commons of England:

Sir ALBERT ROLLIT. I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the commercial treaties with Belgium and Germany prevent, or not, differential fiscal treatment by Great Britain in favour of its colonies, by the colonies in favour of Great Britain, or by the colonies in favour of each other?

I may say that this matter was brought to the notice of the Foreign Office, and they stated that they had obtained the opinion of the law officers of the Crown before giving their reply; and, having taken that opinion, the reply was:

(1) They do not prevent differential treatment by the United Kingdom in favour of the British colonies.

England could to-morrow tax the products of the United States of America going into England and entering into competition with ours, giving us differential treatment without violating those treaties. But the British Foreign Office replies further:

(2) They do prevent differential treatment by British colonies in favour of the United Kingdom. Well, Sir, the Montreal "Witness" says it believes that the law officers of the Crown in England agree with Sir Charles Tupper on this question, but it is greatly relieved to hear that the Prime Minister expressed unhesitatingly his opinion that there is no question at all about the Government having the right to pass this provision.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I suppose Sir Charles Tupper took quite a different view in July, 1892, at the meeting of the Chambers of Commerce in London.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, I think, had better reserve any statements he has until I sit down, because I do not propose to have a grave argument of this kind interrupted by any irrelevant statements. I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman's memory, on this as on many other occasions, has failed him. I am not saying what Sir Charles Tupper ever thought or said. I am saying what the Crown officers of England have stated; and when I say that the present Lord Russell of Killowen, one of the most brilliant lawyers that ever adorned the English bar, and who is now exhibiting equal ability as Lord Chief Justice in Great Britain, was the Attorney General of England at the time, and that he is the man who is responsible for that statement, I have probably satisfied my hon. friend that it is of very little consequence what opinion I may have ever held in view of such a high authority as I have quoted. This matter is one perfectly familiar to this House, one that has been exhaustively discussed, and concerning which there is no possible reason for doubt. The hon. gentleman must know that the Senate and the House of Commons adopted unanimously an address to Her Majesty the Queen, praying that these treaties should be modified so as to take away the obstruction which prevented Canada or any other British colony from treating the products of Great Britain more favourably than those of other countries, and the hon. gentleman cannot fail to know that Lord Ripon, who was then Colonial Minister, replied:

In regard to the third proposition, it seems clear that, under the terms of Article 15 of the Belgian Treaty and Article 7 of the treaty with the Zollverein, the British colonies cannot grant to the products of the United Kingdom any preferential treatment as to customs duties, without such treatment being extended to Belgium and Germany and other countries which have the most-favoured-nation clause with Great Britain.

The reason that that applies to all other countries is obvious. In the most-favoured-nation clause, it is provided that the most-favoured-nation shall enjoy the advantages that any other nation enjoys, and therefore, although the treaties with Belgium and Germany are the only two specific treaties that deal with this question, every other nation is in a position to say to England: What you have granted to Belgium and Germany under the most-favoured-nation clause, applies to us also. If that clause which prevents the colonies from giving a preference to the products of the United Kingdom were removed, it would also disappear from all the other treaties. That is not all. The hon. gentleman knows that I had the honour of negotiating a treaty with France, as a plenipotentiary of Her Majesty, under which Canada obtained certain concessions from France, and in return was to give France certain concessions here. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that he drew a great line of distinction between a preferential trade arrangement and a treaty. He said that the fact that it was not a simple tariff revision providing for the admission of the goods of one country upon more favoured terms than another, but was a treaty under which the advantage was obtained by purchase, as it were, and not by gift, changed the whole aspect of the question and removed all the difficulty. The hon. gentleman will find that that would not help him, if it were the case, because in this case there is no treaty. Was there any treaty made with England under which this Act came into operation on the morning the tariff was announced? Not at all. There was no communication, no arrangement, no treaty, and therefore the flimsy argument of the hon. Minister, the only one he could conjure up, falls to the ground. If there were anything wanting to satisfy him of the entire fallacy of his view, it is the fact that when a treaty was negotiated for freer trade between France and Canada by the Imperial Government, the Bill which was submitted to this House did not provide for the admission of the goods of Belgium and of Germany and the other countries that had the most-favoured-nation treatment with England, and consequently Her Majesty's Government would not consent to it, and my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was obliged to come back to Parliament and to lay before it the Bill of 1895 removing that difficulty and providing that the same rights enjoyed by France should be enjoyed by every country that had the most-favoured-nation treatment with England. Now, one would suppose that these hon. gentlemen, charged with such high and important duties, would have taken the trouble, if they did not know, to inform themselves, but it appears they were otherwise too busily engaged to consider a matter of such small import. What is the position to-day? The hon. gentleman says the law is in operation. Does he mean to say that the statement made by the hon. First Minister here a few evenings ago, that Belgium could not have the benefits that we extended to the mother country, is in force? Does he mean to say that throughout Canada to-day this Government, which professes such loyal devotion to the Crown, has actually instructed its customs officers to violate one of the plainest and most stringent treaty obligations of the mother country? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that this was a grave and important crisis. Sir, you cannot over-rate the importance of the position in which these hon. gentlemen have placed the Government and this Parliament in relation to this question. Their intentions may have been very good, but their absolute inability to deal with this question in the way that treaty obligations made it absolutely imperative that they should deal with it, the ignorance which they have exhibited on the whole question, has placed the Government of the country in one of the most humiliating and unfortunate positions that it has ever been placed in. But the hon. Minister of Finance, in his jaunty way, said: Suppose it is so. He did not seem to have taken the trouble to have informed himself, but confined himself to a mere supposition. Suppose Lord Chief Justice Russell has given that opinion? Why, he said, the world moves. But does the hon. gentleman want to move the Canadian world in the direction of defiant hostility to the mother country? What is the boast of England? It is that she never makes a treaty which she does not maintain in all its integrity to the last jot and tittle. England holds a transcendent position in the world because it is known that her engagements with foreign countries will always be held inviolate. Where have you placed England to-day by this extreme transcendent folly? The hon. gentleman laughs? Does he find anything to laugh at in the statement that it is transcendent folly for any Government in Canada to place itself in open, direct hostility to England. Does he think it anything but an act of transcendent folly for the Government of the day to ask Parliament to put a law on our Statute-book which they know is in the teeth of a solemn treaty made between England and all those other countries? And does he not know that every man whether he is a Belgian or a German or a Russian or a Persian, whoever he may be, belonging to a nation that is entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment by England, is in a position to demand from England—not from us they have nothing to do with us—that the rights they have had pledged, formally pledged by the greatest Empire in the world be recognized, and that this revolutionary encroachment by the Dominion of Canada shall be made good. This boast that these collectors have taken charge and are setting at defiance the treaties of England is an idle boast. Or, worse, it is one that will involve this country not only in disgrace but in most serious loss. There is not one of these countries, and I say it advisedly—if they dare to carry out this project of instructing their custom officers to discriminate between countries between which Great Britain has declared there shall be no discrimination, but may demand that the loss shall be made good, and not only that, but that all the trouble and inconvenience and embarrassment to trade that will follow as a matter of course shall be also made good. I ask this House whether, after all that Canada has suffered by reason of the long uncertainty with regard to the fiscal policy of the Government, it is not a high crime on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite now to prolong that uncertainty and perpetuate that condition of things, thus inflicting further loss and injury upon the people.

The hon. Minister of Finance read to the House a part of the platform adopted at the Liberal convention of 1893. One of the statements contained in that platform was that the existing tariff—that is the tariff under the National Policy—discriminated against Great Britain. That statement I challenge as untrue. It was reiterated by the hon. member for South Oxford to-day. But I brand that statement as untrue and as one of the greatest wrongs that the Liberal party of this country has ever inflicted upon Canada. Why, from the day I took the position of High Commissioner to England, I was met all over Great Britain with the question: Why does Canada discriminate against Great Britain? I found it was only necessary to state the facts to entirely disabuse the minds of all intelligent men of the idea that there was any discrimination in the Canadian tariff against Great Britain. I was invited to deliver an address upon Canada at the great seaport, the city of Newcastle, shortly before I left to come to this country at the end of 1895. And, having delivered that lecture, I was invited by the Board of Trade of Newcastle to deliver an address to that board. On that occasion I met the first men in Newcastle, men of the highest character and standing in regard to financial and commercial matters, men of the greatest experience, intelligence and enterprise. The room was crowded to the doors and I had the pleasure of addressing them for an hour and a half; and at the conclusion of my address at a banquet they took the opportunity of expressing the great gratification they felt, that the impression that they had formed that Canada discriminated against the mother country was not well founded in fact. And on every occasion, wherever I went—and I have been in the habit of attending meetings of Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade all over the United Kingdom—when the facts as established by the statistics of the country were put before the people. I never met an intelligent Englishman who was not satisfied that the charge that this country discriminated against the mother country was not well founded. As this is a matter of some importance, I gave the substance of my lecture to the press, and I will read a few clauses of it in order to give the House the facts and figures upon which I undertook to make good the statement I then made. I may say that the charge of discrimination against England is embodied in an article in the Toronto "Globe" of 2nd of November, 1896, as follows:—

In 1896 we imported from Great Britain $32,979,742. We imported from the United States, $58,574,024. The duty collected on the $32,979,000 of the imports from Great Britain amounted to $7,358,514, and on the $58,574,000 of imports from the United States it was $7,767,992. British goods, therefore, paid 22·3 per cent, and American goods 13·3 per cent, or a difference of American goods to the extent of 9 per cent.

Str CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, Sir, this is a grave indictment, on the face of it a very plausible one and one which would naturally lead parties who do not take the trouble to investigate the question to feel that Canada did discriminate against Great Britain. Yet, when examined, the whole of these fallacies melt into thin air. Did gentlemen opposite, when they were in power from 1874 to 1879, discriminate against England? The public records show that in 1873 the imports from Great Britain were $68,523,000, and in 1879, after these gentlemen had been in power for five years, they had fallen to $30,943,000, a decrease of $37,580,000 in the imports from Great Britain in five years. Did that look like a British policy? On the other hand, in 1873, when they came into power the imports from the United States were $47,730,000, and in 1879 they had only decreased $4,110,000, and stood at $43,620,000. You had a decrease in imports from Great Britain under your free trade system in your imports of $37,580,000, and you had an apparent decrease of $4,110,000 in the imports from the United States. And even that decrease was fallacious for the reason that it was mainly in grain in transit, in bond which, since 1878 has been shown separately. Therefore while there was a decrease of 37½ millions from Great Britain there was no decrease from the United States; yet that was under a free trade system. Now, the imports from Great Britain for consumption in 1896 were $2,036,024 over those of 1879. Notwithstanding the enormous industries that had been created all over Canada, notwithstanding that the National Policy, which was intended to do the work for the Canadian people, with Canadian hands on Canadian soil, had been carried out, there was not only no decrease but an increase during the period that the National Policy was in force. Now, the answer to this is given in a few words. I will read a statement given to the press which is contained in an address I made before the Board of Trade at Newcastle:

Generally speaking, it may be stated that Canada imports from Great Britain most of her staple manufactures, and that they have increased since the higher duties have been in force, or at any rate, have maintained their volume, notwithstanding the great development of similar industries in the Dominion. Further, that while Canadian imports from the United States of raw materials and other articles which Great Britain does not export, or in the export of which she cannot compete with an adjacent country like the United States, have largely increased, United States manufactures have improved to a comparatively small extent, and the trade does not appear to be expanding. For instance, the Canadian free list contains the following articles which Great Britain does not export to Canada to any extent, for the reasons already mentioned :—Anthracite coal, lumber, eggs, grease, hides, raw silk, broom corn, unmanufactured tobacco, florists' stocks, green fruits, cotton waste, raw cotton, gutta percha, newspapers, cocoanut and palm oil, rags, crude rubber, horses, seeds, and sugar. The imports of these articles, in addition to settlers' effects brought by immigrants into Canada, were valued in 1894 at $864,000 from Great Britain, and at the large sum of $20,427,767 from the United States, nearly $18,500,000 of which represented coal, lumber, hides, raw cotton, settlers' effects, crude rubber, and raw sugar. To this add the imports of coin and bullion, which from Great Britain were $1,631,000, and from the United States $2,288,000.

There are also many articles on the dutiable list which Great Britain does not export to any extent, or in which she cannot compete with the United States, owing to the low prices of the goods and to the favourable position occupied by the latter country for transport purposes; for example, cattle and horses (other than for breeding), sheep and other animals, baking powder, blacking, books, breadstuffs, bituminous coal, cocoanuts, coffee, medicines, electric light apparatus, axle grease, hops, malt, marble, mineral oil, trees, provisions, bricks and tiles, clocks, fish oil, &c., fruits, post office matter, turpentine, twine, vegetables, watches, and wood manufactures. Such commodities Great Britain only sent to Canada to the value of $1,505,000, while from the United States they represented no less than $11,849,000. Adding together the goods thus mentioned, those on the free list, including coin and bullion, and those on the dutiable list, the totals are $4,050,000 from Great Britain, and $32,637,000 from the United States.

Figures which present a remarkable contrast, but which are explained at once by the fact that they are articles in which England does not compete with this country :

Deducting these amounts from the total imports from the two countries, it will be found that Canada received from Great Britain merchandise to the value of $34,697,000—chiefly manufactures—as against $20,397,000 from the United States—a balance of $14,000,000 in favour of the mother country, in regard to what may be termed competitive trade. This is a very different thing from the bald statement in the summary given in the Canadian Trade Returns, which shows that in 1894 the imports from Great Britain were $38,747,000, and those from the United States $53,034,000.

Though the moment you came to the manufacturing industries in which Great Britain was interested, you found that the balance was altogether in favour of England and against the United States :

There is another phase of the question. The duty-free imports from Great Britain—

Of which great point is made in this article which I read from the "Globe."

—are only $11,224,000, as against $27,210,000 from the United States, and this is held by some to prove discrimination against the former country. It has already been shown that most of the free imports from the United States consist of raw materials and articles which Great Britain does not export, the value of which, including coin and bullion, were $2,545,000 from Great Britain, and $22,716,000 from the United States. Of such articles as salt, hemp, jute cloth, tea and coffee, articles for use of the Dominion Government, and paintings, Great Britain sent to Canada $2,533,000, and the United States only $397,000; and again, in the case of metals and their manufactures, on the free list, which include steel rails, the figures are $3,362,000 from Great Britain, as against $8,291,000 from the United States. The total of these different figures are $8,439,000 from Great Britain, and $23,941,000 from the United States. The explanation given seems to dispose of the contention that the Dominion free list operates injuriously upon British trade.

Now, Sir, I hold in my hand a statement of the staple manufactures imported into this country from Great Britain and the United States :

Article.	1896.
	From G.B.	From U.S.
Earthenware and china...	$ 385,586	$ 45,572
Fancy goods.....	908,938	228,825
Flax, hemp and jute.....	1,411,243	64,128
Silk	1,896,528	121,756
Spirits and wine.....	416,050	44,010
Woollens	6,930,268	203,848
Manufactures of cotton...	3,357,008	1,067,013

These figures show a total import of staple manufactures from Great Britain in 1896 amounting to $15,305,613, as against $1,775,155 from the United States in the same year. Yet, in face of the explanations that he ought to know perfectly well, and which ought to be regarded as entirely conclusive in these matters, the hon. gentleman ventured to declare that the fiscal policy of Canada discriminated against the mother country in favour of the United States, the facts proving that there was not only no grounds for such imputation of discrimination, but that the figures completely disposed of that question. Now, Sir, I pass on to inquire whether the results show that that was a British or an American policy. While under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite there was a decrease of 37½ millions in the imports of Great Britain to this country during the five years that they were in power, every person knows that no progress was made in this country, that nothing was done that was of value either to Canada or to the mother country. But when we by the National Policy revived the financial position of this country, when we placed the Government in a position to expand and develop the country, what did we do? I need not tell the House that under this National Policy, which has been declared to discriminate against England, we were enabled to secure the construction of over ten thousand miles of railway in Canada, and almost every rail used came in free from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. That was the way in which our policy was not only directly a British policy but indirectly a policy of the greatest value to the United Kingdom. Under that policy we constructed the gigantic work of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We opened up this country. When we came into power, what was the position of Canada? It was that here in the heart of the country, where Parliament meets, we were separated from Manitoba and the great prairies of the North-west by a desert extending over one thousand miles. The North-west itself was an unpeopled desert. One of the grounds of attack made on the Government when it took up the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was this: We were asked by hon. gentlemen then in Opposition what possible utility could there be in constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, when from Lake Nipissing for 3,000 miles to the shores of the Pacific, it would only pass one village containing a few hundred people. All the rest of the country was a desert occupied by wild animals and Indians. We were asked, how can you hope to maintain a line of communication when the earnings of the company will not be sufficient to pay the grease for the wheels, and the country would be ruined by undertaking to operate that gigantic work even if we could secure its construction. I need not tell the House how all these predictions have failed to be realized. I need not tell hon. members that the traffic created by the Canadian Pacific Railway, has caused that great enterprise to become one of the soundest and best financial undertakings in this country, and I need not point to the fact that it has not only enabled people from the older provinces of the Dominion to get access to the great North-west without going through a foreign country, as they were formerly obliged to do, by a most circuitous route in order to reach it at all, but it has opened up what will be at no distant date the great granary of the world for settlement and cultivation, and it has pierced the Rocky Mountains and opened up the enormous resources of British Columbia. The last cargo of rails I sent from England to British Columbia was seven months in reaching that province, while it can now be reached within a few days. Not only have we opened the boundless prairies of the North-west to British settlement, and developed a country that in the future will provide thousands of happy homes, over which the British flag will float, but we will be able to provide bread and meat for the mother country, which in the case of a European war she might otherwise be sorely pressed to obtain. I point to these facts to show that it was not an anti-British but an essentially British policy we adopted, and that it was attended with the best national results.

In addition, we expended during the past eighteen years no less than $36,250,000, from 1878 to 1896 inclusive, in deepening the canal system of Canada to fourteen feet, and we brought the work to a point that will enable

hon. gentlemen opposite within two years—and I am happy to find they are grappling with the question—to secure fourteen feet navigation throughout the entire system of canals connecting with the great lakes. All these matters are of great importance to Great Britain, and it is of the greatest importance that the Dominion should expand, develop and become a great country. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway has already been shown to be of vital importance, and the time may come at no distant date when the possession of this great road which has brought Yokohama within twenty days of London, by a route which occupies only one-half the time occupied by the Suez Canal route, will be of Imperial importance and the safety of British possessions in India many depend upon that work. Yet that National Policy, which has enabled Canada to achieve that great result for herself and the Empire, is alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite to be a discriminating policy against England. Without the National Policy, that national railroad would not exist to-day: we would have had no access to our great North-west except through a foreign country, during six months of the year; and without that policy the teeming millions of mineral resources to be taken out of the bowels of the earth in British Columbia at an early day would have remained buried, or if developed, the wealth would have gone to the neighbouring republic instead of enriching the people of Canada. I hope it is not necessary for me to say more in regard to a question that ought never to have been raised, because the charge that the National Policy of the Liberal-Conservative party discriminates against England is entirely untrue.

I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments on the question not of discrimination but of preferential trade. An hon. member has introduced a Bill with respect to trade marks, and under it the hon. gentleman proposes to make it a very serious offence for any person to appropriate a trade mark that does not belong to him. I heartily approve of a measure of that kind, if it can be carried into effect. But I want to know whether I shall not be in a position to come down and charge the Finance Minister with having stolen the trade mark of the United Empire Trade League. That league is a body of gentleman, a large number of whom are members of the Houses of Lords and Commons of both political parties, influential merchants and commercial gentlemen, who long ago came to the conclusion that the greatest means that could be adopted to promote the unity of the Empire was to establish preferential—not differential as the hon. member for South Oxford said—trade within the Empire. They have propounded to the country a policy of having the products of the United Kingdom sent into the various colonies on preferential terms, on better terms than those enjoyed by any foreign country, and that England should revert to her former position of giving to the products of her colonies a preferential position in her markets. That is the policy for which the United Empire Trade League have worked with great zeal and immense success, and while England is perhaps the most conservative country in the world, yet I have never anywhere witnessed such a revolution in public sentiment as I have in England, in regard to this question of preferential trade. I need not tell the House that preferential trade would increase the population of Canada, develop our wealth and expand our resources to an extent that cannot be hoped for under any other system. A deputation from this United Empire Trade League waited upon Lord Salisbury in June, 1891, with the object of asking to have the Belgian and German treaties modified, and if they could not be modified, to have them denounced so as to remove the restrictions which made it impossible for any colony to give preference to Great Britain. In the course of his speech, Lord Salisbury said :

On this matter public opinion must be framed or formed before any government can act. No government can impose its own opinion on the people of this country in these matters. You are invited, and it is the duty of those who feel themselves to be the pioneers of such a movement and the apostles of such a doctrine, to go forth to fight for it, and, when they have convinced the people of this country, their battle will be won.

This plainly shows that Lord Salisbury was ready, whenever he was supported by public sentiment to adopt a policy of preferential trade within the Empire. Then, on the 25th April, 1892, the Parliament of Canada passed the following resolution :—

That if and when the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than it accords to the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

The passage of that resolution was followed by the historic conference which took place in Ottawa, and which cordially endorsed that sentiment when it passed this resolution :

That this conference records its belief in the advisability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies by which trade within the Empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries.

The next important step in this matter was made when the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, now Secretary of State for the Colonies, declared at the Canada Club banquet, that for so important a purpose as to secure the unity of this great Empire, he would be prepared to abandon the Cobdenite view of free trade to the extent of taxing the products of foreign countries coming into England in competition with the products of the colonies.

It is true that he coupled that with the expression of opinion, that it ought to be accompanied by free trade within the Empire, or, that there should only be a revenue tariff, or, at all events, that there should be no protection within the Empire, but that the protection should be against outside countries. As I have said, the United Empire Trade League took up the question enthusiastically, and in obedience to the expressed opinion of Lord Salisbury fought for the principle, and after the last general election in England they went back to Lord Salisbury with this statement :

The greater number of the members returned to the present Parliament in support of Your Lordship's policy and Administration, advocated either in their election addresses or in their platform speeches, the policy of United Empire trade, and to this fact must be ascribed some portion of the unparalleled majority in the House of Commons by which Your Lordship is supported—especially from working-class constituencies.

The "Times" newspaper, March 10, 1896, says :

The Prime Minister has addressed a letter to Sir Howard Vincent, as honorary secretary of the United Empire Trade League, in reply to the memorial presented last month by the council of that body, praying that notice might be given denouncing the clause in the commercial treaties with Germany and Belgium preventing British colonies from levying a lighter duty upon British goods than upon foreign goods, should they elect to do so. Lord Salisbury says that "since the accession to office of Her Majesty's present advisers the question of the trade relations between the mother country and the colonies has been taken into serious consideration, and that he is in thorough accord with the views expressed by Mr. Chamberlain as to the extreme importance of securing as large a share as possible of the mutual trade of the United Kingdom and the colonies for British producers and manufacturers, whether located in the colonies or in the United Kingdom." The letter goes on to add that "while the Prime Minister fully recognizes the inconvenient character of the stipulations in question—stipulations which should never again be agreed to by this country—he is not prepared to give notice for the termination of these otherwise valuable treaties until a definite scheme has been produced offering such probabilities of increased trade within the Empire as would fully compensate for the risk involved."

Mark, Sir, Lord Salisbury observed that this question of preferential trade had made an enormous advance, but he said that before they took the serious step of denouncing these treaties, he wanted something to assure him that it was going to result in advantage to the Empire. On the 13th February, the London "Times" had an article in which it said it assumes now that the Tupper ministry had been formed a scheme would be propounded for the consideration of Lord Salisbury, and that this question would be taken up.

Sir, I have no hesitation in saying, that had the Government of which I had the honour to be the head been sustained, long ere this I should have submitted to Parliament and endeavoured to obtain its sanction to a proposal for the purpose of carrying out this policy of preferential trade between Great Britain and Canada. I have no doubt that such a policy could be formulated in such a way as to show to Her Majesty's Government that they would be consulting, not only the interests of Canada but the interests of the Empire if they gave effect to it.

But, Sir, I was greatly relieved to know that Mr. Chamberlain had followed up his statement, and had shown no lack of interest in this movement by his speech in opening the Third Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire. On that occasion, he used these somewhat memorable words :

And I admit that, if I understand it correctly, I find the germs of such a proposal in a resolution which is to be submitted to you on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade. What is that resolution? I hope I correctly explain it. That resolution I understand to be one for the creation of a British zollverein or customs union, which would establish at once practically free trade throughout the British Empire, but would leave the contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties upon foreign goods ; except that—this is an essential condition of the proposal—that Great Britain shall consent to replace moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies. Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country, which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might be, under such an arrangement, wholly produced in the colonies, and wholly produced by British labour. On the other hand, as I have said, the colonies, while maintaining their duties upon foreign imports, would agree to a free interchange of commodities with the rest of the Empire, and would cease to place protective duties upon any product of British labour.

If hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to promote preferential trade with Great Britain, there they had the opportunity. They had the opportunity, not only of obtaining the introduction of British goods into this country at a lower rate of duty, but of approaching Her Majesty's Government with a proposal that would secure an advantage to the great natural products of this country, such as wheat, dairy products, cattle, meats of every kind, and breadstuffs of every kind, in the markets of Great Britain upon terms as would give an impetus to Canada such as nothing else would give. He says further :

I only want to impress upon you my personal conviction that, if a proposal of this kind came to us from the colonies, backed by any considerable support on their part, it would not be met with a blank refusal by the people of this country. I say, gentlemen, if it were proposed to us by the colonies, because I do not consider that it would be either wise or practicable that a proposal of this kind should come in the first instance from the United Kingdom. We know how strenuously the colonies cling to their own independence, to their own initiative. If they desire, as we desire, and as we believe they do, this closer union—if they are willing to make some sacrifice of their present arrangements and convictions in order to secure it—let them say so. Let the offer come voluntarily from them, and I believe it will be considered in this country, not in any huckstering spirit, but that it will be entertained as part of a great policy which is intended to unite in the closest bonds of affection and of interest all the communities which are under the British flag and all the subjects of Her Majesty throughout the world.

I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to that as an invitation of the most pertinent character, coming from Her Majesty's Government to Canada in relation to this important question.

The resolution passed by the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire was in entire accord with the position of Mr. Chamberlain in that speech. That resolution, which was passed unanimously, was as follows :—

That this Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire is of opinion that the establishment of closer commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the colonies and dependencies is an object which deserves, and demands, prompt and careful consideration. The congress, therefore, respectfully represents to Her Majesty's Government that, if the suggestion should be made on behalf of the colonies, or of some of them, it would be right and expedient to promote such consideration, and the formulation of some practicable plan, by summoning an Imperial conference, thoroughly representative of the interests involved, or by such other means as Her Majesty may be advised to adopt.

I give that as an additional evidence of the position that this question has assumed.

Now, Sir, what took place during the last general election? It is well known that from the time I came out to this country I took every opportunity, when addressing a great meeting of commercial men in the city of Montreal, as well as in the various addresses which I delivered on the floor of this House and throughout the country, of urging the great importance of this question of preferential trade. And what happened? Why, Sir, my hon. friend the Prime Minister outbade me. Not content with going as far as I did, he put himself on record at a dozen places in similar terms to these to which he gave utterance on the 17th of May, 1896 :

In regard to this question of preferential trade, Mr. Laurier desired to say that Sir Charles Tupper was no more favourable to the idea than himself.

He went on to say :—

My hope is—nay, my conviction is—that on the 23rd of June the Liberal party will be at the head of the polls ; and then it will be the Liberal party, with its policy of a revenue tariff, that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

That was very satisfactory. Now, I have laid my hand on the extract from the "Times" to which I have already referred, and if the House will allow me, I will read it. On February 13, that paper said :

It is believed that the accession of Sir Charles Tupper to the Ministry will lead Canada to make some kind of an effort of preferential trade with the mother country. It is probable that the united governments of Australia will make a similar effort. The recent turn of foreign affairs, especially regarding Germany and America, have given much popular impetus to this movement.

Now, Sir, that was the position in which this question of preferential trade stood; and if ever a Government desired to promote the unity of the Empire and to establish closer trade relations with Great Britain, as the hon. First Minister had pledged himself that he did, this Government certainly had the invitation tendered from Her Majesty's Government to propound a plan under which preferential trade should be established. No hon. gentleman on either side of this House would hesitate for one moment to admit that it would be an enormous advantage to Canada, it would bring millions of capital and people into our country for the purpose of developing our great resources, if the products of Canada had such a position in the markets of Great Britain, which they do not now enjoy. It is true, England receives all our products without imposing any duty upon them: but is that any favour to us? Does not England do the same thing for the United States of America, who meet her with the most hostile tariff possible? Does she not do the same thing for Germany, Russia and every other country in the world? But, while she is thus giving us no favour, she says to us in the plainest terms: "We are quite prepared to meet you half way: the public mind of this country has so changed in relation to this question that we are quite prepared to consider the propriety of giving your wheat, cattle and various other products preferential treatment in the illimitable market of the United Kingdom, where some £200,000,000 sterling are expended on various kinds of food products." She says; "We are prepared to give you a better position and better terms in our markets than we give to the outside world, provided you now develop a scheme." If ever there was an opportunity held out to a country to take advantage of a plan calculated not only to develop the resources of Canada, but at the same time to promote the unity and greatness of the Empire, it was found in the position in which this question stood when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power.

What have they done? Instead of carrying out the pledge solemnly given by the First Minister that as soon as he came into power, he would address himself to this question of obtaining, not differential trade, but preferential trade, which would give Canada enormous advantages, we find that question of preferential treatment, with all its glowing prospects and the opportunities it presented for drawing Canada and the mother country more closely together and at the same time greatly increasing the expansion and development of our country, thrust away and this miserable system of differential treatment undertaken in the teeth of treaties and obligations the mother country is bound. As Mr. Chamberlain said, this matter had received an immense impetus from the Venezuelan difficulty. The moment that England was threatened on the one side by the United States and on the other by Germany, the mind of the intelligent people of England was turned to the question of where England was to get her food. Everybody who knows anything of the question knows that, depending, as England does, on the import of such an enormous quantity of food products, a comparatively short period would bring her into the most dire straits for the want of food. The attention of public men, statesmen and publicists, was then drawn to the question as to what sources of food supply England could look to. Every one knows the boundless capacity of our North-west, every one knows that the shortest line of communication with the food supply and the most easily defended by England would be the Dominion of Canada, and calculations were made. Mr. Long published an article in the "Nineteenth Century," on our food supply, which attracted great attention. He said:

Under conditions which could be created in a few years by the co-operation of the British Government with the governments of our great colonies, all the surplus breadstuffs we require, as well as the more luxurious products of the soil, could be produced in Canada, Australasia, India and South Africa.

In the Canadian North-west 55,550 families, each occupying a quarter-section of land or more, and growing one hundred acres of wheat, would suffice for the purpose. Canada is quite equal to the occasion, and there are thousands of our sturdy sons who would gladly undertake wheat production there or elsewhere in the Empire, if it became worth their while. As a matter of fact, there are millions of acres of wheat land in Canada waiting for occupation.

What did one of the leading journals in London say at the same time? In January, 1896, the "Saturday Review," said:

As soon as America is conciliated, we must proceed to set our house in order. The greater part of the emigration into the United States comes from these islands. It would need but little to deflect the major part of it from the American North-west to the Canadian North-west. A ten-per-cent differential duty in favour of our colonies would settle up Manitoba in ten years, instead of settling up Minnesota and Dakota. This differential duty would restore prosperity to New Zealand and enrich Australia and Canada. There is a kernel of good even in things evil. Pressure from the outside, science tells us, increases the cohesion between the units that compose the body corporate. The threat of war by America will cause Englishmen to hold more closely together, and will diminish that selfishness on the part of the mother country towards the colonies, which has hitherto been regarded as the true commercial policy of the nation, and which has never deserved the name of policy, because it makes for disunion and not for union, for weakness and not for strength.

I deplore the fact that so great an opportunity should have been lost. The Government were bound by their pledges to make an effort to secure preferential trade, and half the offer now made would have accomplished the work. The offer that is made to give to British products the advantage which this tariff will give a year hence, would, if utilized for the purpose I have mentioned, have secured such preferential trade between the mother country and the colonies as would be attended with unbounded advantage. I deplore the loss of such an opportunity the more, because if the hon. the First Minister had used all the ability and research he possesses to discover a means of preventing preferential trade from ever being obtained by Canada, he could not have adopted a better means than the one he has taken. If Lord Salisbury's Government wished to obtain the support of the House of Commons of England to preferential trade and were in a position to come down with such a proposition as was made here in this illegal and unpatriotic way, if the Salisbury Government were in a position to say to the House of Commons: Here are the terms on which Canada is willing to negotiate for preferential trade, and all we have to give in return is admission of the products of Canada into our country on more favourable terms than are given to foreign countries, such a proposition would carry an overwhelming majority of that House beyond doubt. But suppose it were possible to carry the present offer into effect and to give this advantage to England, the moment that was done, and the counter proposal made to bring Canadian products into Great Britain upon more favourable terms than those of foreign countries, such a proposal would have no chance of success. A golden opportunity has been wasted and a course taken calculated to be most injurious to this country.

As I have said, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to-day threw off all disguise. We could not learn from the Finance Minister, not even the "Globe" could, what was really the intent of this tariff, but all disguise was thrown off this afternoon as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared that it was not preferential trade with England he desired. The hon. gentleman knows that all you have to do to arouse the most enthusiastic sentiment of this country is to speak of anything that will draw apparently, the mother country and this country closer together.

And advantage is taken to-day, not to obtain preferential trade with England, but to obtain free trade with all countries. That is the policy. The disguise is thrown off. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) occupied a most humiliating position. When the Mackenzie Government was in power he was the exponent of their financial policy, and in their struggle to retain power, he was ready to adopt first one expedient and then another, but when the Liberals were out of office and had long struggled to get back, it was found that one of the most serious difficulties in the way of their ambitions was the reputation that the hon. gentleman had acquired in this House and out of it as the fierce denunciator of the National Policy and of protection to Canadian industries. No words that the English language could furnish him were strong enough in the denunciation of anything and everything that was calculated to promote and develop Canadian industries. When hon. gentlemen opposite went to the country on the last occasion, they found that the hon. member for South Oxford had to be retired. It was found that the sentiment in favour of the National Policy had taken strong hold of public opinion in Canada. In four successive attempts they had been defeated on that question, and the people had shown that they were determined to stand by the National Policy. And the Liberal party came to the conclusion that it was hopeless to attempt to get into power unless the hon. member for South Oxford could be withdrawn from the field. He was virtually induced—got a hint, I suppose, that his services on the platform, instead of being a benefit to his party, were most damaging—to remain in the background. But that was not enough. When the leader of gentlemen opposite endeavoured to assure the manufacturing industries of this country that they would not be disturbed, that they had nothing to fear at the hands of the Liberal party, they were told by the representatives of those industries: That is all very well so far as you are concerned, Mr. Laurier, I dare say you mean what you say. But, Sir Richard Cartwright is to be the Finance Minister and he is pledged to tear up the National Policy, root and branch, he is pledged to treat those who have been maintaining the industries of this country as robbers and thieves, and there is no hope that any justice would be shown the manufacturers, if he is to be the Finance Minister. What was the result? Why, Sir, the most positive pledges were given again and again that if they came into power Sir Richard Cartwright should not be Finance Minister. But every person knows that there was not a man on that side of the House with the power and ability to deal with questions of that kind possessed by the hon. member for South Oxford. Every person knows that he is a giant—I will not say among pigmies, but I will say he is a giant. He was a Triton—I will not say among minnows, but he was a Triton. And so he was regarded and so he was treated by every person interested in these industries. The hon. gentleman has had his humiliation and has borne it. He has been relegated to the back-ground. He finds another—and I am glad the compliment was paid to a countryman of mine—made Finance Minister in his place. But in doing this, the deepest injury that could be inflicted upon a man who had fought the battles of his party as the hon. member for South Oxford had, is put upon him by compelling him to take third rank in the Administration and putting him behind a young man who had not even been in the Parliament of Canada before. But the hon. member for South Oxford has had his revenge. Though he spoke about a lean Cassius at my side, he was thinking of the lean Cassius at his own right hand. While his words came here, his eye rested upon the man who, in order to get power had pledged himself and had been pledged by his friends in the most emphatic terms, that if the Liberals were returned to power Sir Richard should never be Finance Minister. Though he has been relegated to a back seat, he had the ability, the power, the influence, to treat his colleagues as a parcel of children. He has been able to inflict upon his leader the direst disgrace that one man could inflict upon another. Let me read what the hon. First Minister said to the people of Montreal and then ask what is that hon. gentleman's position here to-day. As lately as the 22nd of January, 1896, before the last election. Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, speaking at Montreal, said :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

We are told that we must not destroy the manufactures of Montreal. I say that we are not going to destroy the industries of Montreal. I contend, on the contrary, that the application of the ideas that we defend will inaugurate an era of prosperity such as Montreal has not known since the inauguration of the National Policy. The present system raises a maximum of taxation, not only on the consumer, but also on the producer. They have a tax on iron, which is a raw material of every industry. The tax on coal, which is also a raw material of every industry, is 60 cents a ton. Although I have not the latest quotations of coal, I am sure that this tax is equivalent to 40 per cent. Now, I am asked, What are you going to do? I have just told you what we are going to do. We are going to have a tariff for revenue, and we are going to abolish completely the duties on raw material.

Where is the hon. gentleman to-day? Upon this solemn declaration of his, the manufacturers of Montreal gave him support. This declaration paralyzed the manufacturing industries all over Canada and prevented them giving support to the men to whom they owed the position they occupy. In the face of a declaration of that kind, where does the hon. First Minister stand when the hon. gentleman for South Oxford rises and declares that he has inaugurated a complete system of free trade. How a complete system of free trade? The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has caused them to commit themselves to this senseless, unpatriotic—I might almost use a stronger word—policy, and now they find themselves in such a position that they have but one resource. And the hon. gentleman knew it right well. I presume he was the only one who knew it. If the hon. First Minister has said what he believed and the hon. Finance Minister has said what he believed, neither of them knew it. But the hon. member for South Oxford knew it, and knew that he had them in a trap. Should not the Governor General do what he may and what, but for the past, I would have no doubt he would do, exercise the right that the Governor of any colony in the British Empire would use, and withhold the Royal assent from an Act that introduces a discriminating tariff, what will the position of hon. gentlemen opposite be? Let the Governor General do his duty, and what happens? Sir, the country is already thrown into inextricable confusion, and there is no resource but the disallowance of the Bill. I am not going at this late hour to take up the time of the House, but I could turn to the constitution of the country to show how the Governor General exercises the power of reservation. By turning to that eminent authority on these questions which Dr. Bourinot has placed before the country, I could show that although the absolute compulsion to withhold assent has been withdrawn, it is only because it is held that the power of disallowance retained by the Imperial Government under the circumstances renders its exercise by the Governor General a matter of less moment. But the hon. gentleman will find by referring to these authorities that if the Governor General does not reserve this Act, as every Governor, I think, throughout the British Empire would reserve it, if it came before him, he is bound by his duty to forward that Act the moment it is passed, to England for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and hon. gentlemen opposite know that within twenty-four hours of that Act being laid upon the Table of the Colonial Minister, it would be disallowed, and the collection of the revenue of this country thrown into confusion. The hon. member for South Oxford knew it all, he saw it all; and no man could listen to him standing there to-day and gloating over the position in which the Government is placed, and the party were placed, without feeling that he had his revenge. Why, Sir, what was his position? He was able to stand on the floor of this House to-day and tell the hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, and tell this House, that he had secured free trade in all its entirety. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that the only means by which the Government can now extricate themselves from the dilemma in which they are placed, is to bring down an additional clause extending all these privileges that they propose to give to England, to Belgium and Germany and to every other country that has most-favoured nation treatment. They know that when, only two years ago, it was attempted to adopt even a treaty of reciprocal trade with France, the Imperial Government took the ground that everything conceded must be given to Germany and Belgium and to all the other countries that had most-favoured-nation treaties with England. What has happened now? Why, the hon. gentleman was able to say: I have triumphed, never mind the solemn declaration that the First Minister made to the people of this country, and by which he has obtained power. Not only was he prepared to enjoy this triumph, but he resumed his old tone, and declared that the work had been accomplished, that free trade had been secured, and that he was in a position to strike down and paralyse all the industries of this country by doing the only thing that remains to the Government to do, that of extending this measure to Belgium and to Germany, and to every other country with which England has most-favoured-nation treatment. Then he said: Probably after all, it will be the United States as well, and we shall have free trade. This he said in the presence of his leader, who was bound in the most solemn manner that a man could be bound to the people of this country, by his promise to protect the industries of this country, by his promise that the manufacturers should not suffer if he obtained power—the hon. gentleman was able to say in the presence and in the hearing of his leader, that protection was a curse to this country. Now, what is the result? The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence. While hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal "Gazette" where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada. It would have been bad enough if the hon. gentleman had gone to the country with a frank avowal that they were in favour of what they had declared to be their policy for long years previously; it would have been bad enough if they had been able to get a majority pledged to sweep away these industries and to destroy the policy that had achieved so much for Canada; but to obtain power by the solemn declaration made publicly and privately all over this country that no harm would come to the manufacturing industries, that not a hair of their heads should be touched, that in fact their rights would be protected and their position would be improved, because they were going to have their raw material free, coal was to be made free—I say that under these circumstances I can understand how indignant the people of this country will feel at the outrage that has been inflicted upon them not by a fair, open, and manly declaration of policy, but by false pretenses, under the guise of solemn declarations that no harm would be done to the industries of this country. Now, the country is in this position, that because the Finance Minister has stupidly made a proposition that is utterly impracticable, and a violation of Imperial treaties, and which will cause the whole revenue Bill to become a nullity, the only recourse the Government have now is to adopt a second measure, to apply this clause to Belgium and Germany, and all other countries having similar treaties with England. Well, I can only say that if the policy were good in itself, the mode in which it has been accomplished is calculated to condemn it. I feel that far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada, and upon its great industries. Still, I unhesitatingly say that from a party point of view the hon. gentlemen are doing our work; they are showing the people of this country that no reliance can be placed upon the most solemn declarations that they make, either in the House or out of it; they are showing the people of this country that, having obtained power, which was all they wished for, they are now prepared to abuse that power at the cost of the sacrifice of the industries of Canada.

Now, I have a word or two to say in regard to the attempted explanation of the Finance Minister as to the coal question. That hon. gentleman has placed himself in a position such as no Minister of Finance in this or any other country ever placed himself. He stood up in his place in this House and declared in the presence of this House a truism, a thing that commended itself to the judgment of every man in this House—that for the Finance Minister to use his position to give the slightest intimation to any person before the Budget was brought down, of what that Budget would contain, or how it would affect any person, was an infamous act. I take the hon. gentleman's own statement as it appears in "Hansard," and I ask him how he stands in regard to that declaration. He admits that he did not receive even all the people interested, but he had a private interview with certain gentlemen connected with the great coal interest of this country, and he admits that he disclosed at that private interview, held in a private parlour, to a certain limited number of parties interested in the business, and without communicating with other parties within his reach or call, what the tariff on coal was to be. That is the position. And what excuse has he to offer? I disclosed to the House one of the basest conspiracies that ever was concocted by anything calling itself a Government, or by any public man calling himself a Finance Minister, in regard to Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman wondered that I was not ashamed to name the word Nova Scotia in this House. Why should I be ashamed? Could I as one of the founders of the National Policy have a greater triumph than that at the end of eighteen years of trial of the National Policy, it had to be adopted by the leader of the local government as the means of carrying the province.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Then why did you oppose him, if he was supporting the National Policy?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Because a person chooses to steal the clothing of another person, that is no reason why he should support him. It was an insult to the intelligence of the people of Nova Scotia. But the question as regards the National Policy is, how far does coal touch it? Let the hon. gentleman read what the "Witness" says on that point, and then ask what the position is. It says:

Mr. Fielding has assured us that there has been no collusion of any sort between him and his former colleague, Mr. Murray. If there has not, these coal constituencies are being misled.

Why did he say that? It was because Mr. Murray had declared that the great issue in the local elections in Nova Scotia was that the province would secure the retention of protection on coal by supporting the Liberal party. What does that newspaper further say:

If Mr. Fielding has surrendered the National Policy at its pivotal point to gain Nova Scotia, he will never be forgiven.

What does the hon. gentleman think of that statement? That is not the denunciation of an opponent; that is the declaration of a most tried and enthusiastic friend and supporter of the Liberal party, which declares that the policy on which Nova Scotia was carried was a pivotal portion of the National Policy. I want to know what the House thinks of the Prime Minister publicly declaring there would be free coal, and yet without any communication being made to any person in this House or out of it, the Minister of Finance, before bringing down his Budget, on the eve of the elections in Nova Scotia, declaring to certain parties interested in the coal business that his policy was going to be the reverse. I say it is a betrayal of the duties of the hon. gentleman's position, such as no Finance Minister has ever been charged with previously in the history of the country. It is a humiliation of the gravest character as regards his leader, to make that announcement under the circumstances under which it was made, and it was adopting a course that however strongly partisan any hon. gentleman may be, I do not believe he will give his support and concurrence to any such advantage being taken by a public man for the purpose of carrying elections. But that is not all. What do the hon. gentlemen behind the Finance Minister, who thinks that Nova Scotia knows something about me, say in regard to this matter? I am glad to declare that if any public man ever had reason to be proud of his native province, I am that man. Hon. gentlemen may search the history of any portion of Canada in vain to find greater devotion and longer continued support than Nova Scotia has given to myself. The hon. gentleman prides himself very much on the defeat of the Liberal-Conservative party. Why should he, when he was compelled to do me the great honour and the great Liberal-Conservative party the honour of admitting that the only means by which the Liberal party could carry the elections was to adopt the policy and platform for which I have fought for years. What will hon. gentlemen behind him think when they know that this is not a trifling matter for them. In the Nova Scotia elections not alone was the coal question involved. It was a fact that the Liberals had stolen our policy and masqueraded about in our clothes in order to obtain the support of the people, but there was a much larger bribe than that. I hold the proof in my hand. Hon. gentlemen opposite will have to vote one million and a quarter dollars of public money in consequence of carrying the Nova Scotia elections. This is the manifesto which Mr. Murray, a former colleague of the present Finance Minister, and the present Premier of the province, issued and on which he carried Nova Scotia. I have already read the portion with respect to coal, and it continues:

The Government of Nova Scotia has made repeated efforts to obtain from the Government of Canada certain claims which were deemed just and equitable, on account of the Eastern Extension Railway and in respect of the Western Counties Railway, as well. The claim in respect to the Eastern Extension Railway was that it had become part of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada, which had been built as a national work and out of the revenues of the whole country, whereas the portion of it between New Glasgow and the Strait of Canso had received a subsidy from the provincial revenue amounting to $671,836, which amount should be refunded to the revenue of Nova Scotia, as it can scarcely be deemed just or fair that the revenue of the province should be called upon to contribute to the construction of any part of a work undertaken and carried forward as a purely national undertaking.

The claim in respect of the Western Counties Railway is based upon the fact that this province contributed the sum of $679,197 as a subsidy towards the construction of the work, and that, in 1887, the Dominion Government, by a special Act of the Federal Parliament, took this road out of the control of the provincial authorities and made it a railway for the general advantage of Canada, under the British North America Act. While not attempting to call in question the constitutional power of the Federal Parliament to vest any public work belonging to a province in the Dominion by an Act of Parliament creating such a work one for the general advantage of Canada, yet both the letter and the spirit of the Act are entirely opposed to the idea that such a work should be taken out of the control of the provincial authorities and subjected to the legislative authority of the Federal Parliament without compensation. These claims were pressed upon the late Government steadily and persistently by every means in our power, including a special delegation to Ottawa in 1892, but no fair consideration of our claims could be obtained.

I regret to say that every effort made by the government to secure for the province the repayment of these large sums were resisted and obstructed at every stage, and with the utmost determination, on the part of our opponents in the provincial legislature, and it is difficult to conceive of any motive for such unpatriotic proceedings, apart from the desire not to embarrass their political friends in the Dominion Parliament. No such unworthy motive should have been allowed to interfere with the settlement of the just and equitable claims of the province.

I propose to again press these claims to an issue, and I have reason to believe that since the change of Administration at Ottawa they stand a better chance for recognition than at the hands of the late Federal Ministry. Before taking such a step, however, it seems to me desirable that we should go strengthened by the mandate of the people of Nova Scotia. Any considerable sum received on this account will be extremely useful in many ways, including, among others, that of making substantial repairs to certain of the public highways of the province which stand in need of special consideration.

Those two sums mentioned together amount to $1,351,033. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has put it in the power of his late colleague, the present Premier of Nova Scotia, to say that the late Government had denied justice, and that he had reason to believe, now when the gentleman who pressed these claims occupied the position of Finance Minister, that the $1,351,033 would soon be in the treasury of Nova Scotia. When hon. gentlemen behind the Finance Minister find that they have to implement these promises, it will, therefore, not be a matter of great surprise for them.

Nova Scotia is a little fitful occasionally in reference to elections. In 1867 I came to this Parliament with eighteen, all the rest of the Nova Scotia members pledged to oppose me and to break up confederation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows that in the election of 1872 the Government of which I was a member had the support of the entire Nova Scotia delegation without a single man being opposed to us. The hon. gentleman knows, that in 1874, when an election was suddenly sprung upon the country on a question that was not understood, I came back with one solitary friend at my side, Mr. McDonald, now a Senator. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows, that in 1878, five years afterwards, when the people had an opportunity of learning what the real position of matters was, fifteen Conservatives out of a total of twenty members were returned to this House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), who was in power in the province a good part of the time, knows when I resigned my position in 1888, the Liberal-Conservative party had the support of sixteen out of twenty-one Nova Scotia members in this Parliament.

I may say a single word to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) who paid a well deserved compliment to the county of Colchester, and who undertook to boast the other day, that that intelligent county would be carried for the Liberal party. Well, the man who stood at the head of the poll in that county, was a Liberal-Conservative. Notwithstanding that Nova Scotia was terrorized by the present Government with threats of dismissal from office, with this gigantic bribe of $1,300,000 and with the bribe of a promise to maintain the duty on coal; notwithstanding all these things, this Government was unable to prevent a Liberal-Conservative from being at the head of a poll in that county.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has reference to the local and not to the Dominion election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As far as the Dominion election is concerned, I may say that the Liberal candidate who a year ago carried that constituency by 300 or 400 majority, at present claims the seat by a majority of eight, but I have no doubt of having the pleasure at an early date of introducing the Liberal-Conservative member for Colchester to the Speaker of this House.

I have listened in this House to a good many things with regard to which I felt that some little liberty was taken with the intelligence of the House, but I have listened to nothing so surprising as some of the statements made recently. It was a matter of amusement to us of the Conservative party, to hear the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) claiming to be the great representative of British sentiment and British loyalty. He taunted us with having been very loud-mouthed about our patriotism, and our regard for the motherland. Well, the hon. gentleman knows, that from time immemorial, loyal devotion to the Crown and admiration and affection for England, has been the cardinal principle of the Liberal-Conservative party. The hon. gentleman knows, that any measure which may be introduced into this House, calculated to draw the mother country and Canada more closely together, and to promote the unity of the Empire, will receive the spontaneous, and hearty, and enthusiastic support of every member of the Liberal-Conservative party. But, Sir, it is a little presumptuous on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to lecture us on the subject of loyalty. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows well, that it is within the last five years that his party have discovered his loyalty. He knows that five years ago the Liberal party convulsed this country by the advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Does any person doubt what that would mean? We all know that it meant, Canada turning her back upon the mother country, going in for continental free trade, adopting the high tariff of the United States made at Washington as our tariff, and putting it in operation against England and all the rest of the world. That was what unrestricted reciprocity meant. And yet, these loyal gentlemen, these super-loyal gentlemen, these gentlemen who now flaunt thus boldly their new-found loyalty, were five years ago advocating a disloyal policy. For fear hon. gentlemen who may not be acquainted with the facts may think me somewhat mistaken on this point, I will take the liberty of reading to the House what the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said at Oshawa, on February 10th, 1891:

C. W. Scott asked: "Does the Liberal party favour discrimination against Great Britain by admitting American manufactures free and taxing the manufactures of Great Britain?"

Sir Richard Cartwright replied: "Certainly we do."

Is that not sufficient to show what the position of the Liberal party in this country was, and what they intended to do? The "Globe" of December 14, 1891, commenting on Sir Oliver Mowat's letter to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, said:

Mr. Mowat now declares that he is in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. We infer that he countenances discrimination against British goods, without which it cannot be obtained.

That is the history, Sir, of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the history of the unrestricted offer?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend is so dense as not to know the difference between an unrestricted offer of reciprocity and an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, I give him up. Now, Sir, the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, at Toronto, on the 30th of September, 1889, at a meeting of the Young Men's Liberal Club, said:

I have read the history of unrestricted reciprocity in this way, that every reform has cost to the reformers years of labour, and those years of labour I, for one, am prepared to give; and though the Democrats may be defeated in the States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until that cause is successful. I will not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of Opposition until the cause has triumphed, and you shall never hear a complaint from me.

The hon. gentleman changed his mind afterwards, and concluded that he would prefer to abandon the policy of unrestricted reciprocity and to take some other policy for the sake of getting into power. He went on:

I tell you, the Liberal party will never cease the agitation until they triumph and obtain continental free trade. We are asked sometimes, gentlemen, what is the programme of the Liberal party. This is the programme of the Liberal party: to obtain a continental freedom of trade.

I am not at all certain that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had not that in his mind to-day when he intimated that he expected the United States to be brought in under this arrangement. Knowing, as he does, that the United States, through Mr. Blaine, announced years ago, and have reiterated on various occasions, that Canada shall have no reciprocity with the United States unless she discriminates against England, the manner in which the hon. gentleman gloated over his triumph over the National Policy, and his intimation that this preferential policy may be extended to the United States shows that it is likely to become a live issue at no distant day. The hon. Prime Minister concluded this speech with these words:

Success will certainly crown our efforts at no distant day. Fixing our eyes steadily upon the goal, we shall go on steadily until we reach it—unrestricted continental reciprocity.

Do hon. gentlemen feel for a single moment that I am doing injustice to their readiness to adopt continental free trade, to turn their backs upon the mother country, and to put in force in Canada the high tariff of the United States against the mother country? Do they think I am doing them an injustice? Let me remind them that the ablest man who ever stood in their ranks in this country, the Hon. Edward Blake, when that battle was fought in 1891, abandoned them, refused to have lot or part with them, and abandoned his constituency, and gave as his reason that he was not willing to fight under false colours, because he believed that the policy of the Liberal party would end in severing the connection between the Crown of England and the Dominion of Canada. And are we to be lectured on the subject of loyalty by gentlemen who, five years ago, roamed through this country endeavouring to strike down British interests and to establish continental free trade at the cost of every sentiment of British loyalty? No, Sir. We stand ready to do everything that men can do to uphold and support any and every measure calculated to draw the great parent state and this country more closely together. Proud of our connection, loyal as we have been from the first hour of our existence down to the present hour, devoted to the Crown and to British institutions, we stand to-day where we have always stood, ready to do battle as best we can in behalf of the suffering industries of Canada. Sir, if the battle of protection and free trade is to be fought over again, we are not afraid to do battle under that banner which carried us to victory before, and under which the great Liberal-Conservative party made Canada what it is to-day. Under that banner, after having won the victory, we used that victory to lift this country out of a condition of depression and despondency such as Canada had never known before. We raised it step by step until, regarding everything that indicates the greatness, progress and prosperity of the country, we occupy the highest and proudest position that any party could ever occupy.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 27th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SAFETY ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. CASEY moved :

That all petitions concerning Bills Nos. 2 and 3 respecting the Safety of Railway Employees and Passengers be referred to the Select Committee on the said Bills.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. REID moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 63) to regulate freight rates on railways. He said : This Bill is similar to the inter-state commerce law of the United States. I propose that a commission be appointed, which will have power to settle all disputes that may arise between shippers and the railways. It also provides that the rates on short hauls shall not be proportionately greater than the rates on long hauls. The Bill is very lengthy, and I will explain it more fully on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

SEIZURE OF "SILVER SPRAY" AND "MARY GROVER."

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked :

1. Were the tug "Silver Spray" and the schooner "Mary Grover," or either of them, seized for infraction of the revenue laws of the Dominion during the year 1883 or 1884, or either of said years?

2. If said vessels or either of them were so seized, what was the nature of the offence for which they, or either of them, were so seized?

3. What was the name of the officer who seized said vessels or either of them?

4. Were said vessels or either of them released? If so, upon what terms?

5. Was an investigation subsequently held? If so, what was the name of the officer who conducted said investigation? Where was it held? What were the names of the witnesses examined at said investigation? Was their evidence reduced to writing and returned to the department, and is the same now on the files of the department?

6. Was final disposition made of the matter?

7. What was the name of the owner or owners of said vessels?

8. By whom were the sworn entries made at Port Arthur or Michipicoten (or wherever the same were made) of the cargoes of said vessels?

9. Were the original entries and the invoices accompanying same returned to the Department of Customs, and are the same now on file in said department?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. The tug "Silver Spray" and the schooner "Mary Grover" were seized for infraction of the revenue laws of the Dominion, the former on the 6th of May, 1884, and the latter on the 5th of May, 1884. 2. The "Mary Grover" was seized for having, in October, 1883, landed a cargo of goods and provisions without report or entry at Michipicoten River, cargo shipped in the United States. The "Silver Spray" was seized for having, in October, 1883, towed the schooner "Mary Grover," with a cargo of goods, &c., from Sault Ste. Marie, United States, to Michipicoten River, Ontario, where said cargo was landed without being reported or entered. 3. The officer who seized the vessels was Joseph Wilson, collector of customs, Sault Ste. Marie. 4. The vessels were released on the owners depositing $4,000 under section 204 of the Customs Act, being $500 for the "Mary Grover" and $3,500 for the "Silver Spray." 5. A reference appears on the files in the Customs Department to an examination made before the Police Magistrate at Toronto, when Captain Emmons, of the "Mary Grover" was arrested for false report, but no report of the evidence taken or witnesses examined at the investigation can be found in the Department of Customs, and the records do not appear to show that such report and evidence were received at the Customs Department. 6. Yes. 7. Messrs. Conmee & McLennan were stated to be the owners of said vessels. 8. Mr. Conmee is reported as having made a sworn entry of the cargo of the "Mary Grover" at Sault Ste. Marie on the 10th December, 1883. 9. The original entries and invoices accompanying same cannot now be found on file in the Department of Customs, and it cannot be gathered from the record in said department whether the invoices were returned or not. Original entries are destroyed after the lapse of three years.

PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT ORWELL, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Has a sub-collector of customs or a preventive officer been appointed for Orwell (Brush Wharf), in Prince Edward Island?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a sub-collector or preventive officer for Orwell (Brush Wharf), if they have not already done so?

3. If not, is the office at Orwell to be closed, and for what reason?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). An acting preventive officer has been appointed at Orwell, P.E.I.

TENDERS FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Will the Minister of the Interior lay on the Table copies of the schedule calling for tenders for Indian supplies in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories for the fiscal years 1896-97 and 1897-98?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Yes, here are the tenders.

TENDERS FOR DEPARTMENTAL BUILDING.

Mr. MONK asked :

Did the Government call for tenders for the temporary roof of the departmental building at Ottawa recently destroyed by fire? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It was imperative, in order to allow the works of repair inside the building to be proceeded with, to build a temporary roof without any delay—that did not permit of the calling for public tenders. The Minister ordered his chief architect to prepare an estimate of the cost of such temporary roof, which that officer placed at $4,500, and Mr. Bourque, an experienced contractor, was asked whether he would be prepared to do the work for the amount of the estimate made by the chief architect. Mr. Bourque consented to do so, the work was awarded to him, and was completed by him to the complete satisfaction of the department. The rapid execution of the work entrusted to Mr. Bourque has allowed the work of repairs to be pushed with such despatch that the Department of Public Works is now into its old quarters and the Department of Marine and Fisheries will be able in a few days to move also, and thereby a saving of a considerable sum, paid for the rent of the temporary quarters occupied by both these departments, will be effected.

WORKS ON THE RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Has the Government called for tenders for works on the Richelieu River at Belœil, near the Grand Trunk Railroad bridge? If not, why not?

2. What amount has the Government spent on the above works between the 1st of August, 1896, and the 1st November, 1897?

3. What is the Government estimate of the total cost of these works?

4. Who is the local overseer of these works? What was his occupation previous to his nomination? What was the date of his appointment? How much a day does the overseer receive?

5. Did the Government call for tenders in connection with the timber required for said works? How were tenders called? Who were the tenderers? To whom was the contract awarded and at what price?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes, tenders were called for on the 14th November, 1894, but the contractor found it impossible to go on with the work and his contract was cancelled by Order in Council of the 25th March, 1896. 2. Nothing. 3. $6,000. 4. Mr. Avila Bernard. The department was aware that Mr. Bernard was a capable and experienced man. Mr. Bernard was appointed on the 1st February last. His salary was $2 per day, which is 50 cents less than salary previously paid for similar service. 5. The department did call for tenders for the timber, procuring quotations from different timber merchants. The persons from whom quotations were asked are the following:—Filion & Barnes, E. H. Lemay, J. C. Robert, Shearer & Brown, Jacques Bourden, Thomas Mitchell, J. & B. Grier, Louis Boucet, A. P. McLaurin, the Bronson & Weston Company, Wm. Mason & Sons, J. T. Marchand & Company, A. D. Cameron, E. Mignault, and P. Prefontaine. The contract was first awarded to A. B. Cameron of Buckingham, who subsequently failed to deliver the timber, and the order was given to Mr. Pierre Prefontaine, of St. Hilaire, at the following prices:—Square hemlock, 12 x 12, 19 cents per lineal ft. Hemlock, flatted to 10 in., 14 cents per lineal ft. Rock elm, $34 per thousand. Hemlock deals, $11 per thousand. Hemlock spars, 5 cents per lineal ft.

MR. HUGH O'LEARY.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Was Mr. Hugh O'Leary, of Lindsay, Ont., employed by the present Government to inquire into the conduct of the agent to the Indians in Rama township, in the county of Ontario?

2. If so, in what capacity?

3. What were the charges against the Indian agent?

4. What was the result of the investigation?

5. What was the cost of the investigation?

6. How much has Mr. O'Leary been paid?
7. If not paid yet, how much is Mr. O'Leary to be paid?
8. What were the special qualifications of Mr. O'Leary for the position of conductor of the inquiry?
9. What was the date of the inquiry?
10. When was the report sent in to the Government?
11. Is the same agent still in the same office?
12. Has Mr. Hugh O'Leary been in the employ of this Government in any other capacity at any time since June, 1896?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). 1. Yes. 2. Commissioner. 3. Various charges of malfeasance and active political partisanship. 4. Investigation not yet concluded. 5. Not known. 6. $50. 7. Not known. 8. Barrister. 9. The inquiry was first entered into in the last days of December. 10. Not yet sent in. 11. Yes. 12. Not in Indian Department or any other department.

QUEBEC FORTIFICATION WALLS.

Mr. DUGAS (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

Are the Government aware that the fortification and other walls belonging to the Dominion of Canada or under its control, in the city of Quebec, are in a very bad state of repair, and that in at least two places they have fallen over into the street and are a danger to property and life? Is it the intention of the Government to ask the House to vote a substantial sum towards repairing the said walls?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Government are aware that the fortification walls belonging to the Dominion in the city of Quebec are in a very bad state of repair and are taking measures to have them put in better condition. The Government have under consideration the necessity of asking the House to vote a proper sum for the repairing of these walls.

THE FISHERIES CASE.

Mr. HUGHES (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from the judgment rendered on 13th October, 1896, by the Supreme Court, in the fisheries case?
2. If so, have the Government taken any and what steps towards entering the said appeal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is the intention of the Government to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court in the fisheries case. The Government have already applied for leave, which has been granted. The case is set down for argument and will be argued during the coming summer.

Mr. HUGHES.

DR. NAP. LAVOIE AND "LA CANADIENNE."

Mr. DUGAS asked :

1. Has Dr. Napoléon Lavoie, of L'Islet, been appointed commander of the steamer "La Canadienne"?
2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to appoint him to that position?
3. Has Dr. Nap. Lavoie been appointed to another position by the Government?
4. If so, what is the nature of the position; what is the salary attached to it; what are his duties; how long has he been under pay; is he empowered to engage men to assist him in the discharge of his duties, and if so, how many?
5. If Dr. Lavoie has been appointed to a position, where is he to reside?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Dr. Napoleon Lavoie has not been appointed commander of the steamer "La Canadienne," but has been appointed inspector of the gulf fisheries to take the place of Commander Wakeham, who has been appointed to the command of the Hudson Bay expedition, and he will be commander of the "Aberdeen," which takes "La Canadienne's" place. The salary is $1,200 a year, and the duties are the same as those performed by Commander Wakeham. Dr. Lavoie is not authorized to engage men without the consultation of the Government. He is to reside at L'Islet. Most of his time will be spent aboard the "Aberdeen," as Commander Wakeham's was spent aboard "La Canadienne."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has become of "La Canadienne."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She is laid up for repairs.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND MONTREAL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER asked :

Whether the hon. the First Minister can explain the contradiction contained in the Speech from the Throne where the following words were used by His Excellency :—

"I have much satisfaction in informing you that arrangements have been concluded, which, if you approve, will enable the Intercolonial Railway system to reach Montreal, and thus share in the large traffic centering in that city. The advantages which will flow from this extension of that railway are apparent, and I have no doubt you will gladly approve of the proposal."

And the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals, in the House, contained in the revised "Hansard" of April 7th, page 597, as follows :—

"I want to repeat what I said the other day, that the matter is still under negotiation between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government. It may be that these arrangements shall come to nothing; it may be that while we are finally settling the conditions they will not be agreed upon, and in that case all that has been done will avail nothing."

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There is no contradiction between the Speech from the Throne and the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) here quoted. The arrangements with regard to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal involve not only the Grand Trunk Railway, but another company, as the papers will show when they are brought down. So far as the Grand Trunk Railway is concerned, though the main features of the arrangements are complete, there are yet important details to be settled.

MR. F. X. SMITH, CAPE GASPE.

Mr. HUGHES (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

1. Has F. X. Smith, lighthouse keeper of Cape Gaspé, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason and at whose request?
3. Was an investigation held in the case of the said Smith?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Mr. F. X. Smith has been dismissed. He was dismissed for active political partisanship, on the representations made by Mr. Fauvel, then member for the county, and, as these representations were so strong and were given on his personal knowledge and honour, no investigation was deemed necessary.

POSTMASTER, NORTHFIELD, B.C.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Why was Mrs. Isabella R. McManus deprived of her position as postmistress of Northfield, B.C.?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The postmaster in question was dismissed because of the overbearing conduct of the postmaster and her husband towards many persons who were obliged to visit the post office.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my hon. friend's (Mr. Mulock's) attention to the question, which is :

Why was Mrs. Isabella R. McManus deprived of her position as postmistress of Northfield, B.C.?

Her husband is not now living. I would ask an answer to the question.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have given the answer.

Mr. DAVIN. Has her husband been overbearing since he died ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The term "postmaster" is applied to the occupant of the office whether male or female. In this case the postmaster was Mrs. McManus. Her husband is living. The report of the inspector was to the effect that they had both been overbearing in their demeanour to many persons who had occasion to visit the office.

CLERKS OF WORKS AND PRIVATE PRACTICE.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether a clerk of works earning a large salary from the Government, is allowed to pursue his private practice as an architect and draughtsman?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I do not know of the existence of such a case.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention to the fact that that is not an answer to my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) cannot cross-examine.

CHARGES AGAINST THE POSTMASTER, COBOURG, ONT.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Cameron) asked :

Does the Government intend to lay on the Table of the House the report of the commissioner appointed to investigate into the charges against the postmaster at Cobourg and the collector of customs there, and others implicated in such charges, and the evidence taken in such investigation?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I would suggest that a motion be made for the papers, and they will be placed upon the Table.

INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Will the Minister of the Interior lay on the Table the letter of Mr. McColl, an officer of the Indian Department in Manitoba, in which letter he explained the reason why he ceased to deal for Indian supplies at the Hudson Bay Company's store in Winnipeg?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The department has not received any such letter from Mr. McColl.

SUPERANNUATION OF MR. CHARLES THIBAUT.

Mr. PARMELEE asked :

1. Is Mr. Charles Thibault, advocate, of Waterloo, Que., drawing a pension under the Superannuation Act?

2. If so, how much did he contribute to the fund, and how much has he drawn out?

3. What was the nature and length of his services, and did they entitle him to superannuation and a pension?

4. How much was he paid in salary while in the service?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. Yes. 2. Amount contributed, $322.10; amount drawn from the 1st September, 1889, to 31st March, 1897, at $760 per annum, $6,143.01. 3. He was secretary to the official arbitrators from the 22nd November, 1880, until he was superannuated on the 1st September, 1889, the length of his service having been eight years, nine months and nine days. The Order in Council, which is dated 18th October, 1889, placing Mr. Thibault on the retired list, directs that in view of the abolition of his office and the faithful and efficient manner in which he performed his duties, ten years be added to his term of service, the board finding that Mr. Thibault was eligible within the meaning of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and that his retirement would be in the public interest. 4. Amount of salary paid Mr. Thibault while in the service, 22nd November, 1880, to 21st January, 1884, at $1,600, $5,069.75; 22nd January, 1884, to 1st September, 1889, at $2,000, $11,203.56.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

Was the settlement arrived at between this Government and that of the province of Manitoba about the Manitoba school question, proposed by the Government of Canada, or did the proposal come from the Manitoba Government?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Shortly after the conclusion of the last session of Parliament, the Government of Canada invited the Government of Manitoba to enter into negotiations with them with a view to that settlement; and in answer to that proposition, three members of the Government of Manitoba came to Ottawa. They had several conferences with the Canadian Government, and the result was the arrangement which is now before the country.

INFANTRY CORPS, MORRIS, MAN.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

Is it the intention of the Minister of Militia to authorize the organization of an infantry corps in the town of Morris, electoral district of Provencher, in the province of Manitoba?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). This matter has not been brought under my attention, nor, so far as I know, under the attention of the Minister of Militia.

L. T. DELISLE, LIGHTSHIP KEEPER.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has L. T. Delisle, keeper of the Red Island Lightship, been dismissed from the service?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Was an investigation held in the case of the said Delisle?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes, by Order in Council of the 2nd March, 1897. 2. From reports received from the agent of this department at Quebec, and from other sources it was proved that Delisle was unsuited for the charge of this important light station, having absented himself at different periods from the lightship, and being addicted to the use of intoxicating liquor. 3. No formal investigation was considered necessary in the case, the agent's representations being sufficient.

Mr. FIELDING.

POSTMASTER OF CAPLAN RIVER.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The other day the hon. member for Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Sir Adolphe Caron) put a question in these words :

Has Théophile Poirier, of Caplan River, been dismissed from the office of postmaster of that place?

The secretary of the department furnished me with a negative answer. A gentleman happened to speak to me upon the subject, and upon making inquiry, I find that the hon. gentleman has made a mistake in his question. There is no such postmaster as Théophile Poirier at Caplan River; the name of the postmaster there is Solomon Poirier. There is a postmaster named Théophile Poirier at a post office known as St. Charles de Caplan. I make this explanation so that if the hon. gentleman will state which post office and which officer he desires information about, I will give him an answer. Lest he might think that my answer related to the postmaster at Caplan River, I would say that the answer is based upon the statement that there is no such postmaster at Caplan River as is mentioned in the question.

FISHERY GUARDIAN, NORTH VICTORIA.

Mr. HUGHES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has an answer to the question I put to him the other day about the fishery guardian in North Victoria.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I read the departmental answer the other day, and got a memorandum from the hon. gentleman saying that it was incorrect. I forwarded that to the officer in charge of the department, and have not received any reply. As there seems to be some dispute between the hon. gentleman and the officer in charge, if he will put his question formally on the paper, it will be formally answered.

THE PREFERENTIAL CLAUSE OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my hon. friend the Controller of Customs what interpretation he places upon the words "on the whole" in the preferential clause of the tariff. Does it mean "on the average"?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Without being in any degree desirous of treating the hon. gentleman's question slightly, I am forced to say that I put upon them the interpretation that the words bear. I do not know any other interpretation to put upon those words "on the whole."

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend, I am sure, does not mean to be discourteous in any way; but as a good many hon. members have felt it a little difficult to construe those words, I thought there would be no impropriety in asking my hon. friend whether those words mean "on the average," or what they do mean.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). What other suggestion do you make?

Mr. McNEILL. I do not make any suggestion; I want to know if they mean "on the average."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought you were suggesting that they had two or three meanings.

Mr. McNEILL. Would that be a fair explanation of the term?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. As applied to Great Britain?

Mr. McNEILL. Not necessarily to Great Britain alone.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Perhaps this would be more satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. I do not understand that if a country admitted one, or two, or half a dozen articles at as low a rate as those articles are mentioned in our classification, that would entitle such country to preferential treatment. Does that answer the hon. gentleman's question?

Mr. McNEILL. To a certain extent, but it does not go quite far enough. Supposing that the tariff of a country, on an average—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think this is out of order.

Mr. McNEILL. Of course, if you say so. I think this is a question of great interest to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the Collector of Customs is not ready to make an answer now, there can be no discussion.

Mr. McNEILL. I thought he was willing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like the hon. gentleman to suggest the alternative meanings that he has in his mind.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to make any suggestion at all; I only wanted to understand what the words mean.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman has not some alternative meaning in his mind, how can he be in doubt.

Mr. McNEILL. My desire is to know whether this condition of things would cover this case. Suppose that, on the average, the tariff of a country is as low as our tariff "D" is upon the average—would that cover the meaning of the words?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. At this moment the only country that I have decided comes practically within its meaning is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him whether he has made any report to Council with reference to that?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that, having listened with pleasure and much instruction to the four hon. gentlemen who have already addressed the House upon this subject at such great length, it will not be necessary for those who follow in the debate to go as fully into all matters connected therewith; therefore I shall content myself with touching upon a few points. I may notice, in the first place, that before the introduction of the tariff our hon. friends opposite seemed to be displeased that it was not brought down sooner and now I am bound to say, after listening to the utterances of some of them that it having been brought down, they do not seem to be pleased with it, and they do not seem to be in a pleasant mood in any respect. If I may judge from the remarks of the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance, I think he was not entirely satisfied with the tariff resolutions when they were laid upon the Table. I also think, after listening to my hon. friend the late Premier last night, when he declared those resolutions to be a jumble of a tariff, to be unconstitutional, to be a transcendent folly, that after making the usual discount for the hon. gentleman's strong language, I would be warranted in inferring that he does not absolutely endorse these resolutions in all their details. Let me notice first the charge that is made, and it seems a wrong one, that by delay of the Government in bringing down the tariff resolutions, the trade of the country has been paralyzed, that great injury had been done to the country, as if the Government, by failing to introduce it sooner, had shown themselves unfit for the management of the affairs of the country. I think the ex-Minister of Finance was particularly severe upon us in that respect. I do not wish to apologize at all, I do not feel that any apology is necessary; but I think if that hon. gentleman would look back upon his own history, would look back upon what he was able to accomplish himself, he might perhaps think that the Government were not deserving of the censure which he seemed anxious to heap upon them in reference to that matter. We have had revisions of the tariff before. We had a revision of the tariff made by that hon. gentleman in 1894, and I find from the record of "Hansard" that on February 14, 1893, the hon. gentleman, in making his Budget speech, while alterations in the tariff were expected by the country, found himself not prepared to introduce those changes in the tariff, and he gave this as his reason. He said:

What I want to state is this, that information has been gathered by the Government, particularly by myself, during the past year, and information will be gathered during the coming season; that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself, with the two level-headed business men who control the Customs and the Inland Revenue, propose during the coming year, not only to listen to the complaints and the pleas of people who come to Ottawa to see us, but we propose to supplement that by a personal inspection and investigation of the various industries of the country.

That was the hon. gentleman's statement, that during the past year he had been gathering all the information possible in order to arrive at an intelligent decision on this important question; that in addition he announced that he himself as Minister of Trade and Commerce and the two Controllers, the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, were to spend the intervening time, between the close of that session and the next meeting of the House, in gathering such information as might be necessary in order to intelligently introduce a tariff in the following session. That session closed on April 1st, and from then to March 15th of the next year those four hon. gentlemen were engaged in seeking information to supplement that already gathered during the previous year by the Minister of Finance; yet the ex-Minister of Finance rises in his place and charges the Government with being unready, and lectures them, and moreover states that they had thereby paralyzed the whole business of the country.

What were the facts with respect to the present Government? The Government was only formed in July. The House met on August 19th and closed on October 5th, and from that time to the following session was the whole period available to make an investigation in order to arrive at what we thought the best conclusion, and the House met within a few days as early this year as the House met after hon. gentlemen opposite had taken more than two years to make their preparations. Their tariff was introduced on 27th March. But on 12th April the hon. gentleman proposed to amend the resolutions by adding forty resolutions to those brought down, and they were not concurred in completely until 5th June, ten weeks subsequently, and after thirty-five of the resolutions had been amended in committee. With that record the Government need not make any apology, for they have done in comparatively few months what had taken more than a year to do by the previous Government, and nevertheless their work had to be amended to the extent I have stated. I need not say more on that point, except to refer to the alleged business paralysis owing to delay. What proof has the hon. gentleman of that statement? Let hon. gentlemen opposite take the trade returns for the nine months of the present year and see if there is any evidence that a blow has been given to business interests or not. Let hon. gentlemen point out individual instances, if they can, where business has been paralyzed and industries closed and the channels of trade and commerce impeded. They have not done so yet, although, of course, other hon. gentlemen will follow. I have seen in the public press instances cited in which industries have been closed, but I have noticed that if this occurred it was for the purpose of stock-taking, and the proprietors of the establishments declared over their own signatures that they had not closed down on account of any uncertainty in respect to the tariff, but in accordance to their usual custom. Business was not paralyzed, and there was no reason why it should be, because the business community had confidence in the hon. gentlemen at the head of affairs. They realized that the Government would make no change of such a nature as would imperil any legitimate business, and business went on in its usual way, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to furnish any evidence that there was that business paralysis of which they have spoken.

There is no doubt that when any tariff changes are anticipated, there is more or less uncertainty, probably more or less anxiety, common to every expected revision of the tariff, and which we could not expect to be absent on the present occasion; but to say that business had been paralyzed, that business had been impeded or been called to a halt, was a statement not borne out by the facts. What did we do? Interviews were held in public, in open daylight, to which all classes of the community were invited, and they came before us. Hearings were given to all those who had representations to make. The Government made themselves aware of the business conditions of the country, of the peculiar conditions surrounding particular industries. They gave ear to all, they availed themselves of every source of information given to them, and having availed themselves of all this information, they sat down and conferred together, having in mind the promises they had made to the people, that they would reduce the tariff, that they would reduce the burdens of taxation on the people, that they would lessen the burdens of the people, and that in addition they would endeavour to carry out their promises, and in doing so they would not act unfairly to any class of the community. To-day in the resolutions laid on the Table there is a fulfilment to the letter of the resolutions adopted by the great Liberal party in this city in 1893. There is reduction of taxation. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot deny that, though in the classification adopted certain articles that in our judgment under the old tariff should have borne a higher rate than they did, have been raised and other goods that have borne higher rates than they should have borne have been lowered; nevertheless in regard to the resolutions laid on the Table, I make bold to say that even with the additions made in that tariff, after all there has been on the whole line of dutiable articles, with exception of spirits, tobacco, ales, and a few other articles, a reduction in the whole of schedule A, comprising the dutiable articles. That, Sir, has been done, although perhaps not in every case perfectly satisfactory to men whose business might be affected by the particular item. That is not to be expected from any government. I have pointed out, that notwithstanding the time taken by the late Government in the tariff revision they made, forty amended resolutions were laid upon the Table twelve days after their tariff resolutions were submitted, and thirty or forty more were amended in committee before these resolutions finally passed this House. It is not strange if it should be found, that there are some who think that this tariff touching upon their particular line of industry, may not have been framed in such a way as to render to them the justice that they, in their judgment, think should be rendered. We claim no infallibility in this matter, and it is possible that such a contention may be true; but any gentleman or any number of gentlemen are at liberty to approach us, and we will endeavour to hear them, and to consider their case, and while we can make no promises to them, they shall have a cordial hearing and we will bring our best judgment to bear upon these matters. Therefore I say we have carried out our pledge.

We pledged ourselves to promote freer trade, if it were possible, between all countries, and especially Great Britain and the United States of America. Our American friends do not seem disposed at this present moment to enter into freer trade relations with us. We do not complain of that, and we have no right to complain; but we have done what was in our power. We have taken a course that does mean freer trade relations between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and this country, and in that we have fulfilled another pledge that was given to the people of Canada when we adopted the resolution that forms the trade platform of the Liberal party.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) spent a large portion of his time in reading extracts of utterances of public men upon this side of the House, with reference to tariff matters. He read them as if they were pledges solemnly given, and gave individual instances in which they must be carried out. He read, that the First Minister had declared, that he was in favour of free trade as it is in England, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) wanted to charge, that pledges were violated unless there was at this very session an entire wiping out the customs duties upon articles upon which they are now levied, and a consequent raising of taxation in another way. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knew full well, that while the First Minister expressed his admiration for the fiscal policy of Great Britain, and while he admired that country as leading in the van of nations, foremost for freedom of speech, foremost for freedom of the press, foremost in trade matters, and while he drew his inspiration from that grand old country; yet the First Minister said in the same breath: that recognizing the conditions that prevailed in this country, he did not expect, nor would he lead the people to expect that for many a long day we could adopt exactly the policy that prevails in the motherland. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) quoted, as if my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) had declared, that if we ever came into power all the manufacturing industries of Canada would be wiped out of existence. No such statement was made. True, the principle of protection was denounced; true warfare was declared against that system, but the ex-Finance Minister will look in vain for any declaration, that other than a revenue tariff was to be introduced in this House; and as a necessary consequence of a revenue tariff there is protection to a greater or less extent bound up in it as an incident of it, but not as a principle thereof.

The hon. gentlemen opposite took protection as their principle, and if any revenue came from it, it followed as an incident; but we on this side of the House take the ground, that the proper principle to act upon is, that we should raise the requisite revenues to carry on the Government of the country, and if there was any protection involved, as protection must be involved, it followed as an incident and not as a principle. There, Sir, is the distinction. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite as defined by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) is, that they were bound to give to industries in this country such support, by way of tariff resolutions and customs duties, as those industries demanded. The position on this side is not that. It is not that we are bound to give them such protection as they demand, but, having regard to the interests of the country, that they should have such protection as was an incident of the revenue propositions laid before the House, and which must be enacted in order to get the necessary revenue to carry on the affairs of this country. As hon. gentlemen opposite know full well, the First Minister in reply to the Finance Minister at that time declared: that should the Liberal party come into power it was their policy to raise the necessary revenues of this country as they had been raised when the Liberals were in power before, namely, from customs and excise duties; but that they should be levied with an eye to securing the necessary revenue.

I need not go into the details of the tariff because they will be dealt with in committee, when they will be fully discussed, and when we will be able to consider their effect upon the revenue, and to point out what advantages have been secured thereby. If there should be any defects, I have not the slightest doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite, in their honest criticism, will point out these defects, and aid us, should we feel disposed, as I trust we may, to rectify any errors that may be made in the light of the principle that we hold.

But, Sir, exception has been taken to what is termed the reciprocal tariff contained in the resolutions laid before the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) opposite denounced it very strongly, and the hon. the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Charles Tupper) was very severe upon it. He read the resolution and he declared himself utterly unable to understand it. He told us, that the ex-Finance Minister was unable to understand it, that the "Globe" newspaper was unable to understand it, and although he himself declared he was unable to make any sense out of it, he also declared in the most emphatic terms, that it was unconstitutional. He laboured that point. Now, it is extraordinary to see an hon. gentleman with his position in the House, seeking to impress the country that we were attempting to do something unconstitutional, to insult Great Britain, to cause her to violate treaties; to think that he should have fulminated in this way, and in the same breath candidly confess that he did not know what he was talking about, because he did not comprehend the resolution.

My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) is strong on the constitution, and always has been.

We remember that our hon. friend told us that the constitution demanded that a certain Bill should pass this House which he was anxious should pass, and it did not pass; and the constitution is there yet, and the hon. gentleman is opposite, and he has let the constitution go—he will not touch it any more. Now, I do not know what he will do with the constitution in this case. I do not know whether he will be able to ascertain before this discussion closes what the meaning of this tariff is, or what it is not. It is strange to me that gentlemen of the intelligence of the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) and the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Charles Tupper)—and I grant it to them, as the House freely grants it to them—cannot understand the resolution which is in print, which they have no doubt read time and again, when the newspapers three thousand miles away, which have got it by cable, seem to be able to comprehend it most thoroughly and completely. Who listened to the extract from the London "Times," read here yesterday, that was not convinced that the London "Times" understood that resolution fully in all its significance; and not only that paper, but all the papers throughout the United Kingdom everywhere, have understood it, and, understanding it, have approved and acclaimed it, while these hon. gentlemen have denounced it, though declaring that they do not understand it.

I need not remind the House of the strong language which the ex-Prime Minister used in reference to that reciprocal clause. I remember, when he was arguing that under that clause Canada must inevitably admit the goods of Belgium and Germany, if not those of twenty other countries—that it had been so declared and decided, that there was no other alternative, that it would be a breach of faith and a flouting of Imperial authority to refuse to admit them—a gentleman on this side of the House asked him if he had always entertained such views, and what he had said at the second congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire in the year 1894. The hon. gentleman replied that it did not matter what he had said—it was what Earl Ripon had said that he had to deal with. Well, I am not inclined to place that low estimate upon the hon. gentleman that he in his humility was willing to place upon himself. I say that he does know something in reference to this matter. When, however, I call to his mind something that transpired and some utterances that were made at that meeting, it will not be for the purpose of proving that the hon. gentleman either does or does not know anything on this subject, but to bring him as a witness to the view that is held by the leading statesmen of Great Britain on the very question now before the House. What are the facts? Canada was represented at that second congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire. Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada, occupied, deservedly, a high place in that assembly. Some of the greatest and brightest business men from Canada and from the other colonies of the Empire, as well as from all parts of the United Kingdom, were present. Subjects of vast importance were brought up and discussed. A subject of great importance was introduced by the High Commissioner for Canada in the following resolution:—

Whereas the British Empire, covering one-eighth of the habitable globe, with a population of 350,000,000, can amply supply the home market with the products of every clime at the lowest possible cost, and whereas a national sentiment of mutual interest and brotherhood should promote more extended commercial relations between the mother country and its many colonies and possessions, Resolved, that in order to extend the exchange and consumption of the home staple products in every part of the British Empire, a slight differential duty should be adopted by the Imperial and colonial governments in favour of the home productions against the imported foreign articles.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings the hon. gentleman spoke to that resolution; and before the vote was taken upon it—it was an amendment—he asked permission to amend it by inserting in it a definite amount of the mutual or reciprocal advantage that was to be given, which he fixed at 5 per cent. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks on the resolution, said:

I am not prepared to advocate this policy on the ground that one or two gentlemen have mentioned to-day, namely, that it is essential to the retention of Canada by the Crown that this or any other policy should be adopted. I have no hesitation in saying that if matters were to stand as they do stand, much as I believe they could be improved and altered, we should remain, and I believe Canada would remain, true to the flag and true to the Sovereign. (Cheers.) If, at the same time, by this great Empire carrying out this policy, it will not only bind all its outlying and component parts more strongly together, but will also unite them by that powerful tie of interest which brings strength to the aid of the great sentimental tie which now unites them—if that be true, it is worth the consideration of every Imperial statesman, and I call upon every representative, whether from the United Kingdom, from Canada, or from Australasia, to say whether this Empire may not be made still greater, still grander, and still more prosperous than it is, and become united, not only for the present, but for the future. The eloquent mover of this resolution says that it would be a very difficult matter. He says you cannot advance, you cannot take a step in this direction, without abrogating the treaties which now exist between Belgium and Germany and this country, and that would involve a serious disturbance to the trade of England. I do not agree to that proposition. I say that if gentlemen present will look at the statistics, they will find that last year this country imported from Belgium £17,358,776 sterling worth, and they have only exported to Belgium £7,638,912. If they look at the trade statistics, they will find that this country imported from Germany £26,073,331 sterling worth, and they only exported to Germany £19,293,626. What follows? Why, it is perfectly apparent from these figures that if Her Majesty's Government said to Belgium and Germany to-morrow, as I am happy to say we have the pledge of Her Majesty's Government, we have the pledge of Lord Salisbury, we have the pledge of the President of the Board of Trade, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the floor of the House of Commons, that England will avail herself of the earliest opportunity of getting rid of these two properly-termed unlucky treaties—(cheers)—the result will be to draw England and her colonies more closely together than they are at present, by fiscal relations which shall place the colonies and the colonists of England in a different position from foreign countries and foreigners. (Cheers.) Why should England wish to make foreigners of her own people? Does any other country in the world do it? Does France make foreigners of her colonists? Does Spain treat her colonists as foreigners? By no means. England stands alone in that regard, and I am not surprised to know that every statesman, Liberal and Conservative, in this country, agrees that it is most desirable to get rid of those treaties that compel England for ever to treat her own colonists as foreigners.

We have the testimony of hon. gentlemen opposite that the faith of the statesmen of Great Britain is pledged that these treaties shall not stand in the way of better trade relations between the mother country and her colonies. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that he believes that while every statesman, Liberal and Conservative, in England entertains the common opinion that it is advisable to get rid of these treaties, and that while he believes the governing authorities in the old country are absolutely determined to get rid of these treaties, they will not be able to do so? Is that the position which the hon. gentleman takes? He then proceeded to say:

But what is the difficulty? Why, it is perfectly palpable, if you look at the much greater importance that these treaties are to both Belgium and Germany than they are to this country, that you are in a position to say to both Belgium and Germany that what England wants is to eliminate this single clause from that treaty, that prevents our treating the outlying portions of the Empire as every country in the world treats the outlying portions of their empire; and if you do not do it, we shall be compelled to denounce the whole treaty. Does any person, looking at those figures showing the enormous import into this country of Belgian and German products over and above all that this country sends to them, suppose that, with such an enormous balance of trade in favour of both Belgium and Germany, they would not at once agree to the elimination of this objectionable clause rather than lose the enormous advantages that they gain under it?

That was the position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Precisely, and I adhere to every word of it now.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Then if the hon. gentleman adheres to every word of it now, does he think that there will be any difficulty in that country in which, according to his own statement, the First Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and every statesman, both Liberal and Conservative, is committed to getting rid of these treaties, there will be any difficulty in coming to an arrangement of this matter even should any difficulty arise under the resolution introduced by us in this House? That is the question I put the hon. gentleman.

And while I am upon this point, I would like to ask the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), who takes such strong ground on this point, whether in 1892 he was playing with the House and the country, when, at the close of his Budget speech, he used the language that I now beg to recall to his attention, and which he will find on record in the "Hansard" of that year. He was alluding to the fact that our neighbours to the south were not disposed to trade as freely with us as they should be, and he was looking forward to a portion of our trade with that country being stopped through the legislation that was being enacted there. If he had reason then to take that view, this Government have all the more reason now to adopt it, in view of the Dingley Bill, which has been introduced in the American Congress, and which, while we do not complain, will have the effect, if it becomes law, of stopping a portion of the trade now enjoyed by both countries. And this Government are determined by every legitimate means, acting in the best interests of the people, if one avenue is to be closed against them, to find other avenues. Now, what did the hon. gentleman say at the close of his speech, looking at the circumstances in existence then, and which are still in existence and stronger and more potent now:

So, Sir, I say we may face towards the old country, and for our varied products exploit those markets which are sure to prove profitable from their constant, and indeed, growing demands. And it may also be that, in the near future, considering this war of tariffs which is taking place the world over, considering the discriminating benefits which are given by some countries and denied by others, it may be worth the careful and thoughtful attention of the Government as to whether or not the time is not approaching, if it is not near at hand, when it will become the duty of this Government to hold out the hand of help to those that help us, to repay favour with favour, and interest with interest, and to give the best treatment in our markets to those countries which afford to us the best treatment in their markets.

Sir, there is nothing in that about a preferential tariff. I can remember the cheers with which it was greeted when the hon. gentleman sat down, and yet that same hon. gentleman stood up and denounced as unconstitutional, as something that should not be entertained in this House, the proposition put in force by us, which he himself was able to see would be beneficial, but never had the courage to adopt. Sir, the difference between the two parties is this. It is not a question as to whether we have done the right thing or not, because we are both agreed upon that. The difference is simply this, that he, knowing it to be right, dared not do it, while we, knowing it to be right, did it.

The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House (Sir Charles Tupper) spoke as if we had done something that was injurious to the best interests of our country. He said we had by our proposition thrown away the great advantage that was ours. He said that if this resolution, instead of being couched in the terms in which it was, contained an offer of preferential trade, stipulating that if Great Britain would put a tax upon the products of other countries and give us free access, while we lowered our duties somewhat in return, such a resolution proposed by Lord Salisbury in the House of Commons would carry immediately, and we would have preferential trade over the entire country. He did not then seem to see any difficulty in the German and Belgian treaties at all. What ground had he for this statement? Every one will admit that if Canada can obtain a preference in the markets of Great Britain, Canada would be very glad to receive it, and every legitimate means put forward to secure that would be hailed with pleasure by both sides. But I entirely deny that the course recommended by the hon. gentleman was the best. He proposes that we should not manifest any feeling, that we should awaken no enthusiasm, that we should excite no sympathy in the people on the other side, but should merely propose a cool and deliberate bargain, and say to the British Government: we will do nothing for you until you are prepared to do something for us. Sir, what will be the effect of this resolution, let me ask the hon. gentleman? What has been its effect upon the English people? We have not gone to them demanding the pound of flesh in return for what we concede; we have recognized the fact that this is a good step in our own interest, and we have recognized it all the more gladly because it is in consonance with our feelings to trade with the mother country. We have, of our own motion, said to the English people: We will give you advantages, though they are given to all nations that come within the provisions of that resolution—it applies, as they know, and as English statesmen know, directly to them in its operation. And what has been the result? Why, Sir, I venture to say that nothing has ever transpired in the history of Canada that has touched the English heart as has this very resolution which is denounced by the hon. gentleman. Who can read the expressions of their papers, when the very words I have made use of are to be found in their leading prints, without seeing that England has been more profoundly touched and moved than ever before, by this Act and its operation. No one can tell how far-reaching its effect may be. The hon. gentleman would make the country believe that we had weakened our position for receiving treatment from England that we would be glad to receive. But I say that by this Act the heart of the English people has been touched, their sympathy has been enlisted; and I make bold to say that to-day, any statesman from Canada going over there would be able to reach the ready ear of the Englishmen with the arguments that can be advanced on our side of any question, and that they might yield concessions to this country in matters of trade, because of the effect which has been produced by this resolution. Who can say that, if the Minister of Agriculture were to go over there and speak to the statesmen of that country with reference to the legislation placing an embargo upon Canadian cattle, he would not be in a stronger position, that he would not be more readily listened to, than he would have been before this resolution was introduced? And so, in respect of everything. The English sympathy has been enlisted, and Canada has been advertised as she never was advertised in her history before. The far-reaching effects of this no one can tell at this moment. While we rejoice in that fact I, for one, am free to admit that I am looking for the interest of Canada as well. If it be true, and we have reason to believe that possibly it may be true, that the Bill introduced in the American Congress will pass in its present form, thus bringing in the rates of duty that are now proposed, we recognize the fact that our great agricultural and lumbering industries, will, in a measure, perhaps, be injured through that legislation. But, as I said before, we do not complain; we have no right to complain. It is not the spirit of the men who compose the Government of this country to complain. Our duty as the Government of Canada is to look after the interests of the people of Canada; and if the markets of our people, were in a measure, stopped on one direction, the bounden duty of this Government was to use every legitimate means to secure advantage in other directions. And we have done so. I have no doubt that this House, representative of the people of Canada, will vote the money necessary to deepen our canals, and to do that work quickly, that we may have cheaper transportation and bring the different provinces of this country closer together. Canada will cheerfully afford the means to promote cold storage and other facilities so that the products of our farms may be transported in better condition to the markets of the mother country. And, with these facilities afforded and availed of and with the sentiment that is aroused in Great Britain to-day, I have reason to believe, and I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me there, an impetus will be given to the trade in the natural products of Canada in the markets of Great Britain that will redound to the marked benefit of the great agricultural and manufacturing industries of this country. That is the point, I think, that must commend itself to all those who sit as representatives of the people in this House.

Mr. PATERSON.

I do not wish to detain the House longer. It is not necessary to go into a consideration of the different items that compose the tariff and the changes that have been made. These will be subject to review when the House goes into committee. I can only say, in conclusion, that in the resolutions as they are laid upon the Table are embodied the results of the best thought we have been able to give to these questions, in the limited time at our disposal. While some may think that we have not gone far enough, and others that, in some lines, we have gone too far, yet I am rejoiced to know that those resolutions meet with the approval of the people of this country. And I am rejoiced to believe, as I do believe, that this country will go on prospering and increasing under the benefits of the measure that has been introduced for the consideration of this House. And, should this House adopt it, I believe an era of greater prosperity is about to dawn upon Canada, and that from ocean to ocean, every province and every portion of every province will feel the quickening and reviving influence of the resolutions that have been submitted for the consideration of this Parliament.

Mr. DAVIN. I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that the new role of enthusiastic Britishers does not sit very easy on hon. gentlemen opposite. The position of the Government at the present time is a triumphant illustration of the victory of Conservatism. For eighteen years hon. gentlemen opposite have been fighting the Liberal-Conservative party; they have been denouncing the principles of the Conservative party; they have been eulogizing the United States, and have laid at the door of their opponents the fact that reciprocity could not be had from Washington. Sir, they are not warm in their seats when we find them, but with somewhat the exaggeration of new converts, adopting the shibboleths, adopting the principles, adopting the catch-words of the Conservative party. We had a long speech, the longest I think on record, from the Finance Minister, and what did he do? Did he expound his Budget? No; he spoke two or three hours before dinner, and three or four hours, after dinner, and then he sat down, overcome by his own efforts, and without having given the House any information about this tariff that would help us to understand it. The Controller of Customs then went on for a considerable time, and he sat down without having expounded the tariff to us, or helped us to understand it. Then we had a speech from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did he explain it? He attempted to explain it, but what did his exposition consist of? In telling us that it might be this, and it might be the other thing, and it might be something else.

Now we have a speech from the Controller of Customs, and of him the same must be said, that he has not helped us in any way to understand the tariff. I suppose he has had a good deal to do with the preparation of the tariff; at all events, he ought to have had as much to do with it as any of the other skilful hands which manipulated it. But are we one whit enlightened by the speech to which we have just listened? Has there been a ray of light thrown upon this difficult tariff?—because it is an unprecedented tariff. We might worship it, without idolatry, without breaking any of the commandments, for it is like nothing in Heaven above, or on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. We have had speeches from three authorities on that tariff, and not one word of light or exposition has come to us. When my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) rose up and asked the Controller of Customs to tell him what was the meaning of "on the whole," was there ever a plainer or a more rational question? Here is an hon. gentleman a member of a Government who have placed a resolution before this House and before the country in which occurs a certain phrase "on the whole"; and he is asked to tell what the meaning of that is, and he dares not attempt to tell. But what does he do? He gives us a platform speech of about an hour in length, and he does this with such energy that I thought a drumhead must have been boiled in his broth. But there was no instruction, there was no enlightenment whatever. Now that question of the hon. member for Bruce was a very important one; and the hon. Controller of Customs let fall a few words at the close of his speech which seemed to glance in the same direction as the clear indication of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that when this tariff becomes law, other nations, in fact some twenty-three nations, I suppose, will be able to come in on the same footing as England without making the least change in their tariffs. Has the hon. gentleman looked at the tariff of Germany? Has he looked at the tariff of Belgium? Is he aware that those who have looked at those tariffs know, or think they know, that whatever course may be taken by the Government—suppose the impossible course should be taken, which I think myself is out of the question, of confining the operations of this preferential clause to England unless the other countries modify their fiscal policies—suppose that was done, German goods could come to us not merely through England but direct, and this country could be deluged with German goods. I think if the hon. gentleman will look at those tariffs he will find that once this goes into operation, this country may be deluged with German goods and with Belgium goods. Does he wish it? Because if he wishes it, then the people of Canada ought to know it. I am not now discussing whether it is desirable or not, but the people of Canada should know what the facts are.

I want to confine myself for a few moments to what fell from my hon. friend the Controller of Customs. He described this tariff with a great deal of enthusiasm. I see that the Toronto "World" says that it is a picturesque tariff. I also see that the "Globe," in one of its illustrations of my hon. friend the Prime Minister, places him before us in the position of a theatrical manager. Well, Sir, this tariff I must confess to you, seems to me to be a piece of tariff skirt dancing—that is the best description I can give of it. My hon. friend who has just spoken, got enthusiastic about the heart of England having been touched; and we have had a great deal of what is highfalutin about the sentimental aspect of this tariff. But what has touched the heart of England is clearly not this tariff, is clearly not these resolutions. These resolutions can hardly have been before the eye of England, or before the good sense of England, or both would have seen that they contain no special favour for her. My hon. friend talks about the "Times." He does not appear to know that in the history of that great journal, the "Times" has taken the wrong view on hundreds of questions. He speaks as though we did not know that the "Daily News" is the mouthpiece of the commercial world, and of the Radical party in England; as though we did not know that it was the organ of the Cobdenites, and these journals clearly thought that this tariff does something for them which these hon. gentlemen do not attempt to say it does, or that they intend it shall do. When the "Times" or the "Daily News" or other journals have had time to consider just what is done for England in this tariff, probably the dythrambics we have heard from across the Atlantic, will be changed to another tune. I know something of the way journalism is conducted in London, and let me ask the House, how do they think an article like that is written in the "Times," or in the "Daily News"? I will tell them. The editorial writer who is in charge, specially of the colonies, comes down about nine o'clock in the evening to the office; he calls upon the editor in the editorial sanctum, and the editor hands him a telegram that he has received from Canada, a brief sketch of what has taken place, in which it is stated that Canada has proposed something special for England. They discuss it for a few minutes; the editorial writer goes into a neighbouring room and writes his leader. What is that leader which we shall see in the "Times," or in the "Daily News," the next morning? It is a brief essay of a clever man who has gone to Printing House Square, or Bouverie Street, from his club. But in two weeks from now when they shall have seen the tariff, and shall know what it means, the same young gentleman will go down and discuss the subject with the editor, and the next morning you will see a leaded column wholly different tone. Sir, I attach no such importance as hon. gentlemen opposite affect to do, to the opinion of the "Times" or the "Daily News," written on such meagre data as they have received; I would attach a great deal more importance to a deliberate opinion from a Canadian journalist. What is the standpoint from which this matter will be looked at in England? It is the standpoint of the English manufacturer; it is not the standpoint of Canada, or of the progress of Canada. No doubt the account that has been sent over to England has indicated that something special has been done for her; but when it is found that the name of England does not occur in the resolution, that there is no real preference for England, their opinion will change.

What happened this evening when my hon. friend was defending the Ministerial position? He quoted a speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in order to buttress the position taken by the Government. That speech was, indeed, like all the speeches of the leader of the Opposition, thoughtful, statesmanlike, a speech strong in its enthusiasm for preferential trade, and for the unification and the consolidation of the Empire.

But surely it is one of the most extraordinary things in the world that this should have been quoted by my hon. friend: for what the leader of the Opposition advocated on that occasion was something wholly different from what has been done by the Government. The leader of the Opposition quoted Lord Salisbury and other statesmen as in favour of denouncing the treaties with a view to securing preferential trade which would confer advantages on Canada. What hon. gentlemen have done is as far as they could, to violate those treaties, and thus make it impossible that the statesmen of England should denounce them until whatever controversies arise over them are settled. Now that this has been done, if any complications have arisen, no matter how trifling they may be, the statesmen of England can not denounce those treaties until the controversies have been settled. Thus at every step, instead of precipitating denunciation of the treaties, they have for the moment any way made it impossible.

A word as to what my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) said about delay. The hon. gentleman said the delay caused no inconvenience whatever, that it did not paralyze trade, that there was no evidence that such was the case. The hon. gentleman is very strong in pinning his faith on newspapers when it suits his purpose, and he is willing to quote the "Times" and the "Daily News" as indicating English public opinion, although there has not been time for the facts in relation to the tariff to percolate through the minds of the people of the United Kingdom; but the hon. gentleman apparently does not know that the monetary and commercial newspapers of this country, the "Monetary Times," for instance, have declared that our business was paralyzed in consequence of this delay. And we know as a fact it was so. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) last night, said that the ex-Minister of Finance had been disingenuous. If I were as frank, I would say that the attitude taken to-day by the Controller of Customs, that taken on Thursday by the Minister of Finance, that taken subsequently on Monday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of standing up and saying that they had fulfilled their promises, that their promises had been carried out and their pledges redeemed, was one of the most impudent acts in the history of parliamentary effrontery. There never has been such a spectacle as that presented by this Government, which is simply an organized perfidy. They have come into power, having made promises and pledges and having given their political note of hand to do certain things. What have they done? They promised to give free trade as it is in England, that we should get reciprocity with the United States, that they would abolish protection and not leave a shred of the curse in the tariff. But hon. gentlemen laugh at the people now. They laugh: We have bamboozled you at the elections, and we are going through with it. Never was a more cynically impudent attitude taken by any Government.

What were the pledges we had west and east? Did not the Prime Minister visit Winnipeg and promise that the Liberals would give us free trade as it is in England? Did not he go to Montreal and tell the people that he would give them free raw material? Did not the Minister of Trade and Commerce at Morrisburg and from a hundred platforms declare that not a single element of that scandalous principle of protection would be found in the tariff which the Liberal Government would give to the country. Were not specific pledges given respecting lumber and coal? The Prime Minister went to Montreal and promised free coal, and that promise went all over the west. Were we not told by leading members of the party that we should have free implements in the North-west? Is there any lowering of the duties on implements by this tariff? Hon. gentlemen opposite have given, as I will show a tariff which is not even a square protectionist tariff, because it is a highly-pigledy, which Dr. Johnson defined as a conglomerated mass of heterogeneous matter. They have given the country a tariff, which has more marked protectionist features in it than any tariff which has heretofore been seen in Canada. Take its preferential element. That is a strictly protectionist principle. But there is the principle of the high bonusing of industries. Is that free trade as they have it in England? That is a strong protectionist principle. Hon. gentlemen who promised a tariff in which there should not be a vestige of protection have brought down a tariff that has the strongest protectionist features; high duties; bonuses; retaliation; preferential trade; anything but the tariff which was promised. What they have done is to try and please everybody. The speech of the Finance Minister was as extraordinary as the tariff he heralded, because he devoted the greater part of it to eulogizing free trade and denouncing protection, and he ended with announcing a tariff which is the reverse of a free trade tariff. I was reminded of an incident in one of the letters of Dr. Russell. Shortly after the Crimean war, he was travelling between Versailles and Paris and met an old woman with handkerchiefs over her left arm. It was summer time. He asked her what her business was, and she replied, "To blow the noses of invalid soldiers who have lost their arms; but at the present time, it being summer, I am a little short of employment." The Minister of Finance had on his arm a lot of free trade rags, remnants of free trade principles; but he finished by telling the House that the demand for his free trade rags was at a low point just now.

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the preferential element in the tariff as though they had discovered it, when the fact is, that it is and has been one of the planks in the platform of the Conservative party. But, the Conservative party would never think of trying to bring about preferential trade by a course which would compel England, if she sanctioned it, to violate treaties. We ought to be informed by this time, whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite have had a communication from the Home Government on this subject. I have been assured by a person very well informed, that a despatch has arrived from one of the Secretaries of State to the Prime Minister, saying, that the Government of England was gratified at the manifestation of Imperial feeling in Canada and the desire to give England a preference, but that the English Government could not sanction this legislation. I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if that be so?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I do not see why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) wishes to ask me. He says he knows all about it, and he has given to the House the substance of what he thinks it is.

Mr. DAVIN. That, Mr. Speaker, is a sample of the kind of thing we have had ever since the Government got into power.

Mr. DAVIN.

They take upon themselves to negotiate, and they receive information, and so long as they dare they keep this House without the knowledge. That is not a proper answer to give to a member of Parliament speaking from his place in this House. The proper answer was, either to deny that the Government had received such a despatch or else to acknowledge its receipt.

Both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), who have been for ten months incubating this tariff, indicate that the brood is not perfect, and that it is not a hatch they are ready to stand by.

Mr. BENNETT. They change the eggs every day

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose they do. They say that changes may be made, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce bowed that they were not too proud to make changes. Well, from this side of the House, and from the North-west Territories, pressure will be brought upon them to change their minds and to carry out their pledges to the North-west, and not to leave the farmers there, worse treated than they could possibly have feared. The hon. the Minister told us that England will avail herself of the earliest opportunity of getting rid of these treaties, and he seemed to think that she would do so now, because her heart had been touched. But we ought to know whether the Government have any ground for saying that England will get rid of these treaties. We should have the facts on the Table of this House before we proceed further to consider the tariff. The Minister of Trade and Commerce read an extract from a speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) delivered in 1893, and we were told that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), because of legislation then passing through Congress, expressed himself as likely to inaugurate a retaliatory policy. At the time my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) spoke in that way, how were hon. gentlemen opposite speaking and how were their journals writing? When this legislation was being promoted in the United States in 1893, the "Globe" had an article in which we read:

But a more enlightened public opinion is abroad, and the people have learned that the freedom of their own is more important than the freedom of other markets. * * And it is evident that a majority of the farmers of Canada have learned to clearly analyse the situation. This belief is strengthened by the result of the Winnipeg election, that city being dependent, to a great extent, on agricultural prosperity. The real demand of the Canadian farmers is not for more duties on farm produce, but for relief from duties now imposed for the benefit of manufacturers. The existence of the American tariff has been used as an argument in favour of retaining protection in the Dominion. Of course, such an argument is entirely without reason, as a policy of tariff reduction and abolition would be the best for the Dominion, no matter how high the American tariff might be.

And, what was the Prime Minister's declaration at Winnipeg? He said: "We are told that if the Americans put up a high tariff that we must put up a high tariff too; that is equivalent to saying that if they are fools we must be fools also." When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) said that, he was not Prime Minister, and now when he is Prime Minister, because the people of the United States are fools, witness the Dingley Bill, we must be fools too, and thus in regard to that as to every other promise, they have turned their back on it. There is not a shred of the principles which they advocated, when in Opposition left. And in regard to the Dingley Bill, gentlemen opposite do not seem to be aware, as statesmen should be, that it is the Senate of the United States settles the tariff. It is not what the House of Representatives does, as the Finance Minister seems to think, it is what the Senate does that fixes the tariff, and if gentlemen opposite are anxious to get that reciprocity upon which they set so much store, then they should not have jumped because of any action of the House of Representatives, but should have waited until they had the decision of the Senate of the United States. We were also told, that if the Minister of Agriculture went across the water, then because of this preferential tariff he would be able to make a powerful argument in favour of raising the embargo against our cattle in England. This shows complete ignorance of the reason why our cattle were scheduled. Sir, that embargo was placed upon our cattle because the farmers of England wanted to have protection, and because the Government determined to give the farmers that protection for which they were asking. Anybody familiar with the facts knows that. The Finance Minister also told us, that one of the subjects upon which the people pronounced upon the 23rd of June, was, this fiscal policy. He told us that the people decided between two parties, one party believing in protection and the other party believing that protection was a curse to the country and that free trade was the great panacea for all our ills. If the Finance Minister believes this, he believes that on the 23rd June the people of this country declared that they were in favour of free trade, or at least, that they were in favour of a revenue tariff pure and simple, a tariff in which there would not be no evidence of consideration for manufacturers. Why is it you do not give the people what they pronounced in favour of? Let me lay down this proposition, that from a constitutional point of view, when an appeal is made to the people of the country, and they decide in favour of a given policy, it is a grave and serious evil to that country if that policy is not carried out by the party which comes into power. This appeal is the great wheel in our constitutional system. We believe in an appeal to the public mind at recurring intervals. We go to that public mind and ask for its verdict, and it is of the utmost importance to the constitutional working of our system that that great wheel should be allowed to turn, and that whatever the people have decided on should be carried into effect. That is the only possible way in which our public men can preserve their character before the world. To-day, so far as the Government could bring it about, all confidence in the public men of Canada has been destroyed. If we were to meet the Prime Minister or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or any of their colleagues in private, and they gave us their word, we would believe it; but is there a man who has heard their promises and pledges within the last twelve months who would now believe one word of theirs uttered in public? There is not a syllable of their promises that they are not ready to forswear, not a pledge that they are not ready to break. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) as "that lean and hungry Cassius." That was a most appropriate application on the part of the hon. gentleman, and I will tell you why. The application was stolen, as all his acts and principles at this hour are stolen. I have read of an elephant in India which on a certain gala occasion stole all the clothes of the Rajah's greatest enemy, and went around in the stolen apparel. That is the position of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. That application to my hon. friend was made in 1893 by the late Sir John Thompson when in the city of Toronto. Even the hon. gentleman's Shakspearean quotation is stolen, like his policy. But there is a quotation which the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in rummaging through his Shakspearean memory, might have used. If, instead of going to "Julius Cæsar," he had gone to "Hamlet," he would have found there expressive language descriptive of another great statesman who had come to ill-gotten power of whom Hamlet says:

A cut-purse of the empire and the rule,
Who from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket—
A king of shreds and patches.

There is a quotation which he might appropriately apply to his leader and himself. He has stolen his policy and the tariff before us is a thing of shreds and patches. It is edifying to hear him talk of their principles; we all know him so well. We remember him going about the country trumpeting against protection, and almost eulogizing union with the United States; singing pæans over the blessings of reciprocity; and groaning over the poor, wretched people who were destroyed by a scoundrelly tariff. And no sooner has he changed from one side of the House to the other than all that is forgotten. We have the Minister of Finance, also a great free trader, before he sat on the Treasury Bench, uttering an occasional free trade sentiment as by the force of habit, or by a trick of memory, and in the next breath coming out with an opposite opinion. In fact the mosaic of the Finance Minister's speech furnishes a most interesting study of the inconsequential. I fear that in making it he was haunted by the memory of the free trade leaders which he has written. We hear him giving utterance to a sound free trade doctrine, and then whipping out a strong protectionist idea. It is quite an interesting study: these gentlemen advocating principles and views which they entirely repudiated up to yesterday, but it is depressing when we think that a deadly blow has been struck at confidence in public men. If you ask how this tariff is received in Montreal, you are told that the Liberals do not like it, that they feel that they have been betrayed, while some Conservatives like it. You ask how it is received elsewhere, and you are told something similar. Well, Sir, there are four forces that put these gentlemen in power: the Liberal party, in which there are a large number of free traders; the Patrons; a certain number of farmers who believed that they would get advantages from a new Government, and some discontented Conservatives. But the great force which put them in power was of course the Liberal party, which contains a large number of free traders. But where are those free traders to-day? Where are the Patrons to-day? Written on their foreheads are the plain words, "Sold, but not paid for." They have been sold. This betrayal has dealt a mortal blow to constitutional government in Canada.

I spoke about the character of this measure. It is a thing of monstrous and portentous birth. Mr. Bengough, who did good service to Canada in other days, was accustomed, before and shortly after the Prime Minister came into power, to depict him in the "Globe" as a good Samaritan, lifting a drowning man out of the water or knocking the manacles off the ankles of a captive, and the drowning man and the captive were always represented as the western farmer; but since the feat of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, a change has come over the spirit of Mr. Bengough's dream. Here is what we have now. We have the new tariff horse with his pedigree described—sire, British Policy; dam, Protection. This is an extraordinary animal for a Liberal and free-trade Government to rear. Here is the leader of the Opposition depicted and the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) looking on, and here is the Finance Minister, in the guise of a sporting man, with his pocket handkerchief protruding in a jaunty way out of his side pocket. He is a sporting man, a horsey man, and we know what is the character of such gentlemen. We know we have to keep our eyes open and our eye-teeth skinned in order not to be done by them. Beneath we read the inscription: The new tariff foal—a sure winner; and we have Mr. Fielding, addressing the leader of the Opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance, saying: Out with it, gentlemen; do not be backward; say you never saw such a glandered, broken-winded, string-halted, ill-shaped, ill-acted and ill-bred colt in your lives. But don't you wish you owned him?

But the answer of these gentlemen is not given. "Why, you impudent thief, you have stolen him out of our stable and have put a little whitewash on his hind legs to try and conceal the theft, and you have given him a new name and call him yours." What is the pedigree they put forward? The dam Protection and the sire British Policy. I would like to find where in British policy and free trade as it is in England, you get the principle of a bonus or retaliation or preferential trade—all of them highly protective.

How is this policy likely to affect the country generally and the North-west Territories in particular? As to how it will affect the country, we have not had any calculations from hon. gentlemen opposite. We have had the great speech, as it is described in the "Globe," of the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding); we have heard from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright); and we have just now listened to the thundering tones of the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), but from none of these hon. gentlemen have we had a syllable to inform us how this tariff is going to affect the trade of the country, and we are compelled to make these calculations ourselves. The revenue from customs last year was, roughly speaking, $20,000,000, and the year before it was between $17,000,000 and $18,000,000, and you will find that the customs revenue which we receive from the United States is something over one-third of the whole. Take $7,000,000 from the $20,000,000, and we have $13,000,000 that will be affected by this tariff, because the favoured-nation clause will not only let in Belgium and Germany, but twenty-two other countries. But suppose we have not all these countries to reckon with, the great bulk of our customs income comes from England and the United States. Well, what will be the result? One-eighth off the $13,000,000 will give you about $1,750,000 for the first year, and then, when you take one-quarter off, you will have lost over $3,000,000. How are you going to make that up? By customs? Then you will have to add to the importation of dutiable goods from those countries something like $13,500,000. Does anybody realize what an enormous addition to dutiable imports that would be? One of two results must follow. You must either get rid of these goods across the line, or if you consume them yourself, your own manufactures must disappear. Yet we have not had in the discussion one word on that question from hon. gentlemen opposite. Then what good will it do the farmer? The goods he is most interested in, agricultural implements, the goods which are classed as his raw material, and continually used on the farm, come from the United States, and these will pay their 35 per cent, while the silks of the fine ladies and gentlemen and their diamonds and precious stones will come in under the reduced tariff. And how much shall we lose? On silks alone, we shall lose a very large sum. What is the object? Those who indulge in these luxuries are not asking for this reduction. Nor have the Patrons of Industry asked for it. What they asked for was an increase in the duties on luxuries. Nor have those wealthy people who wear precious stones asked for it. But you will find that while salt is heavily taxed, much of which we get from the United States, while the implements of the farm are heavily taxed, you are lowering the duty on silks and precious stones and on articles of vertu and luxury.

Mr. MACDONALD. Do you mean to say that we get the greater part of our salt from the United States?

Mr. DAVIN. I think most of the fine salt.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will send you over the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. DAVIN. I have them here. We do not get most of our fine salt from England.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes we do, we get 100,000 tons of salt from England.

Mr. DAVIN. We get none dutiable. To show the inconsistency of this tariff, let me point out that the Finance Minister said, as did the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that they kept in their hands some means whereby to influence other countries to give us advantages. And what does the Finance Minister do? He lowers the duty on wheat and takes away the duty entirely from corn. The taking away of that duty from corn removes a powerful lever by which we might get reciprocity from the United States. Not only that, but it is a blow at the farmers of the west and most of the farmers throughout Canada. Take even Quebec. I was reading the other day one of the agricultural papers of the province of Quebec, and it declared that it was not in the interest of Quebec that the duty should be taken off corn. Yet you have done that wantonly, and why I do not know. I am afraid if we inquired, we should find an explanation not very creditable to the Government. Let me go over the things on which we shall have to pay 30 and 35 per cent. The duty on boots and shoes remains the same. The duty on india-rubber clothing remains the same. The duty on seamless bags is the same. Builders' hardware bears a duty of 30 per cent. Gray and bleached cotton fabrics, which were 22½ are charged 25 per cent. Flannels are charged 35 per cent, and ready-made clothing, 35 per cent. Buggies are 35 per cent. Wagons are the same as before—25 per cent. Nails and spikes are the same, composition nails and spikes and sheathing nails the same; wire nails, 35 per cent.

Screws of all kinds, 35 per cent.

Wrought iron and steel nuts and washers, 35 per cent.

Picks, mattocks, grub hoes, adzes, hatchets and tools of all descriptions, 30 per cent.

Wedges, crowbars, sledges, track tools, 30 per cent.

Shovels and spades, lawn mowers, 35 per cent.

Files and rasps, 30 per cent.

Adzes, cleavers, hatchets, wedges, sledges, hammers, crowbars, cant-dogs and track tools; picks, mattocks, and eyes and poles for same; anvils, vises, and tools, hand or machine, of all kinds, 30 per cent.

Axes, scythes, sickles or reaping hooks, hay or straw-knives, hedging knives, hoes, rakes, prong forks, snaths, farm or field rollers, post-hole diggers, and other agricultural implements, n.e.s., 25 per cent.

Shovels and spades, iron or steel, and lawn mowers, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Needles, of any material or kind, n.o.p., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Brass and copper nails, tacks, rivets, and burrs or washers; bells, n.e.s., and all manufactures of brass or copper, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Zinc, manufactured, n.o.p., 25 per cent ad valorem.

Iron or steel nuts, washers or rivets, including tubular rivets, bolts, with or without threads, and nut and bolt blanks, n.e.s., 25 per cent.

Builders', cabinetmakers', upholsterers', harness makers', and saddlers' and carriage hardware, including butt hinges, locks, curry combs or curry cards, horse-boots and harness or saddlery, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Carvers, knives and forks, of steel, butchers' and table steels, oyster, bread, kitchen, cooks', butchers', shoe, farrier, putty, packing and glaziers' knives, cigar knives, spatulas or pallet knives, razors, &c., 30 per cent.

Iron or steel cut nails and spikes (ordinary builders'); and railroad spikes, n.o.p., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Wrought and pressed nails and spikes, trunk, clout, coopers', cigar-box, Hungarian, horse-shoe and other nails; horse, mule and ox shoes, 30 per cent.

Wrought iron or steel tubing, plain or galvanized, threaded and coupled or not, two inches or less in diameter, n.e.s., 35 per cent.

Other wrought iron or steel pipe or tubing, plain or galvanized, rivetted, corrugated or otherwise manufactured, n.o.p., 30 per cent.

Iron or steel fittings for iron or steel pipes of every description, and iron or steel rods, 30 per cent.

It will be seen that all these things in which the farmers are particularly interested remain as high as ever, although these gentlemen were to have given us a much lower tariff. One of the things we attach great importance to in the North-west is coal oil. We expected to get coal oil free. Is there any chance of it being free? We have a reduction of a cent a gallon, and my hon. friend who represents one of the constituencies in Manitoba says in his paper that the arrangement about tanks means practically the cutting of the duty in two. The hon. gentleman must know better than that; for it means nothing of the kind. The former duty on coal oil was about 100 per cent, according to the calculation of one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I think the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). On that basis, five cents per gallon is equal to 83 per cent at least. And this is a duty on what? On what the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared to be a necessary of life. Then, Mr. Speaker, the duty on lumber remains. When I was advocating, in 1895, that the lumber duty should be reduced, I had the support of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). This is what that hon. gentleman said:

The last item, sawed boards, was discussed, I think, last session. At that time, if I remember rightly, lumber, tongued and grooved, was put on the free list, because it was considered desirable, in the interests of the settlers in the North-west that it should come in free. I do not think that condition has since changed, and I see no reason whatever why the duty should now be imposed because of the construction the Americans have placed upon their tariff in this respect.

And he goes on to say, further:

I hold that it is for the advantage of the consumers of lumber in Manitoba and the North-west Territories that tongued and grooved lumber from the United States should come in free of duty. The arguments that were used last session were in favour of lumber planed on one side or on two sides, coming in free of duty, but not lumber tongued and grooved. It is true, the importer makes a small gain from the less amount of freight he pays when he imports that class of lumber; but the lumber, after it comes to this country, has to be sent to a planing mill to be tongued and grooved, and it costs the consumers about as much to have it tongued and grooved as to have it planed and tongued and grooved also.

And the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said on that occasion:

It seems to me, Sir, that the people of the North-west ought to be considered a little in this matter, as well as my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, or any other parties who are engaged in the manufacture of lumber, and the view taken by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards), is both more politic and more generous. We have spent enormous sums of money to promote settlement in the North-west, and everybody knows that this will only be taken advantage of practically by the settlers in Manitoba or in the North-west, where lumber is, or used to be, sold at a very heavy price. I doubt extremely whether any revenue will be derived from it, and I also doubt the wisdom of bringing any alterations in the tariff at this period of the session.

When my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was up west, and the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), I think, with him, the farmers went before them in the city of Winnipeg and laid bare their claims. They asked to have the duty taken off coal oil; they asked to have the duty taken off implements; and they asked to have the duty taken off lumber. But one farmer went before the commission who seemed to understand them. I think his name was Fleming.

Mr. HUGHES. Where was he? Was he one of those who were paid to go?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know about that. He said: I think I understand what you are going to do. I have been a Liberal all my life and have always supported you, but I may never support you any more; I will not if you do what I think you are going to do. You are going to act very much like two young surgeons when it was decided to amputate a leg. But the patient hollered so much that the young surgeons said: They would have to take off the leg in detail and would begin with the big toe; they would not dare to take off the leg. The most that these gentlemen have done so far, in the way of removing the gangrened leg they talk so much about, is to cut off one of the toes. Another thing that was asked for was that the duty should be taken off iron. I have always been in favour of iron being free.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I have always been in favour of it. Some hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." I may say that I was in favour of a course that was consistent in regard to this matter. In the Bill before us, you have protection by tariff and protection by bonus. That is inconsistent. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted John Stuart Mill. There is a quotation he might have made from Mill. Mill said of a certain measure, that "it made a false profession of nice adaptation to political economy." This Bill if it makes any profession of that sort makes a false profession. In 1879, when Sir Leonard Tilley had proposed his tariff, after the House had risen he went around to visit the manufacturers of this country. I wrote a letter to him, and at the same time a letter to the Toronto "Mail," which, with the permission of the House—and I hope it will not be misunderstood—I will read. This is the counterfoil of the letter, dated October 30 1879 :

THE TARIFF.

To the Editor of the "Mail" :

Sir,—The practical action of Sir Leonard Tilley, in visiting the manufacturers of Canada, will probably result in some changes in the tariff. Permit me, through your columns, to suggest to the Finance Minister that an improvement might be made if iron were protected, not by a tariff, but on the bonus or bounty system. This form of protection was the form which, so far as young communities are concerned, commended itself to the mind of the late John Stuart Mill, and its advantages in the case of an industry like the manufacture of iron, and in our actual circumstances, cannot be doubted.

(1.) The manufacture of iron is the key to all other manufactures. Unless we can manufacture iron successfully, we may throw up the sponge. But the manufacture of iron requires large capital. The capital to work our iron mines must come from outside. Englishmen, accustomed to see strong governments overthrown by a gust of popular feeling, cannot understand how a manufacturer or iron smelter might have calculated with certainty on our present tariff for five years at least, and even could he grasp the rationale of our politics in this particular, he might well think it would take more than five years to turn a profit on a vast outlay. His fears under both heads would have been, and may yet be, relieved by voting a bonus to be given for the next ten years for every ton of iron manufactured in the Dominion. History proves that this policy is always successful, even in the face of adverse natural conditions.

(2.) The result of such a policy would be that vast streams of capital would flow across the Atlantic, and from below the line, stimulating commercial activity and enriching the whole population.

I venture to throw out these suggestions in the hope that the Finance Minister may consider them, together with those which his own energetic observation will have brought before him.

Yours truly,

NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN.

Toronto, October 30, 1879.

Well, Sir, that, if I may venture to say so, is in accordance with sound views of political economy ; that is also, if I may venture to say so, a logical and a rational proposition. But what have we here ? We have the Finance Minister taking off part of the moderate duty on iron, and putting on a bonus. That I hold to be inconsistent, because the bonus does not do away with the objections to the tariff that John Stuart Mill saw. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that iron enters into every manufacture throughout the country, iron is that without which we cannot succeed in becoming a great manufacturing country, and if protected at all, it ought to be protected by bonus. But what does this Finance Minister do but protect it at once by bonus and by customs duty ?

One word as to a feature of this tariff which has not been much discussed. The 16th clause provides that there shall be a Star Chamber established in Canada, that there shall be a court of politicians to try men who are suspected of going into combines. Now, Mr. Speaker, what would that be ? It would be a tribunal composed of party politicians, and a tribunal composed of party politicians will inevitably be a partial tribunal, it will inevitably look with more favour on those who belong to their party. I say this is open to the remark that it bears the character of a scheme to get hold of an enormous power for terrorizing the people of this country, prior to an election, into supporting the Government. We have some indications how this could be worked. We were told that iron was to be placed upon the free list by the Prime Minister. We have the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) in this House, who is a manufacturer of agricultural implements ; we have the Massey-Harris Company who worked hard to help this party to get into power. We have at St. Hyacinthe at present a Mr. Boas, a manufacturer of knitting goods, and he contributed largely, as I am assured, to the campaign funds of the hon. gentlemen on the eve of the last election. Well, we have a bonus given for the manufacture of iron, we have the duty lowered on iron, and, therefore, a great change as to raw material in favour of the Massey-Harris Company and the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville ; but nothing of their protection is taken from the manufacturers of agricultural implements. Then, Sir, this Israelite indeed at St. Hyacinthe, Mr. Boas, who employs some 665 men, and who goes largely into the manufacture of knitting goods, he is benefited ; knitting goods are highly protected, and the hon. gentlemen have lowered the yarns that he imports to 15 per cent. With these facts before us, we have a flood of light on that 16th clause. Can hon. gentlemen expect us not to make every opposition we possibly can to a clause like that ? I may say that, properly speaking, it has nothing to do with fiscal matters, which are the sole property of this House, and if it should be forced through this House by a cast-iron majority, I certainly would hope that that portion of these resolutions would never be passed, and never became law in this country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend for London (Mr. Beattie) has requested me to ask a question of the Government.

and as I see the Ministerial benches are now pretty well filled, I will do so. There is a telegram published in the Montreal "Gazette," dated London, Ont., which states :

A new telegraphic order was received by the customs-house authorities here, this morning, to continue working under the old tariff.

I should like to ask some member of the Government who is present how that is. Is the Postmaster General aware of it ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I know nothing about the telegram, nor do I know as a matter of fact what instructions may have been sent by the Controller of Customs to his officers ; but speaking of the policy of the Government, interpreting it in the light of the tariff introduced, I am quite satisfied no such instructions have been sent to any officer in Canada. It is quite inconsistent with our tariff policy.

Mr. DAVIN. The only thing is this, it would be hard to find anything inconsistent with the tariff policy, because it is consistent only in its inconsistency.

I should like to show the House what were the expectations of the people of this country. In the autumn session of 1896 a committee of this House printed a very important report. On that committee were the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia, the hon. member for Simcoe, the hon. member for South Huron, the hon. member for West Bruce and the hon. member for Bellechasse ; and this is what they said :

The fall in prices in articles which the farmer has to buy has not kept pace with what may be described as the slump in prices in the products of the farm on which the farmer has to depend for his living, nor with the decline in other parts of the world, where legislative and artificial means have not been enforced to maintain high prices. Nor is this result to be wondered at, for, while the agriculturist—the price of whose products is regulated by the price at the port of export—is thus brought into competition with the rest of the world, the classes he has to purchase from have been protected against foreign competition and been thus enabled to maintain their prices unaffected by that which, after all is said and done, is the ultimate factor in settling values.

The committee, therefore, trusts that, while every regard consistent with the principle of reforming the tariff on a revenue basis may be had to existing industries, commercial and manufacturing, yet the mistake of suffering things to remain as they are, fearful of the consequences that a reform on the lines indicated may entail on established industries, should not be made.

I call the attention of the House to this very important statement made by the committee, and I think all the hon. gentlemen I have named sit on the Government side of the House. The report continues :

If such a policy be pursued, it will, as the committee thinks, be at the expense of, and a great disappointment to, the agriculturists of Canada, who, while desiring no unnecessary harm to other classes or interests, are yet anxious that their rights and claims should not be lost sight of in the anxiety, perhaps not unnatural, not to interfere with the so-called vested rights of industries established under a system of tariff legislation that on the whole has been productive of ten-fold more injury than of benefit to the community. In a word, the committee think that the tariff should be readjusted, notwithstanding the loss inevitable that must follow from the recurrence to a wiser system.

Will the House note this statement ? That is the opinion of the member for Simcoe and the hon. member for South Huron and those other hon. gentlemen. They go on to say :

This, and this alone, is all that the committee can suggest as a means of lowering the price of the commodities which the agriculturist has to buy.

The hon. Prime Minister after he was raised to his present high position, speaking in one of the constituencies of Quebec, said : We cannot raise the prices of the commodities you have to sell, but we can lower the prices of those things you have to buy. And he promised to do so.

I have here a statement of what the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west require, which was laid before the Tariff Commission when they were at Winnipeg. Mr. James Fleming was the spokesman of a very large delegation of farmers. The second resolution they submitted to the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs reads as follows :—

2. That agricultural implements, farm machinery and all tools used on the farm, binder twine, fence wire, lumber, nails, and building material, coal oil and fruit be free, and that the duty on salt, cotton and woollen clothing be materially reduced.

I showed before dinner that there is 35 per cent duty on much of what the farmer uses. I showed there is no change whatever in the duty on implements. I pointed out that there was only 1 cent taken off coal oil. When I mentioned salt, the hon. member for one of the Hurons said—and he must have known that I was speaking of dutiable salt—that I was wrong in saying that the bulk of dutiable salt came from the United States. I have looked at the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the report of the Controller of Customs, and I find I was quite right. The great bulk of dutiable salt comes from the United States. The third resolution was as follows :—

3. That the high protective tariff has very materially restricted commerce with Great Britain, which is the country we look to above all others for our markets, and has greatly retarded the settlements of this province.

Mr. Fleming referred to a number of duties that inflicted great injustice on the people of Manitoba, and then he spoke of the coal oil duty, and said :

Mr. Fleming then went on to speak of the duty on agricultural implements, believing the time had come when implements should be placed on the free list. He very strongly urged a reduction of the coal oil duties. If it was necessary to tax people's light, they should begin with electric light, which was a luxury, while coal oil was a necessity.

The hon. Postmaster General, when he sat on this side of the House, was in the habit of speaking of coal oil as one of the necessities of life; but he is silent about it now. His mind that formerly was agitated in regard to the interests of the farmer and the poor man is as calm as a looking-glass. We have some phenomena of that kind in other respects, if I may say so in passing. The hon. member for Simcoe—this has nothing to do with coal oil, but with light of another kind—had an annual motion on the Order paper when our friends were on the Government side of the House. He then took the North-west under his wing, and he had a Bill that was considered of a very disturbing character; but I neither see him in his seat nor the Bill. Mr. Fleming, continuing, said:

Mr. Laurier, discussing coal oil duties, had said that, in adjusting the tariff, he proposed to keep his eye on grand old England. "I hope," said Mr. Fleming, "when the matter comes up in the House, he will still keep his eye on grand old England, and not on grand old Petrolia."

What is the fact? The matter has come up in the House, but there is only a squint at "grand old England," while the other eye is full-orbed and very perspicuous on "grand old Petrolia." Further, Mr. Fleming said:

For seventeen years in this country, Mr. Fleming said, he had fought in the Liberal ranks because he had believed the Liberal leaders were sincere in their protestations of abolishing the unjust protective duties. Now when they had won the battle and relief seemed to be at hand, he was disappointed and disgusted to hear Liberal Cabinet Ministers assuring "protected" eastern manufacturers they would not be disturbed. He was disappointed to hear Hon. Messrs. Laurier and Mowat now saying the tariff changes must be made slowly and gradually. Hon. Mr. Laurier, before election, had declared the high protective tariff was legalized robbery, and now did he propose to continue for any length of time the legalized robbery?

That is what I would like to know, and the North-west wants to know, why he is going to continue this legalized robbery?

Messrs. Laurier and Mowat reminded him of two new and nervous surgeons about to amputate a man's injured limb. They knew the limb must come off, but as the man was hollering a good deal and declaring he would die under the operation, they decided to take it off gradually, first by cutting off a toe. The fear was, he said, they would not cut off more than the toes before next general election.

Who can doubt after the speeches we have heard here, but that his fear is well-grounded. Mr. Fleming who is a clear Grit, I expect, a true, sound Liberal to the core, continues:

I would rather have the Liberal party fall in trying to do right than succeed in doing wrong.

That is a sentiment that may be very vigorous in his breast, but I am inclined to think that there is not a bosom of any Cabinet Minister here that shares any such sentiment as that. I rather think they would prefer to keep their seats by doing wrong, than to fall by doing right. They have turned their back on every principle they held, and there they sit and not a blush on a brazen cheek nor a tear in an iron eye. When one asks oneself, how respectable men can so act, the only thing that one can think of, apart of course from the honours, is the moral of an Irish story. During the penal laws in Ireland a gentleman had turned to be a Protestant, and he was asked how such a good Catholic as he could have changed. Well, he said, seven thousand acres of the best land in Munster make seven thousand good reasons. I suppose there are seven thousand dollars yearly that will account for hon. gentlemen opposite pocketing their principles. Not only that, but the air is alive at the present time with honours; this is Jubilee year, and I read in the papers a long list of the honours that are to be conferred.

This is what Mr. Elder said, speaking to the memorial:

The farmers have returned the present Government on the policy of free trade, and a free trade policy they desire carried out.

I have shown what the farmers expected. Let me show that the leaders of the Liberal party when in Opposition responded to those expectations. The Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, spoke in the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, on 22nd January, 1895, and here are the mottoes that were hung around the room:

"Protection breeds corruption." "Remove the brakes from trade." "Lessen the cost of living." "A tariff for the requirements of the public service." "Down with the monopolies, trusts and combines." "And a large placard indicated the evil results of the National Policy."

But there they are to-day clinging to the National Policy. When the Prime Minister spoke at that meeting he quoted from their abandoned charter, that is now quoted by his friends with undying effrontery in this House and elsewhere; this charter of the free trade policy that has not been carried out. He said:

The Conservative party believe in protection; all their hope is in protection. The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines, such as exists in Great Britain, and their immediate object is a revenue tariff.

And yet they now uphold the strongest protectionist doctrines and principles that have ever been in any tariff. As I have shown by quoting a list of things at 35 per cent, they have made no effort whatever to arrange a lower tariff on the articles that the poor man buys. The Prime Minister further said :

Our programme is for a customs tariff upon the basis of revenue, and nothing else.

But that is not all ; when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) went to Prescott he was accompanied by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was the spokesman for the Liberal party on fiscal questions, and at Prescott the Minister of Trade and Commerce was eloquent over broken promises, and the present Prime Minister was eloquent about the same thing. Well, Sir, they say that hell is paved with good intentions ; the sunny ways of the present Prime Minister are strewn with the barren brambles of worthless promises. This is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

He objected to the establishment in this country of a privileged class to tax the people for their own benefit and to give no return to the people for it. Were the people put in possession of the knowledge, through the Public Accounts, of the taxation that they were compelled to pay for the benefit of the sugar-refiners and cotton manufacturers—

And now we have the duty raised on cotton manufactures, especially that class which the poor man wears.

—and the iron smelters—

And we have a bonus for the iron smelter——and for favoured individuals, they would sweep the whole system away to-morrow.

I hope that the people will take the hon. gentleman at his word, and march on Ottawa, and sweep away as well those who are continuing it. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) then said :

The farmers had evidence that the promises made in 1878 had not been fulfilled, and that the whole system of protection had failed. At the evening meeting, Mr. Graham presented a brief but effective argument in support of the policy of a revenue tariff.

And then we had the member for Leeds and Grenville :

Mr. Frank T. Frost, of Smith's Falls, arraigned the National Policy, and pronounced it a flat failure.

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) was fighting on velvet. He had assurances that he would not be hurt, and that he would be placed by the Liberal tariff in a better position than he was by the Conservative tariff. Under the present tariff not only has he the same protection on his manufactured goods as he had before, but he has his raw material on more advantageous terms.

Mr. DAVIN.

The present Prime Minister declared in 1887 against retaliation. He said on that occasion :

The ministerial press, the salaried press, and consequently the press which represents the ideas of the Ministers, declared that the people of Canada did not want any trade with the United States, if the latter feel that way. But retaliation is not free trade. The policy of the Conservative party is one of retaliation, but the policy of the Liberal party should be one of friendship and good-will towards the United States.

And yet, Sir, what have we to-day from these gentlemen, but a policy of retaliation ? Then the present Prime Minister, when in Opposition, and asking the people to place him where he is at the present time, in 1882, moved a resolution against the coal duties, and spoke as follows:—

Well, then, if the hon. Minister assents to this position, and his followers also assent to it, why do they legislate against nature ? They will tell me that the Americans also legislate against nature.

What speech did we have this afternoon from the Controller of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) ? He pointed to the Dingley Bill, which is, according to the Prime Minister, legislation against nature. And what did we have from the Finance Minister ? He said things had changed—the United States were not in the same mood as he alleged they were in 1893. They were legislating against nature, and we must do the same. But the Prime Minister, when on this side of the House, said :

Can this reason ever be given in a civilized country, that because one nation legislates against nature, we should also legislate against nature ? The hon. gentleman reminded me of what is said of the Chinese mode of duelling. In Paris, where duels are frequent, a man who is offended calls his adversary out, and they settle the matter between themselves ; but in China, if a man is offended, he commences by opening his bowels, and when this is done, the bloody sword is sent to his adversary, who also opens his bowels, so that, instead of one man going to the grave against the laws of nature, two men do so.

On this continent, instead of having one nation legislating against the laws of nature, you have two pursuing that course.

So that because the Americans are disembowelling themselves, our hon. friends on the Government side disembowel themselves too, and contrary to the promises they made. I have further statements made by the present Finance Minister, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the present Prime Minister, when they were looking for votes, when they were holding themselves out as the proper persons to administer the affairs of the country, and were therefore making promises and pledges to the people. Here is what the Finance Minister said in 1894 :

Referring to the coal trade, he said the Liberal party would not preach one doctrine in Capo Breton and another in the rest of the Dominion. If the coal business could not be carried on without protection, then it is better not to carry it on at all. Protection was not a necessity for its welfare; the coal business is not a pauper business.

But what does he do here to-day? He puts 60 cents a ton on coal. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce also said:

Now, if there be a principle of political economy clearer than another, it is the principle that the worst tax which could be imposed is a tax on a necessity of life like coal. Moreover, it is a tax exceedingly partial and unjust in its operation. It will fall on the poorest classes of the community in the depths of the Canadian winter. It is absolutely sectional, pressing heavily on the people of Ontario, and not at all on the great mass of the people through the other provinces. It will form a standing grievance. It is a most doubtful benefit to Nova Scotia.

It is not merely Ontario that the tax on coal affects; it affects Manitoba and the North-west as well. It affects the price of coal along the whole line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In the section of country to which I belong many of the farmers burn coal, and the price of coal from the Lethbridge mines and from the anthracite mines is regulated strictly by the price of coal that comes from below the line. The Prime Minister, speaking in Montreal before the election, said:

They have a tax on iron, which is a raw material of every industry. The tax on coal, which is also a raw material of every industry, is 60 cents a ton. Although I have not the latest quotations of coal, I am sure that this tax is equivalent to 40 per cent. Now, I am asked, What are you going to do? I have just told you what we are going to do. We are going to have a tariff for revenue, and we are going to abolish completely the duties on raw material.

Here is the positive language of the Prime Minister. Then, speaking at Sohmer Park in the same city a few days later, he remarked:

I say that if we were to have a revenue tariff, raw materials would be free. Raw materials are not free to-day under the protective system. There are certain raw materials which are free. Wool is free; thank heaven, they have not thought of taxing it. Cotton is free also. But is iron free? Cotton is a raw material, and wool is a raw material for certain manufactures. But there are two articles which are raw material of every manufacture, and these articles are coal and iron, and are they free? If you have a revenue tariff, the object would be to develop the country, and all raw materials should be free under such a tariff.

The Winnipeg "Tribune," whose editor and proprietor is a member of this House, began to suspect in December last that the Liberal Government, of which he is a supporter, was not going to carry out its promises, and this is what that paper said:

It was with considerable pain that the "Tribune" observed the remarks of members of the Dominion Government who have recently passed through the city, with reference to the tariff. Both Mr. Davies and Mr. Blair observed that they had not heard the tariff mentioned while in the west. If they are disposed to interpret silence on this great—nay, paramount question—to mean that the people of the west are not desperately in earnest in their desire to secure a revolution of the tariff, then we must tell them plainly that they entirely misapprehend the spirit and sentiment of the people. We would like to inquire how it could be possible that they should hear anything about the tariff while passing hurriedly over our plains in private cars, without a stop of more than an hour or two here and there, on their way east? Citizens of the west are noted for their innate courtesy and kindness to visitors and visiting Ministers, more especially if they are here for the first time.

And having spoken pretty strongly, it says:

This may be deemed very plain talk. It is intended to be plain. Like Mr. Greenway, the "Tribune" is a thorough believer having the same policy in power which it advocates when in opposition.

How will the hon. gentleman act now? Is he going to support these men who turned their backs on their promises, who have done the very thing he feared? It will be very curious to see what he will do. I do not know whether there is a shred of a promise or a profession made by the hon. Prime Minister that he intends to keep. Why, when he was at Renfrew he as good as made a promise that he would not do what it seems is now going to be done. The Rev. Mr. Huxtable, a gentleman representing the prohibition movement, said to him:

A majority of some 80,000 of the voters in Ontario have decided in favour of the prohibition of the liquor traffic. We understand that Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

But, Sir, the moment these words fell on the sensitive ear of the hon. gentleman, he stopped and said: "I must tell my friend that I am not Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but only plain Mr. Laurier. I am a Democrat to the hilt." And yet, Mr. Speaker, if all accounts are true, this quasi promise will not be kept and the hon. gentleman will have a title which will sit very gracefully on him. It looks as if we were going to have men made knights, who have so completely belied their promises; we shall have stars glittering on truthless bosoms and honours showered on dishonoured heads. However, I hope for the sake of consistency, that that little shred of a promise will remain unbroken, and that the hon. gentleman will come back from the Jubilee, the same plain Mr. Laurier. I express that wish, though I am really afraid that when he gets to the other side and finds himself in an aristocratic atmosphere, his virtue will ooze out from his finger tips, and he will come back decorated with a title. Instead of being the grand Mr. Laurier, he will have a title, and there will at the same time be such a batch of titles, that I would suggest to the Finance Minister, when dealing with the future deficit which is bound to be large, the advisability of putting a duty on titles, and thus limiting the number or adding greatly to the revenue of the country.

At an earlier period, I was referring to the fact that while on those things which the farmer buys he has to pay 35 per cent. yet, under the preferential tariff, the silks of fine ladies will come in on very advantageous terms. Here are the particulars. Of silks and manufactures of, we imported dutiable :

In—
1896.....	$2,564,491
1895.....	2,331,443
1894.....	2,489,930
1893.....	2,776,053

In no year did we import more from the United States than $122,000 worth, which is, of course, a mere trifle. The duty paid in 1896 was $773,950. Now, one-eighth of that will be $96,743; and without any one wanting it and despite the demand of the Patrons of Industry to have luxuries taxed, that $96,000 is this year taken off and thrown into the sea, and next year $192,000. If you say that it will apply only to England, that will not help you because the great bulk of these things comes from England. Take wool and the manufactures of wool, $6,970,000 out of $8,723,000 came from England. Nearly all these are fine goods. The amount was $9,413,731 in 1892, and $10,306,786 in 1896 paid a duty of $2,759,183.

How much are you going to put into the pockets of the well-to-do, into the pockets of those gentlemen whom my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce used to say the tariff was made for? The first year, under your preferential arrangement, $344,900, and in the second year $689,800, or in the two years, without any one asking you for it, you are going to put into the pockets of those people about a million dollars. And this applies to only one staple. On the whole, you will remit to the prosperous, to the fine lady and fine gentleman over $3,000,000. From what source are you going to make that up? You will have to go to the farmers for the greater part of it. They will have to pay the greater part of that million dollars, and that is not in accordance with the principles enunciated by the Reform party. It is not in accord with the principles of the Patrons, whom the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce took to his heart and called friends and brothers, nor is it in accord with any sound view of what is in the interests of Canada.

I want to say one word as to the course taken with regard to our wheat. Two and a half cents a bushel has been taken off. I am afraid the result will be that we shall not be in the good position we enjoyed in the North-west Territories and Manitoba last year and the year before. In

Mr. DAVIN.

1895—and that was not nearly as good a year for us as last year, the prices of wheat at Duluth, and Winnipeg, and at Fort William, were as follows:—

1895.		Fort William.	Duluth.	Difference.

The prices at Fort William are values at which No. 1 Hard was sold on the respective dates. The Duluth quotations do not allow for 1 floating, which is ½ cent, and being on a basis of No. 1 Northern. Therefore, I allow 1½ cents for difference in prices obtained at those points, as the cost of taking wheat to eastern points, and Europe is the same. This is a fair comparison. These columns show the prices obtained at Fort William, which allows the 1½ cents difference for floating, and shows largely in favour of Canadian wheat. This was due to the tariff preventing American wheat coming in competition with our wheat.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. I have no doubt it is carried. No doubt conviction is carried to the mind of the people that the change was a bad one for the North-west, and it is perfectly gratuitous, for nobody was asking for it, so far as I know, and it can do no good whatever. But on the same plane with it is the removal of the duty on corn, which my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) knows some of the people in his own province object to. I have the "Commercial" here, in which there are articles pointing out that in 1896 the price of wheat in Manitoba was very much better than at points below the line. As you know very well, Mr. Speaker, the prices were so good that in some cases men made money, notwithstanding the duty, by bringing over wheat from below the line. And the general opinion of men who know much more of this subject than I do is that the prospect of touching it already greatly influenced for the worse the price of wheat in Manitoba and the North-west Territories even this year.

I wish to refer for a moment to the speech of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). I am sorry he is not present. I stated in an earlier part of my remarks that that speech was full of inconsistencies, and inconsistencies that are very suggestive in the light of what I have been reading. In the course of that speech he said :

It was not, indeed, until 1876, or about that time, that the question of a high tariff gravely occupied the attention of this House.

He goes on to say :

Now, I believe that Sir John Macdonald was as good a free trader as Mr. Mackenzie.

Well, Sir, I had the honour of intimacy with Sir John Macdonald and knew his opinion on every political question ; and I can say that the statement that Sir John Macdonald was a free trader and not a protectionist, which has been made by the Liberal press and by certain Liberals, for an object, I suppose, is without foundation. He was an enlightened protectionist and thoroughly honest in his conviction. No man, as those about me know, could make a sounder, more conclusive or more convincing protection speech than my late illustrious leader. The hon. the Finance Minister denounced the infant industries and said that "if the nursing-bottle be taken away from them they will immediately perish from the face of the earth." And he indicated that he would take it away. But he has not attempted to take it away, and it is there yet. Then, he denounced bonuses. He gave us a fancy description, a fine picture, of the old-fashioned workman who never dreamt of asking a bonus. But in the tariff which he was about to propose there was a bonus to the iron manufacturers. He says further :

I hesitate not to say that, if we should to-day, by some rash step, do that which some hon. gentlemen say we are bound to do, but which intelligent men know we are not bound to do, and would not do, we would not only break down the manufacturing interests of the country, but we would deal a blow at other interests of a wider and more serious character.

He shows that they would be perfectly within their rights if they were to treat the manufacturing industries—and I say they would—as having no vested rights whatever. Then, having given a bit of free trade clap-trap, he comes to action. The words are the words of a free trader, but the action is the action of a protectionist. He says, in effect : Some may suppose that we are going to keep our promises, but intelligent men know us by this time, and do not expect us to keep our promises. There is another piece of inconsistency in this speech. The hon. Minister says :

I believe that there is nothing inconsistent with sound free trade principles in a government dealing with a neighbour, to hold in its hands whatever levers it may possess in the negotiations;—

And yet in this tariff he gives up the duty on corn, which would have been a powerful lever in dealing with these same neighbours, and gives up three cents on wheat, which also would have been a lever. And this is how he finishes this part of his speech :

—and I say so to-day, not in the spirit of retaliation, because I say, Sir, that we ought not to retaliate upon the United States in the way some people advocate.

Yet he retaliates upon them. While he says we ought not to retaliate he has in his hands a retaliatory tariff.

I have heard it argued that what we should do is to let our tariff stand as it is to-day. I cannot subscribe to that doctrine. The Liberal party has pledged itself to give tariff reform, and the country expects the Liberal party to fulfil their pledge.

And then they do not give the reform they promise. In connection with that, I have already read what the Prime Minister said about retaliation. We are told that this tariff especially belongs to him and that he is to be honoured in England because he is the author of it. And yet, he says he does not believe in retaliation.

I think that the country feels very much as certain carpenters felt when they marched through London on a celebrated occasion, when what was a sham reform was before Parliament, and they had a banner on which was inscribed : "Deal with us on the square ; we have been chiselled too long." Consider the promises of the hon. Prime Minister, of the hon. Finance Minister and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not mention the smaller fry in that brilliant Ministry. But take the great men among them, take the leaders. When we take their promises and their performances, we feel like the carpenter, and the country must feel in the same way, that they have not dealt with us on the square, that we have been chiselled, and we want to know exactly where we are. I say there is in the character of the leaders, or of a few of the leaders, a sort of innate subterfuge by reason of which they cannot possibly make their conduct square with their professions. I have an article here in the "Reveil," written by an admirer of the Prime Minister, and it is a very extraordinary article. It goes over the history of the Prime Minister, and says that he was a disciple of Papineau. It gives you the policy of Papineau and the policy of 1854, and says of that policy :

It was logical and admitted, with all its consequences, the necessity of crushing the clergy in order to make its programme victorious.

Then it goes on to say that in 1877 Mr. Laurier came to the front, and the old chiefs disappeared. Some died, and others were shelved like the Dorions. It goes on to say:

Laurier embodied the new policy. We will not do him the wrong of supposing that he has denied a single one of his Liberal convictions, but he took a new line, which he follows still, and the progress that he has made is none the less real. From his first speech in 1877 he freed himself of embarrassing questions, and no longer pretended to speak of the old programme; but, thank God, in the words of Gambetta, he thought about it all the time.

So he threw over the programme because it was troublesome and not easily managed, but all the time he was thinking of it and aiming at it. This is the character given the present Prime Minister by this brilliant French writer. He goes on to say:

We ask but one thing of Mr. Laurier. Let him speak openly and act above-board. What he does suits us, what he says does not suit us. We want not only acts, but we want words. Is that asking too much?

Now, Sir, in the light of the promises of the Prime Minister that I have read, has not this brilliant writer given us a few X rays by which we may comprehend an interesting, a fascinating, an inscrutable, but still a very undesirable character? If this analysis should be correct, it would make out the Prime Minister to be somewhat like those cynical abbés of the 18th century, who preached Christianity and believed in Voltaire. However, there is the description. Here we have all these promises—promises in regard to coal, promises in regard to iron, promises in regard to implements, promises in regard to articles which the farmer contends are his raw materials. We have all these promises from the Prime Minister as long as he is leading the Opposition, but when he gets into power he turns his back on them all. I reverse the language of this brilliant writer. He says that the acts of the hon. gentleman suit him, but not his words; the farmers say the words of the hon. gentleman suit us, but not his acts. He says, We do not want merely his acts, but we want his words also. Well, the farmers will dispense with his words, if he will only give them acts. He need never again throw one ray of his sunny manner over North-west matters, provided he gives us solid acts. As Alexander Pope says, we prefer solid pudding to empty talk. We prefer the solid legislation that would give us free implements, free coal oil, free iron, free coal, free lumber, a low duty on a number of things that farmers use. We prefer that, a good deal, to any brilliancy of rhetoric, or any charm of manner. Sir, I am really sorry in a way, I can safely say without affectation that I am very sorry for the failure of character on that bench in ten months. In Opposition they were virtuous; their elevation to the bench has been disastrous to them, morally. They have in ten short months sacrificed all claim to the confidence of the people of Canada. A distinguished colleague of the hon. Premier referred the other night to William Shakspeare, and to some things that he said. The hon. Premier is himself a student of Shakspeare, one can see that in his style; as he is a student of much else that conduces to purity of utterance. Let us look at the way free trade has been treated here by its friends, betrayed from that very side by the Finance Minister, one of the loudest self-styled free traders in Canada, or on the continent, or, for that matter, in the Empire. He is in charge of this policy, and he goes and slanders free trade all over with praise, and then betrays it at the close of his speech. Sitting behind him was the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He looked grim, I do not say he looked ghastly, he rather looked the reverse of ghastly, he looked rubicund; but he looked grim and angry, and even contemptuous. I could not help thinking that he felt that some of his heavy armour had been put on a much slighter man. But, Sir, I was glad, I may say to the Prime Minister, that the Finance Minister was a much slighter man, and I will tell him why. He has a distinguished follower behind him who owns a paper in Winnipeg; and when the Minister of Finance was up in Winnipeg, this follower of my hon. friend had an article in which he said that we had now found a leader. He quite filled me with alarm, he indicated, as I thought, a rival; and now I am only doing for that side of the House what an hon. gentleman opposite did for us yesterday when he warned the leader of the Opposition of a coming rival. I am not warning, but consoling, the Prime Minister that he need not fear a rival. I was alarmed, because I thought that when the Finance Minister broke out, we should have something very colossal indeed, and very overpowering. But I may say this, that after the experience of the last four or five days, I do not think that my hon. friend the Prime Minister need fear the rival that the editor of the "Tribune" would have given him. But, Mr. Speaker, there cannot be the least doubt about this, that the promises made by these gentlemen made a deep impression on the country, and the denial of these promises, the failure to keep the pledges made, the failure, above all, to keep the pledges made to the North-west Territories and to Manitoba, have made an impression on the country that I do not think will rapidly pass away. I was referring a moment ago to the turn for quotation that is possessed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and especially his fondness for quoting Shakspeare. The Prime Minister himself is a student of Shakspeare; and he is probably a student of Dante also. Anybody who reads Richard III. will see that the great man who wrote that play must have been a student of the King of Italian song, because the dream of Clarence is palpably an inspiration from the Inferno. It will be remembered that Clarence dreams that he is gone beyond this life, that he has passed the melancholy flood, and the first person that salutes him is the renowned Warwick, who asks:

What scourge for perjury
Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?

And so he vanishes. And then there comes the victim of Clarence's great crime, who appears to him and cries out:

Clarence is come.—false, fleeting, perjured Clarence.

Sir, if there be a Hades where the kings of free trade are, as a great poet and prophet once fancied, and the time comes—which heaven forbend should be near—when the hon. gentleman should go there, why Bright and Cobden will rise up and say:

What scourge for perjury
Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?

Free trade itself will appear and cry out, pointing to his betrayer:

Clarence is come,—false, fleeting, perjured Clarence.

I say this with great regret, because it is a pity from every point of view, but above all, a pity from the point of view of the good of the country. With respect to the constitutional question that is involved in this matter. We had a speech yesterday from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in which he talked constitutional law or international law, and I saw that one of the newspapers to-day said he evinced his usual precision of language. I am a great admirer of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but really I do not think precision of language is his great gift—I think recklessness of language is his gift. He said that this was a mixed question of law and fact. There could not be a more fallacious description. It is at the present moment purely a question of law. There is no question of fact; nor has England ever acknowledged the American view on this subject; nor does the case cited by the Minister furnish an analogy.

I say here that although the Prime Minister said it was not intended that the present tariff should apply either to Germany or Belgium, the Minister of Trade and Commerce as good as admitted that the contention made on this side of the House is correct, namely, that if this preferential column is to apply to England, it will have to apply as well to those countries that have the most-favoured-nation clause. I do not think it is necessary, after the speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition, that I should quote the clause of the treaty with Belgium or the treaty with the German Zollverein. It is enough to say here that as a man who has given some attention to the subject, I have no hesitation in saying that the preferential column must apply to some twenty-two other countries besides England. I say moreover, that England's name is not mentioned there, and that the pretense put forward that there is a clause preferential to England, is erroneously described as picturesque; it would be more correct to describe it as fraudulent; there is no foundation for it, it is essentially deceptive. Let me point out to the House that if these resolutions pass, the Controller of Customs by and by may give whatever advantages he desires to the United States without receiving any authority from this House or Parliament having had anything to say in respect to the matter. If hon. gentlemen will look at the resolution they will see that it gives extraordinary power to the Controller of Customs, and the result would be that the Government would have it in its power to make any arrangement it pleased with the United States. What did the Minister of Trade and Commerce say? That perhaps this was the best way to get reciprocity, and there was running through the speeches of other hon. members something of the same sentiment. Sir, the striking change that has taken place in the sentiments of hon. gentlemen opposite is suspicious. I hold in my hand a report of the speech that has often been referred to, an authoritative speech delivered only six years ago, and I may add that it is a very admirable and able speech. It was delivered in 1891 by the present Prime Minister. As we are pointing out the beautiful consistency of hon. gentlemen opposite we may as well make the case complete. In that speech at Boston the hon. gentleman said:

Our object is, when there is a Liberal Administration at Ottawa, to offer to the United States the free entrance of our territory to all American products, whether natural or manufactured, provided the United States extend the same privilege to the products of Canada.

This involves that we would offer to the American nation advantages denied to the rest of the world. So it does, and it is a cause of bitter reproach against us by the Conservative party, who charge us with disloyalty to England. This is not the place to discuss the grounds of difference that separate us from our opponents. This much only will I say: In the very nature of things, from the sole fact that Canada is growing, developing and progressing, the interest of Canada and the interest of England are on the other side; the only consideration for me is, what is best for Canada, leaving to the people of England to consider, and do what is best for England. This is not a question of sentiment, and, for my part, I am firmly convinced that the economic interests of Canada lie with this continent, and it is on the broad basis of continental freedom of trade that I place the question.

Sir, has geography changed since that speech was made? Have the great features of this Dominion changed since then? And yet we have utterances now, as though such sentiments had never been entertained by either the Prime Minister or his party. And again:

Sir, without entering into controversies which, for obvious reasons ought to be avoided at this board, I may be allowed to observe that men there are in my own country who seem always to forget that Canada is in America. I do not question their motives—I doubt their discretion. They look to a political federation of the whole British Empire, an idea, it must be admitted, not without grandeur, but which would remove the colonies from the position of security which they now occupy, and would embroil them in all the wars which Great Britain, in her present stage of advancement, might have to wage in all parts of the world.

And now, Sir, when the conversion from such views as these has been so recent and so marked, and the utterances that we now hear, of devotion to preferential trade and devotion to the union of the Empire so strong, we should look carefully at any clause to see what power is given to the Government under it. I, for one, look with great jealousy on giving the Government power to do, what only Parliament in a constitutional country should do. I entirely object to the Government doing what should be done by an impartial tribunal. I would like to have an arrangement made whereby combines should be at once hit, as they should be hit the moment they appear, but, Sir, the tribunal under that 16th clause will not be impartial. I take great objection to the present vague clause about which we can get no information, and I want an explanation of what the words "on the whole" mean. Does it mean an average? If it does, in the German Zollverein there might be an average on goods which the business men of Canada would not be interested in and yet under that average these goods would be able to come in.

I say we ought to have explanations on these matters, that we should look with suspicion on a tariff which erects a 35 per cent wall against the poor man and the farmer. The poor men and the farmers of this country had a right to hope for better than to have been abandoned by the men who professed to be their friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, this is an important question and one which has been freely discussed throughout the country for a number of years. It is a question which affects every part of Canada, and I for one cannot allow it to be voted on, nor can I vote upon it myself, without saying a word in justification of the vote which I give. I shall speak especially as to how the tariff is regarded in the western part of the Territories. I wish to say, that there are features in the tariff as it stands, which are disappointing to the people when considered in relation to the promises which have been made, and the ideas that have been gathered in the past from the party at present in power. There are, as I say, certain features of the present tariff which, as I understand it, are disappointing to these people, and it is on account of that that I wish to speak to-night. While there are features that are disappointing, there are also features most encouraging, and we are bound to consider not only the features that are disappointing, but also the features that are satisfactory. If we remember that on the whole, the tariff as proposed to us is more satisfactory than anything that was offered to us otherwise, we are bound to accept it as a whole, even though we do not approve of all it contains. The dissatisfaction has reference to the duties on articles which the farmer uses, and chiefly the duties on agricultural machinery and coal oil.

Now, we in the west are not unreasonable. We understand the difficulty of the task that this new Government had to face in remodeling the tariff. We do not ask for impossibilities, and we are willing in this matter to accept a policy of conciliation, as we were in the matter of the settlement of the school question. We do not wish to see any longer, the different industries in this country held up to antagonism with each other. We do not want hostility to be perpetuated between the agricultural and the manufacturing classes, if a compromise can be effected whereby justice will be done to all classes. At the same time it must be understood, that there is a strong demand for reductions in the tariff in these particular articles which I have named, and the reason is, as read by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), that the fall in the price of agricultural products in the last few years, has been greater than the fall in the prices of the articles that the farmer had to buy. The farmer has been face to face with dire necessity, and it is because of his dire necessity that he asks for relief. It is for this reason also that he is less willing to freely accept the compromise that is now offered than he would be if his circumstances were better. I say, that the western farmers have been face to face in the past few years with unfortunate and unexpected conditions, and they now demand relief, as far as relief is possible, from these conditions.

The point now is: From what source is that relief to come, and toward whom are they to look? In this House, and on this occasion, if the present Opposition had any measure of relief to offer the farmers, now and here was the time to offer it. We have listened to what has been said by the leaders of the Opposition and by their followers who have spoken, and so far as I am able to see, wherever we may look for relief we cannot look to them. Whatever measure of relief we have received we have received from the present Liberal Government; and whatever measure of relief we hope to receive we must look to the present Government for, because we have the definite announcement of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster): that as it was the policy of that party when in power to place the interests of the manufacturers first, so it is the policy of that party in Opposition, and will continue to be their policy.

Now, we have nothing against the manufacturers. We wish the manufacturers of this country to prosper; but we wish to have some share of prosperity ourselves. We wish to have the tariff adjusted so that the industries and interests of the farmers will be considered just as well as the industries and interests of the manufacturers. This is what was not done under the late Government, and so far as we can see now, there is no prospect of its being done should the present Opposition obtain office with their present principles. Under the circumstances, although the new tariff is not, in all its particulars, satisfactory to the members from the west, I for one feel bound to support the resolution on this occasion, as being the best offer made through this House to the people of the western country.

I think the importance of the customs tariff to the people of the country has been exaggerated in the arguments that have been brought forward in regard to it. In the western part of this Dominion, I can assure this House, we do not look upon the customs tariff as the most important issue. I do not wish to minimize its importance at all. We look for a square deal under that tariff, as under every other part of the legislation of the Government. But let it be understood that there are other questions which affect the interests of the people there, and which will affect them in the future, more than the customs tariff, whether it is high or low, a revenue tariff or a protective tariff. The tariff on what we have to buy is not our principal burden. The great burden is the tariff on what we have to sell. It is not the customs tariff—it is the railway tariff which is the great burden on the western country. That is the great question in that country. I think it only fair to put this matter squarely before the House on this occasion, when we talk about what the tariff or the changes in the tariff will do or will not do. It is well to understand that they are not and cannot be expected to do everything for us, and that the part they play in the western country is small compared with the part played by the question of transportation.

With reference to the duty on coal oil, which was six cents a gallon, and is now five cents a gallon, it is an open question whether that change of a cent in the duty will make a difference of a cent in the price. Admitting that it will, when we pay fifty cents a gallon for coal oil in the North-west, it can easily be understood that the reduction of a cent a gallon does not cut much of a figure in that part of the country. If you were to take off the whole duty, it would not make much difference in the price, as long as the freight rate of nearly twenty cents a gallon remains. I mention this to show the difference in the effect on the price as between the customs tariff of five cents a gallon and the railway tariff of say twenty cents a gallon. But we can pay twenty cents or thirty cents freight, and the duty on coal oil, provided we can sell the products we raise at a fair market price. It is the high cost of delivering the produce of the North-west in the markets of the world which is the great drawback in the North-west. For instance, a farmer buys a self-binder, and pays $20 duty on it; but that self-binder he uses, we will say, for five years in cutting one hundred acres of wheat. That is five hundred acres, yielding, say twenty bushels to the acre, making in all ten thousand bushels of wheat. The duty on the self-binder with which he cuts that wheat was $20, whereas a difference of one cent a bushel on the freight charges on that wheat would amount to $100, or, in other words, would pay the duty five times over in the five years, or once each year. That is an illustration of the difference between the effect of the duty upon imports, and the freight rates. No matter whether the duty on the machinery is high or low, it is a small matter compared with the freight charges on the farmer's product.

Now, whatever the Government has done or may do in the matter of the customs tariff, I say that they have done well so far as they have gone, in giving us free binder twine and free fence wire, and in reducing the duties on the smaller articles required by the agriculturists and also on larger machinery. In all these things they have done well; but if this tariff is framed for the purpose of developing the North-west, it will need to be followed up by something much more radical in order to secure that development. I have heard several times in this debate, the question of the development of the west alluded to. It appears that it is considered an important question. As one of the representatives of the west, I say—and I think every one of the others will back me up—that the question of the rates of transportation is the great question in the west, and the one which we wish this House to consider when it considers the question of the development of that country. There is no part of the country that can stand a high customs tariff better than the western part of the country, provided that we get a low tariff of freight rates.

There is another form of taxation besides customs taxation, which has to be borne in the west as well as the east, that is, local and municipal taxation for school and municipal purposes. I had the honour to place on the Order paper of this House last session certain notices regarding the taxation of lands in the Territories, and I am going to take this opportunity of pointing out to this House that owing to a certain condition of affairs in regard to the land of that country, the settlers have to pay a very much higher tax for their school purposes in the parts of the country affected than they should pay, if the understanding entered into by this Parliament with regard to the railroad companies of that country were carried out.

Certain railroad companies, which are entitled to the odd sections, or alternate sections in certain tracts of land, are relieved—I do not know by what arrangement or lack of arrangement—from their proper share of the burden of taxation in that country. They should not be so relieved, because a greater burden is thereby thrown on the settlers of that country. There is the unjust burden, in so far as it is unjust now, of the tariff, of railway rates and of local taxation. I again say to the House that the measure of relief given from the one injustice does not give relief from the other two, and the injustice we are relieved from is not as great as either of the other two. If it is desired to develop the North-west, while the intended lowering of the Customs tariff will, I believe, tend in that direction, it is necessary that this House should follow up its action with regard to the tariff by acting on the other lines and seeing that the settlers are not made to pay more than their fair share of local taxation and not more than is necessary for the transport of their produce. I am not speaking on behalf of the farmers in the eastern country because they have plenty of representatives to speak for them, but I have every assurance that the question of transportation is just as important here as it is in the west. I heard the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) say the other night that the farmers of Ontario were paying more to have their produce hauled 100 miles to Toronto than their competitors in the United States paid for haulage from Chicago to Toronto. If that be the case in Ontario, certainly the farmers here have a grievance similar to ours in the West, which calls for active intervention of the Government in this matter of railway rates.

Mr. CRAIG. I had not intended to speak to-night, but as I have only very few remarks to offer on this question, I might perhaps as well take this opportunity as any other. I am sure that we all must agree that no subject could occupy our attention which is more important than the one now before us. Not only is the attention of this House directed to the subject of the tariff but also the attention of the country, and I propose, in the few remarks I have to make, to consider this subject as free from party bias as possible. I find that in discussing a great many subjects in this House, it seems impossible that we should not look at them through party glasses. Now, I feel satisfied that almost every hon. gentleman opposite who speaks on this question will say that the tariff is what it ought to be. I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Oliver) and who represents the Great North-west, express himself as seemingly perfectly satisfied with the tariff. Although he admits that one cent on coal oil makes no difference, still he is satisfied with it, taking it all round. I might be expected to say that I am dissatisfied with it all round, but I will not say that I am. In some respects, I am pleased with this tariff. I am very glad indeed that although the members of the Cabinet and their supporters are placed in a very strange position before the country,—in the position of breaking all the pledges they made—they have done good service to the country by retaining in a great measure the tariff of their predecessors. But as I look at this tariff, I am struck with one very peculiar feature of it, and that is that it faces both ways. It is intended to catch protectionists and free traders as well. I must confess that while I would not be prepared to say that the members of the present Government have more real ability than their predecessors, yet on a good many questions they show more dexterity and more agility. To use a word which is not quite parliamentary, but which aptly expresses the idea, they have the ability and capacity to humbug the people better than the members on this side. Barnum said that people liked to be humbugged, and it really looks like it.

As I look at this tariff I find it faces both ways. We have, first of all, the general tariff. I noticed that the hon. the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) while reading over the items, said, in a great many cases, for the sake of uniformity we have taken this article which is at 20 per cent, and this other one which is at 30 per cent, and we call them both 30 per cent. Then when this was greeted with a laugh on this side, he would say: This is the general tariff, but wait until we come to the reciprocal tariff. He was evidently then talking to his own side and the Liberals all over the country. We are levelling up, he said, in a good many places, but that is the general and not the reciprocal tariff, but wait until you hear the reciprocal tariff. It is a very ingenious arrangement indeed. They go to the protectionists and manufacturers and they say to them: Here is the general tariff, have a look at it, we have not reduced the duties, but have left them in a great measure as they were before. Keep your eye on that tariff and we expect you to support us. Then they turn to their friends who are in favour of a revenue tariff, and to them they say: Do not look at that general tariff, but at this reciprocal tariff. Keep your eye fixed on that all the time, and you will be satisfied. That may seem a little exaggerated, but when I went home, a few days ago, I heard of a case exactly in point. A gentleman who is an ardent supporter of the Liberal party, who has grown gray in supporting them, who would not listen to any arguments at all to show that there was anything good at all in the Conservative party, went to a friend of mine who was a Conservative as soon as he got the general tariff, and he was thunderstruck. He said: I am so disappointed, I never thought our party would do anything like this, and he went away disgusted. But after a while he came back. Oh, he said, it is all right, here is this reciprocal tariff—and he went away perfectly happy. He saw a way of getting out of it. That is a very ingenious arrangement to suit all parties, and I congratulate the First Minister and those who devised the scheme on their success, if only they can keep it up. It is all right so long as you can keep each man's attention confined to the one tariff that suits him, but if one man looks at both tariffs and compares them, he will wonder where he is at and what the thing really means. To show that what I say is not at all exaggerated, let me read a small selection from a newspaper which, while it calls itself independent, is a supporter of the party opposite—the Montreal "Witness." I once took occasion, in my early political career, to say that the "Witness" was a Liberal organ, and it repudiated the soft impeachment entirely and said it was independent. Perhaps it is independent, but it leans very strongly in the direction of hon. gentlemen opposite. I notice that in this article in the Montreal "Witness" that came out the day after the tariff came down, the 23rd April, it said that the tariff was better than they had feared, that the most important part of the tariff was the reciprocal part, and that in reading it, as a whole, and in reading every clause of it we must remember this reciprocal feature. They wrote that way because they were writing for members of the Liberal party who expected a greater reduction than they got. They go on to say:

In order to appreciate it as a free trade measure, the tariff reformer must grasp the fact that its vital clause, that containing the principle of preferential trade, lowers the tariff immediately 12½ per cent, and at the end of a year from next July an additional 12½ per cent all round, so far as the British Empire is concerned, as well as those countries having a treaty with Great Britain, treaties containing the most-favoured-nation clause, of which the principal are Germany and Belgium.

This is for the free trader. Now, a little further on in the same article, I find the following:—

The form of the tariff is made somewhat more free-trade fashion by the substitution of ad valorem duties for specific duties, but in its multiplicity of classification it remains, as before, protectionist in form.

That is a very good article; it is both a free trade and a protectionist tariff. That is what I say is the great characteristic of this tariff—it faces both ways. Now, they must have some reason to give their supporters for making or keeping this tariff a protectionist tariff. What reason is given? It is that the United States is making a high protective tariff. Now, what does the Montreal "Witness" say in the same paper?

It will show the British people that the story of British disloyalty in Canada was untrue. It also strikes a blow at the United States, and, as they have struck a blow at us, most people will like it for that reason. Mr. Fielding was ready to deal with the United States, but until the negotiations take place, he keeps most of the duties on goods from the United States as they were.

So that is the great argument—that the United States are making a protective tariff and that, therefore, we are justified in making a protective tariff. I have here a selection from the "Globe," but, as hon. gentlemen on the other side all read the "Globe" for themselves, I shall not trouble the House by reading that extract to them. But I may say that it is a very strong argument in favour of protection against the United States. It is a very satisfactory and very conclusive argument, to my mind. It shows that we especially need a high tariff against the United States because their manufactures are so large they have their specialists in the various lines, and it says that if we had no taxes on American goods, the manufacturer of New York State could control our markets as easily as he controls that of his own state, and if we had not a protective tariff our young men would be sent in ever-increasing droves to the United States. That is a good argument to me, a protectionist; but I am very much surprised at the "Globe" addressing arguments like that to a party who denounced protection consistently year after year as long as they were in Opposition. But I suppose we need not expect consistency from hon. gentlemen opposite. The Liberal party, in taking the stand that the Dingley Bill is an excuse for a protective tariff, here forget that during part of the time the Conservative party were in power the McKinley Bill was in operation. They forget that the McKinley Bill made as high a tariff as the Dingley Bill will be after it passes through the Senate of the United States, perhaps higher.

But that, they said, was no excuse—if the United States were fools enough to have a high protective tariff that was no reason why we should be fools also. A while ago they maintained that high protection in United States was no excuse for high protection here, but now that they are in power they make high protection in the States the excuse for higher protection here. Moreover, they argued that the consumer pays the duty. That was a part of the creed of the Liberal party, I believe. If that is true, what nonsense it is for them to talk about having a high protective tariff against the United States. But I venture to say that they know that in a great many cases the consumer does not pay the duty. Perhaps they did not know it before; I hope they are learning; I suppose they are, since they got into power. I believe that in a great many cases the consumer does not pay the duty, and that when we levy a protective tariff against the United States, it does not follow that we pay higher prices; it does follow that articles from the United States are kept out, or if they come in, must come in at a lower price than we should give for them if we had no protection. I will not go on to repeat what was said about protection being a curse to the country. These are matters we all understand. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite hardly meant all they said. I am sure they do not mean it to-day. They say to the manufacturers: Here we have given you a protective tariff. But what do they say to the free traders? They say: Look at the reciprocal tariff and see what a reduction we are making to you; we are in favour of free trade; we are going in the direction of free trade, and this reciprocal tariff is in that direction. They say more. They say that this reciprocal tariff is a preference given to Great Britain, and they take great credit for that. I do not want to deprive them of any credit they may be entitled to. But how do they give this preference to Great Britain? They say: We offer the same to every nation of the world. When we tell them that, under the treaties, they cannot give a preference to Great Britain, they say: We are not giving a preference to Great Britain. And yet, in the same breath, they say they are giving a preference to the mother country and they take great credit to themselves for that. This article that I have read from the "Witness" says that this tariff hits the United States, and for that reason people will be pleased with it. How does this tariff hit the United States? This Government says: We want to hit the United States; how shall we do it? They decide to take the duty off corn. That is a strange way to hit the United States, but they do it. But they are not satisfied to hit the United States once, they must do it again and so they take the duty off binder-twine. But to hit the United States twice is not enough, they must get another blow. And so they take the duty off barb wire. To hit the United States once again takes some consideration. But, after considering every opportunity, they decide to take some of the duty off coal oil. Of course, that does not hit the United States very hard. So they reduce the duty on wheat. As the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said, that is something nobody asked for. But they wanted to hit the United States, and so they reduce the duty on wheat 3 cents a bushel, they reduce the duty on flour 15 cents per barrel, they reduce the duty on iron, and in doing all those things, they are hitting the United States. Well, now, I do not think that the United States objects to be hit in that way. I think if the Government keeps on hitting them that way, they will be quite satisfied. Yet hon. gentlemen say that in this tariff they are retaliating against the United States. But they are not satisfied with that. One would think they might be satisfied when they hit the United States so often, but they are not satisfied, they are going to hit the United States again under certain conditions. And what do you think they are going to do? The Finance Minister threatens to put a duty on anthracite coal. Now we have no anthracite coal in this country, and if we put a duty on anthracite coal, we will raise the price of coal to the consumers all over the country. The people all over this country will have to pay more for hard coal. If this 50 cents a ton duty is put on it, it will raise the price, perhaps, that much, and perhaps not quite as much, but it will raise the price. And so they are going to hit the United States. If they put up the duty to 75 cents on coal they are going to hit them by making the people of this country pay more for coal. Now, I think this is a strange way of hitting the United States, this is a strange way of retaliating; but the Government say they are going to do all this. Now I hope they will not put a duty on anthracite coal. I know the idea is spread over the country that the United States is making a high tariff and we want to retaliate, we want to show them that we are independent, that we can do without them. But after all I think it would be rather foolish to put a duty on anthracite coal. It is not as if we had anthracite coal in our own country, we must get coal from them. Therefore, I would advise the Government to be satisfied with the way they have hit the United States, and not put this duty on anthracite coal, no matter what the United States may do. Now, I intend to consider for a few minutes this resolution about preferential trade. I consider this a dangerous resolution for the reason that it places too much power in the hands of any Government. I do not care what Government it is. If a Conservative Government were in power, I would say that this is a dangerous resolution. Although a supporter of the Conservative party, I would not want to have such a power placed in the hands of a Conservative Government. I consider it dangerous, because the decision as to what countries come under this clause, is left to the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council. Now, I think that is a great mistake. Not only that, but if there was a tariff specifying what any country must come to in order to come into this arrangement, that would be all right, but no tariff is specified. There has been a good deal of dispute about those words in this resolution "a tariff which, on the whole, is favourable." Now, it is a great point to find out what that means. Suppose, for instance, the United States said: We will admit your lumber free, but we want you to admit us to come in under this favoured clause. Now would this Government say: You can come in under this favoured clause if you allow one or two articles to go in free, which are exported by us. Would the Government be justified in saying that? Sir, it is a very serious question, and I hold it is a dangerous thing to intrust any Government with such a great power. For that reason, if for no other, I should be compelled to oppose this resolution. It might be worthy of consideration if, as I said, some duties were specified as the limit to which the Government could go under this clause; but when nothing is specified, when it is left so indefinite, when the whole matter is left to the decision of the Controller of Customs, subject to the Governor in Council, I think it is a most dangerous thing to intrust the Government with such power. Now, what is the result of that? The result is that the whole tariff, and all the manufacturers of this country, are placed entirely at the mercy of the Government. I want to say further, that this scheme is not a preferential scheme to Great Britain, but it looks to me like the thin edge of the wedge to destroy protection altogether. The Liberal party have promised to destroy protection, and while they have not done it yet, and while they do not pretend that they are going to do it, yet I believe that some day they will carry out their pledges if they can. Sir, it is impossible to hold that any body of men can have made such pledges, can have made such solemn declarations on the floor of this House, can have made such declarations all over this country to their supporters, and can have been elected on those pledges, and now turn their back on them. So it seems to me that this scheme of preferential trade, as it is called, is just a scheme to enter the thin edge of the wedge and take protection out of the tariff altogether. We find that all nations are invited to enter into this arrangement. I was reading an article in the Montreal "Witness" which said that it may turn out that Germany, and Belgium, and these other nations have a right to come in under this clause. Well, if they have, says the "Witness," the consumers will get the benefit. Then the "Witness" goes on to say: We would not be satisfied long to allow a highly protected country like Germany to have these benefits, and to refuse those benefits to our kinsmen of the same language to the south of us. While the Montreal "Witness" may not be in the secrets of the Government, still no doubt its editors have a pretty good idea of its policy. The danger is this, that in a short time almost every nation will enjoy the benefits of this preferential clause in the treaty, because the Government are to be the judges as to what nation shall come in and what shall stay out; and while today we find them talking about this Government being against the United States, and while I have shown that they are hitting the United States very hard in certain ways, yet I know what their feelings are towards that country. I remember how they have talked about the United States, how they have ridiculed the idea of going to Australia to build up trade and neglecting the republic to the south of us, and I well know how their thoughts turn in that direction. The "Witness" echoes their opinions no doubt when it hopes that before long the United States will come into this arrangement.

I am in favour of a true preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain, a truly reciprocal arrangement. This is called a reciprocal tariff. I repeat that I am in favour of true reciprocity with England, but I object to this pretended preference, because it is nothing but a pretended preference. I venture to predict that before long we will find other nations are included, and that Germany, Belgium, and twenty-two other countries, and no doubt the United States, will come under and reap the advantages of this arrangement. So this is not in any sense of the word a preferential arrangement with Great Britain. I have no doubt that a great many people will like the idea of entering into a preferential arrangement with Great Britain; it gives vent to their loyalty, they feel we are part of the Empire, and think that it will bind the Empire closer together. If that arrangement were confined to Great Britain, no doubt such would be the case, but if it is extended to almost all the nations of the earth, I do not see how it can have the result of binding the colonies to the mother country and assisting in the consolidation of the Empire. So I object to this pretended preference. It may be said that it is very strange that hon. members on this side of the House, who have talked so long about loyalty should rise and object to this scheme: that while we have always been saying we are loyal, when this great advantage to the mother country is proposed, we turn around and raise objections. But we object because we say this is only a pretended preference, not a real preference to Great Britain. Speaking for myself, I think I may claim that I am as loyal as any hon. gentleman opposite. I do not think a man is better for constantly talking about his loyalty, but I believe I am expressing my honest sentiments when I declare that true loyalty to the Empire is loyalty to Canada, or that true loyalty to Canada is real loyalty to the Empire, and that the true way to build up the Empire is to build up Canada. The strength of the Empire to-day lies in her colonies, and if we devote our energies to building up Canada, to filling up and settling the prairies in the great west and having this country prosperous, I hold we are doing for the Empire in that way real service. We are making Canada great, and we can best serve the Empire by serving Canada. I am not sent to this House to represent workingmen in England, but I am sent here to represent workingmen in Canada. I am not sent here to legislate for the Empire, but I am sent here to help to legislate for Canada, and I maintain that if I do my duty by Canada, if I seek to promote the best interests of this country, if I support legislation which will produce work for the workingmen of this country, if I support legislation which will give proper protection for the farmers, which will help the people of Manitoba and the North-west, then even although I may not talk about loyalty to the Empire or go around singing about it, I am more loyal in doing what I can to build up Canada than those who are neglecting Canada and prating about their loyalty to the Empire. I hold that a true preferential arrangement would help to build up Canada. What would a true preferential arrangement do? It would give the products of Canada preference in the British markets. It is said: It is no use talking about securing that advantage, because Great Britain will not do it. I might reply in the words of the hon. Finance Minister the other evening who, when an objection was made, said, "the world moves"; and I do not think it would be a very reckless prediction to say that the time will come when we will secure a preferential arrangement within the Empire, under which the products of the colonies will receive a preference in Great Britain, and in this way tend to bind together different portions of the Empire. Suppose we received manufactured products from Great Britain under a preferential arrangement, and our products received admission to the British market under a similar arrangement. I hold that if Great Britain would do that, then the result would be most beneficial to Canada. I believe such an arrangement would attract population to Manitoba and the North-west and that our western country would be filled up; and while it might be said that the reduction of the tariff in favour of British manufacturers, would increase competition with our factories, and would reduce the amount of work furnished to our workingmen, the result would be directly opposite, because while more goods might come in from Great Britain, yet there would be a large population in Manitoba and the North-west and our manufacturers would have the market there, and there would be no conflict with Great Britain, and the interest of the Empire would be advanced in this way.

I am opposed to this resolution—I would be glad if I could support it—because I hold it is a dangerous resolution. It is dangerous to entrust such power in the hands of any Government, I do not care what the Government may be, and I would oppose giving such powers to a Conservative Government as much as I do to a Liberal Government. Under this arrangement the Government will have power to make treaties; they will be able to override Parliament altogether; it will not be necessary for the Government to come before Parliament session after session and ask Parliament to assent to treaties, but the Minister of Customs, when he ascertains that a nation offers Canada certain terms, will be able to accept them or reject them as he pleases, and his decision will at once go into effect. This proposition is a most outrageous one—it is dangerous, at least.

Then I oppose this proposal because it makes concessions for nothing. I may say frankly, whether I am accused of disloyalty or not, that I would object to give this preferential advantage, even to Great Britain, for nothing. I should want a preference in return, because, as I have already intimated, I am sent here, not to represent British workingmen, but to represent Canadian workingmen. And I hold that if the tariff is thus reduced in favour of Great Britain alone, and even if their goods came in and our factories were idle to the injury of the Canadian workingmen, and you were to say to them, you have nothing to do, but you have the consolation of knowing that your fellow-countrymen in England are working and are having the employment which you have lost, our workingmen would not be satisfied. So I would object to this concession being made to Great Britain alone.

But I go further, and I say that much as I would object as I do object to granting this concession to Great Britain, so I would in a greater degree object to Germany, Belgium and other nations being included in this arrangement, if it should be carried out. I hold this is a strong objection, because it gives concessions for nothing, not only to Great Britain, but also to Germany and Belgium and twenty-two other countries. I object to that course being adopted, and when the people of this country understand this proposition they will also object to it. The workingmen will object to it. I do not think they want to see the work they are now doing done in Germany, or even done in England—they are not loyal enough for that. I am loyal enough for most people, but even if I did not object to such an arrangement being made with England without return, I would object to such an arrangement being made with Germany and Belgium and other nations, and in this case we are giving something for nothing, and our people will strongly object to it.

Another objection is that this proposition destroys all chances of ever securing a preferential arrangement with Great Britain. That, in my opinion, is a very serious objection. I know it is said we can never expect to obtain a preferential arrangement. We do not know, however, what may happen. We can try to secure it, at all events: if we fail, we can remain as we are. It is folly for any nation, situated as Canada is, to throw away all chances of ever securing a true preferential arrangement. I do not think that statement is too strong in its terms. If any hon. gentleman questions it, I have an answer which will satisfy him, for the "Globe" will no doubt be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite. That paper says:

If, however, there should be other issue, and Great Britain should decide that the Canadian tariff infringes upon the sanctity of Imperial treaties, and should refuse to denounce the treaties with Belgium and Germany, then our measure of tariff reform becomes still wider, and if the manufactures of countries can be sent into Canada even under the special schedule that it was designed should apply only to British goods, we do not know that the masses of the Canadian people need complain. But in this event a fatal blow would be dealt to preferential trading arrangements within the Empire, and the agencies that are making for Imperial union on the basis of inter-Imperial trade, would have received notice to withdraw from the field.

That is conclusive to my mind, and as it is taken from the "Globe," I hope it is conclusive to gentlemen on the other side of the House. While the argument, that this is a dangerous resolution is a good argument, and while the argument, that we are giving valuable concessions for nothing, is a better argument, I believe that this last argument is the strongest of all. It is: That in introducing this resolution and entering on this system, we are throwing away all chance of what we have talked about and dreamed about for years, and which would be a great benefit to this country. Sir, I hope that the Government will reconsider this. I suppose they are not pledged to it so that they cannot withdraw it, but if they should persist in it, for my part, I hope it will not be found workable, because I think it would be a most unfortunate thing for this country. I do not suppose that any advice of mine will have weight with the Government, but I hope they will reconsider the question and look into it carefully. I believe that it would be the part of wisdom to withdraw a resolution like this which is fraught with such serious consequences.

But if they do not reconsider it, and if it goes through the House, I prophesy—although I am not giving to prophesying—that the general tariff will have disappeared altogether in a short time, and that instead of this general tariff which to-day we are willing to take because we cannot get any better one from the Government, which we are willing to take because a great part of it is practically our own tariff; I prophesy that this general tariff which they are holding up before the manufacturers of this country for them to see, will have vanished from before their eyes, and that all that will be left will be the specific tariff. Then, Sir, our fortunes will be almost decided. I know that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have in times past ridiculed protection, and said it did no good to this country. I am glad, Sir, they have belied their former statements by what they have done in the present tariff. I am glad that they do admit, I am glad that their chief organ the "Globe" admits, that Canada needs protection; and yet I am sorry to see that by this preferential arrangement as they call it, they are still bent on destroying protection, and in destroying protection, destroying the manufacturers of this country.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I cannot pretend that the very little learning I can bring to this all-important question, has been gained in any higher school than the school of experience and observation. Able men than I will approach this subject from the standpoint of political economy; I will have to try and wrestle with the question without any help from Adam Smith. I was reading the other day that Sir Walter Scott was always telling strange stories about the abstraction and singularity of Adam Smith; how, that a man who could hardly put on his coat or order his dinner at the butchers, was scarcely fit to decide on the proper course of industry or the mercantile dealings of nations.

The point I want to make out of this reference is: that the teachings of political economy are of less value to Canada just now than the teachings of common sense and experience. The proverbial difference between theory and free trade is always wide, and never is it wider than the awful gulf fixed between the theory of free trade and the practice of free trade. The question how a country can best develop her own industries and raise a revenue, is a question that every country must decide according to the circumstances of her own position and the interests of her own Government.

Free trade might be very good for England and very bad for Canada. Probably no man on earth would be more disappointed if he could come to earth to-day than the late Mr. Richard Cobden; for did he not, in 1844, say:

You have no more right to doubt that the sun will rise in the heavens to-morrow morning, than you have to doubt that in less than ten years from this time, when England inaugurates the glorious era of commercial freedom, every civilized community will be free traders to the backbone.

I think Mr. Cobden would be disappointed if to-day he came to this country looking for free traders to the backbone. Free traders of that description are very scarce, and I am glad for the sake of the country it is so. Free trade like universal peace is a very beautiful and grand and glorious ideal when it works, but the nation that throws away its tariffs before the dawn of universal free trade is about as foolish as the nation that would throw away its guns and ammunition before daybreak on the millenium morning. I am not a free trader; I never was a free trader, and I never will be a free trader. I controlled the first newspaper that advocated protection and the National Policy in Toronto, and I used all my influence in favour of the National Policy, and I am not ashamed to stand on this floor to-night, in this House of Commons, and proclaim my allegiance to the National Policy, and my cheerful acceptance of the leadership of the hon. the leader of the Opposition—on this question.

I entered this Parliament a pledged supporter of the Conservative trade policy, and in view of the character of the trade proposals of the Government, I am not in doubt where to look for opponents of the Conservative trade policy. The leader of the Opposition has been robbed of his clothes by the Government but he still retains the principles of protection, and it is my duty to follow these principles, clothes or no clothes. The Liberal party is half converted to the principles of protection. For the country's sake I rejoice that the Government is half-seas over on the voyage to protection, but the Opposition is sound in the faith, and my place is with those who stand fast by protection for the country's sake. The Opposition is the mother of protection and loves the policy for its own sake; the Government is a sort of wet nurse that takes protection and suckles it in order to earn a living for its party.

Believers in the National Policy must rejoice, they ought rejoice, to see that the system to which they have pinned their faith is so strong and so interwoven with the highest and best interests of Canada, that it defies immediate attack. I admit that some precious features of the National Policy have been spared; but at the same time I confess to an uneasy feeling that there is too much free trade and too little protection in this tariff. I believe that the Government's gradual attack on the National Policy is the only style of attack that is dangerous to the protective principle. Supposing that a Liberal Government really wanted to destroy protection, have they not taken the best and the surest road to the end? It would have been folly for them to begin the work of establishing a revenue tariff by a revolution. They are smart enough not to want to dally with a catastrophe. A policy of sweeping change would have brought about a panic, and this panic would have discredited the Government. Thus public feeling would have been aroused, and a discredited Government would have perished in the ruins of its tariff policy, and all hope of a revenue tariff would have been destroyed. As it is, the Government lulls public sentiment with a fair show of protective items in this tariff, and sooner or later the country may be awakened by changes which will bring us very near to the basis of a revenue tariff. That prospect may not be terrifying to a free-trader. But I am not a free-trader. Neither am I a revenue tariff man. I am a sincere and convinced protectionist, and I recognize in the Government an enemy to my principles, an enemy all the more dangerous because in this instance it is long-headed and far seeing in its methods. Protection had nothing whatever to fear from any party that would attack it after the manner of a bull in a china shop. It is a much harder fight when the friends of protection have to meet an enemy that lays siege to the citadel which it could not take by assault. The citadel of protection was abandoned to its enemies by the folly of its friends and the party that climbed in over the ruins of the last Government expected to destroy the fortress which its orators had been cursing for eighteen long years. Well, the fortress is not destroyed, but the enemies of protection are inside the breast-works. Some of our friends complain that the Liberal party took a contract to pull down protection, and are merely scribbling free trade maxims on the walls of the citadel which it gained by false pretenses. The Government has marred the perfect beauty of the National Policy; but we are told that a high tariff still shelters some of our industries, and that the Government has placed itself in a position to profit by those national impulses created by the impending tariff of the United States. If this new tariff were all that the protective principle had to fear from the Liberal party, I could sympathise with my hon. friends on this side of the House on the loss of their clothes—I would be keenly sensitive to the loss of those clothes. It is chilly over here; I am beginning to feel cold myself. If this question were merely whether the country should permit the Opposition to be robbed of its clothes, I would be willing that the Government should borrow our garments. Al! I would ask is that the Government should wear those principles as a livery in the service of the country, and not as a disguise at a sort of political masquerade. Surely it is better that the Government should borrow our garments rather than altogether destroy the industries which feed and clothe so many of our countrymen.

2. If so, was the said F. A. Jobin condemned to prison?

3. Did he undergo the penalty imposed?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The initials of Jobin are not correctly given, nevertheless, I will answer the question. One J. Jobin, of Pont Rouge was convicted and was condemned to prison. He underwent the penalty imposed.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Is it true that one George Vézina, of Quebec, was convicted of having had unlawful possession of a still, or of having committed some other infringement of the Inland Revenue Act?

2. If so, was the said George Vézina sentenced to a fine and imprisonment?

3. What was the sentence given against the said George Vézina?

4. Did he pay the fine and undergo the term of imprisonment?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The following are the answers to the gentleman's questions:—1. Yes; on the 17th of March, 1896. 2. Yes; on the 17th of March, 1896. 3. Fine of $100 and one month's imprisonment, and a further fine of $500 and one month. 4. He paid the fine of $100 on the 13th April, 1896, and did not undergo imprisonment.

CLAIM OF THOMAS W. ASPDIN.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether the papers respecting the claim of Thomas W. Aspdin for scrip or a land warrant, for services rendered during the rebellion at Fort Macleod, have been brought before the Acting Minister of Militia?

2. When will these claims be settled?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). That matter is under consideration. It is not possible to say when the claim will be settled, or how.

TERRITORIAL EXHIBITION ACCOUNTS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates to pay outstanding indebtedness of the Territorial Exhibition?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government is at present investigating the accounts.

THE FAST LINE—WINTER TERMINUS.

Mr. ELLIS asked :

Is the Government aware that the Finance Minister in 1894 stated to the House that Halifax or St. John, or both, were in the provisional agreement for the Canadian winter terminus of the fast line? What is the present arrangement or understanding with regard to said terminus?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government is aware of the statement which is referred to in the question. The whole matter is at present undergoing careful consideration by the Government, and as soon as arrangements are completed they will be brought down. My hon. friend (Mr. Ellis), I am sure, will admit that it is not possible to give any details so long as the matter is open.

MR. W. C. CHISHOLM.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

When and why was Mr. W. C. Chisholm removed from the office of Indian agent at Heather-ton, Nova Scotia? Who was appointed to succeed him, and by whom was his successor recommended?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have not under my hand the precise answer which I would like to give my hon. friend; I shall be obliged to give it from memory. Mr. W. C. Chisholm was removed in November last, or thereabouts. One Macdonald was appointed in his place.

PACIFIC-YUKON ROUTE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to prosecute surveys this year for the purpose of finding out the best route from the Pacific Ocean into the Yukon country, so that Canadian merchants may be able to obtain the trade of that country?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is the intention of the Government to prosecute surveys for the purpose stated in the question.

SMUGGLING IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Are the Government aware that large quantities of goods are at present being smuggled into the Yukon country on which duty might be collected if customs officers were appointed at certain points?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government is aware that goods are smuggled into the Yukon country, but the Government is not yet aware what will be the best method of stopping the evil. That question is undergoing investigation.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to at once place a fast steamer in British Columbian waters to put a stop to the smuggling now carried on from the American side, and also to stop the poaching by American vessels in our deep sea fisheries?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The question of my hon. friend infringes rather flagrantly upon the rules which prohibit statements of fact from being made in questions. I do not admit the truth of the alleged facts that the hon. gentleman has imported into his question. I may say to the hon. gentleman that last autumn the steamer "Quadra" was detailed to go into the Hecate Straits, with instructions to ascertain whether smuggling or poaching was being carried on there; and the official report the department received from the commander of the ship, does not justify me in believing that the rumours to that effect were true. But I may say to my hon. friend that the Government has appointed a special agent from the Marine Department and the Customs Department jointly, as an officer who will be carried by the "Quadra" to those northern coasts, and whose instructions will be to make a special investigation into this alleged smuggling and poaching.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must beg hon. members to observe the rule which prohibits them from making statements of fact in questions, or statements that may be open to dispute. I hope hon. members will avoid that in future.

MARINE LIGHTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place lights on Fiddle Reef and Brochie's Ledge this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is the intention to place a light on Brochie's Ledge this year, and I think on Fiddle Reef. I am not sure at the moment whether I correctly remember the name of that reef, but it is the intention to place a light on Brochie's Ledge.

WRECK OF THE "SAN PEDRO."

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to cause the wreck of the "San Pedro" to be removed at once? What is the cause of the delay in removing the vessel?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is the intention of the Government to cause the wreck of the "San Pedro" to be removed. It may be necessary to pass a small Act through Parliament, and one was prepared by my predecessor in office, to justify the Government in removing that wreck.

Mr. PRIOR. What is the cause of the delay.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by delay in the matter. The department have given instructions to notify the owners of the vessel of their intention to remove it at once, and I assume it will be done as soon as possible.

USE OF FISH TRAPS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to allow British Columbia fishermen to use fish traps in Canadian waters where American fishermen are using traps in waters contiguous thereto?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is the intention of the Government to allow British Columbia fishermen to fish with traps in the same manner in Canadian waters as they were used last year. As there has been a good deal of controversy on this matter, I may say to my hon. friend that I declined to allow additional fish traps to be used in Boundary Bay, for this reason, that when I had the honour of visiting British Columbia last year I promised the fishermen and the packers that I would make no material alteration in the fishing regulations of that great province until Commissioner Prince had visited it and had reported to me upon the fishery conditions, and whether I would be justified in allowing further traps. I may say that Commissioner Prince has instructions to proceed at an early day to British Columbia, and to spend a long time there, and thoroughly to master the fishery conditions.

POSTMASTER, NORTHFIELD, B.C.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General to an answer that he gave me yesterday, and that I may put myself in order I will conclude with a motion. I will read the record from the "Hansard":

Mr. DAVIN asked:

"Why was Mrs. Isabella R. McManus deprived of her position as postmistress of Northfield, B.C.?"

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The postmaster in question was dismissed because of the overbearing conduct of the postmaster and her husband towards many persons who were obliged to visit the post office.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my hon. friend's (Mr. Mulock's) attention to the question, which is:

"Why was Mrs. Isabella R. McManus deprived of her position as postmistress of Northfield, B.C.?"

Her husband is not now living. I would ask an answer to the question.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have given the answer.

Mr. DAVIN. Has her husband been overbearing since he died?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The term "postmaster" is applied to the occupant of the office, whether male or female. In this case the postmaster was Mrs. McManus. Her husband is living. The report of the inspector was to the effect that they had both been overbearing in their demeanour to many persons who had occasion to visit the office.

Well, Sir, I think it would be a matter of great gratification to Mrs. McManus to be assured, on the high authority of my hon. friend, that her husband is living. He died in February last, he was buried three days afterwards, and I have not heard of any resurrection miracle having been performed. I have a letter here from that poor widow that I will read to the House:

Northfield, B.C., 11th March, 1897.

Dear Mr. Davin,—I don't like to trouble you with my misfortunes, but, under the circumstances, I think it right to ask your influence on my behalf. I have been for nearly three years postmistress here, and I believe I have carried out my duties to the entire satisfaction of the department. I was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Haslam, the then member for Nanaimo. I had a great deal of trouble with the unruly element here, and had to prosecute one man for assaulting me in my office, and had him convicted and fined, and the expense of this was borne by me. On the 19th of November my husband, whom you knew at Qu'Appelle, and who was my mail carrier, met with an accident while carrying the mails, from the effects of which he died on the 12th of last month.

That is the 12th of February. She goes on to say:

I do think it is hard for a poor widow who has lost her husband, for the postal service to supersede her in this manner. It reflects little credit on a Liberal or any other government. I have petitioned the Postmaster General for compensation for the loss of my husband.

The petition did not evidently make much impression on my hon. friend, because, up to yesterday, he was under the impression, and made the confident statement, that the man was alive.

You are well aware of the services that my husband rendered in the North-west Territories—

That is, during the rebellion of 1885:

—for which services he received no reward. I need hardly tell you that my husband's long illness and death has left me in very straitened circumstances, and that I feel keenly the way that I have been treated by the Government.

Now, Sir, I knew Mr. McManus when he kept an hotel at Qu'Appelle station. He was a man who had served Her Majesty, who had seen service, who had fought for the Empire; and I will say of him that a more gallant man and a more obliging man did not walk the earth than that same McManus. In 1885 when the flag of rebellion was lifted up in the North-west Territories, he rendered signal service. Sir, I think these are things that a Government should remember, especially a Government whose bosom is swelling with great British enthusiasm, whose bosom is almost incapable of holding the new flood of loyalty that has poured into it. I think it is extraordinary of them to do as they have done. Surely the facts that this man has served his country, has worn Her Majesty's uniform, and has served this Government during the rebellion of 1885, are matters to be considered. But there is another thing to be considered, the fact that this man is dead, and that this poor widow is left without her protector and her provider. I think that mere chivalry—I will not speak of his conduct as unchivalrous—but surely the commonest humanity would have impelled the Minister not to dismiss a poor woman like that who had served the department for three years—not to dismiss her right on the heel of the burial of her husband. Her husband suffered from the accident that he received while doing his duty as an officer of the department, and as a servant of Canada. Here was a servant of Canada, who, after being laid up for months, died, and the duties of this office were performed by his widow, but she was shortly afterwards removed by the Postmaster General, and deprived of the means of living. I say it is a hard case. I know the hon. Postmaster General has some Irish blood in his veins, and if that blood has anything of the kindness, pity and generosity that is supposed to inhere in Irish blood, I hope when he reconsiders what he has done, he will be able to tell the House in a few days that the course he took was inconsiderate, that he was not aware as to what the facts of the case were, and that the bare circumstance that the husband may have been the supporter of Mr. Haslam, and been a good Tory, should not lead him to strike a poor widow. I hope he will be able to assure the House that he will reconsider the matter.

An hon. MEMBER. What was the salary?

Mr. DAVIN. I am afraid it was very small. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). By accident I happen to have in my bag the papers which I brought to the House yesterday in order to answer the hon. gentleman's question, otherwise I would be at the disadvantage of not being able to make an answer except from memory. The hon. gentleman, in his chivalry, omitted to extend the ordinary courtesy of giving a Minister of the Crown notice that he would bring up this matter. I have no knowledge whatever of the circumstances of this case except what appear in the files of the department. I am not aware of the politics either of the lady or her deceased husband. The matter, so far as this department is concerned, is in no respect tainted with politics one way or the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am stating what is true. There was a complaint made in November last by a large number of citizens against the administration of this post office, and this complaint was referred in the ordinary course as a matter of departmental routine, to Inspector Fletcher, who lives in Victoria.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A Conservative.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know his politics. He made a report in November; the answer I gave the hon. gentleman yesterday was a quotation from his report. Whether the husband has since died, I do not know. The report is dated 25th November, 1896. After referring to the conduct of Mrs. McManus as postmaster, and setting forth that the evidence on that ground was not considered sufficient for her removal, the report says :

That there has been considerable ill-feeling between those of the petitioners who gave evidence and the postmaster, is, on the other hand, quite apparent, and I would state that from inquiries made among the people of the place generally, there is a feeling that the postmaster and her assistant, Mr. McManus, her husband, are somewhat overbearing in their conduct towards many people visiting the office; and several instances were brought to my notice, trivial in themselves, where a more judicious treatment might have avoided more or less unpleasantness. This has given rise to the feeling amongst many of the residents of Northfield that a change is desirable. In deference to public opinion, a change was made.

Mr. DAVIN. Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I was rather surprised when the Postmaster General rose to reply to the few remarks I made with reference to the letter of this afflicted woman, fell into what it is not too strong description to say, was a piece of brutal flippancy. It is inexcusable in any Minister of the Crown, but above all it is inexcusable in a gentleman supposed to be a gentleman and a scholar, who is connected with a great university and has the advantages, if he had availed himself of them, of the humanizing influences of education in that university. Can it be doubted for one moment, after hearing the report which the hon. gentleman read, that there was no ground whatever for dismissing this woman. The hon. gentleman's own inspector said that the charges made against her were trivial in themselves, and I expect if we inquired into the matter further, we would find this to be the case, that there was a politician who desired to get rid of this postmaster, and the politician desired to appoint a supporter of the Liberal party; and I will venture to say, and the Postmaster General will not dare to deny it, that a politician in British Columbia recommended the dismissal of this woman and recommended the appointment of D. S. Macdonald. The course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in carrying out the spoils system is bad enough. There has been cruel and tyrannical conduct all over the country, but it caps the climax that a poor widow with her husband's grave still fresh, should be dismissed from her position, and when I bring up the case in this House we should have from a man in the position of the Postmaster General a piece of brutal flippancy.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the Postmaster General will lay on the Table of the House the report from which he has quoted.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot help saying that I think the language used by my hon. friend, although strong, is not one whit too strong. I have heard certain statements made across the floor of the House which were said in a moment of anger or during keen debate that had better not have been said, and for which allowance could be made, but when a Minister in cold blood commences an answer with an insinuation of that kind, if that is a sample of what this side of the House is to be subjected to by Ministers, I think it is well that the House should take notice of it. Now, that report, so far as it was read by my hon. friend, was not a grave report against the postmaster.

Mr. LISTER. What is the insinuation?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. What does my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) say?

Mr. LISTER. I say you said there was an insinuation and I ask you what is it?

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) the keeper of the Postmaster General?

Mr. LISTER. You are talking to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. With his great love for the Postmaster General, he comes to his rescue.

Mr. LISTER. What is the insinuation?

Mr. FOSTER. The insinuation is well known. The insinuation was intended and every man in the House knows it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to impute motives to me. I neither intended nor made any insinuation, and I will not allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to say so.

Mr. FOSTER. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) was very unfortunate in the choice of his language.

Mr. LISTER. You are misinterpreting him, like you always do.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I would like to have a little fair-play from that side of the House, if you can bring them to that pass.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why do you not tell what the insinuation is?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot continue to address the House, Mr. Speaker, unless you keep order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope hon. gentlemen will be good enough not to interrupt an hon.

member who has the floor unless by asking him a question which he is willing to answer.

Mr. LISTER. He has not answered the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. It must be distinctly understood that any hon. gentleman who has the floor has the right to refuse to answer any interruption whatever. He has the right to refuse to answer, or to give an answer, just as he chooses. It is a mere matter of courtesy, and if the hon. gentleman addressing the House does not wish to answer he should not be further interrupted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I presume we have a right to listen or not as we please.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope, Mr. Speaker, to get an opportunity of continuing my remarks. I would not mind if I were not so unused to public speaking in the House, but these interruptions disconcert me. Leaving this incident, which I think I have sufficiently and fairly characterized, I want to ask the attention of the House to what I think is an injustice involved in the dismissal upon the report as it is given even by the official of the department. It appears that in this case, before the woman's husband was dead, there was certain dissatisfaction in the vicinity where this post office is, and that it reached the ears of the Government. As is proper and right, the Government asked for a report from their inspector. The inspector, Mr. Fletcher, visited the locality and made a report. Between that time and this, a great change took place with reference to the condition of the postmistress. At that time her husband was living, but between that and the middle of February her husband died. Now, the post office inspector stated in the report as follows:—

All those who signed the petition were requested to appear and to give evidence under oath. A fair proportion of the witnesses attended, and of these, the evidence of Thos. Webly and Mrs. Margaret Patterson was taken, and is inclosed herewith.

For the postmaster, the evidence of Mr. L. F. Martin and Rev. S. Asquith was taken, and is inclosed herewith. The evidence of the postmaster, Mrs. Isabella Rose McManus, is also inclosed herewith.

The evidence of Mr. Badcock, called by Mr. Cane, was taken. He is not, however, one of the signers of the petition.

Mr. G. F. Cane, barrister, appeared on behalf of the petitioners, Mr. E. M. Yarwood, barrister, on behalf of the postmaster, Mrs. Isabella R. McManus, and Capt. Dillon on behalf of Mr. Robert McManus, the assistant postmaster.

The evidence of Thos. Webly shows some disagreement between the postmaster and Mrs. Webly, as to the origin of certain correspondence addressed to the latter, concerning which the postmaster refused to give any information.

The evidence of Mr. Badcock concerns chiefly his failure to receive certain letter addressed to him at Northfield, which had been reforwarded to East Wellington, where Mr. Badcock resides, although carrying on business at the former place.

That is a matter which might easily take place in the best regulated post offices. Here is a man who resides in the vicinity of this post office and does business in another place, and his letters during his absence were forwarded to him to the place he was carrying on his business.

The evidence of Mrs. Margaret Patterson deals chiefly with an instance of the delivery to her daughter Lizzie of a letter concerning which the postmaster had some doubt as to whether it was intended for the addressee or not, and to the delivery in March last of a letter to John Patterson intended for her husband, John T. Patterson, as well as to the disposal of certain newspapers delivered to her in error.

Mrs. Isabella Rose McManus, postmaster at Northfield, testified, in connection with the statement of Thos. Weby, that an insufficiently pre-paid newspaper, addressed to him, was tendered to Mrs. Weby, with a request for the deficient postage, which she refused to pay.

With regard to Mr. Badcock's evidence, the postmaster states she knew him to be engaged in business at Northfield, although residing in East Wellington, and that, in re-directing his letters to the latter place, she claims to have acted strictly within the meaning of the regulations, and that, as regards Badcock's supposition that she must have opened the East Wellington mail-bag in which to inclose his letters, the postmaster states that a separate bag is made up at Northfield for East Wellington, in which these letters were inclosed; and this is really the case, but the postmaster at East Wellington should have been present to corroborate this.

She explains also—and in my opinion satisfactorily—the circumstances of the delivery of the letter to Lizzie Patterson, and also of the letter for John T. Patterson delivered in mistake to John Patterson.

The "paper with the rules of the post office," referred to by Mrs. Patterson, is a statement that this letter was intended for John T. Patterson, and is signed by him as an acknowledgment of its receipt, and the same is inclosed herewith.

The misdelivery of the paper for Mr. Morgan to Mrs. Patterson is explained from the fact that it was inclosed with hers in the same package, which was not opened by the postmaster, as it should have been, in the first place and the contents distributed, as the postmaster was not aware that the outside wrapper should have been removed.

That is a mistake which might occur in the best regulated post office. The report continues:

There hardly seems to be sufficient ground in the evidence of the petitioners to support the charges of "mismanagement of the office."

And this report is underlined by some person with a pencil, to show that it must have been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General.

That there has been considerable ill-feeling.

Do you see, Mr. Speaker, all that is in one paragraph, and the Postmaster General, in replying to my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), left out the first sentence of the paragraph. The whole paragraph reads as follows:—

There hardly seems to be sufficient grounds in the evidence of the petitioners to support the charges of mismanagement of the office. That there has been considerable ill-feeling between those of the petitioners who gave evidence and the postmaster is, on the other hand, quite apparent, and I would state that from inquiries I have made among the people of the place generally, there is a feeling that the postmaster and her assistant, Mr. McManus, her husband, are somewhat overbearing in their conduct towards many visiting the office, and several instances were brought to my notice, trivial in themselves, where a more judicious treatment might have avoided more or less unpleasantness.

That same remark applies to my hon. friend the Postmaster General. Sometimes he is inclined to be a little overbearing, but we would not dispossess him of his office and his salary just because two or three instances of that kind were cited.

Mr. LISTER. Oh yes, you would.

Mr. FOSTER. Where would all of us be, if that were done? Where would my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce be sometimes if we dispossessed him of all his emoluments because he was a little overbearing at times? Most high-mettled people are inclined sometimes to lose their basis of self-control, and to be perhaps a little overbearing. The report continues:

This gave rise to a feeling amongst many of the residents of Northfield that a change is desirable. On the other hand, the duties of the office are satisfactorily carried out, and more attention is given to detail than is generally found in a country office. I beg, therefore, to submit the result of my investigation for your consideration.

That report of the Postmaster General's inspector is in favour of the postmaster rather than against her, and under that report I think the most that ought to have been done would have been to have cautioned the postmaster as to this fault of character in being overbearing, and to have given this woman the chance to retain the office, more especially under the circumstances. Her husband lost his life in the service, from injuries actually received in the service. That is a mitigating circumstance; but, more than that, the fact that this man took his life in his hands and fought for the flag of his country against rebellion makes at least a prima facie case for some sort of consideration for his widow who is left to earn her own living, partly by carrying on a post office which the inspector says has been satisfactorily carried on, and in which more attention is given to detail than is generally found in a country office. Now, having animadverted, a little harshly perhaps, but still I think justly, upon my hon. friend's conduct, may I now appeal to his good nature, and ask him to reconsider, in the light of this report of his inspector, whether or not under all the circumstances this poor woman might not be given back the office the duties of which she has attended to so well.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I did not intend to take any part in this discussion; but I happen to be acquainted with some of the facts in reference to this lady for whom the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) expresses so much sympathy. It appears that about ten years ago, at the time that hon. gentleman belonged to a temperance lodge out there, the lady in question kept a temperance hotel. My hon. friend was in the habit of going there at times. I myself, I think, have seen him there. Now, the hon. gentleman has said a great deal about the loyalty of Mr. McManus and about what he had done for the flag of his country. I happened to be there at the time, and I know all the circumstances of the case, and what this gentleman did for his country was to sell illicit whiskey.

Mr. BENNETT. Were you a customer?

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I do not know whether my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia got any of it or not. When I first knew this lady, she kept at Qu'Appelle station what they call in the west a dance-house, and not a respectable dance-house at that. I was surprised to hear that any person of that character was keeping a post office in British Columbia or anywhere else.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, this is one of those cases which attract attention, not so much from the action of the Government, if based upon a reasonable report against the party implicated, as from the fact that the dismissal has been made avowedly not on the report of the officer sent to investigate the case, but on ex-parte statements like those of the member who has just spoken. It is quite probable that Mrs. McManus was not dismissed on the report of the inspector; but on the complaints of other people, like the charge of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that at one time she kept a dance-house—a charge which is not substantiated, and in which I am informed by the hon. member for Assiniboia there is not a word of truth. As I say, it is a case which attracts attention not so much on account of the importance of the position, but as throwing a light on the action of the Government in a great many cases of a similar character. Why is it that the Ministers refuse continually in this House to give any information to us as to the reasons why men are dismissed from employment? Why is it that they have dismissed this woman if there are no grounds or complaints apart from the report of the inspector? Why do they commit such an act of injustice as is shown by this report, and then shield themselves behind the report, saying that there is no politics in the matter, although the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down clearly prove that this is not a question of misconduct at all, but wholly one of politics. Where is there an office in this country as to which statements of the same kind as those made in regard to this office cannot be made? Where is there a district in which there are not to be found Grits and Conservatives? And if the votes of the Grits are taken against a Conservative officer, it can easily be said there are many in the district who would like to see the officer dismissed. That is all that this report says. How easy would it be to find people in any district who would like to see a Conservative officer dismissed, whether in a post office, a custom-house or an inland revenue office? How easy would it be, if there were Liberal officers in any of these positions, to get Conservatives in the district who would like to see them dismissed. And this is the ground put forward by the Government for dismissing this poor woman. Now, having, as the hon. member for Western Assiniboia says, some of that Irish blood in my veins which revolts against such an action as this, I deem it my duty to raise my voice in support of those who have spoken in favour of this poor woman, and to ask the Government to reconsider the action that has been taken. I draw the attention particularly to this case of the hon. Solicitor General, who, if he occupies any position in the Government, is there as the representative of the Irish Catholic people of this country. I ask him to take in consideration the case of this poor woman, and to see that justice is done her. He is there as acting Minister of Justice in this House. Let him not occupy the position of acting Minister of injustice. Let him consider this case in a spirit of justice, and I feel sure that the result will be that the Government will reinstate her in the office from which she has been dismissed.

Mr. McINNES. I was not in the House when this question came up, and I do not know exactly how it has come to be discussed. But as the party who has been dismissed was an officer in my district, I think I may make a remark or two on the question. An investigation was asked for into the management of the Northfield Post Office. So far from politics having had anything to do with the matter, as the last speaker has suggested, let me inform him that the parties who made the charges against Mrs. McManus were Conservatives who were among the strongest opponents I had in that district in the last election. An investigation was held and a report made. I have never seen that report. The ex-Minister of Finance seems to be more familiar with it than I am. He has, however, read statements from that report which I think would amply justify the Postmaster General, or any one else in his position, in dismissing the person against whom these charges were made. But whether the report justified the dismissal or not, I know as a matter of fact, and every person within a reasonable distance of that post office knows, that that dismissal was wholly justifiable.

Mr. QUINN. That is the trouble: the members were made the judges.

Mr. McINNES. That is a fact which is incontrovertible. The overbearing character of that late postmistress and her husband caused a condition of unrest among the people with whom they had to deal that was very far from satisfactory. Let me give you an illustration. It may seem almost incredible to hon. gentlemen, but I know it is an absolute fact. People have gone to the office to complain against the conduct of the postmistress in not handing out the mail to them which was in their boxes. Instead of giving them their mail or giving any satisfactory explanations why it was not delivered, she has actually walked up and down behind her wicket with a six-shooter in her fist. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I am not overstating the facts. They have laid stress on the fact that Mr. McManus lost his life while in the service of his country. I know as a fact that he was not engaged in carrying the mail when he met the accident which brought about his death. On the contrary, he was in a condition which coincides very much with the reputation the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. Davis) gave of him when he was cut in the Territories. If he had not been in that condition, that unfortunate man would probably to-day be in the land of the living. As to the dismissal of Mrs. McManus, it took place before the death of her husband. I have got a certain amount of sympathy in my disposition, and if that poor man had died and no dismissal had taken place, I would have strained a point to retain to the postmistress this partial means of livelihood. But the dismissal took place weeks before her husband died, and when, as a matter of fact, he was on a fair way to recovery. Under these circumstances, knowing as I do, the uneasiness and unrest which existed, and, in some cases, the acts of violence which took place in and about that post office, I think the hon. Postmaster General was absolutely justified in making this dismissal, and if the dismissal had not been made, there would have been ample occasion for alarm at his retaining such an official in a Government office.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What seems to strike me as an important feature in this case is that charges having been made and an investigation ordered, the charges were practically dismissed. We have had statements made here in support of the action of the department which indicate the very unfair treatment of which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) very properly complained, because these are statements of a nature which have never been made, much less on oath, in the presence of the late postmistress. The conduct of the Postmaster General must strike every lover of fair-play as very extraordinary indeed. He would not even read the report of the commissioner on the charges, no doubt because he felt it could not justify his action, but he simply gave in his defence some observations made by the commissioner, which are wholly unsupported by the evidence taken. The commissioner does not pretend that he went into any inquiry as to whether this woman was unpopular or overbearing. The charges were serious enough, if proved, but they were wholly disproved, and under the circumstances it seems to me that a very strong case has been made out for reconsideration by the Postmaster General. It is to be hoped that the case of this woman will in no way be prejudiced by the ex parte statements which have been made in this debate. If the hon. gentleman wishes to establish a new rule, that postmasters or postmistresses must not, unless at the peril of their lives, be overbearing—whatever the inspector meant by that particular term—let that be understood and that charge be investigated. Let the inspector take fresh evidence and make a fresh report before condemnation is passed. Moderate men on both sides will agree with me that the Postmaster General, having undertaken to make a thorough inquiry into the matter, should follow that fairly out and not act without evidence. Certainly, so far as the documents go, there is not a tittle of evidence to support the impression which, no doubt, the inspector gathered in that district. We do not know whom he consulted in order to find out whether this woman was overbearing or otherwise, and the hon. Postmaster General ought to be in possession of that information before finally dismissing this postmistress.

Mr. OSLER. I know nothing about this case at all except what I have heard in the House about it. I should feel humiliated, as a member of this House and a citizen of Canada, to think that our politics have come to this condition that a dismissal should take place on the evidence which has been read to us. I will undertake to procure stronger evidence against any postmaster or postmistress in the county of North York than has been presented in this case. I live in the summer time in the county of York, and I know that in every little town there are jealousies and bickerings; and if these are taken notice of and if on evidence as slight as that given in this case, a dismissal is to take place, I say that our civil service is in a condition worse than that of the United States in the worst stage of the American republic. I feel humiliated that any member of the civil service should be dismissed on the evidence presented to us in this case.

Mr. PRIOR. As I have known for a number of years the parties interested in this case, I think I may be allowed to say a word. I may say, in the first place, that it seems to me we have at last found a case of offensive partisanship—not by the poor woman who held the position of postmistress at Wellington but by some parties through whose influence she lost her means of livelihood. I think I can speak in quite an unbiassed manner, because Mr. McManus, the husband of this woman, took a lively interest in myself at all elections by assisting the Opposition members to do their best to keep me out of my seat in the House. But for all that, I know that he was a man among men. He was a fine specimen of manhood. He belonged to the Imperial army for many years and afterwards to the Canadian militia, he had fought and bled for his country, and although he had his faults, that is no more than the majority of us have. But whatever might be the faults of the husband, that had nothing to do with the wife. The husband is dead, let him rest. But judging by the report which the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) read to the House, we must all be convinced that it is certainly from no shortcoming of this poor woman that she had lost her situation. I quite agree with the speakers who have said that all public servants may, at one time or another, appear to be a little overbearing, but surely that is not sufficient to deprive a poor woman of her livelihood, and especially the wife of an old soldier. The hon. member for Vancouver certainly surprised me in unfolding to us the picture of one lone woman holding up a mining camp with a six-shooter. I have lived a number of years in British Columbia, in the vicinity where this post office is situated, and I know pretty well all those miners who live there, and I cannot for a moment believe that there should be a feeling of unrest amongst those stalwart sons of toil because one woman happens to brandish a six-shooter. Surely, Sir, they have not come down to the condition of hon. gentlemen who live in the effete east. We thought they were manly men; but it is evident that one woman has frightened not only the hon. member but all his constituents. But, joking apart, I do sincerely trust that justice will be done in this case. Mr. McManus was no friend of mine, still I am always ready to raise my voice for the assistance of anybody in distress, whether friend or foe, and I am sure that if the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) thinks the matter over, he will let politics go altogether and will see that it is his duty, and I am sure it will be his pleasure to reinstate this poor woman in her situation.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Whatever may have been the motives which induced my hon. friend to dismiss the postmaster, it is quite evident from the discussion that has taken place that politics had nothing to do with it. The speech just delivered by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) makes this still more apparent. We have the fact that the complaints made against the postmaster were not made by the political friends of the present Government, but by the political opponents of the hon. member who represents the riding in this House. This fact is established in the speech of my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes). Now, we have the further statement of my hon. friend from Victoria that the husband of the postmaster was not a Conservative but a Liberal.

Mr. PRIOR. He was a Conservative, but was paid by the Liberal press.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman himself has just said that the dead should be respected. And now he says that this man was paid. That is the way he respects the dead. That is quite in keeping with what we have heard from the other side of the House.

Mr. PRIOR. I say he was paid for letters written—

The PRIME MINISTER. But he was paid—the hon. gentleman says he was paid, and that is the way he respects this man's grave. I will leave that with himself and with the House. I am not going into the inquiry whether he was paid or was not paid. But from all that has taken place up to the present time, what inducements could my hon. friend the Postmaster General have had to bring politics into this matter? The hon. gentleman from Victoria says that this man's character was so low that he accepted money for political purposes.

Mr. PRIOR. No, I did not say so.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend from Vancouver says that this complaint was made, not by Liberals, but by Conservatives. What were the complaints? One was that the postmaster was overbearing in her office. There were some charges besides that, but they were not proven. But what was proven by the report of the inspector, was that the postmaster was overbearing in her dealings with her customers. I do not know whether she used a six-shooter in her dealings with them or not, but the evidence is sufficient without that. We know a little of what takes place in country villages. Whatever may have been the cause, it is evident that the postmaster had made herself objectionable and obnoxious to the people. The office is a trivial one. I have not gone into the case; this is the first intimation I have had of it, and I do not know the particulars. It may be that my hon. friend's (Mr. Mulock's) judgment in the case may have been hasty. I do not say it was. But what I want to call attention to is that whether his judgment was right or wrong, there was nothing to show that he had been influenced by political considerations in this matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to say, on the line of my leader, that if cases of this kind where the facts have been clearly proven, are to be brought up in this House on the allegation that political considerations have influenced the action of the Minister, it will be impossible to go on with the public business. Is no attention to be paid to complaints, which, in this case, were made by opponents of the Government, without charges been made against friends of the Government of partisanship in trying to secure dismissals. I do not believe there is a person in this House listening to this discussion but must have honestly come to the conclusion that the people who asked for the change in this post office were Conservatives, and Conservatives of the clearest stripe. These people were dissatisfied with the management of this post office and asked to have a change made. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) says that this man was a very active opponent of his, an active Liberal who not only talked against the late Government, but being a man who could wield his pen and wrote able articles in condemnation of that Government. It must appear strange to any honest man that charges of political influence in the action of the department should be based upon such a case. I think that when the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) looks at these facts his indignation will seem somewhat amusing to himself. If complaints such as were made in this case, when taken notice of by the department, were always to give rise to charges of political partisanship in the administration, the work of the department could not be carried on at all. I think it is to the injury of all the departments of the civil service that the time of the House should be taken up by such trivial and ridiculous nonsense as we have heard in regard to this case. Who are most to be considered in cases of this kind? Surely the people. Does my hon. friend who brought up this matter say that the friends of his party living in that district are not respectable people, or that when they sent this petition to the Postmaster General they did not wish that petition to be granted? The small revenue derived from this office could not make it an object to any person to receive the appointment. It is perfectly clear that this change was made out of regard to the petition of respectable citizens living in that district, and for no other reason; and I am surprised to hear the hon. member for Toronto, after hearing the discussion here to-day, making the statement he did with regard to the action of the Administration. Every fair-minded man on this side of the House, and

Mr. LAURIER.

Liberals not holding seats in the House, have been anxious that men holding positions in the service should not be interfered with without cause.

Mr. McCLEARY. Beamsville post office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say that, and I say it without fear of contradiction. I say further, that we have reason to complain, from a party standpoint, of the administration of this Government, so anxious have they been to deal in the most liberal manner with the office holders of this country. But it is ridiculous to say that, when a charge of misconduct is brought against an official, the department is to take no notice of it under penalty of being misrepresented by statements such as that of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) that insinuations were made that were never made or intended to be made. I think that fair-minded men on the other side of the House must say that the Postmaster General did perfectly right in listening to the petition of the people who asked them for a change in this post office.

Mr. McCLEARY. While the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) who has just taken his seat may charge that this matter which has been brought before the House is of no consequence, and to him it is of no consequence, but it is of consequence to the widow who has been deprived of that office. The hon. gentleman contends that no question should be raised in the House as to the action of the Postmaster General in dismissing this lady from office because charges had been submitted against her. But he failed to tell us that, though these charges were submitted, none of them were proven. Will he, as a fair-minded man, as a man who has a reputation in his own province for frankness, say that it is fair, honourable or decent for the Postmaster General to dismiss this lady from her position without charges made against her having been proven? But while we are on this question, before the resolution now before the House is voted upon, I have a matter in which the Postmaster General is interested, that I would like to bring before his notice and before the attention of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will be necessary for all hon. gentlemen taking part in this debate to confine themselves to the question which is raised by the hon. member who moved the adjournment, that is to say, the dismissal of the postmaster at Northfield. It is impossible to go into a general discussion of dismissals.

Mr. McCLEARY. I was just going to give an illustration of the way the Postmaster General administers his department. I presumed, being a new member of the House, that I was within my right.

Mr. SPEAKER. The illustration should be very brief, indeed.

Mr. McCLEARY. I am not so sure about the brevity. But if I cannot go on and discuss the question as pertaining to the administration of the Postmaster General's Department, I will sit down and bring it up at another time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman stated that he proposed to go into some specific case under the administration of the department, other than this one. I do not think that would be in order. The hon. gentleman can bring it up at the proper time.

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman lay the evidence of this case before the House?

Mr. LOUNT. I desire to draw attention for a moment to some facts that appear in the report of the investigation, and to show that they do not warrant many of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I apprehend that it is the duty of the Postmaster General to see that every office of this kind is properly conducted, that those who discharge the functions of public offices should do so in a courteous and obliging manner, that their manner should be of such a character that the people who have to resort to their places should be satisfied with the conduct of the civil servants who have to discharge those duties. When charges come before the Postmaster General, or any other member of the Government, in relation to the duties appertaining to their departments and to officials under their charge and when, upon investigation by such member of the Government, by the Postmaster General in this particular case, it is found that the person discharging the duties of the office in question has not been discharging them satisfactorily, or to the benefit of the community, to the satisfaction of the community, then I apprehend it is the duty of the Postmaster General to see that a change is made in that office. Now, hon. gentlemen on the other side have condemned the Postmaster General, and especially is this the case with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) who always, I won't say improperly, but who always flaunts his loyalty, flaunts his great admiration for British institutions, and who on this occasion took opportunity to state to the House that Mr. McManus was dead at the time of the dismissal, and therefore he accused the Postmaster General of acting unfairly towards his widow in discharging her, in view of the fact that her husband had been in the service of the country, and has discharged his duty in that service in an honourable and in a proper manner. Now, according to this report, there was no evidence before the Postmaster General at the time this report came to him—and I suppose that he acted upon the report, and upon nothing else—there was no evidence before him whatever that Mr. McManus was deceased. The evidence before him was to the contrary, the evidence was that Mr. McManus was in the living flesh, that he was represented at the investigation by counsel, and that therefore Mrs. McManus was not then a widow. Now, to sustain what I am saying, and to show that there was great reason for the inquiry, that there was great reason for the action of the Postmaster General, and that the public in that locality were not satisfied, I will read to the House a few extracts from that report which I think will convince the House and will convince the country that the Postmaster General has done his duty, and that all the charges from the other side of the House to the effect that the conduct of the Postmaster General was merciless, was unkind or severe, are without foundation. Let me draw attention to some statements in the report of the investigation:

Mr. G. F. Cane, barrister, appeared on behalf of the petitioners, Mr. E. M. Yarwood, barrister, on behalf of the postmaster, Mrs. Isabella R. McManus, and Capt. Dillon on behalf of Mr. Robert McManus, the assistant postmaster.

There is the evidence of this report that Mr. McManus was in the flesh at the time of the investigation, and therefore Mrs. McManus was not a widow, as the member for West Assiniboia has told the House, and therefore she was not a person for whom sympathy could be claimed on that ground.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sure that my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me. I did not say that at the time the report was made, or the investigation was held, Mr. McManus was dead; I said that he died on the 12th of February, and that so late as the 11th of March, Mrs. McManus was still occupying the office, although she had been notified that she would be dismissed.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. She was dismissed in January.

Mr. LOUNT. The dismissal took place in January. I understand the hon. member for West Assiniboia to say that the dismissal took place before the death of the man. But the facts are plain before the House that the dismissal was not made upon any ground that would give the hon. gentleman reason for saying that the conduct of the Postmaster General was merciless in any respect. I submit that the evidence shows the contrary. I observe that upon occasions like this every opportunity is seized upon by hon. gentlemen opposite to make capital against the Government, and to make it appear to the press and to the country that this Government are acting in a merciless manner, especially in regard to dismissals; therefore, I take this opportunity of saying that so far as my observation has gone, and I have endeavoured to observe the conduct of the Government in this respect, their conduct has been, on all occasions, prudent, wise and courteous, and the charges to the contrary which have been so furiously hurled against the Government, are without foundation. Now, I have drawn attention to the fact that Mr. McManus was living at the time of the investigation and that he was represented by counsel. Let me for a moment—for I do not wish to occupy the time of the House at any length on a matter so insignificant, nor would I have spoken at all except for the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to make political capital out of something that does not exist—let me draw the attention of the House to these charges and to the finding: and if they do not warrant the dismissal, then I am unable to form a proper judgment. Some of the charges were these:

The evidence of Thomas Webley shows some disagreement between the postmaster and Mrs. Webley as to the origin of certain correspondence addressed to the latter, concerning which the postmaster refused to give any information.

There was one charge.

The evidence of Mr. Badcock concerns chiefly his failure to receive certain letters addressed to him at Northfield, which had been reforwarded to East Wellington, where Mr. Badcock resides, although carrying on business at the former place.

There was another specific charge.

The evidence of Mrs. Margaret Patterson deals chiefly with an instance of the delivery to her daughter Lizzie of a letter concerning which the postmaster had some doubt as to whether it was intended for the addressee or not, and to the delivery in March last of a letter to a John Patterson intended for her husband, John T. Patterson, as well as to the disposal of certain newspapers delivered to her in error.

Now, these were some of the charges, and what is the finding?

There hardly seems to be sufficient grounds in the evidence of the petitioners to support the charges of mismanagement of the office.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. LOUNT. Quite true, but there may be reasons why the postmaster should be discharged, apart from the question of mismanagement, if her conduct is, as it is shown to be, overbearing or tyrannical. That would justify the dismissal of a postmaster. Now, let us read further:

That there is considerable ill-feeling between those of the petitioners who gave evidence and the postmaster is, on the other hand, quite apparent.

Showing that the people in that locality who were making the charges and who were to be served, had considerable ill-feeling produced in their breasts by the conduct of the postmistress. Then, again, the report states:

I would state that from inquiries made among the people of the place generally, there is a feeling that the postmaster and her assistant, Mr. McManus, her husband, are somewhat overbearing in their conduct to many people visiting the office, and several instances were brought to my notice, trivial in themselves, where more judiicious treatment might have avoided more or less unpleasantness.

The gist of this, and the ground of the dismissal, and the ground on which it is warranted—and I venture to say every fair-minded member in this House and every fair-minded man in the country will approve it—is that the conduct of both the husband and wife was overbearing towards many visiting the office. I would ask if, in a public office, whether a post office or any other office where civil servants are employed, their conduct is to be allowed to be overbearing? Is such overbearing conduct to be permitted to continue? I will not say that walking around with a weapon behind the post office partition would be a cause for dismissal in the opinion of the hon. member for Assiniboia, whose courage has been shown on all occasions both in the House and out of it, but if the conduct of the postmaster and her assistant was such as to be overbearing, then I venture to say it is a cause for dismissal; and so far as my investigation of the case goes, I thoroughly and cordially support the conduct of the Postmaster General in taking action under such circumstances.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, before taking into consideration the new tariff that has been submitted by the Government for the approval of this House, I will endeavour to pay my addresses shortly to hon. gentlemen opposite who have criticised the tariff, some of whom have shown that they quite misunderstand the intention of the Government, and have expressed doubt as to the result of the application of that clause which provides for closer trade relations with the mother country. My hon. friend from Assinibola (Mr. Davin) and other hon. members stated that they could not understand how that clause could be applied under present conditions in so far as Great Britain is related to other nations. Permit me to say that it is quite evident that if hon. gentlemen opposite do not understand the new tariff and the application of the preferential clause to our trade with Great Britain, some of the constituencies that have been recently appealed to have clearly indicated that they understand it. Winnipeg clearly understands the new tariff. Yesterday it returned a supporter of the Government by over 1,100 majority. Then there was Macdonald. That constituency was represented by a Conservative and supporter of the late Government, and the voters there clearly understand the tariff, for they decided to support the Government by electing the Government candidate by six or seven hundred majority. Then there was Prince County, Prince Edward Island. The people of that county understand fully the application of the tariff to their own condition and to our relations with Great Britain, for they have returned our old friend, Mr. Perry, by a respectable majority.

An hon. MEMBER. With three polls to hear from.

Mr. McMULLEN. These recent elections clearly prove that while hon. gentlemen opposite may not understand the tariff, at least the people in the constituencies understand it, and have expressed their confidence in the Government and in the tariff revision. I also find that a large portion of the press understand it. The "Flag," published in Ottawa, a paper which is somewhat independent, publishes the following in its editorial columns this morning :

Leaving Conservatism alone, leaving Liberalism alone, leaving all questions of party politics alone and looking at it strictly from the national, from the Imperial, from the British-Canadian standpoint, we have nothing but satisfaction to record with the tariff speech of Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, Thursday night, so far as it dealt with British-Canadian interests. It was a great night for Canada, a great night for Great Britain, a great night for Britishers all over the world.

It was the keynote to the first step to an impending rapprochement between all the nations that fly the British flag and honour the Queen as Her Britannic Majesty's subjects. A special, a reduced tariff for Great Britain, and for all countries that meet us in the same way ; and a general tariff on present lines, a general tariff to confront all the rest of the world that keep up the bars against us. That is an intelligible, sensible and strong policy that every man who is British Canadian first and foremost, and partisan afterwards, will hail with sober approval. We do not expect all Conservative readers to take this view. It is not the view of party, it is the view of a patriotism, lifted above party, that is purely national.

That is the utterance of an independent newspaper with rather Conservative leanings, I presume, with regard to that provision of the tariff. And then we have again the following in this morning's "Citizen" :

In the House of Commons to-day, Sir Charles E. H. Vincent, Conservative and Fair Trader, member for the central division of Sheffield, announced he would move the following resolution a month hence :

"The House expresses grateful and fraternal recognition to the Government and people of the Dominion of Canada of the generous fiscal changes in favour of British trade and labour, announced on Thursday by the Parliament of Ottawa, and already in force, and hopes this first step towards a commercial federation of the Empire will be followed by Australasia, South Africa and the other colonies."

The Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, replying, said : The Government cordially appreciated the friendly spirit shown by the tariff action of Canada. "But," he added, "I understand the proposals do not depend upon any alteration of the system of free trade established in the United Kingdom." That is the utterance of a very distinguished Imperial statesman whose name is well known in this House. The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain declares that he highly appreciates the action of this Government in offering better terms to England. The hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) told us that we adopted the policy of the Conservative party. I earnestly hope, Sir, that in the interests of this country, and for the credit of the party which I support, that whatever vestige of Conservative policy there may in the meantime permit to remain in the tariff, we will at least not adopt the tactics which hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted during their career. We recognize that the moment has come when the affairs of this country should be administered in an honest and patriotic manner, and we trust that those lamentable circumstances which all true Canadians were sorry to hear of, will not be associated with names of members of the Liberal Cabinet as they have been associated with the names of members of the late Conservative Cabinet. It is a singular thing that hon. gentlemen opposite will persist in the statement that these tariff resolutions offer no special privileges to Great Britain, in the face of the utterances to the contrary of British statesmen. We know, Sir, that there were read on the floor of this House quotations from the "Times" and from leading English journals, accepting in a spirit of gratitude and recognizing in a spirit of mutual friendliness, the action of Canada with regard to the preferential clause in the tariff.

It is said that this clause is going to give privileges to other countries as well as to England, and the hon. member (Mr. Davin) stated that some twenty-two countries including the colonies, would be enabled to claim the same privileges as England was likely to become heir to. Sir, if there are other countries prepared to give to Canada the same advantages which she enjoys in the markets of Great Britain, we will have no objection whatever to admit their goods on favourable terms. If there is anything that Canada requires more than another, it is an extended market for her products. We know that owing to the unfortunate action of the United States—unfortunate in their own interests as well as in ours—we have been practically shut out of that market. England has of necessity become the great market for the surplus products of Canada, and I do hope that the loyal action of Canada may be the means of giving us preference in that market that we have not enjoyed before. If, before the embargo was placed on our cattle in England, hon. gentlemen opposite had announced a policy showing their desire to give Great Britain an advantage in our market, I have not the slightest doubt that we would be enjoying to-day the privilege of free entry of our cattle into England.

My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) stated that Mr. Laurier had promised free trade as it is in England. Well, Rome was not built in a day, and at the first session of a Parliament it is an utter impossibility for any political party to carry out all the pledges they made with regard to reform. We have an enormous national debt, and of necessity we will have to raise a large revenue each year. For many years Canada will have to levy considerable amount of taxation in order to provide for the demands on the Dominion treasury. The present is the only course we can adopt now, but I do hope that from year to year the debt of the country, and the annual expenditure will be kept from increasing at least, so that the gross amount of taxation on the people will be considerably less than at present. Thus, the way will be open for further tariff reform. I believe that the present Government have made an honest effort to cut down expenditure. I believe that the Postmaster General, who has been subjected to unfair criticism with regard to his course, has made an honest effort to curb the growing expenditure in his department, and I believe he will persist in that direction. The hon. member (Mr. Davin) also told us that this new tariff had more marked evidences of protection than had the old tariff. Sir, it is rather amusing to notice that since the announcement of the tariff, we have any number of deputations waiting on the Government, and the corridors of the House are filled with men urging that if the tariff goes into force in its present shape it will be a serious thing for their institutions. That to me is a positive evidence that there is a reduction in taxation, and that the tariff is not protective as it has been in the past.

It is quite evident that the Government are travelling in the right direction; it is quite evident that some of those institutions have been struck. If they were not, they would not be here appealing to the Finance Minister for some concessions, and the fact that they are here urging the Government to grant them relief, is positive evidence that the changes in the tariff are in the direction of giving to the people of this country the commodities they use at considerably lower prices.

Mr. DAVIN. Did not similar deputations come to Mr. Foster?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, similar deputations did come to Mr. Foster; but the difference is that those that waited on Mr. Foster, as a rule, got everything they wanted, and were protected up to the hilt, while those that have waited on Mr. Fielding and presented arguments in that direction, have not. I am inclined to think, gone away as well satisfied as they were before. When hon. gentlemen opposite conducted a protective tariff, we know that they opened their ears to the manufacturers, and were willing to carry out their suggestions. We on this side of the House have no ill-feeling towards, and no disposition to interfere seriously with, any manufacturing institution that can hope to live. We want them to live; but the unfortunate fact is that in the past they have not only lived, but have heaped up enormous fortunes under the advantages which were given to them by the previous Government.

The hon. member for Western Assinibolia said that when a government came into power they should carry out the promises they made in Opposition; that after appealing to the people, they should carry out the promises they made to them. Well, an honest effort is being made by the Government to do that. But a man who supported the late Government, as the hon. member for Western Assinibolia did, can hardly claim that they made an honest attempt to carry out their promises. We know that in 1891 they went to the country promising to seek for reciprocity with the United States; that was their cry; and after the election was over, they sent a sham deputation to Washington; but we know that they made no honest effort to carry out that pledge. We know that the people were virtually humbugged. Therefore, such an insinuation comes with very bad grace from any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House.

The ex-Minister of Finance stated that this tariff was exactly the tariff of the past—that there was no difference. Well, when we come to look over the different changes, we find that there is a very considerable difference. The farmers are to have free corn for feeding purposes; after a year they are to have free binder twine; after a year they are to have free barbed-wire fencing; they have certain reduction in coal oil and improved facilities for handling that commodity. All these show that there are considerable reductions in the tariff.

The hon. member for Western Assinibolia eulogizes the bounty system. So far as I am concerned, I have expressed the opinion in this House on previous occasions that if there is any industry in this country which it is thought desirable, from a Dominion standpoint, to encourage, it should be done by the bounty system. In that way you make all the inhabitants of the Dominion pay their proportionate share towards the development of the industry. Thus, the hon. member for Assinibolia, if he wears a silk hat and pays a duty upon it, will contribute a part of that duty towards helping to develop iron. But where you impose a tax on the users of iron, in order to shut out competition, and to develop the industry in that way, it is the users of iron alone who pay for the development, and those who do not use iron do not pay anything. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the bounty system is the proper system if we are going to contribute towards the development of any industry.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Then the hon. gentleman talked about a customs star-chamber. I was surprised to hear his remarks on that point. We had a customs star-chamber in this country for years. We know that by the regulations of the Customs Department in past years the Minister of Customs reserved the right to go back and examine the importations of any importer for months—to go over his books and impose an additional duty if he thought fit. Even when the goods had been sold and used, and there was no possibility of the importer reaching the parties to whom he had sold them, the Minister of Customs claimed the right to make a thorough and exhaustive investigation into the affairs of the wholesale man for months and years back. I would like to know what my hon. friend would call that. Would he not call that a star-chamber? But I am glad to know that the present tariff makes an improvement in that respect. Years ago we offered hon. gentlemen opposite the opportunity to establish the same system. We know that the hon. gentleman who now occupies the Speaker's chair proposed that power should be given to the Government to take off the duty from any article that was the subject of combination, in order to prevent combinations being formed in restraint of trade, and people being imposed upon and charged high prices for goods.

The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) said that this tariff was a policy that faced both ways. Well, that may be true; in a sense it does. It faces, first to the general interests of the people of Canada, and, in the next place, it faces towards closer and better trade relations with the motherland. We quite admit that it faces two ways, in the interests of the mother country as well as in the interest of our own country.

Now, I want to make a comparison between this tariff and the tariff that was in existence in the time of Mr. Mackenzie. At the time hon. gentlemen opposite came into power they declared that in the tariff of Mr. Mackenzie there was no protection, that the industries of this country were languishing, that we required a tariff that would protect those industries and make them prosperous. They declare that this tariff is full of protection clauses—that it is protective from top to bottom. Here is a comparison, as to the rates of duty on a number of articles, between the Mackenzie tariff and the Fielding tariff:

When you look over the list of articles I have read and compared the tariff collected during Mr. Mackenzie's regime with the tariff now imposed, and take into consideration the fact that the expenditure of the country is about one-third more, I think that the tariff of the present Finance Minister bears a very close resemblance to that which was in existence when Mr. Mackenzie was in office. So that when hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is protection from top to bottom, I consider this a very strong answer to that charge.

It is said that the Reform party promised that its policy would be death to protection. Well, Mr. Speaker, we intend to carry out that policy so far as the monopolies of this country are concerned. Monopolies will be absolutely forbidden to exist under the regime of the present Government. We do not want, by the simple passage of a law, to permit a certain number of favoured individuals to draw heavily on the resources of the people and put money into their own pockets. We are willing that any home industry should have what advantages a revenue tariff will afford it, but those specific duties, levied for the purpose of enabling favoured individuals to manufacture their commodities and draw from the people excessive taxes, are repealed, and such advantages are being rapidly brought to a close. It was not desirable, in the interests of the people, that such a condition of things should continue. A revenue tariff is the only sound tariff. When we had a protective tariff, our Finance Minister was entirely at the mercy of those who were ready with arguments in the interests of the different institutions they represented. I should like to know in what position the ex-Finance Minister found himself when parties came to him to urge increased taxation. I should like to know how possibly the ex-Finance Minister, when parties came to him asking for increased taxation, could judge whether what they were asking was reasonable or excessive. He could not possibly know anything about it. It would require an expert in the business of every party seeking protection to decide whether the increased protection sought for was too large or the reverse. And if the Finance Minister was not an expert, he could not possibly be in a position to decide that important point himself. Therefore I contend that a revenue tariff is the only safe, sound and honest means of levying a customs tax in any country. The moment you depart from that, the moment you open your ear to the remonstrances and persistent demands and importunities of the men who advocate increased taxation in their own interests, that moment you run the serious risk of imposing an enormously increased taxation on the people, not for the people's good, but for the benefit of those who are interested in securing an advance in the tariff. A revenue tariff is the only safe, prudent and honest system.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Levying taxes in Her Majesty's name and not for Her Majesty's purposes is a dishonest method of taxation, to which the people should not be asked to submit. The difference between the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite and the tariff we have now in force is simply this. They made protection the leading feature of their policy. To protect every institution was their first object, and the question whether the tax imposed was sufficient to meet the demands on the Dominion treasury or not was only a secondary consideration. We have reversed that order. The tariff now levied is levied from the standpoint of honestly collecting the sum necessary to meet the demands on the Dominion treasury, and any institution that can get any little incidental advantage out of a tariff of that kind is quite welcome to it. But we deny that it is proper to tax the people because some institutions want to benefit thereby.

The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) last night gave us a little exhibition in the style of Mark Twain. The hon. gentleman seems to occupy a somewhat similar position in this House to that filled by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The latter hon. gentleman occasionally affords us considerable amusement, but I must say that the returning officer who gave that one casting vote which put the hon. gentleman in his seat, who has wasted so much of our time, has a great deal to answer for. The hon. member for Toronto is evidently training to take the place of the hon. member for Assiniboia and he gave us some little amusement last night. He said that we had stolen the clothes of the Conservative party. I deny that, Mr. Speaker. We never at any time wanted to clothe ourselves in the filthy rags of protection. We have always opposed the system, and we intend to oppose it, on principle, to the end.

Now, the hon. ex-Finance Minister said that the Slogan cry was "Death to Protection." If he will just alter that to "Death to monopoly," we will admit the truth of the statement. We intend to do away with monopolies; and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot but admit that monopolies do exist in this country. I believe that the Reform party will carry out every pledge they have made. But it is impossible to do all in one session of Parliament. I think the step they have already taken in the direction of relieving the people of excessive taxation and of reforming the tariff is a guarantee that from time to time, as necessity arises, further steps will be taken and the tariff so revised as to reduce the prices of commodities which the people require. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite declare themselves apprehensive of the effect of the new tariff upon the country, and claim that it was a mistake on the part of the people to change from the policy which has been in existence for the last eighteen years. When we look at the record, what do we find the National Policy to have done? It was to have brought in population. Has it done so? We deny that it has fulfilled that promise, but claim that it has been the means, to some extent, of driving out population. The National Policy was to have brought back our people from the United States. If you take up the speeches that were delivered in 1877, before hon. gentlemen opposite appealed to the country to support their protective policy, you will find that they indulged in glowing promises as to the results of the National Policy, and one of these results was to have been the bringing back of our people from the United States. But we find from the record that more people went to the United States from 1878 down to the present time than ever before. The National Policy was to populate our North-west. Has it done that? Every man admits, as a matter of great regret, that we have not been able to send more people into the North-west than we have done. It was to develop our mineral resources. I am glad to see the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in his place. We can well remember when he introduced his iron duties in this House. He told us in glowing terms what would be the result of vitalizing the great iron industry in Canada. He declared that our iron resources were equal to those of any other part of the world. I believe they are. He declared that as a result of the increase of the duty on iron our great iron deposits would be developed, that our population would be increased by 200,000 and that we would have blast furnaces all along our frontier. We were to have them at Kingston, Weller's Bay, Cobourg, Toronto, and several other places from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The people bore the tax imposed by the increase of the duty on iron, and it was a tax that bore very heavily upon the farmers. But did the country realize the advantages promised? No; the duties utterly failed to develop the iron industry. Where are the blast furnaces promised? One has been erected at Hamilton, but that is the only one brought into existence by the duties, I believe, in the whole Dominion. The National Policy was to have given us a home market. The people of this country have sent out more products per head, year by year, since the adoption of the National Policy than before. The National Policy was to have secured reciprocity. That was the great thing that we were to have as the result of this protective system. But, after eighteen years, we find we are further off—no, we are not, but we were, before the 23rd of June last, further off—from reciprocity than ever before. I hope that we may, under the management of the present Government secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States. This every one will admit will be a great advantage to us.

The ex-Finance Minister, in his first budget speech in 1889, intimated to the House, after reviewing the expenditure that Canada had made in national improvements and public works, that he thought our debt had reached its highest point, and that from that time it would begin to diminish and the annual expenditure to go down. But we find that instead of this prediction being carried out, our debt has increased every year, as the figures will show:

Year.	Increase of Debt.
1890.....	$ 3,170
1891.....	275,000
1892.....	3,322,403
1893.....	549,605
1894.....	4,501,989
1895.....	6,891,897
1896.....	5,422,505
	$20,967,391

This is the increase that has taken place in the face of the prediction of the ex-Finance Minister. It represents an average annual increase of $2,995,000, or, in round numbers, $3,000,000 a year.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) made some remarks with regard to the Bill abolishing superannuations, and said that it did not abolish superannuations. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman—he says he is willing to support the Bill—if he is ready to bring in a Bill that would go any further than the Bill that has just been introduced? It would be a violation of justice to those who are now on the superannuation list to deprive them of the annuities they are to receive as long as they live. If such an act were perpetrated, I think the people affected would have a plea with which they could go before the Exchequer Court and demand, and no doubt, receive redress. In the same way it would be unjust to deprive those of superannuation who had served ten years. But the Bill is made to apply as far as it can apply. The intention is that superannuations should be abolished as far as it is possible to abolish them. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the action of the Conservative press with regard to the course of the Government in superannuating the few that have been put on the list since the Liberal party came into power. These newspapers say that the Act has been abused. The Act has not been abused, but has been administered in every instance honestly. Not a single man has been placed on the list who was given more than he was entitled to. Not a year was added to the term of service of any man put upon the superannuation list.

I desire to draw the attention of the House to some of the things which, in my humble opinion, are of advantage under the present tariff. In the first place, specific duties are largely abandoned. There is no kind of duty that is so objectionable as a specific duty. Undoubtedly, under their operation, the people cannot realize the enormous duties they pay. I am glad that the thin edge of the wedge has been introduced, absolutely abolishing specific duties, and I hope that the Government will keep on on that line until every item and vestige of specific duties is eventually wiped out. The free list has been increased by adding corn and binding twine, which is also a step in the right direction. The restrictions surrounding the sale of coal oil are also going to be removed, and facilities are to be offered for the purpose of distributing it without surrounding it with those restrictions to which it has heretofore been subjected. Then fence wire will also be in the free list, and this, no doubt, will be of great advantage to our farmers in the North-west, and to our farmers in other parts of the Dominion. It will undoubtedly be a decided advantage. Then, again, we are enjoying a very large and desirable development in our mineral wealth, and mining machinery to be used for that purpose, is to be admitted in order to facilitate the development of our mineral resources. Then we are to have cheaper iron. I am sure there is not a user of iron in Canada, including all our farmers, but will appreciate the reduction that has been made on iron. That is a desirable move, and I hope the Government will move still further in the same direction. The question of the bounty on iron I shall not refer to, as I have already sufficiently done so. Then, again, the taxation is increased on tobacco, spirits and cigarettes. I do not think there is an individual in this country, unless those who are personally interested in these articles, who will challenge the prudence of the Government in having added to the taxation under these heads, thus bringing a large amount into the Dominion treasury from the increased taxation on these items. Now, Sir, in my humble opinion, the important feature in connection with this whole tariff is the offer, and the inducement, and the advantage, held out to the mother country in the direction of receiving her goods at a lower rate than we will receive the goods of other nations. I think that move will bring in a new era. I believe, Sir, that from the present time the future of Canada is assured. I believe that on the morning of the 24th of June a new condition of things dawned upon this Dominion. The sun rose that day on a condition of things that I believe will eventually secure that measure of prosperity that is so necessary to the future development of this country. I believe that wealth and population will increase, I believe that our farmers will take courage and be in better heart; I believe that our North-west will fill up rapidly with a thriving, active and industrious population. I believe that our mining interests will develop rapidly; I believe that an impetus will be given to a great many industries throughout our Dominion: I believe that under the management, the prudent management, the careful management, the statesmanlike management of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches, a brighter era has opened for Canada. I believe that the people in Canada are realizing that they are beginning to cultivate confidence, they are beginning to act more hopefully. They believe that upright men now occupy the Treasury benches of this Dominion, who are endeavouring to conduct its affairs honestly. I am not for a moment intimating that Conservatives as a whole are dishonest; I am glad to say that there are honourable, upright and patriotic men, no doubt, in the Conservative ranks, just as there are in ours. But I must say this, that if they had rid their skirts of men who were dishonest, of men who showed a disposition to do what was wrong; if they had purged themselves of those men who were willing to live by dishonesty, and those men that lent their countenance to dishonesty and winked at such transactions as the Curran Bridge, the Tay Canal, the Langevin Block, the graving dock scandal—if they had done that their chances with the people of this country on the 23rd of June last, would have been much better than they were. Now, the hon. ex-Finance Minister has evidently sat in his seat with a great deal of uneasiness since this House met. He feels, no doubt along with others, that he is in the cold shades of Opposition. Well, hon. gentlemen on that side of the House had better make up their minds that the country is going to ask them to stay where they are for a considerable time. I think the evidence afforded by several constituencies recently clearly show that the country is going to give a fair and impartial trial to the present Government, it is going to give them a fair opportunity of handling the affairs of this country. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am personally concerned, I shall support this Government just as long as they do what is right; but I will say this to them, that if they allow themselves to be dragged into the mire of disgrace by Curran Bridges, by Tay Canals, by Langevin Blocks, and such things, I shall claim the right to separate from this Government, or from any other Government that is found guilty of those things. If hon. gentlemen opposite had taken that course, their prospects before the people of this country would have been much better on the 23rd of June last than they were in fact. I said the ex-Finance Minister did not appear to be comfortable in his seat. Well, I earnestly hope that he will peaceably and submissively accept the decision of the people of this Dominion, and I hope that he will endeavour prudently and properly to discharge his duty as one of the prominent leaders of the Opposition for a number of years to come—I do not know how long. But let me say this, I believe that if the Hon. Wilfred Laurier continues to conduct the affairs of this country in the manner he has done from the moment he was sworn into office until the present time, if he continues to gain upon the confidence and good-will of the people of this Dominion in the same way in which he has from the 23rd of June up to the present time, the prospects of hon. gentlemen opposite coming back to power are very slim indeed. I hope that he will do that. I hope that the people of Canada will appreciate the honest efforts he is making in their behalf; and that not only the people of Canada, but the people throughout the British Empire, will recognize in him a statesman, a noble man, a man who is determined to serve this country to the best of his power, and the interests of the people who have placed him in the distinguished position he occupies. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made these remarks, feeling it my duty, as a humble representative of a rural constituency, to express my appreciation of the honest efforts the Government have made in constructing this tariff. I am sure that among the people of the Dominion generally the policy of the Government will meet with the same approval that was given it in several constituencies yesterday. Let me say also that should my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in the course of events, be asked to appear again before the electors of that constituency, unless he makes up his mind to declare himself an out-and-out supporter of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, I have no doubt that we shall lose his musical voice in this Chamber. Sir, I do not for a moment fancy that he will do that, and it is very doubtful if he comes back again. He has furnished a good deal of amusement to the House, in times past, and if we have to bid him adieu, we can do so with a kind regard for the manner in which he has endeavoured to discharge his duties, and with a hope that whatever sphere of life he may be called upon to fill, he may prove successful.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 58) respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.—(Mr. Domville.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on this question which has engaged our attention for the last few days, I desire to do so very briefly, and to point out a few facts in connection with it that I think should receive our attention. But before going into the subject proper, I wish to say, in replying to some of the observations made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), whom I regret is not in his place, that if he had been thoughtful or considered for a moment what he was saying, he would scarcely have used the language which he did. He said: It is quite clear that the elections of Winnipeg, of Macdonald and of Prince County, Prince Edward Island, understand it—speaking of the tariff—because they have returned members to support this Government. I take the members for Winnipeg and Macdonald. Hon. gentlemen who were in the House for some years past must remember the petitions that came here from time to time on behalf of the people of that distant country. What were their requests made from the Government, and how far have those requests been granted? For if they have not been granted, it would scarcely justify a verdict in favour of the plea that the Government carried the elections on the basis of the tariff. I jotted down on the spur of the moment a few of the demands they made, and which from time to time they have urged to be granted. They demanded better freight rates. Has the Government given better freight rates by the tariff? It does not touch the question at all; it is not natural that it should do so, and the Government has in no way dealt with the question since they came into power, and therefore freight rates remain the same. They demanded the removal of duties on agricultural implements, as being one of the necessities of life in that agricultural country. But the tariff does not reduce the duty; it allows them to remain as under the old tariff, and therefore there is no concession in the interest of Manitoba and the North-west in that direction. It is true that the hon. member for North Wellington, speaking of the general tariff, pointed out that reductions would be made under the favoured-nation clause, that the duties on English goods would have an advantage of one-eighth the first year and another eighth the second year, or altogether one-fourth. But how will this benefit the North-west? They do not bring in agricultural implements from England, which is the only country that will benefit under the favoured-nation clause. Then they demanded the duty on barbed wire to be taken off. They have received a slight advantage in that direction and abolition of the balance of the duty on the 1st of January, 1898. They also demanded the removal of the duty on binding twine. There is a reduction for the present year and there will be a greater reduction next year. They demanded the removal of the duty on coal oil. The duty has been reduced one cent per gallon. On these three lines the Government have partially met the request of the people of the North-west, but only on these lines, and they must be considered as of minor importance compared with the balance of the tariff. The people of the North-west also wanted cheaper cotton. But the duties on those articles have been raised. It is true we may get cheaper cottons from England by and by, but at the present time the duties must be considered as having been increased. Further, they wanted the duties removed from dressed and undressed lumber. No change has been made under the tariff, as under the favoured-nation clause England will be unable to take advantage in this respect. Considering these facts, it is unreasonable to say that the people of Manitoba and the North-west are satisfied with the tariff? It cannot be so, and we must look for another reason why candidates have been elected to support the present Government. I consider the decision of the electors was largely given on account of the settlement of the school question, because the people of that country were very greatly interested in that question and are not entirely dissatisfied, although they complain, of the settlement effected. The hon. gentleman should go over the subject again, and reconsider the reasons he has put forward.

The hon. gentleman said that industries of the country had been struck by the tariff. No doubt such is the case, or there would not be deputations here asking for items to be reconsidered. The tariff has injured several interests so as to compel manufacturers to close their doors. I have here a Montreal paper which mentions several establishments that have been closed. Here is a sample :

But if the cotton men look with uncertainty to the future, it is still worse with the wire industry. The Dominion Wire Company, whose works are at Lachine, closed down the barb-wire department on Saturday afternoon, and the key will be turned in the other branches of business as soon as the company have worked off what raw material they had in hand. In fact, the darkest view of the case was taken in the office of the company on Saturday afternoon. They state that at their Lachine works 250 hands will be thrown out of employment, and a great many of these men have been with the company since they started operations. It will be most gratifying to the tariff reformers, that not only will the twelve barb-wire factories be closed down, but that even as early as Saturday a representative of the Consolidated Steel Company, of Pittsburg, was in Montreal, prepared to gobble up the trade that Hon. Mr. Fielding had so proudly placed within their grasp.

There is no wonder that manufacturing industries were struck by the tariff. They were, however, struck in the wrong way, in such a manner as to take employment from our people and from our wage-earners, to whom it should be the duty of the Government to give all employment possible.

The hon. member for North Wellington said the bounty system is the proper system to compensate iron manufacturers. Only a year or two ago that hon. gentleman strongly condemned the bounty system when the late Government introduced provisions for the granting of bounties in connection with the manufacture of iron, but now he declares that this is the proper system. What was wrong two years ago cannot be right to-day. The hon. gentleman must either have a bad memory, or he must be very inconsistent. If it was an evil then, I am sure it is an evil at the present time.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that the proper way to collect duties is by a revenue tariff. The claim is made that this is a revenue tariff, and that the distinction between this tariff and the old tariff is that the protectionist feature has been abolished. I take issue with my hon. friend on those grounds. I hold that the proper principle on which to frame a tariff is not on the revenue principle. Why do I say so? Because it means that when a revenue tariff is established taxes must be placed on necessities of life that come in from other countries and which cannot be raised or manufactured here. Why; because, if they cannot be made or raised, and are consumed and imported, there is a duty paid on them, and that duty means revenue. Sir, that will result in what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did when he was in power in 1874, namely, the placing of a duty on tea, on coffee, on rice, and upon these lines that cannot be made or raised in Canada. That is a revenue tariff, but it is not raising a revenue tariff to put a duty upon goods that can be produced in Canada. Such a duty is put on for protective purposes so as to shut out foreigners and to give Canadian manufacturers and Canadian labourers employment at home. Therefore, the tariff now proposed cannot fairly be claimed to be a revenue tariff. So far as the first features of it are concerned, it is as protective as was the late tariff, and when hon. gentlemen opposite say that their new tariff is the proper system upon which to raise a revenue, they either do not understand the principle of a revenue tariff, or else they do not understand the principle of protection.

I hold that the proper principle upon which to raise our revenue is to raise it upon the lines of goods that can be made and produced in Canada, for if we make these goods and raise these goods, then we do not require to bring them from abroad. But, sometimes outsiders will send their goods in here when they find it a better market than the market at home, and so they are obliged to pay duty on them, and that duty makes up our revenue. That is the difference between a revenue and a protective tariff. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) said, that every particle of protection was taken out of the tariff, but he ought to know that protection is not removed by any means through lowering the duty 1 or 2 per cent. Protection applies, rather to the class of goods a duty is levied on than to the rate of duty charged in the tariff.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, deal with the financial statement for a minute both as regards the future and as regards the past. The Finance Minister told us, that in the year 1895-96 we raised, in round numbers, $36,618,000 from our tariff and other sources of revenue, and that we spent $36,949,000; that in 1896-97 we raised,—or will when the year has closed—we will raise, according to his calculation, $37,300,000, and we will spend $37,850,000. Therefore, for the first year these hon. gentlemen are in power, they have increased the expenditure, and for the second year of their regime they propose to raise $37,500,000 and to spend $38,250,000. Let me direct the attention of the House to this condition of things. Before these hon. gentlemen obtained power, they told the people that they were too heavily taxed, that our public expenditure was too heavy, and that if they were given the task of governing the country they would reduce, through economy, the expenditure by at least three or four million dollars. Such statements were made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen). Now, Sir, did the people of the country believe these statements? If they believed them and returned the Reform party to power to make retrenchments, then the people were sadly deceived because the Liberals have not reduced the expenditure, and they do not propose to reduce it. The hon. Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us a few nights ago, that in the very nature of things it could not be expected that the expenditure would be very much reduced, and that for some years it would be in the neighbourhood of from $38,000,000 to $40,000,000 a year. Sir, the people have been promised economy by this Government, and they must be disappointed now when they find that there is to be no decrease in the taxation.

On the other hand, the Liberals before they attained power, claimed that we were raising more money from the people than we should raise to carry on the affairs of the country. Well, Sir, these hon. gentlemen have had an opportunity of showing their hand, and instead of decreasing the amount raised from the people, they propose to increase it, and to spend as much as their predecessors in office did, or in fact a little more. There are two things in connection with this which attracts our attention. First, these hon. gentlemen when in Opposition, either believed that they were right or they believed that they were wrong. If they were as intelligent as men who aspire to govern a country ought to be, they should know what the necessities of the country were, and if they believed that this economy could be made and they have not made it, then they misled the people for they have not carried out their pledges, and they are unworthy of public confidence. Will they state now, that they did know it but tried to deceive the people; or will they say, that they had not intelligence enough to know it, and they find now they were mistaken. In either case they merit the loss of the confidence of the people. Another point in connection with this matter is: The Government came to power pledged to economy, but they have not exercised that economy, or else their judgment was bad; because the expenditure under their rule is as large or larger, than it was under Conservative rule. They came to power declaring, that they would reduce taxation; but as I have shown, they propose to raise as much as their predecessors did, and consequently they cannot reduce the taxes of the people. They told us, that tariff reform was to bring about reduced taxation and destroy the protective principle. Now, the tariff reform which they have made has not destroyed the protective principle, because practically the protective principle is in the new general tariff which we must have in operation for some time. They came to power declaring that they would relieve the farmer of the onerous duties he was obliged to pay on the commodities he uses, but they have not reduced the duties on farm implements, and therefore the farmers of Canada must lose confidence in their pledges. They told us, that they were to relieve the manufacturer by giving him his raw material free, such as coal and iron. Well, the duty on coal is the same as it was before, and although they have partly reduced the duty on iron, it is not free iron by any means. Therefore, these gentlemen opposite have not kept their word in that respect. It is true they have done something for the miners of the country, and for that I commend them. They allow miners to bring in their machinery free, but in proportion as that machinery is brought in free, they strike the Canadian manufacturers; and I think the home manufacturers should have some consideration.

I come now to an analysis of the tariff that is presented to us. We have practically two tariffs in the Budget; the first which comes under schedule "A" and the second which comes under schedule "D." The first is the general tariff, and I shall refer presently to what the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) said that tariff is to be. Last night the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) read the declaration of the principles of the Liberal party when they would come into power, and I shall beg leave to refer to it briefly. Here is what they said they would do:

We, the Liberal party in Canada in convention assembled, declare that the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now upon protective principles, but upon the requirements of the country.

They say in their platform, that it should not be based upon protective principles, but the Finance Minister told us that the new tariff is largely on the principle of the old tariff, and therefore it cannot be other than protective in its principles. They told us :

That the existing tariff is, founded upon an unsound principle—

The unsound principle in the old tariff was protection, and yet the Finance Minister tells us that the old tariff is largely the one which this Government has adopted. It was on an unsound principle before, but they have not changed that principle ; therefore, they have not kept faith with the country. Then, it says, that this tariff, based on this unsound principle, has produced these evils :

It has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations ;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property ;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few ;

It has checked immigration ;

It has caused great loss of population ;

It has impeded commerce ;

It has discriminated against Great Britain ;

All of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

And yet, notwithstanding all these evils here enumerated, the Minister declares that the tariff is very much as it was before in the first schedule, which is the principal one and the one under which we will operate for some time to come.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote free trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

If they have based their new tariff, and according to the hon. Minister's declaration they have, upon exactly the same principle, then it must fail to bring relief to the people of Canada, according to his argument.

Now, I have a word to say on what the hon. Minister is pleased to call the general tariff, because we have practically two tariffs. In my judgment it deviates very slightly from the old protective tariff, and so far as it keeps close to that line, I confess I admire it, and have not much complaint to make with it. The changes they have made are in my opinion in the wrong direction, though they will not much disturb the business of the country. But in all the glamour with which this general tariff has gone out to the world, many people have lost sight of the other part, which gives special privileges to other countries. I candidly believe that as time advances, and the operation of that tariff becomes better known, you will hear a very widespread complaint against it. Now, we have the tariff of to-day, which is a protective tariff. The hon. gentlemen were to do away with protection. The hon. Finance Minister admits that himself. He says in his own speech :

But with the exception of these articles to which I shall refer as I proceed, I have to tell the House that it is not the intention of the Government—speaking of the question generally, and not with reference to any particular article—to propose any great reduction in the tariff as applied to those countries which are not disposed to trade with us. We propose, therefore, to have a general tariff, and that general tariff will be, to a large extent, the tariff of to-day.

Then, I say, it is a protective tariff, and to that extent I admire it and have very little complaint to make of it. But the hon. gentleman says they are fulfilling their pledges. Is that a fact ? What did the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) say in my constituency in 1896. He said :

I stand by the declaration I have made, that protection is nothing more nor less than deliberate, legalized and organized robbery, and, more than that, if you do not stamp it out, it is the very high road to political slavery first, and industrial slavery afterward.

What did he say at Chatham ? He said :

That is very largely due to a most vicious system of legislation, under which the whole fiscal system of Canada has become an instrument of legalized robbery on a scale and to an extent absolutely unprecedented in the history of any other country so young as our own.

He said further :

Our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption. Sir, we strike, and we will strike, for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation ; and I tell the hon. gentleman that we will not rest until the slavery that they have imposed upon us has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are as free as Canadians ought to be free to make the most they can of the opportunities God has given them.

Yet the hon. Minister of Finance tells us it is the same tariff, with the exception of a few changes to do away with some of its enormities. Then the hon. member for South Oxford, speaking of the taxation of the people, said :

We pay 31 or 32 million dollars of taxes every year into the Treasury, and we are really taxed to the tune of 50 or 60 millions a year, counting what we pay to the legalized robbers, whose hands are never out of our pockets at your down-sitting or your up-rising, whether you eat, or drink, or work, or play, or sleep, or fall sick even.

He says, put us into power and we will change it all ; and yet the Finance Minister says that the tariff under which we are going to operate is largely the tariff of to-day. What will the country say about the hon. member for South Oxford? They will say that he was either wrong then or is wrong now, that he was dishonest either then or now, that he either misled the people or was misled himself, and did not know what the necessities of the country were; because now that he is charged with responsibilities of Government, he finds that he cannot carry out his promises. If that tariff was taking $60,000,000 out of the people before, it will do it again. I say that so far as the general tariff is concerned, the people of the country were misled, and they have a right to call the hon. gentleman to account for it.

The hon. member for North Wellington said this afternoon that the system by which the duties are levied is wrong: it should be the ad valorem system instead of the specific. I confess that my examination of this subject leads me to the conclusion that there are strong arguments in favour of the ad valorem system, and perhaps equally strong arguments in favour of the specific system. It is much easier and occasions less difficulty to the importer to collect the duties on the specific principle than on the ad valorem system, because everybody knows exactly what the amount of the duty is, and it is not necessary to keep an army of men to ascertain the values of the goods where made. But the hon. member for North Wellington advocates the ad valorem principle because he says it takes less money from the people. As an illustration of the working of the ad valorem principle, I find that a student of a medical college in Montreal the other day sent abroad for a book that he wanted. What is the taxation on that book on the ad valorem principle? $1.30. What was it on the old principle? Thirty-six cents. How has the ad valorem principle improved that man's finances or taken less money out of his pocket? If that was the purpose of the ad valorem principle, it has proved a failure in this instance. This is an illustration of what the ad valorem principle may do when improperly applied, and what the specific principle may do when properly applied. Now, the hon. Finance Minister said, and the statement was repeated by his friends, that our classification of goods was wrong and that in the new tariff there was an improvement in that respect. Well, the classification in this tariff is not materially different from that of the late tariff. If the late tariff classification was wrong, why did not hon. gentlemen opposite change it, and in not changing it they fail to come up to the expectations of their supporters.

There is another feature of this tariff to which I shall for a moment call attention. There are one or two articles which hon. gentlemen opposite have not touched and which, judging by the explanations they have made, I fear they will not be inclined to touch this session. There is the export duty on logs. I live in a part of the country which feels this evil very much—that is the right to send our logs out of Canada to the United States without any export duty being charged, and the right to send pulp wood out of this country free of duty. We have only a limited timber area to-day, especially of white pine. That wood is becoming more and more valuable every year. The people to the south of us are anxiously looking to us for that lumber, and they will be obliged to come here for it at no matter what price. Years ago I urged that an export duty should be put on logs. I have always blamed our friends because they did not do so, and I was in hopes that the new men would profit by the experience of the past and move in this direction. But they tell us they are not prepared to put an export duty on logs or pulp wood, although, if they did, they would be the means of bringing hundreds of thousands of dollars of capital from the other side to be invested in the sawing of lumber on this side, and this would give employment to our own people. I trust, therefore, that these hon. gentlemen will reconsider that point and decide to put an export duty on logs.

Let me now proceed to an analysis of the tariff. The hon. Finance Minister has told us that they have a general and a special tariff, and that the Liberal party are pledged to tariff reform. But when we examine this general tariff, we find that in it there is no such thing as tariff reform. A few items are changed from specific to ad valorem duties and a few lines are increased and some others lowered. I remember the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) spending an hour, during the session before last, in attempting to prove that the people of this country were imposed upon by the very high duties on cotton, and he did this, although he is said to be one of the men who inspired this tariff. But, Mr. Speaker, the duties on cotton are higher in the general tariff of this Government than they were before, and higher on the same line of cottons on which the hon. gentleman declared the duties were too high. We have also heard the hon. gentleman who now fills the Chair of Speaker (Mr. Edgar) prove conclusively to his own mind that the cotton manufacturers of this country were impoverishing the people and enriching themselves by means of the too high duties imposed. And yet, these duties have been raised still higher.

I come now to the subject of the reciprocal tariff. The first question I ask is, have we the constitutional right to make such a tariff? I endeavoured to elicit that information from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other night, but I regret to say that the very dignified and courteous reply I got, was: Oh, we were not born yesterday. That is a self-evident fact, and therefore did not require any information from the hon. gentleman to make us aware of it. But the other is not a self-evident fact, and to my mind it was a very pertinent question on which the House should be informed. If these hon. gentlemen have consulted British authorities and obtained a reply, the House ought to know it. That would not be giving away state secrets which must be kept sacred until the negotiations are completed, because there are no negotiations going on between this country and Great Britain with regard to this question. Any information which they may have obtained from the authorities in Great Britain as to their right to make this special tariff should have been given to this House. It is the right of Parliament to expect it and the duty of Parliament to demand it, and these hon. gentlemen are doing less than their duty when they refuse to give it. I do not think it adds to the dignity of a Minister of the Crown to reply in the peevish fashion he did to a pertinent question of this kind, and I do not think that it adds to his credit in the country. If we believed what we have heard lately, we must conclude that we have not the right to make that tariff. While I do not intend to say very much on this question, I cannot refrain from reading clause 15 of the Belgian treaty which is the one that applies to this matter in the case of the most-favoured-nations :

Article XV. The produce or manufacture of Belgium, shall not be subject in the British colonies to higher duties than those imposed on goods of British origin.

Now, British and Belgian goods come in to-day at the same duties. Will the Belgian goods be subject to higher duties or not? The hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) said undoubtedly they will. Then, I say, that will be a deliberate violation of that article of the treaty, so far as I can understand it. Lord Ripon said, in answer to the report made by Lord Jersey regarding the Colonial Conference, which was held in this city in 1894 :

Clause 15 in the Belgian, and clause 17 in the German, treaty do not prevent differential treatment by the United Kingdom in favour of the British colonies, they do not prevent differential treatment by the British colonies in favour of each other, but they do prevent differential treatment by the British colonies in favour of the United Kingdom.

Will the hon. gentleman answer that by saying that this is not a differential tariff? That may be the case in the sense that it make the same offer to Belgium as to England and every other country, but what is the spirit of the Belgian treaty? Belgium says : We entered into that treaty long ago, in the year 1862, and under it we were to have the right to put our goods into any British colony at the same rates of duty as English goods. Have we that right under this tariff? The reply is, of course, certainly not. But hon. gentlemen opposite say : We have made them an offer contingent on their doing something. What is that something? It is that they reduce their tariff to us. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no contingency in this Belgian treaty. That treaty secures to Belgium absolutely the right to enter her goods into British colonies at the same rate of duties as English goods, and they can safely say to us : We are not called upon to regard any contingency. We demand the advantages we secured under that tariff in 1862, and we have a right to demand them. And what is the result? The Belgian consul in Montreal says: We expect your customs collector to understand it, and not to charge higher duties on Belgian goods than are charged on those of England. If he does not understand it, we can only apply to our home government, give them the information and let them do as they like. I think this is a deliberate violation of that clause of the Belgian treaty ; and, if so, it is a violation of article 7 of the German treaty, because it is practically the same. What does that mean? Either the goods from other countries, come under the lower tariff or they do not. If they do not, then we violate one of the treaty obligations of England ; and it is said and very properly said, in effect, that as soon as a nation disregards its own treaties it practically declares war against the nation aggrieved. If a nation does not respect its own treaties, its national word is worth nothing, and this must lead to trouble. If the goods of these countries do come in at a reduction under the new tariff as we believe they have a right to come in, what does that mean? It means that we are going to receive at the lower rates the goods from the Argentine Confederation, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Chili, Colombia, Corea, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, German Zollverein, Liberia, Madagascar, Morocco, Muscat, Persia, Portugal, Russia, Sandwich Islands, Siam, South African Republic, Spain, Sweden and Norway, Swiss Confederation, Tunis, Uruguay, and Venezuela. It means that the goods from those countries must come in under the lower tariff if we are to observe the favoured-nation clause, and I do not see how we are to get round it. It seems that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is not very strong in his conviction, that we have the right, because, in speaking of that he says "that it will be found that the passage of the tariff we have at one and the same time rung the death-knell of protection." We have done that, but we have done more than that. He said that the ex-Finance Minister asked for a precedent but that it was utterly unprecedented.

Mr. SPROULE.

I believe the world will agree with him in that. But it would be better if there was a precedent. He says further :

As to England, I submit that the case is very different. Our Government intend to bring the matter of our relation with Great Britain to a head,—

He is not satisfied.

--and if the Opposition in this House possess real courage and patriotism, they will accept the advice tendered to them by the London "Times." I say, Sir, that, instead of carping at the proposal, they should be glad to help it forward. Sir, in time past these hon. gentlemen have made every hustings ring, have made the floors of Parliament ring, with their professions of loyalty and devotion to the old flag. They have a chance to prove their loyalty now. They have repeatedly declared their desire to show independence of the United States. They have declared, some of them, that they wished Canada would assert herself. Canada is asserting herself now. Let them stand by us, shoulder to shoulder, and help us to assert ourselves in the eyes of the world.

It seems he is not certain whether we can do so or not, but he has taken the ground that we should take action first, and find out afterwards whether we can carry it out. He has taken a leap in the dark, and does not know what the consequences of that leap may be. There is one feature of this matter that attracted my attention. They have amongst them Sir Oliver Mowat as Minister of Justice. He is regarded as a high legal authority. When he was Premier of Ontario he had a great deal to do with some questions concerning which absolute knowledge was not in his possession. Take, for instance, the temperance question. Did he first pass a prohibition law and say: We will see whether we have the right to pass it or not. No. He said: We do not know whether we have the right to enact a prohibitory law or not. We do not want to throw the country into confusion, and so we will submit the question to the highest authority, and if they decide that we have the power to act, we will act. But this is a comparatively small matter beside the one that is now before us. This may mean a disturbance of international trade and of the relations between England and her colonies, and between England and other countries. It means a great disturbance of trade with our own country. But, still, hon. gentlemen opposite, think it is not worth while to ascertain whether they have a right to adopt any such legislation as this or not. They proceed to act first, and the country may take the consequences.

We have heard a great deal of what the British papers have said in eulogy of what the Canadian Government has done. I do not wonder at it. We have given them concessions in our market for which they give us nothing in return. Would not any nation eulogize a people that would do that for them? In the generosity of their heart the British people are aiming at free trade the world over. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says that this tariff is a step in the direction of free trade. Its effect is to give the British producer a larger market. That being so, why should they not be pleased? Standing here I put myself in a position second to none in my loyalty to the mother country. But my loyalty does not lead me to give away the rights of the people I represent unless I get something in return. I want the mother country to give me something in return for what I give her. We are charged here with a certain duty. What is it? To look after the interests of the people of Canada. The Scripture says: "He that provideth not for his own is worse than an infidel who denies the faith." We are told that England is pleased with this concession. Why should she not be pleased? She gets from us a concession she never got before. She is reaching after the ideal of the Cobden Club. Few countries have done for her what we have done; I do not wonder that she is pleased. But we have no right to give away Canada's estates and rights, which are valuable to her, without getting something in return. We as Canadians are willing to do our duty, but we should not be called upon to do more than our duty. Now, assuming that we have the right to make this tariff, I come to the second phase of it. What does it mean? It means that within a year from 30th of next June, at latest, a tariff change will commence that will reduce our revenue by $3,782,000 a year, according to our importations of the last year or two. Now, that has got to be made up in some way. It can only be made up, as my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has said, by increased importations in these lines or a higher duty on some other lines of goods. Assume that there are to be increased importations? What does that mean to the manufacturers of Canada? It means the killing off of some of their industries. It means an increase in the importation of cotton, which will strike at the cotton man. It means an increase in the importations of woollens, which will strike at the woollen men. Representatives of lines say that they cannot stand it if the tariff is reduced. Now, we take the first year. A reduction of one-eighth in the tariff, according to the importations of the present year, would mean a falling off of $1,891,000 of revenue. Then it is a serious drawback to the raising of a revenue in that respect; but on the other hand, if it brings in goods enough to make it up, then it is a very serious thing for the manufacturers of the country. Now, what does it mean to the manufacturers of the country? They think they are barely able now to live under the tariff that has been in force, which is a protective tariff. Well, it means that the tariff will be lowered to three-fourths of what it is to-day, or one-fourth inside of two years. What does it mean to the farmers of the country? Let me show the change that it will make in some of the principal articles of produce:

	Old Tariff.	New Tariff.
Apples	40c. per brl.	30c. per brl.
Beans	15c. per bush.	11½c. per bush.
Buckwheat	10c. do	7½c. do
Pease	10c. do	7½c. do
Potatoes	15c. do	11½c. do
Rye	10c. do	7½c. do
Rye flour	50c. per brl.	37½c. per brl.
Hay	$2.00 per ton.	$1.50 per ton.
Barley	30c. per bush.	22½c. per bush.
Meats	2c. per lb.	1½c. per lb.
Corn meal	40c.	18½c.
Oats	10c. per bush.	7½c. per bush.
Oatmeal	20 p. c.	15 p. c.
Wheat	15	8

Now, I would like to ask the Canadian farmer what it means to him. In 1879 we put a duty of about one and a half cents a pound on meats, but we found that the lowering in values on the other side was so great that the Americans commenced to send their meat into Canada in increasing quantities, until in 1890, they sent in thirty-three million pounds of meat to feed Canadians. We asked the Government to increase the duty, we asked it for two or three years, and they finally put it up about ½ a cent a pound, in round figures, and what was the result? Inside of one year it shut out fourteen million pounds of meat. But if the Government reduce it half a cent a pound to-day, as they do under that new schedule, provided the Americans do, then it must come in again. I would like the farmers to understand this, because it will mean a very serious thing to them when this new schedule gets to work. Then take corn. Corn is free to-day, but there was a duty put on corn in 1878 because it was coming in in large quantities, it was lowering the price of the Canadian farmers' coarse grains, of the Canadian farmers' oats, barley and pease. These are the coarse grains raised, at least, in my part of the country. Where the farmers turn their attention to feed solely, they want cheap feed; but the most of them have not reached that stage yet, like my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan). They have not yet become feeders of cattle solely, they are farmers in the agricultural sense of the word, and they are making their money largely out of coarse grains. Now, I say that free corn to-day must seriously reduce the value of their grains. What will be the effect in the western counties of Ontario, in Essex, and Kent and Middlesex and Brant? What will be the effect where they raise so much corn? I see the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) who lives at West Toronto Junction, dissents. Does he think that it will be all right? I think he has severed his connection with that part of the country, but if he is not interested in free corn, I would like to ask his farmer friends if they like it. When they only sold their corn for 19 and 20 cents this year, do they want to have free corn coming in from the other side?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Corn is two or three cents higher now.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be at the present time, but what has been the ruling price for the year? The farmers around Owen Sound know that at certain seasons of the year, during navigation Americans can bring in corn from Chicago for one or one and a half cents per bushel, at low freight rates. And when you can bring it in for a cent a bushel, it comes directly into competition with the peas of the farmers of Canada. There is no doubt of it. Peas are worth 40 cents per bushel there to-day, corn is worth 24 to 26 cents in Chicago, and can be laid down at 25¼ cents in Owen Sound during the season of navigation, if the freightage happen to be the same this year as in past years. If you can buy fifty-six pounds of corn for 25 cents, will you be likely to pay 40 cents for sixty pounds of peas? No, Sir; the hon. member for Huron would not do that, because he is feeding for the money he can get out of it; therefore, he is going to buy corn from the western United States farmers. That is going to take the place of the peas and the oats, and the barley, of the Canadian farmer. There is no doubt about it. I saw it done years ago in my own village, and it will be done again. There is no doubt that when the farmers come to see the operation of this tariff, and to feel its effects, they will not agree with the hon. gentlemen that it is to their advantage that they should have free corn. Then we are told that it is not going to be made free when used by distillers. Now, if they keep the duty on corn to the distillers, what will happen. The seedsmen in our country import corn and sell it to the farmers, and when they have a lot of it on hand, they will turn around and sell it to the distillers. What is to hinder them selling it to the distillers? Under the old system which allowed corn to be brought in free for seed, a declaration is made by the seedsmen in Toronto that the corn is to be used as seed, and the retail seedsmen sells them for that purpose, but when they have any left over it is sold for feed. And if it can be sold to the farmers for feed, what is to prevent them selling it to distillers? I have seen it brought in and come into competition with our own grain as food for the stock of the country, because the seedsmen brought it in and sold it for seed, and the farmers then turned round and used it for food. Now, what is to hinder the distillers getting their corn free in the same way? The farmers will have corn free, and the distillers as well. That corn-growing country in the west, where so many farmers live, will they be pleased? I do not think they will. I am quite sure they will not be pleased, therefore I say that does not satisfy our requirements. But this tariff will have serious effects in other ways. There was a barb wire factory shut down; there was a woolen factory in Perth closed down a few days ago, and another closed up in Peterboro,

I am told, by the change that was made in the tariff. When the manufacturers know the great change that is made and what it will mean to them, they will not be pleased. It will mean throwing out of employment hundreds of Canadian labourers, and sending our money to feed labourers in England and Germany, and other countries who are manufacturing goods for us. We as Canadians do not want that to be done. We want to give employment to labour at home, we want the labourers of our country to live and to keep their families alive in comfort. We want to give them fair wages, we want their wages to be spent in this country; therefore I say that if goods come in under that new schedule it is going to affect injuriously the manufacturers of this country. But we were told by the Finance Minister the other night that they have no right to expect very much from him, because he said that they got the benefits of the tariff while it was in force. He thinks these people have no right to look unpleasant, but that they must bear the consequences. Well, that is not a very agreeable thing to tell a man when he is losing his means of living, when he is losing the money that he has invested in manufactures. Therefore, I do not think that he will be very liable to praise the Government for the new tariff that they have given. I stand squarely upon the question of protection, as I have always stood. I believe it is the policy for Canada; I believe that the interests of Canada demand it as much to-day as it ever did, and I believe we will require it in the future. I am to-day unalterably on that platform, and I will remain there. So far as this tariff makes no changes in the old tariff I have little complaint to make, but in regard to the favoured-nation clause I take strong exception to it.

Finally, I will deal with two questions involved in these resolutions. There are two vicious and unsound principles in these tariff resolutions. The first is the granting of power to the Controller of Customs, subject to the Governor in Council, to say what countries shall have the advantage of the favoured-nation schedule. What does that mean? It means placing vast powers in the hands of the Controller of Customs. To my mind, it practically places in the hands of the Controller, subject to the Governor in Council, the right to make treaties. We do not, in this tariff, specify that if a certain duty is imposed on certain specified articles, and the country from which they come take off or reduce the duty on similar articles of ours going to their country, then we will make concessions to them as was the case with our offer of 1879 to the United States. We then provided that when the United States gave us the freedom of their market for certain articles, then we would give reciprocity in the articles affected. That was definite and specific, but this is neither definite nor specific. The British Parliament has never placed this power in the hands of the Governor in Council there. England has never given us the power to make treaties, which have to be made through England; but this Government is giving the Controller of Customs, governed by the action of the Governor in Council, the right to make treaties. He will consider whether Germany should come under the favoured-nation clause. He will say to that country: if you lower your duty to a certain extent, we will let you come in under the new tariff; if not, we will refuse you the benefit of the preferential clause. This action is not subject to the review of Parliament, but the Controller of Customs will have the power to take action, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council; in other words, the Governor in Council will have the right to make treaties with other countries, if my interpretation be correct. I hold it is correct. This I contend is a vicious and unsound principle; there is precedent for it; it is another leap in the dark, and it is a proposition which should not be allowed to pass this House.

The other vicious principle is that involved in the power given to the Governor in Council to say what articles are under combines, and what reductions should be made in the duty on the same class of articles coming from abroad, or whether the duties should be taken off absolutely. What does this involve? It says to every manufacturer that if you make any arrangement to raise the price, the Government can call you to account; they can bring you before them, and if on examination it is found that you have arranged your business or output with others in the same line so that the price is increased an Order in Council can be passed lowering the duty or placing said articles on the free list. That is taken from an American Act, which I remember reading a few years ago, but it involves a principle which has never been acknowledged here. It places in the power of the Governor in Council control over the manufacturers of the country, a power which might be used in the spirit of blackmail. They might bring manufacturers here and inform them that they had their line of business under review, and if they did not support the party pretty well, they would change the duty, but if they made peace with the Government, it would be all right. Parliament should not place in the hands of the Governor General in Council that power, for it would lead to evil most assuredly. Admitting that hon. gentlemen opposite might exercise this power properly, honourably and honestly, all governments might not so act, and perhaps the Government of the party with which I am connected might not act properly, and therefore I hold this power should not be conferred on any Administration. In that respect the tariff resolutions are entirely wrong, and this principle should be changed. We should not place in the hands of the Controller of Customs, subject to the Governor in Council, the right to say what nation should come under the favoured-nation clause. Further, we should not give power to the Governor in Council to reduce or remove entirely duties on any articles as that body might see fit. As regards the tariff, in some respects I am satisfied with it. If the general tariff were allowed to remain, I should not have much complaint to make; but in regard to other features I am very much opposed to them on the grounds that they are not in the interest of Canada, that they are radically wrong and unsound in principle and that they are not what Canada requires. We require a protective tariff to-day as much as it ever was required in the history of the country, and in my opinion we should stand by such a tariff.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss at any great length the merits of the tariff, and I shall devote my efforts largely to a discussion of a few features of it as those features affect Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Before, however, I enter upon a discussion of these points I wish to make one remark with respect to a statement made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). The hon. gentleman spoke of his loyalty and with a great flourish he announced that he would take back water to no man in the Empire as regards his loyalty to the British Crown, and then he went on to say with respect to the tariff that his idea of loyalty was that he would give nothing unless he obtained something in return. It occurred to me that that was putting the question of loyalty on a dollar and cent basis, and I do not think it reflected very much credit on the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman. He seemed greatly disturbed because of the article which the London "Times" has published applauding Canada for its tariff, and he also sought to make some explanations with respect to the same. I will read, with the permission of the House, a despatch which appears in the "Globe" of to-day with respect to a motion of which notice has been given in the Imperial House by Sir Charles E. H. Vincent, and I call attention to the fact that that gentleman is a Conservative and a free trader. The motion reads as follows:—

The House expresses grateful and fraternal recognition to the Government and people of the Dominion of Canada of the generous fiscal changes in favour of British trade and labour, announced on Friday by the Parliament of Ottawa and already in force, and hopes this first step towards a commercial federation of the Empire will be followed by Australasia, South Africa and the other colonies.

The Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. J. O. Chamberlain, replying, said the Government cordially appreciated the friendly spirit shown by the tariff action of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE.

I call particular attention to these remarks as coming from one of the foremost British statesmen in the British Empire.

But, he added, I understand the proposals do not depend upon any alteration of the system of free trade established in the United Kingdom.

Now, Sir, if you will permit me, I should like to supplement this motion with a poem which appears in the London "Times" from the pen of Rudyard Kipling, probably the future poet laureate of the British Empire:

A nation spoke to a nation,
A queen sent word to a throne:
Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own.
The gates are mine to open
As the gates are mine to close,
And I set my house in order,
Said the Lady of the Snows.

Neither with laughter nor weeping,
Fear or the child's amaze,
Soberly under the white man's law
My white men go their ways.
Not for the gentile's clamour,
Insult or threat of blows,
Bow we the knee to Baal,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

My speech is clean and single,
I talk of common things,
Words of the wharf and market-place
And the ware the merchant brings.
Favour to those I favour,
But a stumbling-block for my foes,
Many there be that hate us,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

I called my chiefs to council,
In the din of a troubled year,
For the sake of a sign ye could not see,
And a word ye would not hear.
This is our message and answer,
This is the path we chose,
For we be also a people,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

Carry the word to my sisters,
To the Queens of the East and South.
I have proved faith in the heritage
By more than the word of mouth.
They that are wise may follow,
Ere the world's war trumpet blows,
But I, I am the first in the battle,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

A nation spoke to a nation,
A queen sent word to a throne:
Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own.
The gates are mine to open
As the gates are mine to close,
And I abide by my mother's house,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss the tariff especially from the point of view of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I may say at the outset that when I decided to enter parliamentary life, and when I went into the constituency of Lisgar, I told the farmers of that county on every platform: Gentleman, it makes no difference to you whether the Government in power at Ottawa is labelled Grit or Tory ; but it does make a great difference to you whether that Government shall do right or do wrong by you. I said to them : Gentlemen, you have been persistently misrepresented at Ottawa for the last fifteen years ; the men whom you sent as your delegates always failed to tell the House of Commons and to tell the people of the country what the disabilities were under which you laboured. I said, further : Gentleman, if you send me to Ottawa, whether it be a Conservative Government or a Liberal Government that is in power, I shall stand up and tell them what I think your wants are. It is because of that pledge that I address this House to-night.

An hon. MEMBER. What about Bob Watson ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. A worthy member calls my attention to the fact that there was an exception to the Manitoba representation in the case of the Hon. Robert Watson. I am pleased to stand corrected, because all will bear witness that Mr. Watson was a faithful representative of Manitoba in this Parliament

I am here, in some respects, in a different position from many other members. I had a Patron opposed to me until a short time before the election. He, however, was a Conservative Patron, and when it was pointed out to him that if he remained in the field he would jeopardise the chances of the Conservative candidate—my opponent, he good-naturedly decided to retire from the contest, and leave a straight fight between the president of the Conservative Association of Manitoba and myself. I said to the Patrons, and I said to the Liberals, and to all who attended my meetings : Gentlemen, I am not obliged to make any professions with regard to Patronism, but I pledge you my word that if you elect me to the House of Commons I, at least, will be as good a Patron as will be sent to the House from any part of Canada ; and I hope, before I have concluded, Mr. Speaker, that you and the House will agree with me that I have redeemed my pledge in that regard.

I want to say a word with regard to the west. It has been the custom for many years to regard the people of the west as chronic kickers, and daily I hear the epithet used. It has been the custom to consider that we in the west are always desiring more than the people of the east consider to be our share. Well, Sir, the people of the west have laboured under great disabilities, and to these I wish to address myself briefly. I consider it to be my duty to speak of these things, because we in the west who have been pioneers, we in the west who have borne the burden and heat of the day, are but trustees for eastern Canada for the care and development of that country. We have not had that development in the west which we should have had. I was pained indeed to hear the Hon. Mr. Sifton, now Minister of the Interior, at a banquet tendered him in the city of Winnipeg, declare that during the last ten years as many people had left the province of Manitoba as had come into it. That is a deplorable condition of affairs, and it behooves the members of this Parliament to turn their attention to it, and to find out what the reasons for it are. When we think of the glowing pictures that were drawn in regard to the progress of that country some twelve or fifteen years ago, we must all agree that its condition to-day is a great disappointment to our people. The people of that country endure many hardships. They have no coal worth speaking of, and wood is scarce. In the severe cold of the winter many a farmer is obliged to drive twenty or twenty-five miles for a load of wood. It is all very well to talk about the people of the west being constantly complaining, but I am sure the House will agree with me that they have many reasons to complain, and if they had not, Manitoba would now be one of the most thickly populated provinces of the Dominion, for it certainly has rare natural advantages, and a soil than which there is none more fertile on the face of the earth. Notwithstanding that, it must be confessed with humiliation that our province has not made the progress we expected. The country is inland, far removed from eastern Canada, and is therefore entitled to special consideration. It has suffered very severely from heavy railway freights, and unfortunately there seems to be little prospect of obtaining relief in that respect. Many of us have come to think that Manitoba and the west should receive special treatment, and that it might be the part of wisdom for this Government to deal in a particular manner with the province of Manitoba, even if we were to go the length of giving it a special tariff.

My own view with regard to the settlement of that country is that the best immigration policy is to make the settlers happy and contented. My deep and abiding conviction is that 5,000 happy, contented and prosperous settlers in that province are worth more than the expenditure of $1,000,000 a year to bring immigrants from foreign countries. If you do not make the people who live there happy and contented, they will leave the country, and they will write to their friends warning them against going there. I repeat, Sir, that the true immigration policy is to make the settlers of the west contented and happy. It is not our country, Mr. Speaker ; it is your country ; it belongs to the Dominion of Canada at large. The Dominion of Canada has a very great stake in that country ; and in considering this question, I think all true statesmen and friends of Canada will be disposed to meet together and devise means for the development and up-building of that country, and rendering its people contented and happy.

At the last general election the people of that country looked forward to a possible change in their political representatives, and it was with considerable regret when the polls closed on the 23rd of June, that we in the west had to recognize the fact that we had not sent a solid delegation against the late Government which had so mismanaged affairs in Manitoba and the North-west. But, Sir, this House and the country are well aware why we were not able to send that solid delegation. We were practically taken by the throat and throttled, the ballot-boxes were stuffed, and a special effort was made to send members to this House who would vote for the coercion of the province of Manitoba. But I ask you and the House to look at the result of the polling in Manitoba yesterday, when nearly 1,200 majority was given in the city of Winnipeg in favour of the Liberal candidate and this Government, and between 300 and 400 majority was given in the constituency of Macdonald for the Liberal candidate there. I think that is the best vindication that the province of Manitoba requires.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I promised to refer to a few of the disabilities under which that province laboured, and I will do so. Let me briefly call the attention of the House to the tariff as it existed, and as I regret to say it still exists, on fruits. The amount of duty paid on fruits at Winnipeg last year was $58,000. Peaches to the value of $6,063 paid a duty of $2,223; plums to the value of $6,727 paid a duty of $1,681; pears to the value of $4,134 paid a duty of $827; strawberries to the value of $2,299 paid a duty of $502; cherries to the value of $768 paid a duty of $138; grapes to the value of $3,086 paid a duty of $1,333; lemons to the value of $31,000 paid a duty of $3,423. It will surprise the House to know that the people of that country pay as much as five cents for a single peach and from five to seven cents for a single pear; and the folly of protection on these articles will be illustrated when I point out that the duty affords very little protection to Ontario fruit, because the fruit imported from the United States is usually imported at a period when the Ontario fruit is not available, and in many cases the Ontario fruit would not stand the long railway or lake passage to that country. The duty on peaches is nineteen cents a box, and five cents on the box, which is no good. The duty on strawberries is two cents a pound, or six cents a box. There are children in Manitoba and the North-west who rarely, if ever, taste fruit at all. In country places it is rare to find any fruit ever brought into the home of the settler. On apples, the duty is forty cents a barrel, and that duty practically amounted to the value of a barrel of apples in Ontario last season. Apples are about the only fruit within the range of the farmers of Manitoba. To illustrate how we suffer in regard to fruit, I may say that one of my colleagues, I think the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), made the statement to-day that a car-load of apples delivered in Prince Albert cost some $600 and of that entire amount the cost of the apples was but $136, the duty and freight amounting to nearly $500 on the car-load. Bananas are thirty-five cents a pound in the country. It takes about a bushel of wheat to purchase a pound of bananas.

I will invite your attention briefly to the duty on lumber. The high price of lumber practically compels farmers to live in that rigorous climate in poor houses, and without shelter for their stock. It is almost impossible for them to engage in mixed farming with lumber at the present price, because they cannot afford to buy lumber to construct byres for their cattle and other buildings necessary. Along the line of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, rough lumber is from $3 to $7 per thousand cheaper than it is along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, owing to competition on these grades. The Premier of Manitoba, the Hon. Mr. Greenway, informed me the other day that he was able to bring in lumber from the United States and take it on the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway to a point called Mariopolis, some twenty miles from his home, and then cart it that distance, and yet save $200 on the lumber required for his barn, as compared with the cost of Canadian lumber. Mr. Kenneth McKenzie, one of the pioneer settlers of Manitoba, the gentleman who was defeated by Dr. Rutherford in Macdonald yesterday, made the remarkable statement in Winnipeg to the tariff commissioners, the Minister of Finance and the Controller of Customs, that he had put up buildings twenty-four years ago with lumber which had to be floated down the Red River and that he had got it just as cheap as it was at present, with all the railway facilities that exist. I am sure you will agree with me that that is a remarkable state of affairs, and I would urge on the Government the desirability of revising its tariff with regard to lumber, and if possible reducing the duty and relieving the people of Manitoba and the North-west. Let me read in this connection a letter which I received two or three days ago from a constituent of mine:

Pilot Mound, April 14th, 1897.

R. L. Richardson, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Owing to so many manufacturers' deputations having met the Tariff Commissioners since Messrs. Fielding and Paterson met the western people, at Winnipeg, it has been deemed advisable that each delegate write to the M.P. for the constituency in which he resides, to press the claims of the farmers' delegation on the Government and the House at the revision of the tariff. It will not be necessary to go over the whole ground again, and, to be short, I shall only emphasize one item. I will touch on lumber.

The early settlers obtained from the woods logs of sufficient size to construct houses for themselves and stables for their stock. This source of supply being limited, has been exhausted years ago. The farmer to-day has to use lumber, but, owing to a combine, prices are forced up, and farmers whose market towns are along the C.P.R. lines, cannot buy lumber at the same rates as those along the N.P.R. This fact was prominently brought out at the last session of the local House. The facts, so far as lumber is concerned, are as follows:—

The great majority of farmers are in need of lumber for stables, granaries and dwellings. New settlers on vacant, or partly improved, land, are in the same position. They have to use lumber or sods.

Twenty thousand farmers could expend $1,000 each in lumber, amounting in the aggregate to $20,000,000, and then not be half through building. This does not include what the new settlers that we expect, will require, neither does it include what would be used in building in cities and towns. Dairying and stock-farming are a necessity for profitable returns to the farmer. He requires buildings for live stock and buildings for his feed. Were the hon. commissioners to visit the farmers in Manitoba in February and March last, they would require no argument that this is a vital necessity.

At Swan Lake, on the N.P.R., the prices of lumber are as follows. These rates are lower than on the C.P.R.:—

	Price. Per M.	Duty. Per M.
Inch siding, No. 2.....	$21.00	$2.75
do do 1.....	26.00	4.00
Flooring, No. 2.....	21.00	2.75
do do 1.....	26.00	4.00
Dimension lumber.....	16.50	Free.
Shingles	2.50	Free.

I have also a copy of a letter which of itself clearly establishes a combine in lumber, besides what was proven before the commissioners in Winnipeg:

“ Vancouver, B.C., March 15th, 1897.

“ Messrs.....
“, Man.

“ Gentlemen,—We shall be glad to quote for shingles, in reply to yours of the 9th inst. But must first ask if you are an active member of the Western Retail Lumberman's Association, of which we are honorary members.

“ Yours truly,

“ (Signed) E. H. HEAP & Co.”

Here will be a chance to operate that provision with regard to crushing out combines. When the commissioners were in Manitoba, it was clearly proven that a combine existed in lumber in that country, and I hope that should evidence be furnished later on to prove that that combine still exists, the Government will take the matter into its serious consideration and crush out that combine by removing the duty on lumber. The writer continues:

The parties I got the letter from do not wish me to use their name. Like all business letters in up-to-date offices, it is type-written. I trust, and confidently expect, that the western members and the Government will do what is in the interest of the west, and that, as the Hon. Mr. Fielding remarked when closing the session at Winnipeg, that the revision of the tariff will be in the right direction.

The American lumberman obtains his logs practically from the same forests, whether those forests be in the Lake of the Woods country or B.C., one north, the other south of the boundary line. Why cannot the Canadian lumberman put lumber on the market at as low a rate as the American?

In the battle for a decent tariff, the west is watching you. I have no doubt but that the member for Lisgar will do his duty.

Yours truly,

D. A. STEWART.

Delegate for the Constituency of Mountain.

And now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point made about getting lumber from the province of British Columbia, I may reply that that seems almost hopeless in view of the high rates of freight which exists. I was informed by a gentleman who purchased the lumber that on one car which cost him $114, the freight alone was $147 or considerably more than the price of the lumber itself. The statement was freely made that lumber sells on an average $3 to $5 per thousand cheaper in Dakota and Minnesota than in Manitoba, and yet this lumber comes pretty much from the same source. I heard a very prominent farmer, named Ben Swanson of Manitou, make the statement before the tariff commission in Winnipeg that the cost of lumber used in a barn for which a neighbour had secured an estimate was for Canadian lumber $1,200, while he was able to procure the same lumber from the States for $800.

Now, I propose to refer very briefly to the question of coal oil. That, if you will allow me to make a pun, was a burning issue during the recent elections in Manitoba. The farmers who appeared at our meetings asserted with gravity and sincerity—and I have no reason whatever to doubt their statements—that coal oil can be bought in Pembina, a very short distance south of the international boundary line, for from 10 to 12½ cents per gallon, and it is retailed at Emerson, just a few hundred yards north of the international boundary line, on the Canadian side, at 35 cents. The average price throughout Manitoba and the Northwest is from 40 to 50 cents per gallon. It is only fair to say in this connection that six gallons of American oil are only equal to five gallons of Canadian oil, for the Canadian measure is Imperial and the other is wine measurement. To illustrate still more strongly how deeply that country suffers from the exorbitant price we pay for coal oil, I need only mention that it takes one bushel of wheat to buy one gallon of coal oil.

Mr. DUGAS. It will take two bushels under this last tariff.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Wheat is going up and coal oil is going down.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The price of wheat this last season was something over 60 cents, so that a bushel of wheat would purchase more than a gallon of coal oil this season. As a matter of fact, farmer after farmer rose in our meetings throughout the province of Manitoba and declared that they were only able to secure one gallon of coal oil for one bushel of wheat. Owing to many considerations the price of wheat has been much higher this last season than it has been on an average for many years past. Of course the higher price of coal oil is not wholly due to the duty. We suffer especially in the matter of coal oil from the high freights. It is also fair to state that the retailer charges a very high profit on coal oil. We also suffer from the restriction in connection with the bringing in of coal oil in tank cars and also from the duty on barrels.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the difficulty about tank cars ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood that there were certain restrictions in this respect, that we were not allowed to distribute the coal oil in the North-west in these tank cars—that we could not send a tank car, for instance, to Regina or Prince Albert. I believe American oil is barrelled before it comes in the country, and I think I am correct in saying that at least most of the Canadian coal oil is put in barrels in eastern Canada. I believe that, under the law and regulations, we are unable to distribute the imported product in tank cars throughout the country.

Mr. FRASER (East Lambton). If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I would state for the information of himself and other hon. members that the barrelling of coal oil for the North-west is done in Winnipeg. I would also like to say a word as to the price at Pembina, which, I think, he stated at 12½ cents, while the price a short distance away on the Canadian side is 35 cents. It is quite manifest that the price a short distance from the border on the Canadian side should be the price on the American side plus the duty. Now, 12½ cents plus 6 cents duty would be 18 cents if the gallons were the same.

Mr. WALLACE. It would be 5 cents duty, allowing for the wine gallon.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton). Yes, the imperial gallon is one-fifth larger than the wine gallon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Continuing my remarks I may say that I was disappointed that the Government announced a reduction of only 1 cent per gallon on the duty on coal oil. We in the west had advocated free coal oil. I may say that I scarcely expected that we might be able to get it free, but we fondly hoped, at least, to have the duty cut in two. However, something has been promised us in regard to the removal of these restrictions; and gentlemen connected with the coal oil trade inform me that the removal of these restrictions will represent a further reduction of 1½ cents or 1¾ cents per gallon. Assuming this to be correct the change amounts almost to cutting the duty in two. I sincerely hope it will be so. I have just one brief observation with regard to the coal oil industry itself. The petroleum produced from the Canadian oil fields, as it comes from the earth is inferior to the American article. I am informed that it is supercharged with sulphur, the extraction of which is a very costly process to which the American crude oil has not to be subjected.

I come now to deal with the question of agricultural implements. The figures I will quote were given before the Tariff Commission when it sat in Winnipeg, and I have no reason to believe that they are not accurate; for, according to my recollection, and I attended all the sessions of the commission there, I heard none of these figures contradicted. Now, a binder which would sell for $100 in Ontario costs the settlers of our province $145. The McCormack or American binder sells retail for $119 south of the line, in Manitoba for $155. To demonstrate the enormous profit on binders you will allow me to cite one circumstance. Some years ago an accident happened to a train load of McCormack binders in the United States, and according to the court record, I understand, the claim which the manufacturers put in for these binders was only $36 a piece. A seeder made in Brantford for $17 sells in Winnipeg for $70. The duty on a binder is $20, and on a mower $8. If you estimate the duty on a farmer's entire outfit, I am told on good authority, that it will be found to be about $500. I am sure the House will agree with me that that is an enormous tax for the settlers in the North-west to pay. Then there is the question of arbitrary valuation at the international boundary. The binder which is most popular in Manitoba and the North-west is the McCormack, the American binder. This is said by the settlers to be, far and away, the best binder that has ever been produced on this continent. But, when they are imported into our province under the regulations of the late Government which, I understand, are being carried out now, instead of these binders being admitted at $80, the price at which they are invoiced to the dealer in the United States, they are entered at $100. Thus the settler in Manitoba is obliged to pay 20 per cent, not on the price of the implement, but on the arbitrary valuation of $100.

Mr. WALLACE. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that $80 is the price to the dealer. Has he any evidence of that ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no evidence.

Mr. WALLACE. I deny the statement, and I can prove the contrary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I informed the House these figures were given before the Tariff Commission in Winnipeg and I never heard them disputed. If I did not believe them to be strictly accurate I would not repeat them in this House.

Mr. WALLACE. Did the McCormacks give these figures?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know anything of what the McCormacks gave. My belief is, from corroborative statements given to me, that these figures are strictly accurate. I was going on to say that the figures show that instead of paying 20 per cent, the settlers are paying at least 25 per cent for these implements. I would urge upon the Government, inasmuch as they have not seen fit to reduce the duty on binders, the desirability of having the restriction of this arbitrary valuation removed, and so enable the settlers in the country to secure their implements at the valuation which, I believe, is placed upon the implements in the United States. There is another important point to be considered in this connection. American machinery is universally acknowledged by the settlers throughout Manitoba and the North-west to be much superior to the Canadian-made article. In order to satisfy myself upon that point, I made careful inquiries from a considerable number of settlers; and when I was out visiting my old homestead about 50 miles from here, a couple of weeks ago, I questioned my brother and a number of his fellow farmers on that point, and they all assured me that the American implement was a much better one than those manufactured in Canada. Now, if that is so, you will recognize the importance of having these restrictions removed in order that the settlers may have the best implements at the lowest price. I am told that the life of an American implement is much longer than that of a Canadian implement. It is only fair for me to say, however, in that connection, that I discussed that point in Ottawa a few days ago with the general manager of the Massey-Harris Company and he asserted positively that the Canadian implement was equal in every respect to the American implement, that the steel was as good, that the iron was as good, and that in fact everything that enters into the manufacture of that implement, was equally as good as that used in the United States. In order to be perfectly fair, I present these two statements, the one from men who have no interest in saying that the Canadian implement is inferior, the other from a gentleman who is interested in saying that it is not; and I will leave the House to judge which evidence they wish to accept. Now, let us take ploughs. The Canadian article, according to such evidence as I have been able to procure in the North-west, never would suit the farmers. Of 80 gang-ploughs sold in Portage la Prairie last season, 72 were of American make. I am sure the House will be astonished at that fact. It must be remembered that our exports must pay for our imports, and pay the interest on the national debt and on foreign loans. The agricultural exports for 1896 amounted to $48,531,000, while the manufacturers' exports amounted to the paltry sum of $2,249,000. It is true that in the rough the manufactured articles exported were put down at 25 million dollars, but this improperly includes 17 million dollars for lumber, the most important article of export next to agricultural products. It will therefore be seen that the exports of farm products paid for the imports. In view of these figures, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that instead of going any distance to assist manufacturers, this House should with one voice be in favour of assisting the agriculturists of Canada. It is said that the manufacturers have some 370 million dollars invested in Canada, and these figures are always used for the purpose of influencing Parliament to protect those industries. But I would make a plea for the farmers of Canada, who have not only 370 million dollars invested, but who have, I think, according to a moderate estimate, about 3 billion dollars invested in this country. They are the class, Mr. Speaker, who should receive the first consideration. Let me read to you a telegram which I received an hour or two ago. An announcement was sent up to the west this afternoon saying that the members from the West would raise their voices on this question; and I received this dispatch:

R. L. Richardson, M.P., House of Commons, Ottawa.

Although products of the mines are insignificant in value, compared with the wheat yield of Manitoba, the Government makes mining machinery free, and leaves the duty on agricultural implements. Tell the House that the greatest mine in the country is the golden fields of Manitoba grain. The inference is obvious.

I am sure that those who have visited the province of Manitoba during harvest time, and all who have studied the figures of the agricultural exports, particularly the wheat exports of Manitoba, will agree with me in saying that Manitoba is indeed a gold mine, and that the farmers of that province should be considered infinitely before the mines of British Columbia.
